THE Editor's aim has been to provide a complete and independent Dictionary of the Bible in a single volume and abreast of present-day scholarship.

1. Complete.—The Dictionary gives an account of all the contents of the Bible, the articles being as numerous as in the largest dictionaries, but written to a different scale. The Index of the Dictionary of the Bible in five volumes by the same Editor has been taken as basis, and such additions made to it as the latest research has suggested. The persons, places, and important events in the Bible are described. There are articles on the Biblical theology and ethics, on the antiquities, and on the languages—English as well as Hebrew and Greek. The books of the Bible are carefully explained in their origin, authorship, and contents; and full account is taken of the results of literary criticism and archaeological discovery.

2. Independent.—The Dictionary is not a condensation of the five-volume Dictionary. It is not based upon it or upon any other dictionary. It is a new and independent work. All the signed, and most of the unsigned, articles are written afresh, and (with few exceptions) by different authors from those who treated the same subjects in the larger Dictionary. Even when the wording of the large Dictionary has been retained, as in the case, for example, of proper names of minor importance, every statement has been verified anew. The single-volume Dictionary will thus be found as fresh and full of life as the largest dictionaries are.

3. In a single volume.—This is to bring the contents of the Bible, in accordance with present scholarship, within reach of those who have not the means to buy or the knowledge to use the Dictionary in five volumes. This Dictionary contains no Hebrew or Greek except in transliteration. It is, however, a large volume, and it would have been larger had not the utmost care been taken to prevent overlapping. For the great subjects are not treated with that excessive brevity which makes single-volume dictionaries often so disappointing. The space has been so carefully hus-banded that it has been found possible to allow 24 pages to the article on Israel; 23 pages to the article on Jesus Christ; and half that number to a further article on the Person of Christ. There is another way in which space has been saved. The whole subject of Magic Divination and Sorcery, for example, has been dealt with in a single article. That article includes many sub-topics, each of which is found in its own place, with a cross-reference to this comprehensive article; and when the word occurs in this article it is printed in black type, so that no time may be lost in searching for it.

4. Abreast of present Scholarship.—That is to say, of the average scholarship of its day. There are many reasons why a Dictionary of the Bible should not take up an extreme position on either side. But the reason which has proved to be most conclusive, is the impossibility of getting the whole of the work done satisfactorily by either very advanced or very conservative scholars. They are not numerous enough. And there could be no satisfaction in entrusting work to men who were chosen for any other reason than their knowledge of the subject.

The Editor would call attention to the Additional Note on the article Assyria and Babylonia, which will be found at the end of the volume.

PRONUNCIATION OF PROPER NAMES

It will be generally agreed that some uniformity in the pronunciation of Scripture Proper Names is extremely desirable. One hears in church and elsewhere, not only what are obvious and demonstrable mispronunciations, but such variety in the mode of pronouncing many names as causes irritation and bewilderment. It is impossible to tell whether a speaker or reader is simply blundering along, or whether he is prepared to justify his pronunciation by reference to some authority, or to base it upon some intelligible principle. If after hearing a name pronounced in a way widely different from that to which we have been accustomed, we refer to some accessible authority, it is by no means improbable that it will be found to support the accentuation or enunciation of which we should previously have been inclined to disapprove.

It is less easy to see how the uniformity desiderated is to be brought about. A committee consisting of representative Biblical and English scholars might draw out a list which would be accepted as a standard, on the assumption that individuals were prepared, for the sake of the desired uniformity, to give up their own personal habits or preferences. It is certain that no authority less distinguished would be recognized. It has therefore been, no doubt, a wise decision on the part of the Editor of the present work not to indicate, as was at one time contemplated, the pronunciation of each proper name as it occurred, at any rate when any difficulty was likely to be experienced. This would simply have been to add another to the numerous, and too often discordant, authorities already existing. Instead, it has been thought better to prepare the way, in some degree, for an authoritative list by discussing briefly some of the principles which should govern its construction.

1. Divergence of authorities.—It may be well at the outset to illustrate that divergence of accessible authorities to which allusion has been made. For this purpose we shall select the four following lists:—(1) That of Professor T. K. Cheyne, D.D., of Oxford, originally contributed to the Queen's Printers' Teachers' Bible of 1877 (Eyre & Spottiswoode); (2) that contributed by Professor W. B. Stevenson, B.D., now of Glasgow, to the Supplementary Volume to Dr. Young's Analytical Concordance (George Adam Young & Co.); (3) that contained in the Appendix to Cassell's English Dictionary, edited by John Williams, M.A. (Cassell & Co.); and (4) that contained in the Illustrated Bible Treasury, edited by Wm. Wright, D.D. (Nelson & Sons). The following names are thus given:

* As it is not stated by whom the lists in Nelson's and Cassell's publications were drawn up, the Editors' names are given as responsible for them.
PRONUNCIATION OF SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES

These examples might be greatly multiplied, particularly in the case of those which might be termed more familiar names in regard to which there are two ruling modes of accentuation, as Ag'abus and Ag'abush, Ahime'leh and Ahim'elech, Bah'urim and Bah'urim, Bath'sheba and Bathshe'ba, Ced'ron and Ce'dron, Mag'dalene and Mag'dalene, Pen'i-el and Pen'i-el, Reh'obo'am and Rehobo'am, Thad'daeus and Thad'daeus. An examination of the lists will show the very considerable extent of the variation which exists even among those who may be regarded as guides in the matter, and it will show also that a great part of the variation may be accounted for by the degree to which the Editors of the respective lists are disposed to give weight to the forms of the word in the original, or to what may be considered the popular and current pronunciation. This is indeed the crux of the matter.

2. Principles adopted.—In what follows we shall keep in view especially the contributions of Professor Cheyne and Professor Stevenson, each of whom explains in an introduction the principles on which he has sought to solve the problem presented; and perhaps we may be allowed once for all to acknowledge our obligations to these able and scholarly discussions. In reference to the point just referred to, Professor Cheyne says:

"Strict accuracy is no doubt unattainable. In some cases (e.g. Moses, Aaron, Solomon, Isaac, Samuel, Jeremia) the forms adopted by the Authorized Version are borrowed from the Septuagint through the medium of the Vulgate. Here the correct pronunciation would require an alteration of familiar names which would be quite intolerable. But even where the current forms are derived from the Hebrew, a strictly accurate pronunciation would offend by introducing a dissonance into the rude but real harmony of our English speech. Besides, that quickness of ear which is necessary for reproducing foreign sounds is conspicuously wanting to most natives of England. Still, the prevalent system of pronouncing Biblical names seems unnecessarily wide of the mark. There is no occasion to offend so gratuitously against the laws of Hebrew sound and composition as we do at present. Not a few of our mispronunciations of Hebrew names impede the comprehension of their meaning, especially in the case of names of religious significance, when the meaning is most fully fraught with instruction. A working compromise between pedantic precision and persistent mispronunciation is surely feasible.'

'It does not offer an absolute standard, for no such standard exists. The supreme authority in pronunciation is prevalent usage (among educated people). But the weakness of such an authority is specially clear in the case of Scripture names. Even names not uncommon are variously pronounced, and many are so unfamiliar that there is no "usage" by which to decide. . . . In actual speech unfamiliar words are pronounced as analogy suggests, unconsciously it may be. . . . There is no single court of appeal. In particular, the original pronunciation is not the only, nor perhaps the chief, influence. If it were better understood how impossible it is to pronounce Hebrew names as the ancient Hebrews did, there would be less temptation to lay stress on the original as the best guide. On the other hand, the closer the incorporation of Scripture names into English, the better; and this also is a consideration entitled to influence. . . . The principles here adopted are those which seem to express the English treatment of ancient foreign names which have become common property in the language.'

(1) New Testament.—The case is no doubt widely different with regard to the Old Testament as compared with the New. In the New Testament the Greek form of the name (including the transliteration of Hebrew names) may almost invariably be followed; thus, Aristob'ulus, Ar'temas, Dio'repheus, Ep'e'netus, Proch'orus, Tab'i'tha. The diphthong of the Authorized and Revised Versions specifies Thad'daeus; the CK rather than the CK. Cheyne and Stevenson both spell the name Thaddeus, the former accepting the first, and the latter the second, syllable. It is desirable to follow the Greek sometimes even in the face of common usage, as by making Beth'sa'-i-da a word of four syllables, and Ja'-i'-rus a word of three. There are some peculiarities which have to be noticed, e.g. that final ε is sounded in Beth'phage, Geth'semane, Mag'dalene, but not in Nazarene, or Urban. For Pho'mice the R.V. reads Pho'nix. So'a'thens, again, is a word of three syllables. With some attention to these principles, of which the above are merely examples, the pronunciation of New Testament names should present little difficulty.

(2) Old Testament.—When we turn to the Old Testament we find ourselves in presence of a much more complicated problem. Here it is impossible to conform our pronunciation to that of the original language; yet if we are not to pronounce at haphazard, and follow each his own taste and habit, we must reflect upon the conditions, and frame at least general rules for our guidance. In the absence of a standard list of pronunciations constructed by experts of such authority that we might waive in favour of their dicta our personal predilections, there will, at the best, be considerable room for individual judgment. We do not aim, therefore, at doing more in the following observations than aid such judgment by showing the alternatives before it, and indicating the limits within which it may be profitably exercised.

'The supreme authority in pronunciation,' says Professor Stevenson, 'is prevalent usage (among educated people).' The difficulty in many cases is to determine what is prevalent usage, and how far the education which is presumed to guide it has included the elements which would make it reliable in such a connexion. Prevalent usage itself may be educated and corrected, and the question is where the line shall be drawn between 'pedantic precision' and 'persistent mispronunciation' (to use Professor Cheyne's phrase), how much shall be conceded to a regard for the methods of the ancient Hebrews on the one side, and for those of the modern Britons on the other? This question is the more difficult to answer because the training and environment of even highly educated people differ so widely, and because what is prevalent in one circle is almost or altogether unknown in another.

Professor Cheyne suggests, as a guiding principle, the giving of some attention to the religious significance of proper names, particularly those which contain in some form the proper name of God in Hebrew. With this laudable object, he, as a rule, shifts the accent in such names as to bring their religious significance prominently before the reader. The practice, however, brings him into conflict with many undoubted cases of established usage. Professor Stevenson holds that the influences which must affect the treatment of Scripture names are—(1) The original pronunciation; (2) the characteristic tendencies of purely English speech; (3) the fixed customary pronunciation of certain words resembling others less common. In applying the second of these principles—the characteristic tendencies of English speech—he appeals chiefly to analogy:

'People naturally pronounce according to the analogy of other words which are familiar, and the practice supplies a rule of treatment. Doubtful or unfamiliar words should be pronounced in harmony with the general tendencies of the language, or in a way similar to other words which strikingly resemble them. Scripture names are borrowed from the foreign languages Greek and Hebrew. They are, therefore, to be compared specially with words of similar origin, such as the names of classical antiquity.' He admits, however, that 'conflict of analogies cannot be wholly avoided. If one is not in itself stronger than another, the most desirable result in each case should be preferred. Ease of pronunciation is one test of desirability. The principle of pronunciation according to sense has also been used by the writer.'

It is needless to say that he carries out these principles with great care and consistency. The weak point of the position is that the analogies founded on by one scholar will not be equally familiar, or commend themselves to the same extent, to another; and it may well appear to many that Professor Stevenson in his list of proper names concedes too much to popular usage, and would in some cases attain a more desirable result by approximating more closely to the form of the original.

3. Points for consideration.—We shall now present for the consideration of the reader who desires to achieve as great a degree of correctness as the matter admits of, some of the more important points which he will have to decide for himself, assuming that when he has once adopted a rule he will follow it as consistently as possible, or be able to give a reason for any deviation.

(1) Shall we adopt what may be called the Continental pronunciation of the vowels—a, e, es, i eu?—In many instances we may be strongly tempted to do so; to one who knows Hebrew it is more natural, and the effect is finer—Mesopotamia is a grander word than Mesopotamia. But it is only in the less familiar words that this could be done. The first syllables of Canaan, Pharaoh, Balaam, must have the à as in fate or fair.

(2) Is the Hebrew J to be pronounced like J in judge, or like y?—It would probably be impossible to follow the latter mode in the large number of names beginning with J, such as Jericho, Joash, etc., and it would be intolerable in the case of Jesus: but there are instances in which it would impart an added dignity—e.g. Jehovah-jireh is far finer if the j be sounded as y, and the i as e. In the middle of words, especially in words containing the Divine name Jah, the matter has already been settled for us, as in most cases appears as iah, Abaziah, Isaiah, Shemaiah. The question here arises whether the i is to be treated as consonant or vowel, and if the latter, whether it should ever be accented. Professor Cheyne, in order to bring out more prominently the Divine name, would treat the iah = iah always as a separate word—Abaziah, Isaiah, Shemaiah. Except for this consideration the rule would probably be, that where it follows a consonant the i is not only treated as a vowel but also accented—Jeremi’ah; when it follows a vowel it is assimilated with that vowel as in the two examples given above, which will illustrate the way in which one or other vowel may give place, Isaiah (Isa-ah), Shemaiah (Shemi-ah), though some would render the former also Isi’ah.

(3) The question often arises in the case of names of three or more syllables, especially when the last two are significant in the original, whether the accent should be placed on the penultimate or thrown farther back in accordance with general English practice. Professor Stevenson says:—'The English stress accent in ancient foreign names is determined, with limitations, by the original length of the vowels, not by the original stress.' But in the case of words in familiar and frequently read passages of Scripture, the 'limitations' are extensive, and must be allowed to override considerations based on length of vowel. Where Cheyne prefers Abime’elech, Abith’ophe, Jocheb’ed, Joha’nan, Stevenson gives Abim’elech, Ahith’ophe, Joch’ebed, Jo’hanan. On the other hand, Cheyne gives Am’raphel and A’holiab, whereas Stevenson accentuates Amra’pheel and Aholi’ah. Nor is it an English trait to have too much regard for significant parts of words. We do not say philosophy, biology, Deuteronomy (though this is heard occasionally), but the stress is laid on the connecting syllable. So, if Abimelech and the class of names ruled by it be allowed, a great deal might be said for Abina’zidab, Abi’athar, and similar words being pronounced thus, instead of Abina’zah, Abi’athar, etc., notwithstanding the length of the penultimate in the original. Here, again, views will differ according to the 'educated usage' to which we have access, and the deference we may be inclined to pay to the peculiarities of English speech. With reference to Jochebed and Johanan in the examples quoted above, it should be noted that Stevenson makes an exception to the rule of the penultimate...
accent in favour of names in which the first element is some form of the Divine name. The accent, he says, rests in such cases on this first element. It may be doubtful if this reason is the one consciously adopted in regard to these names. Jo'hanan seems to us unnatural, and for Jehon'adab we prefer the explanation given in the former part of this paragraph.

(4) Professor Stevenson is doubtless right in saying that the established pronunciation of familiar names determines that of others in the same form that are less familiar. Dan'iel and Is'rael are the key to one class of such names, unless, as he points out, Penu'el be accented on the second syllable, and determine other words in—uel. Phil'ippi (accent on the first) is due to the analogy of Philip, and Ene'as 'to the analogy of Virgil's hero.'

These may serve as examples of the kind of difficulty which surrounds the subject, and the extent to which individual judgment may be exercised. There are general principles which may be adopted and usually observed, though perfect consistency in their application may not be attainable or desirable. Let the reader ascertain in all doubtful cases the form and pronunciation of the name in the original,* and compare it with those suggested by the best authorities within his reach. He will then be able to follow the method which most commends itself to his ear and judgment. Though the student may not always adopt the pronunciation given in Professor Stevenson's list, nothing but good can result from a careful pondering of his explanations. Let us be sure that, though we are told that 'De minimis non curat lex,' it is worth our while to be as careful as we can even about 'little things.'

ALEXANDER STEWART.

* These are given in all cases by Professor Stevenson in Roman letters, according to a system of transliteration which he explains in his introduction. They are thus made accessible to English readers.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

AARON. — In examining the Biblical account of Aaron, we must deal separately with the different 'sources' of the Hexateuch.

In the view of many scholars, the Aaron portions of the OT are a very subordinate part. He, Nadab and Abihu, along with 70 elders, accompanied Moses up Mount Sinai (Ex 24:10-11). In the former passage he is distinguished from the priests, who are forbidden to come up; he would seem, therefore, to have been an elder or sheikh, perhaps somewhat inferior to the 70. In 32:1-4 Aaron 'let the people loose for a derision among his enemies.' What this refers to is not known; it was probably the making of the golden bull, which in the eyes of the surrounding nations would be only an act of piety.

In other passages, which cannot be assigned either to E or P, the mention of Aaron is probably due to a later hand. In 4:14-16 Moses is allowed to have Aaron as a spokesman. But the 'Levite' (v.14) is suspicious: for Moses was also of the tribe of Levi, and the description is superfluous. The verses probably belong to a time when 'Levite' had become a technical term for one trained in priestly functions, and when such priestly officials traced their descent from Aaron. In the narratives of the plagues Aaron is a silent figure, merely summoned with Moses four times when Pharaoh entreats for the removal of the plagues (8:1-25; 9:16). In each case Moses alone answers, and in the last three he alone departs. In 10:2 Moses and Aaron went in to announce the plague, but Moses alone turned and went out (v.5). The occurrence of Aaron's name seems to be due, in each case, to later redaction.

In 21, Aaron is the brother of Miriam (13:1). He was sent to meet Moses in the wilderness, and together they performed signs before the people (4:21-23). They demanded release from Pharaoh, and on his refusal the people murmured (6:1-5, 6-13). Little of E has survived in the narrative of the plagues, and Aaron is not mentioned. In 17:10-12 he and Hur held up Moses' hands, in order that the staff might be lifted up, during the fight with Amalek. And while Moses was on the mountain, the same two were left in temporary authority over the people (24:14). Aaron is related to have abused this authority, in making the golden bull (32:4-6). As in the preceding passage, the words, which are suitable in reference to two bulls, are placed in Aaron's mouth.) In 14:24 Aaron, with the elders, was called to Jethro's sacrifice—an incident which must be placed at the end of the stay at Horeb. In Nu 12 Aaron and Miriam claimed that they, no less than Moses, received divine revelations; only Miriam, however, was punished. In J, there is a general reference to the part played by Aaron in the Exodus.

It is noteworthy that there is not a word so far either in J or E, which suggests that Aaron was a priest. But it is probable that by the time of E the belief had begun to grow up that Aaron was the founder of an hereditary priesthood. Dt 18:5 occurs in a parenthesis which seriously interrupts the narrative, and which was perhaps derived from E (cf. Jos 24:14).

3. In D, Aaron was probably not mentioned. Dt 10:6 has been referred to; 32:40 is from P; and the only remaining passage (10:9) appears to be a later insertion.

4. Outside the Hexateuch, two early passages (1 S 12:7-8, Mic 6:1) refer to Aaron merely as taking a leading part in the Exodus.

5. In P, the process by which the tradition grew up that Moses delegated his priesthood to Aaron is not known. But the effect of it was that the great majority of Levites, i.e. trained official priests, at local sanctuaries throughout the country traced their descent to Aaron. The priests of Jerusalem, on the other hand, were descendants of Zadok (1 K 1:32; 2 S); and when local sanctuaries were abolished by Josiah's reforms, the country priests came up to seek a livelihood at Jerusalem (see Dt 18:1). The Zadokites charged them with image-worship, and allowed them only an inferior position as servants (see 2 K 23, Ezk 44:21).

But at the Exile the priests who were in Jerusalem were carried off, leaving room in the city for many country (Aaronite) priests, who would establish themselves firmly in official prestige with the meager remnant of the population. Thus, when the Zadokite priests returned from Babylon, they would find it advisable to trace their descent from Aaron (see Ezr 2:5). But by their superiority in culture and social standing they regained their ascendancy, and the country priests were once more reduced, under the ancient title of Levites, to an inferior position.

This explains the great importance assigned to Aaron in the priestly portions of the Hexateuch. Reference must be made to other articles for his consecration, his purely priestly functions, and his relation to the Levites (see articles PRIESTS AND LEVITES, SACRIFICE, TABERNACLE). But he also plays a considerable part in the narrative of the Exodus and the wanderings. His family relationships are stated in Ex 6:20, 22, 25, 29. He became Moses' spokesman, not to the people but to Pharaoh (7:7), in whose presence he changed the staff into a 'serpent' (called the 'reptile' in 4:2 J). P relates the 2nd plague (combined with J), the 3rd and the 6th, in each of which Aaron is conspicuous. Aaron as well as Moses suffered from the murmurings of the people (Ex 16, Nu 14:9-16; 20); both were consulted by the people (Nu 9:15); and to both were addressed many of God's commands (Ex 9:10, 12; 11, 15:1-16; Nu 29). Aaron stayed a AARON’S ROD.—A very complicated section of the Hexateuch (Nu 16–18), dealing with various revolts against the constituted authorities in the wilderness period, the exclusive right of the tribe of Levi to the chief priestly duties being thus firmly established for the Levites. The story of Aaron’s rod is more particularly, however, significant as pointing to the beginning of the priestly office of Judaism in the time of Moses. For the word of God was deposited by Divine command before the ark along with 12 other rods representing the 12 tribes of Israel, in order that the right of Jephthah’s daughter to the priestly functions might be visibly made known (see Nu 16–18 with G. B. Gray’s Com.). The rod was thereafter ordered to be laid up in perpetuity ‘before the ark of the testimony for a token against the rebels’ (v. 12). A later Hebrew tradition, however, transferred it, along with the pot of manna, to a place within the ark (He 9:5). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AB.—See Time.

ABACUC.—The form of the name Habakkuk in 2 Es 1:36.

ABADDON.—A word peculiar to the later Hebrew (esp. ‘Wisdom’) and Judaic literature; sometimes synonymous with Sheol, yet more particularly, however, signifying that lowest division of Sheol devoted to the punishment of sinners (see Srezel). Properly, its Gr. equivalent would be ἀπολύμα (‘destruction’), as found in the LXX. In Rev 9:11 Abaddon is personified, and is said to be the equivalent of Ἀπολύμα (‘destruction’). Abaddon differs from Gehenna in that it represents the negative element of supreme loss rather than that of future suffering.

ABADIAS (1 Es 326).—An exile who returned with Ezra; called Obadias, Esr 8:9.

ABACHTA (Est 11).—One of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs sent by Ahaseurus (Xerxes) to fetch the queen, Vashti, to his banquet.

ABANAH.—The river of Damascus mentioned by Naaman, 2 K 5:11. It is identified with the Barada, a river rising on the eastern slope of the Anti-Lebanon, which runs first southward, then westward, through the Wady Barada and the plain of Damascus. About 15 miles from Damascus, after dividing fan-wise into a number of branches, it flows into the Meadow Lakes. R. A. S. Macalister.

ABARIM (‘the parts beyond’).—A term used to describe the whole east-Jordan land as viewed from Western Palestine. From there the land beyond Jordan rises as a great mountain chain to a height of 3000 feet and more from the Jordan valley. Hence Abarim is joined with ‘mount’ (Nu 27:3), Dt 32:49 and ‘mountains’ (Nu 33:1), also with ‘Tyre, heaps of’ (Nu 21:9). See also Jer 22:26 and Ezek 39:17 (RV; AV ‘passages’).

E. W. G. MasTernA.

ABBA is the ‘emphatic’ form of the Aram. word for ‘father.’ It is found in the Gr. and Eng. text of Mk 14:36, Ro 8:30 and Gal 4:6 (in each case Abba, ho patér, ‘Abba, Father’). Aram. has no article, and the ‘emphatic’ affix ‘6 is usually the equivalent of the Heb. article. Both can represent WH (مو, see Davidson’s Synax, § 21 f.); and abba occurs in the Psb. of Lk 22:23 for pater. The ‘articular nominative’ is found in NT sixty times for the vocative; and as we have ho patér for ὁ πατέρ (Moulton, Gram. of NT Greek, p. 70). Jesus often addressed God as ‘Father’ or ‘my Father.’ In both cases He would probably use ‘Abba’; for ‘abba may be used for ‘Abi’ (Targ. on Gn 19.4). In Mk 14:36, ho patér is perhaps a gloss added by the Evangelist, as in Mk 5:41. He adds an explanation of the Aram.; but in Ro 8:30 and Gal 4:6 the Gentile Christians had learned for importunity to use the Aram. word Abba; as the Jews in prayer borrowed ˫耘 for ‘my Lord’ from the Greek, and used it along with words in Hebrew and Aramaic in prayer (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. 252). J. T. MARSHALL.

ABDIAS (2 Es 1:9).—Obadiah the prophet.

ABIEL (‘servant of God’).—Son of Guni (1 Ch 5:17).

ABINNDEO.—Dn 1:17, etc.: probably a corruption of Abed-nebo, i.e. ‘servant of Nabonidus’.

ABEL.—Gn 4:10. The Heb. form Hebhel denot ‘vapour’ or ‘breath’ (cf. Ec 1, ‘and vanity’), which is suggestive as the name of a son of Adam (‘man’). But it is perhaps to be connected with the Assyrian, e.g. son. Abel was a son of Adam and Eve, and brother of Cain. But the narrative presupposes a long period to have elapsed in human history since the primitive condition of the first pair. The difference between pastoral and agricultural life has come to be recognized for Abel was a keeper of sheep, while Cain was a tiller of the ground (see Cain). The account, as we have it mutilated; in v. 4 Heb. has ‘and Cain said unto his brother’ (not as AV and RV). LXX supplies the words ‘Let us pass through into the plain,’ but it may be a mere gloss, and it cannot be known how much of the story is lost.

Nothing is said in Gn. of Abel’s moral character, of the reason why his offering excelled Cain’s in the eyes of J.; cereal offerings were as fully in accord with Hebrew law and custom as animal offerings. He 11:4 gives ‘fain as the reason: ‘In Heb 12:9 the blood of sprinkling ‘speaketh something better than the blood of Abel in that the latter cried for vengeance (Gn 4:12). In Mt 23:3–5 Lk 11:3 Abel is named as the first of true martyrs whose blood has been shed during a period covered by the OT, the last being Zacharias (wh. see). In Jn 8:38 it is possible that Jesus was thinking of the story of Abel when He spoke of the devil as murderer from the beginning,’ i.e. the instigator of murder as he is of lies. A. H. M’Neile.

ABEL.—A word meaning ‘meadow,’ and entering an element into several place-names. In 1 S 6:16 reference in AV to ‘Abel’ is in the RV corrected to ‘Gedor.’ Elsewhere the name is found only in a few qualifying epithets.

ABEL (OF) BETH-MAACAH.—Where Sheba from Joab (2 S 20:14–18) was captured Ben-hadad (1 K 15:10), and by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15:29) corresponding to the modern Arib, west of Tell ed-Ke and north of Lake Huleh. R. A. S. Macalister.

ABEL-CHERAMIM (‘meadow of the vineyards’). The limit of Jephthah’s defeat of the Midianitans (Jg 11:28). Site unknown. R. A. S. Macalister.

ABEL-MAIM (‘meadow of waters’).—An alternative name for Abel of Beth-maccah, found in Jer 12:2, which corresponds to 1 K 15:19, quoted under that; see R. A. S. Macalister.

His mother belonged to one of the leading Canaanite families in Shechem, although Jg 8th calls her a concubine, and Josiah (9th) brands her as a maid-servant. On Gideon's decease, Abimelech, backed by his maternal relatives, gathered a band of mercenaries, murdered his seventy half-brothers 'on one stone,' and was accepted as king by the mixed Canaanite and Israelite population of Shechem and the neighbourhood. But Jotham sowed the seeds of dissension between the new ruler and his subjects, and the latter soon took offence because the king did not reside among them. After that they were ripe for revolt, and Abimelech found a leader in Gaal, son of Ebed. Abimelech defeated him, took the city, and sowed the site with salt, in token that it should not again be built upon. Thebes, the next town attacked by him, fell into his hands, but he was mortally wounded by a woman whilst assaulting the citadel (Jg 9:13-4, 2 S 11th). His significance in the history of Israel consists in the fact that his short-lived monarchy was the precursor of the durable one founded soon after. 3. 1 Ch 8:24; r 1 Abimelech.

ABINADAB ('father is generous').—1. The second son of Jesse (1 S 16th 17th, 1 Ch 29). 2. A son of Saul slain in the battle of Mt. Gilboa (1 S 31st 1 Ch 10). 3. Owner of the house where the ark was brought by the men of Kiriath-jearim (1 S 7th), whence it was subsequently removed by David (2 S 6th 1, 1 Ch 13).

ABINOMA ('father is pleasantness').—The father of Barak (Jg 4th 8th 22).

ABIRAM ('father is the Exalted One').—1. A Reubenite, who with Dathan conspired against Moses (Nu 16th etc, Dt 11th, Ps 106th). See art. KORAH. 2. The firstborn son of Hiel the Bethelite, who died when his father rebuilt Jericho (1 K 10th).

ABISHAG.—A beautiful young Shunammite who attended upon David in his extreme old age (1 K 2oth 11). After David's death, Abishag was asked in marriage by Adonijah; the request cost him his life (1 K 2oth 38).

ABISHAL.—Son of Zeruiah, David's step-sister (2 S 17th, 1 Ch 29). His brothers were Joab and Abishai (2 S 24th). He was a hot-tempered, ruthless soldier. Accompanying David into Saul's camp, he would fain have killed the sleeper (1 S 26th). An editorial addition (2 S 38th) associates him with Joab in the blood-revenge taken on Abner. Abishai was second in command of the army (2 S 10th 18), and if we make a slight necessary correction at 2 S 23th 44, we find that he was first of the famous thirty. He is credited with the slaying of three hundred foes, and David's love for him is evinced by his life to Abishai's interposition (2 S 23th 21st). Notwithstanding their relationship and their usefulness, there was a natural antipathy between the king and the two brothers. (2 S 39th). J. TAYLOR.

ABISHALOM.—See ABISALOM.

ABISHUA.—1. Son of Phinehas and father of Bukki (1 Ch 6th 64th, Ezr 7th): called in 1 Es 8th Abihu, and in 2 Es 1st Abissai. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8th; cf. Nu 26th 18th).

ABISHUR ('father is a wall').—A Jerahmeelic (1 Ch 24th).

ABISHEK.—See ABISHUA, No. 1.

ABITAL ('father is dew').—Wife of David or mother of Shephatiah (2 S 31st 1 Ch 39).

ABITUB.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8th).

ABUD (i.e. Abihud).—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1th 12).

ABJAC'T.—In Ps 53th 'abject' occurs as a noun, as Herbert's Temple—Servants and abjects fliet me.

ABNER.—Saul's cousin (1 S 14th 14th) and commander-in-chief (1 S 17th 26th). He set Ish-bosheth on his father throne, and fought long and bravely against David general, Joab (2 S 2). After a severe defeat, he killed Asabel in self-defence (2 S 26th). He behaved arrogantly towards the puppet-king, especially in taking possession of one of Saul's concubines (2 S 37th). Resenting bitter the remonstrances of Ish-bosheth, he entered into negotiations with David (2 S 34th), and then, on David behalf, with the elders of Israel (2 S 35th). Drifting to loss of his own position, and thirsting for revenge, he murdered him at Hebron (2 S 34th). David gave him a public funeral, disassociated himself from Joab's acts (2 S 36th, and afterwards charged Solomon to aveng his death (1 K 29). Abner was destitute of all lofty ideas of morality or religion (2 S 36th), but was the only capable person on the side of Saul's family.

ABOMINATION.—Four Hebrew words from different roots are rendered in EV by 'abomination' and, occasionally, 'abominable thing.' In almost all cases (for exceptions see Gn 43th 46th) the reference to objects and practices abhorrent to J, and oppose to the moral requirements and ritual of His religion. Among the objects so described are heathen deities such as Ashethor (Astarte), Chemosh, Milcom, f'abominiqon of the Zidonians (Phoenicians), Mosbite and Ammonites respectively (2 K 20th); images an other paraphernalia of the forbidden cults (Dt 27th 27 and often in Ezek.); and the flesh of animals ritually tabu (see esp. Lv 11th in. art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. Some of the practices that are an 'abomination unto J' are the worship of heathen deities and of the hearest bodies (Dt 13th 17th and often), the practice of witchcraft and kindred arts (Dt 18th), gross acts of immorality (Lv 18th), falsification of weights and measures (Pr 11th) and 'evil devices' generally (Pr 15th 14).

One of the four words above referred to (pilgig) occurs only as a 'technical term for state sacrificial flesh, which has not been eaten within the prescribed time ('Driver, who would render 'profane meat.') (Lv 7th 19th, Ezk 4th, Is 65th). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.—A term four only in Mk 13th and its parallel Mt 24th. It is obviously derived, as St. Matthew indicates, from Dan 11th 12th of. In these passages the most natural reference is to the desecration of the Temple under Antiochus Epiphanes, when an altar to Olympian Zeus was erected on the altar of burnt sacrifices. As interpreted in the revision by St. Luke (21st), the reference is to the furnishing of Jerusalem by the Roman army. It is very difficult, however, to adjust this interpretation to the expression of Mk. 'standing who he ought not,' and that of Mt. 'standing in the holy place.' Other interpretations would be: (1) the threatened erection of the statue of Caligula in the Temple; (2) the desecration of the Temple area by the Zealots, who during the siege made it a fortress or (3) the desecration of the Temple by the presence of Titus after its capture by the Roman army. While it is impossible to reach any final choice between the different interpretations, it seems probable that the reference of Mk 13th is to that destruction of the Temple. Of the 'abomination of desolation' (or the abominatic
ABRAHAM

That makes desolate') is to be taken as a warning for those who are in Judæa to flee to the mountains. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the reference is to some event, portending the fall of Jerusalem, which might possibly be interpreted by divination from the prediction of the Parousia (2 Th 2:13). It would seem natural to see this event in the coming of the Romans (Lk 21:20), or in the seizure of the Temple by the Zealots under John of Giscas, before the city was completely invested by the Romans. A measure of probability is given to the latter conjecture by the tradition (Eusebius, HE iii. v. 3) that the Jewish Christians, because of a Divine oracle, fled from Jerusalem during the course of the siege.

ABRAHAM.—Abraham and Abraham are the two forms in which the name of the first patriarch was known in the Hexateuch. The name recorded in Gn 17:1 (P) is a harmonistic theory, which involves an impossible etymology, and cannot be regarded as historical. Of Abraham no better explanation has been suggested than that it is possibly a dialectic or orthographic variation of Abram, which in the fuller forms Abram and Abiram is found as a personal name both in Heb. and Babylonian. The history of Abraham (Gn 11:29–29) consists of a number of narratives, which have been somewhat loosely strung together in a semblance of biographical continuity. These narratives (with the exception of ch. 14, which is assigned to a special source) are apportioned by critics to the three main documents of Genesis, I, E, and P; and the analysis shows that the biographical arrangement is not due solely to the compiler of the Pent., but existed in the separate sources. In them, we can recognize, amidst much diversity, the outlines of a fairly solid and consistent tradition, which may be assumed to have taken shape at different centres, such as the sanctuaries of Hebron and Beersheba.

Arrived in Canaan, Abraham builds altar to Shechem, where he receives the first promise of the land, and Bethel, where the separation from Lot takes place; after which Abraham resumes his southern journey and takes up his abode at Hebron (ch. 13). This connexion is broken in 12:4–24 by the episode of Abraham's sojourn in Egypt, which probably belongs to an older stratum of Jahwistic tradition representing him as leading a nomadic life in the Negeb. To the same cycle we may assign the story of Hagar's flight and the prophecy regarding Ishmael, in ch. 16; here, too, the home of Abraham is apparently located in the Negeb. In ch. 18 we find Abraham at Hebron, where in the theophany he receives the promise of a son to be born to Sarah, and also an intimation of the doom impending over the guilty cities of the Plain. The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the deliverance of Lot, are graphically described in ch. 19, which closes with an account of the shameful origins of Moab and Ammon.

Passing over some fragmentary notices in ch. 21, which have been amalgamated with the fuller narrative of E, we come to the last scene of J's record, the mission of Abraham's servant to seek a bride for Isaac, told with such dramatic power in ch. 24. It would seem that the death of Abraham, of which J's account has nowhere been preserved, must have taken place before the servant returned. A note is appended in 25:9 as to the descent of 16 Arabian tribes from Abraham and Keturah.

2. Of J's narrative the first traces appear in ch. 15, a composite and difficult chapter, whose kernel probably belongs rather to this document than to J. In its present form it narrates the renewal to Abraham of the two great promises on which his faith rested—the promise of the seed and the land, and the confirmation of the latter by an impressive ceremony in which God entered into a covenant with the patriarch.

The main body of Elohist tradition, however, is found in ch. 17, where the main institutions of circumcision and the covenant with Isaac are described.

The latter part of ch. 21 is occupied with the narrative of Abraham's adventures in the Negeb—especially his covenant with Abimelech of Gerar—which leads up to the consecration of the sanctuary of Beersheba to the worship of Jahweh. Here the narrative has been supplemented by extracts from a Jahvistic recension of the same tradition. To E, finally, we are indebted for the fascinating story of the sacrifice of Isaac in ch. 22, which may be fairly described as the gem of this collection.

3. In P, the biography of Abraham is mostly reduced to a chronological epitome, based on the narrative of J, and supplying some gaps left by the compiler in the older document. There are just two places where the meagre chronicle expands into elaborately circumstantial description. The first is the account, in ch. 17, of the institution of circumcision as the sign of the covenant between God and Abraham, round which are gathered all the promises which in the earlier documents are connected with various experiences in the patriarch's life. The story of Machpelah after the death of Sarah, recorded at great length in ch. 23, is peculiar to P, and was evidently of importance to this writer as a guarantee of Israel's perpetual tenure of the land of Canaan.

4. Such is, in outline, the history of Abraham as transmitted through the recognized literary channels of the national tradition. We have yet to mention an episode, concerning which there is great diversity of opinion,—the story of Abraham's victory over the four kings, and his interview with Melchizedek, in ch. 14. It is maintained by some that this chapter bears internal marks of authenticality possessed by the rest of the Abrahamic tradition, and affords a firm foothold for the belief that Abraham is a historic personage of the 3rd millennium B.C., contemporary with Hammurabi (Amarahfel) of Babylon (c. 2300). Others take a diametrically opposite view, holding that it is a late Jewish romance, founded on imperfectly understood data derived from cuneiform sources. The arguments on either side cannot be given here; it must suffice to remark that, even if convincing proof of the historicity of ch. 14 could be produced, it would still be a question whether that judgment could be extended to the very different material of the undisputed Hebrew tradition. It is much more important to inquire what is the historical value of the tradition which lies immediately behind the more popular narratives in which the religious significance of Abraham's character is expressed. That these are have been in the strict sense of the word is a proposition to which no competent scholar would assent. They are legends which had circulated orally for an indefinite time, and had assumed varied forms, before they were collected and reduced to writing. The only question of practical moment is whether the legends have clustered round the name of a historic personality, the leader of an immigration of Aramean tribes into Palestine, and at the same time the recipient of a new revelation of God which prepared the way for the unique religious history and mission of Israel. It cannot be said that this view of Abraham has as yet obtained any direct confirmation from discoveries in Assyriology or archaeology, though it is perhaps true that recent developments of these sciences render the conception more intelligible than it formerly was. And there is nothing, either in the tradition itself or in the evidence of the background against which it is set, that is inconsistent with the supposition that to the extent just indicated the figure of Abraham is historical. If it be the essence of legend, as distinct from myth, that it originates in the impression made by a commanding personality on his contemporaries, we may well believe that the story of Abraham, bearing as it does the stamp of ethical character and individuality, is true legend, and that he has grown up around some nucleus of historic fact.

5. From the religious point of view, the life of Abraham has a surprising inner unity as a record of the progressive trial and strengthening of faith. It is a life of unclouded earthly prosperity, broken by no reverse of fortune; yet it is rooted in fellowship with the unseen. 'He goes through life,' it has been well said, 'listening for the true voice which he not stands up in formal concepts, but revealed from time to time to the conscience; and this leaning upon God's word is declared to be in Jahweh's sight a proof of genuine righteousness.' He is the Father of the faithful, and the Friend of God. And the Asyriology or archaology is reflected in the attitude of spirit which are inconsistent with the patriarch in a less admirable light only throw into bolder relief those ideal features of character in virtue of which Abraham stands in the pages of Scripture as one of the noblest types of Hebrew piety.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.—It was natural for the Jews to represent Abraham as welcoming his righteous descendants to the bliss of heaven. It was, also, not unusual for them to represent the state of the righteous as a feast. In the parable of Lk 16:22 Jesus uses these figures to represent the blessedness of the dead Lazarus. He was receiving at the feast next to Abraham (cf. Mt 8:1). A Rabbi of the third century, Adda Bar Abbah, uses precisely this expression as a synonym for entering Paradise. Other Jewish writings occasionally represent Abraham as in a way overseeing the entrance of souls into Paradise. 'Abraham's Bosom,' therefore, may not unreasonably be said to be a synonym for Paradise, where the righteous dead live in eternal bliss. There is no clear evidence that the Jews of Jesus' day believed in an intermediate state, and it is unsafe to see in the term any reference to such a belief. SHAILER MATTHEWS.

ABRECH.—A word of doubtful significations, tr. 'Bow the knee,' in AV and RV (Gn 41:8 'then he made him [Joseph] to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee; and he set him over all the land of Egypt'). The word should be either Hebrew or Egyptian. An Assyrian etymology has been proposed, viz. abarahu, the title of one of the highest officials in the Assyrian Empire, but no such borrowings from Assyria are known in Egypt. Hebrew afford no likely explanation. Egyptian hitherto has furnished two that are possible: (1) 'Prasal' but the word is rare and doubtful; (2) abarak, apparently meaning 'Attention!' 'Have a care!' (Spiegelberg). The last seems the least improbable.

ABRONAE.—A station in the journeys of (NuS5:34). ABRAHAM ('father is peace').—Third son of David, by Abigail, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (1 K 2:45). His sister Tamar having been wronged by her half-brother Amnon, and David having failed to punish the criminal, Absalom assassinated Amnon and fled to Geshur, where he spent three years (ch. 13). Joab procured his recall, but he was not admitted into his father's presence. In his usual impetuosity he next compelled Joab to bring about his full restoration (14:18). Then he assumed the position of heir-apparent (19; cf. I S 9:4, 1 K 19), and began undermining the loyalty of the people against which it is set, that is inconsistent with the supposition that to the extent just indicated the figure of Abraham is historical. If it be the essence of legend, as distinct from myth, that it originates in the impression made by a commanding personality on his contemporaries, we may well believe that the story of Abraham, bearing as it does the stamp of ethical character and individuality, is true legend, and that he has grown up around some nucleus of historic fact.

According to reliable evidence, this was the one who according to the story of 40 years before his return set up the standard of rebellion at Hebron, a town which was well-situated towards him because it was his birthplace, and was aggrieved against David because he had no longer the metropolis. The old king was taken by surprise, and fled to the east of the Jordan. On entering Jerusalem, Absalom publicly appropriated the royal harem, thus proclaiming the supercession of his father. By the insidious counsel of Hushai the time was wasted in collecting a large army. But time was on David's side. His veterans rallied round him; his seasoned captains were by his side. When Absalom offered battle, near Mahanaim, the king's only anxiety was lest his son should be slain. This really happened, through Joab's agency. The father's natural, but unseasonable, lamentation was cut short by the soldier's blurt (1 S 18:20). On the other hand, the story of the history it is clear that, if Absalom lacked capacity, he possessed charm. His physical beauty contributed to this: 2 S 14:20-27 is probably a gloss, but certainly rests on a reliable tradition; the polling of the hair was a favorite device in biblical art. As a character of singular loftiness and magnanimity, an unworldly and disinterested disposition which reveals no moral struggle, but is nevertheless the fruit of habitual converse with God. The few narratives which present the patriarch in a less admirable light only throw into bolder relief those ideal features of character in virtue of which Abraham stands in the pages of Scripture as one of the noblest types of Hebrew piety.

ACCESS

ACCESS (Gr. προάσπεσ).—The word occurs only in Ro 5, Eph 2:3, 8, and the question (regarding which commentators are much divided) is whether it ought to be understood in the trans. sense as 'introduction,' the being brought near by another, or in the intrans. sense as 'access' or personal approach. The trans. sense is most in keeping with the ordinary use of the vb. in classical Gr. (cf. its use in 1 P 3:14 'the might bring us to God').—The idea suggested being that of a formal introduction into a royal presence. 'Access,' moreover, does not so well express the fact that we cannot approach God in our own right, but need Christ to introduce us; cf. 'by [R.V. 'through'] whom' (Ro 5:1), 'through him' (Eph 2:4), 'in whom' (3:2). The word 'access' does not occur in Hebrews, but the writer has much to say on the subject of our approach to God through Christ, esp. for the purpose of prayer (4:16).

ACCO.—Jg 1:2. See POLEMAIS.

ACCOSe (1 Mac 8:10).—Grandfather of one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabeus in b.c. 161. Accoos represents the Heb. Hakkoz, the name of a priestly family (1 Ch 24:9; Ezr 2:31).

ACCUSED.—See Ban.

ACEDALAMA.—See ACEDALAMA.

ACHAIA.—This name was originally applied to a strip of land on the N. coast of the Peloponnesus. On annexing Greece and Macedonia as a province in b.c. 146, the Romans applied the name Achaia to the whole of that country. In b.c. 27 two provinces were formed, Macedonia and Achaia; and the latter included Thessaly, Etolia, Aacarnania, and some part of Epirus, with Euboa and most of the Cyclades. It was governed in St. Paul's time by a provincial of the second grade, with headquarters at Corinth (Ac 18:12), 'Hellas' (Ac 20:23) is the native Greek name corresponding to the Roman 'Achaia.' There were Jewish settlements in this province, at Corinth, Athens, etc. (Ac 17:2), and the work of St. Paul began amongst them and was carried on by Apollos (1 and 2 Cor. passim, Ac 17:5; Acts 18:19).

A. SOTTER.

ACHAIOUS.—The name of a member of the Church at Corinth. He was with Stephanas and Fortunatus (1 Co 16:17) when they visited St. Paul at Ephesus and 'refreshed his spirit.' Nothing more is certainly known of him. As slaves were often named from the country of their birth, it is a probable conjecture that he was a slave, born in Achaia. J. G. TASKER.

ACHAN.—Son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah (Jos 7:1). It is brought home to Joshua (Jos 7:21) that the defeat at Ai was due to the fact of Jahweh's covenant having been transgressed. An inquiry is instituted to Achan is singled out as the transgressor. He confesses that after the capture of Jericho he had hidden part of the spoil, the whole of which had been placed under the ban (ch.19), i.e. devoted to Jehovah, and was therefore unlawful for man to touch. According to the usage of the times, both he and his family are stoned, and their dead bodies burned—the latter an even more terrible punishment in the eyes of ancient Israel. The sentence is carried out in the valley of Achor ('troubling'). According to Jos 7:20, 21, this valley was so called after Achan, the 'troubler' of Israel. Later his name was changed to Acher to correspond more closely with the name of the valley (1 Ch 7:27). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ACHAR.—See ACHAN.

ACHBOR ('mouse' or 'jerboa').—1. An Edomite (1 Chr 26a). 2. A curiour under Josiah, son of Micaiah (2 K 22:11), and father of Elhanan (Jer 26:2 om. i.XX, 39f.). Called Abdon (2 Ch 21:5).

ACHICHAH, the nephew of Tobit, was governor under Sarchonos = Esaraddon (To 1st etc.). The nearest Hebrew name is Ahihud (1 Ch 8:7).

ACHIAS.—An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1), omitted in Ezr. and 1 Es.

ACHIOR ('brother of light').—A general of the Ammonites (1 Ch 3:28 etc.), afterwards converted to Judaism (ch. 14).

ACHIPHA (1 Es 5:2).—His children were among the 'temple servants' or Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel; called Hakupha, Ezr 2:26, Neh 7:26.

ACHISH.—The king of Gath to whom David fled for refuge after the massacre of the priests at Nob (1 S 30:8). In 1 S 27:7 he is called 'the son of Maachah' (possibly = 'son of Maacah,' 1 K 2:9). He received David with his band of 600 men, and assigned him the city of Ziklag in the S. of Judah. Despite the wishes of Achish, the other Phil. princes refused to let David take part in the final campaign against Saul. ["Achish" should be read for 'Abimelech.' In Ps 84 (title).]

ACHMETHA.—The Ecbatana of the Greeks and Romans, modern Hamadan. It was the capital of Media (in Old Persian Ḥamāzdtana). It is mentioned but once in the canonical books (Ezr 6:1), as the place where the archives of the reign of Cyrus were deposited. It was several times mentioned in the Apocrypha (Heb. Roq., To 3:6 14:21, Jth 1:17).

J. F. McCUNDY.

ACHOR ('āmeq 'ākhôr,' Vale of Grievance').—Here Achah (wh. see), with his family, was stoned to death. It lay on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15:57 etc.). Gushi identified it with Allain south of Jericho, between the mountains on the west and Jordan and the Dead Sea on the east. Wady Kelt, a tremendous gorage which breaks down from the mountain W. of Jericho, probably formed the boundary between Judah and Benjamin. In the mouth of this valley, it seems likely, the execution took place.

W. Ewing.

ACHSAYAH (1 Ch 2:9, AV ACHSAY).—The daughter of Caleb. Her father promised her in marriage to the man who should capture Debir or Kirjath-egeber—a feast accomplished by Othniel, the brother of Caleb, whose home in a south land (Negeb) was increased by the grant of the 'upper springs and the nether springs' (Jos 15:17-20, Jg 1:19).

ACHSHAPH.—About 17 miles E. of Tyre, now called Isaf or Kesaf, on N.E. border of territory assigned to Asher (Jos 19:19). Its king joined Jabin's confederacy, which was defeated by Joshua, and the ruler of Achshaph was amongst the slain (Jos 11:20).

J. TAYLOR.

ACHZIB.—1. A town in Asher (Jos 19:23), from which the natives could not be dislodged (Jg 1:27); it lay on the coast between Acre and Tyre. The early geographers called it Ekdipta: now ez-Zib. 2. In the S. of the Shephelah (Jos 13:26), near Mareshah. Mic 1:16 predicts that 'Achzib shall be to the kings of Judah ahaham ('deceptive'), a stream whose waters' flood when most needed (cf. Jer 15:18).

ACROSTIC.—Acrostic poems, i.e. poems in which initial letters recurring at regular intervals follow some definite arrangement, occur to the number of 14 in the OT. Another instance is Sir 51:1-30. All these are of a simple type, and are so planned that the initials recurring at fixed intervals follow the order of the Hebrew alphabet; thus the first section of the poem begins with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, aleph; the second with the second letter, bet; and so on down to the twenty-second and last letter, tav. The interval between the several letters consists of a regular number of lines. In Ps 111, 112 this interval is one line; in Ps 25, 34, 145, Pr 30:9-31, Sir 51:1-30, and in the fragment, which does not clearly extend beyond the thirteenth letter, contained in Nah 4, the interval is 2 lines; in La 4 it is

2 longer lines, in chs. 1 and 2 it is 3 longer lines; in Ps 9 and 10 (a single continuous poem), and in Ps 37, it is 4 lines. In Ps 37, where the interval between each successive letter of the alphabet is 3 long lines, each set of three lines begins with the same letter; and similarly in Ps 119, where the interval is 16 lines, each alternate line within each set of 16 begins with the same letter.

Certainly in La 2, 3 and 4, and, according to the order of the verses in the LXX, in Ps 34 (for Ps 34 there is a d. A. Titus (for Ps 34 where the sense seems to require the transposition of v. 4 and v. 10, and in Ps 9, the sixteenth and seventeenth letters of the Hebrew alphabet occupy respectively the seventeenth and sixteenth places in the acrostic scheme. The reason for this is unknown.

Comparatively few of these poems have come down to us; they have suffered from accidental errors of textual transmission, and probably also from editorial alterations. In some cases an entire strophe has dropped out of the text; thus the sixth strophe (of 2 lines) has fallen out between v. 13 and v. 18 of Ps 145, though in the latter case it still stood in the Hebrew MS from which the Greek version was made. Occasionally lines have been inserted apparently, in more than one place in Ps 37, and in Nah 1. But such corruption of the text is really serious only in Ps 9 f., Nah 1, and Sir 51:13-30.

The earliest of these fifteen poems are probably La 2 and 3. The writer, or perhaps his companion, has placed them in the sixteenth and fifteenth centuries B.C.; but the custom of writing such poems may have been much more ancient. Perhaps the latest of the poems is Sir 51:13-30 (about n.c. 180), but the Jews continued to compose such poems long after this. The English reader will find the strophes to be distinctly marked in the OT, and the initial Hebrew letters with their names in English letters, in the RV of Ps 119. Unfortunately the RV does not give the initials in the other poems; but they will be found, in the case of the Psalms, in (for example) Kirkpatrick's Psalms (Cambridge Bible), Cheyne's Book of Psalms, Driver's Parallel Psalter. For La 2 and 4 see Expositor, 1906 (April) [cf. Smith]; for Nah 1, Expositor, 1909 (Sept.), pp. 207-220 [G. B. Gray], or Driver, Century Bible, p. 26 f. Common though it is in literature and with such medieval Jewish poets as Ibn Ezra, no decisive instance of the type of acrostic (or in which the initial letters compose a name, has been found in the OT, though some have defined the name Simeon (or Simon) thus given in Ps 110. Ps 23 and 34 contain each an alphabetic strophe at the end; in each case the first word of the verse is a part of the Hebrew verb paddah, 'to redeem,' and it has been suggested that the author or a copyist has thus left us the name -Pidada -but interesting as this suggestion is, it is for several reasons doubtful.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. I. Summary of contents.- The fifth book of our NT gives the history of the Church from the Ascension till A.D. 61. It may be divided into two parts, one of which describes the early history ('Acts of Peter' and 'Acts of the Hellenists'), and the other the life of St. Paul ('Acts of Paul') from his conversion to his imprisonment at Rome. The two parts overlap each other; yet a clear division occurs at 13, from which point forwards the Pauline journeys are described by one who for a considerable part of them was a fellow-traveller. The parallelism between Peter and Paul is very striking, corresponding deeds and events being related of each; and this peculiarity was thought by the Tübingen school to betray a fictitious author, who composed his narrative so as to show the equality of Peter and Paul. Though this conclusion is arbitrary, the parallelism shows us that the author, whoever he was, selected his facts and arranged them with a set purpose.

2. Unity of authorship.—From 16 onwards, the writer, who never names himself, frequently betrays his presence as a fellow-traveller by using the pronoun 'we.' It is generally conceded that these 'we' sections are genuine notes of a companion of St. Paul. But we must note that the compiler of Acts was probably not an eyewitness, who incorporated in his work extracts from a diary contemporary with the events described. These critics see in the book traces of four strata, and assert that it is a compilation of the same nature as that of the Pentateuch, the Book of Enoch, and the Apostolic Constitutions. Now no doubt our author used sources, in some parts of his book written sources. But if he were a 2nd cent. compiler, we ought to be able to detect interpolations from differences of style (as we do in Apost. Const.), and often from anachronisms. Moreover, seeing that he was at least a man of great literary ability, it is remarkable that he should use the pronoun 'we' if he was a late writer copying a 1st cent. source. His style is the same throughout, and no anachronisms have been really brought home to him; but this is by no means a high compliment. Thus we may, with Harnack, dismiss the compilation theory.

3. Literary work.—The unity of his authorship is a matter of internal evidence, if the unity of authorship be admitted, appears. The writer was a close companion of St. Paul. Now, the names of the Apostle's companions given in the Epistles, we shall find that all but four must be excluded, whether as having joined him after his arrival at Rome (for the author made the voyage with him, 27), or as being mentioned in Acts in a manner inconsistent with bishopship (so, e.g., Timothy, Tychicus, Aristarchus, Mark, Priscus, Aquila. Trophimus must be excluded), or as having deserted him, or as being Roman Christians and not the four (Crescens and Jesus Justus) are insignificant, and had no specially intimate connexion with the Apostle. We have only Titus and Luke left. Neither is mentioned in Acts; it was probably important to the writer to have two close friends of the Apostle, and so he places Titus and Luke in the list. The names of the Apostle's companions given in the Epistles, we shall find that all but four must be excluded, whether as having joined him after his arrival at Rome (for the author made the voyage with him, 27), or as being mentioned in Acts in a manner inconsistent with bishopship (so, e.g., Timothy, Tychicus, Aristarchus, Mark, Priscus, Aquila. Trophimus must be excluded), or as having deserted him, or as being Roman Christians and not the four (Crescens and Jesus Justus) are insignificant, and had no specially intimate connexion with the Apostle. We have then to choose between them, and Patristic evidence (§ 4) leads us to choose Luke. But why are thus not mentioned in Acts? It cannot be (as Lightfoot suggests) that he was unimportant (cf. 2 Cor. 9), but perhaps Luke's silence is due to Titus being his near relation (Crescens); cf. Exp. of Acts, esp. the scope of the alphabet and (1907) 285, 355, 580.

The author was a Gentile, not a Jew (Clement, 15), to which an conclusion to which a consideration of his interests would lead us (§ 8; see also Ac 11 'in their language'). He was a Roman citizen (Col 7), and the name Paul he uses (1 Cor 1:1, 9, 20, 27). His countryman is indicated, A Preface to Luke, thought to be not later than the 3rd cent., says that he was 'by nation a Syrian of Antioch'; and Eusebius (HE II 3. 4), using a vague phrase, says that he was 'according to birth, of those from Antioch'; while later writers like Jerome follow Eusebius. Certainly we should never have guessed this from the cold way in which Luke introduces the last of the list of the seven in Acts. Some (Brocklach, Rendall) conjecture that Theidian Antioch is really meant, as the scenes in the neighbourhood of that city are so vivid that the description might well be by an eye-witness. But the 'we' sections had not yet begun, and this seems decisive against the writer having been elsewhere present. Other evidence is in his habit of having to have been a Macedonian of Philippi, since he took so great an interest in the claims of that colony (16). Indeed, Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 208 ff.) preoccupy the ingenious conjecture that Luke, having met Paul at Troas accidentally (16), could not have had any appointment, as Paul had not meant to go there), was the certain man of Macedonia' who appeared in the vision (16); it must have been someone from the Apostle knew by name, for otherwise he could not have told that he was a Macedonian, a tempting conjecture. Luke need not have been a new convert at that time. On the other hand, it must be said that against his having been a native of Philippi are the facts that he had no home there, but went to judge with Lydia (16'), and that he only supposed that there was a Jewish place of prayer in Philippi (169 Ry.). His interest in Philippi may rather be accounted for by his having been left in charge of the Church there (17'; 20', in the interval between his first and second visit to Philippi and his return there). Yet he was quite probably a Macedonian [Ac 27' is not against this, of a Greek family cause said of Antioch]; he was Gentile not by some conquest for the Jews, and certainly not a Roman citizen like St. Paul. His Greek nationality shows itself in his calling the Macedian 'Barbarians' (28'), i.e. non-Greek speaking, and in many other ways.

4. Patristic testimony.—There are probable references to Acts in Clem. in Rome (c. a.d. 95), who references to 138' 206 etc.; and in Igitur (c. a.d. 110), who apparently refers to 4'; also in Polycarp (c. 111); almost certainly in the Martyrdom of Polycarp (c. a.d. 155); and full quotations are found at the end of the 2nd cent. in Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Ireneus, all of whom ascribe the book to Luke. So also the Muratorian Fragment (c. a.d. 200). Moreover, the apocryphal Acts, some of them of the 2nd cent., are built on our canonical Acts, and their authors must have known the latter.

5. Style.—The book is not a chronological biography; there are few indications of time (17' 24' c. Lk 31'); yet there are other occasions where he uses phrases like 'after several days,' which may indicate intervals of days, months, or years. He seizes critical features, and passes over unessential details. Thus he does not relate the events of the 13 years spent by St. Paul in Tarsus (199'), probably as being years of education in which no striking event occurred. So he tells us practically nothing of the missionary journey through Cyprus (18'), though much work may have been done among the Jews there, while great space is given to the epoch-making interview with Sergius Paulus. The writer leaves a good deal to be understood; he states facts, and leaves the reader to fill in the necessary inferences: he reports directions or intentions, and leaves it to be inferred that they were carried into effect, e.g. 13' (no reason given for Elymas' opposition, it is not explicitly said that Paul preached to the proconsul), 13' (the reason for Mark's departure not stated, nor yet for Paul and Barnabas going to Pisidian Antioch), 16' (no reason given for the Philippi preachers' change of attitude), 17' (not said that the injunction was obeyed, but from 1 Th 2' we see that Timothy had rejoined Paul at Athens and was sent away again to Macedonia, whence he came in Ac 18' to Corinth), 20' (not stated that they arrived after they had said they must be understood), 21' (it must be inferred that the injunction was obeyed).

6. Crises in the history.—These may be briefly indicated. They include the Day of Pentecost (the birthday of the Church); the formation of the Seven (among them Nicholas, a 'proselyte of righteousness,' i.e. a Gentile who had become a circumcised Jew); the conversion of St. Paul; the episode of Cornelius (who was only a 'proselyte of the gate,' or 'God-fearing,' one who was brought into relation with the Jews by obeying certain elementary rules, such, probably, as those of 15', but not circumcised [this is disputed; see NICOLAUS]; this means, therefore, a further step towards Pauline Christianity); the first meeting of Paul and Barnabas with a Roman official in the person of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, the initial step in the great plan of St. Paul to make Christianity the religion of the Roman Empire (see § 7); henceforward the author calls Saul of Tarsus by his Roman name, one which he must have borne all along, for the purposes of his Roman citizenship; the Council of Jerusalem, the 'Indication' of Pauline teaching; the call to Macedonia, not as being a passing from one continent to another, for the Romans had not this geographical idea, nor yet as a passing over to a strange people, but partly as a step forwards in the great plan, the entering into a new Roman province, and especially the association for the first time with the author (§ 3); the residence at Corinth, the great city on the Roman highway to the East, was the most likely place for the appeal to Caesar; and the apprehension at Jerusalem. These are related at length. Another crisis is probably hinted at, the acquittal of St. Paul; for even if the book were written before that took place, it does not appear that he became free of such troubles as had been brought upon him towards the end of the two years' sojourn at Rome (cf. Ph 23').

7. Missionary plan of St. Paul.—(a) The author describes the Apostle as beginning new missionary work by seeking out the Jews first; only when they would not listen he turned to the Gentiles, 13', 14', 10' (no synagogue at Philippi, only a 'place of prayer') (it, the words 'as is custom' are decisive) 17', 18', 19', 19' 20'; we may perhaps understand the same at places where it is not expressly mentioned, 14', 21', or the Jew may have been weak and without a synagogue in those places. (b) St. Paul utilizes the Roman Empire to spread the gospel along its lines of communication. He was justifiably proud of his Roman citizenship (16' 22' etc.; cf. Ph 17' [RVm] 39', Eph 29'), and he wishes to have for the great idea of Christianity being the religion of the Roman Empire, though not confined to it. Hence may he understood his zeal for Gentile liberty, and his breaking away from the idea of Jewish exclusiveness. In his missionary journeys he confines himself (if the word should be used) to the activity of the Gentiles (his theory be accepted; see art. GALATIANS [EMPIRE TO TURN] to the great roads of traffic in the Empire. He utilizes the Greek language to spread Christian influence, just as the Roman Empire used it to spread information in the far East, where it never attempted to force Latin (for even the Roman colonies in the East spoke Greek, keeping Latin for state occasions). Paul and Barnabas, then, preached in Greek; they clearly did not know Lycaonian (cf. Ac 14' with 14'). The Scriptures were not translated into the languages of Asia Minor, which were probably not written languages, nor even into Latin till a later age.

Following the same idea, the author represents the Roman officials in the colonies as more favourable to St. Paul than the magistrates of the ordinary Greek cities. Contrast the account of the conduct of the Greek magistrates at Iconium and Thessalonica who were active against him, or of the Court of the Areopagus at Athens who were contemptuous, with the silence about the action of the Roman magistrates of Pisidian Antioch and Lystra, or the explicit statement about Sergius Paulus, Gallio, Festus, Claudius Lysias and Julius the centurion, who were more or less fair or friendly. Even the preachers at Philippi ended apologizing profusely when they had the opportunity to appeal to Caesar; yet it was the right of the Roman citizen to do so.

8. The writer's interests.—It is interesting to observe these, as they will lead us to an approximate date for the work. There is no better test than such an inquiry for the detection of a forgery or of a compilation. The principal interest is obviously St. Paul and his mission. To this the preliminatory history of the Twelve and of the beginnings of Christianity leads up. The writer emphasizes especially St. Paul's dealings with Roman officials. Of minor interests we notice medicine, as we should expect from 'the beloved physician,' and the rural science of surgery; the position and influence of women (11' 12' 13' 15' 16' 17', 21', 22' etc.; in Asia Minor women had a much more prominent position than in Greece proper); the organization of the Church (24' 28' 38' 48' 150' 196' etc.); Divine intervention to overrule human projects (note especially the remarkable way in which St. Paul was led to Troas, 10' 4'); and navigation. This last interest cannot but strike the most cursory reader. The voyages that are spent by St. Paul lead by the Cape of Good Hope, while the land journeys are only just mentioned. Yet the writer was clearly no professional sailor. He describes the drifting in 27' as a zigzag course when it must have been straight; he is surprised at their passing Cyprus on a different side when going westward from that on which they had passed it going eastward (27° 21'), though that was, and is, the normal course in autumn for sailing vessels (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 317). It has been truly remarked by Ramsay (ib. p. 22) that the writer's interests and views are incompatible with the idea of a 2nd cent. compiler: e.g. the view of the Apocalypse, and the optimistic tone, would be impossible after the persecution of Domitian—or even (we may add) after that of Nero.

9. Date.—From the reasoning of §§ 2, 8 (see also § 12) we must reject the idea of a 2nd cent. compiler and decide between a date at the end of the two years at Rome, 284c. (Blass, Salmon, Headlam, Rackham), and a later date 70–80 A.D. (Ramsay, Sanday, Harnack, and most of those who ascribe the book to Luke).—(a) For the former date we note that there is no reference to anything after the Roman imprisonment, to the martyrdom of James the Lord's brother in A.D. 62, or to the Neronian persecution in A.D. 64, or to the death of Domitian in A.D. 96. (b) If we accept this latter date, and that St. Paul was released soon after the two years; but we should gather that our author did not know for certain the result of the appeal to Cesar. He could hardly have known that the Apocalypse had been written; and we should not again see the Ephesian elders was falsified, or he would not have left 20th without remark (but see Paul, i. 4 d[)]. The optimistic tone (§ 8), contrasting so greatly with that of the Apocalypse, points in the same direction; as also does the absence of any reference to the Pauline Epistles, which we should expect if 15 or 20 years had elapsed since they were written; and of any explanation of the apparent contradiction between Galatians and Romans (see art. Galatians [Epistle to the]). On the other hand, it is quite likely that a close companion of St. Paul would be the last to have, as long as he was with him, a copy of his correspondence.—(b) For the later date, according to 16., it is suggested that Luke contemplated a third volume, and so ended his second abruptly (cf. 1st, properly 'first treatise,' not 'former'; but in late Greek comparatives and superlatives were frequently confounded; cf. 1 Cor 15.51). It is also thought that the Lk 21st must have been written after the taking of Jerusalem, and that a fortiori Acts must be later; and that the atmosphere of the Flavian period may be felt in it. For an alleged borrowing of Acts from Josephus, and for further remarks on the date, see art. Luke [Gospel acc. to] and Thessalians. To the present writer the earlier date given above seems more probable.

10. Sources.—The author had exceptional opportunities of getting information. For the last part of the book he was his own informant, or he had access to St. Paul. John Mark would tell him of the delverence of St. Peter and of the mission to Cyprus (12–13). For the 'Acts of the Hellenists' (chs. 6–8) and for the Cornelius episode he would have Philip the Evangelist as an authority, for he spent two years at Cesarea; and perhaps also Cornelius himself. He had perhaps visited the Syrian Antioch, and could get from the leaders of the Church there (e.g. Manaen) information of the events which happened there. The five chapters remain. Here he had to depend entirely on others; he may have used written documents similar to those mentioned in Lk 11, though he may also have questioned those at Jerusalem who had witnessed these events. Dr. Blass thinks that Luke here used an Aramaic draft by Mark; this is pure conjecture, and it is quite uncertain if Luke knew Aramaic.

11. The Bezan codex.—This great Uncial MS (D, now at Cambridge), supported by some MSS of the Old Latin Version, presents a strikingly different text from that of the other great Greek MSS, and has also many additions, especially in Acts. Dr. Blass's theory is that these variations in Acts come from Luke's having made two drafts of the book, the first draft, the 'Bezan Luke' is too smooth, and its readings are too often obviously added to ease a rough phrase, for it to it be original. It is more probable that it represents the original, and that Luke made a revision of it in Asia Minor in the 2nd cent. by one who was very familiar with the localities described. Many scholars, however, think that it preserves the genuine and authentic readings which have been lost in the other great MSS; but this seems doubtful.—In 116 this MS (supported by Augustine) renders 'we,' makes the writer to have been present at Syrian Antioch when Agabus prophesied.

12. Accuracy of Acts.—This is most important, as it would be almost impossible for a late writer to avoid pitfalls when covering so large a ground. Instances of remarkable accuracy are: (a) the proscription in Cyprus (13'), which had only been under the rule of the Senate for a short time when St. Paul came there, and afterwards ceased to be so governed—otherwise the governor would have been a 'propritor.' An inscription in Cyprus is dated 'in the proconsulship of Paulus.' (b) So the proscription in Achaea (18'); this province had been off and on united to Macedonia. At one time separated and governed by a propritor and then united, a few years before St. Paul's visit it is said that some of the readings of the 'first man' at Phaselis, and the 'first Ten.' This last title was only given (as here) to a board of magistrates in Greek cities which the Roman appointees in Italy the name was given to those who stood first on the Senate roll. (d) The 'first man' in Malta (28') and the 'politeia' ('rulers of the city') at Thessalonica (17'); probably a local Macedonian title, are both supported by inscriptions. (f) The Old Court of the Areopagus at Athens (17'), which really ruled the city,—though it was a free city,—as the demos or popular assembly had lost its authority. (g) The 'Archon' at Ephesus (19'), the president of the 'common Council' of the province in cities where there was a temple of Rome and the Emperor; they superintended the worship of the Emperor. Their friendliness to St. Paul was the sign of an early date, for the book could only have been written while the Imperial policy was still neutral to Christianity, or at least while the memory of that time was still green. Contrast the enmity between Christianity and this archonship depicted in the gospels and 13th etc. No 2nd cent. author could have written thus. (A) The details of the last voyage, thoroughly tested by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill, who sailed over the whole course.—Against all this it is alleged that there are contradictions between Acts and Galatians (see art. on that Epistle); but these vanish on examination, especially if we accept the 'South Galatian' theory. Instances of minute accuracy such as those given above show that we have in Acts a history of great importance and one that is most trustworthy. The accuracy can only come from the book being a genuine contemporary record.

ADAAH (Jos 16.9.).—A city of Judah in the Negeb; perhaps a corrupt reading for Ararab, i.e. Aror of 1 S 30'.

ADAH.—1. One of the two wives of Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen 419–26). The name possibly means 'brightness' (cf. Arab, ghadd, Lamech's other wife being named 'Zillah'—shadow, darkness,' 2. Daughter of Elon, a Hittite, and one of the wives of Essau (Gn 36:4). In Gn 20:4 (P) the daughter of Elon the Hitite, whom Essau takes to wife, is named Basemath (Gn 24:44, see E Z R A 3:12).

A D A I A H (jehovah has adored).—1. The maternal grandfather of Josiah, 2 K 22:5. 2. A Levite, 1 Ch 6:4, called Ziddo in v. 24. 3. A son of Shimel (in v. 19 Shemai) the Benjamite, 1 Ch 8:8. 4. The son of Jeroham, a priest, and head of a family in Jerusalem, 1 Ch 2:49. 5. The father of Meseelah, a captain who helped to overthrow the usurpation of Athalitha, 2 Ch 23:22. 6. One of the family of Bani, who took a strange wife during the Exile, Ezr 10:9. 7. Another of a different family of Bani, who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10:9. 8. A descendant of Judah by Pharez, Neh 11:9. 9. A Levite of the family of Aaron, Neh 11:10; probably the same as No. 4.

A D A L I A (Est 9:3).—The fifth of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

A D A M.—The derivation is doubtful. The most plausible is which connects it with the Assy. adamu, 'make,' 'produce': man is thus a 'creature'—one made or produced. Some derive it from a root signifying 'red' (cf. Edom, Gn 26:14), men being of a red colour in the district where the word originated. The Biblical writer (Gn 2:7) explains it, according to his frequent practice, by a play on the word 'adamah,' 'earth,' which is that in itself derived from the root 'red.' The word occurs in the Heb, 31 times in Gn 1:26-5:27. In most of these it is not a proper name, and the RV has rightly substituted 'man' or 'the man.' The verses where the RV has 'Adam' since the name signifies 'mankind,' homo, Mencheh, not 'a man,' vir, Mami (see 5:2), the narrative appears to be a description, not of particular historical events in the life of an individual, but of the beginnings of human life (ch. 2), human sin (ch. 3), human genealogical descent (4:1-5). In a few passages, if the text is sound, the writer slips into the use of Adam as a proper name, but only in 5:2 does it stand unmistakably for an individual.

1. The creation of man is related twice, 1 M 2:27 (P) and 2:27 (J). The former passage is the result of philosophical and theological reflection of a late date, which had taught the writer that man is the climax of creation because his personality partakes of the Divine (and in 5:2 this prerogative is handed on to his offspring); but the latter is written from the naive and primitive standpoint of tradition, which deals only with man's reception of physical life (see next article).

2. Man's primitive condition, 2:18-25 (J). The story teaches: that man has work to do in life (2:18); that he may not partake of the fruit of the tree of knowledge (2:17); that all nature is for him (2:19); that he is the chief of the beasts in the intellectual ability, and therefore in the authority, which he possesses to assign to them their several names (2:19, 20); that man, in his primitive condition, was far from being morally or socially perfect; he was simply in a state of savagery, but from a moral standpoint innocent, because he had not yet learned the meaning of right and wrong (v.19); and this blissful ignorance is also portrayed by the pleasures of a luxuriant garden or park (v.14).

3. The Fall, 3:1-24. 3 (J). But there came a point in human evolution when man became conscious of a conflict—the earliest germ of a recognition of an organ of man, pictured as a serpent, and his higher aspirations after obedience (8:16); the serpent having already been identified with the devil; the idea is not found till Ws 2:9); by a deliberate following of the lower nature against which he had begun to strive, man first caused sin to exist (v.5); with the instant result of a feeling of shame (v.7), and the world-wide consequence of pain, trouble, and death (v.14-15), and the cessation for ever of the former state of innocent ignorance and bliss (v.23-24).

A. H. M'NIBLE.

A D A M I N  T H E  N T.—A. In the Gospels.—1. In Mt 19:4-5 Mk 10:4-9 Jesus refers to Gn 19:7. His answer to the Pharisees is intended to show that the provision made for divorce in the Mosaic law (Di 24:1-4) was only a concession to the hardness of men's hearts. The truer and deeper view of marriage must be based on a morality which takes its stand upon the primeval nature of man and woman. And with His quotation He couples one from Gn 2:24 (see also Eph 5:3). The same result is reached in Mt., but with a transposition of the two parts of the argument.

In Lk 22:24 the ancestry of Jesus is traced up to Adam. As a Gentile writing for Gentiles, St. Luke took every opportunity of insisting upon the universal power of the gospel. Jesus is not, as in St. Matthew's Gospel, the descendant of Abraham only, but of the man to whom all mankind trace their origin. But further, the same Evangelist who relates the fact of the Virgin-birth, and records that Christ was, in His own proper Person, 'Son of God' (1:2), also, in His words of the genealogy, that the first man, and hence every human being, is 'son of God.' As Jesus is both human and Divine, so the genealogy preserves the truth that all mankind partake of this twofold nature.

B. In the Epistles. —The truth taught by St. Luke is treated in its redemptive aspect by his master St. Paul.

1. 1 Co 15:22. The solidarity of mankind in their physical union with Adam, and in their spiritual union with Adam's fall, and therefore died. The Apostle, without attempting fully to reconcile them, places side by side the two aspects of the truth—the hereditary transmission of guilt, and moral responsibility; and thus death made its way to all men, 'because all sinned.'—(a) vv.13, 14. The contrast is far greater than the similarity; in quality (v.13), in quantity (v.14), in character and consequences (v.17).—(c) Summary of the argument (v.18-22).

2. In Ro 5:12-18 this is treated more fully.—(a) vv.13-15. There is a parallelism between Adam and Christ. Both had a universal effect upon mankind—in the case of Adam by a transmission of guilt, and therefore of death; the corresponding statement concerning Christ is postponed till v.15, because St. Paul intervenes with a parenthesis dealing with those who lived before any specific commands were given in the Mosaic law, and yet who sinned, owing to the transmitted effects of Adam's fall, and therefore died. The Apostle, without attempting fully to reconcile them, places side by side the two aspects of the truth—the hereditary transmission of guilt, and moral responsibility; and thus death made its way to all men, because all sinned.'—(b) vv.13-17. The contrast is far greater than the similarity; in quality (v.13), in quantity (v.14), in character and consequences (v.17).—(c) Summary of the argument (v.18-22).

3. 1 Co 15:12-14. In the foregoing passages St. Paul deals with the practical moral results of union with Adam and Christ respectively. These verses (a) go beyond that, and show that there is a radical difference between the nature of each; (b) look forward, and show that this difference has a vital bearing on the truth of man's resurrection.

(a) vv.18-24. It is shown, by illustrations from nature, that it is reasonable to believe man to exist in two different states, one far higher than the other. In vv.16-18 St. Paul adapts Gn 2 (LXX), and reads into the words the doctrinal significance that the body of the first representative man became the vehicle of a 'psychical' nature, while the body of the Second is the organ of a 'pneumatical' nature. The second half of his statement—the 'last Adam' became a life-giving spirit—is to be based on a reminiscence of Messianic passages which speak of the work of the Divine Spirit, e.g. Is 11:1, Jl 2:28-29.

(b) But as the living soul (pnevko) preceded the life-giving spirit (pnevma), so is it with the development of mankind (v.14). As the first man had a soul in conformity with his origin from clay, while the Second has His origin from heaven (v.17), so the nature of some men remains earthy, while that of some has become heavenly (r. 4a). But further, in his present state man is the exact counterpart of the first man, because of his corporate union with him; but the time is coming when he shall become the exact counterpart of the Second Man (cf. Gn 2:14), because of our spiritual union with Him (r. 4b).

4. In Ph 2:4 there is an implied contrast between 'Christ Jesus, who . . . seemed not to be subject on an equality with God,' and Adam, who took fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, which God said had made him 'as one of us' (Gn 3:22).

5. On 1 Ti 2:5, see Eves; and on Jude 4 see Enoch.

ADAM (city).—A city in the Jordan valley, 'beside Zarethan' (Jos 3:16); usually identified with Jez 'ad-damih, near the confluence of the Jabbok and the Jordan, where there was once a bridge. Hiram, Solomon's worker in brass, may have had his furnace here (cf. 1 K 7:43).

ADAMAH.—A fortified city of Naphtali (Jos 19:42); identified by Conder with 'Adamah on the plateau north of Esbushean; placed by the Palestine explorers at ad-damih, 5 miles S.W. of Tiberas. See ADAM-NEKEK.

ADAMAH is twice (Ekz 3:22, Zec 5:7) used in AV and RV as tr. of sâmîr, which is elsewhere rendered either 'brier' (Is 5:18, N. v. = ?Gn 2:15, 22), or 'diamond' (Jer 1:12). 'Diamond,' which arose from 'adamant' by a variety of spelling ( adamant, or 'adamint,' then 'adamanti' or 'diamond'), has displaced 'adamant' as the name of the precious stone, 'adamant,' which is now used metaphorically to express extreme hardness.

ADAM-NEKEK.—The pass Adami (Jos 19:41), on the border of Naphtali. Neubauer and C. A. Smith identify it with ad-damih, 5 miles S.W. of Tiberas, See ADAMAH. G. L. ROBINSON.

ADAR (Exr 6:14, Est 5:12, 9:14, 1 Mac 2:16, 2 Mac 1:16, Est 10:13, 14:16).—The 12th month in the later Jewish Calendar. See TIME.

ADASA.—A town near Bethoron (1 Mac 10:21, Jos. Ant. xii. x. 5), now the ruin 'Adamash near Gideon.

ADBEEL.—The third son of Ishmael (Gn 25:17, 1 Ch 1:29), eponym of the N. Arab tribe, which appears in cuneiform inscr. as Ihud or Ithbhal, and which had its settlements S.W. of the Dead Sea.

ADAN (1 Es 5:1).—Some of the inhabitants of this place returned with Zerubbabel, but were unable to prove their true Iar. descent by showing to what clan or family they belonged (Est 2:23). The name does not appear in the later lists in Est 10, Neh. 10. In Neh 7:42 it appears as Addon.

ADAR.—1. A town on the border of Judah south of Beersheba (Jos 15:22). The site is unknown. 2. See ADR.

ADDA.—See SEPHREN.

ADDON.—Neh 7:27, See ADDAN.

ADDUS.—1. His son returned with Zerub. (1 Es 5:4); omitted in the parallel lists in Est 2, Neh. 2. 3. See JADDUS.

ADDY.—A town in the Shephelah (Jos. Ant. xiii. vi. 5) fortified by Simon the Hasmonaen (1 Mac 12:18, 13:1). See HADDUS.

ADIN (Est 2:8, Neh 7:19, 1 Es 5:4, 23).—See ADUN.

ADINA.—A Reubenite chief, 1 Ch 11:6.

ADINO.—The present Heb. text of 2 S 23:14 is corrupt, the true reading being preserved in the parallel passage 1 Ch 11:14 'Jashobeam, the son of a Haschmonite, he lifted up his spear.' The last clause, hit 'brer eh-hanthô, was corrupted into hit 'adnô ha'ent, and then taken erroneously as a proper name, being treated as an alternative to the preceding 'Joshéb-bashebeth, a Tachche-monite' (see JASHOBREH).

ADINU (1 Es 5:4, called ADIN in 5:3).—His descendants returned with Zerub. to the number of 454 (1 Es 5:4, Est 2:23) or 656 (Neh 7:29). A second party of 51 (Est 8:8) or 251 (1 Es 8:9) accompanied Ezra. They are mentioned among the 'chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10).

ADLAI.—The father of Shaphat, one of David's hardmen, 1 Ch 27:25.

ADMAH (Gn 15:13, 14, Dt 20:9, Hos 11:8).—One of the cities of the Cisear or 'Round.' It is not noticed as overthrown in the account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19), but is included in their catastrophe in the two later passages.

ADMATHA (Est 1:9).—One of the seven wise men or counsellors of Ahasuerus, who were granted admittance to the king's presence (cf. 2 K 15:19).

ADMIRAH.—This word in AV means no more than wonder, as Rev 17:8 'I wondered with great admiration' (RV 'with a great wonder').

ADONI-BEZEK (perhaps a corrupted form of ADONI-ZEDEK, Jos 10:9-15).—A king of Bezek (a different place from that mentioned in 1 S 11), who was defeated by Simeon and Judah. The mutilation inflicted upon him—the cutting off of the thumbs and great toes—was in order to render him harmless, while retaining him as a trophy; but he died on reaching Jerusalem. Adoni-bezek boasted of having mutilated seventy kings in a similar manner. The passage (Jg 9:7) which speaks of Adoni-bezek does not appear to be intact; the original form probably gave more details.

W. O. E. OSBORN.

unwilling, as it gave a handle to his enemies, for King David was still alive. These, naturally on the alert, represent the gathering to David, now very aged, as an attempt to usurp the throne while he is yet alive; Bathsheba reminds David of his promise that Solomon, her son, should succeed him on the throne (11:3) [this may or may not have been the case; there is no reference to it elsewhere, and it certainly does not accord with what we read in 1:24]; David, remembering perhaps the rebellion of Absalom (whom Adonijah seems to have resembled in temperament as well as in outward appearance), is easily prevailed upon to transfer the succession to Solomon (11:2). Even so it is very doubtful whether Bathsheba would have succeeded in her plan had it not been that she was enabled to gain Benaliah to her side; as captain of the king’s body-guard (the Cherethites and Pelethites), Benaliah was the man upon whom the issue really depended, for he commanded the only armed troops that were immediately available. In an emergency such as this, everything would depend upon who could strike the first decisive blow. Had the old commander-in-chief Of Solomon, time to act before those forces, no doubt issue would have been different; but Bathsheba and her friends had laid their plans too well, and they won the day. Adonijah is ‘pardoned’ (11:3); it would have been to the advantage of the attitude of the people (24), to put him to death until Solomon was secure on the throne; but as he was rightful heir, the safety of Solomon’s throne could never be guaranteed as long as Adonijah lived. Bathsheba was not the woman to be oblivious of this fact, accordingly she recommences her intrigues; she represents to Solomon that Adonijah is desirous of marrying Abishag the Shunammite, the maid-in-who was brought to David in his old age (9:14), and who, according to Oriental ideas, was regarded as one of the royal wives. Such a desire was naturally interpreted by Solomon as an intention of seeking the kingdom (29), and self-preservation compelled him to decree Adonijah’s death, a sentence which was carried out by Benaliah (29).

The above is not in entire accord with the Biblical account, which in its present form gives rise to a number of serious difficulties. We shall mention but two of these. The request which Adonijah asks Bathsheba to convey (29) was the most grievous insult that could have been offered to the king; Adonijah would have known precisely what the result would be, viz. death to himself, unless supported by an army; but the note that he consulted an armed rising. Secondly, Bathsheba is quite the last person he would have selected to present the request as nothing of the kind, and prime mover in this successful conspiracy which had robbed him of his succession, he would know better than to casually entrust it to a person whom he knew, or even feared, to be a woman, in his old age, to this task. Adonijah is one of those men whose cruel fate and tragic death, both undeserved, must call forth deep sympathy and commiseration.

2. Adonikam.—Adonikam, one of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 9:18, 10:9).

3. One of those sent, in the third year of Jehoshaphat, to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17:7, 9). W. E. G. OBERBILLY

ADONIKAM (‘my Lord has arisen’), Ezra 2:28, 8:1; Neh 7:11, 1 Esd 5:19. The head of a Jewish family after the Exile; apparently called in Neh 10:15 Adonijah.

ADONIRAM, ADONIRAM.—The latter name occurs 2 S 20:6, 1 K 12:9, and is probably a corruption of Adoniram. Adoniram superintended the levies employed in the public works during the reigns of David, Solomon, and Rehoboam. He was stoned to death by the rebellious Israelites when sent to them by Rehoboam (1 K 12:9).

ADONIRAM.—The phrase rendered by EV ‘pleasant plants,’ and by RV ‘plantings of Adonis’ (Is 17:4), alludes to the miniature gardens whose rapid decline symbolized the death of this god, or rather the spring verdure of which he is a personification. This phase of the myth, which the Greeks obtained from the Semitic Tannmuz cult, through the Phoenicians, where the god was worshipped under the title of Adon (‘lord’), is used by Isaiah to depict the fading hope of Israel. See TANMUIZ.

N. KÖNIG.

ADONI-ZEDEK.—King of Jerusalem at the time of the Invasion of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua. After the Gibeonites had succeeded in making a league with Israel, he induced four other kings to unite with him against the invaders. Joshua came unexpectedly upon the allied kings, and utterly routed them. They were discovered in a cave at Makkedah, and brought before Joshua, who ordered them to be slain. Their bodies were hung up until the evening, when they were taken down and flung into the cave where they had hid themselves. The mouth of the cave was filled up with great stones (Jos 10:27). Some have identified Adoni-zedek with Adoni-bezek of Jg 1.

ADOPTION.—The term ‘adoption’ is found five times in St. Paul’s letters (Eph., Rom.), and not elsewhere in the NT. It has reference to a situation where ‘adoption’ is made to the favoured position of the Jews as the chosen people. To them belonged the adoption, the position of sons (Ex 4:22). In the remaining passages St. Paul uses the word to describe the privileges of the Gentiles, who are opposed to the unbeliever. He is trying, as a rule, to bring home to Gentile readers the great change wrought by the coming of Christ. Though W. M. Ramsay has attempted to identify peculiarities of Syro-Greek law in Gal 4, and though it is true that ’no word is more common in Greek inscriptions of Hellenistic times: the idea like the word is native Greek,’ yet St. Paul’s use of the term seems to be based on Roman law. See Hastings’ ERE, s.v.

Adoption in Roman law could be effected by a modified form of the method of sale known as mancipatio. It seems to have existed among all the nations in the East, and has been discovered in legal documents of the ancient world. The process was as follows: the father, or the Gebir, made personal to the person to whom he desired to give his son, or his goods, or his property. Certain formal gestures were made and sentences pronounced. The (purchaser) simultaneously paid the price by striking the scales with a piece of money, and the (vendor) ratified what he had done in a set form of words. (Maine, Ancient Law, vi.) The witnesses were necessary, especially in the age before written documents, to vouch for the regularity of the procedure, and to ensure the genuineness of the transaction.

Some of the details of the personal laws are reflected in the language of St. Paul. To redeem those under the law (Gal 4) suggests that God’s action in sending His Son to slay the Law under which we are is the same as that of the Jewish father, when, by the adopting parent’s purchase of a son from his natural father.

Again, Dr. W. E. Ball (Contemp. Rel., 1891) has pointed out that the work of the Spirit (Ro 8:5) is parallel to the place of the five witnesses in the process of adoption. The reality of God’s adoption is assured by the Spirit’s witness. Dr. Ball brings out the general force of the metaphor thus. Any one who was made a son by adoption, severed all his former ties. Even his debts appear to have been cancelled. The adopted person becomes the eyes of the law a new creature. He was born again into a new family. By the aid of this figure, the Gentile convert was enabled to realize in a vivid manner the fatherhood of God, brotherhood of the faithful, the obliteration of past penalties, the right to the mystic inheritance. The figure of adoption describes clearly the effect of God’s revelation of Himself as Father.

St. Paul speaks of adoption, as both present (Ro 8:5) and future (v. 15). With Pflieger we must distinguish three moments in adoption. It involves here and now, freedom from the Law, and the possession of the spirit of adoption which enables us to address God as our Father. Adoption will be completed by the redemption of our body, the inheritance with Christ in glory. ‘Becin an inward relation and as Divine right, with which, however, the objective and real state does not yet correspond (Mk 9:10). When St. Paul's view of adoption now and adoption hereafter compare 1 Jn 3:8.

In Eph P adoption seems to mean that conforming to the character of Christ which begins here and is to be perfected through the future.

That the word 'adoption' does not represent belief as children of God by nature, is undeniable. But it would be a mistake to press the term as giving a complete account of St. Paul's views of the relations of God to man. Roman law afforded St. Paul illustrations rather than theories. It is not clear whether in Ro 8 he conceives the spirit of sonship which crying 'Abba, Father,' to be received in the Spirit or at conversion; or on the other hand to be the natural cry of the human heart. But in any case, he has found the love of God In Christ, and the change in his life is such that the complete change produced in a man's condition by adoption is only a pale reflex of the Apostle's experience. See further, INHERITANCE.

ADORAM (1 Mac 13:39).—The same as Adoram.

ADORAM (2 Ch. 11:16).—A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam on the S.W. of his mountain kingdom; now Dor, a small village at the edge of the mountains W. of Hebron.

ADORAM.—See ADONIRAM.

ADORATION.—The word is not found in AV or RV, and even for the verb RV substitutes 'worship' in Bel 4; but both the idea and its expression in art are frequent.

Amongst the Hebrews the postures and gestures expressive of adoration underwent slight change in the course of time. Kissing the statue of a god (1 K 18:2); bowing in prostration (2 Ch 11:16) was amongst the most frequent. Bel 4 was rendered a name as an act of submission or reverence towards kings (2 S 14:4), towards strangers of mysterious quality (Gn 18:8), as an expression of close and respectful attachment (1 S 20:8), or with the design to conciliate (Gn 33:10, 1 S 25:5, Est 8:9, Mt 15:18), or to honour (2 K 13:17). 'Sat before the Lord' (2 S 7:15) may refer to a special and solemn mode of sitting, as in 1 K 18:14; the Arabs are said to have sat during a part of their worship in such a way that their head could easily be bent forward and made to touch the ground.

Outside the Christian sphere, prostration continued in the East to be a mark of submission and homage, rendered to such men as were held in any respect or reverence by convention invested in thought with Divine qualities or powers. The NT, by example and less frequently by precept, confines this fullest mode of worship to God, and protests against its use towards men. Jairus' act (Mk 5:41, Lk 8:46) was prompted by intense yearning, a father's self-abandonment in the sore sickness of his child, and must not be taken as implying a full recognition of Christ's Divinity. Like Mary's posture at Bethany (Jn 11:32), it was a preparation for the attitude of the disciples after their visit to the empty tomb (Mt 28:9). Whatever Corinthus intended (Ac 10:33), Peter found an opportunity to lay down the rule that no man under any circumstances is an appropriate object of adoration; and John repeats that rule twice not far from the end of Scripture (Rev 19:10, 22:8). The attempt to alienate from God His peculiar honours is foredoomed by Satan (Mt 4:10); and adoption naturally follows a conviction of the presence of God (1 Co 14:31).

ADRAMMELECH.—1. Adrammelech and Anamme-lech (wh. see), the gods of Sepharvaim to whom the colonists, brought to Samaria from Sepharvaim, built a temple on the Mount of Olives (2 K 17:27). There is no good explanation of the name: it was once supposed to be Adar-malki, 'Adar the prince.' But Adar is not known to be a Babylonian god, and compound Divine names are practically unknown, nor were human sacrifices offered to Babylonian gods.

2. Adrammelech and Sharezer (wh. see) are given in 2 K 19:37 as the sons of Sennacherib who murdered their father. [The Kethibh of Kings omits 'his sons'.] The Babylonian Chronicle says: 'On the 20th of Tebet, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was killed by his son in an insurrection'; and all other native sources agree in ascribing the murder to one son, but do not name him. Adrammelech is impossible as an Assyrian personal name, and probably arises here from some corruption of the text. The sons of Sennacherib known to us are Ashur-nadin-shum, king of Babylon, b.c. 700–694; Esarhaddon, who succeeded his father, b.c. 681; Ardi-Belit, Crown Prince, b.c. 694; Ashurum-ushshabli, for whom Sennacherib built a palace in Tarbis; Ashur-Ilu-muballitsu, for whom Sennacherib built a palace in Assur; and Sbar-etfi-Ashur. Possibly Ardi-Belit is intended.

C. H. W. JOWIS.

ADRAMYTIIUM.—A town of Mysia (in the Roman province of Asia) on the Adriatic Gulf, originally a native State, and only later Hellenized by the Delians, who had been driven away from home by the Athenians (422 B.C.). In Roman times it was a place of considerable importance both politically and intellectually. It possessed a harbour, and a ship belonging to the place carried St. Paul from Cesarea by Sidon and Cyprus to Myra (Ac 27:4).

A. SOUTER.

ADRIA (more correctly Hadria).—The name was first confined to the northern part of what we call the Adriatic Sea, or to a stretch of land near that, and was derived from a once important Etruscan city, Atria, situated at the mouth of the Po. The rest of what we call the Adriatic Sea appears to have been at that time included in the term Ionian Sea or Ionian Gulf. It was only later, with the growth of the Syracusan colonies on the coasts of Italy and Illyria, that the name 'Hadria' came to include the whole Adriatic, and even then, at first, it was the practice to call the southernmost part the Ionian Sea. This reduction of the Ionian Sea to a part of Hadria led, when the name 'Ionian Sea' was transferred to the Sicilian Sea in the W. of Greece, to a misuse of the term 'Hadria.' It was extended to include the Tarentine Gulf, the Sicilian coast, and the Corinthian Gulf, and even the whole Sea from Crete and Malta, as in Ac 27:7.

A. SOUTER.

ADRIEL.—Son of Barzillai, the Meholathite. He married Merab, the eldest daughter of Saul, who should have been given to David as the squire of Goliath (1 S 18:19, 2 S 21:9 in the latter 'Michal' is a mistake for 'Merab').

A. SOUTER.

ADUEL.—An ancestor of Tobit, To 11; a variant form of Adiel, 1 Ch 4:4.

ADULLAM.—A city in the Shephelah, assigned to Judah; named between Jarmuth and Socoh (Jos 15:16, etc). It is probably the modern 'Id el-Dajl, 14 miles N.W. of Beit Jibrin. Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11:17), and the children of Judah returned to it after the captivity (Neh 11:19). The Cave of Adullam, the refuge of David (1 S 22:1, etc.), must have been in the region of those in the adjoining valley. Adullamites (Gn 36:5, etc.)—an inhabitant of Adullam.

W. EWING.

ADULTERY.—See CRIMES, MARRIAGE.

ADUMMIN.—The Ascent of (Jos 15:18, etc), is the ascent of that part of the road ascends from Jericho to Jerusalem. Its modern name, Qal'at ed-Doum, is the ascent of blood or 'red,' is most probably due to the red marl which is so distinctive a feature of the pass.
In this pass, notorious for robberies and murders, is the traditional 'Im' of Lk 19:4.

ADVENT.—See Parousia.

ADVERTISE.—Ru 4:1 'I thought to advertise thee,' i.e. inform thee; so Nu 24:4.

ADVOCATE (Gr. paraikeses).—The word occurs only in the writings of St. John: four times in his Gospel (14:16, 15:27, 16:7, 17:21) of the Holy Spirit, and once in his 1st Epistle (1:2) of Jesus. It is an unfortunate taboo which has led to the English Versions rendering it in the former as 'Comforter' (RV' or Advocate, or Helper, Gr. Parakeles) and in the latter as 'Advocate' (RV' or Comforter, or Helper, Gr. Parakeles).

'Comforter,' though a true and beautiful designation of the Holy Spirit, is an impossible rendering. It is true that paraikeses means either 'comfort' (Mt 8:15, 2 Co 1:3) or 'call to one's side' (Ac 2:28), but paraikeses must not be translated into English with an English word.

It is a passive form, and denotes 'one who comforts (paraikeses) but one who is called in to aid (paraikateis).'

It was a forensic term, signifying the counsel for the defence and correspondingly the Advocate to our 'advocate' (Lat. advocatus). Singularly enough, the Greek-speaking Fathers mostly took the word in the impossible sense of 'Comforter,' influenced perhaps by the false analogy of 'Comelator.' A Jewish name for the Messiah.

Cf. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. xvi. 20: 'He is called Parakaletos because He comforts (paraikeses) and consoles and helps our infirmity.' Wore it understood in its literal sense,' 'Spirit-Help,' 'Comforter,' 'Comelator,' would be a fair rendering; but as a matter of fact it originated in an error; nor does it suggest the true idea to the English reader. It should be observed that 'Comforter' in Jn 14:16 lends it no support. It gives 'desolate'; literally, as in the margin of both Versions, 'orphans.'

The substitution of 'Advocate' for 'Comforter' reveals a wealth of meaning in our Lord's address to the Eleven on that night in which He was betrayed. During His earthly ministry He had been God's Advocate with men, pleading God's cause with them and seeking to win them for Him. He was going away, but God would send another Advocate, without whom He would not go away, and who would make their testimony effective, 'convincing the world regarding sin, righteousness, and judgment.'

Jesus told the Eleven that it was 'expedient for them that one should go away,' since His departure was the condition of the advent of the Advocate (16:7); and Jn 21 furnishes a profound commentary on this declaration. Jesus in the days of His flesh was God's Advocate on the earth, pleading with men for God. The Holy Spirit has taken His place, and performs this office. But Jesus is still an Advocate. He is the Advocate of sinners up in heaven, pleading their cause with God, and, in the language of St. Paul (Ro 8:34), making intercession for them.

And thus it was expedient for us that He should go away, that we might enjoy a double-advocacy—the Holy Spirit's hero, pleading with us for God; and that of Jesus in the court of heaven, pleading with God for us. There are three dispensations in the history of redemption, each richer and fuller than the last: (1) The OT dispensation under which men knew only of God in high heaven; (2) that of the Incarnation, under which the Father came near to men in Jesus Christ and by His gracious advocacy appealed to their hearts; (3) that of the Holy Spirit, under which the Holy Spirit is the Father's Advocate here, and Jesus 'our Advocate above, our Friend before the throne of love.'

DAVID SMITH.

AEDIAS (1 Es 9:7).—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. The name is probably a corruption for Zejah of Ezr 10:16.

AGNÉES.—The name of a paralytic at Lydda who was cured by Peter (Ac 9:32-34).

AGNON.—Jn 3:6, meaning 'springs': a site near Salim [wh. see].

ÆSORA (Jsh 4:1).—An unknown Samaritan town, possibly mod. Assirah, N.E. of Shechem.

AGABUS.—A Christian prophet of Jerusalem (Ac 11:28), whose prediction of a famine over the civilized world occasioned the sending of alms from Antioch to Jerusalem. The famine happened, not simultaneously in all countries, in Claudius' reign (Suetonius, Tacitus). Agabus also foretold St. Paul's imprisonment, by binding his feet and hands with the Apostle's girdle (cf. Jl 13:14—). A. J. MACLEAN.

AGADE (formerly but erroneously read Agan).—A city of Northern Babylonia and the capital of Sargon, the founder of the first Semitic empire (c. a.c. 3800).

It was first discovered by George Smith, Agade was the Semitic Akkad (see Akkad). It stood near Sippara or Sepharvaim (wh. see), and may have been in later times a suburb of the latter town. A. H. SAYCE.

AGAG.—1 Nu 24:25, probably a cryptic's error: LXX haas Gog. 2 Sam. 2:8, the king of Amalek, whom Saul defeated and spared; some Gr. MSS name his father Asor (15:4). Whether he met his fate bravely or timidly cannot be determined from the extant text (v. 8). Samuel considered him to be under the ban of extermination, and therefore killed him as a religious act (v. 32).

J. TAYLOR.

AGABE.—The designation of Haman (Est 3:10 8:3 9:9). Josephus (Ant. xi. vi. 5) calls him an Amalekit. The epithet in Esther indicates that, as Agag was Saul's adversary, so Haman was the foe of this other Benjamite. The LXX reads Bugias, 3:8, omits at 3:8, and at 3:16 has Macedonian, a word of evil connotation after Antiochus Epiphanes. J. TAYLOR.

AGAIN.—The Eng. word 'again' means in AV either 'a second time,' as Pb 4:8, 'ye sent once and again'; or 'back,' as in Mt 11:1 'go and show John again those things which ye do bear' (i.e. 'go back and show John').

AGAPE.—See Love Feast.

AGAR.—The sons of Agar are mentioned in Bar 3:9, they are called Hagarenes in Ps 83:16, Hagrites in 1 Ch 5:19, 3:27. Their country lay east of Gilead.

AGATE.—See Jewels and Precious Stones.

AGE, AGED, OLD AGE.—In the OT advancing age is represented by words of different root-meaning. The aged man is azagen, perhaps 'grey-bearded' (Gn 49: 2 S 19:19, 12:32, Ps 71:8, Jer 6:15); 'old age' is also sêdîkî, i.e. 'hoary-headedness' (Gn 15:16, 1 K 14:24; cf. Gn 46:34, Ps 21:15). According to the Mishna (Ab. vi. 21) the latter word implies a greater age (70) than the former (60). But in Job 15:15 (cf. 39:9) yâsedîkî, i.e. 'very aged,' marks a further advance in years, of which the sign is a 'shattering' of strength. Ps 68:6 is the only passage in which a definite period is fixed for human life. The idea that 'half old age' (helech) is a blessing is expressed in Job 28:10; the contrast is furnished by the gloomy picture (30:9) of the 'fathers' whose old age lacks the court of heaven. The wisdom of the old was proverbial (Job 12:17 32:27), though there were exceptions (Job 32:1, Ps 110:10).

The experience of the older men fitted them for positions of trust and authority; hence by a natural transition of thought 'elders' became an official title Ex 24:3, Ac 11:30. Respect is to be shown to the old (Lv 19:32, Pr 23:29), and the decay of reverence for age is an evil
omen (Dt 28:6, 1 K 12:9, Is 47:1). It was to the grandmother of Obed that the Hebrew women said 'he shall be . . . a nourisher of thine old age' (Ru 4:17); the delightful provision of children illumined the glad-gracious message of Israel's God: 'even to old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you' (Is 46:4).
J. G. TASKER.

AGEE.—The father of Shammah, one of the 'Three (2 S 23:10).

AGABA (1 Es 58:7).—In Ezer 2:16 Hagaba, Neh 7:18
Hagaba.

AGGAEUS.—The form used in 1 Es 6:5, 7 and 2 Es 140 for Haggai (wh. see).

AGIA (1 Es 5:6).—In Ezer 2:16, Neh 7:19 Hattil.

AGONY (Lk 23:46) is not a translation but a transformation of the Greek agonía, equivalent to St.
Matthew's 'sorrowful and sore troubled' (20:38) and St. Mark's 'greatly amazed and sore troubled' (14:43).
The word does not mean 'agony' in the English sense.
Agón was 'a contest,' and agonía the trepidation of a combatant about to enter the lists. Christ's Agony in Gethsemane was the horror which overwhelmed Him as He faced the final ordeal. DAVID SMITH.

AGRAPHA.—See UNWRITTEN SAYINGS.

AGRICULTURE.—Throughout the whole period of their national existence, agriculture was the primary occupation of the Hebrews. According to the priestly theory, the land was the property of Jć; His people enjoyed the usufruct (Lv 25:3). In actual practice, the bulk of the land was owned by the towns and village communities, each of them having its share of the common lands. The remainder included the Crowns lands and the estates of the nobility, at least under the monarchy. Husbandry—the Biblical term for agriculture (2 Ch 26:9)—was highly esteemed, and was regarded as dating from the very earliest times (Gn 4:2). It was Jć Himself who taught the husbandman his art (Is 28:20).

1. Of the wide range of topics embraced by agriculture in the wider significance of the term, some of the more important will be treated in separate articles, such as CART, FLAX, FOOD, GARDEN, OLIVE, OX, THORNS, VINE, etc. The present article will deal only with the more restricted field of the cultivation of the principal cereals.
Those were, in the first rank, wheat and barley; less important were the crops of millet and spelt, and those of the family—lentils, beans, and the like.

1. The agricultural year began in the latter half of October, with the advent of the early rains, which soften the ground baked by the summer heat. Then the husbandman began to prepare the sows for the winter seed by means of the plough. From the details given in post-Biblical literature, it is evident that the Hebrew plough differed but little from its modern Syrian counterpart (see PEFS1, 1891). The essential part or 'body' of the latter, corresponding in position to the modern plough-tail or 'stilt,' consists of a piece of tough wood bent and pointed at the foot to receive an iron sheath or share (1 S 18:2), the upper end being furnished with a short cross-piece to serve as a handle. The pole is usually in two parts: one stout and curved, through the lower end of which the 'body' is passed just above the share; at the other end is attached the lighter part of the pole, the 'fingers.' The upper end of which a stout pin is passed to serve as attachment for the yoke.
The plough was usually drawn by two or more oxen (Am 6:10), by ass (Is 5:26), but the employment of one of each is forbidden (Dt 22:7). The yoke is of wood—the bar of Lv 26:13 (RV)—fitted with two pairs of converging pegs, the lower ends connected by thongs, both to receive the necks of the draught animals. Two smaller pegs are fixed in the middle of the yoke, a ring of willow, rope, or other material, which is passed over the end of the pole and kept in position by the pin above mentioned. As the ploughman required but one hand to guide the plough, the other was free to wield the ox-goad, a light wooden pole shod at one end with a simple iron spike whereby he could check the oxen (cf. Ac 9:3), and having at the other a small spade with which to plant the plough-share. Gardens, vineyards (Is 5:2), and parcels too difficult to plough were worked with the hoe (Mt 13:22). The prevailing mode of sowing was by hand, as in the parable of the Sower, the seed being immediately ploughed in. It was possible, however, to combine both operations by fixing a seed-box to the yoke, which seed was passed through an aperture at the bottom of the box and was conducted by a pipe along the tail.
It thus fell into the drill behind the share and was immediately covered in. The handfuls of seeds were gathered in by Jewish legend with the invention of this form of seedling-plough (Bk. of Jubilees 11:28). This mode of sowing is probably referred to in Is 26:5 ('the wheat in rows' RV). There is no evidence that harrows were used for covering in the seed.

2. During the period of growth the crops were exposed by a variety of risks, such as the delay or scanty fall of the spring rains (the 'latter rain' of the OT, Am 4:14), by anxious for the hot sirocco, mildew, hail—these three are named together in Hag 2:17; cf. Dt 28:15, Am 4: and worst of all a visitation of locusts. The productiveness of the soil naturally varied greatly (cf.
9:13, 15, 17). In the semi-tropical Jordan valley, and latest in the uplands of Galilee. The average harvest period, reckoned by the Hebrew legislation (Lv 23:16, Dt 16:18) to cover seven weeks, may be set down as from the middle of April to the first of July. The barley ripening about a fortnight sooner than the wheat.
The standing corn was reaped with the sickle (Dt 16:19) and the stalks being cut considerably higher up than with us. The handfuls of ears were gathered into sheaves, and these into heaps (not into shocks) for transportation to the threshing-floor. The corners of the field were left to be reaped, and the fallen ears to be gleaned, by the poor and the stranger (Lv 19:9, Dt 24:19, Ru 2:3).

For small quantities the ears were stripped by beating with a stick (Ru 2:17, Is 6:1), otherwise the threshing was done by means of the village threshing-floor. This was a large, specially prepared, vessel for holding a heap of threshed grain, and was elevated at one side, with the floor sloping from the upper to the lower end, with an aperture at the lower end for the fall of the sheaves. Such a vessel was called a granary (Is 8:12), and was a common form of building in the East, the former being the favourite in Syria, the latter in Egypt. The former consists of two or three thick wooden planks held together by a couple of cross-pieces, the whole measuring from 5 to 7 ft. in length by 3 to 4 ft. in breadth. The under side of the granary is set with sharp pieces of hardstone (cf. Is 41:16), which strip the ears as the drag, on which the driver sits or stands, is drawn across the heaps, and at the same time cut up the stalks into small lengths.

After the threshing came the winnowing. By means of a five- or six-pronged fork, the 'fan' of the OT and AGrippa

NT, the mass of grain, chaff, and chopped straw is tossed into the air in the western evening breeze. The chaff is carried farthest away (Ps 11), the light morsels of straw to a shorter distance, while the heavy grains of wheat or barley fall at the winnower's feet. After being thoroughly sifted with a variety of sieves (Am 9), in 30B.C., the grain was stored for immediate use, and in cisterns (Jer 41), or in especially constructed granaries, the 'barns' of Mt 6.

4. Of several important matters, such as irrigation, the terracing of slopes, manuring of the fields, the conditions of lease, etc.—regarding which Vogelstein's treatise Die Landwirtschaft in Palastina is a mine of information for the Roman period—there is little direct evidence in Scripture. Agriculture, as is natural, being largely in the legislative codes of the Pentateuch. Some of the provisions have already been cited. To these may be added the solemn injunction against removing a neighbour's 'landmarks,' the upright stones marking the boundaries of his fields (Dt 22:9, 27), the humanitarian provision regarding strayed cattle (Ex 23, Dt 22:9), the law that every field must lie fallow for one year in seven (Ex 23:11; see, for later development, SABBATICAL YEAR), the law forbidding the breeding of hybrids and the sowing of a field with two kinds of seed (Lv 19:9, RV), and the far-reaching provision as to the inalienability of the land (Lv 25:2).

The fact that no department of human activity has enriched the language of Scripture, and in consequence the language of the spiritual life in all ages, with so many appropriate figures of speech, is a striking testimony of the grace occupied by agriculture in the life and thought of the Hebrew people. A. R. S. KENNEDEY.

AGRIPPA.—See Herod, N. B. 6. 7.

AGUE.—See Medicine.

AGUR.—Son of Jabez; author of the whole or part of Pr 30, one of the latest sections of the book. His name may signify 'hiring,' or 'assembler'; cf. Vulg. 'Vera Itas congregante diligente.' Some have thought that massa (AV 'the prophecy,' RV 'the oracle'), which otherwise is out of place, is the name of his country (Gn 25:4). J. TAYLOR.

Ahab.—1. Son of Omri, and the most noted member of his dynasty, king of Israel from about 873 to about 853 B.C. The account of him in our Book of Kings is drawn from two separate sources, one of which views him more favourably than the other. From the secular point of view he was an able and energetic prince; from the religious point of view he was a dangerous innovator, and a patron of foreign gods. His alliance with the Phoenicians was cemented by his marriage with Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre (1 K 16:31), who was also, if we may trust Josephus, priest of Astarte. At a later date Ahab entered into alliance with Judah, giving his daughter Athaliah in marriage to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat (2 K 3:2). His wealth is indicated by the ivory palace which he built (1 K 21:1, 22). The reign of Ahab was marked by frequent wars with the Syrian kingdom of Damascus. Benhadad, the king of that country, was so successful that he claimed suzerainty over Israel—a claim which Ahab was at first disposed to admit (1 K 20:25). But when Benhadad went so far as to threaten Samaria with indiscriminate plunder, Ahab resisted. In two campaigns he defeated the Syrians, and when taking his borders again into his possession. Contrary to the advice of the prophetic party, he treated his captive magnanimously, and concluded an alliance with him, stipulating only that the cities formerly taken from Israel should be restored. The alliance was one for trade and commerce, each party having bazaars assigned him in the capital of the other (1 K 20:27). It is not improbable also that common measures of defence were planned against the Assyrians, who were showing large intentions in the region of the Lebanon. In the battle of Karkar, which was fought against these invaders in the year 854, Ahab was present with ten thousand troops. This we learn from the Assyrian inscriptions.

The religious innovation for which Ahab is held responsible by the Hebrew writers, was the introduction of the Phoenician Baal as one of the gods of Israel. It is clear that Ahab had no idea of displacing Jahweh altogether, for he gave his children names which indicated his devotion to Him. But to please his wife he allowed her to introduce and foster the worship of her own divinities. Her thought was that with the religion of her own country she would introduce its more advanced civilization. The champion of Jahweh's exclusive right to the worship of Israel was Elijah. This prophet, by his bold challenge to the priests of Baal, roused the anger of Jezebel, and was obliged to flee the country (1 K 17:19). Other prophets do not seem to have been disturbed, for we find them at the court of Ahab in the last year of his life (22). These, however, were subservient to the crown, while Elijah was not only a prophet against religious changes, but the champion of the common people, whose rights were so signaly violated in the case of Naboth.

Ahab died fighting for his people. The Syrian war had again broken out—apparently because Benhadad had not kept his agreement. Ahab therefore tried to recover Ramoth-gilead, being assisted by Jehoashaphat of Judah. In the first encounter Ahab was slain, his reputation for courage being vindicated by the direction of his adversary to his soldiers—'Fight neither with small nor with great, but only with the king of Israel' (1 K 22:39).

2. A false prophet 'roasted in the fire' by the king of Babylon (Jer 29:2).

AGUR.—See Abraham.

AHARHEL.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4).

AHABAB.—Father of Eliphelet (2 S 23:4), and a member of the family of Maacah, settled at Beth-macah (20:4), or a native of the Syrian kingdom of Maacah (7:8). 8)

AHUZERUS (old Pers. Khshayashr).—The Persian king (b.c. 485-465) known to Greek history as Xerxes. Complaints against the Jews were addressed to him (Est 4:14). It is he who figures in the Book of Esther; Da 9 erroneously makes him father of Darius the Mede, confusing the latter with Darius Hystaspis, the father of Xerxes. The Ahuzerus of To 14th is Cyaxares. J. TAYLOR.

AHAVA was a settlement in Babylonia lying along a stream of the same name, probably a large canal near the Euphrates. Notwithstanding the fact that the exact locality can be verified. It was here that Ezra mustered his people before their departure for Jerusalem (Est 8:1, 2, 4). Some district north or west of Babylon, near the northern boundary of Babylonia, is most probable. J. F. McCURDY.

AHAZ, son and successor of Jotham, king of Judah, came to the throne about b.c. 734. The only notable event of his reign, so far as we know, was the invasion made by his northern neighbours, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus. These two kings had made an alliance against the Assyrians, and were trying to compel Ahaz to join the coalition. His refusal so exasperated them that they planned his deposition and the appointment of a creature of their own to be his successor. Ahaz did not venture to take the field, but shut himself up in Jerusalem and strengthened its fortifications. It was perhaps at this time of need that he sacrificed his son to the fire, burnt-offering to Jahweh. Isaiah tried to encourage the faint-hearted king, pointing out that his enemies had no prospect of success or even of long existence. But Ahaz had more faith in political measures than in the apocalyptic word. He sent a message to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, submitting himself unrestrainedly to him. The embassy carried substantial evidence of AHIZAh.—Two kings of this name are mentioned in the OT, one in each of the Israelite kingdoms.

1. Ahaziah of Israel was the son of Ahaz, and ruled after him only two years or parts of years. He is said to have been a worshipper of Baal, that is, to have continued the religious policy of his father. By a fall from a window of his palace he was seriously injured, and, after lingering awhile, died from the accident. The Moabites, who had been subject to Israel, took this opportunity to revolt. Ahaziah is accused of sending messengers to inquire of the celebrated oracle at Ecron, and is said unexpectedly to have received his answer from Elijah (2 K 1:1).

2. Ahaziah of Judah was son of Jehoram and grandson of King Jeroboam under whom the influence of his mother, who was a daughter of Ahah and Jecahel, is not surprising to read that he walked in the ways of Ahah. All that we know of him is that he continued the league with Israel, and that, going to visit his uncle Jehoram in Jezreel, he was involved in his fate at the revolt of Jehu (2 K 9:37).—H. P. SMITH.

AHBAN.—A Judahite, son of Abishur (1 Ch 2:9).

AHER (another).—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7:2).

AHI ("brother").—1. A Gadite (1 Ch 5:9). 2. An Asherite (1 Ch 7:7). But the reading is in neither case free from doubt.

AHIAH.—See Ahiah.

AHIAH.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:24).

AHIAN ("fraternal").—A Manassite, described as 'son of Shemida' (1 Ch 7:19); but the name is scarcely that of an individual; note in the context Ahiezer and Shechem, and cf. Nu 26:29.

AHIEZER ("brother is help.").—1. Son of Ammishaddai, of the tribe of Dan, one of the three princes who represented Dan at the census and on certain other occasions (Nu 1:26, 26; Nu 26:29; Nu 31:10). 2. The chief of the Benjamite archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:26).—H. P. SMITH.

AHIJAH.—1. S 141; 18 (AV Ahiah), a priest, son of Ahitub, who had charge of the oracle and consulted it for Saul (read 'ephod' for 'ark' at v. 19). Ahijah is probably to be identified with Ahimelech (231). 2. 1 K 4:10, one of Solomon's secretaries, who conducted the king's correspondence and wrote out his decrees. His father Shusha seems to have held the same office under David. 3. 1 K 11:17, 12:14, 2 Ch 10:18, a prophet of Shiloh, who foretold the division of the kingdom and the elevation of Jeroboam. Subsequently he predicted the death of Jeroboam's son (1 K 14:23). 4. 1 K 15:7, 28, father of Baasha. 6. 1 Ch 29:7 has an Ahijah, son of Jerahmeel, but it is hopelessly corrupt. The LXX gets rid of the name. 6. 1 Ch 29:7 (AV Ahiah), son of Ehab, a Benjamite: at v. 4, 29, but LXX Ahijah, 7. 1 Ch 11:1, one of David's heroes, from Poleon, an unknown locality; perhaps Giloh should be read, seeing that Poleon has already been mentioned (v. 21). 8. 1 Ch 26:9, a Levite, overseer of the Temple treasures. But we ought probably to substitute the words, 'their brethren.' 9. Neh 10:25 (RSV Ahiah), a layman who joined Nehemiah in signing the covenant. J. TAYLOR.

AHIKAM.—One of the deputation sent by king Josiah to Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22:11; 2 Ch 34:29). Later he used his influence to protect Jeremiah from the AHITUB.—1. Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, the father of Ahimelech or Ahijah, the priest who was put to death by Saul (1 Sm 14: 22); 2. Acc. to 2 Sm 21: 30 ( = 1 Ch 15: 18) the father, acc. to 1 Ch 9: 11, Neh 11: 16 the grandfather, of Zadok the contemporary with David and Solomon. It is very doubtful, however, whether the name Ahitub here is not due to a copyist’s error. The text of 2 Sm 21: 30 should probably read: ‘and Zadok and Abiaabir, the son of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub.’ 3. Even more doubt attaches to another Ahitub, father of another Zadok (1 Ch 6: 1, 26; cf. 1 Es 8: 5, 2 Es 11: 4). 4. An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8: 36.

AHLAB.—A city of Asher (Jg 19: 2). The site has been identified with the later Hush Halab or Giscala, now el-Jish in Upper Galilee; but this is, of course, uncertain.

AHIAL.—1. The daughter (?) of Sheshan (1 Ch 2: 9), cf. v. 4. 2. The father of Zabad, one of David’s mighty men (1 Ch 11: 2).

AROH.—Son of Bel, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8: 9). See ARHAN (9). The patronymic Abshiba occurs in 2 Sm 23: 27.

AROLAH, AROHIAH, AROHIBA, AROHIBAH, AROHIBAHAN.—The names in AV of the RV of the original, 1 Es 2: 14, 22, 1 Es 3: 10, 11, 13, 22, 1 Es 4: 23, 22, are probably corrupt.

AHUZZAM.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4: 2).

AHUZZATH.—The ‘friend’ of Abimelech, the Philistine of Gerar, mentioned on the occasion when the latter made a league with Isaac at Beersheba (Gen 20: 1). The position of ‘king’s friend’ may possibly have been an official one, and the title a technical one (cf. 1 K 4: 1, 1 Ch 27: 21). The rendering of the LXX gives a different conception, that of ‘promusis,’ or friend of the bridegroom.

AHZAI.—A priest (Neh 11: 14).—Jabzera (1 Ch 9: 2).

AL.—1. A place between which and Bethel Abraham was stationed before (Gen 12: 6) and after (15: 2) his sojourn in Egypt. The repulse of the Israelite attempt on the city (Jos 7: 4) led to the exposure of the city of Achian: when that was expired, the city was captured and destroyed (8: 26) by a ruse. It never reappears in history, though it continued to be inhabited: it is the Aiath in Isaiah’s description of the march of the Assyrian (10: 6), and the Alia of Neh 11: 2. In 1 Ch 26: 11 ‘Azanah, enumerated among the cities of Ephraim, is in many MSS ‘Aynah, which is another form of the name. This, however, cannot in any case be the same place, which was within the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18: 26), where Azim is ‘a corruption for the name of this city.’ After the Exile, Al and Bethel between them supplied a contingent of 223 to the number that returned (Ezr 2: 24), and the city was once more settled by Benjaminites (Neh 11: 16). That the city was insignificant is definitely stated in Jos 7: 7, and indicated by the fact that in the list of captured cities it is almost the only one of which the situation is specified (Jos 12: 2). Its capture, however, made a deep impression on the Canaanites (Jos 9: 10). As to its identification, the only indication to guide us is its proximity to Bethel (agreed by all to be Beitzin), on the east of that place (as follows from Gen 12: 6). Various sites have been proposed—Turmus ‘Ayya (which contains an element resembling the name, but the situation is impossible); Khurbet Hayan (which also has a similar name, but the antiquities of the place are not known to be old enough); Deir Druze (which is in the right place, but also possibly not an old enough site); and et-Tell (a mound whose name has the same meaning as the word ‘tell’). Possibly this last is the most likely site.

AL.—A distinct place, possibly against the Ammonites, Jer 49: 22 (pers. a clerical error for ‘Ar’). R. A. S. Macalister.

ALALON.—1. A city allotted to, but not occupied by, Dan (Jos 19: 4, 14). We find it in the hands of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11: 10); later the Philistines took it (2 Ch 29: 8). It may be the modern Yafik, 3 miles N.E. of Lebdon, 14 miles west of Jerusalem. 2. An unknown town in Zebulun (Jg 12: 16).

AIJELET HASH-SHAHAR, Ps 22 (title).—See Psalms.

AIN.—1. A town in the neighbourhood of Riblah (Nu 34: 3), probably the modern el-‘Ain near the source of the Orontes. 2. A town in Judah (Jos 15: 20), where Aim and Rimmon should be taken together. It is probably Umm er-Ramadtn, to the N. of Beersheba. W. Ewing.

AIN.—The sixteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and so used to introduce the sixteenth word in Gen 2: 4.

AKAN.—A descendant of Esaai (Gen 36: 27); called in 1 Ch 1: 24, Jakam.

AKATAN (1 Es 8: 3).—Father of Joannes, who returned with Ezra; called Hakatana in Ezr 8: 3.

AKEDAMA (AV Acedama).—The name of the ‘poison’s field’ (Ac 1: 7), purchased for the burial of strangers with the blood of the first born, returned in 1 Es 5: 27. The traditional site is at the E. side of the Wady er-Rababi (the so-called ‘Valley of Hinnom’) on the S. side of the valley. It is still known as Ha’ak et-Dumm (field of blood), which represents the old name in sound and meaning. The identification has not been traced earlier than the Crusaders, who erected here a charnel-house, the ruins of which still remain—a vault about 20 feet long and 20 feet wide (internal dimensions) erected over and covering the entrance to some of the ancient rock-cut tombs which abound in the valley. The skulls and bones which once thickly strewn the floor of this charnel-house have all been removed to a modern Greek monastery adjacent. There is no evidence recoverable connecting this site with the work of potters.

AKKAD (Accad).—Akkadians.—Akkad (a) is the Semitic equivalent of the Sumerian of Pa-LA Parish, the capital of the founder of the first Semitic empire. It was probably in consequence of this that it gave its name to Northern Babylonia, the Semitic language of which came to be known as Akkadian or ‘Akkadian.’ In the early days of cuneiform decipherment ‘Akkad’ was the name usually applied to the non-Semitic language of Semitic Babylonia, but some cuneiform texts published by Bezold in 1899 (ZA p. 434) showed that it was called by the Babylonians ‘the language of Sumer’ or Southern Babylonia, while a text recently published by Messerschmidt (Orient. Litg. 1905, p. 268) states that Akkad was the name of the Semitic ‘translation.’ When Babylonia became a united monarchy, its rulers took the title of ‘kings of Sumer and Akkad’ in Semitic, ‘Kendi and Uri’ in Sumerian, where Uri seems to have signified ‘the upper region.’ In Gn 10: 11, 12. The name of the city, not the country to which it gave its name.

A. H. Sayce.

AKKOS (AV Accos), 1 Es 5: 4.—See Hekkoz.

AKKUB.—1. A son of Eloi (1 Ch 3: 2). 2. A Levite, one of the porters at the E. gate of the Temple; the eponym of a family that returned from the Exile (1 Ch 9: 7, Ezr 2: 40, Neh 7: 11, 12), called in 1 Es 5: 24, Dacub. 3. The name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2: 40); called in 1 Es 5: 24, Acta. 4. A Levite who helped to expound the Law (Neh 8: 7); called in 1 Es 4: 6, Jacubus.

AKRABATINE (1 Mac 5: 8).—The region in Idumea of the people of Akrib. This is probably the place mentioned in a prophecy against the Ammonites, Jer 49: 22 (pers. a clerical error for ‘Ar’). R. A. S. Macalister.

AKREBATUM (less correctly Arribbom) Jos 15: 5 AV, ‘Scorpion Pass’).—The name given to an asent to the south side of the Dead Sea, a very barren region.

ALABASTER.—See Jewels and Precious Stones.

ALAMOTH, Ps 46 (title), 1 Ch 15: 16.—See Psalms.
ALEC, one of the generals of Demetrius, and received still further honours (1 Mac 10). But Alexander Balas cared more for sensual pleasures than for kingly duties: his father-in-law Ptolemy turned against him, and Alexander, fleeing to Arabia, was assassinated there (1 Mac 11v).

ALEXANDRIA

In its times of greatest prosperity, Alexandria had a population of between 800,000 and 1,000,000. Trade, amusement, and learning attracted to it inhabitants from every quarter. It was an amalgamation of Hebraism and Hellenism, a city wherein Jewish colonists had settled in Egypt in large numbers after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 52:28), and during the Persian period their number greatly increased. The Jews formed no insidious portion. Jewish colonies were under their own governor or 'Alabarch,' and observed their own domestic and religious customs. Their great central synagogue was an immense and most imposing structure, wherein all the trade guilds sat together, and the 70 elders were accommodated in 70 splendidly bejewelled chairs of state.

It was in Alexandria that one of the most important events in the history of religion took place, when the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into the Greek tongue. The legendary tales narrated by Josephus regarding the accomplishment of this task may be dismissed as baseless. But it is undisputed that during the reigns of the earlier Lagidæ (somewhere between a.c. 250 and 182) the 'Septuagint' was made its appearance. It is certainly not the product of a syndicate of translators working harmoniously, as Jewish tradition asserted. The work involved a most arduous effort, the Pentateuch being the best done, while some of the later books are wretchedly translated. The translation was regard by the Jews with mingled feelings—execrated by some because it was hostile to the commonwealth, and extolled by another section as the means by which the beauties of the Law and the Prophets could be appreciated for the first time by the Greek-speaking Gentiles. It paved the way for the translation of the LXX into Christian languages, a most valuable preparation for the truths of Christianity. It familiarized the heathen nations with the God of righteousness as He had been revealed to the Jews. The LXX became, under God's guidance, a most valuable preparation for the truths of Christianity. It familiarized the heathen nations with the God of righteousness as He had been revealed to the Jews. The LXX became, under God's guidance, a most valuable preparation for the truths of Christianity.

The Christian Church to-day is the only orthodox text of the OT.

The sons of the Ptolemies with the Seleucidae at Antioch, as described in Dan 11, the Ptolemies II. Philadelphus left his mark on Palestine in the cities of Philadelphia (= Rabbath-ammon, Dt 23:17), Ptolemais (Ac 21:11 = Acco, Jg 19:14), Philippiæ, etc. Under Ptolemy III. Euergetes I. (a.c. 247-222) the famous 'stole of Canopus' was inscribed. With Ptolemy IV. Philopator the dynasty began to decline, and his oppressions of the Jews (largely mythological) are narrated in 3 Maccabees. Under Ptolemy V. Epiphanes the Alexandrian supremacy over the Jews was exchanged for that of Antiochus III in the Great (Dan 11:4-21). In his reign the celebrated 'Rosetta stone' was erected. The ten succeeding Ptolemies were distinguished for almost nothing but their effeminacy, folly, luxury, and cruelty. The city increased in wealth, but sank more and more in political power. Julius Caesar stormed Alexandria in a.c. 47, and after a brief spell of false splendour under Cleopatra, it fell after the battle of Actium into the hands of the Romans, and its fortunes were henceforth merged with those of the Empire.

But while its political power was thus passing away, it was developing an intellectual greatness destined to exercise a profound influence through succeeding centuries. Among its Jewish population there had arisen a new school which sought to amalgamate Hebrew tradition and Greek philosophy, and to make the OT yield up Platonic and Stoic doctrines. This attempted fusion of Hebraism and Hellenism was begun by Aristobulus, and reached its climax in Philo, a contemporary of Jesus Christ. The Jews found in the Gentile writings many beautiful and excellent thoughts. They could logically defend their own proud claim to be the sole repositories of the ancient philosophic and religious truths, asserting that every rich and luminous Greek expression was borrowed from their Scriptures. Plato and Pythagoras, they declared, were deeply in debt to Moses. The Greeks were merely repackaged in clean, uncrushed, and Hebrew religious and moral conceptions. The next step was to re-write their own Scriptures in terms of Greek philosophy, and the most simple way of doing this was by an 'Alexandrian' translation of the OT, which was very largely responsible for the theory that St. Paul was not unfamiliar with Alexandrian hermeneutics and terminology (cf. Gal 4:24). But there is no proof that St. Paul ever visited Alexandria. He seems to have left the city not from going thither, because the gospel had already reached the city (cf. Ro 15:28). Eusebius credits St. Mark with the introduction of Christianity into Egypt. In the 2nd and 3rd cent. Alexandria was the intellectual capital of Christendom. The Alexandrian school of theology was made luminous by the names of Pantaenus, Clement, and especially Origen, who, while continuing the allegorical tradition, strove to show that Christian doctrine is not self-contradictory and realized the dreams and yearnings of Greek philosophy. The evil tendencies of the method found expression in the teachings of the Alexandrian heretics, Basilidæ and Valentinæ, who spoke of the final consummation of the universe.

The city of Alexandria fell before Amul in the 7th cent. It began to decline. The creation of Cairo was another blow, and the discovery in 1497 of the new route to the East via the Cape of Good Hope almost destroyed its trade. At the beginning of the 19th cent. Alexandria was a mere village. To-day it is again a large and flourishing city, with a rapidly increasing population of over 200,000, and its port is one of the busiest on the Mediterranean shore.

ALGUM.—See ALMUG.

ALLAH.—A ‘duke’ of Edom (1 Ch 19:6); called in Gn 36:43 Alaph.

ALIAN.—A descendant of Essau (1 Ch 19:6); called in Gn 36:4 Alvan.

ALIM.—See NATIONS, STRANGER.

ALLAMELCH.—A town of Asher, probably near Acco (Jos 19:20).

Site unidentified.

ALLAR (1 Es 5:4).—One of the leaders of those Jews who could not show their pedigree as Israelites at the return from captivity under Zerubbabel. The name seems to correspond to Immer in Ezr 2:59, Neh 7:1, of the places from which these Jews returned. In 1 Es 3:55, Adam, and Immer' appear as 'Charaathnan leading them and Allar.'
ALLEGORY.

ALLEGIATION.—See PARABLE.

ALLEGIA.—See ELEUSA, AIA.

ALLEMET, AV Alemeth, 1 Ch 6:64; Almon, Jos 21:14.—A Levitical city of Benjamin. It is the present 'Atmil on the hills N. of Anathoth.

ALLIANCE.—In the patriarchal age alliances between the Chosen People and foreign nations were frequent. Many of the agreements between individuals recorded in Genesis implied, or really were, treaties between the tribes or clans represented (Gn 21:24—31:48). During the period of the Judges confederations between the more or less isolated units of which the nation was composed were often made under the pressure of a common danger (Gn 41:61). When Israel became consolidated under the monarchy, alliances with foreign nations were of a more formal character, e.g. Solomon's treaty with Hiram (1 K 5:9). His marriage with Pharaoh's daughter probably had a political significance (3:9). The policy of alliance between Israel and Phoenicia was continued by Omri and Ahab (18:8); and, if this be a 'covenant of brethren,' there is no doubt, on reciprocal commercial interests (cf. Ac 19:25). Asa and Baasha contended for alliance with Benhadad (1 K 15:21), and Judah and Israel themselves parted company during the reign of Jehoshaphat (cf. 18:32). Such a friendship is denounced in 2 Ch 25. Pekah and Rezin are united against Judah (2 K 16:5, 7). With the appearance of Assyria, relations with foreign nations become important and complicated. The temptation is to stave off the danger from the east by alliance with Damascus or Egypt. Sennacherib assumes that this will be the policy of Hezekiah (2 K 18:21). The prophets from the first set their faces against it (Dt 17:9, Hos 5:18, 20, 30; Jer 22:1, 20). It is the 'hiring of lovers' in place of J's, leading to sin and idolatry (2 K 16), and is politically unsound, resting on a broken reed. The parties being so unequal, the ally could become the tributary (18:5). Under the Rechabites, Ezra and Nehemiah oppose any alliance with 'the peoples of the land.' In later times, for a short period only, did the nation gain sufficient independence to make an alliance; in this case it was with Rome (1 Mac 5:13). C. W. EMMET.

ALLOWS.—1. The head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (1 Es 5:2). He may be the same as Ammi (Ezr 2:43), or Ammi (Neh 7:23). 2. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4:2). ALON BACHTO (oak of weeping).—The place where Deborah, Rekabiah's nurse, was buried; it was near Bethel (Gn 35:2).

ALL TO BREAK.—This phrase (Gn 19:26) means altogether broke. The 'all' is used for altogether, as in 1 K 14:19 'till it be all gone'; and the 'to' is not the sign of the infin., but an adverb like Germ. zer, meaning thoroughly. Thus, 'His breast to-broken with his sadl bowe'—Chaucer, Knight's Tale, 2739. The correct spelling (as in the original ed. of AV) is 'all to brake.' ALLOW.—To 'allow' generally means in AV 'to approve,' as in 1 Es 7:39 'that which I do I allow not.' But in Ac 24:26 it has the mod. sense, admit.

ALLOW.—RRm (Is 1:2) for EV 'tun.' See MINING AND METALS.

ALMIGHTY is the regular rendering of Shaddai, which occurs altogether 45 times in the OT; 6 times qualifying El (God) and 59 times [31 of these in Job] standing by itself. In the Revised English its use is mostly confined to P, according to which source it is the name by which God revealed Himself to the patriarchs (Ex 6:3, cf. Gn 17:1, 35:1). The meaning and derivation are alike obscure. The LXX usually render by Panoskurion ('Almighty'); 6 times by a fanciful derivation they paraphrase by 'He that is sufficient.' But in Gn. El Shaddai is always represented in the LXX by a pronoun, 'my (or thy) God'; in Ezk 10:1 it is merely transliterated. Other suggested renderings are 'the Destroyer-God,' i.e. 'the Storm-God,' 'the Rain-God,' 'the Mountain' (cf. 'Rock' as a title of God in Dt 3:2-5, 18, 20, 21), or 'Lord.' The last two have the most probability on their side, and it is hard to choose between them; but the fact that in Babylonian 'the Great Mountain' (shadu rabbu) is a common title of Bel seems to turn the scale in favour of the former of the two meanings proposed; some slight confirmation is perhaps afforded by 1 K 20:23. In composition the word occurs in two personal names: Zurishaddai (Nu 1:19) and Ammishaddai (Nu 10:17); perhaps also in Shedu (Nu 19). The first ('Shaddai is my Rock') is specially interesting if the meaning given above is correct.

In the NT, with the exception of 2 Co 6:14 (a quotation from 2 S 7:19), the name is confined to the Apocalypse. Some slight confirmation is perhaps afforded by 1 K 20:23. In composition the word occurs in two personal names: Zurishaddai (Nu 1:19) and Ammishaddai (Nu 10:19); perhaps also in Shedu (Nu 19). The first ('Shaddai is my Rock') is specially interesting if the meaning given above is correct.

ALMON.—See ALLEMETH.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIN.—A station in the journeys (Nu 33:15, 41), prob. identical with Beth-diblathaim (Jer 49:22). The meaning of Diblah or Diblathaim is a double cake of flesh; its application to a town may indicate the appearance of the place or neighbourhood.

ALMOND (shak'da).—The fruit in Gn 43:14, Ex 25:30, 37:21-29, Nu 17; the tree in Ec 13:1, Jer 11:16, Lus (Gn 30:9), mistranslated 'hazel,' is certainly the almond; it is the name of the almond in modern Arabic.' The almond (Amygdalus communis) is in Palestine the earliest harbinger of spring, bursting into beautiful white blossom late in January in Jerusalem, before its leaves appear. Hence its name and symbolism: the little white petals being visible only on closer inspection—suggested its comparison to the white hair of age (Ec 12:1). The fruit is a great favourite. It is eaten green before the shell hardens, especially by children, and the ripe kernels are eaten by themselves or with nuts and puddings, and are also made into sweetmeats with sugar, both as 'almond icing' and 'burnt almonds.' A present of almonds would be sure to be appreciated in Egypt (Gn 43:11), as they did not grow in the latter country.

ALMS, ALMSGIVING.—'An alms' (Ac 3:3) is something freely given, in money or in kind, to the needy, from motives of love and pity for the recipient, and of gratitude to the Giver of all. Hence what is given or paid to the poor under the authority and compulsion of law, as the poor man's relief, is not alms. For such or similar motives, our Lord said 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' (Pa 3:15). The whole of the Hebrew legislation, and in particular the legislation of Dt, of which in this respect, 15:1 may be taken as the epilogue: 'Thou shalt surely open thine hand unto thy brother, to thy needy and to thy poorest'
ALMUG

(RV). The writings of the prophets, also, are full of generous advocacy of the rights of the poor. In the later pre-Christian centuries almsgiving became one of the most prominent of religious duties (Ps 112:19, Fr 14th 19th 314, Job 29:9). The sentiment of the 2nd cent. B.C.—by which time it is significant that the Hebrew word for 'righteousness' had acquired the special sense as in the true text of Mt 6:1 (see RV)—is fully reflected in the Books of Sirach (7:5 72 2984) and Tobit (see esp. 47-ii). From this time onwards, indeed, almsgiving was considered to possess an atoning or redemptive efficacy (Sir 32:2 'alms [RV 'almsgiving'] maketh an atonement for sins,' To 4th 12 'alms delivereth from death,' cf. Dn 4:7). After the cessation of sacrifice, almsgiving appears to have ranked among the Jews as the first of religious duties, more meritorious even than prayer and fasting. Arrangements were made by the Jewish authorities for the systematic collection and distribution of the alms of the people. An oftenery for the poor also formed a recognized part of the synagogue service.

Almsgiving occupies a prominent place in the teaching of our Lord, who rebukes the ostentatious charity of His day (Mt 23:5), emphasizes the blessedness of those who give alms (Ac 20:35), its opportunities (Mt 25:40), and its highest motive, 'in my name' (Mk 9:40). In the early Christian community of Jerusalem the need of the poor were effectively supplied, for its members 'had all things common, neither was there among them any that lacked' (Ac 4:32, 4). The need for careful distribution of the Church's alms led to the institution of the diaconate (Ac 6:1-7). The provision of a poor man's fund for the behoof of the mutual Church was much in the thoughts of the Apostles of the Gentiles (1 Cor 16:14, 2 Cor 9:4-5), and until a period within living memory the care of God's poor continued to be the almost exclusive privilege of the Church

ALMUG, or ALGUM (1 K 10:11-12, 2 Ch 2:9 915, 11 this two names are probably variants of the same word, caused by transposition of letters, as is common in Heb. and Arabic).—This tree was imported by Solomon from Ophir (1 K 10:11) and from Lebanon (2 Ch 2:9) for staircases, balustrades, and musical instruments. There is nothing certain known of the nature of this wood, but as Jewish tradition states that it was a red wood, red sandal wood (Pterocarpus santalinus)—now used chiefly for its colouring properties—has been very generally accepted.

ALOES (αλαθίς, Fr 7th, Nu 24th 'a lna aloes'); 'abanth, Ps 45:5, Ca 447: also abbe, Jn 19:9).—This is the modern eagle-wood (a name derived from the Heb. agaru); it has nothing to do with the familiar bitter aloes of medicine, or with the American aloes, now much cultivated in gardens in Palestine, but a recent importation. This eagle-wood is obtained from plants of the Acacia genus, but the fragrant part of the tree is that which are diseased; the odoriferous qualities are due to the infiltration with resin, and the best kinds sink when placed in water. The development of this change in the wood is hastened by burying it in the ground. A trade in this wood has gone on from early times; it comes from India, the Malay Peninsula, etc., and has long been a favourite with the Arabs, who call it el 'ud. The use of the word (translated 'lign aloes,' Nu 24:6) by Balaam creates a difficulty. Either he must have referred to the tree from mere hearsay, or some other plant of the same name may at that time have grown in the Jordan valley, or, as seems most probable, the Heb. word has been wrongly transcribed. Both 'palms' and 'terebinths' have been suggested as suitable alternatives.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.—A title of God in Rev 1:8 19, of Jesus in 229, its presence in 11 AV is not justified by the MSS. Alpha was the first, and Omega, the last letter of the Greek, as Aleph and Taw were the first and the last of the Hebrew alphabet. In the Talmud, 'From Aleph to Taw' meant 'From first to last,' including all between. Cf. Sheb. 51.1 (on Bar 9b), 'Do not read 'My Sanctuary,' but 'My name,' which are the sons of men who have kept the whole Law from Aleph to Taw.'

This explains the title. In each instance St. John defines it. Rev 11 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty' (AV 'the beginning' and the ending' is an interpolation from 21:22), i.e. the Eternal, the Co-eternal, the Contemporaneous. Rev 21 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end'; 22:13 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last (cf. Is 44:4 46:9), the beginning and the end,' i.e. He who controls all things, from whom all come and to whom all return, the fons et clausula, the starting-point and the goal of history (cf. Col 1:17). The ascription of this title to Jesus as well as to God in a writing so early as the Apocalypse strikingly attests the view of our Lord's Person which prevailed in the primitive Church.

Aurelius Prudentius makes fine use of the title in his hymn on The Lord's Nativity ('Corde natus ex parentis'), thus rendered by Neale:

'Of the Father's love begotten
The worlds began to be,
He is Alpha and Omega,
He the source, the ending He,
Of the things that are, that have been,
And all that are to be,
Eternally and moremore.'

ALPHABET.—See Writing.

ALPHAUS.—1. The father of James the Apostle (Mt 10:3—Mk 3:18—Lk 6:13—Ac 1:13), commonly identified with James the Little, son of Mary and brother of Joses or Joseph (Mk 14:16—Mt 27:56). This identification is confirmed by Jn 19:25, if it be allowed that Clopas is the same name as Alphaeus. And this is most likely. Both names probably represent the Aramaic Chalaph, '1 Mac 11:2). St. John's 'Laphas' is almost a thing of literature, while 'Alphaeus' is the name in a Greek dress, the disguise being more apparent if it be written with WH, 'Halpheus.'

2. The father of Levi the tax-gatherer (Mk 2:14), afterwards Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist (Mt 9:19). It is remarkable that in Mk 2:14 Codex Bezae and some cursives read James for Levi, and there is a tradition (Chrysost. in Matt. xxxviii.) that the Apostles Matthew and James had both been tax-gatherers. It is perhaps possible that Alphaeus the father of James was identical with Alphaeus the father of Levi, and that the two tax-gatherer Apostles were brothers. Nothing is recorded of Alphaeus; yet, if these identifications are allowed, great was his glory. He was evidently himself a believer; his son Joses, though undistinguished, was evidently a believer also; his son James was an Apostle; his son Matthew was an Apostle and an Evangelist; and his wife Mary was one of the faithful women who stood by the Cross and visited the Sepulchre (Mk 16:9).

DAVID SMITH.

ALTAR.—1. The original purpose of an altar was to serve as a means by which the blood of an animal offered in sacrifice might be brought into contact with, or otherwise transferred to, the deity of the worshipper. For this purpose in the earliest period a single stone sufficed. Either the blood was poured over this stone, which was regarded as the temporary abode of the deity, or the stone was anointed with part, and the rest spread out at its base. The introduction of the flesh was consumption of the flesh in whole or in part belongs to a later stage in the history of sacrifice (wh. see). But even when this stage had long been reached, necessity might compel a temporary reversion to the earlier custom operando, as we learn from Saul's procedure in 1 S 14:21. From the altar of a single 'great stone'
ALTAR

(1 S 6th) the transition was easy to an altar built of unhewn stones (Ex 20:24, Dt 27:4-5 RV), which continued to be the normal type of Hebrew altar to the end (see 1 Mac 4:6; Jos. BJ V, v. 6).

2. A type of prehistoric altar, to which much less attention has been paid, had its origin in the primitive conception of sacrifice as the food of the gods. As such it was appropriately presented on a table. Now the more probable of the two disc-like stones laid on the ground, which was and is the table of the Semitic nomad, was the smooth face of the native rock, such as that on which Manoah spread his offering (Jg 16:24, cf. 6:17). The well-known rock-altars, in Palestine and elsewhere, with their mysterious cup-marks—typical specimens are illustrated PEFS, 1900, 32 ff., 249—to receive the sacrificial blood, can scarcely be other than pre-historic table-altars. The similarly marked table-stones or Syracian dolmens also belong here. A further stage in the evolution of the altar table is seen in the elaborate structures recently discovered within the West-Semitic area. In these the rock is cut away so as to leave the altar standing free, to which rock-cut steps lead up, an arrangement forbidden, from motives of decency, by the earliest legislation (Ex 20:24, with which cf. 28:12 and paral. from a later date). The uppermost step shows the altar from the region from which the altar is derived. Some show cup-hollows for libations of blood (see illust. in Moore’s ‘Judges’ in SBOI p. 33), while that first discovered at Peïta has a depression for the altar-hearth (PEFS, 1900, 250 ff., with sketch). Its dimensions are 9 ft. by 6, with a height above the platform of 3 ft. The altars of the more important sanctuaries under the Hebrew monarchy, such as Bethel, were of a similar nature. A description of ‘the altar of burnt-offering’ of the Tabernacle will be given under TABERNACLE; for the corresponding altars of the Temple of Solomon and its successors, and of Edom see TEMPLE.

3. A third variety of primitive altar is the mound of earth (Ex 20:1), a copy in miniature of the hill-tops which were at all times favourite places of worship (see HIGH PLACE).

4. Altars of a type above described were intended for the ordinary open-air sacrificial service, details of which will be found under SACRIFICE. There is no clear reference earlier than Jeremiah to the use of incense, and no reference at all to any altar of incense in the legitimate worship before the Exile, for 1 K 7:37 in its present form is admittedly late, and the altar of 1 K 6:69 must be the table of shewbread (see TEMPLE, Shewbread).

5. From what has already been said, it is evident that an altar was the indispensable requisite of every place of worship. It was not until the 7th cent. B.C. that Josiah succeeded in abolishing the ‘high places’ and destroying or desecrating their altars (2 K 23:11), in accordance with the fundamental demand of the Deuteronomistic law-code (Dt 12:1-4). In the older historical and prophetical writings, however, and even in the earliest legislation (see Ex 20:18 RV), the legitimacy of the local altars is never called in question. On the contrary, religious leaders such as Samuel and Elijah show their concern for the worship of Jah by the erection and repair of altars.

6. As altars to which a special interest attaches may be mentioned that erected by David on the threshing floor of Araunah (2 S 24:18-22), the site of which is marked by the present mosque of ‘the Dome of the Rock’; the altar erected by Ahab after the model of one seen by him at Damascus (2 K 22:13); the sacrificial and incense altars to the host of heaven in the courts and probably even on the roof of the Temple (2 K 23:4, Jer 19:1); and finally, the altar to Olympian Zeus placed by Antiochus Epiphanes on the top of the altar of burnt-offering (1 Mac 1:19).

7. Reference must also be made to altars as places of refuge for certain classes of criminals, attested both by legislation (Ex 21:13ff.) and history (1 K 14:24; see more fully, REFUGE (Cities of)). The origin and precise significance of the horns of the altar, of which the refuge laid hold (1 S 28:6), and which played an important part in the ritual (Ex 29:25, Lv 4:3), have not yet received a satisfactory explanation. A small limestone altar, showing the horns in the form of rounded knots at the four corners, has just been discovered at Gezer (PEFS, 1907, p. 196, with illust.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ALUS.—A station in the journeys (Nu 33:11).

ALVAN.—Son of Shobal, a Horite (Gen 36:19); called in 1 Ch 1:10 Alvan, in Gen 36:4 Alvah, 1 Ch 1:10 Aliah, one of the ‘dukes’ of Edom.

AMAD (Jos 19:9 only).—A city of Asher. The site is doubtful; there are several ruins called ‘Amud in this region.

AMADATHUS.—Est 12:15, 17. See HAMMATHATHA.

AMAL.—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:36).

AMALEK, AMALEKITES.—A tribe which roamed, from the days of the Exodus till the time of King Saul, over the peninsula of Sinai, and probably among the inhabitants of the region to whom the Amorites immediately south of Judah were allotted. They are not counted among the kindred of the Israelites, and probably were among the inhabitants of the region who were conquered by the Amazons in 306 BC. The Amalekites already had a kingdom established in the land. With this agrees the statement of a poem quoted in Nu 24:20 ‘Amalek was the first of the nations.

Israel first met with the Amalekites in the region near Sinai, when Amalek naturally tried to prevent the entrance of a new tribe into the region (cf. Ex 17:1-4). The battle which ensued produced such a profound impression, that one of the few things which the Pentateuch claims that Moses wrote is the ban of Jehovah upon Amalek (Ex 17:16). It appears from Dt 25:17-19 that Amalek made other attacks upon Israel, harassing her rear. On the southern border of Palestine the Amalekites also helped at a later time to prevent Israel’s entrance from Kadesh (Nu 13:14).

During the period of the Judges, the Amalekites aided the Moabites in raiding Israel (Jg 3:1), and at a later time they helped the Midianites to do the same thing (6:1; 7:15). This kept alive the old enmity. King Saul attempted to shatter their force, and captured their king, whom Samuel afterwards slew (1 S 15). However Saul is said to have taken much spoil; the Amalekites were still there for David to raid during that part of Saul’s reign when David was an outlaw (1 S 27:4). The boundaries of the habitation of the Amalekites at this time are said to have been from Telem, one of the southern cities of Judah (Jos 15:19), to Shur on the way to Egypt (1 S 15:7). Most modern critics also read Telum for Hatlah in 1 S 15, and for ‘of old’ in 1 S 27:5.

It was formerly supposed, on the basis of Jg 5:19 and 12:9, that there was at one time a settlement of Amalekites farther north, in the hill country of Ephraim. That is, however, improbable, for in both passages the text seems to be corrupt, and the Hebrew for ‘valley’ in 12:9 from the proper name Shullim. Individual Amalekites, nevertheless, sojourned in Israel (2 S 11:11).

In 1 Ch 1:21 there is a remarkable statement that a remnant of the Amalekites had escaped and dwelt in Edom, and that 500 Simeonites attacked and smote them. Perhaps this accounts for the priestly genealogies which make Amalek a descendant of Bene of Edom, and a subordinate Edomite tribe (cf. Gen 36:30 and Am 6:14).

Perhaps here we learn how the powerful Amalek of the earlier time faded away. Ps 83 is a late composition—refers to the Amalekites as still aiding Israel’s enemies;
AMMIEL

AMMIEL (Jos 15th only).—An unknown city of Judah, in the desert south of Beersheba.

AMAN.—1. The persecutor of Achiacharus (To 14th). 2. Ezra 2:6a, 17. See HAMAN.

AMANA (Ca 4?).—Probably the mountains near the river Abana or Amana, being connected with Hermon and Lebanon; or else Mount Amun in the north of Syria.

AMARAH ('3' said' or 'promised').—1. Zeph 1:1, great-grandfather of the prophet Zerubbabel, and son of a Hezekiah who may be the king. This is the only instance of the name of that is certainly pre-exilic. 2. 1 Ch 6:24, grandfather of Zadok the priest. 3. 1 Ch 23:24, a Levite in David's time. 4. 1 Ch 6:4, Ezr 7:2 (Amarias, 1 Es 8, 2 Es 12), son of Azariah, who is said to have ministered in Solomon's temple. The lists in which 2 and 4 occur are very uncertain, and the name may refer to the same person in both. 5. 2 Ch 19:4, a high priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat. 6. 2 Ch 31:15, a Levite, a gate-keeper, in Hezekiah's time. 7. Neh 12:10, 10, a priestly clan which returned to Jerusalem, and sealed the covenant under Nehemiah (probably the same as AMMER, 1 Ch 24:4, Ezr 2:10, Neh 8:1, 10 Ch 9:6). 8. Ezr 10:14, a Judahite, one of the sons of Bani (v. 24, cf. 1 Ch 9:8) who had taken strange wives. 9. Neh 11:1, a Judahite who offered to dwell in Jerusalem. 10. Neh 13:8, where Meraniah is probably a corruption of Amaniah (which is found in Syr. and Luc.). A. H. M'Neile.

AMARIAS (1 Es 5?).—An ancestor of Ezra, called Amaniah in Ezr 7?

AMASA.—1. The son of Ichhara an Ishmaelite, and of Abigail the sister of king David. He commanded the army of the rebel Absalom (2 S 17:22); but was completely routed by Joab in the forest of Ephraim (18:17). David not only pardoned him, but gave him the command of the army in place of Joab (19:18). He was treacherously slain by Joab at 'the great stone of Gibeon' (2 S 20:3, 18). 2. An Ephraimithe who opposed the bringing into Samaria of the Jewish prisoners, whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken in his campaign against Ahaz (2 Ch 28:9).

AMASAI.—1. A Kohathite (1 Ch 26:17); the eponym of a family (2 Ch 29:12). 2. One of the priests who blew trumpets on the occasion of David's bringing the ark to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15:24). 3. One of David's officers at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:4), possibly to be identified with AMASA, No. 1.

AMASHAI.—One of Jehoshaphat's commanders (2 Ch 17:25).

AMAZIAH.—1. Son of Jehoash of Judah. He came to the throne after the assassination of his father. It is recorded in his favour (2 K 4?) that although he put the murderers of his father to death he spared their children—something unheard of up to that time, we infer. Our sources know of a successful campaign of his against Edom, and an unsuccessful one against Israel. In this he seems to have been the aggressor; and after refusing to hear the advice of Jehoash, whom he had chanced to meet, to a trial of strength, he had the mortification of seeing his own capital plundered. The conspiracy by which he perished may have been prompted by his conduct in this war. In the matter of religion he received qualified praise from the author of Kings (2 K 14:17), while the Chronicler accuses him of gross apostasy (2 Ch 25:14).

AMBASSADOR, AMBASSADE.—As diplomatic agents of sovereigns or other persons in high authority, ambas- sadors are frequently mentioned in OT and Apocrypha from the days of Moses (see use of the Maccabees (1 Mac 9:7 11:12 15:1)). Insults to their persons was a sufficient causa belli (2 S 14:25). In several passages (e.g. Nu 20:20, Dn 2:23), the 'messenger' of EV is practically an ambassador, as the Heb. word is elsewhere rendered (2 Ch 35:20, Is 30:4, Ezk 17:22). Jos 9:9, however, should be read as in RV. The ambassador of Jer 49:36 (=Ob) is probably an angel. In NT the word is used only metaphorically (2 Co 8:19, Eph 6:20).

"Ambassador," the mission of an ambassador (2 Mac 4:21 RV), is used also as a collective for ambassadors themselves (Lk 14:21 19:19 RV). In 1 Mac 14:21 read with RV "the copy of their words." A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AMBER (chashmal, Ezk 1:27 9:3).—The translation 'amber' is much questioned, a metallic substance being generally considered more probable. Prof. Ridgeway ('Encyc. Bibl., s. v.) has, however, shown that amber may well have been known to Ezekiel. The amber commonly seen is the opaque yellow variety from the Baltic, a resinous substance changed by long submersion in the sea. It is a favourite ornament, in necklaces and bracelets, in the Orient, especially among Jews and, is credited with medicinal virtues. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

AMBUSH.—See War.

AMEN.—A Hebrew form of affirmation usually translated in the LXX by an equivalent Greek expression (PRINTS, 1425); Jer 27:8 'so be the word, which the Lord spake to you, a sign and a token'. It is used in the New Testament ('I say'; 'I hope'; 'I believe'), and was occasionally given as a title to the Evangelist (Matth 1:1, Luk 1:1). It is often used in the sense of 'verily' followed by a statement which He desires to invest with special authority (Mt 5:3, Mk 3:23, Lk 4:11, etc.) as worthy of unquestioning trust. The Fourth Gospel reduplicates—a form which, though Christ may Himself have varied the phrase in this manner, is nevertheless stereotyped by this Evangelist (Jn 3:29 and 24 other places), and marks the peculiar solemnity of the utterances it introduces. The impression created by this idiom may have influenced the title of 'the Amen' given to the Lord in the Epistle to the Laodiceans (Rev 3:14). A strikingly similar phrase is used by St. Paul in 2 Co 13:10 'through him (i.e. Jesus Christ as preached) is the Amen'—the seal of God's promises. Its use in doxologies is frequent.

AMETHYST.—See Jewels And Precious Stones.

AMI.—The head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 23); called in Neh 7:17 Ammon.

AMMISHAI (true).—Father of the prophet Jonah (2 K 14:24, Jon 1:1).

AMMAY (2 S 9th only).—A hill near Gibeah in the wilderness of Gibeon. Site unknown.

AMMI (my people').—The name to be applied to Israel in the time of restoration. It is to take the place of Lo-ammi (= 'not my people'), the name given in the first instance by Hosea to Gomer's third child, but in the prophetic fragment, Hosea 11:11 [in Heb 11:1], referred to the people of Israel.

AMMIDID.—One of the families that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5:9); omitted in the parallel lists (Ezr 2:12—Neh 7:17).

AMMIEL ('kinsman is God').—1. Son of Gemalli, and spy of the tribe of Dan (Nu 13:17 P). 2. Father of Machir (2 S 9:17 17:27). 3. The sixth son of Obed-edom, who with his family constituted one of the courses of doorkeepers in the time of David; to them was allotted the charge of the S. gate of the Temple and the storehouse (1 Ch 26, esp. v. 14). See EPHRAIM, 2.

AMMIHUD ('kinsman is majestic').—1. An Ephraimite, father of Elisahum (Nu 1st 21st 76th 126th (P)).

2. A Simeonite, father of Shemuel (Nu 24th (P)).

3. A Naphalite, father of Pedahiel (Nu 25th (P)).

4. According to the Qəb 2 S 13rd and the AV, the name of the father of the Gushirite king Talmi (Kethibh and RV Ammihur).

5. Son of Omri, father of Uthiel (1 Ch 9th).

AMMIHUR.—See AMMIHUR, No. 4.

AMMINADAB.—1. Son of Ram and father of Nahshon (Nu 4th 1st = 1 Ch 29th, Mt 11th; Nu 1st 28th 70th (P)); father-In-law of Aaron (Ex 6th). 2. Son of Kohath and father of Korah (1 Ch 6th).

3. A chief of a Levitical house (1 Ch 13rd (P)).

AMMINADIB occurs in AV and RV of a very obscure passage, Ca 60th, 'my soul made me like the chariots of Amraphel, like the Hebrews, they adopted the language of the people in whose land they settled, thus later speaking a Canaanite dialect. The genealogy which traces their descent from Lot probably signifies that the Ammonites lived in the land of Lot, or in Jordan, called by the Egyptians Ruten, which lay to the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan.

In Dt 28th the Ammonites are said to have displaced the Zammumim, a semi-mythical people, of whom we know nothing. Jg 11th-14th represents Ammon as having conquered all the land between the Jabbok and the Arnon, and a king of Ammon is said to have repressed Israel for taking it from them. The statement is late, and of doubtful authority. Israel found the Amorites in this territory at the time of the conquest, and we have no good reason to suppose that the Ammonites ever possessed it. Their capital was in the north-eastern portion of this region, around the sources of the Jabbok. Rabbah (modern 'Amman) was its capital and centre.

At the time of the conquest the Gadite Israelites did not disturb the Ammonites (Nu 21st,Dt 29th), or attempt to conquer their territory. During the period of the Judges the Ammonites assisted Eglon of Moab in his invasion of Israel (Jg 3rd), and attempted to conquer Gilead, but were driven back by Jephthah the Gileadite (11th, 12th-15th). Later, Nahash, their king, oppressed the town of Jabesh in Gilead, and it was the victory which delivered this city from the Ammonites that made Saul Israel's king (1 S 11th). Saul and Nahash thus became enemies. Consequently, later, Nahash befriended David, apparently to weaken the growing power of Israel. When David succeeded Saul in power, Hanun, the son of Nahash, provoked him to war, with the result that Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, was stormed and taken (Am 11th, 12th). Hanun was introduced to vassalage, and terrible vengeance was wreaked upon them (2 S 10th-12th). Afterwards, during Absalom's rebellion, a son of Nahash rendered David assistance at Mahanaim (2 S 17th). Zedekiah, another son of Nahash, was one of David's heroes (2 S 20th). These friendly relations continued through the reign of Solomon, who took as one of his wives the Ammonite princess Naamah, who became the mother of King Shishak of Egypt (1 K 11th 14th (h)). After the reign of Solomon the Ammonites appear to have gained their independence.

In the reign of Ahab, Ba'asa, son of Rehoboam, the Ammonites was a member of the confederacy which opposed the progress of Shalmaneser into the West (cf. K.A 72th).

According to 2 Ch 20th, the Ammonites joined with Moab and Edom in invading Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat. Before the reign of Jehoram (I., the Ammonites had made another attempt to get possession of Gilead, and their barbarities in warfare excited the indignation of the prophet Amos (Am 11th). Chronicles represents them as beaten a little later by Jotham of Judah, and as paying tribute to Uzziah (2 Ch 28th 27th). When next we hear of the Ammonites, Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon is employing them to harass the refractory Judean king Jehotakim (2 K 24th). Perhaps it was at this period that the Ammonites occupied the territory of Gad (Jer 49th). Later, the domination of the Babylonian compelled Ammon and Israel to become friends, for Ammon conspired with King Zedekiah against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 27th), and during the sieges of Jerusalem many Judeans had migrated to Ammon (Jer 40th). The Babylonian king regarded both Ammon and Judah as rebels, for Ezekiel represents him as casting lots for them (Ezck 21st, cf. Zeph 2st). Perhaps there was a settlement of Ammonites in Israelitish territory, for De 20th recognizes the danger of mixture with Ammonites, while Jos 18st seems to indicate that there was in post-exilic times a village in Benjamin called the village of the Ammonites.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, Baalis, king of Ammon, sent a man to assassinate Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah (Jer 40th). Again, 140 years later, the Ammonites did everything in their power to prevent the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh 2nd 14th-15th). Nehemiah and Ezra fomented its emnity by cancelling the marriages of Ammonitish women with Israelitish peasants who had remained in Judah (Neh 13th).

Between the time of Nehemiah and Alexander the Great the country east of the Jordan was overrun by the Nabataeans. Perhaps the Ammonites lost their identity at this time: for, though their name appears later, many scholars think it is used of these Arabs. Thus in 1 Mac 5th Judas Macabbeus is said to have defeated the Ammonites: Ps 83rd reckons them among Israel's enemies; while Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 19) says the Ammonites were numerous in his day. As Josephus (Ant. 11. 5) uses the same language of the Moabites and Ammonites, though elsewhere (xiv. 4. 4) he seems to call them Arabians, it is possible that the Ammonites had lost their identity at the time of the Nabataean invasion. Their capital, Rabbah, was rebuilt in the Greek style by Ptolemy Philopappus of Egypt in the 3rd cent. B.C. and named Philadelphia. Its ruins amid the modern town of 'Amman are impressive. The god of the Ammonites is called in the OT Milcom, a variation of Melkek, 'king.' When the Jews, after the Exile, to avert national disaster, performed child-sacrifice to Jawheh as Melek or 'king,' the prophets stamped this ritual as of foreign or Ammonite origin on account of the similarity of the name, though perhaps it was introduced from Phoenicia (cf. G. F.
AMOS

Moore in Encyc. B. & M. iii. 3188 ff.). The Ammonites appear to have been a ruthless, semi-circumcised people. Such a rite may have been practised by them too; if so, it is all that we know of their civilization.

AMON (Gr. ᾿Αμών, Egypt. Amān).—An Egyptian deity, who primarily was a sun-god, and later as Amun Ra-seen-ntmu ('Ammon, the sun-god, the king of the gods'), was the local deity of Thebes. With the subjugation of the petty princes of lower Egypt by Asarnef, of Thebes (c. 1700 B.C.), he became the Egyptian national god. His supremacy, recognized for 1100 years by all Egyptian rulers with the exception of Amenophis IV. (c. b.c. 1650), came to an end with Akkaddon (c. 1614 B.C.), the invasion of Egypt (cf. Jer 46), and the destruction of Thebes by Ashurbanipal (c. b.c. 682; cf. 2 M 3). After these events he was relegated to the ranks of the local gods. See No. 1, Ammon.

AMORITES.—An ancient people whose presence can be traced in Palestine and Syria and also in Babylonia. From Dt 3 it appears that their language differed only dialectically from Canaanite, which was Hebrew. This view is confirmed by many proper names from the monuments. They were accordingly of the same race as the Canaanites. Contract tablets of the time of Hammurabi (c. 2250) show that Amorites were in Babylonia at that time (cf. Middem, Altbab. Privatrech. No. 42). At this period their country was designated by the ideogram MAR-TI. It has long been thought that this ideogram stood for Palestine and Syria. At that time, then, the Amorites were already in the West. Because of the identity of their proper names, it is believed that the Amorites were identical in race with that Semitic wave of immigration into Babylonia which produced the first dynasty of Babylonia, the dynasty of Hammurabi (cf. Paton, Syria and Palestine, 25-26). Paton holds that an Amorite wave of migration overran Babylonia and the Mediterranean coast about b.c. 2500, but Johns (Expos. April, 1906, p. 341) holds it probable, also on the basis of paleography, that the Amorites in Babylonia and the West before the time of Sargon, c. 3800. About b.c. 1400 we learn from the el-Amarna tablets that the great valley between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges, which was afterwards called Cilicia-Syria, was inhabited by Amorites, whose prince was Aziru (cf. KIR, v. Nos. 42, 44, and 50). At some time they seem to have overrun Palestine also, for in the E document they are regarded as the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the mountain-land of Palestine, whom the Hebrews conquered (cf. Nu 26, Jos 24). This was also the view of the prophet Amos (26), and, in part, (16, 17). The document, on the other hand, regards the Canaanites (wh. see) as the original inhabitants of the country. As the J document originated in the southern kingdom and the E document in the northern, some have inferred that the Amorites were strong in the northern, but even the J document (15b) recognizes that the Amorites were strong in the valley of Aijalon. AMOS.

1. The man.—Amos, the earliest of the minor prophets whose writings have come down to us, and the initiator of one of the greatest movements in spiritual history, was a herdsman, or small sheep-farmer, in Tekoa, a small town on the uplands, some miles south of Bethlehem. He combined two occupations. The sheep he reared produced a particularly fine kind of wool, the sale of which doubtless took him from one market to another. He was also a 'price fixer' of sycomores. The fruit of this tree was husked in its ripening process by being bruised or pinched: and as the sycomore does not grow at so great a height as these, the OCCUPATION would bring Amos into touch with other pastoral and rural occupations. The simple life of the uplands, the isolation from the dissipation of a wealthier civilization, the aloofness from all priestly or prophetic guilds, had doubtless kept him aloof from the influence of his father and with the spiritual independence which found in him so noble an utterance. While he was thus a native of the kingdom of Judah, his prophetic activity arose in the kingdom of Israel. Of this awakening he gives a most vivid picture in the account of his interview with Amaziah, the priest of Bethel (7th-8th). He had gone to Bethel to some great religious feast, which was also a business market. The direct call to prophesy to testify against the unrighteousness of both kingdoms had probably come to him not long before; and amidst the throng at Bethel he proclaimed his vision of Jehovah to the people who had come from the ten tribes of Israel, and prepared to punish the iniquity of the house of Jeroboam II. The northern kingdom had no pleasant memories of another prophet who had declared the judgment of God upon sown (2 K 18), and Amaziah, the priest, thinking that Amos was one of a prophetical and official guild, contemptuously bade him begone to Bethel, where he could prophesy for hire (7). The answer came flashing back. Amos claimed all connexion with the hireling prophet whose 'word' was dictated by the immediate political and personal interest. He was something better and more honest—no prophet, neither a prophet's son, but a herdsman and a dresser of sycomores, called by God to prophesy to Israel. Herein lies much of his distinctiveness. The earlier prophetical impulse which had been embodied in the prophetical guilds had become professional and insincere. Amos brought prophecy back again into the line of direct inspiration.

2. The time in which he lived.—Amos 1 may not be part of the original prophecy, but there is no reason to doubt its essential accuracy. Amos was prophesying in those years in which Uzziah and Jeroboam II were reigning contemporaneously, b.c. 775-750. This date is of great importance, because few prophetic writings are dating with a plumb-line the historical situation as those of Amos. For nearly 100 years prior to his time Israel had suffered severely from the attacks of Syria. She had lost the whole of her territory east of Jordan (2 K 15); she had been driven from the north to the south (13). But now Syria had more than enough to do to defend herself from the southward pressure of Assyria; and the result was that Israel once more began to be prosperous and to regain her lost territories. Under Jeroboam II this prosperity was especially strong in the upland districts, but the people revelled in it, giving no thought to any further danger. Even Assyria was not feared, because she was busy with the settlement of internal affairs, rebellion and pestilence. Amos, however, knew that the relaxation of pressure could be but temporary. He saw that Assyrian power would pass Damascus down into Palestine, and bring in the day of account; and although he nowhere names Assyria as the agent of God's anger, the references are unmistakable (5 1-7). It is this careless prosperity with its accompanying unrighteousness and forgetfulness of God that is never out of the prophet's thoughts. The book is short, but the picture of a time of moral anarchy is complete. The outward religious observances are kept up, and the temples are thronged with worshippers (5 9); tithes and voluntary offerings are duly paid (4 1-5 9). But religion has divorced itself from morality, the saved from the unrighteous. As Every Lazy, 4 3. three no 195). While They 6". These Amos. These Amos. The pictures are (a) the devouring locusts (7 1-2); (b) the consuming fire (7 1-4); (c) the plumb-line (7 4); (d) the basket of summer fruit (8 1-2); (e) the smitten sanctuary, and destruction of the worshippers (9 1-8). 9 1-18 is in striking contrast to the tone of the rest of the book. Instead of threats there are now promises. The line of David will be restored to its former splendour; the cities shall be built up; the settled agricultural life shall be resumed. This Epilogue is generally acknowledged to be a late addition to the prophecy. It contains no moral feature, no repentance, no new righteousness. It tells only of a people satisfied with vineyards and gardens. 'The people have the legitimate hopes; but the first are hopes of a generation of other conditions and of other deserts than the generation of Amos' (G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, i. 196).

4. THEOLOGY OF AMOS.—In his religious outlook Amos had many successors, but he had no forerunner. His originality is complete. (i) His view of Jehovah.—Hitherto Jehovah had been thought of as a Deity whose power over His own people was absolute, but who seemed to have influence when moved from certain geographical surroundings (1 20). The existence of other gods had not been questioned even by the most pious of the Israelites; they denied only that these other gods had any claim over the life of the people of Jehovah. But Amos will not hear of the existence of other gods. Jehovah is the God of the whole earth, His supreme claim is righteousness, and where that is not conceded He will punish. He rules over Syria and Caphtor, Moab and Ammon. As a threefold quality, as truly as over Israel or Judah (3 12, 13). Nature too is under His rule. Every natural calamity and scourge are traced to the direct exercise of His will. Amos therefore lays down a great philosophy of history. God is all-righteous. All events and all peoples are in His hands. Political and natural catastrophes have religious significance (6 9).

(ii) The relation of Jehovah to Israel.—Amos, in common with his countrymen, considered the relation of Jehovah to Israel to be a special one. But while they had regarded it as an indissoluble relationship of privilege, a bond that could not be broken provided the stated sacrifices were maintained, Amos declared that it could be broken, but that the very existence of such a bond would lay Israel under heavier moral responsibilities than if she had been one of the Gentile nations (9 10). As her opportunities had been greater, so too would be her punishment for wasting them be proportionately severe. Jehovah's first demands were morality and justice and kindliness, and any sacrificial system that removed the emphasis from the criminal element of sin to the observance of ritual was an abomination (5 24-25).

(iii) The inevitable judgment.—It is his certainty of the moral character of God that makes Amos so sure of the coming catastrophe. For the first time in the Hebrew literature he uses the expression 'the day of the Lord'—a phrase that may already have been current in a more genial and privileged sense to indicate the day that God will utterly destroy the nations (9 1-5, 6-15). With this broad view of history, a view from which the idea of special privilege is excluded, he sees in the northern power the instrument of Jehovah's anger (59 6-7); a power that in its self-aggrandisement is working out Jehovah's purpose. (iv) Fashion and policy.—It was the custom for many a century to accept the verdict of Jerome, that the prophet was a rustic and unskilled in speech. That, however, is anything but the case. The arrangement of the book is clear; the Hebrew is pure; and the knowledge of the outside world is remarkable. The survey of the nations with which the prophecy opens is full of precise detail. Amos knows, that the Amorites migrated from Kir, and the Philistines from Caphtor (9 7); he has heard of the swellings of the Nile (9 7), and regards the fact with a curious dread. He has been a close observer of animal conditions in Israel. Much of his imagery is drawn from nature—earthquakes and the eclipse of the sun, the cedars and the oaks, the roaring of the lion, the snaring of birds, the bite of the viper; once only does he draw a comparison from shepherd life (3 15).

6. RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE.—Amos' true significance in religious history is that with him prophecy breaks away from its true line, individual, direct, responsible to none save God. The word of the Lord came to Amos and he could not but speak (3 9). Such a cause produced an ineffectual state. In that direct view of Jehovah, Amos learned the truths which he was the first to proclaim to the world—that Jehovah was the God of the whole earth; that the nations were in His keeping; that justice and righteousness were His great demands; that privilege, if it meant opportunity, meant likewise responsibility and liability to the doom of those who have seen and have not believed.

R. BRUCE TAYLOR.
AMPHIPOLIS.—A town in a part of Macedonia formerly reckoned to Thrace, on the river Strymon, about 3 miles from its mouth, where the harbour Eion was situated. It was a place of great strategic and mercantile importance. It underwent various vicissitudes, but retained its importance based on its abundant supplies of excellent wine, figs, raisins, and gold, silver, and gold mines; its woollen fabrics. The Romans raised it to the rank of a free town and the chief town of the first district of the province Macedonia; through it the Via Egnatia passed. The verb in the Greek (Ac 17') seems to indicate that St. Paul passed through it without preaching there.

A. SOUTER.

AMPLIATUS (AV Amplaíus).—Greeted by St. Paul (Ro 16'), perhaps of the imperial household (Lightfoot on Ph 42'), and a prominent Christian (Sandy—Headlam). The name, a common slave designation, is found inscribed in the catacombs. A. J. MACLEAN.

AMRAM.—1. A Levite, son of Kohath and grandson of Levi (Nu 31:1, 1 Ch 6:1, 14). He married Jochebed his father's sister, by whom he begat Aaron and Moses (Ex 6:16-20) and Miriam (Nu 26:7, 1 Ch 6:5). The Amramites are mentioned in Nu 31:1, 1 Ch 26:23. 2. A son of Bani who had contracted a foreign marriage (Ezr 10:46).

AMRAPHEL.—The king of Shinar (Gen 14'). He has been identified (by Schrader and usually) with Hammurabi, king of Babylon, but apart from the difficulties due to differences of spelling, there is no evidence that Hammurabi was ever allied with a king of Elam and a king of Larsa to invade the West. Boscowen suggests Amur-Pal, the ideographic writing of Simmubibl, the father of Hammurabi, for whom such an alliance is more likely. See CHREIONOMAER.

AMULETS AND CHARMS.—1. The custom of wearing amulets (amuletum from Arab. root —'to carry') as objects to protect the wearer against the influence of evil spirits, and in particular against 'the evil eye,' is almost as wide-spread as the human race itself. Children and domestic animals are supposed to be especially subject to such influence, and to-day in the Arabic border lands there is hardly a child, or almost an animal, which is not defended from the evil eye by a charm ('Doughty). The Jews were in this respect like the rest of the world, and in the Talmud it is said that ninety-nine deaths occur from the evil eye to one from natural causes (see MAGIC DIVINATION AND SOCERCY).

2. RV has substituted 'amulet' for AV 'ear-rings' in Is 3:29, the Heb. word being elsewhere associated with serpent-charming. There is nothing to indicate their precise nature or shape. Our knowledge of early Palestinian charms against death in battle, the typical recent excavations at Gezer, Taanach, and Megiddo. These have brought to light hundreds of amulets, bewildering in their variety of substance and form—beads of various colours (the blue variety is the favourite amulet at the present day), pendants of slate, pieces of coral, bronze bells (cf. Ex 28:39), a tiny ebon fish from the Maccabean period, a yellow glass pendant with 'good luck to the wearer' in reversed Greek letters (PEFS, 1904, Illust. p. 354), a small round silver box with blue enamel (ib. 1903, Illust. p. 303), etc. The influence of Egypt, where amulets were worn by men and gods, by the living and the dead, is shown by the greater number of scarabs and 'Horus eye' unearthed at Gezer and Taanach.

3. The 'consecrated tokens' (2 Mac 12:10 RV) found by Judas Maccabaeus on the bodies of his soldiers were probably worn for the same purpose. The Gr. word being a tr. of the Aram. word for 'amulet.' The Mishna (c. A.D. 200) shows that in NT times a favourite charm ('gemiza', whence our 'cameo') consisted of a piece of parchment inscribed with sacred or balistic writing, and suspended from the neck in a leather capsule. In this connexion it may be noted that 'phylactery' signifies an amulet, and like the mezuzah or door-post symbol, was often so regarded.

4. In antiquity jewelry which were worn quite as much for protective as for decorative purposes, being supposed to draw the attention of the spirit from the wearer. A popular form of jewel-amulet was the moon-shaped crescent in gold and silver, like those worn by the Jerusalem ladies (Is 8:21 RV), and the 'crescents and pendants' worn by the Midianite chiefs and hung from the necks of their camels (Jg 8:22 RV). The ear-rings of Gn 38, also, were evidently mere ornaments, so that AV and RV may both be right in their renderings—'ear-rings,' 'amulets'—of Is 59.

For the amulets worn by the heathen Arabs see Helmhausen, Rasse Arab. Heidenthumus (1887), 143 ff., and for modern Jewish amulets the art. 'Amulet' in Hastings' DB.

AMUSEMENTS.—See GAMES.

AMZI.—1. A Merarite (1 Ch 6:9). 2. A priest in the second Temple (Neh 11:1). In Neh 11:1 the restoration of 1699 has 'Beriah.'

ANAB.—A city of Judah in the Negeb hills (Jos 11:19), inhabited first by the Anakim. Now the ruin Anub near Debir.

ANEL.—Brother of Tobit and father of Achiacharus (To 15).

ANAH.—1. A daughter of Zibeon, and mother of Obolihamah, one of Esau's wives (Gen 36:14, 18, 20 (R')). Some ancient authorities (including I.XX. Sam. Fesh.) read son instead of daughter, which was the custom among the Arabs.

2. Anah (Gen 36:24 (R), 1 Ch 1:40), a Horite 'duke,' brother of Zibeon (Gen 36:25 (R), 1 Ch 1:40). If we take Anah as an eponym rather than a personal name, and think of the relationship between clans rather than individuals, it is quite possible to reduce the above three references to one. In regard to No. 2 the note is appended. 'This is Anah who found the hot springs (AV wrongly 'the mules') in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father' (Gen 36:9).

ANAHARATH (Jos 19:3), mentioned with Shilon and Rabbith on the east side of the Plain of Esdraelon in Issachar. It is perhaps the modern en-Na'urah in the Valley of Jezreel.

ANAIAH ('I hath answered').—1. A Levite (Neh 8), called Ananías in 1 Es 9:4. 2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:2). In 1 Es 9:4, it is called 'Ianaia (Esv). It is not certain whether the reference is to one man or two.

ANAIAH—A people, not yet identified, named in Gn 10:18 (1 Ch 1:18) among the inhabitants of the highlands of Judah, whom tradition credited with colossal height. The word Anah is properly a race-name, and, being often used with the article, it is really an appellative, probably meaning 'the long-necked (people).' In the genealogizing narrative of Jos 13:4 there were three sons or clans of Anah; Sheeshai, Ahiman, and Talmai. These were all driven out by Caleb (cf. Jg 19, 40). Jos 11:14 gives them a wider habitat, as scattered over the hill-country of Palestine generally, whence they were exterminated by Joshua. In Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod some remnants were to be found after Joshua's time (11:19). See also AREAH.

ANANI.—A son of Elecciah (1 Ch 3v).

ANANIAS.—1. Neh 3v, the father of Maaseiah, and grandfather of Azariah, who took part in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. 2. A town inhabited by Benjamin after the Captivity (Neh 11v).

ANANIAS.—This name occurs several times in the Apocrypha: in 1 Es 21v, 23v, 48 (representing 'Hanani' and 'Hanamath' of Ezr 10v, 21, 'Anahah' and 'Hanam' of Jos 21v, 7) and in To 13v, Jth 8v. It is the name of three persons in NT. 1. The husband of Sapphira, who in the voluntary communism of the early Church sold 'a possession' and kept part of the price for himself, pretending that he had given the whole (Ac 5v). The sudden death of husband and wife, predicted by St. Peter, was the signal proof of God's anger on this Judas-like hypocrisy. 2. A 'devout man according to the law' at Damascus, a disciple who instructed and baptized Saul of Tarsus after his conversion, restored to him his sight by imposition of hands; he had been warned by the Lord in a vision (Ac 9v).

ANATE.—1. A city in Benjamin given to the Levites (Jos 21v); the modern 'Anaitz, 21 miles N. of Jerusalem, an insignificant village with considerable ruins. It was the home of Abiah, (1 K 2v) and of Jeremiah (Jer 1'); re-occupied after the exile (Neh 7v). 2. A Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch 7v).

ANCESTOR-WORSHIP.—Every people whose religious beliefs have been investigated appears to have passed through the stage of Animism, the stage in which it was believed that the spirits of those recently dead were potent to hurt those they had left behind on earth. The rites observed today by an Irish wick have their origin in this fear that the spirit of the dead may injure the living. There are several traces of a similar belief in the OT. When a death took place in a tent or house, every vessel which happened to be open at the time was counted unclean (Nu 19v). The remains were not remained clean only if it had a covering tied over it. The idea was that the spirit of the dead person, escaping from the body, might take up its abode in some open vessel instead of entering the gloomy realms of Sheol. Many mourning customs find their explanation in this same dread of the spirit but lately set free from its human home. The shaving of the head and beard, the cutting of the face and breast, the tearing of the garments—apparently a survival of the time when the mourner stripped off all his clothes—are due to the effort of the survivor to make himself unrecognizable by the spirit.

But to admit that the OT contains traces of Animism is not the same as to declare that at one stage the Israelites practised Ancestor-worship. Scholars are divided into two groups on this subject. Some (e.g. H. G VI 1. 451; Smend, Altest. Relig. 112 f.) affirm that Ancestor-worship was of the very substance of the primitive religion of Israel. Others do not at all admit this point (e.g. Kautzsch, in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 61v; W. B. Paterson 111., 445v) for the evidence adduced for Ancestor-worship as a stage in the religious development of Israel proceeds on these lines:

(a) Sacrifices were offered at Hebron to Abraham, and at Shechem to Joseph, long before these places were associated with the worship of Jehovah. (b) When a purer faith took possession of men's hearts, the old sacred spots retained their sanctity, but new associations were attached to them. A theophany was now declared to be the fact underlying the connexion with the famous dead was thus broken. In the same way sacred trees and stones, associated with the old Canaanitish worship, had their evil associations removed by being linked with the truth in the history of Israel. But this existence of sacred places connected with the burial of a great tribal or national hero does not at all prove Ancestor-worship. It is possible to keep fresh a great man's memory without believing that he can either help or hinder the life of those on earth.

(b) Evidence from mourning customs. It is held that the cutting and wounding (Jer 10v 4v), the covering of the head (Ezk 24v), the rending of the garments (2 S 11v 3v), the wacking of sackcloth (2 S 21v, Is 15v), are to be explained as a personal dedication to the spirit of the dead. But all this, as we have seen, can be explained as the effort so to alter the familiar appearance that the spirit, on returning to work, will not recognize the objects of its spite. Then the customs that had to do with food, the fasting for the dead (1 S 31v, 2 S 24v)—the opening of a funeral feast after sundown (Hos 9v, 2 S 3v, Jer 16v)—the placing of food upon the grave (De 23v)—do not prove that Ancestor-worship was a custom of the Israelites. They only show that the Israelites were pleased to appease the spirit of the dead, and that this was done by a sacrifice, which, like all primitive sacrifices, was afterwards eaten by the worshippers themselves. When these funeral rites were acted with solemnity it was because they were heathenish and unfitting for a people that worshipped the true God.

(c) The teraphim, it is said, were some form of household god, shaped in human form (1 S 19v 3v), cached about as one of the most precious possessions of the home (Gn 31v), consulted in divination (Ezk 21v), presumably as representing the forefathers of the family. Nothing is known with certainty regarding the teraphim. That they were of human form is a very bold inference from the evidence afforded by 1 S 19v 3v. The variety of derivations given by the Jews of the word teraphim shows that there was complete ignorance as to their origin and appearance.

(d) In 1 S 28v the spirit of Samuel, called up by the witch of Endor, is called eholim. But it is very precarious to build on an obscure passage of this kind, especially as the use of the word eholim is so wide (applied to God, angels, and possibly even judges or kings) that no inference can be drawn from this passage.

(e) It is argued that the object of the levirate marriage (Dt 25v) was to prevent any deceased person being left in Sheol without some one on earth to offer him worship. But the motive stated in v. 4, 'that his name be not put out in Israel,' is so sufficient that the connexion of the levirate marriage with Ancestor-worship seems forced.

The case for the existence of Ancestor-worship among the Hebrews has not been made out. As a branch of Semitic stock, the Hebrews were, of course, heirs of the common Semitic tradition. And while that tradition did contain much that was superstitious with regard to the power of the dead to work evil on the living, it does not appear that the worship of ancestors, which in other races so often associated with the stage of Animism, had a place in Hebrew religion.

ANCIENT OF DAYS

ANCIENT OF DAYS occurs 3 times in Daniel (7:9, 22), as a title of God in His capacity as Judge of the world. In the Vision of the Great Aspiztes He is depicted as a very old and majestic figure, with white hair and white raiment, seated on a fiery throne, and having the books of the records of man opened before Him. The picture is no doubt suggested by the contrast between the Eternal God (Ps 90:2) and the new-fanged deities which were from time to time introduced (Jg 5, Dt 32), rather than, as Hippolytus (quoted by Beermann, Das Buch Daniel, p. 46) suggests, by the idea of God as making the ages old without turning old Himself. In the troublous times which are represented by the Book of Daniel, it was at once a comfort and a warning to remember that above the fleeting phases of life there sat One who remained eternally the same (Ps 90:2 102:27). At the same time it is worth remembering that the phrase in itself has no mystical significance, but, by an idiom common in Hebrew as in other languages, is merely a paraphrase for ‘an old man.’

H. C. O. LANCE. ANDREW.—One of the twelve Apostles, Simon Peter’s brother (Jn 1), He belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee (v. 3), the harbour-town of Capernaum (see Beetman, Das Buch Daniel, p. 46) where Peter was stationed on the lake. He was present at the anointing of Simon (Mt 4= Mk 2), whose home he also shared (Mk 1), Ere he knew Jesus he had been influenced by the preaching of John the Baptist, and became his disciple, and it was on hearing the Baptist’s testimony that he attached himself to Jesus (Jn 1=46). He brought his brother Simon to the newly found Messiah (v. 4), thus earning the distinction of being the first missionary of the Kingdom of heaven; and it seems that, because of his three, he enjoyed a special intimacy with the Master (Mk 13). Tradition adds that he was crucified at Patras in Achaea, and hung alive on the cross for two days, exhorting the spectators all the while.

DAVID SMITH. ANDRONICUS.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul (Ro 16) as a ‘kinsman,’ i.e. as a fellow-countryman (cf. Ro 9 16, 10), who had been imprisoned for Christ; distinguished as an Apostle (in the largest sense of the name), and a believer from early days, having perhaps come to Rome after the persecution of Ac 11.

A. J. MACLEAN. ANEM.—(I Ch 6 only).—A town of Issachar, noticed with Ramoth. It appears to answer to Eng-gannim (wh. see) in the parallel list (Jos 21).

ANER.—1. One of the three Amorite chieftains, the other two being Mamre and Eshkol, who were in covenant with Abraham (Gn 14). 2. A hill on the border of Hebron (Gn 23), and Eshkol is the name of the valley not far from Hebron (Nu 13), it is natural to suppose that Aner also was the name of a locality which gave its name to a clan. 2. (I Ch 6 only).—A town of Manasseh, west of Jordan. The site is doubtful.

ANGEL.—1. Old Testament.—That in the OT the existence of angels is taken for granted, and that therefore no account of their origin is given, is to be explained by the fact that belief in them is based upon an earlier Animism, such as is common to all races in the pre-polytheistic stage of culture. The whole material for the development of Israelite angelology was at hand ready to be used. It must therefore not cause surprise if we find that in its earliest stages the distinction between Jehovah and angels should be one of degree rather than of kind (see ANGEL OF THE LORD). This is clearly brought out in the earliest of the Biblical documents, e.g. in Gn 18; ere Jehovah is one of three who are represented as companions, Jehovah taking the leading position, though equal honour is shown to all; that the two men with Jehovah are angels is directly asserted, and there we are told, where they were supported by the various names in the OT for angels, and their varied functions (see below). They went to Sodom, after it had been said in 18:21 that Jehovah ‘went his way.’ Moreover, Jehovah’s original identity with an angel, according to the early Hebrew conception, is distinctly seen by comparing, for example, such a passage as Ex 3 with v. 4; in the former it is the ‘angel of the Lord’ who appears in the burning bush, God there is further that direct identification in Gn 16:11 21:7. In the earliest document in which angels are mentioned (J) they appear only by two or three, in the later document (E) they appear in greater numbers (Gn 28 32; this is just what is to be expected, for J, the earlier document, represents Jehovah in a less exalted form, who Himself comes down to earth, and personally carries out His purposes by degrees, however, more exalted conceptions of Him obtain, especially in E. The conception of His characteristic of holiness becomes realized, so that His presence among men comes to appear incongruous and unifying, and His activity is delegated to His messengers or angels (see Angel of the Lord).

The English word ‘angel’ is too specific for the Hebrew (mal’akh) for which it is the usual equivalent; for in the Hebrew it is used in reference to men (e.g. Gn 32 13, Dt 22, Jg 6, Is 33, Mal 1), as well as to superhuman beings. Besides the word mal’akh there are several other expressions used for what would come under the category of angels, viz.: ‘sons of God’ (ben ‘elohim),* Gn 6:4; ‘sons of the mighty’ (ben ‘eitim), Ps 89:5 29; ‘mighty ones’ (gibborim), J 41 5 EV; ‘the holy ones’ (qodeshim), 12; ‘watchers’ (seraphim), Is 62; ‘watchers of the habitations of the earth’ (an’er), 31. There are also the three expressions: ‘the host of Jehovah’ (zeba’ Jehovah), Jos 5; ‘the host of the height’ (zeba’ marom), 24; ‘the host of heaven’ (zeba’ shamarim), Dt 17 (see also QEHERIM, SAGRAMIM).

Angels are represented as appearing in human form, and as having many human characteristics: they speak like men (1 K 19); they eat (Gn 18); they fight (Gn 3), J 41 3, cf. S 9 5); they possess wisdom, with which they instruct men (Job 41); they have imperfections (Job 41). On the other hand, they can become invisible (2 K 6, Ps 104), and they can fly, if, as appears to be the case, seraphim are to be included under the category of angels (Is 6).

The functions of angels may be briefly summarized thus: they guide men, e.g. an angel guides the children of Israel on their way to the promised land (Ex 23; below), and it is by the guidance of an angel that Abraham’s servant goes in quest of a wife for Isaac (Gn 24 46); in Job 33 an angel guides a man in what is right; they are more especially the guides of the prophet (1 K 13, 19, 2 K 4:4 7); they are the bringers of evil and destruction upon men (2 S 24 17, 2 K 19, Ps 33 78, Job 33); in Ps 16 the wrath of a king is likened to angels of death; on the other hand, they are the protectors of men (Ps 34 0 91), and, after they have destroyed from destruction (Gn 19); their power is superhuman (2 K 6, † cf. Zec 12); they report to God what is going on upon the earth (Job 1 2), for which purpose they are represented as riding on horseback (Zec 1 2, cf. Ps 18 10, Is 19);† their chief duty above is that of praising God (Gn 28, Ps 103). Angelic beings seem to be referred to as ‘watchmen’ in Is 62 and Dn 4 0. An early mythological element regarding angels is perhaps represented in such passages as Jg 5, Is 40 8 26, and elsewhere.

(d) In Ezekiel, angels, under this designation, are never mentioned, though the angelology of this book is clear. Cf. the ambiguous expression ‘sons of the prophets’ (ben ‘ebeh ‘elohim).† The word used in this passage is not the usual one for angel, though its sense ‘fellow-countryman’ (mizah) is the same as that of mal’akh.

shows considerable development; other names are given to them, but their main function, viz. messengers of God, is the same as in the earlier books; for example, in 2 S it is a 'spirit,' instead of an 'angel,' who acts as an intermediary being, see, too, 3 S 11-16; in 3 S 40 a vision is attributed to the hand of the Lord. In 40 it is a 'man' of a supernatural kind who instructs the prophet; and again, in 48, 'men,' though clearly not of human kind (see v.11), destroy the wicked in Jerusalem. In Esd., as well as in Zec, Zohar angels take up a very definite position of intermediate beings between God and man, one of their chief functions being that of interpreting visions which Divine action creates in the mind of men; in both those books angels are called 'men,' and in both the earlier idea of the 'Angel of the Lord' has its counterpart in the prominent position taken up by some particular angel who is the interpreter of visions. In Zec. different orders of angels are for the first time mentioned (29-44). In Daniel there is a further development; the angels are termed 'watchers' (41-11) and 'princes' (10-21); they have names, e.g. Michael (10-12), Gabriel (8-9), and there is a vision of the four 'princes' in Daniel, 4; as in Zec. so in Daniel there are different orders among the angels, but in the latter book the different categories are more fully developed.

Before we take up these later books we may see the link between the earlier belief and its development in post-Biblical Jewish literature. The main factors which contributed to this development were (1) the far transcendence of the Babylonian influence upon the Jews asserted itself in this as well as in other respects; according to Jewish tradition the names of the angels came from Babylon. Secondly, Persian influence was of a marked character in every exilic times; the Zoroastrian belief that Ormuzd had a host of pure angels of light who surrounded him and fulfilled his commands, was a ready-made development of the Jewish belief, handed down from much earlier times, that angels were the messengers of Jehovah. Later still, a certain amount of Greek influence was also exercised upon Jewish angelology.

2. The Apocrypha.—Some of the characteristics of angels here are identical with those found in the OT, viz.: they appear in human form (2 Es 1, 2 Es 16), they speak like men (To 5, 2 Es 4), they guide men (v.35); they bring destruction upon men (1 Mac 7: 6, 11); on the other hand, they heal men (To 4: 1), their power is superhuman (12, 16-29, Three 5), and they praise God (2 Es 8, Three 7). The angelology of the Apocrypha is, however, far more closely allied to that of Esdras and Daniel than the angelology of these to that of the rest of the OT; this will be clearly seen by enumerating briefly the main characteristics of angels as portrayed in the Apocrypha.

In 2 Esdras, 14 a figure of an angel adjustable appears as an instructor of heavenly things; thus in 2 Esdras 12 an angel causes Esdras to fall into a trance in order to receive instruction in spiritual matters; in 2 Esdras, after an angel has instructed Esdras, the latter is commanded to tell others what he had learned; sometimes an angel is identified with God, e.g. in 5: 47; but usually there is very distinct differentiation; sometimes the angel seems almost to be the alter ego of Esdras, arguing with him in formal language (12). In To 12-13 there are some important details,—here an angel instructs in manner of life, but more striking is the teaching that he brings to remembrance before God the prayers of the faithful, and that he understands the burial of the dead; he has a name, Raphaiah, and is one of the seven holy angels ('archangels') who present the prayers of the saints, and who go constantly in and out before the presence of God; that there are ranks among the angels is thus taught much more categorically than in the later Biblical books. Further, the idea of guardian-angels is characteristic of the Apocrypha; that individuals have their guardian-angels is clearly implied in To 5, that armies have angelic aids is taught in 1 Mac 11, while in 2 Mac 29 occurs a Jewish counterpart of the Roman legend of Castor and Pollux; there is, possibly, in Sir 17: 2, an indication that nations also have their guardian-angels; so, too, it would be the line descendant of the early Israelite belief in national gods. The dealings of angels with men are of a very varied character, for besides the details already enumerated, we have these further points: in Bar 14 an angel is to be the means whereby the Israelites in Babylon shall be helped to withstand the temptation to worship the false gods of the land; in To 6 10-11 an angel describes a method whereby an evil spirit may be driven away; in v. 4 an angel saves a man from murder. In general, an angel takes the prophet Habakkuk by the hair and carries him from Judah to Babylon, in order that he may share his dinner with Daniel in the lion's den; with once (Mt 25: 31) an angel anoints the flame of the furnace into which the three heroes had been cast, and makes a cool wind to blow in its place (cf. Da 3:28).

* Cf. in Egyptian belief, the similar functions of Isis and Nephthys.

† Names of angels occur also in 2 Esdnas, viz.: Jeremid (4), Phathed (59), and Urel (109).

This will thus be seen that the activities of angels are, according to the Apocrypha, of a very varied character. One other important fact remains to be noted: they are almost invariably the benefactors of man, their badness and anger against man, something which is identified with God, yet in spite of this, with one possible exception, 2 Mac 4: 21, no worship is ever offered to them; this is true also of the OT, excepting when Hezykiah is identified with the Lord, there is at least one case of the worship of an angel, Rev 4: 8, cf. Col 2: 18. The angelology of the Apocrypha is expanded to an almost unlimited extent in later Jewish writings, more especially in the Book of Enoch, in the Targums, and in the Talmud; but with these we are not concerned here.

3. New Testament.—(a) In the Gospels it is necessary to differentiate between what is said by Christ Himself on the subject and what is narrated by the Evangelists. Christ's teaching regarding angels may be summed up thus: Their dwelling-place is in heaven (Mt 18: 10; Lk 22: 43); they are superior to men, in the world (Mt 25: 31); they are sinless (Mt 18: 10); they carry away the souls of the righteous to a place of rest (Lk 16: 22); they are (as seems to be implied) of neither sex (Mt 22: 30); they are very numerous (Mt 20: 28); they will accompany Jesus at His second coming (Mt 20: 28); cf. Lk 12: 47); there are angelic children (Mt 18: 27); they rejoice at the triumph of good (Lk 15: 10). Turning to the Evangelists, we find that the main function of angels is to deliver God's messages to men (e.g. Mt 1 20: 28, Lk 1: 25). On only one occasion are angels brought into direct contact with Christ (Mt 4: 1); with a parallel passage Mk 1: 12, it is noteworthy that in the corresponding verse in the Third Gospel (Lk 4: 5) there is no mention of angels. Thus the main differences between Christ's teaching to angels and that which went before are that they are not active among men, their abode and their work are rather in the realms above; they are not the intermediaries between God and men, for it is either Christ Himself, or the Holy Spirit, who speaks directly to men; much emphasis is laid on their presence with Christ at His second coming. On the other hand, the earlier belief is reflected in the Gospel angelophanies, who are a marked characteristic of the Nativities and Resurrection narratives; though here, too, a distinct and significant difference is found in that the angels is always clearly differentiated from God.

(b) In the Acts there seems to be a return to the earlier beliefs, angelic appearances are not being frequently mentioned (5) (7) (11) (12) etc.; their activity in the affairs of men is in somewhat startling contrast with the silence of Christ on the subject. It is possible that most of the references in the Acts will permit of an explanation in the direction of the angelic appearances being subjective visions (e.g. 8) (9) (7) (30); but such occurrences as are recorded in 9) (12) (both belonging to the Petrine school) would require a different explanation, while that mentioned in 12 would seem to be the popular explanation of an event which could easily be accounted for now in other ways.

The mention, in 12, of what is called St. Peter's angel, gives some insight into the current popular views concerning angels; it seems clear that a distinction was made between an angel and a spirit (Ac 5-1).

(c) In the Ep. to the Hebrews, the standpoint, as would be expected, is that of the OT, while in the 1st century the angelology is that common to other apocalyptic literature (cf. also the archangel of Jude). W. O. E. Cesterly.

ANGEL OF THE LORD (JAHWEH)

He appears in human form, the origin of angels is stated to be their creation by Christ (Col 144); as in the Acts, they are concerned with the affairs of men (1 Co 4) (14), Ro 8, 1 Ti 5); at the same time St. Paul emphasizes the teaching of Christ that God speaks to men directly, and not through the intermediacy of angels (Gal 14, cf. Ac 9); in Col 2 a warning against the worshipping of angels is uttered, with which compare the worshipping of demons in 1 Co 108; in accordance with the teaching of St. Paul speaks the presence of angels at the Second Coming (2 Th 17).

(d) In the Ep. to the Hebrews (188), as would be expected, is that of the OT, while in the 1st century the angelology is that common to other apocalyptic literature (cf. also the archangel of Jude). W. O. E. Cesterly.

ANGEL OF THE LORD (JAHWEH), called also the 'Angel of God.'—He occupies a special and unique position; he is not merely one among the angels, albeit a great one, but one sui generis, in a special way Jehovah's representative among men. He may be regarded as in some sense the guardian-angel of the nation of Israel, in that he appears to be the nation's representative at important crises (e.g. Gn 23-168, Ex 3:1423, Nu 225, Js 6:2, 2 K 14, Zac 14).

Early in human form, and most of the characteristics of angels generally are his. The main difficulty with regard to him is that while in some passages he is identified with Jehovah Himself (e.g. Gn 485-14, Js 5), in others there is distinct differentiation, (e.g. Gn 16:121424; in this last he is spoken of as having been sent from Jehovah); this differentiation becomes more and more marked in the later books (e.g. Zac 14). The contradiction here presented can be adequately explained only on the supposition that the evolution of thought on the subject must have run somewhat on the following lines. From the earliest angelology of the Hebrews, itself the offspring of still earlier Animistic conceptions (see ANGEL), there emerged the figure of Jehovah; originally, i.e. long before the time of Moses, Jehovah must, in the popular mind, have been regarded as belonging to the angelic host, and by degrees He assumed a more and more exalted position; as subjective revelation increased, the more fully did the personality of Jehovah become realized, and His superiority to the angels recognized, though in the process it was inevitable that the differentiation and should not always be complete. When ultimately, under the Mosaic dispensation, the holy character and the real nature of Jehovah began to be apprehended, the belief that He personally appeared among men necessarily became more and more untenable; hence, while Jehovah Himself receded further from men, His messenger, or angel, appeared in His stead, and became His representative in all His dealings with men. What must have been such a revolution in the time-honored faith would meet with many retrograde movements before it finally triumphed, as is shown by such passages as Js 6.12. Some such process must be postulated in order to understand the otherwise unaccountable contradiction referred to above.

The angel of the Lord spoken of in the NT (e.g. Mt 16, Lk 23) must not be confounded with the OT 'Angel of Jehovah'; an OT parallel is to be found rather in such a passage as Zac 13, where the angel is one of a kind, not the only one of his kind.

W. O. E. Cesterly.

ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES (Rev 115-23).

1. According to one set of opinions, these angels were men, and the mark is of every church to them is (1) the presiding presbyters or bishops of their respective churches. But while this view is attractive and popular, the reasons against it are strong. Human officials could hardly be made responsible for their churches as angels are. A bishop might be called an angel, i.e. a messenger, of God or of Christ (cf. Hag 11, Mal 1, 2 Co 5), but would he be called 'the angel of the church'? Above all, it is certain that at the early church the language to which the Apocalypse is now genereally referred was an unacquainted episcopate was unknown. (2) Others have supposed that the angels were congregational representatives, church messengers or deputes (which would be in harmony with the proper meaning of the word 'angel'), or even the person who acted as 'Reader' to the assembled church (notice 'he that readeth' in v.). But if the responsibility put upon the angels is too great for angels, it is much too great for any lesser spheres. Besides, the glory and dignity assigned to them as the stars of the churches (115) is inconsistent with a position like that of a mere Reader or deputy.

2. A good many have held that 'angels' is to be understood in its ordinary Scriptural application, not to men, but to celestial beings. In support of this are—(1) the fact that throughout the rest of the book (except the Gr. word, which is not necessarily used here in the same sense; (2) our Lord's utterance in Mt 186, which suggests a doctrine of angelic guardianship; (3) the fact that in Daniel, to which the Apocalypse is so closely related, the guardian-ship of angels is extended to nations (12). The objections, however, are serious. No definite Scriptural teaching can be adduced in favour of the idea that churches have their guardian-angels. Messages intended for churches could hardly be addressed to angels, unless it is scarcely conceivable that such beings would be identified with particular churches in all their infidelities and shortcomings and transgressions, as these angels are (see, e.g., 114).

3. The most probable view, accordingly, is that the angels are personifications of their churches—not actual persons either on earth or in heaven, but ideal representatives. It is the church, of course, that receives the letter, the 'Thou' of address having manifestly a collective force, and it is to the church itself that the letter is sent (cf. 11, where there is no mention of the angels). The idea of angels was suggested, no doubt, by the later Jewish beliefs on the subject, but it is used in a figurative manner which suits the whole figurative treatment, where the glorified Jesus walks among the golden candlesticks, and where the church's language that are couched in highly metaphorical language. It might seem to be against this ideal view that the seven churches, as candlesticks, are definitely distinguished from the seven angels, as a symbol of the initial order in keeping with the inevitable distinction between an actual and an ideal church that they should be thus contrasted as a lamp and a star.

ANGER.—In OT 'anger' represents about a dozen Heb. roots, which occur as nouns, vbs. (once 'angered' is used transitively, Ps 106:9, and adj. By far the most frequent words are ἁγιος (lit. 'to holiness') and its derivatives. ἁγιος is used of the anger of both men (Gen 27:30, Ex 11:32 32:8 etc.) and God (Ex 4:2 32:4, Ps 6:7 etc.). In NT 'anger' is of much less frequent occurrence, and represents only 2 roots: (a) in the manner of ἀγγίζω (lit. 'touch'), the vb. orgizō, the adj. ὁργιζόμενος, and the vb. ὀργίζομαι (only in Tit 1:17), and the trans. vb. ὀργίσσω (Ro 1:18, the only case of a trans. use of 'anger' in NT); (b) the vb. χόλει (lit. 'to be full of bile,' from χόλος, 'bile'), used only in Jn 7:11 to express the bitter anger of the 'Jews' against Jesus. With regard to the distinction between ὀργή and the synonym, thumos, it is to be noted that while ὀργή is very often tr. 'wrath,' thumos is rarely so. 'Anger,' and ὀργή the two words occur together, thumos in each case is 'wrath' (Ro 2:2, Eph 4:2, Col 3:4) and ὀργή 'anger' (Eph 4:2, Col 3:4) of 'indignation' (Ro 2:2). Thumos is the more violent word, denoting anger that is not merely latent and lurking, but an active and passionate sorrow. It is used only in Jn 7:11 to express the wrath of men (the only exception being Ro 2:2), while ὀργή in the great majority of cases (Mt 3:1, Jn 3:3, Ro 1:1 etc.) denotes the righteous indignation of God.
ANGER (WRATH) OF GOD

J. C. LAMBERT

ANGUS (WRATH) OF GOD.—It might seem that the idea of the Divine anger, manifesting itself in judgments of destruction, belongs to an early and anthropomorphizing stage of religion. Yet, on the whole, the Biblical conception will be found consistent and profoundly ethical. God is holy—a term which seems to unite all the unapproachable perfections of Deity, especially and particularly the holiness of His purity. He is the 'Holy One of Israel,' in covenant relation with a nation to whom He has revealed Himself as holy, and whom He will fashion with slow redemptive purpose into an holy people. Moreover, God is righteous, a term which denotes the unerring and the unswerving sense of justice of God, which is realized in the punishment of sin. The Divine holiness is not an element in an abstract conception of Deity: it is not a passive perfection, but an active attribute of a self-revealing and redeeming God. It follows that one side of this activity is necessarily a reaction against, a repudiation of, what is unholy and unrighteous, especially in the idolatries, are destitute of fire and sword, pestilence and famine (Ps 78, Dt 32:43). So 'jealous' is God for His holiness, that even accidental profanation of its symbol, the Ark, is visited by extreme penalty (1 Kgs 18, 2 Kgs 17:18). But the anger of the Lord through Berekiah, is also just: it is 'provoked' by moral causes and for moral ends, and is averted by penitence and moral acquiescence in the righteousness of his judgments (Ex 32, Lev 4:3, Nu 25, Dt 32:9). Psalmist and Prophet dwell upon the subordination of the Divine anger to the Divine mercy. God is slow to anger (Ps 103:14 15, Jb 20, Jon 4, Nah 1), and His anger passes away (Ps 89, Is 12, Jer 3, Mic 7:18). Yet the wrath of God remains an essential element of His revelation through the prophets, a real Divine attribute, complementary, not antithetic to the Divine mercy (Is 13:10 32:17 d32:19 54:1). In the NT, although the stress has shifted, to the love of God revealed to the world in Jesus Christ, the anger of God still holds place. The teaching of Jesus, while refusing to see in all physicalills the Divine displeasure against sin (Lk 19:41, Acts 9:13), is a real impression of the anger of God's judgmements (Lk 13:25, Mt 25:20-24, Lk 12). In St. Paul's writings this conception of judgment, held in reserve against unrepentant sin, is expressed in the phrase 'the wrath of God,' or, more simply, 'the wrath' (Col 3:5, Eph 5, Col 3:10). The NT translation 'day of wrath' (Ro 2, cf. Mt 3:1); sinful man unredeemed by Christ is necessarily a 'vessel of wrath,' a 'child of wrath' (Ro 2, Eph 2). It is true that the divine application to God's anger are mainly eschatological and contain figurative elements (see esp. Rev 6:14 'the wrath of the Lamb,' 11:14 11:16 19:5). But for the significance of the Divine wrath as an ethical necessity in God, though His fundamental attribute is love, it may be noted that (1) the writer through whom the revelation of the Divine love attains its culmination expression ('God is love,' 1 Jn 4:18) declares also of him that obeys not the Son, 'the wrath of God abideth on him' (Jn 3:34). (2) The Epistle which shows how in Christ the aloofness and terror of Israel's worship are done away in favour of full and free access to a 'throne of grace,' has, as the climax to its glowing description of Christian privilege, the solemn warning 'our God is a consuming fire' (He 12:28-29).

ANGEL.—Is 19:1, Hb Hl. The same Heb. word is translated 'book' in Joh 4:1.

ANIAM.—A man of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:1).

ANIM (Joe 1:10 only).—A city of Judah, in the mountains near Ezemnon. It seems probable that it is the present double ruin of Ghuwein, west of Ezemnon.

ANISE (RV 'dill,' Mt 23:23) is the familiar plant Anethum graveolens, one of the Umbelliferae. It is indigenous in Palestine, and is extensively used both in cooking and in the form of 'dill water' as a domestic remedy for flatulence. It is expressly stated in Jewish writers that the dill was subject to the following regulations.

ANNA (the Greek form of Heb. Hannah, which means 'grace').—The name of an aged prophetess (Lk 2:36), one of the godly remnant in Israel who in the dark days which preceded the Messiah's advent were looking for the day-spring from on high and waiting for the consolation of Israel. She was the daughter of Phanuel, and belonged to the ancient tribe of Asher, whose women were celebrated for their beauty, which fitted them for wedding with high priests and kings. She had attained a great age, upwards of a hundred years, since she had been a wife for seven years and a widow for eighty-four (see RV). She had given herself to a life of devotion, frequenting the house of prayer and 'her lips spake much wisdom' (Lk 2:36). At the Presentation of the Infant Messiah (Lk 2:25) she entered the sacred court, and, hearing Simon's benediction and prophecy, she took courage, and talked about the Holy Child to her godly intimates, quickening their hope and preparing a welcome for the Saviour when He should by and be manifested unto Israel.

DAVID SMITH.

ANNAS.—1. High priest from a.d. 6 to 15, an astute and powerful ecclesiastical statesman. At the time of our Lord's trial he was merely high priest emeritus, and his son-in-law Caiphas, the acting high priest, praised as officia over the meeting of the Sanhedrin (Jn 19:13, Mt 26:57). Nevertheless, since the high priest emeritus retained not only his title (cf. Jn 18:16, 18:11, 21, Ac 4), but all his obligations and many of his prerogatives, it is not surprising that the masterful Annas took an active and independent part in the proceedings. After Jesus' arrest at dead of night, 'they led him to Annas first' (Jn 18:13). The Sanhedrin might not meet until daybreak, and the interval seemed well employed in a preliminary examination of the prisoner by the skilful veteran (Jn 18:19-22). Subsequently he took part also in the trial of Peter and John (Ac 4:6). 2. 1 Es 9:29 Ezr 10:Harim.
ANNIS.—The eponym of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5''). Omitted in Ezr. and Neh.

ANNUS.—A Levi (1 Es 9''—Neh 8' Barni).

ANNUUS (1 Es 8'')—The name does not occur in Lk 1'9.

ANOINTING, ANOINTED.—1. The Hebrews distinguished between anointing with oil in the sense of its application to the body in ordinary life (sub), and anointing by pouring sacred oil on the head as a rite of consecration (mashech). As regards the former, olive oil alone or mixed with perfumes, was largely used in the everyday toilet of the Hebrews, although among the poor its use would be reserved for special occasions (Ru 30). To abstain from anointing in this sense was one of the signs of mourning (2 S 3''). Its result was a sign that mourning was at an end (12''). Honour was shown to a guest by anointing his head with oil (Ps 25'', Lk 7''), and still more by anointing his feet (Lk 7'') of God?

2. Anointing as a religious rite was applied to both persons and things. Kings in particular were consecrated for their high office by having oil poured upon their heads, a practice which seems to have originated in Egypt. Though first met with in OT in the case of Saul (1 S 10', cf. David, 2 S 2' 5', Solomon, 1 K 1'9'' etc.), the rite was practised in Canaan long before the Hebrews. By the pouring of sacred oil upon the head (see 2 K 9''), there was effected a transference to the person anointed of part of the essential holiness and virtue of the deity in whose name and person the representative of the rite was personified. By the Hebrews the rite was also believed to impart a special endowment of the spirit of J'' (1 S 16'4, cf. 1s 6'1''). Hence the sacrosanct character of the king as 'the Lord's anointed' (Heb. meshich [Yehoshaphat], which became in Greek Chrisan or translated, christes—both 'Messiah' and 'Christ,' therefore, signifying 'the anointed'). The application of this honoriaceous title to kings alone in the oldest literature makes it probable that the rite of consecration of the priestly race (Ex 29') 10'8'—13', Lv 8''—19'') was a later extension of the rite. Only one exceptional instance is recorded of the anointing of a prophet (1 K 19'—Is 6'1'' is metaphorical).

In the case of inanimate objects, we first early mention of the primitive and wide-spread custom of anointing sacred stones (Gn 28'4'' etc., see PILLAR), and in the Priests' Code the tabernacle and its furniture were similarly consecrated (Ex 39'6, 40'). For 2 S 2' 18'' see WAR. See also Mary. No. 2. A. R. S. Kennedy.

ANO.—A contraction for 'in one (moment),' 'anon' means at once, as Mt 13'0'' he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon (RV 'straightaway') with joy receiveth it.'

ANOS.—1 Es 9'4'—Vanish, Ex 10'8'.

ANSWER.—An answer is (1) an apology or defence, as 2 Ti 4'1'' 'at my first answer no man stood by me'; so perhaps 1 P 3'1'' 'the answer of a good conscience'; (2) oracle. Divine response, as Ro 11'4'' what saith the book of which we read?'

ANT (namidah. Arab. naimidah).—Ants are exceedingly abundant all over Palestine, where, through their vast numbers, they perform a most important rôle, by continually changing the surface soil in the way every farmer in northern countries. No more remarkable illustration of diligence (Pr 6'4'') could be found than these little insects, which, in all but the wettest weather, can be seen scurrying backwards and forwards on the long tracks they have made. Some common varieties of Palestine ants (Aphamogaster barbara, A. structor and Phedole megacephala) store up great quantities of various kinds of seeds, which they are, in some unknown way, able to germinate and make use of as food (Pr 30'9'). Whole troops of these little insects may be seen carrying seeds, often many times their own size and weight, from a distant garden or corn-field. The writer has even seen a procession of ants carrying their harvest under the thickness of a broad mud wall which covered the corn-field, and then anointed and frequented road. The stores of seeds so collected have been found so great that the Mishna laid down rules in regard to their ownership. If they were discovered before the field was reaped, they belonged to him, but if afterwards, they were all or in part for the poor. The sacriety of the ant in this and other respects is widely recognized both in Oriental lore—as in Pr 30'4''—and even more forcibly by our Lord (cf. Mt 13'1'—E. W. G. Masterman.

ANTELOPE (RV).—A doubtful translation of te'ot, Dt 14'' and Is 55'1''. Tradition, our only guide here, is in favour of 'ox' (ibid. sec). E. W. G. Masterman.

ANTHIOS.—A man of Benjamin (1 Ch 5'9').

ANTICHRIST.—The great opponent and counterpart of Christ, by whom he is finally to be conquered. The word appears only in the NT (1 Jn 218'4, 2 Jn 7'), but the idea was present in Judaism and developed with the growth of the Messianic hope.

The origin of the conception.—While the precise term 'Antichrist' is lacking in Jewish literature, the idea of an opponent who persecutes God's people and is ultimately to be conquered by the Messiah, is an integral part of that general hope, born in Prophecy, which developed into Messianism in the NT period. As in the case of so many elements of Messianism, the beginning of the 'opponent' idea may fairly be said to have been Do 11'8'' (cf. also Ezc 12'14'), where the reference is to Antiochus IV., but it would be a mistake to see in the Antichrist conception of the Johannean literature an unprecedented description of distinct personalities. There seems to have been rather a gradually developing anti-Messianism, which at many points duplicated the developing Messianic hope. This general conception, which played an important rôle in early Christianity, was probably due to the synthesis of at least five factors, each independent in origin.

(a) The historical opponents of the Jews, such as Antiochus iv., Pompey, and the Roman Empire in general (cf. the position of Gog in Prophectic thought). These naturally aroused the most intense hatred on the part of the Jews, particularly those under the influence of Pharisaism. Their hostility was regarded as extending not only to the Jews as a nation, but as heathen, to Jehovah himself, and particularly to His plans for the Jewish people. This political hatred of the Pharisees entered into the Antichrist expectation, just as their political hope went into the Messianic programme.

(b) The dualism of Babylonia and Persia, especially as it was expressed by the dragon, between whom and the agents of righteousness there was to be a fight to the death. This dragon conception may with much probability be seen not only in the identification of the serpent of the Temptation with the devil, but also in the beast of the Johannean Apocalypse, the great opponent of the Christ, and in the sea monster of Rabbinalism.

(c) The Beliar (or Belial) myth, which underlies the NT thought (cf. 2 Co 6'8'), as well as Jewish fears. The first reference to Beliar seems to have been in Jubilees 1'3, but the myth is not unlike that of the Babylonian Pitam, queen of the abyss, who was conquered by Marduk. Subsequently he was identified with Satan, who was also identified with the dragon (cf. Ascena. Is 46'4, Rev 12'9'). This identification was the first step towards the fully developed expectation of the Talmud, of a conflict between God and the devil.

(d) Belief in the return from death of the persecuting Emperor Nero.—This expectation seems to have been already diffused throughout the Roman world, and particularly to Palestine, the latter part of the first Christian century (Sib. Or. iv. 119—150, v. 363 ff.), and lies behind the figures of Rev 13.
ANTILIBANUS

16. and 17. He is apparently to return with the kings of Parthia, but he is also, in Rev 17:14-11, identified with the beast of the abyss (cf. Sib. Or. v. 28-34).

(e) The myth of Simon Magus and that of the false prophet.—This myth seems to have been common in Christian circles, and Simon Magus (wh. see) became the typical (Jewish) prophet and magician who opposed Christ and was cast into the sea by Him. See later.

2. Synthesis of the elements.—These various elements possess so much in common that it was inevitable that they should be combined in the figure of the Satanic opponent, whom in Christendom and the modern world they are to be pre-condition of establishing His Kingdom of God. A study of the Book of Revelation, as well as of other NT writings (e.g. 2 Th 2:1-13, 2 Co 6:1, 1 Jn 2:14-25, 4, 2 Jn, Rev 11:14-18 13:1-17, 19:1-5, Mt 24.1-25), will show that there was always present in the minds of the writers of the NT a superhuman figure, Satanic in power and character, who was to be the head of opposition both to the representatives of Christ and to the Christ Himself. This person is represented in Assumption of Moses (ch. 8), Ascension of Isaiah (ch. 4), as well as in other Jewish writings, as one who possessed the Satanic supremacy over the army of devils. He was not a general tendency, but a definite elliptical use of the concept (wh. see) of St. Paul (2 Th 2:3; see Man of Sin) and the various opponents of Christ in the Apocalypse. Transcendental pictures and current eschatology set forth the Christian idea on the one hand of the Roman Emperor or Empire as a persecuting power, and on the other of Jewish fanaticism. Just which historical persons were in the mind of the writers it is now impossible to say with any certainty...

In the Patristic period the eschatological aspects of the anti-Messianic hope were developed, but again as a mystical picture of historical conditions either existing of about to exist. The Seleucid Empire and its last remnants, the half of the Roman Empire attributed to Antichrist. He is also by the early Church writers sometimes identified with the formal Jewish Messiah, who was to work miracles, rebuild the Temple, and establish a great empire with demons at his service. Under the inspiration of the two Witnesses (Elijah and Enoch) the Messianic revolt against the Antichrist was to be begun, the Book of Revelation being interpreted literally at this point. The Temple was to be rebuilt, and the Five Mishes (Mt 24:10), and the Messiah was to slay Antichrist with the breath of His mouth, and establish the Judgment and the conditions of eternity.

Thus in Christian literature that fusion of the elements of the Antichrist idea which were present in Judaism and later Christianity is completed by the addition of the traits of the false prophet, and extended under the influence of the current polemical against Jewish Messianism. The figure of Antichrist, Satanic, Neronically, falsely prophetic, the enemy of God and His Kingdom, moves out into theological history, to be identified by successive ages with nearly every great opponent of the Church and its doctrines, whether persecutor or heretic.

ANTIOCH (Syrian).—By the issue of the battle of Ipsus, Seleucus Nikator (n.c. 312-280) secured the rule over most of Alexander the Great’s Asiatic empire, which stretched from the Halys river and the Mediterranean coast to the Tigris river on one side to the Jazartes and Indus on the other. The Seleucid dynasty, which he founded, lasted for 247 years. Possessed with a mania for building and claiming them after himself or his relatives, he founded no fewer than 37, of which 4 are mentioned in the NT—

(1) Antioch of Syria (Ac 11:9), (2) Seleucia (Ac 13:3), (3) Antioch of Pisidia (Ac 13:14, 2 Th 3:1), and (4) Laodicea (Col 4:16, Rev 11:8). The most famous of the 16 Antioches, which were built and populated by Seleucus’s father Antiochus, was Antioch on the Orontes in Syria. The spot was carefully chosen, and religious sanction given to it by the invention of a story that sacred birds had revealed the site while he was watching the site from a neighbouring eminence. It was politically advantageous that the seat of empire should be removed from the Euphrates valley to a locality nearer the Mediterranean.

The new city lay in the deep bottom of the Orontes, about 300 miles N. of Jerusalem. Though 14 miles from the sea, the navigable river Orontes, on whose left bank it was built, united it with Seleucia and its splendid harbour. Connected thus by the main trade routes with the commerce of Babylon, Persia, and India, and with a seaport keeping it in touch with the great world to the W., Antioch speedily fell heir to that vast trade which had once been the monopoly of Tyre. Its seaport Seleucia was a great fortress, like Gibraltar or Sebastopol. Seleucia attracted to his new capital thousands of Jews, by offering them equal rights of citizenship with all the other inhabitants. The citizens were divided into 18 wards, and each commune attended to its own municipal affairs.

His successor, Antiochus I., Soter (n.c. 280-261), introduced an abundant water supply into the city, so that it had its own well, and to a public spot its graceful fountain. He further strove to render Antioch the intellectual rival of Alexandria, by inviting to his court scholars, such as Aratus the astronomer, and by superintending the translation into Greek of learned works in foreign tongues. In this way the invaluable history of Babylon by Berossus, the Chaldean priest, has been rescued from oblivion. The succession of Seleucus and Antiochus was not of water, but of sons.

The Seleucidae and the Ptolemies are described in Dn 11. The fortunes of the war varied greatly. Under the next king but one, Seleucus II., Kallinikus (n.c. 246-226), Ptolemy Euergetes captured Seleucia, instanced raids with an Egyptian garrison in it, and harried the Seleucid empire as far as Susiana and Bactria, carrying off to Egypt an immense spoil. Worst of all, Kallinikus devoted himself to the embellishment of his royal city. As founded by S. Nikator, Antioch had consisted of a single quarter. Antiochus I., Soter, had added a second, but Kallinikus now included a third, by annexing to the city the island in the river and connecting it to the mainland by five bridges. In a single street the streets were all at right angles, and at the intersection of the two principal roads the way was spanned by a tetrastylos, a covered colonnade with four gates. The city was further adorned with costly temples, porticoes, and statues. But the most remarkable engineering feat begun in this reign was the excavation of the great dock at Seleucia, the building of the protecting mole, and the cutting of a canal inland through high masses of solid rock. The canal is successively a cutting and a tunnel, the parts open to the sky aggregating in all 1869 ft., in some places cut to the depth of 120 ft., while the portions excavated as tunnels (usually 24 ft. high) amount in all to 395 ft.

With Antiochus III., the Great (n.c. 283-187), the fortunes of the city revived. He drove out the Egyptian garrison from Seleucia, ended the Ptolemaic sovereignty over Judea, reduced all Palestine and nearly all Asia Minor to his sway. Until his death it was finally shattered by the Romans in the irretrievable defeat of Magnesia (n.c. 190). After the assassination of his son Seleucus IV., Philopator (n.c. 157-150), who was occupied mostly in repairing his father’s losses, his kingdom had yet remained, the brilliant but wholly unprincipled youth Antiochus IV., Epiphanes (n.c. 175-164), succeeded to the throne. With the buffoonery of a Caligula and the vice of a Nero, he united the genius for architecture and Greek culture which he inherited from his race. In his dreams Antioch ANTIOCH was to be a metropolis, second to none for beauty, and Greek art and Greek religion were to be the uniform rule throughout all his dominions. To the three quarters already existing he added a fourth, which earned for Antioch the title 'Tetrapolis.' Here he reared a 'Fragrant House,' a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on one of the eminences of Mt. Sibyllus, and a strong citadel on another spur of the mountains that surround the city. From here in the double colonnades that he laid out, a splendid course of double colonnades, which ran for 5 miles in a straight line. In wet weather the populace could walk from east to west over the city, and was named the Charonion. Epiphanes' policy of Hellenizing Palestine evoked the determined opposition of the Maccabeans, and in the wars which ensued his forces suffered many defeats, though the injuries and atrocities he committed in Jerusalem were unspoken. With Antiochus Epiphanes died the grandeur of the Syrian throne.

The succeeding princes exercised only a very moderate influence over the fortunes of Palestine, and the palmy days of Antioch as a centre of political power were gone for ever. The city was the scene of many a bloody conflict: in the years of the later Seleucids, as usurper after usurper tried to wipe through blood to the throne, and was shortly after overcome by some rival. In several of these struggles the Jews took part, and as the power of Antioch waned, the struggle was practical, and the independence of the Jewish Hasmoncean princes increased. In 31 B.C. all Syria passed into the hands of Tigranes, king of Armenia, who remained master of Antioch for 14 years. Pompey put an end to the Seleucid dynasty, and the line of Antiochene monarchs expired in B.C. 65. The strong P za Romana gave new vigour to the city. Antioch was made a free city, and became the seat of the prefect and the capital of the Roman province of Syria. Mark Antony ordered the release of all the Jews in its enclaves during the recent disturbances, and the restoration of their property. As a reward for Antioch's fidelity to him, Julius Caesar built a splendid basilica, the Casarea, and gave, besides, a new aqueduct, theatre, and public baths. Augustus, Agrippa, Herod the Great, Tiberius, and, later, Antoninus Pius, all greatly embellished the city, contributing many new and striking architectural features. The ancient walls were rebuilt to the height of 60–80 ft., with a thickness at the top of 8 ft., and surrounded by gigantic towers. The vaulted street was carried across ravines up the mountain slope to the very summit of the hills which overlook the city. Antioch seemed thus to be defended by a mountainaul bulwark, 7 miles in circuit. Earthquakes have in later ages demolished these walls, though some of the Roman castles are still standing.

When Christianity reached Antioch, it was a great city of over 600,000 inhabitants, called the 'Queen of the East,' the 'Third Metropolis of the Roman Empire.' In 'Antioch the Beautiful' there was to be found everything which Italian wealth, Greek aestheticism, and Oriental luxury could produce. The ancient writers, however, are unanimous in describing the city as one of the foulest and most depraved in the world. The cosmopolitan in disposition, the citizens acted as if they were emancipated from every law, human or Divine, licentiousness, superstition, quackery, indecency, every fierce and base passion, were displayed by the populace; their skill in coining scurrilous verses was notorious, their sordid, licentious, and insolent ways rendered the name of Antioch a byword for all that was wicked. The brilliancy and energy, so praised by Cicero, were balanced by an incurable levity and shameless disregard for the first principles of morality. So infamous was the grove of Daphne, five miles out of the city, filled with shrines to Apollo, Venus, Isis, etc., and crowded with theatres, baths, taverns, and bazaars, that soldiers detected there were punished and dismissed the Imperial service. 'Daphnic morale' became a proverb. Juvenal could find no more forcible way of describing the pollutions of Rome than that soldiers detected there.

In this Vanity Fair the Jews were resident in large numbers, yet they exerted little or no influence on the morals of the city. We hear, however, that the Jews, and in particular, the Jerusalems, were respectable residents of Antioch. There they continued a year, and built up a strong Church. Antioch had the honour of being the birthplace of (1) the name 'Christian' (A.D. 118), and (2) of foreign missions. From this city Paul and Barnabas started on their first missionary journey (A.D. 4), and to Antioch they returned at the close of the tour (A.D. 14). The second journey began from and ended at Antioch (A.D. 135–140); and the city was again the starting-point of the third tour (A.D. 189). The Antiochene Church contributed largely to the poor saints in Jerusalem, and earned the title of the 'Church of the Gentiles.' Here also the dispute regarding the circumcision of Gentiles converts broke out (A.D. 142), and there Paul withheld Peter for his inconsistency (Gal 2:12). After the fall of Jerusalem, Antioch became the true centre of Christianity. A gate still bears the name of 'St. Paul's Gate.' It was from Antioch that Ignatius set out on his march to martyrdom at Rome.

This city claimed the name Ammanius Maredsulis, Evagrius, and Libanius. From A.D. 252–380 Antioch was the scene of ten Church Councils. The Fraternal of Antioch took precedence of those of Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. Antioch was captured in A.D. 260 by Sapor of Persia; in A.D. 538 it was burned by Chosroes; rebuilt by Justinian, it again fell before the Saracens in A.D. 636. Nicephorus Phocas recovered it in A.D. 900, but in A.D. 1084 it fell to the Seljuk Turks. The first Crusaders retook it in 1098 after a celebrated siege, signalled by the 'invention of the Holy Lance'; but in 1268 it passed finally into the hands of the Turks. Earthquakes have added to the ruin of the city. Those of A.D. 134, A.D. 37, 115, 457, and esp. 526 (when 300,000 persons perished), 526, 1170, and 1872 have been the most disastrous. The once prosperous city has shrunk into a small, ignoble, and dirty town of 6,000 inhabitants, still, however, bearing the name of Antaki (Turkish) or Antakiyah (Arabic). It is again the centre of a Christian mission, and the Church of Antioch, as of old, is seeking to enlighten the surrounding darkness.

ANTIOCH (Pisidian).—The expression 'Antioch of Pisidia' or 'Antioch in Pisidia' is incorrect, as the town was not in Pisidia. Its official title was 'Antioch near Pisidia,' and as it existed for the sake of Pisidia, the adjective 'Pisidian' was sometimes loosely attached to it. It was actually in the ethnic district of Phrygia, and in the Roman province of Galatia (that region of Asia Minor known as Phrygia Galatia). Founded by the inhabitants of Magnesia, it was made a free town by the Romans, and a colonia was established there by the emperor Augustus to keep the barbarians of the neighbourhood in check. The municipal government became Roman, and the official language Latin. St. Paul visited it four times (Acts 13:14 14:16 17:18), and it is one of the churches addressed in the Epistle to the Galatians.

ANTIOCHIANS

ANTIOCHIANS (2 Mac 4: 11).—The efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to spread Gr. culture and Gr. customs throughout his dominions were diligently furthered by a section of the Jews. The leader of this Hellenizing party, Jason, brother of the high priest Onias iii., offered a large sum of money to Antiochus to induce the king to allow the inhabitants of Jerusalem 'to be enrolled as Antiochians.' Antiochus acceded to the proposal, and shortly afterwards a party of 'Antiochians' from Jerusalem was sent by him with a contribution of money for the festival of Heracles at Tyre.

ANTIOCHUS (2 Mac 4: 40).—A concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who assigned to her the revenues of the two Olidan cities, Tarsus and Mallus.

ANTIOCHUS (1 Mac 12: 14; cf. Jos. Ant. xiii. v. 8).—The father of Numinus, who was one of the envoys sent (c. B.C. 144) by Jonathan the Maccabees to renew the covenant made by Judas with the Romans, and to enter into friendly relations with the Spartans.

ANTIOCHUS.—A name borne by a number of the kings of Syria subsequent to the period of Alexander the Great.

1. Antiochus I. (c. 280–261) was the son of Seleucus Nicator, through whose house he was named. Immediately after the death of Alexander. On the murder of his father he came into possession of practically the entire region of Asia Minor as far east as the provinces beyond Mesopotamia. The most important event of his reign was his defeat of the Celts, who, after devastating Macedonia and Thrace, swarmed into Asia Minor and established a kingdom which was subsequently known as Galatia. The date and place of the victory are unknown, but it won him the name of Soter ('Saviour'). His capital was Antioch in Syria, but he was never able to bring his vast empire into complete subjection. He was a friend of literature and art, and it is possible that under him the beginning was made for the Greek translation of the Pentateuch.

2. Antiochus II., Theos (c. 261–246).—Son of the foregoing, essentially a warrior, carrying on interminable struggles both with the free Greek cities of his own territory, to which he finally gave something like democratic rights, and with Ptolemy Philadephos of Egypt. Under him, however, the Jews of Asia Minor gained many civic rights.

3. Antiochus III., the Great. —He ascended the throne when only 15 years of age, and he reigned from C. B.C. 223 to 187. Along with Antiochus I. and Antiochus II. he is known as Antiochus the Great. His reign, like that of most of his contemporaries, was one of constant war, particularly with Egypt. In the course of these wars he gained possession of Palestine through his occupation of Babylonia (B.C. 198), and established the Syrian administration over Judaea, although for a time he ruled the province jointly with Ptolemy Philadephos of Egypt. Like Antiochus I., he was a great colonizer, and induced 2000 Jewish families to go from Mesopotamia to Lydia and Phrygia, thus laying the foundation for the influential Jewish Dispersion in those regions. So warlike a monarch could not fail to come into conflict sooner or later with Rome. He was defeated in the battle of Magnesia in B.C. 190, and three years later was killed, according to some authorities, while plundering a temple at Elymais.

4. Antiochus IV., Epiphanes ('the Illustrious'), also known as Antiochus the Godly. —The son of the preceding, who had been sent as a hostage to Rome. In B.C. 175 he seized the Syrian throne, and began a series of conquests which bade fair to rival his father's. While he was in power in Egypt, however, he was deposed by the Romans to leave that country, and thus found himself forced to limit his energies to Syria. In the course of his conflict with Egypt he had become suspicious of Judaea, and determined to force that country into complete subjection to his will. His motives were probably more political than religious, but as a part of his programme he undertook to compel the Jews to worship heathen gods as well as, if not in place of, Jehovah. His plans were first put into active operation, probably towards the end of B.C. 170, when he returned from Egypt, although the chronology at this point is very obscure and it may have been a couple of years later. He plundered the Temple of some of its treasures, including the seven-branched candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table of shewbread. He also placed a garrison in the citadel of Jerusalem, and set about the complete Hellenizing of Judaea. Circumcision and the observance of the Sabbath were at the detention of penalty of death. Pagan sacrifices were ordered in every town in Judaea, and every month a search was made to discover whether any Jew possessed a copy of the law or had circumcised his children. In December 168 n.c. a pagan altar, probably to Olympian Zeus, was erected on the altar of burnt-offering, and the entire Jewish worship seemed threatened with extinction. This probability was increased by the apostasy of the high priests.

This excess of zeal on the part of Antiochus led to the reaction, which, under the Chastisim and Maccathias, the founder of the Maccabees, ultimately brought about the release of Judas from Syrian control. The events of this period of persecution are related in detail, though with a large element of legend,—in 2 Maccabees, and reference is to be found to them in 1 Macc. 11n. Antiochus finally died on an expedition against the Parthians in B.C. 164. (For an account of the struggle of Mattathias and Judas against Antiochus, see Maccabees.)

5. Antiochus V., Eupator. —Son of the preceding; began to reign at the death of his father, when a mere boy of 9 (or 12) years. He was left by his father under the control of Lydas, his chief representative in Palestine, and with him were left the questions about the release of Judas from Syrian control. The events of this period of persecution are related in detail, though with a large element of legend,—in 2 Maccabees, and reference is to be found to them in 1 Macc. 11n. Beth-zarahs, n.c. 165, when Judas Maccabaeus was defeated (1 Mac 8: 42–44). The complete conquest of Judaea was prevented by the rise of the pretender Philicus, who, however, was conquered. In the midst of their success, both young Antiochus and Lydas were assassinated by Demetrius i. n.c. 162). Their death reacted favourably on the circumstances surrounding the rising Maccabean house.

6. Antiochus VI., —Son of Alexander Balas. Trypho, one of the generals of Alexander Balas, at first championed the cause of this boy after his father had been killed in Asia. After a few months Trypho died, and the assassination of Antiochus by the physicians of the court, and reigned in his stead (1 Mac 13: 11).

7. Antiochus VII., Soteres (n.c. 138–128), the last of the emergent Syrian monarchs, came to the throne during the imprisonment of Demetrius ii. After defeating Trypho, he undertook to establish his sovereignty over the Jews. Simon partially won his favour by presents and by furnishing auxiliary troops, but at last refused to meet his excessive demands for permitting such independence as Judaea had come to enjoy under the weak predecessor of Antiochus. Thereupon Antiochus sent his generals into Judaea, but they were defeated by the sons of Simon (1 Mac 15: 16). He himself came during the first year of John Hyrcanus (135–134), and after devastating Judaea shut up Hyrcanus in Jerusalem. He was about to capture the city through starvation when he unexpectedly made an attack upon Hyrcanus, probably because of the interference of the Romans. These terms laid very heavy demands upon the Jews, and included the destruction of the fortifications of the city. Until n.c. 129–128 Judas then again subject to the Syrian State, but at the end of that year Antiochus was killed in a campaign against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus was enabled to reassert his independence. See Maccabees.

ANTIPAS

ANTIPAS.—1. See Herod, No. 3. —2. A martyr of the church of Pergamum, mentioned only in Rev 2:12, unless some credit is to be given to the late accounts of his martyrdom. According to these, he was roasted to death in a brazen bowl in the days of Domitian. Cures of toothache were believed to be accomplished at his tomb. Shailer Matthews.

ANTIPATER.—Son of Jason, one of two ambassadors sent by Jonathan to the Romans and to the Spanians to renew the ‘friendship and the confederacy’ (1 Mac 12:14-14).

ANTIPATRIS.—Hither St. Paul was conducted by night on the way from Jerusalem to Caesarea (Ac 23:31). It was founded by Herod the Great, and probably stood at the head of the river ‘Aujeh (now Rks el-A'ajeh). Here are the remains of a large castle of the Crusaders, probably to be identified with Mzrabel.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ANTONIA.—See Jerusalem.

ANUB.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4:4).

ANYL.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 2.

APACE in AV means ‘at a quick pace,’ as Ps 68:5, ‘kings of armies did flee space.’

APAME.—Daughter of Bartacus, and concubine of Darius I. (1 Es 2:9).

APE.—Ape was imported along with peacocks from Opis by Solomon (1 K 10:22; 2 Ch 9:22). In importing monkeys, Solomon here imitated the custom of the Assyrian and Egyptian monarchs, as we now know by the monuments. No kind of monkey is indigenous in Palestine. E. W. G. Masternak.

APELLES.—The name of a Christian who is said to have been in the house of St. Paul in Ro 16:6, and who is described as the ‘approved in Christ.’ It was the name borne by a distinguished tragic actor, and by members of the household.

APELERA (1 Mac 11:21).—A district taken from Samaria and added to Judea by Demetrius Soter (Ant. xiii. iv. 9). See Ephraim, No. 1.

APHARSACHITES.—See next article.

APHARSACHITES (probably the same as the Apharsachites, Ezr 5:69).—A colony of the Assyrians in Samaria; an eastern people subject to the Assyrians.

APHARSITES (Ezr 4:9).—One of the nations transported to Samaria by the Assyrians. Otherwise unknown. The text is doubtful.

APPIAN.—1. An unidentified city in the plain of Sharon (Jos 13:21). It may be the same as Aphek of the oracles of Solomon (1 K 10:22) with No. 1, 2. A city which Asher failed to take (Jos 13:21, 19, 11). It may be the bet of the same name, on Nahor Israfil, 3. Some authorities identify this (1 S 29:9) with No. 1, and make the Philistines advance upon it to join the S. W. But if they approached from Shunem (29:9), Aphek must have been in Edom, the possibilities may be. In the neighbourhood of the Bet, the place where Ahab defeated Benhadad (1 K 20:19, 20), in the Mhesor, probably the modern Fig, or El, on the brow of the plateau, overlooking the Sea of Galilee. Possibly Joshua smote the Syrians here (2 K 13:172). W. Ewing.

APPAKH (Jos 15:9).—Probably same as Aphek. 1.

APPERA (1 Es 5:4).—His descendants were among the sons of Solomon’s servants who returned with Zerubbabel omitted in the parallel lists (Ezr. and Neh.).

APPIH.—A city of Asher (Jg 12:31), the same as Aphek. 2.

APPHAR.—See BETH-LE-APHRAH.

APOLCALYPTIC.—See REVELATION [BOOK OF].

APOLCALYPTIC LITERATURE. — The apocalypse as a literary form of Jewish literature first appears during the Hellenistic period. Its origin is to a considerable degree in dispute, but is involved in the general development of the period. Among the Hebrews its forerunner was the description of the Day of Jehovah. On that day, the prophets taught, Jehovah was to punish the enemies of Israel and to establish His people as a world power. In the course of this conception was supplemented by the further expectation of a judgment of the nations, by a Device of wisdom (Am 2:9-10, 12-15 Zec 14:1-4 21-11, J 24-25, Ezk 394). The first approach to the apocalyptic method is probably to be seen in Zec 9-14. It was in the same period that the tendencies towards the aesthetic conception which had been in apted, from the Hellenistic exile were beginning to be realized under the influence of the Hellenistic culture. Because of their religion, literature was the only form of aesthetic expression (certain music) which had been allowed to the Jews. In the apocalypse we thus can see a union of the symbolisms and myths of Babylonia with the religious faith of the Jews, under the influence of the Hellenistic culture. By its very origin it was the literary means of setting forth by the use of symbols the certainty of Divine judgment and the equal certainty of Divine deliverance. The symbols are usually animals of various sorts, but frequently composite creatures whose various parts represented certain qualities of the animals from which they were derived.

Apocalyptic is akin to prophecy. Its purpose was to prophesy in a new manner to the people that the times were to be times of great trial and suffering, and that the future was due to be revealed by the inexpressible events that were to befall the world. (a) The prophet, standing a take a standing present, so interprets current history as to disclose Divine forces at work therein, and the inevitable outcome of a certain course of events. The words of the apocalypticist are, for the most part, those of those who were in distress, by ‘revealing’ the future. Between genuine propheticism and apocalyptic there existed, however, certain differences not always easy to formulate, and appreciable to students of the Bible as a whole. (c) Prophecy made use of symbol in literature as a means of enforcing or making intelligible its Divinely inspired message. The apocalyptists employed allegorically an elaboration of the time of the end, chief among which were sheep, bulls, birds, as well as mythological beings like Beliar and the Antichrist. The parent of apocalyptic is the book of Daniel, and the apotheosis of the Book of Daniel in the Maccabean period (see Daniel [BK. OP]). From the time of this book until the end of the 1st cent. A.D., and indeed even later, we find a continuous stream of apocalypses, each marked by a strange combination of pessimism as to the present and hope as to the future yet to be miraculously established. These works are the output of one phase of Pharisaism, which, while elevating both Torah and Oral Law, was not content with bald legalism, but dared to trust in the realization of its religious hopes. The authors of the various works were utterly unknown. In this, as in other respects, the apocalypses constitute a unique national literature. Chief among apocalyptic literature are the following:

1. The Epigraphical Text. — The Enocic Apocalypse is a collection of apocalypses and other material written during the last... two centuries before Christ. It was probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic, and then translated into Greek, and from that into Ethiopic and Latin. As it now exists, the collection is a survival of a wide-spread Enoch literature, and its constituent sections have been to a considerable extent edited by both Jews and Christians.

Critics, while varying as to details, are fairly well agreed as to the main component sources, each possibly representing a different author or school.

(i.) The original ground-work of the present book is to be found in chs. 1-36 and 72-104, in the midst of which are, however, numerous detours and variations (see iv. below). These chapters were probably written before B.C. 100. Chs. 1-36 deal chiefly with the portrayal of the punishment to be awarded in the Day of Judgments. The eschatology of these chapters is somewhat sensuous as regards both the resurrection and rewards and punishments. In them we have probably the oldest piece of Jewish literature touching the general resurrection of Israel and representing Gehenna as a place of final punishment (see Gehenna).

The dream visions (chs. 83-90) were probably written in the time of Judas Maccabaeus or John Hyrcanus. By the use of symbolic animals, sheep, rams, wild beasts—Hebrew history is traced to the days of the Haemonian revolt. The years of misery are represented by a flock under the care of the shepherds, who, in the new age about to dawn, are to be cast with the evil men and angels into an abode of darkness. The Messiah is to appear, although his function is not definitely described. In ch. 91 the future is somewhat more transcendentally described. In these chapters of this oldest section the new eschatology is more apparent. In them are to be found representations of the sleep of the righteous, the resurrection of the spirit of the world, the thousand years, the Messiah, the Day of Judgment, and the punishment of the wicked in hell.

(ii.) It is either the second or the second group of chapters (37-71), or the Similitudes, is post-Christian. We have been thoroughly discussed. The general consensus of recent critics, however, is that it was written to a greater extent than the second group between B.C. 94 and 64: at all events, before the time of Herod. The most remarkable characteristic of these Similitudes is the imagery of the Son of Man in the Messiah. But it is not possible to see in the use of this term any reference to the historical Jesus. More likely it marks a stage in the development of the term from the general symbolic usage of Dn 7, which exactly represents the NT. In the Similitudes we find described the judgment of all men, both alive and dead, as well as of angels. Yet the future is still to some extent sensuous, although transcendental influences are very evident in the second section. The Messiah personifies the world and is more than human. The share which he has in the reorganisation of the world is more prominent in the older sections.

(iii.) Interspersed throughout the book are sections which Charles calls "the book of celestial physics." These sections are the curiousities of scientific nature, which may be taken as a fair representative of the astronomical and meteorological beliefs of the Palestinian Jews about the time of Herod.

(iv.) Interpretations from the so-called Book of Noah, which are very largely the work of the last part of the pre-Christian era, although it is not possible to state accurately the date of their composition.

The Importance of Enoch is great for the understanding of the eschatology of the NT and the methods of apocalyptic.

(b) The (Slavonic) Secrets of Enoch probably had a pre-Christian origin, and further, presupposes the existence of the Ethiopic Enoch. It could not, therefore, have been written much prior to the time of Herod, and as the Temple is still standing, must have been written before A.D. 70. The author (or authors) was probably a Hellenistic Jew living in the first half of the 1st cent. A.D. The book is particularly interesting in that in it is to be found the first reference to the millennium (xxi. 2—xxiii. 2), which is derived from a combination of the seven creative days and Ps 90. At this time, the history and life cycle, of the world, the Sabbath of the thousand years, was to begin. The Secrets of Enoch is a highly developed picture of the coming age and of the structure of the heavenly, which, it holds, is seven-fold. Here, too, are the judgment, though of individuals rather than of nations, the two sons, the complete renovation or destruction of the earth. There is no mention of a resurrection, and the righteous are upon death to go immediately to Paradise.

The Book of Enoch is a Hellenistic commentary on Genesis, and was probably written in the Maccabean period, although its date is exceedingly uncertain, and may possibly be placed in the latter half of the 1st cent. A.D. Theology and dogma have been developed. While there is no mention of the Messiah, the members of the Messianic age to live a thousand years, and are to be free from the influence or control of Sin. The book teaches that evil, and in place of sin and Satan.

The 'new age' was to be inaugurated by wide-spread study of the Law, to which the Jews would be forced by terrible suffering. Certain passages would seem to imply a resurrection of the dead and a renewing of all creation along with the endless punishment of the wicked.

3. The Psalms of Solomon—a group of noble songs, written by a Pharisee (or Pharisees) probably between B.C. 70 and 40, the dates being fixed by references to the Persian conquest of Jerusalem and the destruction of Jerusalem (Ps-B Sol ii. 30, 31). The collection is primarily a justification of the downfall of the Maccabean house because of its sins. Its author (or authors) was opposed to monachism as such, and looked forward to the time when the Messiah would really be king of Judea. The picture of this king as set forth in Psalms xvi—viii is one of the noblest in Jewish literature. He is to be sinless, strong through the Holy Spirit, gaining his wisdom from God, conquering the entire heathen world without war, 'by the word of his mouth,' and to establish the capital of the world at Jerusalem. All the members of the new kingdom, which, like the Messiah, are miraculous, are to be 'sons of God.' These two Psalms are not of a kind with the ordinary apocalyptic literature like the Enoch literature, and probably represent a tendency more religious than apocalyptic. At the same time, the influence of the apocalyptic is not wanting in them.

The Assumption of Moses was probably written in the opening years of the 1st cent. A.D., and narrates in terms of prophecy the history of the world from the time of Moses until the time of its composition, ending in an eschatological picture of the future. As it now stands, the writing is hardly more than a fragment of a much larger work, and exists only in an old Latin translation. The most striking characteristic is the importance given to Satan as the opponent of God, as well as the rather elaborate portrayal of the end of the world it narrates. The Judgment is to be extended to the Gentiles, and no Messiah is mentioned, the Messianic kingdom rather than He being central. Further, the writer, evidently in fear of the many tendencies among his people, says distinctly that God alone is to be judge of the Gentiles.

6. The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs is a composite work purporting to preserve the last words of the twelve sons of Jacob. It was probably written during the first two centuries of the Christian era, although some of its material may be earlier. As it now stands, it is full of Christian interpolations, and it has little apocalyptic material, being rather of the nature of homilies illustrated with much legendary matter, including eschatological pictures and references to demons and their king Beliar. The new age is not distinctly described, but apparently involves only earthly relationships. God's judgment on wicked men and demons is, however, elaborately pictured, sometimes in terms hard to reconcile with the less transcendental accounts of the blessings assuring to the Jewish nation. Each of the patriarchs is represented as dealing with that particular virtue or vice with which the Biblical account associates him, and also as foretelling appropriate blessings presently to the latter part of the 1st. The Apocryphon literature, however, was common in the 1st cent., and the book is a valuable monument of the eschatological tendencies and beliefs of the early Christians. Particularly important is it as throwing light upon the development of the Antichristian doctrines.

6. The Ascension of Isaiah is a composite book which circulated largely among the Christian heretics of the 3rd century. At its basis lies a group of legends of uncertain origin, dealing with the Antichrist and Beliar. These in turn are identified with the expectation that Nero would return after death. The book, therefore, in its present shape is probably of Christian origin. It is the prominent Christian group of apocryphal literature.

7. The Apocalypse of Ezra (Second Esdras), written about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. It is the most complete expression of Pharisaic pessimism. Written in the midst of national misfortune, it is not possible to see any relief except in the creation of a new world. The age was coming to an end, and the new age which was to belong to Israel would presently come. The ugliest aspect of the enemies was beinguisine, but not until the number of the righteous was complete. The book is no doubt closely related to the Apocalypse of Baruch, and both apparently reproduce the same original material. It has been considerably affected by Hebrew influence because of its emphasis on generic human misery and sin, with the consequent need of something more than a merely national deliverance, it gives a prominent position to the Messiah, who is represented as coming. As Second Esdras the book has become part of the Apocrypha of the OT, and has had considerable influence in the formation of Christian eschatology.

8. The Apocalypse of Baruch is a composite work which embodies in itself a ground-work which is distinctly Jewish, and certain sections of which were probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem. Criticism, however, has not arrived at any complete consensus of opinion as regards its composition, but there can be little doubt that it represents the same apocalyptic tendencies and much of the material which are to be seen in Second Esdras. Just what are the relations between the two writings, however, has not yet been clearly shown. The probability is that the Apocalypse of Baruch, as it now stands, was written in the second half of the 1st cent. A.D., and has come under the influence of Christianity (see esp. chs. xlii-xlii). Like Second Esdras, it is marked by a despair of the existing age, and looks forward to a transcendental reign of the Messiah, in which the Jews are to be supremely fortunate. It exists to-day in Greek and Syriac versions, with a strong probability that both are derived from original Hebrew writing. This apocalypse, both from its probable origin and general characteristics, is of particular value as a document for understanding the NT literature. In both the Apocalypse of Baruch and Second Esdras we have the most systematized apocalyptic picture that has come down to us from Pharisaism.

9. The Sybiline Oracles are the most important illustration of the extra-Palestinian-Hellenistic apocalyptic hope. As the name indicates, it is a collection of various writings dealing with the historical and future conditions of the Jewish people. The most important apocalyptic section is in Book iii., 97–858, in which the punishment of the enemies of the Jews is elaborately foretold. They also foretell the future and the Messianic Judgment. This book was probably edited in the middle of the 2nd century by a Christian. In general, however, this Sybiline literature, with its numerous interpolations, is not such a distinct picture of the future as those to be found in the Ezra-Baruch apocalypses.

APOCRYPHA.—The term 'Apocrypha' is applied to a body of literature that has come down to us in close connexion with the canonical books of the Bible, and is not of them. This term (Gr. ἀποκρύφα, 'hidden') is used to specify certain books or writings that were purposely hidden from general public contact, either because of their supposed sacredness, or to retain within the precincts of a certain sect the type or version of a common literary or religious work, the contents of which were not sufficient of themselves to carry the books over into the canonical collection of the Bible. The term applied to them as 'apocryphal,' that is, withheld from public gaze and use, was at first rather complimentary to their character. But their rejection by the Jewish and Palestinian body of worshippers, as well as by the larger proportion of the early Church, gradually stamped the name 'apocryphal' as a term of reproach, indicating inferiority in content and a spurious sort of orthodoxy. Henceforth such books lost their early sacredness, and became embodied in a collection that remained entirely outside the Hebrew Bible, though in general found in the Septuagint and the Vulgate.

The word 'Apocrypha,' as used by Protestant Christians, signifies the books found in the Latin Vulgate as over and above those of the Hebrew OT. Jerome incorporated in his revision and translation, in the main as he found them in the Old Latin Version, certain books not found in the Hebrew canonical writings. These books had been carried over into the Old Latin from the Septuagint.

The real external differences, then, between the Protestant and Rom. Cath. Bibles to-day are to be traced to the different ideas of the Canon on the part of the Jews of Palestine, where the Hebrew Bible was on its native soil, and on the part of the Jews of Alexandria who translated that same Hebrew Bible into Greek. With this translation, and other books later called the Apocrypha, they constructed a Greek Bible now called the Septuagint (the Seventy).

In the transfer of the works from the Septuagint to the Old Latin and to the Vulgate, there is some confusion both as to their names and their order. These so-called Apocryphal books may be roughly classified as follows:

1. Historical: First and Second Maccabees, and First Esdras [Third Esdras in Vulgate].
3. Prophetic: Baruch (ch. 6 being the 'Epistle of Jeremy'), Prayer of Manasseh.
APOCYPHNA

5. Didactic: Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon

In some classifications Third and Fourth Maccabees are included.

Most of these books are found in their original form in Greek, with the exceptions noted below, and not in the Hebrew; therefore the Jewish religious leaders did not regard them as inspired. Furthermore, some of their writers (1 Mac 4:6 9, 2 Mac 2:28) disclaim inspiration as the Jews of Mustood it. The NT writers do not quote these books, nor do they definitely refer to them. Their existence in the Greek Bible of the times of Christ does not seem to have given them any prestige among the Jewish authorities of that day. The Church Fathers made some use of them, by quotation and allusion, but were not so emphatic in their favour as to secure their incorporation in the regular canonical books of the Bible.

Jerome, in his revision of the Old Latin Bible, found the Apocryphal books therein, as carried over from the Septuagint; but in his translation of the OT he was careful not to include in the OT proper any books not found in the Hebrew Canon. In fact, he regarded his time as too valuable to be spent in revising or translating these uninspired books.

Until the Council of Trent, April 15, 1546, that the Roman Catholic Church publicly set its seal of authority on eleven of the fourteen or sixteen (including 3 and 4 Mac.) Apocryphal books. This Council names as canonical the following books and parts of books: First and Second Maccabees, Additions to Esther, History of Susanna, Song of the Three Holy Children, Bel and the Dragon, Tobit, Judith, Baruch, Sirach, and Wisdom of Solomon; omitting from the ancient Jewish tradition of the and Fourth Esdras (Vulgate Third and Fourth Esdras).

The Council of Trent settled the Canon of Scripture for the Roman Catholic Church, and decreed an anathema against any one who did not agree with its statement. Even before the meeting of that famous Council, Coverdale, in 1535, had introduced the Apocrypha into the English Bible edited by himself. It was published in the first edition of the AV in 1611, but began to be left out as early as 1629. It was inserted between the OT and NT. As a result of a controversy in 1826, it was excluded from all the Bibles published by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

In our discussion of the character and contents of these books, we must keep in mind the fact that the word 'Apocrypha' is used in the Protestant sense as inclusive of the fourteen books given in the RV of 1895, eleven of which are regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic Church.

The general character and the contents of these books are as follows:

1. First Maccabees. This is a historical work of rare value on the Jewish war of independence against the encroachments and invasions of Antiochus Epiphanes (n.c. 168-164). Its author is unknown, though thought to have been a Jew of Palestine, who wrote between n.c. 105 and 64. The book is known in a Greek original, though it was translated, according to Jerome, from a Hebrew original that was current in his day (end of 4th cent.).

2. Second Maccabees is an abridgment of a five-volume work by Jason of Cyrene (2nd). It is prefaced by two letters said to have been sent from the Jews of Jerusalem to the Jews of Egypt. This book deals with the history of the Jews from the reign of Seleucus V. (n.c. 175) to the death of Nicanor (n.c. 161). The multiplication of the marvellous and miraculous in the narrative disproves the value of the material as a source of historical data. The book was written somewhere between n.c. 125 and the fall of Jerusalem in n.c. 70. It is extant in Greek.

3. First Esdras (Third in the Vulgate) is the canonical book of Ezra in Greek, which in reconstructed form tells the story of the decline and fall of the nation of Judah from the time of Josiah. It recites the overthrow of Jerusalem, the Babylonian exile, the return of Nehemiah, the return of the house of Judah, and Ezra's part in the reorganization of the Jewish State. Jerome refers to the canon open regarding the three courtiers contained in this book.

4. Additions to Esther.—The canonical Esther concludes with 10:3; this chapter is filled out by the addition of seven verses, and the book concludes with six additional chapters (11-16). The regular text of the book is occasionally interposed and amplified by some writer or writers, to give the story a fuller narrative and make the telling of it more effective. These additions sometimes contradict the Hebrew, and add nothing of any value. This editorial work is thought to have been done by an Egyptian Jew somewhere in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (n.c. 161-145).

5. The History of Susanna is an account of Daniel's discovery of a malicious slander against the good woman Susanna. The story is prefixed to the book of Daniel. It is found in the Greek, and was prepared by an unknown author at an unknown date.

6. The Song of the Three Holy Children is found inserted between v.21 and v.24 of Dn 3. Its author and date are unknown.

7. The Story of Bel and the Dragon follows Dn 12. It is a proof by Daniel that the priests of Bel and their families ate the food set before the idol. Daniel slays the dragon, and is a second time thrown into the lions' den. The origin of this story is unknown, though it is thought to have been attributed to the Hebrew version of the Greek apocrypha. It is part of the predelator stories are found in the Septuagint of Daniel, and a MS of No. 6 has recently been found.

8. Tobit is a romantic story of the time of Israel's captivity. Tobit is a rich merchant of Ninive who becomes blind. He sends his son Tobias to Rages in Media to collect a debt. An angel leads him to Ecbatana, where he romantically marries a widow who was still a virgin though she had had seven husbands. Each of the seven had been slain on their wedding-day by Asmodeus, the spirit of the bride. On the inspiration of the angel, Tobias marries the widow, and, by burning the inner parts of a fish, puts the spirit to flight by the offensive smoke. The blindness of Tobit is healed by using the gall of the fish, the burning of whose entrails had saved his life of Tobias. The book is found in an Aramaic version, three Greek, and three Old Latin versions, and in two Hebrew texts. Its date is uncertain, though it doubtless appeared before the 1st cent. B.C.

9. Judith is a thrilling tale of how Judith, a Jewish widow, secured the confidence of Holofernes, an Assyrian commander who was besieging Bethulia. Steadily in the night she approached him in his tent, already overcome with heavy drinking, took off his scimitar and cut off his head, and fled with it to the besieged city. This valiant act saved the distressed Israelites. The story bristles with absurdities in names, dates, and geographical material. It seems to have imitated in one respect Jael's murder of Sisera (Jg 4:19-22). It may have been written some time about n.c. 100, so long after the life of Nebuchadnezzar as to have made him king of Nineveh, instead of Babylon. The original text is Greek.

10. Baruch.—This is a pseudoepigraphical book attributed to Baruch, the scribe of Jeremiah. Its purpose seems to have been (1) to quiet the souls of the Jews in exile by telling them that they would soon return to their native land; and (2) to admonish them to flee the idolatry that was everywhere prevalent in Babylonia. Bar 6 is called the 'Epistle of Jeremy,' and is nominally a letter of that prophet, warning the exiles against worshipping idols. This book is thought to have originated sometime after B.C. 320. Its original language is Greek, though there is reason for believing that 1-3§ was first written in Hebrew.

11. Prayer of Manasses, king of Judah, when he was a captive of Ashurbanipal in the city of Babylon (2 Ch 33:14). It probably originated in some of the legends current regarding this notable king, and may have been intended for insertion in the narrative of 2 Ch 33. Its original is Greek. It is not a part of the Vulgate adopted at the Council of Trent, but is in the appendix thereof.

12. Second Esdras (Vulg.: Fourth Esdras). If First Esdras is the reconstructed Ezra, and the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah are taken as one book, then this is Third Esdras (as in the Septuagint). If Ezra and Nehemiah are left out of account, this book is Second Esdras (as in the Apocrypha of RV). If, as in the Vulgate, Ezra is reckoned as First Esdras, and Nehemiah, as Second Esdras, and the reconstructed Ezra as Third Esdras, then this book is Fourth Esdras. This work is a peculiar combination of material. It is not history at all, but rather a religious document imitative of the Hebrew prophets, and apocalyptic in character. Its Greek original, if it had one, has been lost, and the work is executed in Latin, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Aramaic.

13. Ecclesiasticus, or, The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach.—This is one of the most valuable of the Apocryphal books. It resembles the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job in its ethical characteristics. It was written by a Jew called Jesus, son of Sirach, probably early in the 3rd cent., though the Greek translation was issued about A.D. 152. The book was originally written in Hebrew, and in this language about one half of it has recently been discovered in Egypt and published. It is one of the works that give us a vivid idea of the wisdom literature produced in the centuries preceding the Christian era.

14. Wisdom of Solomon lauds wisdom and a righteous life, but condemns idolatry and wickedness. The author employs, in the main, illustrations from the Pentateuch. He purports to be Solomon, and makes just such claims as one would imagine Solomon would have done if he had been the author. He is thought to be anywhere between A.C. 150 and A.D. 70, and to have been a Jew of Alexandria. The book possesses some valuable literary features, though in its present form it seems to be incomplete. Its original title was Greek.

If we should include Third and Fourth Maccabees in this list, as is done by some writers (but not by the Vulgate), we find these peculiarities:

15. Third Maccabees describes an attempt to massacre the Jews in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (A.C. 222-205), and a notable deliverance from death. The work is extant in Greek (in LXX), but not in the Vulgate.

16. Fourth Maccabees is a discussion of the conquest of matter by the mind illustrated by the use of the story of the martyrdom of the seven Maccabees, their mother and Eleazar. The work is found in the Alexandrian MS of the Septuagint, and in Syrian.

In addition to these Apocryphal books, but not included either in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, or the RV, there is an ever-increasing list of works that scholars have chosen to call pseudoepigrapha. These were written at various periods, but mainly just before, during, and just after the times of Christ. Many of them deal with the doctrinal discussions of their day, and present revelations to the author under strange and even weird conditions. These writers attached to their books as a rule the name of some famous personage, not by way of deception, but to court favour for the views set forth. It would carry us too far afield to take up these works one by one. Merely the titles of some of them can be mentioned. As a piece of lyrical work the Psalms of Solomon is the best example in this group. Of apocalyplical and prophetic works, there are the Book of Enoch, quoted in Jude, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. Legendary works are the Book of Jubilees and the Ascension of Isaiah. One of the curious cases of mixed material is that of the Sibylines. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

To these miscellaneous RV’s, ‘or glost of pollutions,’ it appears that in that period of theological and doctrinal unrest, many of which are now published, and others are being discovered in some out-of-the-way place almost yearly. Their value lies in the revelations that they give us of the methods adopted and the doctrines promulgated in the early centuries of the Christian era, by means of such works.

APOLLONIA (Ac 17:—).—Paul and Silas passed through this town on their way from Amphipolis to Thessalonica. It is known that it was the important Egyptian road which ran between Dyrachium (mod. Duraesus) and Thessalonica, but its exact site has not yet been discovered. It was about half-way between Amphipolis and Thessalonica, and lay between the rivers Axios and Strymon.

APOLLONIUS.—1. A governor of Cœle-Syria and Palaestina under Seleucus IV (2 Mac 4/). He suppressed the abortive attempt of Heliodorus on the Temple-treasury. To this he probably owes the title myrarchos (2 Mac 5/), which the Vulg. renders adiœsus principem, ‘desivable prince.’ In 168 B.C. he was sent to Hellenize Jerusalem, and he initiated the great persecution with a cruel massacre on the Sabbath (2 Mac 5/). The Maccabees defeated and slew him, wearing his sword even after (1 Mac 3/). He was sent to Egypt by Antiochus IV., B.C. 173 (2 Mac 4/). An official under Antiochus V. who molested the Jews (2 Mac 19/). The RV renders him a governor against the Jews (R.C. 147) on the side of Demetrius (1 Mac 10/), but Ant. xiii. 7 f. is in error. From Jannia he sent a pompous defiance to Jonathan Maccabees, who, however, captured Joppa and defeated Apollonius.

APOLLOPHANES (2 Mac 10/).—A Syrian killed at the taking of Gazara by Judas Maccabees.

APOLLO (a pet name, abbreviated from Apollo, which appears in D text of Ac 18/).—Apart from a doubtful reference in Tit 3/ we derive our knowledge of Apollo from 1 Cor. and Ac 19/—. In Acts he is described as an Alexandrian Jew, an eloquent man, with an effective knowledge of the OT. He came to Ephesus before St. Paul sojourned there, and, having been instructed in the way of the Lord, he zealously proclaimed his views in the synagogue, where Priscilla and Aquila heard him. What exactly his views were, it is not easy to decide. Ac 18/ suggests that he was a Christian in some sense, that he knew the story of Jesus, believed in Him as Messiah, but did not know of the coming of the Holy Ghost. The disciples mentioned in Ac 19/2, who are clearly in a parallel position, do not seem to know even so much as this; and ‘instructed the whole’ may mean the same thing: ‘they instructed the whole, included the person of Christ,’ while even the phrase ‘the things concerning Jesus’ may refer simply to the Messianic prophecies (cf. Lk 24/), and see art. ‘Apollo’ by J. H. A. Hart in JTS, Oct. 1903). In Ephesus, Apollo may have preached only John's baptism of repentance. But Priscilla and Aquila made him a full Christian.

Later on Apollos worked in Corinth, with great success. His eloquence and Philonic culture won him a name for wisdom. F. C. M. made his preaching attractive, so that many declared themselves his special followers (1 Co 117). Apollos' teaching in Corinth may have been marked by allegorical interpretation, insistence on Divine knowledge, and the need of living according to the precept (see St. Paul's sarcastic reference to 'nature' in 1 Co 118). But the party-strife at Corinth was not of his intending. Apollos and Paul were agreed in their gospel (1 Co 194) - a fact the Corinthians overlooked. Apollos refused the request of the Corinthians for a speedy second visit (1 Co 161). St. Paul apparently speaks of Apollos as an Apostle (1 Co 41). We have no certain records of Apollos' teaching, but it has been suggested that he wrote the Wisdom of Solomon before, and the letter to the Hebrews after, his conversion.

APOLLYON ('the Destroyer'). - The Greek equivalent in Rev 91 of Abaddon, the angel of the bottomless pit, who was also the king of the locusts (see ABADDON). The word does not appear in its Greek form in later Rabbinic writings, and only here in the NT. As an angel Apollyon seems to have been regarded as equivalent to Apollyon, king of demons, in Jewish mythology; but our data are too few to warrant precise statements.

APOTHEOSY. - A deification from the tenets of some religious community. In Ac 212 it describes the charge brought against St. Paul by the Jews, viz., that he taught that the Jews should abandon Mosaicism. In 2 Th 22 it describes the deification of Christians which was to accompany the 'man of lawlessness'; i.e., the Antichrist. This expectation is an illustration of what seems to have been a common belief - that the return of the Christ to establish His Kingdom would be preceded by exceptional activity on the part of His superhuman opponent, and that this would result in an abandonment of Christian faith on the part of many of those nominally Christian.

SHAILEY MATHEWS.

APOTHESES. - A papal, 'one commissioned,' represents a Heb. word which signified not merely a messenger but a delegate, bearing a commission, and, so far as his commission extended, wielding his commissioner's authority. 'The Apostle of any one,' says the Talmud, 'is even as the man himself by whom he is deputed.' The name was applied by Jesus to the twelve disciples, whom He attached to Himself to aid Him in His ministry and to be trained by the discipline of His example and precept for carrying it on after His departure (Lk 619, Mt 1019). Cf. Lk 1719. 'Even as thou didst commission me unto the world, I also commissioned them unto the world' (where 'commission' is the verb cognate to 'Apostle').

Jesus appointed twelve Apostles corresponding to the twelve tribes, thus intimating that their mission was meanwhile to Israel (cf. Mt 109); but by and by, when He was setting out on His last journey to Jerusalem, He 'appointed other seventy and commissioned them' (Lk 109), thus intimating the universality of His gospel, inasmuch as, according to Jewish reckoning, mankind was composed of seventy nations.

At Jesus' Lord's departure the Twelve were the Apostles par excellence (cf. Ac 63). They were the men who had been with Jesus, and their peculiar function was to testify of Him, and especially of His Resurrection (Ac 203; v. 2 and Lk 2446). But they were not the only Apostles. The title was given to Barnabas (Ac 144, 1 Co 95, 4) and Andronicus and Junias (Ro 167). It may be that it was extended to men of Apostolic character, but then why was it withheld from one like Timothy (2 Co 11, Col 11)?

Barnabas, as tradition declares, and Andronicus and Junias, as Origen suggests, belonged to the order of the Seventy, it may well be that those others besides the Twelve who were styled 'Apostles' were the Seventy. It is true the title is recognized as the head of the Church at Jerusalem, should be accorded the dignity of Apostleship, as well for his extreme sanctity as for his relationship to Jesus. And as for Paul, his Apostolic title was bitterly contested; and he triumphantly defended it on the double ground that, though he had not accompanied with Jesus in the days of His flesh, he had seen Him after His glorification on the road to Damascus (1 Co 92), and though he was not one of the original Apostles, his Apostleship had the Lord's own sanction (1 Co 92, 2 Co 512). Perhaps it was his example that emblazoned others outside the ranks of the Twelve and the Seventy to claim Apostleship on the score of Apostolic gifts, real or supposed (2 Co 11, Rev 21). See also Disciples.

APOTHECARY. - In all the 8 occurrences of this word in OT and Apocr. we should render 'perfumer,' as does RV in half of these (Ex 3010, 2174, Ec 1016); elsewhere the former is retained (2 Cr 164, Neh 55 [cf. marg.]), Sir 385, 49). See Perfumer.

APPHIA. - A Christian lady of Colossae, a member of the household of Philemon, probably his wife (Philem 9).

APPHAS (1 Mac 29). - The surname of Jonathan the Maccabae. The name is usually thought to mean 'dissembler'; and some suppose that it was given to Jonathan for his stratagem against the tribe of the Jambri, who had killed his brother John (1 Mac 94-4).

APPJ. FORUM. - Ac 2518 AV; RV 'The Market of Apulia.' See next article.

APPJUS, MARKET OF. - A market-town (without city rights) on the Appian Way, 10 Roman miles from Missus Tabernus (Three Taverns), near the modern railway station, Foro Appio. As the Apulians went, the road was the main road from Rome to the south and east of the Roman Empire. It was traversed by nearly all travellers from or to those parts (Ac 2816).

APPLE. - That the apple (apallos) of the OT is the fruit known by that name to-day is extremely doubtful. It is true that the tree in size and foliage would answer to the reference in Ca 818, Jl 111; the fruit too in its sweetness (Ca 29) and its smell (Ca 79) is very appropriate. It is also suggestive that Heb. tappas closely resembles the Arabic for 'apple,' tuffah. On the other hand, it is a substantial difficulty that the apple does not grow well in Palestine proper, as distinguished from the Lebanon. The native fruit is small and wanting in sweetness; almost all eatable apples are imported from the North. In consequence of this, several fruits which to-day are found in Palestine have been suggested. The citron, a favourite with the Jews on account of its size, was and colour, is certainly a more recent introduction. The apricot, suggested by Tristram, which flourishes in parts of Palestine in greater perfection than any other fruit, would seem to answer to the references well. It is deliciously sweet, with a pleasant smell, and, when ripe, of a brilliant golden colour. The tree is one of the most beautiful in the land, and when loaded with its golden fruit might well suggest the expression 'apples of gold in pictures of silver' (Pr 25:1). Unfortunately there is considerable doubt whether this tree, a native of China, was known in Palestine much before the Christian era. A fourth fruit has been suggested, namely, the quince. This is certainly a native of the land, and is common all over Palestine. The fruit, when ripe, though smelling pleasantly, is not 'sweet' according to our ideas, but even to-day is much appreciated by the oriental palate when cooked, and is extensively used for making a delicious confection. The quince, along with the true apple, was sacred to Aphrodite, the goddess of love.

APPLE OF THE EYE (lit. 'child or daughter of the eye,' i.e. that which is most precious [the organ of sight], and most carefully guarded [by the projecting bone, protecting it as far as possible from injury]). A figure of God's care of His people (Dt 28:4, Ps 17:9, Zec 2:9), and of the preciousness of the divine Law (Pr 7:2). In La 2:16 it is the source of tears.

APRIL AND PRISCILLA.—The names of a married couple first mentioned by St. Paul in 1 Co 16:9, and by St. Luke in 19:41. Only in these passages do the names occur in this order; in later references the order is always 'Priscilla and April' (Ac 18:2, Ro 16:3, 2 T 4:19). A natural inference from this fact is that Priscilla was a more active worker in the Church than her husband. In favour of this view is the statement of Chrysostom (i. 306 D, 177 A, ill. 150 B, C) that it was Priscilla's careful expositions of 'the way of God' (Ac 15:29) that proved so helpful to Apollos. This testimony of Haranick has his ingenious but doubtful theory that Priscilla was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. From the prominence given in Roman inscriptions and legends to the name Prisca (St. Paul) or its diminutive Priscilla (St. Luke), Hort concludes that she belonged to a distinguished Roman family (Rom. and Eph. p. 12 ff.). Aquila was a Jew of Eastern origin—'a man of Pontus by race' (Ac 18:3).

From Rome, Aquila and Priscilla were driven by the edict of Claudius (A.D. 52). As the nearest among the Jews, which led to their expulsion, arose 'through the instigation of Chrestos,' it is not improbable that Aquila and Priscilla were at least sympathizers with Christianity before they met St. Paul. On this supposition their ready welcome of the Apostle to their home at Corinth is most easily explained. Their hospitality had a rich moral value in private and in public they were indescribably kind to St. Paul. As early as his first visit he was encouraged to listen to St. Paul's persuasive reasonings (Ac 18:19). Nor was the advantage all on one side; from these 'friend-workers in Christ Jesus' (Ro 16:3) it is probable, as Ramsay suggests (Hasting's Dict. of the Bible, p. 482), that the Apostle of the Gentiles learnt 'the central importance of Rome in the development of the Church.' We may fairly associate with this friendship the maturing of St. Paul's plan for evangelizing Rome and the West, which we find already fully arranged a little later (Ac 19:9, Ro 15:31).

At the close of St. Paul's eighteen months' residence in Corinth, Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him to Ephesus. At their home Christians assembled for worship, and, according to an early gloss (DG al.) on 1 Co 16:9, the Apostle again lodged with them. At Ephesus they remained whilst St. Paul visited Jerusalem; then, in 15:39-41, the eloquent Alexander,新产品ly drawn greatly from their ripe Christian experience, and learnt, from one or both of them, the secret of power in ministering the gospel of grace (Ac 15:29-31); also there it is probable, that they made 'the church of the Gentiles' their debtors by risking their lives in defence of St. Paul. The allusion to this courageous deed is in Ro 16:9, and from this passage we learn that Aquila and Priscilla sojournered for a while in Rome, where once more their hospitable home became a rendezvous for Christians.

ARABIA, ARABS

This statement affords no ground for disputing the integrity of the Epistle. Their former connexion with Rome, their interest in the Church of Christ in the metropolitan city, and their missionary habit, furnish presumptive evidence in favour of such a visit. From these trusted friends St. Paul may have received the encouraging tidings which made him 'long to see' his fellow-believers in Rome (Ro 1:11). The last NT reference to this devoted pair shows that they returned to Ephesus (2 T 4:19); their fellowship with Timothy would, doubtless, tend to his strengthening 'in the grace that is in Christ Jesus' (2 T 2:19).

AR.—A city on the Arnon, the border between Moab and the Amorites (Nu 21:19, Dt 2:1), now Wady Mâjîb. It is called Ar Moab (Nu 21:19, Is 15:1), I Moab (Nu 22:19), and the 'city that is in the valley' (DT 22 etc.). It is possibly the ruin seen by Burckhardt in the valley below the junction of the Lefjân and the Mâjîb.

ARA.—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:9).

ARAB (Jos 15:9).—A city of Judah in the mountains near Dammus. Perhaps the ruin er- Rabîyûn near Jâlûb.

ARABAH.—The name given by the Hebrews to the whole of the great depression from the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of Akabah. (For the part N. of the Dead Sea, see JORDAN.) The name is now applied only to the southern part, extending from a line of white cliffs that cross the valley a few miles S. of the Dead Sea. The floor of the valley, about 10 miles broad at the N. end, gradually rises towards the S., and grows narrower, until, at a height of 2000 feet above the Dead Sea, nearly opposite Mt. Hor, the width is only about 1 mile. The average width thence to Akabah is about 6 miles. The surface is formed of loose gravel, stones, sand, with patches of mud. Up to the level of the Red Sea everything indicates that we are traversing an old sea-bottom. Apart from stunted desert shrub and an occasional acacia, the only greenery to be seen is around the springs on the edges of the valley, and in the wadys which carry the water from the adjoining mountains into the Wâdy el-Jâb, down which it flows to the Dead Sea. The great limestone plateau, et-Tâh, the Wilderness of Paran, forms the western boundary, and the naked crags of Edom the eastern. Israel traversed the Arabah when they went to Kadesh-barnea, and again when they returned to the south to avoid passing through the land of Edom (Nu 20:2, 21:2, Dt 2).

W. EWING.

ARABIA, ARABS.—In the present article we have to do not with the part played by the Arabs in history, or with the geography of the Arabian peninsula, but only with the emergence of the Arab name and people in Bible times.

'Arâb (for which we should have expected rather 'ârâb) is scarcely at first a proper name, but stands merely for 'waste,' 'desolation.' So in Is 21:11 which may really belong to Isaiah himself, but should perhaps be ascribed to a later hand: 'Bivouac in the coope [made up of thorn-bushes, sometimes like an Italian MacchBle], in the waste, ye caravans of Dedan.' In this passage the title masâd/ba'râb, which in any case is late and wanting in the ancient Gr. version, incorrectly takes the name 'Edom' as a proper name, instead of showing the correct interpretation of this word adopted by the LXX here and in other passages. More commonly the word used for 'waste' is the fem. form 'ârubb (e.g. Is 35). Job 4:19 (89 etc.), which, preceded by the art. (âdâ'-ârubbûb), stands for the deep gorge which, connecting to the north of the Dead Sea and including the latter, stretches to the Red Sea (DT 26 etc.). Whether this name means 'a possession of the desert, or should be taken as a proper name, is uncertain; but at bottom this distinction has no importance, for the two notions of 'Bedouin' (Badawī, which also = 'inhabitant of the desert') and 'Arab' were pretty much identical in the mind of civilised peoples. It may be noted that here the Massoretes appear to assume the appellative sense, since they point 'arābī, whereas for 'Arab' they use the form more akin to Aramaic than Hebrew, 'erābī (Neh 2:6). The plural 'arābim' in Neh 21:22 and 2 Ch 26:7 Qere, from 'arābīm' (Kethib of the last passage) may also be justified from the standpoint of Hebrew usage. The form in 2 Ch 26:7 can hardly be taken as the name of a single clan quite distinct from Dedan and Tasher. The Massoretes, for the sake of distinction, point in the second instance hā'-erēb, this has no value and in Ezk 27:5. In these passages 'ārāb can hardly be taken as the name of a single clan quite distinct from Dedan and Tasher.

This suggests the exactness of a prose narrator, and in point of fact were perhaps not very well informed about the various branches of the Bedouins, of whose territory the Israelites pushed gradually over the desert until they met with a stronger force. It is possible, indeed, that the rise of the name 'Arab' among the Hebrews (c. B.C. 700) is connected with the circumstance that the ancient clans of Ismael, Midian, and other desert tribes by that time disappeared or at least lost all significance. In the desert there goes on a constant, if for the most part a slow, interchange in the rise and fall of tribes and tribal names. A brave tribe may be weakened by famine or defeat; it may be compelled to migrate or to adopt a settled mode of life, and thus its name becomes lost among a peasant population; or it may become otherwise broken up and its once formidable name preserved only by the memory of a few brave and implacable descendants. The Arabian peninsula, which has been divided almost entirely into a succession of scattered tribes, each of which was a small family, assimilating foreign elements becomes great tribes. So it was millenniums ago; so it is still.

The Assyrian sources name the Arabs as early as the 9th century B.C., and the passages cited by For swearing in his Catalogue, vol. v. 1964. King Darius I. in his inscriptions, enumerates Arabiyān among the countries subject to him. The name always follows Babylonia, Assyria (which as a province included Mesopotamia proper and also probably N. Syria), and precedes Egypt. We shall have to understand by this name the great desert region not only of Syria, but also of Mesopotamia as well as the peninsula of Sinai. About this same time as the first name of the Arabian tribes appears, there is a reference to the Greeks. Eschylus (Pers. 316) names an Arab as fighting in the battle of Salamis, and his contemporary, from whom Herodotus borrowed his description of the battle of Xerxes, enumerated Arab archers as forming part of the latter (Hecrod. vii. 69). While Eschylus (Prom. 422) has quite fabulous notions about the dwellings of the Arabs, Herodotus is well acquainted with them. His account of the situation of the Arabian peninsula is approximately correct, but he has specially in view those Arabs who inhabit the region lying between Syria and Egypt, i.e. the desert lands with whose inhabitants the ancient Hebrews had frequent relations, peaceful or warlike. Xenophon appears to use the term 'Arabia' in essentially the same sense as King Darius. He too gives this name to the desert to the east of the Euphrates, the desert which separates Babylonians from Mesopotamia proper (Arab. vii. viii. 25).—the same region which was still called 'Arab' by the later Syrians. This tract of country, so far as we can learn, has always been peopled by Arab tribes. In the 8th century B.C. we find, in the above-cited passages from the Memoirs of Nehemiah, repeated mention of an Arab—Gashem or Gashmu, whose real name may have been Geshem—who gave Nehemiah no little trouble. About this time, perhaps, the Arab tribe of Nabateans had already pressed their way from the south and driven the Edomites from their ancient seats. Towards the end of the 4th century they were firmly established at least in the ancient Edomite capital, Petra; and they gradually extended their dominion widely. The first Book of Maccabees clearly distinguishes the Nabateans from other Arabs, whereas the second book simply calls them 'Arabs' (2 Macc 5), as do also other Greek and Latin writers. The Nabatean kingdom counted, indeed, for so much with Westerners that they could regard it as the 'Arabs' par excellence. The Apostle Paul (Gal 4:8), like profane writers, reckons the Sinaitic peninsula, which was part of the Nabatean kingdom, as belonging to Arabia. Again, the part of Arabia to which he withdrew after his conversion (Gal 1:19) must have been a desert region not far from Damascus, which then also was under the sway of the king of the Nabateans. By the 'Arabians' mentioned in Ac 2:10, in connexion with the miracle of Pentecost, the author probably meant Jews from the same kingdom, which, it is true, had in his time (?) become the Roman province of Arabia (A.D. 105).

We do not know whether the name 'Arab' originated with the Arabs themselves or was first applied to them by outsiders. In any case, it first extended itself gradually over the region, and the greater peninsula. Uncivilized and much divided peoples recognize their national unity only with difficulty, whereas this is more readily perceived by their neighbors, by that time, and is therefore considered as the common name of the tribe. But the wide wanderings of the Arab nomads, due to the nature of their country, brought them slowly into contact with peoples of other language and other customs, and this could awaken in them the consciousness of their own nationality. Perhaps the recognition of Arab unity was fostered also by the fact that the ancient Arabs of the south and of other parts of Arabia. But be that as it may, the ancient Arab epitaph of Namra to the S.E. of Damascus, dating from the year A.D. 328, is probably Tel 'Arad, 16 miles S. of Hebron. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:41).—W. Ewing.

ARAM, ARAMESANS (often in AV and RV 'Syrians').—A number of scattered but kindred tribes which made their appearance in the Euphrates valley about B.C. 1300 and rapidly extended their chief habitat from Harran, east of the Euphrates, south-westward to the Harran. The north-eastern part of this region was called Aram 'of the rivers' (Aram-naharaim, Ps 89:10, title). The Aramesans are first mentioned by Shalmaneser i. of Tyš Nüldeke.
ARAMITESS

Assyria about B.C. 1300 (W.F.T. iii. 4, No. 1). About the same time their name occurs in an inscription of Rameses II. (cf. Müller, Asien und Europa, 222, 224). In 8th and 7th cent. B.C. they sailed for Cyprus and Crete (KIB i. 34) as dwelling east of the Euphrates, and in this same region they were later (885-824) conquered by Ashurnasirpal and Shalmaneser III. Many of them continued to live in the Euphrates valley, where their language spread to such an extent that, in the reign of Sennacherib, Aramaic glosses begin to make their appearance on Babylonian contracts. In Nippur many similar documents, from the Persian period have been found. They indicate that the use of Aramaic was spreading among the common people of Babylonia. It probably came into general use here, as the Babylonian Testament seems to mix it in.

The Aramaeans pushed into the West in large numbers shortly after B.C. 1300. In course of time they occupied Damascus and a part of the country to the south as far as the Taurus, some of them mingling with tribes still farther to the south and becoming the Ammonites, Moabites, and Israelites. A part of the Aramaeans also displaced the Hittites in Hamath. Damascus became the leading Aramaean State (cf. A. A. Alt, op. cit., p. 79), but other Aramaean kingdoms were Arm-Geshur, and Arm-Maccah in the Hauran to the north of Bashan; Arm-Zobah, farther north towards Damascus; and Arm-Rehob, near the town of Dan (Nu 13'15; Je 15'5), conjecturally identified with Baniyas (Moore, Com. on Judges, 399).

King David married a daughter of the king of Geshur, and she became the mother of Absalom (2 Sam 5), who afterwards died there (15'1). Damascus was conquered by David (16'1), who also made Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah tributary (ch. 10). Zobah is mentioned by Ashurbanipal three centuries later as Subiti. Not long after, David, Damascus regained its independence. In the reigns of Basheh and Asa it was an ally now of Israel and now of Judah (1 K 15'10). During the century from Ahab to Jehoshaph of Israel, Damascus again and were frequently at war, and Damascus held much of Israel's trans-Jordanic territory. After this the Aramaean kingdom became weaker, but in the reign of Ahaz it made an attempt on Judah (Is 7) and was finally subdued by Tilghath-pileser III. of Assyria in B.C. 752.

The Aramaeans continued to form the basis of population in the region from Aleppo to the Euphrates and beyond. Early in the Christian era this region became Christian, and in that Aramaic dialect called Syriac a large Christian literature exists.

ARAN.—Son of Dishan, the Horite (Gen 36, 1 Ch 1, 1 Macc 2). The name denotes 'a wild goat,' and Dishan 'an antelope' or 'gazelle.' while Seir the ancestor is 'the he-goat.'

ARARAT (Gen 8, 2 K 19'12) [Jasa 372', Jer 51'7] is the Hebrew form of the Assyrian Uarat, which on the monuments from the 9th cent. downward is designated a kingdom in the N. of the later Armenia. The extension of the name naturally varied with the political limits of this State; but properly it seems to have denoted a small district on the middle Araxes, of which the native name Ararat is thought to be preserved in the Ararat of Herodotus (iii. 94, vii. 79). Jerome describes it as 'a level region of Armenia, through which the Araxes flows, of incredible fertility, at the foot of the Taurus range, which extends thus far.' The Araxes (or Arat), on his way to the Caspian Sea, forms a great elbow to the S.; and at the upper part of this, on the right (or S.W.) bank of the river, the lofty snowclad summit of Massis (called by the Persians the 'mountain of Noah') rises to a height of nearly 17,000 ft. above sea-level. This is the traditional landing-place of the ark; and, through a misunderstanding of Gn 8'4 ('in one of the mountains of Ararat'), the name was transferred from the surrounding districts to the two peaks of this mountain. Great Ararat and Little Ararat,—the latter about 7 m. distant and 4000 ft. lower.

Whether this is the site contemplated by the writer in Genesis (P) is not quite certain. The Syrian and Moham- medan tradition places it at Jebel Judi, a striking mountain considerably S. of Lake Van, commanding a wide view over the Mesopotamian plain, and just possibly be included among the 'mountains of Ararat.' In the wider sense of the term. This seems the view of Josephus (Ant. i. 5, 6), who is unconscious of any discrepancy between 'Armenia' and the 'Kordyasan' mountain of Berosus. His statement about relics of the ark being shown in his time seems to be based on some story.

ARATHES, formerly called Myrhidates, was king of Cappadocia B.C. 162-130. In B.C. 138 the Boeotians wrote letters to Arathes and certain other eastern sovereigns in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15'4).

ARANAH (2 S 21'4; called in 1 Ch 21'4; 2 Ch 3' Orn.)—A Jebuse who owned a threshing-floor on Mount Moriah. This spot was indicated by the prophet Gad as the place where an altar should be erected to J', because the plague, which followed David's numbering of the people, had been stayed. David bought the threshing-floor and oxen for 50 shekels of silver. The price paid is given in 1 Ch 21'14 as 600 shekels of gold—a characteristic deviation from the earlier account.

ARBA is named 'the father of the Anak' in Jos 14'14 (so read also 21'33; 15'19) and is said to have been the founder of the city which bore his name, that is Kiriat-arba, later Hebron (wh. see), where was a chief seat of the Anakim.

J. F. McCurdy.

ABARITE (2 S 23'1).—A 'native of Beth-arabah,' a town in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15'11 18'3).

ABATTA (AV Arbattis), 1 Mac 8'6.—A district in Palestine. The situation is doubtful. It may be a corruption for Abrabbatis—the topography of Samarion near 'Akrah E. of Shechem.

ARBELA.—The discrepancy between Mac 19 and Jos. Ant. xii. 1, our only authorities, makes unt- certain the route of Baccides in his march on Jerusalem. Josephus makes him pitch his camp at Arbeia in Galilee: 1 Mac. brings him 'by the way that leadeth to Gilgal,' to 'Messaloth which is in Arbeia. His course thence points out Japhia as Gilgal, about 5 miles to the S.E., where the battle was fought with Judas. Messaloth might then be sought in Medeiah, about 3 miles S.E. of Dothan. But no name resembling Arbeia, either of town or districts, is found in the neighbourhood, although Euesdus (Onomasticon) seems to have known an Arbeia not far from Lejuen. On the other hand, Arbeia in Galilee survives in the modern 'Rihāl or Rihād, a ruin on the S. lip of the gorge, Wady Hamām, which breaks westward through Gennesaret. There is, however, no trace of a Mesoloth here, unless indeed Robinson's ingenious suggestion is right, that it may be the Heb. meṣúlth, referring to the famous caverned cliffs in the gorge, whence Bacchides expatriated the refuges.
ARBITE

W. Ewino.

ARBITE.—The LXX (2 S 23:3) apparently reads 'the Archite,' cf. Jos 16:10 and 'Hushai the Archite,' 2 S 15:17; but a place 'Arch,' in the S. of Judah, is mentioned Jos 15:6. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 11:11 we read 'the son of Ezkal,' a reading which is supported by several MSS of the LXX in 2 Sam. i.e., and is probably correct.

ARBONAI (Jth 28).—A torrent apparently near Glicina. It cannot be represented by the modern Nahr Ibrāhīm, since the ancient name of that river was the Adis.

ARCH,—It is usually stated that the Hebrews were acquainted with the architectural principle of the arch, but in view of the extreme antiquity of the arch in Babylonian mason work, as e.g. at Nippur, of the discovery of early arches by recent explorers, and of the vaulted roofs of later Jewish tombs, this view is now seen to be erroneous, although the arch is not mentioned in Scripture. The word 'arch' does, indeed, occur in the EV as 'Aroth,' but this is probably a mistake for 'porch,' 'porches.' See Temple.

A. R. S. Kennedy.

ARCHANGEL.—See Angel.

ARCHELAUS.—Mt 2:2. See Herod, No. 2.

ARCHER.—See Armour, Army.

ARCHEVITES.—'The people of Ezech' (wh. see). See Archites. The inhabitants of Ezech were deported as colonists to Samaria by king Ashurbanipal (668-626). Their name is mentioned in Ezr 4:1 along with dwellers in Babylon; and the deportation of Archevites most probably indicates that Ezech sided with Babylon in the revolt of Samas-sum-ukin against the Assy. king.

ARCHIPPOSS (Philem 2, Col 4:17) was evidently a member of the household of Philemon of Colossae, probably his son. He shared his spirit, since St. Paul, referring doubtless to his work in missionary operations in those parts, styles him 'our fellow-soldier.' He had been entrusted with some important office in the Church, whether at Colossae, or, as Lightfoot, in view of the preceding context, more probably supposes, at the neighbouring town of Laodicea; and, considering the spiritual atmosphere of the place (Rev 3:14), it is not surprising that the Apostle should have thought it needful to exhort him to zeal in his ministry.

David Smith.

ARCHITE.—The native of a town [in Jos 16:3 read 'the Archite,' not 'Arch' as in AV] situated on the north border of Benjamin, possibly the modern 'Am 'Ark, west of Bethel. Hushai, David's friend (2 S 15:9), belonged to this town.

ARCHITECTURE.—The Hebrews never developed a native style of architecture. The genius of the people lay elsewhere. Alike in civil, religious, and funereal architecture, they were content to follow alien models.

David's palace in his new capital was probably the first building since the conquest which gave scope for architectural display, and in this case workmen, plans, and decorative materials were all Phoenician (2 S 5:8). The palace and temple of Solomon were likewise the work of Phoenician architects, and the former doubtless supplied the model for the more ambitious private buildings under the monarchy. Late Egyptian influence has been traced in the tombs of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, but the prevailing influence from the beginning of the 3rd cent. onwards was undoubtedly Greek (cf. 1 Mac 1:10, 2 Mac 4:9). The many magnificent buildings of Herod, for example, including the colonnades and gates of the Temple, were entirely built in the prevailing Graeco-Roman style. When the excavations at Gezer,—where

Mr. Macalister claims to have discovered, with much else of architectural interest, the palace of Simon the Great, Macabeus (1 Mac 13:10).—Tsachach, and Megiddo are finished and the results published in final form, and still more when other historical sites, such as Samaria (cf. Am 3:14, 1 K 22:16), shall have been similarly laid bare, it may be possible to write a history of Palæstina, including pre-Israelite or Amorite architecture, but that day is not yet. ARCHIVES.—The 'house of the archives' (Ezr 6:19; AV 'rolls') was a part of the 'treasure house' (516) of the Persian kings at Babylon, in which important State documents were preserved.

ARCHUS.—See Stars.

ARD.—Benjamin's son in Gn 46:5, but his grandson in Nu 26:34—1 Ch 8:9 (Addar). Patronymic Ardites (26:34).

ARDAT (2 Es 9:6 AV Ardath).—'A field' in an unknown situation.

ARDITES.—Nu 26:1. See Ard.

ARDON.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:4).—

AREOPAGUS.—This is a compound name, which means 'Hill of Ares,' that is, Hill sacred to (or connected with) Ares, the Greek god of war, who corresponded to the Latin Mars. The hill referred to is a bare, shapeless mass of rock in Athens, about 380 feet high. It is due west of the Acropolis, and separated from it only by a ridge. From the earliest times known to us this hill was associated with murder trials, and a court known as the 'Council from the Areopagus' met on or near it to try such cases. In the account in Acts (17:25) it is not the hill, but the 'Council' itself that is referred to, the name of the hill being often used for the Council which met there. In Roman times the Council had power to appoint lecturers at Athens, and St. Paul appears before them to have his aptitude tested. The proceedings were auditive to the surrounding crowd. St. Paul's claim was rejected, and only one member of the Council, Dionysius the 'Areopagit' (174), was convinced by his teaching.

A. Souther.

ARES (1 Es 8:4).—756 of his descendants returned with Zerub.; they correspond to the 775 (Ezr 2:9) or 662 (Neh 7:10) children of Arah.

ARETAS.—This is the dynastic name (Aram. Arekath) of several kings of the Nabatean Arabs whose capital was Petra (Sela), and whose language, for purposes of writing and commerce was the Nabatean dialect, as is seen from the existing inscriptions (Cooke, N. Semitic Inscr. p. 214 ff.). The first of the line is mentioned in 2 Mac 3:19, the fourth (whose personal name was 'Eneas') in 2 Co 11:19, whose 'ethnarch' is said to have 'guarded the city of the Damascus in order to take' St. Paul; but the Apostle escaped. This was within three years after his conversion (Gal 1:10, Ac 22:2). There is a difficulty here, for Damascus was ordinarily in the Roman province of Syria. Aretas had held it in b.c. 85; the Roman coins of Damascus end a.d. 34 and begin again a.d. 62. It is has been supposed that the Nabataeans held the city during this interval. Yet before the death of Tiberus (a.d. 37) there could hardly have been any regular occupancy by them, as Vitellius, propror of Syria, was sent by that emperor to punish Arata iv. for the vengeance that the latter had taken on Herod Antipas for divorcing his sister in favour of Herodias. It has therefore been thought that a.d. 37 is the earliest possible date for St. Paul's escape; and this will somewhat modify our view of Pauline chronology (see art. Paul, the Apostle, 4). Yet the allusion in 2 Co 11:14 does not necessarily imply anything like a permanent tenure of Damascus by Aretas' ethnarch. A temporary occupancy may well have taken place in Aretas' war against Herod Antipas or afterwards; and it would be unsafe to build any chronological theory on this passage. The reign of Aretas IV. lasted from B.C. 9 to A.D. 40; inscriptions (at el-Hejra) and coins are dated in his 48th year (Cooke, L.C.).

A. J. Maclean.

ARGOB.—1. Argob and Arich were guards of Pekahiah (2 K 15:2), who fell by the hands of Pekah along with their master. 2. A district in the kingdom of Og, abounding in strong cities and unिalled towns. It was subdued by 'Jair son of Manasseh,' and became the possession of his tribe (Dt 3:13, 1 K 4:32 etc.). It is called 'the Argob' (Dt 3). This, together with the fact that chebot, 'measured area,' always precedes the name, seems to indicate a definitely marked district. This would apply admirably to the great lava field of el-Luja, N.W. of Jebel Hauran. Within this forbidding tract the present writer collected the names of 71 ruined sites. Hes Gesenius rightly translated 'a heap of stones,' the identification would be almost certain. But the name seems to mean 'arable land' (roged=cloud), Job 21:28, 38:32. Argob must therefore be sought elsewhere. The W. slopes of the mountain (now Jebel ed-Duhur) were almost always, for a clearly defined cause. They abound in ruins of antiquity; while the rich soil, now turned to good account by the Druzes, would simply justify the name of Argob. W. Ewing.

ARIDAI (Est 9:1).—The ninth of Haman's sons, put to death by the Jews.

ARIDATH (Est 9:8).—The sixth son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ARIEL ('the lion').— Mentioned in Argob in a very obscure passage (2 K 15:25).

ARIEL.—1. One of Ezra's chief men (Ezr 8:24). 2. The name of a Moabite (according to RV of 2 S 23:28, 1 Ch 11:32) whose two sons were slain by Benaijah. 3. A name of uncertain meaning, perhaps 'God's altar-hearth,' given to Jerusalem by Isaiah (22:25). It has recently been proposed to read Ur-ai ('city of God') as a paraphasia or play of words on Uru-saim, the earliest recorded form of the name 'Jerusalem.' A. R. S. Kennedy.

ARMATHEA (Mt 27:37, Mk 15:24, Lk 23:26, Jn 19:18).—A place known only in connexion with Joseph. It was probably near Lydda.

ARISAI (Est 9:8).—The eighth son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ARISTARCHUS.—The name of one of St. Paul's companions in travel. He was 'a Macedonian of Thessalonica' (Ac 19:27), and a convert from Judaism (Col 4:10). From Troas, Aristarchus accompanied St. Paul on his departure for Jerusalem at the close of the third missionary journey (Ac 20); he also embarked with the Apostle on his voyage to Rome (27). In Col 4:10 he is called St. Paul's 'fellow-prisoner' (cf. Philem 24, where Epaphras, not Aristarchus, is styled 'my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus'). The expression probably refers not to a spiritual captivity, but either to a short imprisonment arising out of the turmoil described in Ac 19:29, or to a voluntary sharing of the Apostle's captivity by Aristarchus and Epaphras.

C. G. Lassen.

ARISTOBULUS.—1. The name of a son and of a grandson of Herod the Great. The grandson lived as a private individual at Rome, and was a friend of the Emperor Claudius; those greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16:23 were probably some of his slaves. If he was then dead, they might have become members of the Imperial household, but would still retain Aristobulus' name. 2. The teacher of Ptolemy (2 Mac 114). A. J. Maclean.

ARIUS (1 Mac 12:7, 8).—A king of Sparta, grandson and successor of Cleomenes II. His reign lasted from 280 to B.C. 265, and he was contemporary with the high priest Onias I., the successor of Jaddua. Friendly letters were interchange amongst Aristus and Onias (probably about B.C. 200); and Jonathan Maccabeus refers to these communications in a letter which he sent by his ambassadors to Sparta (c. B.C. 144), 1 Mac 12:8, 11b. AV Darius in v.7 is due to corrupt text.

ARK.—This word, from Lat. arcus, 'a chest,' is the rendering of two Hebrew words, of which one ("bibhah, probably a loan-word) is used for a mummy-case or coffin (Gen 50:2), and in particular for the sacred ark of the Hebrews.

Ark of the Covenant.—1. Names of the ark.—Apart from the simple designation 'the ark' found in all periods of Heb. literature, the names of the Ark may be divided into three groups, which are characteristic (a) of the oldest literary sources, viz. Samuel and the prophetic narratives of the Hexateuch; (b) of Deuteronomy and the writers influenced by Dt.; and (c) of the Priests' Code and subsequent writings. In (a) we find chiefly 'the ark of J.,' doubtless the oldest name of all, and 'the ark of God'; in (b) the characteristic title is 'the ark of the covenant'—alone or with the additions 'of J.' or 'of God,' etc. (cf. the designation 'the ark or chest containing the tables of the covenant' (Dt 9:24), and therefore practically 'the ark of the Decalogue'; in (c) the same conception of the ark prevails (see below), but as the Decalogue is by P termed 'the testimony,' the ark becomes 'the ark of the testimony.' All other designations are expansions of one or other of the above.

2. History of the ark.—The oldest Pentateuch sources (J, E) are now silent as to the origin of the ark, but since the author of Dt 10:2 had one or both of these, it may be assumed that its construction was there also assigned to Moses in obedience to a Divine command. It certainly played an important part in the wanderings (Nu 10:25, 14f.), and in the conquest of Canaan (Jos 3:9, 6:14), and finally found a resting-place in the temple of Solomon which under the care of a priestly family was carried from Moses (1 K 3:9). After its capture by the Philistines and subsequent restoration, it remained at Kirjathjearim (1 K 4:17), and was removed by David, first to the house of Obed-edom, and thence to Jerusalem, and finally erected in his new capital (2 S 6:16f.). Its final home was the inner sanctuary of the Temple of Solomon (1 K 8:9f.). Strangely enough, there is no further mention of the ark in the historical books. Whether it was among 'the treasures of the house of the Lord' carried off by Sheshak (c. B.C. 930), or whether it was still in its place in the days of Jeremiah (2:6f.) and was ultimately destroyed by the soldiers of Nebuchadrezzar and Nebuzaradana (2 Ch 36:17), it is impossible to say. There was no ark in the Temples of Zerubbabel and Herod.

3. The significance of the ark.—In attempting a solution of this difficult problem, we must, as in the foregoing section, leave out of account the late theoretical conception of the ark to be found in the Priests' Code (see Talmudic), and confine our attention to the oldest sources. In these the ark—a simple chest of Lebanon wood, according to Dt 10:5—a container, with the operations of war, in which it is the representative of J., the God of the armies of Israel. Its...

presence on the field of battle is the warrant of victory (1 S 4:49, cf. 2 S 11:10), as its absence is the explanation of defeat (Nu 14:47). His issue was to return from battle and present "a J" himself (Nu 10:4). So closely, indeed, is the ark identified with the personal presence of J in the oldest narratives (see, besides the above, 1 S 6:8, 2 S 6:9), that one is tempted to identify it with that mysterious "presence" of J which, as a fuller manifestation of the Deity than even the "anger of J", was Israel's supreme guide in the wilderness wanderings (Ex 32:45, 33:1 compared with v. 11, Dt 4:15, and 1 S 6:3, where read 'neither a messenger nor an angel, but his presence delivered them'). The ark was thus a substitute for that still more complete Presence (EV 'face') which no man can see and live.

Under the prophetic teaching Israel gradually outgrew this naive and primitive, not to say fetish-like, conception, and in the 7th cent. we first find the ark spoken of as the receptacle for the tables of the Decalogue (Dt 10:8). Apart from other difficulties attending this tradition, it is quite clear that the heart was explained the extreme reverence and, to us, superstitious dread with which the ark is regarded in the narratives of Samuel. Hence many modern scholars are of opinion that the stone tablets of the Israelite tradition have taken the place of cruel, fetish stones, a view which it is impossible to reconcile with the lofty teaching of the founder of Israel's religion.

A. R. S. KENNE LD.

ARKITE is used (Gn 10:1, 1 Ch 1:37) for the people of Arkite, a town and district of Phoenicians about 12 miles north of Tripolis. It was taken by Tiglath-pileser III. in b.c. 738. As the birthplace of the Emperor Alexander Severus, it was later called Cæsarea Libani. It is probably mentioned, under the form Ikkur, in the Aramaic Letters. J. F. McCurdy.

ARM.—Part of the insignia of royalty amongst Oriental peoples was a bracelet worn on the arm (2 S 183; cf. W. R. Smith's reading of 2 K 11:17 where, agreeing with Wellhausen, he would substitute 'bracelet' for 'armlet' (v. JOTC 311 n.)). The importance attached to the functions discharged by this organ are incidentally referred to by Job in his solemn repudiation of conscious wrong-doing ('Let my shoulder fall from the shoulder-blade, and my arms be broken from the bone' 31:12). The heart was said to be situated 'between the arms,' and, therefore, in the murder of Joram, the deadly aim of Jehu resulted in the instantaneous death of the former (2 K 10:1). It is interesting to recall here the theory of the 'Jewish' Jehu, in which origin of his political enemies, especially as the narrative reveals the affection inspired by the prophet amongst some of the courtiers (Jer 39:3). A note of vividness is introduced into the narrative telling of St. Paul's method of bespeaking attention from a crowd which he was anxious to address (Ac 12:8, 21:16, cf. 12:17). There is in the Gospel no more beautiful picture than the two presented by St. Mark, in which the tenderness of Jesus to little children is emphasized. In each of them is pointed out the startling method by which His teaching was often enforced objectively on His hearers' attention (Mc 9:16, cf. 1 Lk 2:28).

Besides this literal use, there is also an extensive employment of the word in a metaphorical or a spiritual sense. Sometimes we find it used to denote the strength of the ungodly and their power to commit acts of tyranny on God's people (cf. Ps 10:6, Job 38:34, Ezk 30:16; cf. 'arm of flesh,' 2 Ch 32:6, Jer 17:6). Sometimes the word expresses the might of God's ceaseless activity even of His chosen (Dt 4:15, Ps 144, Is 66:3, Ac 13:24), or in breaking the power of His enemies (Ex 6:1, Dt 5:4, Ezk 21:29), or again in upholding the movements and harmony of His creation, ruling in justice with unswerving sternness (Ezk 20:4, Job 40:1, Is 40:18, Jer 27:28). The doom pronounced on the house of Eli contains this word to express the removal of that latent vitality which shows itself in prolonged hereditary strength and activity (1 S 20:3, cf. Zec 11:17).

The cognate verb is also used not only literally, to furnish arms for the purposes of war (Gn 14:14, Nu 31:18), but also in a spiritual sense, to procure and make use of those graces and helps which are meant as weapons, offensive and defensive, of the soul against the sinner (1 S 3:19, cf. Eph 6:18).

ARMAGEDDON.—See HARMAGEDON.

ARMENIA.—See ARARAT.

ARMLET.—See ORNAMENTS, § 4.

ARMONI.—Son of Saul by Rihaph (2 S 21:1).

ARMOUR, ARMS.—The soldier's arms, offensive and defensive, are never so termed in our EV: 'armour,' 'whole armour' (Eph 6:14 [Gr. panoplia], the 'harness' of 2 Mac 15:3, RV 'full armour'), and more frequently 'weapons of war' are the terms employed. In RV 'harness' in this sense has in most cases given place to 'armour.'

1. Offensive arms.—In a familiar representation from an Egyptian tomb of date, n.c. 1834, a band of Semitic nomads are depicted with the primitive arms of their race—the short spear, the bow, and the throw-stick—the last perhaps the handstaves of Ezk 39:7. In OT the principal arms of attack are the sword, the javelin, the bow, and the spear. The sword claims precedence as an older weapon than the sword. The normal Hebrew form, the chānit, had a stout wooden shaft with a flint, bronze, or iron (1 S 15:3) head. According to the period, the modern Bedouin sheik, it figures as a symbol of leadership in the case of Saul (1 S 22 26, cf. 15:18, RV). The rōmāch appears to have been a lighter form of spear, a lance, and to have largely supplanted the heavier spear or pike in later times (Neh 4:3, 14, Jl 3:9). Both are rendered 'spear' in EV. (b) The kīḏān was shorter and lighter than either of the above, and was used as a missile, and may be rendered javelin (Job 31:29, RV, Job 41:19, RV 'the rushing of the javelin') or dart. The latter term is used as the rendering of several missile weapons, of which the precise nature is uncertain.

(c) The sword had a comparatively short, straight blade of iron (1 S 13:4, Is 2), and was occasionally two-edged (Ps 149:4, He 4:7). Euhu's weapon, only 18 inches long, was rather a dagger (Je 3:19, RV 'sword'). The sword was worn on the left side, as a sign of the king's political enemies, especially as the narrative reveals the affection inspired by the prophet amongst some of the courtiers (Jer 39:3). A note of vividness is introduced into the narratives telling of St. Paul's method of bespeaking attention from a crowd which he was anxious to address (Ac 12:8, 21:16, cf. 12:17). There is in the Gospel no more beautiful picture than the two presented by St. Mark, in which the tenderness of Jesus to little children is emphasized. In each of them is pointed out the startling method by which His teaching was often enforced objectively on His hearers' attention (Mc 9:16, cf. 1 Lk 2:28).

Besides this literal use, there is also an extensive employment of the word in a metaphorical or a spiritual sense. Sometimes we find it used to denote the strength of the ungodly and their power to commit acts of tyranny on God's people (cf. Ps 10:6, Job 38:34, Ezk 30:16; cf. 'arm of flesh,' 2 Ch 32:6, Jer 17:6). Sometimes the word expresses the might of God's ceaseless activity even of His chosen (Dt 4:15, Ps 144, Is 66:3, Ac 13:24), or in breaking the power of His enemies (Ex 6:1, Dt 5:4, Ezk 21:29), or again in upholding the movements and harmony of His creation, ruling in justice with unswerving sternness (Ezk 20:4, Job 40:1, Is 40:18, Jer 27:28). The doom pronounced on the house of Eli contains this word to express the ARMOUE, ARMS.
Beasts (1 S 17"), as well as a military weapon (2 K 38 and often). The Hebrew sling, like those of the Egyptians and Assyrians, doubtless consisted of a long narrow strip of leather, widening in the middle to receive the stone, and tapering to both ends. At one end was a loop by which the sling was held as the finger swung it to the breast, while the other end was released as the stone was thrown. The Benjamites were specially noted for the accuracy of their aim (Jg 20.35).

2. Defensive arms.—(a) First among the arms of defence must be placed the shield, of which two main varieties are common to all periods, the small shield or buckler (rank and file, and the hard arm shielhide (zinnah), the target of 1 K 10°. The distinction between these is rarely preserved in our EV (e.g. Jer 47—in Ps 35, Ezek 29 they are reversed), but the relative sizes of the two kinds may be seen in the passage of 1 Kings just cited, where the targets or large shields each required four times as much gold as the smaller buckler. These, however, were only for state processions and the like (1 K 5°, 9°). Apart from this light round shield of the ancient world, the Roman cyp.'s; the zinnah was the scutum or large oblong shield which more effectively protected its bearer against the rakes of battle. This was most probably made of layers of leather stretched on a frame of wood or wickerwork, since both the shields and the bucklers might be burned (Ezek 39).

The spatha (23", a long thrusting weapon) was favourite with the religious poets of Israel (Psalm. passim). St. Paul also in his great military allegory introduces the large Greco-Roman shield (Eph 6). Neither the nature of the new helmets nor information. Kings and other nobles wore helmets of bronze (1 S 17°, 8°), but those prepared by Uzziah for 'all the host' (2 Ch 26°, RV) were more probably of leather, such as the monuments show to have been worn by mummies. The heads of other Armenians presented in the Greek age by bronze, for the élite of the infantry at least (1 Mac 6°).

(c) The same difference of material—bronze for the leader and iron for the common soldier—holds good for the cuirass or coat of mail (1 S 17°, 8°). The latter term takes place in RV of the antiquated habergeon (2 Ch 26°, Neh 4°, and brigandine (Jer 46°, 61°). The cuirass, which protected both back and front, is also intended by the breastplate of 1 S 35° (RvM 'coat of mail'), 1 Mac 3°, 1 Th 5°, Eph 6. Goliath's coat of mail was composed of scales of bronze, and probably resembled the Egyptian style of cuirass described and illustrated by Wilkinson (Anc. Egyp. [1878] i. 210 ff.). This detail is not given for Saul's cuirass (1 S 17°). Ahab's 'harness' consisted of a cuirass which ended in 'tassels or flaps, the lower 'armour' of K 6° (RvM). The Syrian war-animals were protected by breastplates (1 Mac 6°), and probably also the horses of the Egyptian cavalry (Jer 46).

Great pieces of bronze to protect the legs are mentioned only in connexion with Goliath (1 S 17°). The military boot is perhaps referred to in 1 S 9° (RvM).

The arm brisure is met with as early as the time of Abimelech (Jg 9°), and later in connexion with Jonathan, Saul, and Goliath, and with Joab, who had several (2 S 18°). This office was held by a young man, like the squire of medieval knighthood, who carried the shield (1 S 17°), cuirass, the reserve of darts (2 S 18°), and other weapons of his chief, and gave the coup de grâce to those whom the latter had struck down (1 S 14°).

An arm brisure for the storage of material of war is mentioned by Nehemiah (3°), but that this was built by David cannot be inferred from the difficult text of Ca 4°. Solomon's arm brisure was 'the house of the forest of Lebanon' (1 K 10°, 22°). The Temple also seems to have been used for this purpose (2 K 1°).

ARMOURBEARER, ARMOURY.—See Armbruir.

ARMY.—1. In default of a strong central authority, an army in the sense of a permanently organized and disciplined body of troops was an impossibility among the Hebrews before the establishment of the monarchy. The bands that followed a chief or division, and the hastily improvised levies from his own and neighbouring clans, whose members returned with their share of the spoil to their ordinary occupations when the fray was at an end. The first step towards a more permanent arrangement was the rise of the Philistines (1 S 13°, cf. 14°). David, however, was the first to establish the nucleus of a standing army, by retaining as a permanent bodyguard 600 'mighty men' (the official title was 'captain') round him in his exile (1 S 23°, 2 S 10°). To these were added the mercenary corps of the Chereithites and Peletithes (wh. see), and a company of 600 Gittites (2 S 15°). Apart from these, David was raised by levy as before, but now from the whole nation, hence the technical use of 'the people' in the sense of 'the army' (2 S 20° and often). Solomon's organization of his kingdom into administrative districts (1 K 4°) doubtless included matters of army administration (cf. v. 8° 10°).

2. The organization of the Hebrew army was by units of thousands, originally associated with the civil divisions of the same name, with subdivisions of hundreds, fifties, and tens (1 S 31°, 17°, 22°, 2 K 11°, 11°), an arrangement which continued into the Maccabean period (1 Mac 2°). Each unit had its own war-horse and one great 'captain.' The whole was under the supreme command of the 'captain of the host.' The relative positions and duties of the shoterim (AV 'officers') and other military officers are quite uncertain. The former appear to have been charged with keeping and checking the lists of the quotas to be furnished by the various districts (Dt 20°).

3. The army was composed in early times entirely, and at all times chiefly, of infantry, the bulk of whom were armed with the spear or pike and the large shield or target (see Armbris). The archers carried a sword and buckler (1 Ch 5°), and with the slingers (2 Ch 26°) made up the light infantry. Of the horsemen, although long before the vital part of the forces of the surrounding nations, were first introduced into the Hebrew army by Solomon (1 K 4°, 26°, 22°; see CHARIOT, HORSE).

4. The period during which a citizen was liable for military service extended from his twentieth (Nu 1°, 2 Ch 25°) to his fiftieth year (Jos. Ant. xii. xii. 4). Exemption was granted in the cases specified in Dt 20°, at least under the Maccabees (1 Mac 3°), and to the members of the priestly caste (Nu 29°).

5. As regards maintenance, each city and district had doubtless to supply its own quota with provisions, in so far as these were not drawn from the monarchy's store. The soldier's recompense consisted in his share of the loot, the division of which was regulated by the precedent of 1 S 30°. The first mention of regular pay is in connexion with the army of Simon Maccabaeus (1 Mac 14°). Foreign mercenaries figure largely in the armies of the later Maccabean princes and of Herod. No reference has been made to the numbers of the Hebrew armies, since these have in so many cases been greatly corrupted in transmission.

ARNA.—One of the ancestors of Ezra (2 Es 17), corresponding apparently to Zerahiah of Ezr 74 and Zeraias of 1 Es 8.

ARAN.—A descendant of David (1 Ch 315).

ARAN.—An Annu and ancestor of Jos (Lk 32), called in Mt 14 Ram (RV). Cf. Ru 41 ch 29 15.

ARON.—A valley with a stream in its bed, now called Wady el-Mojib, which gathers the waters from many tributary vales—the ‘wadys’ [AV ‘brooks,’ RV ‘valleys’] of Arnon (Nu 21-14)—as it flows westward to the Dead Sea. It was the N. border of Moab, cutting it off from the land of the Amorites in old time (Nu 21-13 etc.), and later, from that of the Eastern tribes (Jos 12 etc.). It is named in Is 16 (‘the fords of Arnon’) and Jer 48 (where the reference may be to the inhabitants of the valley, or to a city of that name now unknown). Mesha made the ‘high way in Arnon,’ and built (possibly fortified) Aroer (Moabite Stone). This ‘high way’ probably followed the line of the Roman road, traces of which still remain, with indications of a bridge, some distance W. of Aroer—the modern ‘Ar-Shar,’ or ‘Ar-ar’ which stands on the N. bank. W. Ewing.

AROD.—A son of Gad (Nu 26) Aradi Ga 46. A patronymic Arodites (Nu 26). Anor.—Three distinct places. 1. ‘Aroer which is by the river of Arnon’ (Dt 2.19) is probably the ruin ‘Arad’, on the north bank of the Wady Moffib (Arnon). In such a position it necessarily became a frontier town, and as such is mentioned (cf. Dt 24 2 K 10 etc.). It was captured by Sihon, king of the Amorites (Dt 24 4 Jos 12 and 13, Jg 11); when conquered by Israel it was assigned to Reuben (Dt 35); it was taken by Hazael, king of Syria (2 K 10), and apparently later on by Moab (Jer 48.2). 2. A city of Judah (1 S 30), perhaps the ruin ‘Ar’dr, twelve miles east of Beer-sheba. 3. A city of Gad near Rabbah, i.e. ‘Amonos (Jos 13, Jg 11). The site is unknown.

E. W. G. Masterman.

AROM (1 Es 5).—His descendants are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubbabel. The name has no parallel in the lists of Ezra, and Neh., unless it represents Hashum in Ezr 29.4.

ARPHASHAD was, according to Gn 10.26, the third son of Shem, and, according to 111,2, he was the second in the line of descent from Shem to Abraham. Gn 10.26 is transliterated on the basis of Shem, from which Babylonia or Assyria is absent in the present text. The latter portion of the word furnishes Chessed (cf. Gr 229), which is the singular form of Chassidim (Chaldees). Probably two words in this period of 106 were combined into one, the latter being Chessed and the former Arphashad, which is a region south-west of Assyria, possibly the same as the Arra-pachitis of Toltomey. The mistaken reading in 16.26 was then taken as the basis of 111.12.

ARAP.—A city of Syria north-west of Aleppo (2 K 18 19.1, Is 10 36 37 Jg 49). Now the ruin Teli Erfjed.

ARPHAXAD.—1. A king of the Medes (Jth 11). He reigned at Ecbatana, which he strongly fortified. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, made war upon him, defeated him, and put him to death. 2. The spelling of Arpachshad in AV, and at Lk 3 by RV also. See Arpachshad.

ARROW.—See Armour, and Magic DIVINATION, etc.

ARROWSNAKE (Is 34.5 RV).—See Owl, SERPENT.

ARSACES.—A king of Parthia (known also as Mithridates I.). When opposed by Demetrius Nikator, who thought people would rise to assist him against Tryphon, he deceived Demetrius by a pretense of negotiations, and in n.c. 138 took him prisoner (1 Mac 14.3; Justin, xxxvi. 1). In 1 Mac 15.9 Arsaces is mentioned among the kings to whom was sent an edict (Jos. Antiq. xiv. v. 3) from Rome forbidding the persecution of the Jews.

ARTSHURITH (AV Azechurith), 1 Es 6.11—12 of his sons returned with Zerubbabel. The corresponding name in Ezr 24.13 is Jorah; and in Neh 7:26 Hariph.

ARTS.—Among the Hebrews the fine arts, with the possible exception of music, were not necessarily cultivated (cf. ARCHITECTURE). The law of Ex 20 constituted an effective bar to the development of the plastic art in particular. As to the nature and workings of the early ephod (Deut 28 17), and stele (Gn 31:14, Jg 17.1, Is 10 19 RV), as of the ‘graven images’ and the later ‘molten images,’ we can only speculate. Sculpture in wood, but of Phenician workmanship, both in relief (1 K 8 22) and in the round (v. 22), found a place in the Temple of Solomon. The only specimens that were discovered of ‘genuine Israelite’ sculpture (according to the discoverer, Professor Sellin) are the headless human heads (cherubim), foreparts of lions and other motifs that adorn the upper altar of incense from Tannach (illust. PBEFS, 1904, 390).

Of painting there is no trace in OT. The coloured representations which Ezekiel saw with abhorrence on the gates of the Jerusalem Temple walls were not from the ancient original, but imitations, figures chiselled in outline, with the contours filled in with verminion (Ezk 23.14, cf. v. 11). The decorative work on pure Hebrew pottery was practically confined to geometrical designs. Of the minor arts, gem-engraving may have attained considerable development (Ex 28.11). The finest product of modern excavation in Palestine in the domain of art is probably the Hebrew seal with the lion maribor (cf. Gn 31:14) found at Magiddo (see Seals). Mention may also be made of the fibul and other gold work implied in such passages as Ex 28.11. The products of the Hebrew crafts must also have shown considerable skill (Ex 25). ARTAXERXES is the Greek form of the Old Persian Artakhshatra, the Hebrew being Artaxshart (Arx). The Artaxerxes of the Bible is Arta. Longimanus (n. c. 465 424), son of Xerxes (Bibl. Ahasuerus). By him Ezra was permitted to go to Jerusalem from Babylon and restore the affairs of the Jewish community (Ezr 7 8). He also favoured the simultaneous mission of his cup-bearer Nehemiah thirteen years later (Neh 2 5). The events narrated in Ezr 4 7 and said to have occurred in the time of Artaxerxes must have taken place during an earlier reign, probably that of Cambyses; if indeed, they are to be regarded as unhistorical. His reign was more important for Israel than that of any other king of Persia except Cyrus the Liberator.

ARTEMAS.—A trusted companion of St. Paul, in the later part of his life (Tit 3). There is no evidence for the statements of Dorotheus (Bibl. Maxima, Lugd. 1677, p. 429) that he had been one of the 70 disciples, and was afterwards bishop of Lydia.

ARTEMIS.—Ac 19 41 RV. See DELIA.

ARTIFICE.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS.

ARTILLERY.—1 S 20 AV (in obsol. sense, of Jonathan’s bow and arrows; RV ‘weapons’); 1 Mac 617. (see FORTIFICATION, § 7.

ARTS AND CRAFTS.—One of the most characteristic distinctions between the Hebrew and the Hellenic views of life is found in the attitude of the two races to manual labour. By the Greek it was regarded as unworthy of a free citizen; by the Jew it was held in the highest esteem, many Talmudic sopherim bear witness. The general rise in OT for craftsmen (2 K 24, Jer 24 RV), artificer (1 Ch 29), or skilled artificer is charash, from a root meaning ‘to cut.’ Most frequently, however, it is qualified by the name of the material. This suggests the following divisions. [In RV 'craft' has been displaced by the more modern 'trade'.]
ARTS AND CRAFTS

1. Workers in wood.—The productions of the 'worker in timber' (1 Ch 22:44), elsewhere in OT carpenter (also Mt 13:43, Mk 6:7), probably surpassed in variety and volume those of any other craftsman, for they comprised not only those of the modern carpenter and cabinetmaker, but also of the ploughwright, woodcarver, and other specialized arts and crafts of to-day. His tools cannot have differed much from those of his Egyptian contemporaries described and illustrated by Wilkinson (Anc. Egyg., see Index). Various axes are named in OT. For one variety the text distinguishes between the hewn and the wooden heel (Dt 19:14). Another is from the context probably an adze (Jer 10:9), while a third appears as a hatchet in Ps 74:17. RV. The carpenter's hammer (Jer 10:18) was rather a wooden mallet (cf. Jg 4:20); his saw (Is 41:7, Sir 49:28) seems latter probably then as now a 'booth-shaped piece of metal inserted in a section of an oak or walnut log'—the tongs (Is 44:3) and the bellows (Jer 6:24). For the goldsmith and the silversmith, see MOLY AND METALS, and Gold, Silver. The smiths carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 24:1, Jer 24:1) were probably those specially skilled in the manufacture of weapons of war.

2. Workers in stone.—From the time of palaeolithic days man has been a 'worker in stone', a term confined in OT to those who cut and dressed stone for building purposes (1 Ch 22:20). The more usual rendering is mason (2 S 9:4, 1 Ch 14:1), but masons are called by various processes, such as the 'heaving out' (1 K 5:17 RV) of the stones in the quarry (67 RV), the 'heaving' of wine-vats (Is 5:29) and tombs (2 K 20:4) in the solid rock, the cutting and dressing of 'hewn stones' for various constructions (Ex 20:4, 1 K 5:1, 2 K 22, Am 6:4). The stonesquares of 1 K 5:18 (AV) were rather men from the Phoenician city of Gebal (RV 'Gebalites'), in this branch of industry. The builders (2 S 9:4, 1 Ch 14:1) were usually in charge of the plan or model (Ex 25:1; 1 Ch 28:1, RV pattern), using the measureing-reed (Ex 20:4) and the plumbline (Am 7:7) or plummet (2 K 21:15, Zec 4:11). The large hammer used in quarrying (Jer 23:9) is different from the smaller hammer of the stone-cutter (1 K 6:7). The axe of the last passage is rather the pick for stone-dressing, and was the tool used in cutting in the Siloam tunnel as the workmen tell us in their famous inscription. For dressers in stone, see Scafts.

3. Workers in clay.—Clay, not stone, was the ordinary building material among the Hebrews (see House). Brickmaking, however, was too simple an operation to attain the dignity of a special craft in OT times, as was also 'plastering' with clay (Lv 14:4) or lime (De 14:3; cf. Mt 23:27 and Ac 25:2 'whited wall'). It was otherwise with the potter and his work, perhaps the oldest of all crafts, for which see Pottery.

4. Workers in leather.—Among these is the tanner (Ac 9:43), who prepared the leather from the skins of domestic and other animals, including the marine dugong (Ex 25:7, RV 'seal', AV 'badger'). The hair was removed by means of lime, or the acrid juices of plants, applied to the skins after they had been soaked for some time in water. Owing to their uncleanly accompaniments, the tanner and his trade were regarded by the Jews with much disfavour. Like the fuller, he was forbidden to carry on his trade in the city, which explains the situation of Simon's tannery 'by the sea side (Ac 10:31). In early times the tanner not only supplied the material but probably actually manufactured the leather and sold it to the shoemaker, while the making of shoes, girdles, and other articles of leather (Lv 13:47), and the preparation of skins for water, wine, and milk (see Botkins) were long matters of purely domestic economy.

5. Trades connected with dress.—The closing words of the preceding paragraph apply equally to the making of the ordinary dress of the Hebrews (cf. 1 S 24:12). The tailor first appears in the Mesopotamian milieu. Certain crafts, however, gradually developed into separate crafts, such as that of the weaver (Ex 35:30, 1 S 17:1; see Spinning and Weaving), the embroiderer (Ex i.e.), whose name, however, is only a technical term, was never employed (see Cottume). The work of the fuller (Is 7:17, Mal 3:9, Mk 9:9) was of two kinds, according to he dealt with the web from the loom, or with soiled garments that had already been worn. The latter he carried on in a similar way, with a soaplike substance (rendered soap in Mal 3:9) and fuller's earth. The new—'the uncressed cloth' of Mt 9:6, Mk 2:22 RV—on the other hand, after being thoroughly steeped in a similar mixture, was stamped and felted, then bleached with fumes of sulphur, and finally pressed in the fuller's press. Fulling, like tanning, was carried on outside the towns, but the precise situation of the 'fuller's field' of Isaiah's day (Is 15:2) is not certain. Here may be mentioned the barber (Ezk 51:1) and the perfumer (AV 'apothecary', 'confectionary'), for whom see Hair and Perfume respectively.

6. Employments connected with food.—Of the skilled-official class, were to be found only in the houses of the wealthy (see Food). The Hebrew name shows that they killed as well as cooked the animals. The shamble of 1 Co 10:16, however, are not, as some translations would have us believe, but the provision-market of Corinth, where meat and other provisions were sold. The butchers were numerous enough to give their name to a street of the capital in Jeremiah's day (Jer 37:19); for their work see Baks. Public mills employing millers appear late, but are implied in the rendering great millstone of Mt 19:19 RV (cf. marg. and see Milt). The well-known Tyronen cheece-sellers valued in Jerusalem received its name from the industry carried on there (Jos BJ v. iv. 1).

7. Miscellaneous employments.—If to the above there be added the tent-makers (Ac 18:3; see Scafts), BRICKMAKING, however, was too simple an operation to

8. Employments connected with the land.—Most of these are noticed in other connexions; see Agriculture, Sheep, Vine, etc. The prophet Amos describes himself as 'a dresser of sycomore trees' (Am 7:1 RV), for which see Amos, ad not.

9. Miscellaneous employments.—If to the above there be added the tent-makers (Ac 18:3; see Scafts), no trade or manual employment of importance will, it is hoped, have been overlooked. Most of the remaining occupations will be found under their own (e.g., 'baker', 'schmuck', 'handicraftsman') or kindred titles, as 'merchant' under Trade, 'physician' under Medicine, etc.

10. Two general characteristics.—This article may fitly close with a brief reference to two characteristics of all the more important handicrafts and occupations. The first is still a feature of Eastern cities, namely, the grouping of the members of the same craft in one street or quarter of the city, to which they gave their name. Thus we find in Jerusalem, as has been noted, 'the bakers' street', 'the fullers' field', and 'the cheesemakers' valley', to which perhaps he added 'the valley of craftsmen' (Neh 11:18). Josephus mentions a smiths' bazaar, a wool-market, and a clothes-market in the Jerusalem of his day (BJ v. vii. 1).

The second point to be noted is the evidence that the members of the various crafts had already formed themselves into associations or guilds. Thus we read in Nehemiah of a 'son of the apothecaries, i.e., a member of the guild of perfumers (38)', and of 'a son of the goldsmiths' (39). Cf. Ezra 2:42 the 'sons of the porters' and the familiar 'sons of the potters'. In 1 Ch 23: Bre see similar associations of linen weavers and potters, for which see Macalister, 'The Craftsmen's Guild', etc. PEF 54, 1905, 243 ff. The expression 'sons of' to denote membership of an association goes back to the days when trades were hereditary in particular families. A guild of silversmiths is attested for Ephesus (Ac 19:19). For the probable earnings of artisans among the Jews see W. A. R. S. Kennedy.

ARUBOTH.—An unknown district, probably in S.W. Palestine (1 K 4:9).

ARUMAH.—The place of refuge of Abimelech (Jg 9:4), perhaps de-Ormesh, 6 miles S.E. of Nablus (Shechem).

ARVAD (modern Ruwâd) was the most important of the northerly cities of Phoenicia. It was built on an island 70 miles north of Beirut—a sort of second Tyre, with another town on the mainland opposite. In Ezck 27:11 it is named as furnishing oarsmen for the galleys of Tyre and warriors for its defence. In the ethnological list of Gn 10:18 (1 Ch 1:9) it is mentioned among the chief settlements of the Canaanites or Phoenicians. Throughout antiquity it was a place of renown for trade and general enterprise, ranking next to Tyre and Sidon. It is the Aradus of 1 Mac 1:29.

J. F. McCurdy.

ARZA.—Prefect of the palace at Tirzah, in whose house King Elah was assassinated by Zimri at a carouse (1 K 16:9).

ARZARETH (2 Es 18:4).—A region beyond the river from which the ten tribes are to return. It became the subject of many later Jewish legends concerning the Sabatic River beyond which the lost tribes were to be found—variously identified with the Oxus and the Ganges.

ASA. 1. The third king of Judah after the disruption, succeeding Ahijah. Since his mother's name is given as the same as that of his mother, some have supposed the two kings to have been brothers. But there may be some mistake in the text. Asa is praised by the Biblical writer for his religious zeal, which led him to reform the worship, and even to depose his mother from her place of influence at court because of her idolatrous practices. Politically he was a mistaken character. He submitted to Benhadad of Damascus to secure his aid against Baasha of Israel, who had captured Ramah. The temple treasures were sent to Benhadad, who thereupon invaded Israel, and Baasha was compelled to sacrifice the threaten strong fortress (1 K 15:22-23). The Chronicler (2 Ch 14:5) credits Asa with a victory over an enormous force of Ethiopians. 2. A Levite (1 Ch 9:9).

H. P. Smith.

ASADIAS (A' is kind,' cf. 1 Ch 24:3).—An ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1).

ASAHEL.—1. The youngest son of Zeruiah, David's sister, and the brother of Joab and Abishai. He was famous for his swiftness of foot, a much valued gift in ancient times. He was one of David's thirty heroes, probably the third of the second three (1 K 15:23). He was also commander of a division in David's army (1 Ch 27:7). He was slain by Abner (2 S 2:18-22). 2. A Levite, who taught the people in the reign of Jehoshaphat (1 Ch 17:2). 3. A subordinate collector of offerings and tithe in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31:3). 4. Father of Jonathan, who opposed Ezra's action in connexion with the divorce of foreign wives (Ezr 10:4).

ASALAH (A' is made').—1. One of the deputations sent by Josiah to consult Huldah the prophetess, 2 K 22:14 (AV Assiah), 2 Ch 34:2. 2. One of the Simeonite princes who attacked the shepherds of Gedor, 1 Ch 4:6.

ASAPHE (A' gatherer').—1. The father of Joah, the 'recorder' or chronicler of the court of King Jehoshaphat (1 Ch 15:17). 2. The 'keeper of the king's forest,' to whom king Artaexerxes addressed a letter directing him to supply Nemehiah with timber (Neh 2:7). 3. A Korahite (1 Ch 26:29), same as Abiasaph (wh. see). 4. The seer of one of the three guilds which conducted the musical services of the Temple in the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 15:16; etc.). The latter traces this arrangement to the appointment of David, in whose reign Asaph, who is called 'the seer' (2 Ch 20:25), is supposed to have lived. At first the Asaphites alone seem to have formed the Temple choir, and in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (wherever we have the memoirs of the latter in their original form) they are not yet reckoned among the Levites. At a later period they shared the musical service with the 'sons of Korah' (see Korahites). Ps 50 and 73-88 have the superscription le-Asaph, which means in all probability that they once belonged among the Levites. Artaxerxes the Great and also among the Amalekites.

ASCARA (1 Es 5:4).—His sons were among the Temple servants or Nethinim who returned under Zerubbabel; omitted in the parallel lists in Ezzr. and Neh.

ASARAMEL (AV Šarahem).—A name whose meaning is quite uncertain (1 Mac 14:4). See R.Vm. ASPAREL (AV Asareel).—A son of Jehallelel (1 Ch 4:4).

ASASARETH (1 Es 5:5).—A king of Assyria, probably a corrupt form of the name Esarhaddon, which is found in the parallel passage Ezzr 4:4. The AV form Asarharez comes from the Vulgate.

ASCALON.—See ASKELON.

ASCENSION.—The fact of our Lord's Ascension is treated very scantily in the Synoptic Gospels. From Mt. it is entirely omitted. In the appendix to Mk. the words in which it is stated are rather the formula of a creed than the narrative of an event (Mk 16:19). Lk. is somewhat more circumstantial, and, though the chronology is uncertain, mentions the journey to the neighbourhood of Bethany and the disappearance of Christ in the act of blessing, together with the return of the disciples to Jerusalem (Lk 24:42-53). The narrative, meagre as it is, is not inconsistent with, and may even presuppose, the events recorded at greater length in Acts (1:4-5). Here we learn that the scene was more precisely the Mount of Olives (v.19); that this was the final conversational discourse of Jesus, and that prior to this and after it, but also made in Mk 10:9, concerned the promise of the Holy Spirit (vv.4-9); and that the Ascension, so far as it was an event and therefore a subject of testimony, took the form of the uplifting of the bodily form of Jesus from the earth till it disappeared in a cloud (vv. 4-10). Whether this experience involved more than the separation of Christ from immediate contact with the earth, and included his gradual descent into the upper air, there is nothing directly to show. The general form of the narrative recalls that of the Ascension in view of the fragment (Lk 9:29-36). The words of the 'two men in white apparel' (v. 19) suggest that the final impression was that of disappearance above the heads of the onlookers (v. 11). It will be noticed, that while the Markan appendix and Luke, unless the latter narrative is interpolated, blend fact and figure (Mk 16:9 'received up [fact] into heaven [partly fact, partly figure], and sat down at the right hand of God [figure']; Lk 24:46 'he parted from them [fact], and ascended into heaven [partly figure; but see R.V.]', as must necessarily be the case where the doctrine of the Ascension is concerned; Acts, on the other hand, which purports to describe an event, rigidly keeps within the limits of testimony.

There are certain anticipations of the Ascension in the Gospels which must be regarded as part of their witness to it. Thus Lk. introduces the account of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem with the warning that 'when the days were being fulfilled that he should be received up' (Lk 21:32 R.V.). It is probable that the Ascension is here delineated blended with the Crucifixion, as some regard the Crucifixion Christ. Harnack, in his 'Gesammtwerk' (1890), regarded the word Εξωδιασε (Lk 24:51) as almost necessarily imply the Ascension. The Fourth Gospel, while in its accustomed manner omitting the story of the Ascension, probably regarded as known, introduces it on the part of Christ both before and after the Resurrection (Jn 6:27 7:14, 15 16:20 etc.). And if we compare statements in the Epistles (Eph 4:10, He 1:14 etc.) with the Ascension narrative, it is possible that we are able to detect in these passages some of the historic facts as the basis of their teaching. To this must be added all those passages which speak of Jesus as exalted to the right hand or throne of God (Ro 8:3), Eph 1:10, He 10:12 etc.), and as returning to earth in the glory of the Father (Mt 25:31, Mk 9:31, Ph 3:20 etc.). In connexion with the Resurrection, uses the expression 'having gone up into heaven' (1 P 3:22, cf. Jn 14:3). From this we omit such considerations as arise out of the fact of the Resurrection itself, which are satisfied only by an event that puts a definite period to the earthly manifestation of the incarnate Christ.

From what has been said it will appear that the Ascension stands on a somewhat different level from the Resurrection as an attested fact. Like the Virgin-birth, it did not form a part of the primitive preaching, nor does it belong to the evidences of Christianity. The fragment of what is thought to be a primitive hymn quoted in 1 Ti 3:16 somewhat curiously places 'preached among the nations' before 'received up in glory.' But it is nevertheless a fact which came within the experience of the Apostles, and can therefore claim a measure of historical testimony. The Resurrection is itself the strongest witness to the reality of the Ascension, as of the Virgin-birth, nor would either in the nature of the case have been capable of winning its way to acceptance apart from the central faith that Jesus actually rose from the dead. But neither the fact itself nor its importance to the Christian believer depends upon the production of evidence for its occurrence. It will not be seriously disputed by those who accept the Apostolic gospel. On the other hand, the fact that the Ascension was accepted in the primitive Church as the event which put an end to the heavenly manifestation of Christ, and took away the Resurrection in striking relief as in the full sense of the word a fact of history. It is the Ascension, represented as it is in Scripture not only by the historical, but also by the mystical, and not only the Resurrection, which might be viewed as an apotheosis or idealization of Jesus. That 'Jesus is now living at the right hand of God' (Harnack) is not a sufficient account of the Christian belief in the Resurrection, and the claims of the Ascension narrative, which, even if Keim and others are right in regarding it as a materialization of the doctrine of the eternal Session as set forth in the Epistles, becomes necessary only when the Resurrection is accepted in the most literal sense.

The Ascension is the point of contact between the man Jesus Christ of the Gospels and the mystical Christ of the Epistles, preserving the historical character of the former and the universality of the latter in true continuity. It enabled the disciples to identify the Egyptian Pentecost with the promise of the Holy Spirit, which had been specially connected with the withdrawal of Jesus from bodily sight and His return to the Father (Jn 16:7, 14). An eternal character is thus given to the sacrifice of the death of Christ, which becomes efficacious through the exaltation of His crucified and risen manhood (He 10:11-14, 13-14). J. G. SIMPSON.

ASCENT OF BLOOD (Jos 15:15, AV 'ascent of Adummin').—The steep road from Jericho to Jerusalem, so called, according to Jerome, from the heads of the brigands who infested it (cf. Lk 10:38); but see ADUMMIN.

DAVID SMITH.

ASEAS (1 Es 9:26).—One of the sons of Anna who agreed to put away his 'strange' wife; called Ishihjah, 1 Es 10:26.

ASEBERIAS (AV Asebeia).—A Levite who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (1 Es 8:47).

ASEBIA (AV Asebia).—A Levite who returned with Ezra (1 Es 8:48).

ASENATH.—Daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On, wife of Joseph and mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen 41:44). The name is like the Hebrew names in the story of Joseph, is of a well-known late type, prevalent from about n.c. 950; it should probably be vocalized Asseit or Basen or 'belonging to Re,' (or 'belonging to the father of Re'). Nett was the goddess of Saiz, and the name was especially popular in names from the 26th (Saite) Dyn., n.c. 664, and onwards for some two centuries. Asemith is the heroine of a remarkable Jewish and Christian romance, in which she renounces her false gods before her marriage with Joseph; it can be traced back to the 5th cent. A.D., and is probably a good deal earlier.

F. L. GUPTILL.

ASH.—See Frn.

ASHAH (Jos 15:19, 1 Ch 4:66).—Perhaps the same as Cor-asahan (wh. see). It was a town of Judah, near Libnah and Rimmon, belonging to Simeon, and not far from Debir. The site is doubtful.

ASHARELAH (AV Asareiah).—An Asshaphite (1 Ch 25:2), called in v. 14 Jesheerah.

ASHBEA occurs in an obscure passage (1 Ch 4:4 'house of A.' ) where it is uncertain whether it is the name of a place or of a man.

ASHDOD ('fortress'; Greek Azotus).—A city in the Philistia Pentapolis; not captured by Joshua (Jos 13:13), and a refuge for the unslaughtered Anakim (Jos 11:21); theoretically assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jos 15:45). Hither the Philistines brought the ark, and sent it thence to Gath, on account of an outbreak probably of bubonic plague (1 S 5:4). Uzziah attacked the city, destroyed its walls, and established settlements near it (2 Ch 26:9). The Ashdodites joined with Sanballat in opposing Nehemiah's restoration of Jerusalem (Neh
ASHER

47, yet some of the Jew of the period married wives from Ashdod, and their children spoke in its dialect (Neh 13:24). It was captured by Sargon's commander-in-chief (Isa 19:22), by Memnon, Zerahiah, and Zechariah speak denunciations against it. It was again captured by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc 5:49), and again by Jonathan (10:4). The solitary reference to it in the NT is the record of Philip's departure thither after the baptism of the Ethiopian (Ac 8:28). It is identified with the modern Ewodu, a village about two-thirds of the way from Jaffa to Askalan, and some 3 miles from the sea. It is on the slope of a hill, and at its entrance are the remains of a large mediaval khan. There are fragments of ancient buildings to be found here and there in the modern walls.

ASHER.—1. A town on the so. border of Manasseh (Jos 17:7). Site unknown. 2. To 1 Ch 16:10, no. 1.

ASHER.—1. The eighth son of Jacob, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid. Leah, joyful over his birth, named him 'Happy' (Gn 30:11). This 'popular etymology' dominates Jacob's speech in the Blessing of Jacob (48:49) and the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33:17). Asher's territory was especially fertile and fitted to promote prosperity. Whether this fact operated in its naming, or whether the name was originally that of a divinity of Ashen, or of a Canaanite clan mentioned frequently in the Tell el-Amarna letters as the Māri abd-Asheerīt ('Sons of the servant of Asher'), or whether the Canaanite tribe 'Asur, known from the inscriptions of the Egyptian king Seti I. (14th cent.), gave its name to the tribe, it is impossible to say. The two last theories imply an amalgamation of original inhabitants with a Hebrew clan or tribe, which, probably prior to the entrance of the southern tribes, had found its way to the North. A predominance of the Gentile element thus introduced would account, in a measure at least, for the non-participation of the Asherite in the war against Sisera, although they are said to have sent a contingent to the support of Gideon in his war with the Midianites (Jg 6:9-7:1), and, according to the Chronicle, sent 40,000 strong to Hebron to aid David in his struggle for the kingship (1 Ch 12:9). According to the earliest writing extant in the OT, viz., the Song of Deborah, the other northern tribes, Zebulun to the south and Naphtali to the east of it, flung themselves with fierce abandon against the army of Sisera, while 'Asher sat still at the haven of the sea' (Jg 5:17). According to P's census, there were 41,500 males 'twenty years old and upward' at Sinai, and when they arrived in the plains of Moab they had increased to 53,400 (Nu 1:26-28). P gives also the territorial boundaries, including the names of 22 cities and their dependent villages, the majority of which are unidentified (Jos 19:19-42; cf. Jg 1:27 & Jos 17:17). Asher's territory was gained by settlement, not by conquest (Jg 1:1). The tribe played an unimportant role in Israel. It is not mentioned in 1 Ch 27:26ff, where the tribes are enumerated together with their respective leaders under David. For the genealogies see Gn 46:17, Nu 26:8, 1 Ch 7:6-8. See also TRIBE OF ISRAEL.

ASHERAH.—In RV Asherah (plur. Asherim, more rarely Ashereth) appears as the tr. of a Hebrew substantive which AV, following the LXX and Vulgate, had mistakenly rendered grove. By OT writers the word is used in three distinct applications.

1. The goddess Asherah.—In several places Asherah must be recognized as the name of a Canaanite deity. Thus in 1 K 18:19 we read of the prophet of Baal and of Asherah, in 2 K 18:2; 18:4 of 'an abominable image' and in 2 K 21:2 of 'a graven image' of Asherah, also of the sacrificial vessels used in her worship (238), while Jg 3 speaks of the Baalim and the Asheth. These references, it must be allowed, are not all of equal value for the critical historian and some of our foremost authorities have hitherto declined to admit the existence of a Canaanite goddess Asherah, regarding the name as a mere literary personification of the asherah or sacred pole (see § 3), or as due to a confusion with Astarte (cf. Jg 3:15 with 23:31). In the last few years, however, a variety of monumenntal evidence has been turned up by the LXX salesman sur les religions semitiques (1905), 119 ff)—the latest from the soil of Palestine itself in a cuneiform tablet found at Taanach—showing that a goddess Ashirat or Asherah was worshipped from a remote antiquity by the Western Semites. There need be no hesitation, therefore, in accepting the above passages as evidence of her worship in OT times, even within the Temple itself.

The relation, as to name, history, and attributes, of this early Canaanite goddess to the powerful Semitic deity named Ishtar by the Babylonians, and Asherah (OT 'Ashethore') by the Phoenicians, is still obscure (see K A T. Index; Largue, op. cit.). The latter in any case gradually displaced the former in Canaan.

2. An image of Asherah.—The graven image of Asherah set up by Manasseh in the Temple (2 K 21:7), when destroyed by Josiah, is simply termed the asherah (2 K 23:7). Like the image described by the prophet of the Exile (Is 44:16), it evidently consisted of a core of wood overlaid with precious metal, since it could be at once burned and 'stamped to powder' (2 Ch 22:11) for the corresponding image of Baal at Samaria (cf. 1 K 16:24 with 2 K 10:10) according to the emended text of the latter passage it was burned by Jehu but was soon restored (13'-something of greater consequence than a mere post or pole. It must have been a celebrated image of the goddess.

3. A symbol of Asherah.—In the remaining passages of OT the asherah is the name of a prominent, if not indispensable, object associated with the altar and the mazzaboth (see P I L L A K) in the worship of the Canaanite high places. It was made of wood (Jg 6:25), and could be planted in the ground (Dt 16:22), plucked up or cut down (Mic 5:14, Ex 34:21), and burned with fire (Dt 12:11). Accordingly, the asherah is now held to have been a wooden post or pole having symbolical significance in the Canaanite cults. How far it resembled the similar emblems figured in representations of Babylonian and Punicene rites can only be conjectured.

When the Hebrews occupied Canaan, the local sanctuaries became seats of the worship of J', at which the altars of sacred pole and pillar continued as before. The disastrous results of this incorporation of heathen elements led to the denunciation of the asherahs by the prophetic exponents of Israel's religion (Ex 34:13, Jer 17, Mic 5:14, and esp. Dt 7:12-15, 16), and to their ultimate abolition (2 K 18:20).

4. Significance of the asherah.—The theory at present most in favour among OT scholars finds in the asherahs or sacred poles the substitutes of the sacred trees universally revered by the early Semites. This theory, however, is not only incapable in view of the fact that the asherahs are found beside or under such sacred trees (Jer 17:2, 1 K 14:23, 2 K 17:12), but has been discredited by the proved existence of the goddess Asherah. In the earlier period of the Semitic occupation of Canaan (c.n.c. 2500-2000), this deity probably shared with Baal (cf. Jg 3:15 etc.) the chief worship of the immigrants, particularly as the goddess of fertility, in which aspect her place was later usurped by Astarte. In this early unionism, the asherah was the male symbol, as the stone pillar was of Baal. Bearing her name, it passed by gradual stages into the complete elkan or anthropomorphic image of the deity as in Samaria and Jerusalem.

ASHES. — Ashes on the head formed one of the customary tokens of mourning for the dead (see Mourning Customs as of private 2 S 13‘b and national humiliation (Neh 9, 1 M 25)7). The penitent and the afflicted might also sit (Job 2, Jon 30) or even wallow in ashes (Jer 6, Ezk 27‘). In 1 K 20‘a we must, with RV, read ‘headband’ (wh. see) for ‘ashes.

In a figurative sense the term ‘ashes’ is often used to signify even greater wretchedness. Insignificance (Gn 15‘a, Job 20‘b). ‘Proverbs of ashes’ (13‘a RV) is Job’s equivalent for the modern ‘rot.’ For the use of ashes in the priestly ritual see Radd Haife.

A. R. S. KennedY.

ASHHUR (AV Ashur).—The ‘father’ of Tekos (1 Ch 2‘a 4).1

ASHITMA. — A god whose form of worship is unknown, and who has been identified with the Phoenician El Shamun and the Babylonian Tashmītu. As Hazmu, the god’s seat of worship (2 K 17‘b), was occupied by the Hittites, the deity was probably non-Semitic. N. Koenig.

ASHELKON (Greek Ascalon).—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is mentioned several times in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. According to Jos 15‘a it was unoccupied, but the interpolated passage, Jg 11‘b, enumerates it among the places captured by Israel. It is doubtful whether Samson took the spoil with which he paid his wages (Jg 14‘a) from this city, which is a two days’ journey from Timnath, or from a similarly styled village, much nearer at hand, now possibly represented in name by Kharbet ‘Ashkalon, near Tel Zakariya. It is referred to in the story of the return of the ark (1 S 6‘a), and in David’s lament (2 S 20‘d), and with the other Philistine cities is made an object of denunciation by various prophets. Here Jonathan Maccabaeus was honourably received (1 Mac 10‘b 11‘a), and it was the birthplace of Herod the Great. It was captured by the Crusaders, but recaptured by the Muslims after the battle of Hattin. Extensive remains of ancient buildings still exist on the site, which retains the name of ‘Ashkelon: numerous fragments of statues etc. are found by the natives from time to time. R. A. S. Macalister.

ASHKENAZ in Gn 10‘a (1 Ch 1‘b) appears as a son of Cush (wh. see), which means apparently that the name represents a people akin to the Cimmerians, an Indo-European people who made trouble for the Assyrians in and about Armenia in the later days of their empire, in the 7th cent. B.C. In Jer 51‘a Ashkenaz is connected with Ararat and Minni. The view now generally accepted by scholars is that Ashkenaz in the Hebrew text is a slight misreading for Ashghāz, an important tribe akin to the Cimmerians who had to do with Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, the last great kings of Assyria, the name appearing in the inscriptions as Ashghāz. Further, it is probable that the Skythōn, ‘Scythians,’ represent the same people and word.

ASHNAH.—Two unknown sites of towns in Judah (Jos 15‘a and 15‘d).

ASHPENAZ.—The chief of Nebuchadrezzar’s eunuchs (Dn 1‘b).

ASHTOAROTH. — This city (pl. of Ashethoreth [wh. see]), originally held by Og, king of Bashan (Dt 1‘a, Jos 9‘b 12‘a 13‘b 3).2 later captured by the Israelites and by them awarded to the Gershonites (Jos 21‘b Be-eshterah, ‘dwelling [or temple] of Ashethoreth’; cf. | 1 Ch 6‘a, 7‘c), named in the roll of allotments, among the9 six tribes of Israel, and identified with Ashethoreth-karnaim (wh. see). However, a statement found in Eusebius’ Onomasticon favours the view that the names designate ‘Ashethoreth-kenain (Mac 3‘b). The Eusebian relates that there were at this time two names of the village, separated by a distance of 9 miles, lying between Adara (Edrei) and Abila; viz., (1) Ashethoreth, the ancient city of Og, 3 miles from Abila, and (2) Karnaim Ashethoreth, a village in the corner of Bashan, where Job’s village is shown (cf. Book of Jubilees 29‘a). Eusebius’ Karnaim Ashethoreth evidently lay in the corner of Bashan formed by the rivers Nahr er-Rukhad and Shurr‘at el-Madaineh, in which vicinity tradition places Zb, Job’s fatherland. At long. 36° E., lat. 32° 50‘ N., on the Bashan plateau, stands Tell (‘hill’) ‘Ashthor, whose strategic value as shown by the ruins, was recognized in the Middle Ages. Its base is watered by the Mayo en-Nob Ayyūb (’stream of the prophet Job’). Following this rivulet’s course for 24 miles N.E., passing through the Hammam Ayyūb (‘Job’s bath’), is found its source, a spring said to have trebled to four when Job himself was impetuous stamped upon the ground. In the immediate vicinity towards the S., Job’s grave is shown. Furthermore, upon the hill at whose base these two places are situated lies the village of Sa’diyeh or Shekit Sa’d, whose mosque contains the tomb of a hero, a large basalt boulder against which Job is said to have leaned while receiving his friends. Indeed, 1 of a mile S. of Sa’diyeh at el-Merkes, another grave (modern) of Job is shown, and a Der (‘monastery’) Ayyūb, according to tradition built by the Ghassanids Amr, is known to have existed. Eusebius’ Ashethoreth must then have been in the proximity of Muser, 34 miles S. of Sa’diyeh, and 8 miles N.W. of Adara, almost the center, almost the center, the point of Onomasticon. Even Tell ‘Aṣhtar, 44 miles S. of Tell ‘Aṣhtar, protected on the one side by the Yarmuk, on the other by a chasm, and showing evidences of having been fortified by a triple wall toward the third, is admirably situated for a royal stronghold.

None of these modern place-names, with the exception of Tell ‘Aṣhtar, is linguistically related to the Ashethoreth and ‘Ashethoreth-karnaim of the Bible and Onomasticon. The description of ‘Ashethoreth-karnaim (2 Mac 12‘b, cf. 1 Mac 5‘a) as a place hard to besiege and difficult of access because of numerous passes leading to it, in whose center is a double peak, is applicable to Sa’diyeh or to Tell ‘Aṣhtar or even to Tell Aṣhtar, whose double peak at the S. summit is partly responsible for the translation of the name ‘Aṣthor of (near) the double peak’ (see Ashtoreth). The similarity of name between Tell ‘Aṣhtar and ‘Aṣṭothor-karnaim, even though Tell ‘Aṣhtar does not lie directly between Adara and Abila, and lacks, with the other places, narrow passes, would favour the identification of ‘Ashethoreth-karnaim with Tell ‘Aṣhtar, and hence, according to the distances of Eusebius, the location of ‘Aṣthor near Muser. However, until the ancient name of Muser is known, and the various levels excavated, a definite determination of the location of these cities, and even of the difference between them, must remain impossible. N. Koenig.

ASHTHORETH-KARNAIM.—The scene of Chederaulins’ defeat of the Rephaim (Gn 14‘b). It is perhaps mentioned in Am 6‘a (EB ‘Have we not taken us horn (Karnaim) by our own strength’?). It is identical with Carnion or Karnaim, after whose capture, in n.c. 164, Judas Maccabaeus destroyed the temple of Ataratis (wh. see), whether the inhabitants had fled for refuge (2 Mac 12‘b, cf. 1 Mac 6‘a) for the interpretation of name see Ashethoreth, and for location, Ashethoreth. N. Koenig.

ASHTORETH.—This deity, especially known in the Sidonian goddess for whom Solomon erected a shrine, later destroyed by Josiah (1 K 11‘a 13, 2 K 23‘), was worshiped by all Semites, and the most striking Biblical records, be identified with Ashethoreth-karnaim (wh. see). However, a statement found in Eusebius’ Onomasticon favours the view that the names designate ‘Ashethoreth-kenain (Mac 3‘b). The Eusebian relates that there were at this time two names of the village, separated by a distance of 9 miles, lying between Adara (Edrei) and Abila; viz., (1) Ashethoreth, the ancient city of Og, 3 miles from Abila, and (2) Karnaim Ashethoreth, one might even be justified in supposing from the name that ‘Ashethoreth was represented with the horns of a cow or a ram. Mesha, king of Moab, dedicated his prisoners to a composite goddess 'Ashtar-Chemosh. Indeed, her existence in S. Arabia is evidenced by the probably equivalent male god 'Athtar. In Abyssinia, she was called Astar; in Assyria and Babylonia, Ishtar (used also in the pl. 'Ashtartu) to denote 'goddesses,' cf. 'Ashtaroth, Jg 21:19, 1 S 7:2 1292); in Syria, 'Atur, and in Phœnicia, 'Ashtar, whence the Hebrew 'Ashtur (with the vowels of Ishtar (the feminine thing)) substituted for the original. See Molech, Baal.

The character of this goddess, concerning which the OT makes no direct statement, is most clearly depicted in the Assyro-Babylonian literature. Here she appears as the goddess of fertility, productiveness, and love on the one hand, and of war, death, and decay on the other, a personification of the earth as it passes through the seasons. In Assyria, the sixth month, Elul, the height of the summer, is sacred. In this month, through her powers, the ripening of vegetable life takes place, represented by Tammuz, whose coming is heralded by Ishtar's festival at Aû in the fifth month. From this period of the year, the crops and verdure gradually decay, and finally disappear in the winter. Thus, since Ishtar has failed to secure the life which her powers had created, popular belief made her the cause of death and decay. She therefore became a destructive goddess, who visited with disease those who disobeyed her commands, and even a goddess of war. (cf. 1 S 31:3).

However, she was later conceived as a warrior-nation goddess, whose victory over her enemies was symbolized in her destruction of the vegetable life. As a mother-goddess (her temple at Nimroud), she set out to the lower world in search of healing waters to revive Tammuz. During this quest (winter) the propagation of all life ceases. Successful in her search, she brings forth the new verdure, and once more assumes the rôle of a merciful goddess, to whom all life is due. At a later period, when all gods had obtained their fixed abodes and the necessity of assigning an abode to them was felt, the gods were identified with the heavenly bodies. Thus Ishtar was given the planet Venus, whose appearance at certain seasons was the morning-star and at other times as the evening-star, paralleled the growth and decay of nature. Hence, in accordance with one theological school of the Babylonians, which considered Sin (moon) the ruler of the luminaries of the night, Ishtar was also known as the 'daughter of Sin.' By others she was designated as 'daughter of Anu (lord of heaven),' and even as the 'sister of Shamash (sun),' since, as the evening-star Venus appears in the west, and reappears in the east in the same manner.

The cults of this goddess were extant at various localities of Babylonia and Assyria. At some of these, both sexes of her character were worshipped, side by side, with equality; at others, more importance was attached to one of her aspects. Thus at Uruk (Erech) in her temple E-Anna ('house of heaven') she was both a goddess of fertility and a martial deity, in whose service were Kizrett, Ukhati, and Kharmati, the priestesses of Ishtar. At Agade, Calah, and Babylon greater stress seems to have been laid upon the latter aspect, and it is doubtless with the worship of this side of Ishtar's nature that the religious prostitution mentioned by Greek writers was connected (Hdt. i. 199; Strab. xvi. i. 20; Ep. Jerem. cf.; Luc. de Cœl. 6 f.). Among the Assyrians, three Ishtars, viz., Ishtar of Nimroud, Ishtar of Kidiminiru (temple at Nimroud), and Ishtar of Arbelu, were especially worshipped. This warrior-nation naturally dwelt upon the martial aspect of the deity almost to the exclusion of her mild side as a mother-goddess, and accorded to her a position next to Ashur, their national god. Indeed, Ishtar was even designated as his wife, and since he ruled over the Iputi (spirits of heaven), so she was said to be 'mighty over the Anunnakki' (spirits of the earth).

Thus Ishtar is the goddess whom Ashur-nisir-pal (n.c. 1800) apathy calls 'queen of the gods, into whose hands are delivered the commands of the great gods, lady of Nineveh, daughter of Sin, sister of Shamash, mother of the gods, dispenser of light and life, and the goddess of the universe, lady of heaven and earth, who hears petitions, heeds sighs, the merciful goddess who loves justice.' Equally does Esarhaddon's claim, that it was 'Ishtar, the lady of heaven and earth, who stood at his side and broke his enemies' bows, apply to this deity—a goddess, to whom the penitent in the anguish of his soul prays—'Beside thee there is no guiding deity.

I implore thee to look upon me and hear my sighs.
I proclaim peace, and may thy soul be appeased.
How long, O my Lady, till thy countenance be turned towards me.
Like doves, I lament, I satiate myself with sighs.'

N. ROBIN.

ASHURANIPAL—Son and successor of Esarhaddon on the throne of Assyria, n.c. 668-626. He is usually identified with Asshur-rî, Ezr. 4:19. He included Manasseh of Judah among his tributaries, and kept an Assyrian garrison at Gezer. See ASHURA, OSNAPPAR.

C. H. W. JOHN.

ASHURITES.—One of the tribes over whom Ishboseth ruled (2 S 21). The name is clearly corrupt, for neither the Assyrians (Asshar) nor the Arabian tribe Harurim (2 Sm 25) can be intended. The Pesh. and Vulg. read 'the Geushurites,' whose territory bordered on that of Gilead (Jos 13:13), and who might therefore be suitably included here. It has been urged, however, against this view, that Geushur was an independent kingdom at this time (cf. 2 S 2 S 13:13), so that Ishboseth could not have exercised control over it. We should probably read ha-Asîrî the 'Ashurites,' i.e., the tribe of Asher (cf. Jg 18).

ASHVATH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:8).

ASIA.—In the NT this word invariably means the Roman province Asia, which embraced roughly the western third of the peninsula which we call Asia Minor. It was bounded on the N.E. by the province of Bithynia, on the E. by the province of Galatia, on the S. by the province of Lydia, and had been ceded to the Romans by the will of the Pergamene king Attalus in B.C. 133. The following ethnic districts were in this province—Myala, Lydia, Western Phrygia, and Caria. The province was the richest, and, with the one exception of Africa, its equal, the most important in the Roman Empire. It was governed by a proconsul of the higher grade, with three legates (or Proconsul, Proconsul, Epiphanius, Epiphanius, and Smyrna were its principal cities. St. Paul's preaching in Ephesus was the most powerful cause of the spread of the gospel in this province, and the Epistle to the Ephesians is probably a circular letter to all the churches in it. Seven are enumerated in Rev 1-3, which is post-Pauline.

A. SOUTER.

ASIARCH.—The form of the word is parallel with Lytarch, Bithyniarch, etc., but the signification is by no means certain. The title of Asiarch could be held in conjunction with any civil office, and with the high priesthood of a particular city, but the high priest of Asia and the Asiarch were probably not identical; for there was only one high priest of Asia at a time, but there were a number of Asiarchs, as Ac 13:3 shows, even in one city. The honour lasted one year, but re-election was possible. It was held in connexion with the Koînôn (Council) of the province, the main duty of which was to regulate the worship of Rome and of the Emperor; and the Asiarchs were probably the deputies to the council elected by the towns.

A. SOUTER.

ASIBAS (1 Es 9).—One of the sons of Phoros or Parosh who agreed to put away his 'strange' wife; answering to Malchijah (2) Ezra 10:19.

ASIHEL.—1. Grandfather of Jehu a Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4:3). 2. One of five writers employed by Ezra. to transcribe the Law (2 Es 14 [3]).

3. (AV Assaiah) An ancestor of Tobit (To 11).

ASISPA. (1 Es 51).—His sons were among the Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel; called Hasupha, (Est 24, Neh 7).

ASMODÆUS, the 'evil demon' of To 3, 6, 8, appears freely in the Talmud as Ashmedai, which popular etymology connected with shāmād, 'to destroy.' It is fairly certain, however, that it is the Avestan Asma dāsika, 'fury demon,' conspicuous from the earliest to the latest parts of the Parsi scriptures. It would seem that the Book of Tobit is really a Median folk-tale, adapted for edification by a Jew, with sundry uncomprehended features of the original left unchanged. For these see 'Zoroastrianism' in Hastings' DB, § 4. In the Talmud Ashmedai is king of the Shē'ēm, demons supposed to be mortal, and of either sex.

JAMES HOPE MOURTON.

ASNAEH.—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Est 24, 1 Es 52).

ASAPPER. —See Osnapper.

ASOM (1 Es 9).—His sons were among those who put away their 'strange' wives; called Hashum, Est 10.

ASP.—See Sarpent.

ASPALATHUS (Sir 24).—The name of an aromatic associated with cinnamon in the passage cited, but impossible to identify. It is probable that there were two species of plants, and more than one vegetable product, known by this name.

ASPATHA (Est 9).—The third son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ASPHALT.—See Bitumen.

ASPHAR (1 Mac 9).—A pool in the desert of Tekoa, or Jeshimon, where Jonathan and Simon the Maccabees encamped. The site is not known with certainty, although it may plausibly be identified with the mod.

Bt Belth, a reservoir 6 miles W.S.W. of Engedi.

ASPHARASUS (1 Es 5).—One of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel, called Mispar, Ez 2, and Misperseth, Neh 7.

ASRIEL (in AV of 1 Ch 7, 17th ).—A Manasseite (Joe 17, Nu 26), in the latter the patronymic Asrielite occurs.

ASS (hamār; 'she-ass,' ʻalmon [Gr. onos of both sexes]; 'young ass,' or 'colt,' ṣeyr [Gr. pótos]; 'wild ass, Gázeh').—The ass (Arab. hamār) is the most universally used domesticated animal in Palestine. On it the felah rides to his day's work, with it he ploughs his fields, threshes out his corn, and at last carries home the harvest (Neh 10). Whole groups of pack-animals travel every road carrying corn (Gn 42, 17), fire-wood (Gn 22), provisions (1 S 16, 38), skins of water or baskets full of sand, stone or refuse. A group of such animals are so accustomed to keep together that they would do so even if running away (1 S 9, 14). The little ass carrying the barley, which leads every train of camels, is a characteristic sight. Whenever the traveller journeys through the land, the braying of the ass is as familiar a sound as the barking of the village dog. The man of moderate means when journeying rides an ass, often astride his bedding and clothes, as doubtless was done by many a Scripture character (Nu 22, 31; Joe 13, 1; 1 S 22, 31; 2 S 17, 10 etc.). A well-trained ass will get over the ground rapidly at a pace more comfortable than that of an ordinary horse; it is also very sure-footed. The man of position in the town, the sheikh of the mosque, lawyer or medical man, is sometimes, in any peaceful citizen,—is considered suitably mounted on donkey-back, especially if the animal is white (Jg 5). A well-bred white ass fetches a higher price than a fairly good horse. A she-ass (Arab. ʻutār) is preferred (Nu 22, 31, 1 S 9, 2 K 4, 21, 1 Ch 27, 9), because quicker and more easily led tied up; a strong male is almost uncontrollable at times, and gives vent to the most dismal brays as he catches sight of female asses. The castrated animal is not often seen, because frequently wanting in 'go' and very timid. She-asses are also, when of valuable breed, prized for breeding purposes. The common ass is brown, sometimes almost black or grey. Skeletons of asses are not uncommon by the high-road sides, and the jawbone of this may be a not unhandy weapon in an emergency (Jg 15, where the play on the word 'ass' [hamār] and 'heap' [hamōr] should be noticed). Although the ass was forbidden food to the Jews, we read (2 K 9) that an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver' in the extremity of famine in besieged Samaria. In ploughing, the modern felākān actually seem to prefer to yoke together an ox and an ass, or a camel and an ass (contrast Dt 22, 10). The idea of the stupidity of the ass is the same in the East as in the West.

The young ass (Is 5, 22) or colt (Job 11, 12, Zec 9, 9, Lk 19 etc.), the Arab. jaḥal, is referred to several times. Little colts of very tender age trot beside their mothers, and soon have small burdens put on them. They should not be regularly ridden for three years. The young asses in the Bible are all apparently old enough for riding or burden-bearing.

Wild asses are not to-day found in Palestine, though, it is said, plentiful in the deserts to the East (Job 24), where they roam in herds and run with extraordinary fleetness (Job 39). Ismael is compared in his wildness and freedom to a wild ass (Gn 16, 2), while Issachar is a wild ass subdued (49, 8).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ASSAMAIAS (AV Assanias).—One of twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels on the return to Jerusalem, 1 Es 8.

ASSAPHIOTh (AV Asaphilion). 1 Es 5.—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel among the sons of Solomon's servants. Called Hasaphoreth, Ez 2, Sopharath, Neh 7.

ASSASTINS, THE.—In the time of Felix a band of robbers so named disturbed Judea. They are mentioned in Ac 21, 34 (stōnct, AV 'murderer'). Josephus says that at Felix's suggestion they murdered Jonathan son of Ananus, the high priest (Ant. XX, vii, 5). They took a leading part in the Jewish War. See art. Egyptian (The).

ASSEMBLY.—See Congregation.

ASSHUR.—See Assyria.

ASSHURIM.—The Asshurim, Lutshinim, Lemurim (Gn 29) were Arabian tribes, supposed to be descended from Abraham and Keturah through Dedan. By the Asshurim the Targum understood dwellers in encampments to be meant. A tribe Aššur appears on two Maimon inscriptions.

J. TAYLOR.

ASIDEANS.—See Harideans.

ASSIR.—1. A son of Korab (Es 6, 1 Ch 6). 2. A son of Ebiasaph (1 Ch 6, 7). 3. A son of Jeconiah (AV and RVm of 1 Ch 3). It is probable, however, that RV correctly renders 'Jeconiah the captive.'

ASSOS.—A town over half a mile from the Gulf of Adramyttium (in Mysia, province of Asia), in a splendid position on a hill about 770 feet high at its highest point. The fortifications are amongst the most elegant of their kind. It passed through various hands before it was from B.c. 334-241 under Alexander the Great and his successors, and from B.C. 241-183 under the Pergamenian dynasty. At the last date it became a Roman town. (See the Birthplace of Eutychus, St. Paul went from Troas to Assos by the land-route on his last visit to Asia (Ac 20).

ASSUMPTION OF MOSES.—See Apoc. Lit., p. 409.
ASSURANCE.—The word is used both in an objective and a subjective sense, according as it denotes the ground of confidence or the actual experience. When St. Paul declares at Athens (Ac 17:11) that God has appointed a certain slabaster to judge the world, and has given assurance of this unto all men by raising Him from the dead, it is an objective assurance that he means, for he knew very well that all men were not personally assured of the fact of the Resurrection. In 2 Ti 3:14, again, Timothy's assurance of the things which he has learned and has been assured of, is identified with the outward authority of the person from whom he has received them. For the most part, however, assurance in Scripture denotes not an objective authority or fact, but a subjective assurance or inward experience. The word occurs once in OT (Is 32:17 AV), and quite characteristically assurance is there represented as the effect of righteousness. In NT assurance (πεπείσεν) is an accompaniment and result of the gospel (1 Th 1:5). And the assurance produced by the gospel is not intellectual merely, or emotional merely, or practical merely, it fills and satisfies the whole man. There is a full assurance of understanding (Col 2), and a full assurance of faith (He 10:22; cf. 2 Ti 1), and a full assurance of hope (He 6:4). [Cf. 11:1 RV, where the last two forms of assurance run into each other—faith itself becoming assurance (ὑπηρέτησις) or assurance of an underlying ground of hope]. But there is also an assurance of love (1 Jn 3:19; love being, however, not a mere feeling but a practical social faculty, a love of deeds and truth that ministers in all good things to its own interest (cf. 11:18). Thus on one plane of that Christian love which is the fulfilling of the Law—we come back to the prophetic ideal of an inward peace and assurance which are the effects of righteousness.

In any doctrine of assurance a distinction must again be recognized between an objective and a subjective assurance. The grounds of Christian assurance are present in the case of all men; the other merely intellectual assent, every believing man would be fully assured of his salvation. But, as a positive experience, assurance must be distinguished from saving faith (cf. 1 Jn 5). Yet the Spirit witnesses with our spirit that we are the children of God (Ro 8:16); and those in whom the consciousness of that witness is dim and faint should seek with more diligence to grow in faith and love and hope and understanding also, that thereby they may make their calling and election sure (2 P 1:10). J. C. LAMBERT.

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.—I. Assyria.—1. Natural features and Civilization.—Strictly speaking, Assyria was a small district bounded on the N. and E. by the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, on the W. by the Tigris, on the S. by the Upper Zab. The W. bank of the Tigris was early included, and the limits of the kingdom gradually extended till the Empire included all Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and parts of Asia Minor and Egypt. The term 'Assyria,' therefore, was widely different in meaning at different periods. The earliest capital was Asshur, on the W. of the Tigris, between the mouths of the Upper and Lower Zab. The above-named district, a natural stronghold, was the nucleus of the country. For the most part hilly, with well-watered valleys and a wide plain along the Tigris, it was fertile and populous. The cities Calah at the junction of the Upper Zab, Nineveh on the Chosar, Dur-Sargon to the N.E., Imgur-Ilé S.E., Tarbis to the N.W., and Arbela between the rivers Zab, were the most noted in Assyria itself.

The climate was temperate. The slopes of the hills were well wooded with oak, plane, and pine; the plains and cultivated lands, with wheat and barley, lentils, flax and vines. Wild olive, poplar, acacia, pomegranate, apricot, mulberry, and other fruits. A great variety of vegetables were grown in the gardens, including beans, peas, cucumbers, onions, lentils. The hills furnished plenty of excellent building stone, the associated slate especially lent itself to the decoration of halls with sculptures in low relief, while marble, hard limestone, conglomerate and basalt, were worked into stone vessels, pillars, altars, etc. Iron, lead, and copper were obtainable in the mountains near. The ruins and wild and wild ox, the bear, jackal, and many other less easily recognized animals are named. The eagle, bustard, crane, stork, wild goose, various ducks, parrot, weaver, the black raven, swallow, are named; besides many other birds. Fish were plentiful. The Assyrians had domesticated oxen, asses, sheep, goats, and dogs. Camels and horses were introduced from abroad.

The Assyrians belonged to the North Semitic group, being closely akin to the Arameans, Phoenicians, and Hebrews. Like the other Mesopotamian States, Assyria early came under the predominating influence of Babylonia. According to Gn 10:11, Nimrod went out from the land of Shinar into Assyria and built Nineveh, etc. That Babylonian colonies settled in Assyria is probable, but it is not clear whether the Assyrians themselves were a distinct people, or whether they assimilated to the indigenous population there. The Assyrians of historic times were more robust, warlike, 'fierce' (Is 30:1), than the mild, industrial Babylonians. This may have been due to the influence of climate and incessant war; but it may indicate a different race. The culture and races of Assyria were essentially Babylonian, save for the predominance of the national god Ashur. The king was a despotic at home, general of the army abroad, and he alone missed an annual expedition to plunder or subjugate some State. The whole organization of the State was essentially military. The literature was borrowed from Babylonia, and to the library of the last Assyrian king, Ashurbanipal, the best part of the Babylonian and Hebrew classics. The Assyrians were historians more than the Babylonians, and they invented a chronology which is the basis of all dating for Western Asia. They were a predatory race, and amassed the spoils of all Mesopotamia in their treasure-houses, but they at least learned to value what they had stolen. The enormous influx of manufactured articles from abroad and the military demands prevented a genuinely native industrial development, but the Assyrians made splendid use of foreign talent. In later times, the land became peopled by captives, while the drain upon the Assyrian army to conquer, garrison, colonize, and hold down the vast Empire probably robbed it of the country of resisting power.

2. History.—The excavations conducted at Nineveh and Calah by Layard, 1845 to 1853; by Botta at Khorsabad, 1845-1846; continued by Rassam, G. Smith, and others up to the present time; the edition of the inscriptions by Rawlinson, Norris, and Smith, and the decipherment of them by Rawlinson, Hincks, and Oppert, have rendered available for the history of Assyria a mass of material as yet only partially digested. Every year fresh evidence is discovered by explorers in the East, and the wide-spread influence of Assyria may be illustrated by the discovery of a stele of Sargon in Cyprus, a stone tablet of Ashur-uballit at Zinjerli on the borders of Cilicia, a letter from Ashur-uballit king of Assyria, to Amenophis iv., king of Egypt, at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt, of statues of Assyrian kings at Nahr-el-Reb near Beyrut. Besides this primary source of history, chief contemporary with the events it records, we have scattered incidental notices in the historical and prophetic books of the OT giving an important external view, and some records in the cuneiform tablets, and others in the authors of the Judg. Hi. Be that they found that reference to them was not of direct value. Owing to the intimate connexion of Assyria and Babylonia, a great deal may be treated as common matter, but it will conduce to clearer the separate their history. Some of the common sources for history will be noticed here.

(a) Chronology.—(a) Year-names.—The Babylonians gave each year a name. Thus the names of the first four years of the reign of Hammurabi are: (a) the year in which Hammurabi became king; (b) the year in which Hammurabi established the throne of the land in righteousness; (c) the year in which the throne of Nannar was made; (d) the year in which Malga was destroyed. These dates, or year-names, were decided upon and noticed sent round to the principal districts, early each year. Thus we know that the date, since the date, to be used for the eighth year of Samsu-Iliuna was sent as far as the Lebanon, where the tablet giving the order was found. Until the new year-name was known, the year was dated ‘the year after the last known date. Thus the fourth year of Hammurabi would be called ‘the year after that in which the throne of Nannar was made.’ The scribes kept a record of these dates, and a long list of year-names, in two recensions, has been published, which, if perfect, would have given the year-names from Samsu-Iliuna to the tenth year of Ammi-zaduga. It was natural that the same ideogram MU should denote ‘year’ and ‘name.’ When, therefore, this list counts 43 MU to the reign of Samsu-Iliuna, we do not know what ‘year’ that is, but only that he used 43 year-names in his reign. We know that the same year was sometimes called by two different names. When, therefore, the King’s List gives Samsu-Iliuna a reign of 58 years, we may explain this discrepancy by supposing that the list of year-names gives only the number of separate names. As a year-name often mentions a campaign, it seems most unlikely that it could have been given in the beginning of the year, still more when it records such an event as the fall of a city. The list of year-names records some event, usually domestic, religious, or military, for each year, and the remainder of the year is called ‘the accession year’ of his successor, and his first year was that beginning on the first of Nisan after his accession. Thus over a long series of years, the sum of the reigns is accurately the length in years, except for the margin at the beginning and end: it is exact to a year.

(b) Eponym Canon.—The Assyrians devised a modification of the year-name which avoided all difficulty. They named each year after a particular official, who could be selected as the beginning of the year, which was called his timma or eponym. The particular official for each year was originally selected by lot (parr), but later a fixed order was followed, the king, the Tartan, the chief of the levies, the chief scribe, etc., then the governors of the chief cities. As the Empire extended, the governors of so many distant places as Carrhedia, Rasappa, Kimmuth, or even Samaria, became eponyms. Later still the order seems to be quite arbitrary, and may have been a royal choice. Lists of these officials, in their actual order of succession, known as the Eponym Canons, were drawn up, are fairly complete from B.C. 911 to B.C. 668, and can be restored to B.C. 648. This method of dating is at least as exact as Arik-den-ili, and was in use in Cappadocia, possibly much earlier. A very large number of names of Eponyms are known, which are not in the Canons, but as yet they can rarely be dated.

(c) Chronological statements.—This system, however, provided an accurate means of dating, and warrants great reliance on the statements of the kings as to the dates of events long before their times. Provided that they had access to earlier Eponym Canons than we possess, there is no reason why they should not be exact. Later kings were not disinclined to give such chronological statements. Thus Shalmaneser i. states that Erishum built the temple of Ashur, which Shamshi-Adad rebuilt 150 years later, but which was destroyed 580 years later by a fire and built fresh by him. The king does not state in which year of the reign of events took place; but Assur- haddon also states that the temple was built by Erishum, restored by Shamshi-Adad, son of Bel-kabi, and again by Shalmaneser i. 454 years later, and again by himself. The former statement of Ashur- haddon i. was much nearer to the facts, and it is easier to reconcile with other statements. Senacherib’s Bavian inscription states that he recovered the gods of Ekalatu, which had been carried away by Marduk-nadin-ahhe, king of Akkad, in the days of Tiglath-pileser i., 418 years before, thus dating both Marduk-nadin-ahhe and Tiglath-pileser i. at about B.C. 1107. Tiglath-pileser i. tells us that he rebuilt the temple of Ashtur and Adad which had been pulled down by his great-grandfather Ashur-dan i., 60 years before, and that he stood 641 years since its foundation by Shamshi-Adad, son of Ishme-Dagan. This puts Shamshi-Adad about B.C. 1290 and Ashur-dan i. about 1170. Senacherib states that a seal captured from Babylon by Tukulti-Ninib i. had been carried away to Babylon again and was brought back by him 600 years later. This puts Tukulti-Ninib i. about 1650. The capture of Susa is the image of Nana, which had been carried off by Kudur-nanhundi, 1635 years before. This puts an invasion of Babylon at about 2275. A boundary stone dated in the 413 year of Bel-nadin-ahhe-si states that from Gulkishar, probably the sixth king of the second Babylonian dynasty, to Nebuchadnezzar i. there were 696 years. This puts Gulkishar about B.C. 1350. There is a ‘chronicle’ of one kings, whose name is not known, that does not appear on the system, of Bel-nadin-ahhe, which was restored in Sippata, which had not restored since Shagarakti-shuruntu, 800 years before. This puts that king about 1530. Further, that Naram-Sin, son of Sargon i., was 3200 years by him, which dates Naram-Sin about B.C. 3750. Further, that Hammurabi lived 700 years before Burns-b durushi. This dates Hammurabi about B.C. 2100, or B.C. 2150, according as we understand Burns-burushu or Hi. to be intended. It is evident that all such dates are vague. The numbers may be only approximate, 500 for 560 or 640, say. Further, we do not know from which year of the writer’s reign to reckon, not to which year of the king named. We may add a further margin of uncertainty.

(2) The Kings’ List, Ptolemy’s Canon, Eponym List.—The Babylonian Kings’ List, if complete, would have given the names of the kings of Babylon from the First Dynasty down to the last native ruler, Nabonidus, with the lengths of their reigns. It does furnish these particulars for long periods. The famous Canon of Ptolemy begins with Nabonasser, B.C. 747, and gives the names of the kings, including the Assyrian Poros (Tiglath-pileser iii.), Sargon, and Esarhaddon, with the dates of their reigns, down to Nabonidus, then the Achaemenids to Alexander the Great, the Ptolemys and Romans, so connecting with well-known dates. The Eponym Canon lists the eclipse of B.C. 763, and their dates are thus fixed. So far as they overlap, the last three sources agree exactly. We may then trust the Eponym Canon to B.C. 911 and the Kings’ List wherever preserved.

(6) Genealogies, Date Documents.—The kings usually mention their father and grandfather by name; often an earlier ancestor, or perhaps either, naming his father, and we are thus enabled to trace back a dynasty from father to son over long periods. Unfortunately we are rarely told by them how long a king reigned, but where we have documents dated by the year of his reign, we can say he reigned at least so many years.
ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA

In both Assyrian and Babylonian history there are still wide gaps, but exploration is continually filling them up. The German explorations at Assur added quite 20 new names of Assyrian rulers. It is dangerous to argue that, because we do not know all the rulers in a certain period, it ought to be reduced in length. It is as yet impossible to reconcile all the data, because we are not sure of the kings referred to. We already know five or six of the same name, and it may well be that we mistake the reference.

3. Synchronous History.—The so-called Synchronous History of Assyria and Babylonia gives the lists and rectification of boundaries between the two countries from B.C. 1400 to B.C. 1500 and B.C. 900 to B.C. 800; and the Babylonian Chronicle gives the names and lengths of the reigns of the kings of Assyria, Babylonia, and Elam from B.C. 744 to B.C. 668. These establish a number of synchronisms, besides making considerable contributions to the history.

The bulk of the history is derived from the inscriptions of the kings themselves. Here there is an often remarked difference between Assyro-Babylonian usage. The former are usually very full concerning the wars of conquest, the latter almost entirely concerned with temporal boundaries or domestic affairs, such as palaces, walls, canals, etc. Many Assyro-Babylonian kings arrange their campaigns in chronological order, forming what are called Annals. Others are content to sum up their conquests in a list of lands subdued. We rarely have anything like Annals from Babylonia.

The value to be attached to these inscriptions is very various. They are contemporary, and for geography invaluable. A king would hardly boast of conquering a country which did not exist. The historical value is more open to question. A 'conquest' meant little more than a raid successful in exacting tribute. The Assyrians, however, gradually learnt to consolidate their conquests. They planted colonies of Assyrian people, occupying them with conquered lands. They transported the people of a conquered State to some other part of the Empire, allotting them lands and houses, vineyards and gardens, even cattle, and so endeavored to destroy national spirit and produce a blended population of one language and one civilization. The weakness of the plan lay in the heavy taxation which prevented loyal attachment. The population of the Empire had no objection to the substitution of one master for another.

The following table of monarchs is compiled from the above-mentioned materials. Where the relationship of two kings is known, it is indicated by S for 'son,' B for 'brother,' or the preceding king. When two kings are known to be contemporaries, their names are placed between commas. Probable dates of accession are given with a query, known dates without. Where a figure with + is placed after a name it indicates mentally attested minimum length of reign, thus 25 + means 'at least 25 years.' The lengths of reigns in the Year List or Chronicle for the First Dynasty are given in brackets.

Early traditions.—We may dismiss as mythical the Assyrian claim that Nineveh was founded directly after the Creation, but it points to a tradition of immemorial antiquity. Sargon claimed to have been preceded on his throne by 350 rulers of Assyria; but even if he counted ancient Babylonian overlords of Assyria, we have no means of checking his figures. Senacherib professed to trace his lineage back to Girsu, Eabani, and Humbaba, the heroes of the Babylonian National Epic, through such ancient rulers as Eriba, La’iti-Ashur, Assur-gumilas, Shamashshulushu, etc., whose names are not otherwise known. The reference may have been to his having built a temple for Nana (= Ishtar) in Nineveh may be meant for the Babylonian city of the same name, and an inscription of Dungi found in Nineveh might have been carried there by Assyrian conquerors.

Earliest mention.—Hammurabi, however, in one of his letters refers to troops in Assyria, and in the prologue to his celebrated code of laws states that he returned to Assur its ancient glory of defeating its ancient rivals and made glorious the name of Ishtar in her temple at Nineveh. As these benefactions were placed after the benefits conferred on the Babylonian cities, we may conclude that Ashur and Nineveh were subject to him, and that the deity referred to had been carried off by invaders, perhaps the Elamites, or Kassites. A contemporary letter mentions a defaulting debtor as having gone to Assyria. These are the earliest references to the country.

Earliest rulers.—The earliest rulers of Assyria styled themselves ‘pates of Assur.’ The title was that borne by the city rulers of Babylon. In Assyria its Assyrian equivalent was ‘ishshadakku, and it often interchanges with ‘shang,’ priest.’ It was still borne by the kings of Assyria, but while it designated them then as chief priest of the nation, we may conclude the usage of the title once was similar to that of Babylon, where it designated the king subject to some king. Hence it has usually been supposed that the title of Assur was subject to Babylonia. In the fourth year of Hammurabi one Shamsi-Adad is named in a way that suggests his being the ‘pates of Assur, subject to Hammurabi. We know the names of many of these rulers. Thus Ushpi was the founder of the temple of Ashur in the city of Assur, and may be the earliest of all. Kikis, who may be the same as Kiki- Bel otherwise known, founded the city wall of Assur, and may be as early, if not earlier. The title descended from father to son for five generations, of whom we put Eristum as early as c. 1820. The order in which these groups are arranged is at present purely conjectural, and we have been before the intervals between them. Shamshi-Adad II., son of Bel-kabi, should be some sixty years before Shamshi-Adad I.

Early kings.—We do not know the exact date at which Assyria achieved her independence of Babylon, but it may well have synchronized with the Kassite conquest of Babylonia, or have contributed to it. A possible reference to the ‘war of independence’ is contained in a tablet which names a great conflict between the king of Babylon and the prince of Assyria, to whom the title ‘king’ is not conceded, which ended in the spoil of Babylon being carried to Assyria; but we are given no names to date events. Esarhaddon traced his descent from Adasi, father of Bel-ibni, who founded the kingdom of Assyria. If we credit this, Adasi or Bel-ibni was the first ‘king.’ Adad-nirari II. states that the son of Adad-salum, king who lived before Sulli, is doubtful whether the group of three, Ashur-rahi, Asur-nirari II., and Assur-rim-misheusu, who last of the rest determined the city wall of Assur, should not be put before the ‘kings.’ As Ashur-bel-nisheusu restored the wall of the ‘Newtown’ of Assur, which Puzur-Ashur had founded, we must put a Puzur-Ashur II. before him. The interval of time we do not know, but a city wall surely lasted years before the reign of Ashur-bel-nisheusu’s father, Ashur-nirari II.

Relations with Egypt and Babylonia.—About n.c. 1500 an Assyrian ruler sent gifts to Thothmes II., in his 24th and 30th years; but we are not told which king. Sargon shows to have been a great man, as he could not be so bel-nisheusu made a treaty with Kara-indash I. at the boundaries of the two countries: a few years later Puzur-Ashur II. made a fresh treaty with Burma-burias I. Ashur-uballit names Erba-Adad I., and father of Ashur-bel-nisheusu his grandfather, in the inscription on the bricks of a well he made in Assur. Adad-nirari I. names Puzur-Ashur, Ashur-bel-nisheusu, Erba-Adad and Adad .... In this order, as builders at the wall of ‘Newtown.’ But the Ashur-uballit who wrote to Amennophis IV., in the Tell el-Amarna tablets says that his father Ashur-bel-nisheusu was in friendly relationship with Amennophis III., and he was followed by his son Adad-nirari, whose son was Ariš-deň-lli and grandson Adad-nirari II., who names this Adad .... He must therefore follow Ashur-uballit I.

Extension to the West.—Ashur-uballit II. gave his daughter Muballit-ti to succeeded to the throne of Babylon, but the Kassites rebelled against him, put him to death and set up a Kassite, Nazi-buqash. Ashur-bel-nisheusu invaded Babylonia, set Kurigalzu II., another son of Burma-burias I., on the throne. With Ashur-uballit II. also begins Assyrian history proper—the expansion to the W., which was so fatal to Babylonia, and was the forerunner of the expansion of Assyria over the west. Assyria; the overlord of Babylonia, and the Kassites, and further to the east Assyria and Babylonia, were left by this expansion to the E. and W., penetrating as far as Ishtar on the Habor, subduing Tukulti-Ninurta I., Gutium, the Aramaeans, Elam, and the Semitic Suttis. Ashur-bel-nisheusu was the son of the last king of the Kassites, and one of the conquerors of Babylonia. On the W. he extended his conquests over Haran to the Euphrates. Shalmaneser I. (Shulmanu-ashared) crossed the upper waters of the Tigris, placed Assyril colonies among the tribes to the N., subdue the Arameans of Upper Mesopotamia, took Mitanni, the capital of Hani, defeated the Khitites, Ahlamut, and Suttis, captured Hanan and ravaged up to Carchemish. He made Calah his capital, and restored the temple of Ishtar at Nineveh. He first bore the title shar kishshatš, supposed to mark the conquest of Haran.

Capture of Babylon.—Tukulti-Ninurta I. conquered Gutium, the Shubari, 40 kings of Nairi, the Ukumāni, Bihuni, Sharauda, Mehit, Kuhli, Kummuh, the Pushsh, Mumna, Ahsh, Madi, Nihani, Ahhu, Ariš, Purruκu. His chief triumph, however, was over Hanan. He defeated and captured Bitilliššu, and took him prisoner to Assyria, ruling Babylon seven years by his name. Assyria, on the E., over the Nineveh, ruled eleven months. Elam now appeared on the scene, invaded Babylonia, and a Kassite, Ksadashman-herbe I., was set up. After eighteen months more, Tukulti-Ninurta I. took Babylon, slew its people with the sword and set up Adad-nim-iddina, who ruled six years. Tukulti-Ninurta

deported the god Marduk to Assyria and carried off great spoil from Espagga, his temple in Babylon. Among other things he carried off a seal of lapis lazuli, which had belonged to Shagarakti-shuriah, father of Bitilashašu, and engraved his own name and titles on it. It was afterwards carried back to Babylon, whence Semmacherib brought it once more 600 years later. We thus get a date n.c. 1285, which must fail either in Tukulti-Ninib's reign or in that of Ninb-tukulti-Ashur's, 16 (? ) years later when Marduk was carried back to Babylon. After Adad-shum-iddina had reigned six years, the Kassites and Babylonians set Adad-shum-usur on his father's throne. Tukulti-Ninib had built a city called Kar-Tukulti-Ninib, close to Assur, which he intended for the seat of his capital, but the Assyrians estranged his own people, for his son Ashur-nazir-apil 1, rebelled against him, besieged him in a house in his new city, and finally killed him. Of the reign of the paricide we know nothing. Adad-shum-usur corresponded with two kings of Assyria, Ashur-nirari iv. and Nabû-dân, who appear to be reigning both at the same time. Perhaps they were sons of Tukulti-Ninib i., or it may be another Adad-across-the-waters. The Babylonians were usually placed here, but we know nothing further about them. It was Ninb-tukulti-Ashur who carried back Marduk, and perhaps the seal above named, to Babylon. Possibly he took refuge from Ashur-shum-iddina back to Assur. There is much doubt about this period, but Adad-shum-usur lived to defeat and kill Bel-kudur-usur. Erba-Adad n. is known only as father of Ninb-apil-eshtar, from Tiglath-pileser i. calls a 'powerful king that truly shepherded the hosts of Assyria.' He was besieged by Adad-shum-usur in Assur. Ashur-dân i. defeated Zamana-shum-iddina and captured several Babylonian cities, carrying off much spoil to Assyria. He had a long reign, probably till the beginning of the reign of the Nueku. Ashur-resh-ishi began to revive the military glories of Assyria, conquering the Ahlam, Gutium and Lullum. He then invaded Babylon, and Nebuchad-rezzar fought him in Assyria, but was defeated and lost his commander-in-chief.

(i) Tiglath-pileser i., etc.—Tukulti-apil-eshtar (Tiglath-pileser i.) has left us very full accounts of a long reign and series of conquests; chief of Upper Mesopotamia along the base of the Caucausus, Armenia, and W. to the N. E. corner of the Mediterranean, 'in all 42 countries with their princes. The Bedouin Sûti were driven back to the Euphrates. The Babylonian king Marduk-nâdin-ahhe invaded the S. of Assyria and carried off the gods of Eakkâle, but, after two years' fighting, Tiglath-pileser defeated him and captured the chief city of Babylon as far as North Babylon, including Sippara and Babylon itself. He was no less distinguished by his restorations of his own cities, and he acclimatized all sorts of useful trees and plants. Ashur-bêl-kala, Shamshi-Adad v., and Ashur-dân i., sons of Tiglath-pileser, followed on the throne, but in what order is not known. Adad-nîrari i., son of Ashur-dân i., and Ashur-nazir-apil ii., was son of Shamshi-Adad v.; but beyond these relationships nothing much is known of them. Shalmaneser ii. tells us that he recaptured Petru and Mitkunun on the far side of the Euphrates, which Tiglath-pileser had taken, but which were lost to Assyria in the reign of Ashur-kirbi. As Shalmaneser's six predecessors cannot be separated, this is usual to put Ashur-kirbi here. With the king Illu-hirib who set up his image near the Amanus, also named by Shalmaneser, be the same or an earlier and more successful conqueror, is not yet clear. The interval between Tiglath-pileser i. and Ashur-nazir-apil ii. is a gap of unknown length. The 8th Dynasty of Babylon, we cannot tell its length or how many things are still unknown to us. Adad-nîrari iv. warred with Shamash-mudammil and Nabû-shum-} shukkan of Babylon; Tukulti-Ninib ii. continued the subjugation of the mountainers N. of Assyria, gradually winning back the Empire of Tiglath-pileser i.

With Ashur-nazir-apil i. began a fresh tide of Assyrian conquest, n.c. 885. He rebuilt Calah, and made it his capital. The small Armeian State of Bit-Adin, between the Balîh and Euphrates, held out against him, but he conquered the Mannai, Kûrîr, and Zamâa between Lake Van and Lake Urmia. Carchemish, Habîl ('Amk), or Harran on the Euphrates revolutionised, and the army reached the Lebanon, Tyre, Sidôn, Gebal, Arvad, etc., were fain to buy off the conqueror. Ashur-nazir-apil had invaded the Babylonian sphere of influence, and Nabû-apil-iddina sent his brother Zabûdânu and 3000 troops prisoners.

(j) Shalmaneser ii., etc.—The reign of Shalmaneser ii., his son and successor, was one long campaign. He records 58 separate expeditions, and began to annex his conquests by placing governors over the conquered districts. The Armenian Empire now began to bar Assyria's progress north. Assyria now first appeared on Israel's horizon as a threatening danger. Shalmaneser's celebrated bronze doors at Balawat and the Black Obelisk give us pictures of scenes in his reign. They represent ambassadors from Girzân near Lake Urmia, from Jahû (Jehu) of Israel, from Shalmaneser's brother Marduk-bel-ússat, and from Sûli, and from Karparanda of Hattin. This Muei is N. E. of Cilicia (1 K 18:6§), whence Solomon brought his horses. Shalmaneser invaded Kûlâ in Cilicia, and Tabal (Tubal), where he annexed the silver, marbled ablaster works. He reached Tarzi (Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul). To the N. E. he penetrated Parsû, the original Persia. In Babylon, Nabû-apil-iddina was deposed by his son, Marduk-shum-iddina, against whom arose his brother Marduk-bel-ússat, who held the southern States of the Scandans, already peopled by the Charlans. Shalmaneser invaded Babylonia, and, passing to the E., besieged Marduk-bel-ússat in Mé-turnat, drove him from there to another place, and finally killed him and all his partisans. In the rôle of a friend of Babylon, Shalmaneser visited the chief cities and sacrificed to the gods, captured most of the southern States, and laid them under tribute.

Shalmaneser's campaign against Hamath on the Orontes took place in n.c. 854. The fall of Bit-Adin had roused all N. Syria to make a stand. At Karkar the Assyrian Army had against them a truly wonderful combination.

Charlotis. Horsemen. Foot.

The presence of Ahab in this battle in which Shalmaneser claims to have won the victory is most interesting. The battle was not productive of any settled results, as Shalmaneser had to fight the same foes in n.c. 849 and again in n.c. 842 Shalmaneser iii. defeated Hazad, besieged him in Damascus, and carried off the spoils of Malaha, his residence. At this time he received tribute from Tyre, Sidon, and Jehu, 'of the house of Omri.' Jehu's tribute is interesting—it includes silver, gold, a vessel of gold, a ladle of gold, golden drinking cups, golden beaters, tin, a sceptre, and bedelach.

Shalmaneser's last years were clouded by the rebellion of his son Ashur-nazir-apil i., who assumed more than half the Empire, and was not subdued by the successor to the throne, his brother Shamshi-Adad vi., till after eight years' struggle. He may be considered actual king for those eight years. Shamshi-Adad had to fight the Babylonian kings Bau-alilulula and Marduk-baluatu-ukhi. He warred in Chaldea and advanced into Media as far as Mt. Elven to secure the Mannal and Parsba against the rising power of Armenia. Adad-nirari v. penetrated into Armenia right up to the Caspian Sea. Assyria had pushed W. and secured Haid-rabab and Daleh, old conquests of Assyria. Adad-nirari v., however, fought several campaigns in the West, from the upper part of the Euphrates to the land of Hatti (N. Syria), Amurri (N. Palestine), Tyre, Sidon, the land of Omri (Israel), Uдумu (Edom), and Palastu (Philistia), to the Mediterranean, he exacted tribute. He besieged Mari's, king of Damascus, in his capital, captured it and carried off rich spoil. Their expeditions may be placed in B.C. 804 and B.C. 797.

(k) Tiglath-pileser III.—Armenia was steadily rising in power, and Assyria gradually lost all its northern conquests. In 745 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III. carried his conquests into lower Babylonia; in the north, Armenia was powerful and ready to threaten W. Syria; Egypt was making a vigorous effort to interfere in Palestine. Assyria and Babylon bade fair to fill the vacuum in the Near East, and Tiglath-pileser III. roused the old energy. The Arameans were pouring into Babylonia, filled the Tigris basin from the lower Zab to the Ulu, and held some of the most boasted districts of Akkad. Tiglath-pileser marched into Babylonia, subdued the provinces of N.E. Babylonia, the Medes were set in order, and then Tiglath-pileser turned to the west. The new kingdom of Arpad was strongly supported by Armenia, and Tiglath-pileser swept to the right into Kummuh and took the Arameans in the rear. He crushed them, and for the time was left to deal with the West. Arpad took three years to reduce; then gradually all N. Syria came into Assyrian hands, and the great kingdom of Arpad was destroyed. This Tiglath-pileser took the Pul of Kutha, the capital of the land of Egypt, and the town of Upper Egypt was captured. He then advanced to Babylon, and subduing the Medes and the Medes, he took Babylon, and made the district an Assyrian province.

The Southern States hastened to avoid invasion by paying tribute. Memorial of Semiramish, Zababi of Arabia, Razannu (Rezon) of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre are noteworthy; but Carchemish, Hamath, Miltiia, Tabal, Kulluni (Guzzu) also submitted, B.C. 733. In B.C. 728 Hanno of Gaza was defeated. In B.C. 733-732 Damascus was besieged and taken, Isern. was invaded, the whole of Naphthali taken, and Pekah had to pay heavy toll. In B.C. 731, Hezekiah was murdered, and Tiglath-pileser advanced, and made Hosea his successor. Asshur, Moab, Ashkelon, Edom, and Ahaz of Judah paid tribute. Samsi, the king of the Arabs, was defeated, and the Subeans were punished. This Tiglath-pileser is supposed to be the Sargon who, after defeating the Chaldean Ukl-zkar, who had got himself made king of Babylon, in B.C. 728 was crowned king of Babylon, as Pul. 4 (l) Sargon.—Shalamesser, v. seems to have been son of Tiglath-pileser. He was king of Babylon as Ululai, and succeeded to Tiglath-pileser's Empire. In B.C. 724 he began the siege of Samaria, which fell after two years. We have no Assyrian accounts of this reign. Sargon at once succeeded him, but we have no knowledge of his title to the throne. He never mentions his immediate ancestors, or does Sennacherib, but the latter evidently wished to claim ancient royal descent, and kings Ba-ian-ida claimed descent from the ancient king. That Sargon is called orka, 'the later,' in his own inscriptions may be meant to distinguish him from the great Sargon of Akkad, whose reign he so closely resembles, or from some other Sargon, the third king of Akkad. Sargon's claim to the throne is not quite clear. He was a Babylonian of the Ninurta family, and it is possible he was a brother of the old king. He was a great builder, and the famous Ashurbanipal was a grandson of Sargon, who built his palace of Nineveh. The name of Sargon may be derived from the word sar, 'lord,' sar-ge or sar-gu, 'great.' The name of Sargon seems to have been derived from Assur-ku, the chief god of Assyria, 'Assur the great.' Sargon was the great founder of the Assyrian Empire. He was a daring and able monarch, and the founder of the great empire of Assyria.

settled about Halah on the Habor, in the province of Cogaz and in Media (2 K 17), being replaced by Babylonians and Syrians. Merodach-baladan, king of Bit Iakin, a Chaldaean State in S. Babylonia, who had been tributary to Tiglath-pileser III., had made himself master of Babylon, and was supported there by Elam. Sargon met the Elamites in a battle which he won as a victory, but he had to leave Merodach-baladan alone as king in Babylon for twelve years. This failure roused the West under Jaubid of Hamath, who secured Arpad, Simitir, Damascus, and Samaria as allies, supported by Hanno of Gaza and the N. Arabian Muzri. Sargon in B.C. 720 set out to recover his power here. At Kaizar, Jaubid was defeated and captured, and the southern branch of the confederacy was smashed at Raphia. Hanno was carried to Assyria, 933 people deported, Shabi (Sibi, Sewe, So), the Tartan of Piru of Muzri, fled, the Arameans submitted and paid tribute. Azuri of Ashdod, who began to intrigue with Egypt, was deposed and replaced by his brother, Ahihith. A rebellion in Ashdod led to a pretender being installed, but Sargon sent his Tartan to Ashdod (Is 20:1), the pretender fled, and Ashdod and Gath were reduced as Syrian provinces. Judah, Edom, and Moab staved off vengeance by heavy toll. Sargon's heaviest task was the reduction of Armenia. Rusa I. was able to enlist all Upper Mesopotamia, including Mushki, and fought against him, but he was unable to subdue the foe. Sargon's efforts were clearly aided by the incursions of the Gimirri (Gomer) into N. Armenia. Having triumphed everywhere else, Sargon turned his attention to Tarhuntassa against the Arameans. At Elam was a favourable opportunity for attacking Merodach-baladan, who was merely holding down the country by Chaldean troops. Sargon marched down the Tigris, seized the chief posts on the east, screened off the Armeans and their allies, and took Elam. He therefore abandoned Babylon and fell on Sargon's rear, but, meeting no support, retreated S. to his old kingdom and fortified it strongly. Sargon entered Babylon, welcomed by the inhabitants and the king himself. ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA Ituab of Sidon overlord of Phoenicia, and assailed Tyre with the allied fleet. Its king escaped to Cyprus, but the city held out. Sennacherib meanwhile passed down the coast, reduced Ashkelon, but was met at Eltekeh by the Arabians and Egyptians. He gained an easy victory, and captured Eltekeh, Timnath, and Ekron. He concentrated his forces upon Judah, captured 46 fortified cities, deported 200,150 people, and shut up Hezekiah, 'like a bird in a cage,' in Jerusalem. He assigned the Judæan cities to the kings of Ashdod, Ekron, and Gaza, imposed fresh tribute, and received from Elamite, Chaldaean, and Babylonian princes, eight hundred talents of silver, precious stones, couches of ivory, thrones of ivory, precious woods, his daughters, his palace women, male and female singers, etc., an end to vassalage, which was carried to the capital. His siege of Lachish is depicted on his monuments. Before his campaign was over, Merodach-baladad had again appeared in Babylon. A difficulty has always been felt about the destruction of Sennacherib's army, because, if it took place after this campaign, he could hardly have been so successful in Babylonia. His inscriptions end with n.c. 659, but Esarhaddon's reference to his second campaign in Babylonia, and a fragmentary reference to Azekah, suggest that he invested Jerusalem again, on a second campaign, and that the destruction occurred then. The Biblical mention of Sennacherib, king of Elam, who had already appeared on the scene, would date the event after n.c. 691. Further, it seems to have occurred soon before his death in n.c. 681.

In Babylonia, Bal-bi'nu proved unfaithful and was removed and Nippur, Sennacherib's son, was installed as king, and reigned six years. Sennacherib devastated Bit Iakin and defeated Shuzub, a Chaldaean king. He then employed Phœnician shipbuilders and Editions of Elam. Sennacherib marched into Babylonia, his men, including Elamite and Babylonian soldiers, carried the captives to Nineveh. He then invested Jerusalem, where the Chaldeans had already appeared on the scene, and would date the event after n.c. 691. Further, it seems to have occurred soon before his death in n.c. 681.

Assyria, as monumentally attested, falls naturally into periods: (a) the rise of the city-states and their struggle for supremacy; (b) the supremacy of Babylon and the First Babylonian Empire; (c) the Kassite supremacy and the rise of Assyria; (d) the contemporaneous kingdoms of Assyria and Babylonia; (e) the supremacy of Assyria to its fall; (f) the New Babylonian Empire.

(a) The city-states.—The prehistoric remains of the earliest settlers in Babylonia are numerous, but they have received no systematic study. The existence of a non-Semitic race, the so-called Sumerians, is at least the most convenient assumption to account for the problems of the earliest history, but it is impossible to decide how early they were intermixed with Semitic folk. It is as yet not possible to fix the date of their entrance from the S.W., or from the side of Elam, or from N. Mesopotamia. The earliest monuments we possess show a variety of towns, each of which served as a nucleus to a wide area of villages. As populations grew and needs increased the people brought about disputes as to boundaries, and wars ensued. The States entered into keen rivalry in other directions, as commerce developed. As early as c. 3500 B.C. the condition of things may be aptly compared with that of England under the Heptarchy. Eridu, modern Abu Shahrain, lay on the Gulf and W. of the Euphrates mouth. As the seat of the worship of Ea, god of waters, his business was rather on the sea than on the land, but it was always revered as the primitive home of civilization and religion. We have no evidence that it was ever the seat of a kingdom. Babylon, Carchemish, to the W. lay Ur, modern Muchel, then also on the Gulf, the home of the worship of Sin, the moon-god. Across the Euphrates, 30 miles to N.E., lay Larsa, modern Senkerah, where Shamsah, the sun-god, whose daughter, the goddess Ningirsu, was worshipped. The Tepey, or Ziggurat, of Nippur lay by the Euphrates and Ur, modern Narkawich, with its Ishtar temple. To the N. was Ur, modern Tel Ed. From Mar, 35 miles to the E., on the Shatt-el-Hai canal from the Tigria to the Euphrates, was Shuruppak the large, modern Warka (Erech), with its Ishtar cult. To the N. was Larsa, modern Tel Ede. From Mar, 35 miles to the E., on the Shatt-el-Hai canal from the Tigria to the Euphrates, was Shuruppak, later Larsa, modern Tell al-Yahudiyeh or Larsa, later Larsa, modern Tell al-Yahudiyeh, which was also the site of the old Eanna temple. The city was named after the goddess Inanna, who was worshipped there as the goddess of love and fertility. The city was destroyed by the Elamites in the 3rd millennium B.C., and was later inhabited by the Chaldeans.

The history of this period has many gaps, probably because the archaeological exploration has been carried out only at Tell al-Yahudiyeh. The evidence for other cities consists chiefly of references made by the rulers of these two cities, who either ruled over others or were ruled over by them. A king of Ur might leave offerings at Nippur, or order some building to be done there; or the rulers of Nippur might name the king of Ur as their overlord. Such scattered references we must weave into the story we can. About c. 4500 B.C. the first king of Kish, King of S.W., offered to Bel of Nippur the spoils of Kish. Later, Mesilim, king of Kish, made Shuruppak a subject State. About c. 4200 B.C. the king of Eridu, Eanna, and Eanna-wara, made a covenant with the city of Nippur. About c. 3500 B.C. the king of Ur, Naram-Sin, conquered his allies, the city of Eshnunna, and made them submit to his authority. He then advanced into the N.W. and overthrew the kings of S. into Arabia and the islands of the Persian Gulf.

About c. 3500 B.C. the king of Nippur, Shuruppak, Kish, Babylon, and Erech, ruled, and, or at least levied tribute, from the Mediterranean coast, over parts of Syria, and into Arabia, S. into Arabia and the islands of the Persian Gulf. About c. 3500 B.C. the king of Nippur, Shuruppak, ruled in peace, as a subject prince, or patera. Guzua, b.c. 3500, ruled over the Euphrates valley as a subject prince, or patera. Guzua, b.c. 3500, ruled over the Euphrates valley as a subject prince, or patera.

The first kingdom of which we have important inscriptions was Agum-akirum (Agum ii.). He claims to rule over the Kassite empire, the Akkadian, the Babylonian, the Ashurbanipal, Pada, Alman, and Gutium. He restored the images of Marduk and Zaranpazhent, of which he had been carried away to Kish in N. Mesopotamia. Later we learn from the Tell am Armanu letters that as early as the time of Adad-nirari III. king of Assyria, Kurigalzu of Babylon was in friendly relations with Egypt, and refused to support a Canaanite conspiracy against its rule. The relations with Assyria have been already dealt with. He was followed by his grandson, who invaded Egypt. He was killed in battle with the Egyptians, and his son, Naram-Sin, succeeded him. The king of Babylon, Sargon, invaded Egypt, and was defeated by his successor, Hammurabi, king of Babylon. Hammurabi ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his successor, Nebuchadnezzar, ruled for a long time, and his success... and possibly China on the E., and with Eubea on the West.

(f) New Babylonian Empire.—The new Babylonian dynasty was that of Pashe, or Isin, a native dynasty. Nebuchadnezzar I., was apparently its founder. He defeated the Elamites and wrested from them the provinces already occupied by them, and brought back the statue of Bel which they had captured. He also reconquered the West, and left his name on the rocks of modern Sippar. His exploits upon Assyria were unsuccessful. Henceforth Babylonia was pent up by Assyria and Elam, and merely held its own. The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth dynasties yield but a few names of whole years in the records. The Arabian migration swallowed up Mesopotamia and drove back Assyria and Babylonia. The Chaldeans followed the old route from Arabia by Ur, and established themselves firmly in the S. of Babylonia. Akkad was plundered by the Suti. Thus cut off from the West, the absence of Babylonian power allowed the rise of Philiatia; Israel consolidated, Phoenicia grew into power. Hamath, Apamea, Palmyra, became independent States. Damascus became an Arabian power. Egypt was split up, and could influence Palestine but little. When Assyria revived under Adad-nirari, the whole W. was a new country and had to be reconquered. Babylon was restored to her old condition. She was not to have her borders on Assyria's; and had to call for Assyrian assistance in the time of Shalmaneser. Finally, Tiglath-pileser iv. became master of Babylonia, and after 912 B.C. the Chaldean and Assyrians were at war. The Medo-Babylonian Empire was divided between them. Under their common overlords it was a mere dependency of Assyria, till it was destroyed by Babylon. Under Ebalhaddon and Ashurbanipal, Babylonia was revived once more, and Nabopolassar found in the weakness of Assyria and the fall of Nineveh a chance to recover.

Nabopolassar reckoned his reign from B.C. 626, but during the first few years of it he was almost in morass. Babylonian cities such as Ezech continued to acknowledge Sin-shar-ishkun. According to classical writers, he allied himself with the Medo-Scythian hordes, who devastated Mesopotamia, and captured Nineveh. He claims to have chased from Akkad the Assyrians, who from the days of old ruled over all peoples and with their heavy yoke wore out the nations, and to have broken their yoke. They seem to have made no attempt to hold Mesopotamia and Pharaonic N. of them as avanzing from Egypt to take Syria, was defeated at Carchemish B.C. 605 by Nebuchadrezzar. So Babylon succeeded to the W. part of the Assyrian Empire. Beyond a few building inscriptions we know little of this reign.

Nebuchadrezzar's inscriptions hardly mention anything but his building. He fortified Babylon, enriched it with temples and palaces; restored temples at Sippur, Larsa, Ur, Dilbat, Bas, Ereh, Borsa, Kutna, Mariat; cleared out and walled with quays the Aratu canal which ran through Babylon, and dug a canal N. of Sippur. He left an inscription on the rocks at Wady Brissa, a valley N. of the Lebanon Mountains and W. of the upper part of the Orontes; another on a rock N. of the Naher el-Kelb, where the old road from Arvad passes S. to the cities of the coast. A fragment of his annals states that in his 57th year he fought in Egypt against Amasis.

Amel-Marduk (Evil-Merodach), his son, was not acceptable to the priests, and was murdered by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, who had married a daughter of Nebuchadrezzar, and was son of Bel-shur-iskun, the rule-timer. He, too, was occulted chief with the temples of his land. Neriglissar was succeeded by his son Labashi-Marduk, a 'bad character,' whom the priests deposed, setting up Nebonidus, a Babylonian. He was an antiquary rather than a king. He rebuilt many of the oldest Babylonian temples, and in exploring their ruins found records which have helped to date early kings, as quoted above. For some reason he avoided Babylon and left the command of the army to his son Belshazzar. The Manda king, Astyages, invaded Mesopotamia, and was repelled only by the aid of Cyrus, king of Anshan, who a little later by his overthrow of Astyages became the ruler of Persia, and then conquered Croesus of Lydia. On the 16th of Tammuz 539 B.C. Cyrus entered Babylon without resistance. Nabonidus was spared and sent to Karmania. Belshazzar was killed. Cyrus was acceptable to the Babylonians, worshipped at the ancient shrines, and upheld the gods with the idea above of a leadership over their land and people, made Babylon a royal city, and took the old native titles, but the acceptance had departed from the Semitic world for ever.

2. Literature.—Throughout the whole of the old Semitic systems of a form of writing. The earliest specimens of which we know are little removed from pictorial writing; but the use of flat pieces of soft clay, afterwards dried in the sun or baked hard in a furnace, as writing material, and strokes of a triangular reed, soon led to conventional forms of characters in which the curved lines of a picture were replaced by one or more short marks on the line. These were gradually reduced in number until the resultant group of strokes bore little resemblance to the original. The short pointed wedge-shaped 'daba' of the reed have given rise to the name 'cuneiform.' The necessities of the engraver on stone led him to reproduce these wedges with the conventional signs with sufficient resemblance even on the appearance of nails, but all such graphic varieties make no essential difference. The signs denoted primarily ideas: thus the picture of a bull, or a bull's head, would symbolise 'power,' and the words derived from the root 'to be powerful,' then from the word 'powerful' a syllabic value would be derived which might be used in spelling words. Thus the picture of a star might signify 'heaven,' the sign for Amu, the sign for a, and be used to denote all things 'high, lofty, or divine; its syllabic value being as it would be used in spelling wherever aslambil had to be written. But, again, as 'god' was 6b, it might be used in agreeing with. The signs have more than one value, even as syllables: they may also denote ideas. The scribes, however, used not far short of 500 signs, and there is rarely any doubt of their meaning. The values attached to the signs in many cases are not derivable from the words which denote their ideas, and it has been concluded that the signs were adopted from a non-Semitic people called the Semurians. Many inscriptions cannot be read as Semitic, except by regarding them as the development of pictorial writing, and when read syllabically are supposed to be in the Semitic language, which continued to be used, at any rate in certain phrases, to the last, much as Latin words and abbreviations (like e. s. d.) are used by us. There is still great obscurity about this subject, which can be solved only by the discovery of earlier or intermediate inscriptions.

At any rate, we are now able to read with certainty, except for a few obscure expressions, inscriptions which possibly date back to n.c. 6000. The earliest inscriptions hitherto recovered have been from temple archives, and naturally relate to offerings to the gods or gifts to the temples. From very early times, however, contracts such as deeds of sale, dispositions of property, marriage settlements, etc., were preserved in the archives, and many families preserved in sepulchral monuments, letters, business accounts, etc. Writing and reading were widely diffused, even among women being well educated in these respects, and we have enormous collections in our museums of material relating to the private life and customs of the people at almost all periods of the history.

The Babylonians early drew up codes of laws, hymns, ritual texts, mythology, and made records of observations in all directions of natural history. The supposed influence of the heavy body led to works associating celestial phenomena with terrestrial events—the so-called astrological texts which recorded astronomical observations from very early dates. A wonderful collection of extraordinary events, as births of monsters or abnormal beings, were regarded as ominous, and an attempt was made to connect them with events in national or private history. These 'omen tablets,' also dealt with mortals, especially human actions evincing some godly or Divine displeasure. Evil conduct was thus placed under a ban, and the punishment of it was assigned to the 'hand of God or the king.' It was a very high morality that was thus inaugurated; to say yes with the lips and no in the heart, to use false weights, to betray a friend, to estrange relations, to slander or backbite, are all forbidden. The conduct of a good king, of a good man, of a faithful son of his god, are set out with great care, by contrast in the present, 'To him that does thee wrong return a gracious courtesy.' Medicine was extensively written upon, and the number of cases prescribed for is very great. We are not able, as a rule, to recognize either the ailment or the prescription; but it seems that magical spells were often used to drive out the demon supposed to be the cause of the disease.

The Babylonians had some acquaintance with mathematics, so far as necessary for the calculation of areas, and they early drew up tables of squares and cubes, as well as of their measures of surface and capacity. To them we owe the division of time into hours, minutes, and seconds. Their measures still lack the fundamental explanation which can be afforded only by finding some measured object with its Babylonian measure inscribed upon it, in a state allowing of an accurate modern measure. See WYKYRTS AND MeASURES.

3. Religion.—The religion of Babylonia was a syncretic result of the union of a number of city and local cults. Consequently Shamash the sun-god; Sin the moon-god; Ishtar, Venus; Marduk the god of Babylon, Nahhunte of Borsippa, Bel of supreme builder of palaces and temples, guardian of right, defender of the weak and oppressed, accessible to the meanest subject. The expansion of city territory by force of arms, the growth of kingdoms and rise of empires, led to a military caste, rapacious for foreign spoils, and domestic politics became a struggle for power between the war party of expansion and conquest and the party of peace and consolidation. The Babylonian literature was extensive, and much of it has striking similarities to portions of the Bible (see Creation, Deluge, etc.). It also seems to have had influence upon classical mythology.

ATAROTH

—1322 or 3622 of Astad's descendents are mentioned as returning from Zerubbabel (1 Es 8:40). He is called Asagad in the can. books, and 1222 descendents are mentioned in the parallel list in Ezr 2:14, 2322 in Neh 7:11. He appears as Astath, 1 Es 8:24, when a second detachment of 111 return under Ezra (Ezr 2:23). Asagad appears among the leaders who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:18).

ASTROLOGY, ASTRONOMY.—See MAGIC, etc.

ASTYAGES (Bel 1) was the last king of Media. He was defeated and dethroned by Cyrus the Great (B.C. 550).

ASTUPPIM.—1 Ch 27:3. R V = 'RV correctly 'storehouse.'

ASTUR (AV Assur), 1 Es 5:1. His sons returned among the Temple servants under Zerubbabel; called Harhar, Ezr 2:16, Neh 7:39.

ASYLUM.—See ALTAR, KIN [NEXT OF], REFUGEE [CITIZEN OF].

ASYNCRITUS (Ro 16:4).-A Christian greeted by St. Paul with four others 'and the brethren that are with them,' perhaps members of the same small community. The name occurs in Rom. Ins. CIL vi. 12,565, of a freedman of Augustus.

ATAD (Gen 50:12).—A threshing-floor on the road to Beersheba. The site is marked by the modern 'AT.'

ATAR (AV Jatal), 1 Es 5:1. His sons were among the porters or door-keepers who returned with Zerubbabel; called Ater, Ezr 2:16, Neh 7:4.

ATARAH.—Wife of Jerahmeel and mother of Onam (1 Ch 2:20).

ATAROATIS (RV less correctly Ategatis).—In addition to the sanctuary of this goddess (=Gr. Derceto) at Carnion (2 Mac 12:10), other shrines were situated at Hierapolis and Ashkelon. Here sacred fish were kept, and at the latter place the goddess was represented as a mermaid, resembling the supposed form of the Phœnæan Dagon (wh. see). Some exploration, because of the ancient name of Carnion, i.e., Ashleroth-karnaim, have identified the goddess with Astarte. The name, however, a compound of 'Aquat (=Phœn. 'Astar, Heb. 'Ashtoreth'wh. see) and 'Attah, which latter term appears as a god's name upon inscriptions, shows her to be Astarte who has assimilated the functions of Attah. This etymology, together with her mermaid-form and the fact that fish were reared in the temple, makes her a personification of the fertilizing powers of water.

N.W. of District. 2. A town on the S. border of the territory of the children of Joseph (Jos 16), called "Ateron addar" in v., probably identical with "Dorothy," 11 mile S.W. of Bethelhoron the Lower. 3. A town not identified, towards the E. end of the same border (Jos 16). 4. Name of a family (1 Ch. 24, RV "Arotheth-Joab").

ATETA (AV Teta), 1 Es 54a = Matta, Ezra 2, Neh 7.

ATHACH. 1 S 30. — Unknown town in the south of Judah.

ATHALIAH.—A man of Judah dwelling in Jerusalem (Neh 11).

ATHALIAH.—1. The only queen who occupied the throne of Judah. She was the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and was married to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat. On the accession of her son Ahaziah she became queen mother, second only to the king in power and influence. When Ahaziah was slain by Jehu, she could not bring herself to take an inferior position, and seized the throne for herself, making it secure, as she supposed, by slaying all Ahaziah's brothers and members of the house of David, and saying they were within her reach. One infant was preserved, and was successfully concealed in the Temple six years. The persons active in this were Jehohasib, sister of Ahaziah, and her husband Jehohadad, the chief priest. The story of the young prince's coronation by the body-guard is one of the most dramatic in Hebrew history. The death of Athaliah at the hands of the guard forms the introduction of the memorable traffic in the temple of Baal, which is spoken of in the same connexion, indicates that Athaliah was addicted to the worship of the Phoenician Baal, introduced by her mother into Israel (2 K. 11). 2. See Gottholam. 3. A Benjamin (1 Ch 8).

ATHERAM (Nu 21).—Either a proper name of a place from which the route was named; so RV 'the way of Atharim,' as LXX.—or, 'the way of tracks,' i.e. a regular caravan road. (The rendering of AV, 'way of the spies,' follows Targ. and Syr.) The 'way of Atharim' will then be that described in Nu. 13th (a).

ATHENOBUS (1 Mac 15th-20th).—A friend of Antiochus vii., Sidetes. He was sent to Jerusalem to remonstrate with Simon Macabbeus for the occupation of Joppa, Gasara, the citadel of Jerusalem, and certain places outside Judaea. Simon refused the terms proposed, and Athenobus was obliged to return in indignation to the king.

ATHENS.—In the earliest times, Athens, on the Gulf of Attica, consisted of two settlements, the town on the plain and the citadel on the hill above, the Acropolis, where the population fled from invasion. Its name and the name of its patron-goddess Attene (Athena) are inextricably connected. She was the maiden goddess, the watchful defender of her people, the patroness of the arts. The city lies about 3 miles from the seacoast on a large plain. When Greece was free, during the period before b.c., 146 Athens was the capital of the district Attica, and developed a unique history in Greece. It first gained distinction by the repulse of the Persian invasion in b.c. 490 and 480, and afterwards had a brilliant career of political, commercial, literary, and artistic supremacy. It was in the 5th cent. n.c. the greatest of Greek democracies, and produced the greatest sculptures and literary works the world has ever seen. In the same century Socrates lived and taught there, and later Plato and Aristotle. The conflict with Sparta, the effects of the Macedonian invasion, and ultimately the Roman conquest of Greece, which became a Roman province under the name 'Achaia,' lessened the political importance of Athens, but as a State it received from Rome a position of freedom and consideration worthy of its undying merits. Athens remained supreme in philosophy and the arts, and was in St. Paul's time (Ac 17-18), 1 Th 3) the seat of a famous university. A. Souter.

ATPERA (1 Es 9).—See HATPERA.

ATONEMENT.—The word 'atonement' (at-one-ment), in English, denotes the making to be at one, or reconciling, of persons who have been at variance. In OT usage it signifies that by which sin is 'covered' or 'expiated,' or the wrath of God averted. Thus, in EV, of the Levitical sacrifices (Lv 1, 14, 25, 26, etc.), of the half-shkel of ransom-money (Ex 30, 14), of the intercession of Moses (Ex 32), of the zeal of Phinehas (Num 25), etc. In the NT the word occurs once in AV as tr. of the Gr. word katallag, ordinarily and in RV rendered 'reconciliation' (Rom 5). The 'reconciliation' here intended, however, as the expression 'received,' and also v.14 ('reconciled to God through the death of his Son') show, is that made by Christ on behalf of sinners (cf. Col 1, 19 having made peace through the blood of his cross). In both OT and NT the implication is that the 'reconciliation' or 'making-at-one' of man and God necessarily entailed expiation or propitiation. In its theological use, therefore, the word 'atonement' has come to denote, not the actual state of reconciliation into which believers are introduced through Christ, whose work was, however, oriented to this end, but the reconciling act itself—the work accomplished by Christ in his suffering and death for the salvation of the world.

In the OT the dedication of the temple.—In tracing the Scripture teaching on the subject of atonement, it is desirable to begin with the OT, in which the foundations of the NT doctrine are laid. Here several lines of preparation are to be distinguished, each of which, as OT revelation draws to its close, tend to unite.

1. The most general, but indispensable, preparation in the OT lies in its doctrines of the holiness, righteousness, and grace of God; also, the sin and guilt of man. God's holiness (including in this his ethical purity, His awful elevation above the creature, and His zeal for His own honour) is the background of every doctrine of atonement. As holy, (reconciled to God through the death of his Son') show, is that made by Christ on behalf of sinners (cf. Col 1, 19 having made peace through the blood of his cross). In both OT and NT the implication is that the 'reconciliation' or 'making-at-one' of man and God necessarily entailed expiation or propitiation. In its theological use, therefore, the word 'atonement' has come to denote, not the actual state of reconciliation into which believers are introduced through Christ, whose work was, however, oriented to this end, but the reconciling act itself—the work accomplished by Christ in his suffering and death for the salvation of the world.

In the OT the dedication of the temple

2. A second important line of preparation in the OT is in the doctrine of sacrifice. Whatever the origins or ethic associations of sacrifice, it is indisputable that sacrifice in the OT has a peculiar meaning, in accordance with the ideas of God and His holiness above indicated. From the beginning, sacrifice was the appointed means of approach to God. Whether, in the earliest narrative, the difference in the sacrifices of Cain and Abel had to do with the fact that the one was bloodless and the other an animal sacrifice (Gen 4), or, as later stated, solely in the disposition of the offers (v.), is not clear. Probably, however, from the commencement, a mystic virtue was attached to the shedding and presentation of the sacred element of the blood. Up to the Exodus, we have only the generic type of the burnt-offering; the Exodus itself gave birth to the Passover, in which blood sprinkled gave protection from destruction; at the ratification of the Covenant, peace-offerings appear with burnt-offerings (Ex 20:24); finally, the Levitical ritual provided a cultus in which the idea of atonement had a standing place. Critical questions as to the age of this legislation need not detain us, for there is an increasing tendency to recognize that Hebrew law preceded the date of the later codification of the Levitical laws, the bulk of these laws rest on older usages. That the propitiatory idea in sacrifice goes back to early times may be seen in such pictures of patriarchal piety as Job 19:21; 23:9, and in Hos 4:13. A stoning virtue is expressly assumed as belonging to sacrifice in Ps 23:4. Cf. also allusions to sin- and guilt-offerings, and to propitiatory rites in so old a stratum of laws as the 'Law of Holiness' (Lv 19:5; 26:39), and in Hos 4:13. It is in the Levitical system that all the ideas involved in OT sacrifice come to clearest expression. The Epistle to the Hebrews admirably seizes the idea of the system.

The mitotic properties of the animal, the sacredness of their blood, the maintenance of their fellowship with God, and the sense held by the Levites of this sanctity, were impressed on the idea of the holiness of God, and is designed throughout to impress on the mind of the worshipper the sense of the separation which sin has made between him and God, and that he can only approach God directly, but only through the priesthood. The priest alone could enter the sacred enclosure; into the Most Holy Place even the priests were not permitted to enter, but only the high priest, once a year, and then only with blood of sacrifice, offered first for himself and then for the people; all this signifying that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest (Heb 10:19-21; 8:3). While an atoning virtue is expressly assumed as belonging to sacrifice in Ps 23:4, it is not difficult to recognize the remission and even include it in their pictures of a restored theocracy (cf. Is 56:7; 60:6; Jer 17:13-17; 33:7; 18; etc.), their polemic must be regarded as against the abuse rather than the use. The proper prophetic preparation, however, lay along a different line from the sacrificial.

The basis of it is the idea of the Righteous Sufferer, which is seen shaping itself in the Prophecies and the Psalms (cf. Ps 22); and the righteous man, both through the persecutions he sustains and the national calamities arising from the people's sins which he shares, is a living exemplification of the law of the innocent suffering for the guilty. Such suffering and sacrifice, if permitted, would be tantamount to intercession, is not in itself atoning. But in the picture of the Servant of Jehovah in Is 53 a new idea emerges. The sufferings arising from the people's sins may be seen in this Hosea, through the spirit in which they are borne, and the Divine purpose in permitting them, sufferings for sin—vicarious, healing, expiatory. Their expiatory character is affirmed in the strongest manner in the successive verses, and sacrificial language is freely taken over the sufferer (Is 53, 6; 10; 11). Here at length the ideas of prophecies and those of sacrificial law coincide, and, though there is no second instance of like clear and detailed portraiture, it is not difficult to recognize the same ideas in later prophecies, e.g., in Zec 3:126; 13:7, Dn 5:27. With such predictions on its lips OT prophecy closes, awaiting the time when, in Malachi's words, the Lord, whom men sought, would come to His Temple (3:3).

ii. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The period between the OT and the NT affords little for our purpose. It is certain that, in the early part of the NT, the Sadducees think, there were partial exceptions, the great mass of the Jewish people had no idea of a suffering Messiah, or thought of any connection between the Messiah and the sacrifices. If at all, the Messiah was to be acquitted, not from the sacrifices, in atoning and other good deeds; and the sacrifices of the righteous were regarded as in some degree atoning for the wicked. It was a new departure when Jesus taught that 'the Christ should suffer' (cf. Mk 8:24). Yet in His own suffering and death He claimed to be fulfilling the Law and the Prophets (Lk 22:37, 44).

1. Life and Teaching of Jesus.—The main task of Jesus on earth was to reveal the Father, to disclose the true nature of the Kingdom of God and its righteousness, in opposition to false ideals, to lead men to the recognition of His Messiahs, to recover the lost, to attach a few faithful souls to His new kingdom, and to prepare their minds for His death and resurrection, and for the after duty of spreading His gospel among mankind. The dependence of the Messianic salvation on His Person and activity is everywhere presupposed; but it was only in frag-
ATONEMENT

Him that 'he shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1:21; He is the promised 'Saviour' of the house of David (Lk 1:32-49)); the Baptist announced Him, with probable reference to Is 53, as 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1:29, cf. 1:28). From the hour of His definite acceptance of His vocation of Messiahship in His baptism, and at the Temptation, combined as this was with the clear consciousness of Is 50 (cf. 40:4), the 'ideal of salvation, Jesus could not but have been aware that His mission would cost Him His life. He who recalled the fate of all past prophets, and sent forth His disciples with predictions of persecutions and death (Mt 10), seems to have foreseen, as to His own fate at the hands of scribes and Pharisees (cf. Mt 22:19). But it was not simply as a 'fate' that Jesus recognized the inevitability of His death; there is abundant attestation that He saw it in a Divine ordination, the necessary fulfilment of prophecy, and an essential means to the salvation of the world. As early as the J udæan ministry, accordingly, we find Him speaking to Nicodemus of the Son of Man being lifted up, that whatsoever believeth on Him should not perish (Jn 3:16). He sets Himself forth in the discourse at Capernaum as the Bread of Life, in terms which imply the sacrifice of His body to death for the life of the world (Jn 6:32-50). Later He speaks of a voluntary surrender of His life for His sheep (Jn 10:17-18). After Peter's great confession, He makes full announcement of His approaching sufferings and death (Mt 16:21; Mk 8:31). He also sought to couple this with His resurrection at the Transfiguration (Lk 9:31). Yet clearer intimations were given. There is first the well-known announcement to the disciples, called forth by their disputes about the order of salvation: 'The time is come that the Son of Man is to be lifted up.' The world will be judged, and all the people of the earth will see the Son of Man coming in His kingdom (Mt 24:27-28; cf. Lk 17:22; 21:25-26; Jn 12:47-48). It was the subject of His teaching that the world in general should look upon Him as 'the Servant of the Lord' (Ps 21:10) and 'the Son of Man' (Mt 17:23; Lk 9:32; Acts 7:18). He is to be seen and recognized a God in the body of His flesh through death, was our 'ransom,' procured for us 'forgiveness of sins through his blood,' etc. (cf. Is 53:5-7; Ro 3:24-25; 5:6-8; Eph 2:15.9). He is to be seen and recognized a God in the body of His flesh through death, was our 'ransom,' procured for us 'forgiveness of sins through his blood,' etc. (cf. Is 53:5-7; Ro 3:24-25; 5:6-8; Eph 2:15.9).

2. The Apostolic teaching.—The OT had spoken: the Son of Man had come and yielded up His life a ransom for many. He was now exalted, and had shed the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:33) in the power of the Resurrection. The idea of the sacrifice of Christ, the passing of God's grace into human belief, had been set forth, and the remission of sins in His name to all nations—a clear proof that through His death and resurrection a fundamental change had been wrought in the relations of God to humanity (Mt 20:28-29; Lk 24:45-46).

Several things stand out clearly in the Apostolic doctrine of the atonement; each of them in harmony with what we have learned from our study of the subject in the OT. The presuppositions are the same—the holiness, righteousness, and grace of God, and the sin and guilt of man, entailing on the individual and the race a Divine condemnation and exposure to wrath which man is unable of himself to remove (wrought out most fully by St. Paul, Ro 1:18-28, Ga 2:19-20). The atonement itself is represented (1) as the fruit, and not the cause of God's love (Ro 5:6-8; Ga 2:19-20); (2) as a necessity for human salvation (Ro 3:24, He 9:22); (3) as realizing perfectly what the ancient sacrifices did imperfectly and typically (He 9, 10); as an expiation, purging from guilt and cancelling condemnation (Ro 8:1.2.3, He 10:17-18, 1 Jn 1:7, Rev 5:6 etc.), and at the same time a 'propitiation,' averting wrath, and opening the way for a display of mercy (Ro 3:21, He 2:9, 1 Jn 2:20); (4) as containing in itself the most powerful ethical motive—to reconcile man and render him active godliness. Christian service, etc. (Ro 6:14, Col 6:14.2 Col 5:18-19, Ga 2:19-20, Eph 5:2.1, 1 P 1:18.2, 1 Jn 4:19; etc.; with this is connected the work of the Holy Spirit, which operates these sanctifying changes in the soul); (5) as, therefore, effecting a new set of attitudes and concepts in man's respect of the magnitude of the price at which our salvation is bought (Ro 8:35, 1 Th 2:13, He 10:5, 1 P 1:14.16 etc.), and the completeness of the deliverance accomplished—from wrath (Ro 5:1, Th 1:10), from the power of ATONEMENT, DAY OF

Indwelling sin (Ro 6:1-14, 8:2-14 etc.), from bondage to Satan (Eph 2:2-3, 6:20 etc.), from the tyranny of the evil world (Gal 1:4, Tit 2:14, 1 P 1:14 etc.), finally, from the effects of sin and death and all other evils (Ro 8:2, 1 Cor 15:26 etc.).

In the NT teaching, therefore, the sacrifice of Christ fulfills all that was prefigurative in the OT doctrine of atonement, for, as the true and perfect sacrifice, it is infinitely transcendent, while it supersedes, all NT prefigurations. The relation of the Christian atonement to that of the Law is, accordingly, as much one of contrast as of fulfillment. This is the thesis wrought out in the Epistle to the Hebrews, but its truth is recognized in all parts of the NT. The sacrifices of the OT were, in their very nature, incapable of really removing sin (He 10:1). The NT teaches us the immanence of the character of the victims, in their frequent repetition, in their multiplication, etc. (He 9:9).

In Jesus, however, every character meets, qualifying Him to make atonement for humanity. He is at once perfect and perfect sacrifice: Divine dignity as Son of God (Ro 1:4, He 5:5, 8:10 etc.); a perfect participation in human nature (Ro 8:3, Gal 4:4, He 2:10-17 etc.); absolute sinlessness (2 Co 5:21, Ro 4:25, He 7:26 etc.); entire human sympathy (Ro 8:34, He 2:17-18) regards God, undeviating obedience and surrender to the will of the Father (He 2:18, Ro 8:3, Heb 10:19-21). He is 'Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn 2:2), and His sacrificial death the culmination of His obedience (Ro 5:9, Heb 10:19).

ii. Rationale of the Atonement.—The way is now open to our last question—How was atonement for sin by Christ possible? And in what did Christ's atonement consist? The NT does not develop a theology of the atonement; yet a theology would not be possible if the NT did not yield the principles, and lay down the form and source of a partial solution of this problem.

A chief clue to an answer to the above questions lies in what is taught (1) of Christ's original, essential relation to the creation (cf. Jn 1:1-4, 1 Co 8:6, Eph 1:4, Col 1:17), and (2) to the sacrifice (Ro 1:4, 8:1-4). This connects itself with what is said of Christ's Divine dignity. Deeper even than the value His Divine Sonship gives to His sacrifice is the original relation to humanity of the Creative Word which renders His unique representative relation to the race possible. It is a world beyond the representations of the NT to say, with Maurice and others, that He is 'the root of humanity.' In Him it is grounded; by Him it is sustained; from Him it derives all the powers of its development. While He represents mankind in the nature of created humanity, His personality is above humanity. Hence His generic relation to the race—'Son of God'—'Son of Man.' In this 'mystery of godliness' (1 Tm 3:16) lies the possibility of a representative atonement for the race.

For this is the next point in the solution of our problem; Christ's identification of Himself with the race He came to save is complete. It is not merely 'federal' or 'legal'; it is vital, and this in every respect. His love is unbounded; His sympathy is complete; His purpose and desire to save are unaltering. He identifies Himself with humanity, with a perfect consciousness (1) of what He is; (2) of what the race He came to save is and needs; (3) of what a perfect atonement involves (cf. Jn 8:46). Himself holy, the well-beloved Son, He knows with unerring clearness what sin is, and what the means from God is about sin. He does not shrink from anything His identification with a sinful race entails upon Him, but freely accepts its position and responsibilities as His own. He is 'made under the law' to 'answer for sin' (Y Midr. 54:23), as it were, by laying down His life, a life not merely broken but broken and violated, and entailing 'curse.' Identifying Himself thus perfectly with the race of men as under sin the one hand, and with the mind of God about sin on the other, He is the natural mediator between God and man, and is alone in the position to render to God whatever atonement for his race is necessary as well as practical.

But what is necessary, and how did Christ render it? Here come in the 'theories' of atonement; most of them 'broken lights'; all needed to do full justice to the Divine reality of the NT simply restates Scriptural all theories which affirm that atonement—reparation to the violated law of righteousness—is not necessary. Christ's work, while bringing forgiveness, conserves holiness, magnifies law, and indicates righteousness (Ro 3:21-26). Also defective are theories which seek the sole explanation of atonement in the ethical motive; purely moral theories. Atonement is taken for granted in the sense only of the reconciliation of man to God. Scripture recognizes obstacles to salvation on the side of righteousness in God as well as in man's unwillingness, and atonement aims at the removal of both. It has the aspect of propitiation, of expiation, of restitution in integrum, as well as of moral influence. It is an act of reconciliation, embracing God's relation to the world equally with the world's relation to God (cf. Jn 3:16, 2 Co 5:19).

There remain two views, one finding the essence of Christ's atonement in the surrender of a holy will to God—in the obedience of Christ unto death, even the death of the Cross (Maurice and others). This assuredly is a vital element in atonement, but is it the whole? Does Scripture not recognize also the submission of Christ to the endurance of the actual penal evil of sin—specially to death—so that rests in the judgment of God upon our race? All that has preceded necessitates the answer that it does. The other,—the legal or forensic view,—accordingly, puts the essence of atonement in this penal endurance; in the substitutionary submission of Christ to the penalty due to us, as individual, it is the one acceptable thing to God (cf. J. M'Leod Campbell). It is here, therefore, that we must seek the most secret of atonement. The innocent suffering with and for the guilty is a law from which Jesus did not withdraw Himself. In His consciousness of solidarity with mankind, He freely submitted to those evils (shame, ignominy, suffering, temptation, death) which express the judgment of God upon the sin of the world, and in the experience of them—peculiarly in the yielding up of His life—did such honour to all the principles of righteousness involved, rendered so impressive to the world, as to inspire a faith in God in His attitude to the sin of the world, as constituted a perfect atonement for that sin for such as believingly accept it, and make its spirit their own. 'By the which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (He 10:14).

PROFITITATION, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF.—The Day of Atonement, with its unique and impressive ritual, is the culmination and crown of the sacrificial worship of the OT. The principal details are given in Lv 16, supplemented by Ex 29, Nu 28-29, Ex 29, all from the Priests' Code, though not all, as we shall see, from the later strata of the priestly legislation. The date was the 10th day of the seventh month (Tishri) reckoning from evening to evening (Lv 16:23, 25). Not only was this day a 'sabbath of solemn rest,' on which no work of any sort was to be done, but its unique place among the religious festivals of the OT was emphasized by the strict observance of a fast. The rites peculiar to 'the day of atonement' (Y Midr. 54:23), as it were, in later literature, may be conveniently grouped in five stages.

(a) In the preparatory stage (Lv 16:4-14), after the special morning sacrifices had been offered (Nu 29:1-14), the high priest selected the appointed sin- and burnt-offerings for himself and his 'house,' i.e. the priestly caste, then laid aside his usual ornate vestments, bathed, and robed in a simple white linen tunic and girdle. He next selected two he-goats and a ram from the people's offerings, and proceeded to 'cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for J,' and the other lot for Azazel (AV 'scapegoat,' see Azazel). These preparations completed, the proper expiatory rites were begun, and were accomplished in three successive stages.

(b) In the first stage (vv.11-14) the high priest made atonement for himself and the priesthood. After slaying 'the goat,' the head of the sacrificed animal was thrown into the Moat, and the high-priestly tunic was shed and cast aside. The high priest then proceeded to wash, along the high-priestly path to the Most Holy Place in Jerusalem, where he was numbered among the Israelites, and where he had been immersed in the ritual washing. Here the 'sins' of all the nation were recorded and the high priest was ritually cleansed. He then proceeded to the sanctuary, carrying the sin-offering in the wilderness. The ritual cleansing of the high priest was completed, and he was once more prepared to officiate at the sanctuary. The high priest then entered the Most Holy Place in Jerusalem, where he was numbered among the Israelites, and where he had been immersed in the ritual washing. Here the 'sins' of all the nation were recorded and the high priest was ritually cleansed. He then proceeded to the sanctuary, carrying the sin-offering in the wilderness. The ritual cleansing of the high priest was completed, and he was once more prepared to officiate at the sanctuary.

(c) In the second stage (vv.15-19) atonement was made in succession for the Most Holy Place, the Holy Place, and the outer court. The goat on which the lot for 'J' had fallen was slain by the high priest, who then entered the Most Holy Place for the third time with its blood, which he manipulated as before. On his return through the Holy Place a similar ceremony was performed (v.19, cf. Ex 30:10), after which he proceeded, as directed in vv.14-15, to 'cleanse and hallow' the altar of burnt-offering, which stood in the outer court. These activities culminated in the final stage of 'the Day's' ceremonial (vv.20-22). The fact that the essential part was now accomplished was strikingly shown by the high priest's retiring into the Holy Place to put off 'the holy garments' (vv.20-22), bathe, and resume his ordinary high-priestly vestments. Returning to the court, he offered the burnt-offerings for himself and the people, together with the fat of the sin-offering. The remaining verses (23-30) deal with details, the characteristic significance of which will be discussed presently.

Reasoning from the liturgical history of Lv 16, from the highly developed sense of sin, and from the unique prominence given to fasting, as well as from the fact that the date is unknown, OT scholars are now practically unanimous in regarding the Day of Atonement as an institution of the post-exilic age. There is good reason for holding—although on this point there is not the same unanimity—that it originated even later than the time of Ezra, by whom the main body of the Priest's Code was introduced. The nucleus from which the rites of Lv 16 were developed was probably the simpler ceremonial laid down by Ezekiel for the purification of the sanctuary (43:22). Other elements, such as the earlier provisions for the entry of the high priest into the Most Holy Place still found in the opening verses of the chapter, were incorporated to make an actual performance of the great fast of Neh 9th, contributed to the final development of the institution as it now appears in the Pentateuch. It is doubtless much older than the earliest reference in Sir 50:1 (c. B.C. 180). In NT it is referred to as 'the Fast,' (Ac 27:9), and so occasionally by Josephus.

The most striking illustration of this transmissibility, however, is seen in the central rite by which the nation's sins are transferred to the head of 'the goat for Azazel,' the demonic spirit of the wilderness (cf. the similar rite, Lv 14:4-9).

These survivals from the earlier stages of the common Semitic religion should not blind the modern student to the profound conviction of sin to which the institution bears witness, nor to the equally profound sense of the need of pardon and reconciliation, and of uninterrupted approach to God. By its emphasis on these essential needs of the soul the Day of Atonement has underlined for the modern the importance of the preparation for Judaism for the perfect atonement through Jesus Christ. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in a familiar passage contrasts the prophetic work of the high priest on this day with the great propitiation of Him who, by virtue of His own atoning blood, 'entered in once for all into the holy place' (He 9:24), even 'into heaven itself,' where He remains, our great High Priest and Intercessor (7:25).

ATROTH-BETH-JOAB.—See Azaroth, No. 4.

ATROTH-SHOPHAN.—A town E. of Jordan, near Aroer and Zaanem, fortified by Gideon (Nu 32:4). Some place it with Ataroth at Attarás. This is hardly possible. The site is unknown.

ATTAIN.—In Ac 27:7 'attain' has the literal meaning of reach a place (so RV). Elsewhere it has the figurative sense still in use.

ATTALIA (modern Adalia).—A town on the coast of Pamphylia, not far from the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, founded and named by Attalus II. It was besieged in n.c. 79 by F. Serrullus Isauricus, when in possession of the pirates. In the Byzantine period

AUGUSTUS.—This name is Latin, and was a new name conferred (16th Jan. B.C. 27) by the Roman Senate on Caius Octavius, who, after his adoption by the dictator Caius Julius Caesar, bore the names Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus. The word means 'worthy of reverence' (as a god), and was represented in Greek by Αὔγιωτας, which has the same signification, but was avoided by Lk 2:23 as impious. In official documents Augustus appears as 'Imperator Caesar Augustus.' He was born in B.C. 65, was the first Roman emperor from B.C. 23, and died in A.D. 14. He was equally eminent as soldier and administrator, and the Empire was governed for centuries very much on the lines laid down by him. In Lk 2:1 he is mentioned as having issued a decree that all inhabitants of the Roman Empire should be enrolled (for purposes of taxation). There is evidence for a 14-year cycle of enrolment in the Roman province of Egypt.

A. SOUTER.

AUTEAS.—A Levite (1 Es 9:47); called in Neh 7:54 Hodiah.

AUTHORITY.—The capability, liberty, and right to perform what one wills. The word implies also the physical and mental ability for accomplishing the end desired. Authority refers especially to the right one has, by virtue of his office, position, or relationship, to command obedience. The centurion was 'a man under authority,' who knew what it meant to be subject to others higher in authority than himself, and who also himself exercised authority over the soldiers placed under him (Mt 22:8). In like manner 'Herod's jurisdiction' (Lk 23:2), he was his authority over the province which he ruled. Hence the authority of any person accords with the nature of his office or position, so that we speak of the authority of a husband, a parent, an apostle, a judge, or of any civil ruler. The magistrates who are called in Ro 13:1 'the higher powers,' are strictly the highly exalted and honoured authorities of the State, who are to be obeyed in all that is right, and reverence as the 'ministers of God for good.' God is Himself the highest authority in heaven and on earth, but He has also given unto His Son 'authority on earth to forgive sins' (Mt 28:18) and to execute judgment (Jn 5:27).

After his resurrection Jesus Himself declared: 'All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth' (Mt 28:18; cf. Col 2:8, 1 P 3:21). In the plural the word is used in Eph 2:3; 6:22, Col 1:28, to denote good and evil angels, who are supposed to hold various degrees and ranks of authority. See DOMINION, POWER.

AUTHORIZED VERSION.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS.

AVARAN ('pale').—Surname of Eleazar, a brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 2:16).—See ANOINT, DRESS, POWER.

AVEN.—An insulting substitute in Ezk 30:1 for on (wh. see).

AVENGER OF BLOOD.—The practice of blood-revenge has been very widely spread among societies in a certain stage of civilization, where there has been a central authority to fix the order of retaliation, and where the certainty of retaliation has been the only guarantee for security of life. Among the Semites the custom was in full force from the earliest times, and it is still the only spring of order in Arabia. It depends for its maintenance upon the solidarity of the clan or tribe. All the members of the tribe, whatever may be the immediate parental relationship, are counted as being of one blood; a wrong done to one is a wrong done to all, to be avenged if necessary by all the offended clan upon all the clan of the offender. The phrase used by the Arabs is, 'Our blood has been shed.'

Of the form of blood-revenge that involved the whole clan or tribe in the murder of a single individual there are still traces in the OT (Jos 7:4, 2 K 3:27). Naturally, however, the duty of avenging the shedding of blood fell primarily upon him who was nearest of kin to the slaughtered man. This next of kin was called the goël. The word in Hebrew law was used in a wide sense for him whose duty it was to redeem the property or the person of an impoverished or enslaved relative (Lv 25:46, 47, 49, Ru 4:16), but it came to be used specially of the man who had to perform this most tragic duty of kinship. The steady effort of Hellenic law was to limit this and enslave the duty, and ensure that a blood feud should not perpetuate itself to the ruin of a whole clan, and that deliberate murder and accidental homicide should not come under the same penalty. It is possible to trace with some definiteness the progress of this sentiment by which the goēl was gradually transformed from being the irresponsible murderer of a possibly blameless manslaughter to being practically the executioner of a carefully considered sentence passed by the community. See KNIGHT (Next occur).

R. BRUCE TAYLOR.

AVITH.—A Moabite city (Ge 36:12); site unknown.

AVOID.—This word is used idiomatically in 18 15th 'David avoided out of his presence twice.' So Coverdale translates Mt 16:18 'Anoyde fro me, Sathan.'

AVOCHU. —This word, now obsolete except in legal phrases, means to acknowledge.

AVVA, AVVITES (2 K 17:7, 8).—See IVYAH.

AVVIM.—1. The Avvim are spoken of in Dt 2:11 (cf. Jos 15:5) as primitive inhabitants of S.W. Palestine near Gaza, who were absorbed by the immigrants from Caphtor (wh. see), i.e. the Philistines. 2. A Benjamite town (Jos 15:19); site unknown.

J. F. McCurdy.

AWAY WITH.—This phrase is used idiomatically with the force of a verb in 1 L 11 the calling of assemblies, 'I cannot away with.' i.e. tolerate. This verb is omitted (=get away with, i.e. in mod. English 'get on with').

AWL.—A boring instrument, named only in connection with the ceremony whereby a slave was bound to perpetual servitude (Ex 21:2, Dt 15:18).

AWNING.—Correctly given by RV in Ezk 27:27 as tr. of Heb. mekâtak, corrected from mekassot (AV 'that which covered thee').

AX, AXE.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 1, 3.

AXLE, AXLE-TREES.—See WHEEL.
AZAZEL. — Father of one of the commission appointed to investigate the foreign marriages (1 Es 9:4); same as Azabiel No. 4.

AZABIEL. — One of those who put away their foreign wives (1 Es 9:4).

AZALEAH. — Father of Shaphan the scribe (2 K 22:2, 2 Ch 34).

AZANIAH. — A Levite (Neh 10).

AZARAIAS. — The father or, more probably, a more remote ancestor of Ezra (1 Es 8:9); — Seraiah of Ezr 7:1.

AZARIAH. — 1. King of Judah; see Uzziah. 2. 2 Ch 22:22 for Ahaziah. 3. 2 Ch 15:14 a prophet, son of Oded, who met Asa's victorious army at Mareshah, and urged him to begin and persevere in a religious reform. 4. High priest in the reign of Solomon (1 K 4:5). 5. 1 Ch 6:6, Ezr 7, father of Amariah, who was high priest under Jehoshaphat. 6. High priest in the reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26:23-24); he withstood and denounced the king when he presumptuously attempted to usurp the priests' office (Gershon asumes upon the altar. 7. High priest in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 30:11). 8. 1 Ch 6:33, Ezr 7? (Ezerias, 1 Es 8:2; Azarias, 2 Es 11), son of Nikiiah the high priest. 9. K 1:4, a son of Nathan, who 'was over the officers' (v.7). 10. 1 Ch 26, son of Ethana whose wisdom was surpassed by that of Solomon (1 K 4:31). 11. 1 Ch 23, a man of Judah who had Egyptian blood in his veins (v.23). 12. 1 Ch 6:4, a Kohathite Levite (called Uzziah in 1 Ch 6:4). 13. 14. 2 Ch 21, Azariah and Azariah, two of the sons of Jehoshaphat. 15. 16. 2 Ch 23, Azariah and Azariah, two of the five 'captains of hundreds' who assisted Jehoiada in the restoration of Josiah. 17. 2 Ch 23:23, one of those who supported the prophet Oded when he rebuked the army of Israel for purposing to enslave the captives of Judah. 18. 19. 2 Ch 23, two Levites, a Kohathite and a Merarite. 20. Neh 5:2, one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem. 21. Neh 7:7 (called Seraiiah, Ezr 2:14). 22. Neh 5:1 (Azarias, 1 Es 8:2), one of those who helped the Levites to 'cause the people to understand the law.' 23. Jer 43:4, son of Hoshahiah (the Maschathite, 40th), also called Jezaniah (40th 429) and Jazaniah (2 K 25:17). He was one of the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. 24. The Hebrew name of Abednego (Dan 1:7, 11, 12:2). 25. 26. Azarias. — 1. 1 Es 9:1; called Uzziah, Ezr 10:9b. 2. 1 Es 9:4, one of those who stood beside Ezra at the reading of the Law. 3. 1 Es 9:4—Azariah of Neh 8:9. 4. Jazaniah, father of Samuel Raphael (To 53:6, 19 79 95). 5. A captain of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 5:14. 59, 60).

AZARU. — Ancestor of a family which returned with Zerbabbel (1 Es 5:8).

AZAZ. — A Reubenite (1 Ch 5:9).

AZAZEL. — The name in Hebrew and RV of the desert spirit to whom one of the two goats was sent; laden with the sins of the people, in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16:8, 27, RV, see ATONEMENT [DAY of]). Etymology, origin, and significance are still matters of conjecture. The AV designation scapegoat (i.e. the goat that is allowed to escape, which goes back to the caper emusiarus of the Vulgate) obscures the fact that the word Azazel is a proper name in the original, and in particular the name of a powerful spirit or demon supposed to inhabit the wilderness or 'solitary land' (16:27). The most plausible explanation of this strange element in the rite is that it connects Azazel with the illicit worship of field-spirits or satyrs (lit. 'he-goats') of which mention is made in several OT passages (Lv 17:1, Is 52:16 etc.). It may have been the intention of the authors of Lv 16 in its present form to strike at the roots of this popular belief and practice by giving Azazel, probably regarded as the prince of the satyrs, a place in the recognized ritual. Christianity itself can supply many analogies to such a proceeding. The belief that sin, disease, and the like can be removed by being transferred to living creatures, beasts or birds, is not confined to the Semitic races, and has its analogy in Hebrew ritual, in the ceremony of the cleansing of the leper (Lv 14:1). In the Book of Enoch (c. B.C. 180) Azazel appears as the prince of the fallen angels, the offspring of the unions described in Gn 6:4.

A. R. S. Kenedy.

AZAZI. — 1. A Levite (1 Ch 15:23). 2. Father of Hoshab the prince of Ephraim (1 Ch 27:27), son of Obed the overseer of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 31:12).

AZE. — Father of Nehemiah, who took part in rebuilding the walls (Neh 3:20).

AZEKAR. — A city of Judah (Jos 15:4, 17, 34), 11 Ch 11, Neh 18:10, near the Valley of Elah; inhabited by the Jews after the Captivity. Site unknown.

AZETAS. — Head of a family which returned with Zerbabbel (1 Es 5:8).

AZAD. — See Aasted.

AZIAH. — Ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 11); called Azariah, Ezr 7:2, and Oziias, 1 Es 6:8.

AZEL. — A Levite (1 Ch 15:23); called in v.16 Jaaziel — the full form of the name.

AZIZA. — A Jew who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:7); called in 1 Es 4:3 Zardeus.

AZMAYETH. — 1. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 5:8). 2. One of David's mighty men (2 S 5:19, 1 Ch 11:34), probably identical with the Azmaveth of 1 Ch 12:27, whose sons joined David at Ziklag, and who was 'over the king's treasurers.' 3. A Benjamite town (1 Ch 12:9, 22, Neh 7:7s Beth-azmaveth, 1 Es 5:1 Beth-moth); mod. Hume, S.E. of Gilboa.

AZMO. — An unknown place on the border of Judah (Nu 34:4, Jos 16); called in Jos 15:19 16 Ezem.

AZNOOTH-TABOR. — An unknown place on the slope of Mt. Tabor, marking the S.W. corner of the portion of Naphtali (Jos 19:3).

AZOR. — An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1:14).

AZOTUS. — See Assos.

AZAN. — Father of Pattiel (Nu 3:4).

AZUR. — One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:2). 2. Father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer 26:). 3. Father of Jaaazaniah, one of the princes of the people (Ezk 11:1).
Baal (Baal, Baalim)

Baal (Baal, Baalim).—Used generally, the word ba‘al means ‘possessor,’ ‘inhabitant,’ ‘controller.’ Thus, a married man is called ‘possessor of a woman’ (Gen 34:16), a ram, ‘possessor of horns,’ and even the citizens of a locality are denoted by this word (Job 19:20, 1 S 33:21, 2 S 21:2). With a similar meaning, it is applied to numerous Canaanitish local deities (pl. ba‘alim, Job 29:8), names (1 S 17:28, 1 K 18:14; pl. sing. ba‘al, Job 2:4, Jer 11:26 etc.; cf. Baal-gad, Baalath-beer, and other compounds of this word). These gods were supposed to manifest themselves in the fertility, or in war, of the locality, and to be worshipped. Such an animistic conception is evident from the fact that they were worshipped in high places and in groves, where such rites as prophecy (Jer 23:9), fornication (Jer 4:3), self-mutilation (1 S 18:21), and child-sacrifice (Jer 19) were practised under the guidance of kemdirim or idolatrous priests (Zeph 1). The same idea is also clear from the use of this word among the Arabs, who designate land irrigated by subterranean springs as ‘Ba‘al’land, ‘i.e. land inhabited by a spirit. Gradually, however, some of these gods assimilated more abstract powers (cf. Baal-berith), and as their votaries extended these powers over a greater area, became the Baal par excellence, i.e. the controller of the duty of his worshippers (cf. Jg 6:25, 1 K 16:15 18:16 19:1 [in the last three passages, Melkart of Tyre]).

So great a predilection for cults of such a nature was shown by the Israelites, from the time of their entrance into Canaan until the fall of the monarchy, that Jahweh is given this title. Thus Saul, a zealous worshipper of this deity, became (1 S 15:8) one of his granduncles (Eshbaal, and one of David’s heroes is called ‘Beeliah (‘J’ = Baal’); cf. also Meribbaal (1 S 4:10), Beelzeba (1 Ch 14:1), Jerubbaal (Job 48:2). A confusion, however, of facts and the Canaanitish deities seems to have taken place, to avoid which, Hosea (2:17) demands that Jahweh be no longer called Ba‘al (‘my Baal’), but ‘Jeshurun (my husband’). Under the influence of such prophecies the Israelites abandoned the use of Baal tor Jahweh, and in later times developed so great an antipathy to this word that later revisers substituted bosheth (‘shameful thing’), not only wherever Ba‘al occurred for the Canaanitish deities (Jos 9:19, Jer 3:11 etc.), but also, forgetful of its former application to Jahweh, in some of the above names (see Ishshosheth), supposing them to allude to local gods. N. KORNING.

Baal-berith (‘lord of the covenant’).—The god of Shechem, where he had a temple (Job 8:30); called also El-berith (98). The ‘covenant’ may be that amongst the Canaanitish peoples or that between Canaanites and Israelites; or the title may be parallel to Zeus Horkios, the god who presides over covenants.

Baal-gad (? ‘Baal of fortune’).—A place under Hermon, in the valley of Lebanon, referred to only the northern limit of the country conquered by Joshua (Jos 11:17 12:19). Various identifications have been suggested, all uncertain. Perhaps Baanias is the most probable. See Cesariea PHILIPPI.

Baal-Hamon.—The unknown site of Solomon’s vineyard (Ca 811).

Baal-Hazor.—Beside Ephraim, where were Absalom’s sheep-shearers (2 S 13:20). Identified by Conder with Tell ‘Asur, a mountain 4960 ft. above the sea, an hour’s ride N.E. of Bethin.

Baal-Heron.—Baal (3 S, 1 Ch 5:25).—See Herman.

Baal-Juda (Baal, No. 1, i.e. Kiriath-jearim.

Baalis.—King of Ammon in time of Gedeal (Jer 49:4).

Baal-Meon.—A city of Moab assigned to Reuben. The name occurs in Nu 32:13 as Baal-Meon, but in Jos 13:17 as Beth-baal-Meon; both forms being found also on the Moabite Stone; cf. Ezk 25:6, 1 Ch 5:3; also Beth-meon of Jer 49:13. It is to be identified with the modern Mu’ta, about 5 miles S.W. of Medeba. G. L. ROBINSON.

Baal-Peor.—The local deity of Mt. Peor (Dt 4:19, Nu 25). In Dt 4:19 and Hos 9:11 it is the name of a place.

Baal-Peraizim.—An unidentified site near Jerusalem (2 S 5:15, 1 Ch 14:1).

Baal-samus (1 Es 9:4)—Masseiah of Neb 8.

Baal-Shalishah (2 S 4).—An unknown site, probably somewhere in Mt. Ephraim.

Baal-Tamar.—An unknown site near Bethel and Gibeah (Jg 4:19).

Baalzephon (Beelzephon).—A Philistine god worshipped at Ekron (2 K 15:15, 18, 17), whose name in the form of Beelzebub (AV and RV Beelzebub) has been applied to the ‘prince of the devils’ (Mt 10:12, Mk 5:1, Lk 11:12, 15, 17). The OT form, ba‘al (controller, inhabitant) of files,’ indicates either that the god was thought to appear as a fly, or that, besides oracular powers, he possessed the ability to increase or destroy insects. On the other hand, if the NT spelling, ’Baal of the mansion (temple),’ is to be preferred, it would seem to indicate that the OT form is a deliberate perversion originating with some pious scribe, who was perhaps offended at such a title being given to any other than Jahweh. Such an interpretation would account for the variation in spelling, and for its application to Satan, whose realm was called ‘the house par excellence’ among the Jews of the NT period.

Baal-Zephon.—Ex 14:9, Nu 33:17; the name of a place near the spot where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, apparently a shrine of ‘Baal of the north.’ The corresponding goddess ‘Baalit of the north’ is named along with the god of Kosem (Goshen), in an Egyp. papyrus of the New Kingdom, as worshipped at Memphis. F. L. GRIFFITH.

Baana.—1. 2. Two of Solomon’s commissariat officers (1 K 4:1, 2). 3. Father of Zadok, one of those who rebuilt Jerusalem (Neh 3). 4. One of the leaders who returned with Zerubbabel; probably identical with the preceding, and with Baanah No. 3.

Baaara.—Wife of a Benjamite (1 Ch 8:9).
BAASEIAH.—A Kohathite (1 Ch 6:1; prob. an error for Maaseiah).

BAASHA, king of Israel, obtained the crown by usurpation. He was an officer of the army under Nadab, son of Jeroboam, and while the army was besieging Gibbethon, a Philistine town, he slew his king and mounted the throne. The execution of the whole house of Jeroboam followed. Baasha was a warlike ruler, and carried on war with Judah throughout his reign. The only incident preserved to us is his capture and fortification of Ramah, which led to the interference of Benhadad, as already recounted in the article ASA. Although Baasha died in his bed after a reign of twenty-four years, his dynasty was extinguished two years after his death (1 K 15:29-29).

H. P. SMITH.

BABBLER.—Ac 17:18 ‘What will (RV 'would') this babbler say? ’The Gr. word translated ‘babbler’ means one who picks up a precarious living, like a crow. The language of such persons, says Bp. Chase, ‘was, and is, plentiful and (on occasion) low’; but it is possible that the Athenians applied the word to St. Paul not on account of his speech, but his looks. In that case the modern coinage ‘carpet-bagger’ would give the sense.

BABE.—See Child.

BABEL, TOWER OF.—See Tower of Bab.

BABIB.—Head of a family which returned with Ezra (1 Es 8:8); called in Ezra 8:8 Bebai.

BABYLON.—Bab is the Hebrew form of the native name Bāb, ‘Gate of God.’ It was also Tin-tor or 'Seat of Life and Power.' It is likely that these names once denoted separate towns gradually incorporated. Other quarters of Babylon were Shu-anna, Te, Shuppat, and Lutam. According to the Heb. tradition (Gn 10:10), it was as old as Erech, Akkad, and Calneh. Native tradition makes it as old as Erech and Nippur, the latter being proved by excavations to date back to prehistoric times. Babylon is from Bāb-bani. It lay on the E. bank of the Euphrates, part of its site being now occupied by Hillah, about 50 miles S. of Baghdad. The ruins extend for 5 miles N. to S. Babil, the N. ruin, covers 120,000 sq. ft. and is still 90 ft. high. It covers the remains of the celebrated Esagila temple. The Mullahbeh is not much less in area, and 28 ft. high. The Kasr contains the ruins of Nebuchadrezzar’s palace, along whose E. side ran the sacred procession street, decorated with enamelled tiles representing the deities, the temple, to the Istar-gate at the S.E. corner. The whole was enclosed within an irregular triangle, formed by two lines of ramparts and the river, an area of about 8 sq. miles. The city crossed the river to the W., where are remains of a palace of Nerrissar. In later times it became coterminous with many other large cities, and Herodotus ascribes to it a circuit of 55 miles. The German excavations now being carried on may be expected to solve the many problems connected with the site.

From the very earliest times the kings and rulers of Babylonia worked at the building of its temples, palaces, walls, bridges, quays, etc. Hammurabi first raised it to be the capital of all Babylonia. It was sacked by Semacherib in B.C. 699, the chief palaces, temples, and city walls levelled with the ground, and the waters of the Euphrates turned over it. Esarhaddon began to rebuild it, and it stood another long siege under his son, Ashurbanipal. Nabopolassar began its restoration; Nebuchadrezzar raised it to its height of glory. Cyrus took it without resistance, and held his court there. Darius built up his empire besieged, took it, and destroyed its walls. Xerxes plundered it. Alexander the Great planned to restore it. Antiochus Soter actually began the restoration of its great temple. The foundation of Seleucia robbed it of its population, but the temple services continued to a.c. 29, at least. See further, Assyria and Babylonia. C. H. W. JOHNS.

BABYLON (in NT).—Babylon was apparently used by the early Church as a symbol for Rome. In Rev. (14:18 17:15 17:18 17:24) its destruction is foretold, because of its sins, and particularly because of its persecution. Such identification is, however, somewhat uncertain, and rests ultimately on the improbability that the word in the connexion in which it appears can refer to the city of Mesopotamia; the term is so used in Mt. (17:24; Ac 7:42). This basal probability is supported by the fact that Babylon is called 'mystery' in Rev 17, is said to be seated on seven mountains (v. 9), and to be a centre of commerce and authority (18:1-17. 14). Rome is apparently called Babylon in St. Or. v. 143, 158; 2 Es.; Apoc. Baruch.

This identification of Babylon in Revelation with Rome dates at least from the time of Jerome. The attempt to identify it with an apostate Judah and Jerusalem can hardly be taken seriously. The fact that Revelation utilised the Jewish apocalyptic material further makes it imperative that the term symbolizes a power which stood related both to Christians and Jews, in a way parallel with the relation of Babylon to the ancient Hebrew nation.

2. The reference to Babylon in 1 P 1:18 has had three interpretations: (a) Babylon in Egypt, mentioned by Strabo and Epiphanius; (b) Babylon on the Euphrates; and (c) Rome. In view of the symbolic use of the word ‘Babylon,’ as mentioned in the foregoing, the last seems the most probable. Eusebius (HE II. 15) so interprets the reference, and, in view of the ancient and persistent tradition, there is nothing improbable in St. Peter’s having been in Rome. This probability is strengthened by the reference to the persecution to which Christians were being subjected. Assyrian Babylon in the second half of the 1st c. was in decay, and 1 Peter would be particularly likely if it went out from the seat of a persecution, such as that of Nero, or possibly of Domitian. SHALER MATTHEWS.

BABYLONISH GARMENT (addoreth Shin’ar).—Stolen by Achan (Jos 7:21), literally 'mantle of Shinar'; probably a cloak of embroidered stuff. Babylonia was famous in classical times for such costly garments, and the sculptures exhibit the most elaborately embroidered dresses. The Babylonian inscriptions enumerate an almost endless variety of such garments, worked in many colours. C. H. W. JOHNS.

BACA, VALLEY OF.—An allegorical place-name, found only in Ps 84, where the RV renders 'Valley of Weeping.' Most probably it is no mere actual valley, but is the 'Valley of the Shadow of Death' in Ps 23.

R. S. MACALISTER.

BAACHIDES.—Governor of Mesopotamia under Demetrius Soter; sent to establish Alcimus (wh. see) in the priesthood; defeated Jonathan the Maccabean, in a later period besieged him in the fortress of Bethbsal; was finally compelled to entertain proposals for peace (1 Mac 7:34-9:7-10:8; Jos. Ant. XIII. x.23-29).

BACCHUS.—A singer who put away his foreign wife (1 Es 9:6).

BACCHUS.—See Dionysus.

BACEMOR.—An officer of Judas Maccabaeus (2 Mac 12:9).

BADGER.—Rock badger (Lv 11:16 Rv), i.e. Hyrax. See CONY.

BADGERS’ SKINS.—Mentioned (in AV) as the upper covering of the Tabernacle, etc. (Ex 25:26 etc.), and materials for making sandals (Exk 16:4). It is almost certain the word tahash is mistranslated ‘badger,’ as badgers, though found in Southern Palestine, are not common enough, nor are their skins suitable for such use to have been made of them. The RV renders (mg. porpoise-skins) hardly eases the difficulty zoologically, although having some support from etymology. De- litzsch, from the similarity of tahash to the Assy. tahshan = 'wether,' thinks it probable that the word means BAG, PURSE, WALLET.—Several kinds of bags, etc., may be distinguished. (a) The shepherd's and traveller's wallet for carrying one or more days' provisions. Like most of the other OT bags, it was made of skin, girdled undressed, and slung across the shoulder. This is the scrp of Mt 10:10 and parallels (RV 'wallet'). The former is retained by our RV (but Amer. RV 'wallet') to render a unique word, which had to be explained even to Hebrew readers by the gloss 'the shepherd's bag' (1 S 17:9). (b) A more finished article, the leather satchel which served as a purse (Pr 1:4). (c) The favourite bag in which he kept his story weights (Dt 25:13), also served as a purse (Pr 1:19). (d) The favourite bag for money and valuables—hence the beautiful figure 1 S 25:29, where 'the bundle of life'—life's jewel-case—was one which could be tied with a string (2 S 12:19, Pr 31:17, as Gn 42:25 RV 'bundle'). If required, a seal could be put on the knot. (e) Another word is used both for a large bag, capable of holding a talent of silver (2 K 5:24), and for the dainty lady's satchel (Is 38:10; RV AV crisppling bags). (f) The 'bag' which Judas carried (Jn. 12:5, 39) was rather a small box (RVm), originally used for holding the mouthpieces of wind-instruments.

BAGOS.—The head of a family which returned with Ezra (1 Es 8:9) called in 1 Es 9:1 Bagol, and in Ezra 2:24 Bigva BAGOAS.—A eunuch in the service of Holofernes (Jth 12:10, 11, 13 13:14). BAGOL.—See Bagos.

BAGPIPE.—See MUSIC.

BAHURIMITE.—See BAHRIM.

BAHURIM.—The place where Bathit, son of Laish, was ordered to relinquish Michal (2 S 2:9), where Shimeel dwelt, who cursed David in his flight (2 S 18:9); where Ahimaaz and Jonathan hid in the well from Abulom (2 S 17:9-10); and the home of Azmaveth, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11:39, 2 S 23:9, where Barhumite is written for Bahurimite). It was in the tribe of Benjamin (cf. the passages relating to Shihim), and the account of David's flight, which supplies the only topographical indications, accords with the traditional identification with Ainutil, N. E. from the Mount of Olives, and about a mile beyond 'Amata (Anathoth) from Jerusalem.

BAILERUS.—The head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5:9). BAKKAR.—A Levite (1 Ch 9:39).

BAKKUK.—An ancestor of certain Nehemiah who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:8, Neh 7:93) called Acub in 1 Es 8:9.

BAKEMEATS, BAKER.—See BREAD.

BALAAM is the subject of a remarkable and intricate narrative in Nu 22-24, connected with the arrival of Israel in the Promised Land, and the relationship of the chosen people to Moab and Ammon. Balaam was a soothsayer of Ethr or on the Euphrates, called by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites, who were lying encamped in the Jordan valley. He had difficulty in undertaking the task, and he found, whenever he essayed to curse Israel, that the Lord had forbidden him to do so, and that his burden must be blessing instead. At the request of Balak he changed his position again and again on the heights above the Dead Sea, in the hope of obtaining a different oracle, but the negative he had to deliver remained the same, and he foretold the future splendour of Israel (24:10). Sent away by Balak without the reward promised to him if he would deliver an oracle to curse to Israel, he returned to his own country, and returning to one narrative, his end was full of shame. He was accused of having induced Israel to commit impiety in connexion with religious worship, a feature in the Semitic idiom. It was through this charge that he became known to subsequent ages, and his name became a name of infamy (Nu 31:14, 2 P 24' Rev 20:4; Jos. Ant. v. 6). The inspiration of Balaam, contrasted with his subsequent sin and disgraceful death, his knowledge of the will of God, together with his intense desire to grasp the rewards of unrighteousness, has given rise to a notable sermon literature. Bishop Butler speaks of the self-deception by which he persuades himself that the sin he commits can be justified to conscience and to God; Newman regards him as an insatiable of the trouble that can come on a character, otherwise noble, where spiritual advancement is always allowed to dwell with it; Arnold adds him as an instance of the familiar truth that the purest form of religious belief may coexist with a standard of action immeasurable above it. W. Robertson makes him the text for a sermon on the perversion of gifts.

This complexity of character is, however, greatly simplified by the recognition of the various strands in the narrative. It is clear that the account of P connecting Balaam with Israel's uncleanness has nothing to do with the original narrative. This original narrative is contained in Nu 22-24. According to it, Balaam was a prophet of Pethor on the river Euphrates. His fame had spread across the wilderness, and, when Balak found himself in straits through the advance of Israel, he sent for Balaam to come and curse Israel. Balaam asked God whether he should go, and was refused permission. Balak therefore sent yet greater gifts, and once again Balaam asked counsel of God. This time permission was granted. So far there had been no indication of God's displeasure; but now follows (22:8-24) the story of the ass, through which God's anger at the refusal of the ass to accept His answer, given once and for all, is manifested. If, however, the reader will pause at Balaam's 22:23 to 23:3 he will find that it is the most smoothly, and that he is still viewing Balaam's character from the same not unfavourable standpoint (22:23; cf. vv. 25-26) is the effort to join up the threads of the story after the interposition). When Balaam is brought in sight of Israel, he breaks out into a burst of praise (24:4-9) which rouses the wrath of Balak. Balak justifies himself by reminding the king that he had warned him of the constraint of the Lord (v.9). He then utters another oracle predicting the glory of Israel and the destruction of Moab and Ammon (vv.11-14).

This analysis leaves out of account 22:24-25 and 25, which seem to belong to a narrative dealing with the same facts, but placing a more sinister interpretation on the conduct of Balaam. The story of the ass is plainly out of harmony with the narrative just outlined. It is a story belonging not to the wilderness, but to a land of vineyards. It ignores the embassy that has been sent to bring Balaam back across the wilderness (22:8-9), for it represents Balaam as travelling alone. It is also extremely unlikely that so long a journey as that from the Euphrates to Moab would be attempted upon an ass. Then ch. 23, with its elaborate building of altars and offering of sacrifices, seems to belong to a later age, while the constant shifting of position in the effort to secure a more favourable oracle presents Balaam in a much more favourable light than before. Since this analysis of the text is not certain, we may take it that the original story proceeds from J, and that the second narrative, more complicated both in psychology and ritual, is from E.
BALADAN

The narrative of P ascribing the sin of Baal-peor to Balaam is out of touch with both the other narratives. According to it, Balaam was a Midianitish seer who tried to bring about the ruin of Israel, in default of other means, by persuading them to give way to lust. (Nu 31: 1; Jos. Ant. vii. vi. 6). 'It has been conjectured that this story arose partly out of a difficulty on the part of the priestly narrator in conceiving of a heathen being an inspired prophet of God, partly from the need of accounting for the great sin of the Israelites' (DBI i. 233). Balaam thus seems to have fallen in the estimation of Israel from being a seer of alien race, who distinguished himself by his faithfulness to the truth he knew, to becoming synonymous with temptation of a kind that was always especially insidious for Israel.

BALADAN.—See MEMADAH-BALADAN.

BALAAM (Jos 18: 19).—An unknown town of Simeon; perhaps identical with Bealoth (Jos 15: 31) and Bilhah (1 Ch 4: 25), called Balah in Jos 15: 4, where it is assigned to Judah.

BALAK.—The King of Moab who hired Balaam, Nu 22-24. See Balaam.

BALAMON.—A town near Dothan (Jth 8: 17).

BAMTAN.—See at Locust (8).

BALDNESS.—See CUTTINGS in the FLESH, HAIR.

BAMOTH.—A product of Gilead (Gen 37: 43), celebrated for its healing properties (Jer 8: 24; 65: 31), and an important article of commerce (Ezk 27: 11). Nothing is known for certain about the nature of this substance, but it is usually supposed to be some kind of aromatic gum or resin. There is now no plant in Gilead which produces the characteristic product of this nature. Mastich, a resin much used by the Arabs for flavouring coffee, sweets, etc., and as a chewing gum, is considered by many to be the source of Gn 37: 2 (so RV). It has been used with healing properties. It is a product of the Pistacia lentiscus, a plant common in Palestine. The so-called 'Balm of Gilead' of commerce, and the substance sold by the monks of Jericho to-day, this latter a product of the sahkim tree, are neither of them serious claimants to be the genuine article. See also SPEICE.

BALSAM.—See SPICE.

BALIITASAR.—The Gr. form of Belshazzar (Dan 5: 27, 11; Bar 11: 27 and of Belshazzar) (Dan 4: 6). BAN (only Ezk 20: 19) is the ordinary word for 'high place,' but is here retained in its Hebrew form as the word 'mannah' in the parallel case Ex 16: 18, on account of the word-play: 'What (mah) is the ba-mah to which ye go (bd)?' See further, HIGH PLACE.

BAMOTH, BAMOTH-BAAL.—Bamoth is mentioned in Nu 21: 23 as a station in the journey of Israel from the Arnon to the Jordan. It is prot. identical with Bamoth-baal of Nu 22: 3 (R.V.; AV and RV 'the high places of Baal'), to which Balaam was led by Balak. Bamoth-baal is mentioned as a Reubenite city in Jos 13: 17.

BAN.—The ban is an institution from remote antiquity, which still survives in the Jewish and Christian Churches. Its earlier history has not yet received the systematic treatment which it merits. The original ideas, common to all the Semitic languages, is that of withdrawing something from continuous use and setting it apart for the exclusive use of a deity. In Hebrew the verbal root acquired the more specialized meaning of devoting to Jh. His enemies and their belongings by means of fire and sword, and is usually rendered 'utterly destroy.' (R.V. adds 'Heb. devote'), while the noun (chabreth, Gr. anathema) is 'accursed (AV) or devoted (RV) thing.' In this brief treatment of a large subject we propose to distinguish between the war ban, the justice ban, and the private ban.

1. The war ban, clearly the oldest form of the institution, shows various degrees of severity. The war ban of the first degree, as it may be termed, involved the destruction not only of every man, woman, and child of the enemy, but also of their entire property of every description (see Dt 13: 15). The treatment of the Amalekites in I S 15 is a familiar example. The case of Achan, after the ban and capture of Jericho, affords a striking illustration of the early ideas associated with the ban. Every 'devoted thing,' as henceforth the inviolable property of Jh, and therefore taboo, became infected with the deadly contagion of the spoil. For instance, Lv 27: 28 ('most holy,' lit. 'holy of holies'). Hence by retaining part of the devoted thing (chabreth) in his tent Achan infected the whole camp of Israel, with disastrous results (Jos 7: 1-3). More frequently we meet with a relaxed form of the war ban, which may be called the ban of the second degree. In this case only the men, women, and children of the doomed city were devoted, while the cattle and the rest of the spoil became the property of the whole nation (cf. Josh 21: 43; 7: 21). A still further relaxation, a ban of the third degree, is contemplated by the law of Dt 20: 11, by which only the males are put to the ban, the women and children being spared as the purveyors of the besiegers. On the other hand, only virgins were to be spared in Nu 31: 7, and Jg 21: 20, for special reasons in the latter case.

2. The justice ban differs from the other in being applicable only to members of the theocratic community. It appears in the oldest legislation as the punishment of the apostate Israelite (Ex 22: 11), and is extended in the later legislation to the idolatrous community, Israel. Thus, in Nu 21: 16, 'The ban,' which is a special case, is delivered to the Lord, only the first degree of ban being inflicted. An important modification of the judicial ban is first met with in Ezr 10, where recallitants of the exiles, being reprobate, and only the 'substance forfeited' (R.V. 'devoted') to the Temple treasury. This modified chabreth became the starting-point of a long development. For these later Jewish and Christian bans see EXCOMMUNICATION.

3. The attenuated form of ban found in the later passage Lv 27: 28 may be termed the private ban. The cases contemplated—man or beast or field—are evidently those of unusual solemn and inalienable dedications by private persons for religious purposes (cf. Nu 16: 35, Ezk 44: 29, and the NT 'corban'), as opposed to the redeemable dedications of the preceding verses. The latter are holy only while the former are 'most holy.' The following verse, on the contrary, must refer to the justice ban.

The ban was an institution of earli date than the Hebrew conquest, and was probably contiguous to the most rigorous form (see Mesha's inscription, II. 11-17), perhaps also by the Ammonites (2 Ch 20: 11). Instances of similar practices among many half-civilized races are noted by anthropologists. The original motive of the ban is probably reflected in Nu 21: 23, where it is represented as the return made to Jh for help against the enemy vouchsafed in terms of a preceding vow (cf. deuto from deuwo). This has to be interpreted in the light of the primitive solidarity between man and his clan. Even in Israel the wars of the Hebrews were the 'wars of J' (Nu 21H). The religious element is found in the complete renunciation of any profit from the victory, and this renunciation is an expression of gratitude for the fact that the war-God has delivered the enemy, who is His enemy also, into the hands of the conquerors. In the case of the Maccabees, the renunciation is an expression of the war-God's gift of victory. The renunciation is an expression of gratitude for the fact that the war-God has delivered the enemy, who is His enemy also, into the hands of the conquerors. In the case of the Maccabees, the renunciation is an expression of the war-God's gift of victory.

With regard to the widespread application of the war ban in the Deuteronomistic sections of Joshua, modern criticism has taught us to see in these ideal generalizations of the exilic age. The Hebrews of the conquest were in truth the children of their age, but such a stupendous holocaust as is implied in such passages as Jos 11H, 2f. must not be placed to their credit. The legislation of Dt, it must further be remembered, is the outcome of several centuries' experience of Canaanite heathenism, the true character of which the soil of Palestine is only now revealing, and of its baseful influence on religion of J. In this legislation the service of these women is still retained only both in the protecting the community against a serious menace to its religious life. Nevertheless the enactment of Dt 19H remained a dead letter till the age of the Maccabees (1 Mac 5H).

BAN.—The head of a family which could not trace its descent (1 Es 5H, a corrupt passage).

BAN. Müller.—Ezr 8H, 9:1—Benedictus of Err 10H.

BAND.—This spelling represents three historically distinct English words: (1) 'Band' in the sense that which binds—the rendering of a variety of Heb. words, some of which are also rendered by 'bond,' (2) a band or piece of ribbon (Ex 39H RV 'sash'), (3) 'Band' in the sense of a company of soldiers, more or less organized, as the rendering of several Heb. words, such as render on RV 'companies' (Gn 32H) or 'troop' (Ex 11H) or 'hordes' (Ezk 33H-)

In NT 'band' in this third sense renders σφερα, the Gr. rendering of the Roman word (for the Roman army in NT times see Leitzen). In the minor provinces such as Judæa the troops were entirely auxiliaries, of which the unit was the cohort of about 500, in certain cases 1000, men. The Roman garrison in Jerusalem consisted of such a cohort of provincials, probably 1000 strong, the 'band' which figure was probably held both in the Gospels and in the Acts (Mt 27H, Mk 15H, Ac 21H, and probably Jn 18H. —RVm 'cohort' throughout). This cohort was under the command of a Roman prefect of the military tribune, the 'captain' or 'chief captain' (Gr. chilarch) of our EV.

Another auxiliary cohort is probably that named the Augustan band (Ac 27H. Gr. στρατεύμα; AV 'Augustus' band'). It has been much debated whether the band is a title of honour like our 'King's Own,' or a territorial designation signifying that in cohort in question was recruited from Samaria, then named Sebaste (= Augusta). Schürer (GJV 1, 462) curiously would combine both these views. Ramsay, on the other hand, maintains that the Augustan band was a popular, not an official, name for a body of troops detailed for some special service by the emperor (cf. J. L. and the Tracteur, p. 315). A similar uncertainty as to its place in the military organization of the time attaches to the Italian band (in which Cornelius was a centurion (Ac 10H). The name merely shows that it was a cohort of Roman citizens, probably volunteers, from Italy, as opposed to the ordinary cohorts of provincials.

3. A Levite (1 Ch 26H, Neh 8H and Neh 10H).

4. A Judahite (1 Ch 9H).

5. Head of a family of exiles that returned (Ezr 2H = Biniu of Neh 7H and Neh 10H).

6. One of those who had married a foreigner (Ezr 10H).

BANIAH.—Ancestor of Bani, who returned with Ezra (1 Es 8H).

BANISHMENT.—See Crimes and PUNISHMENTS.

BANK.—A mound of earth in siegecraft, see FORTIFICATION and SIEGECRAFT.

BANUS.—A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5H).

BANNERS.—1 Es 9H = Benaiah of Ezr 10H.

BANNER, ENSIGN, STANDARD.—That the Hebrews, like the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. (1875) i. 105, illus.), Assyrians, and other ancient nations, possessed military ensigns is a safe inference from Nu 2(, but not from the mention of the standard-bearer in Is 10H AV, which is to be rendered as RVm. Nothing certain, however, is known regarding them. In the former passage a distinction seems to be made— for another of the standards (lit. 'signs,' cf. Ps 74H where the reference is probably to the standards of Antiochus' army) of the 'fathers' houses,' and the standards (the banner of Ca 2H, cf. 6H 40) of the four great divisions of the Hebrew tribes in the wilderness, according to the artificial poetry of the priestly writer.

Equally uncertain is the relation of these to the σης, which was a wooden pole (Nu 21H. AV 'standard' cf. the parapets with 'standards' Is 30H RV). Bani, placed on an eminence as a signal for the mustering of the troops. This word is of frequent occurrence both in the original sense and in the figurative sense of a rallying point, in the prophetic announcements of the future (Is 33H 11H, Jer 4H and often). The rendering alternates between 'ensign' and 'banner.'

A. R. S. Kennedy.

BANNUS.—1 Es 9H—either Bani or Biniu of Ezr 10H.

BANQUET.—In AV 'banquet' and 'banqueting' always mean wine-drinking, not feasting generally. Thus Ca 2H He brought me to the banqueting house (Heb. 'the house of wine'), I P 4H 'banquetings' (Gr. 'drinckings,' RV 'carousings'). See Meals.

BAPTISM.—This term, which designates a NT rite, is confined to the vocabulary of the NT only. It does not occur in the LXX, neither is the verb with which it is connected ever used of an initiatory ceremony. This verb is a derivative from one which means 'to dip' (Jn 12H, Rev 12H), but itself has a wider meaning, - to wash' whether the whole or part of the body, whether by immersion or by the pouring of water (Mk 7H, Lk 11H). The substantive is used (a) of Jewish ceremonial washings Mk 7H, He 4H; (b) in a religious sense (Mk 10H, Lk 12H; cf. 'plunged in calamity'); and (c) most commonly in the technical sense of a religious ceremony of initiation.

The earliest use of the word 'baptism,' to describe a religious and not merely ceremonial observance is in connexion with the preaching of John the Baptist, and the title which is given to him is probably an indication of the novelty, in fact, of his procedure (Mt 3H, Mk 1H, Lk 7H; cf. Mk 6H, 4H). He 'preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins' (Mk 1H), i.e. the result of his preaching was to induce men to seek baptism as an outward sign and pledge of inward repentance on their part, and of their forgiveness on the part of God. 'Baptism is related to repentance as the outward act in which the inward change finds expression. It has been disputed whether the practice of baptizing parents on their request has had any historical basis in the Roman community was already established in the 1st cent.; probably it was. But in any case the significance of their baptism was that of ceremonial cleansing; John employed it as a symbol of a seal of moral purification. But, according to the Gospel record, John recognized the obedient and prophetic character of the baptism administered by him: 'I indeed have baptized you with water; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost' (Mk 1H).

2. Jesus Himself accepted baptism at the hands of John.
BAPTISM

(Mk 1:9), overcoming the resistance of the Baptist with a word of authority. That Jesus Himself baptized is nowhere suggested in the Synoptic Gospels, and is expressly denied in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 4:2); but His disciples baptized, and it must have been with His authority, equivalent to baptism by Himself, and involving admission to the society of His disciples. On the other hand, His instructions to the Twelve and to the Seventy contain no command to baptize. Christian baptism was to be baptism with the Spirit,' and 'the Spirit was not yet given' (Jn 7:39).

It is recorded in Acts (1:8) that the risen Lord foretold that this promised baptism would be received after His departure, 'not many days hence.' Of Christian baptism, although it finds a formal analogy in the baptism of John, which in its turn represents a spiritualization of ancient Jewish ideas of instruction, appears as in its essential character a new thing after the descent of the Holy Spirit. It is a phenomenon 'entirely unique, and in its inmost nature without any analogy, because it rises as an original fact from the soil of the Christian religion of revelation' (von Dobisché). It has been customary to trace the institution of the practice to the words of Christ recorded in Mt 28:19. But the authenticity of this passage has been challenged on historical as well as on textual grounds. It must be assumed, first, that the formulation of the threefold commission which is here enjoined, does not appear to have been employed by the primitive Church, which, so far as our information goes, baptized 'in' or 'into the name of Jesus Christ' (Ac 2:38; 10:47; 16:32; 19:5, 6; cf. 1 Cor 12:13, 18), without reference to the Father or the Spirit. The difficulty arising may be met by assuming (a) that Baptism in the name of Jesus was equivalent to Baptism in the name of the Trinity, or (b) that it is, ipso facto, the due fulfillment of the condition involved in baptizing 'in the name of Jesus.' But it is better to infer the authority of Christ for the practice from the prompt and universal adoption of it by the Apostles and the infant Church, to which the opening chapters of Acts bear witness; and from the significance attached to the rite in the Epistles, and especially in those of St. Paul.

4. That baptism was the normal, and probably the indispensable, condition of being recognized as a member of the Christian community appears from allusions in the Epistles (1 Cor 12:13, Gal 3:29), and abundantly from the evidence in Acts. The first preaching of the Spirit-furnished facts on the day of Pentecost may well have led to many 'being pricked in their heart'; and in answer to their inquiry addressed to 'Peter and the rest of the apostles,' Peter said unto them: 'Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 2:38); 'Then they that received his word were baptized' to the number of 'about three thousand souls.' At Samaria, 'when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women' (8:12), the earliest express statement that women were admitted to the rite. In this case the gift of the Spirit did not follow until Peter and John had come down from Jerusalem and 'prayed for them that they might be filled with the Holy Ghost.' 'Then they laid their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost' (8:17). Saul was baptized by Ananias (9:17) in accordance with instructions recorded by himself (22:16), and the received the 'remission of sins' (Ac 22:16; 1 Cor 12:3, 13). But it is better to infer the authority of Christ from the prompt and universal adoption of it by the Apostles and the infant Church, to which the opening chapters of Acts bear witness; and from the significance attached to the rite in the Epistles, and especially in those of St. Paul.

5. The practice of St. Paul, no less than that of St. Peter, led to the promulgation of Christian baptism, though the Apostles seemed as a rule to have left the actual administration to others (1 Cor 1:14-17); 'for Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel.' At Philippi Lydia was baptized 'and her household'; there also the jailor, and all that were his (Ac 16:14-17); Co�k, Crispus and Gaius, and the household of Stephanas (1 Cor 1:16, 17).

6. The conditions antecedent to baptism are plainly restated in Acts, viz., repentance and profession of faith in Jesus as Messiah or as the Lord,' following on the preaching of the word. The method of administration was baptism with water in or into the name of Jesus. Immersion may have been employed when the presence of sufficient water made it convenient; but there is nothing to show that affusion or sprinkling was not regarded as equally valid. That baptism was 'in the name of Jesus' signifies that it took place for the purpose of sealing the new relationship of belonging to, being committed to, His Personality. The blessing attached to the rite is commonly exhibited as the gift of the Holy Spirit; the due fulfillment of the condition involved in 'being baptized.' It was to be received as a symbol of the true unity of Christians (Eph 4). The body with which the believer is thus incorporated is composed of sinners as well as of righteous community of Christians, sometimes as the Personality of Christ; 'for as many of you as were baptized into Christ, did put on Christ' (Gal 3:27). Conversely, as with the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, all the elements both of qualification and of experience are sometimes summed up in a pregnant phrase and without regard to the order in which they emerge. The phrase 'in remission of sins' (Ro 4:11) may find its interpretation by comparison with Mt 16:19 ('in your forgiveness'), i.e., as referring to the continuous cleansing of the Church by the word; but if the reference is to baptism, then the phrase 'by the word' probably alludes to the profession of faith by the baptized, whether it took the form of 'Jesus is Lord' (Ro 4:12; cf. 1 Cor 12:3), or whether it expressed the content of the faith more fully. In Tit 3, while baptism is the instrument by which admission is realized, 'regeneration' and 'renewal' are both displayed as the work of the Holy Spirit. And here the Apostolic interpretation of the rite touches the anticipation of it in our Lord's words recorded in Jn 3. Faith wrought by the Spirit and the believer are alike necessary to entrance into the Kingdom of salvation (cf. Ro 10:13, 14).

In 1 Cor 15:29 Paul refers to the practice of persons allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of the dead. Such a practice is equivalent to the Holy Spirit's command in the Greek mysteries, from which it may have crept into the Christian Church. As such it may be regarded as a purely magical, and wholly superstitious, vicious reception of the sacrament. Of such a practice the Apostle expresses no approval, but 'simply meets his opponents with their own weapons without putting their validity to the proof' (Rendtorff).
BAR

7. The NT contains no explicit reference to the baptism of infants or young children; but it does not follow that the Church of the 2nd cent. adopted an unauthorized innovation when it carried out the practice of infant baptism. There are good reasons for the silence of Scripture on the subject. The governing principle of St. Luke as the historian of the primitive Church is to narrate the advance of the Kingdom through the missionary preaching of the conversion of adult men and women. The letters of the Apostles were similarly governed by the immediate occasion and purpose of their writing. We have neither the account of the organization, of the primitive Church. But of one thing we may be sure: had the acceptance of Christianity involved anything so startling to the Jewish or the Gentile mind as a distinction between the religious standing of the father of a family and his children, the historian would have recorded it, or the Apostles would have found themselves called to explain and defend it. For such a distinction would not have been in direct conflict with the most deeply rooted convictions of Jew and of Gentile alike. From the time of Abraham onwards the Jews had felt it a solemn religious obligation to claim for their sons from their earliest infancy the same communion with God as he himself stood in. There was sufficient parallelism between baptism and circumcision (cf. Col 2:11) for the Jewish-Christian father to expect the baptism of his children to follow his own as a matter of course. The Apostle assumes as a fact beyond dispute that the children of believers are ‘holy’ (1 Co 7:14), i.e. under the covenant with God, on the ground of their father’s faith. And among Gentile converts it was possible but equally authoritative principle, that of patria potestas, would have the same result. In a home organized on this principle, which prevailed throughout the Roman Empire, it would be a thing inconceivable that they, nor a complete account from the father in their religious rights and duties, in the standing conferred by baptism. Thus it is because, to the mind of Jew and Gentile alike, the baptism of infants and children yet unable to supply the conditions for themselves was so natural, that St. Luke records so simply that when Lydia believed, she was baptized ‘with her household’; when the Philippian jailor believed, he was baptized, and all those belonging to him. If there were children in these households, these children were baptized on the ground of the faith of their parents; if there were no children, then the principle took a still wider extension, which includes children; for it was the servants or slaves of the household who were ‘added to the Church’ by baptism on the ground of their master’s faith.

8. Baptism was a ceremony of initiation by which the baptized not only were admitted members of the visible society of the disciples of Christ, but also received the solemn attestation of the consequences of their faith. Hence there are three parties to it. The part of the baptized is mainly his profession of faith in Christ, his confession ‘with his heart’ that he is the Lord’s. The second is the Christian community or Church (rather than the person who administers baptism, and who studiously keeps in the background). Their part is to hear the profession and to grant the human attestation. The third is the Head of the Church Himself, by whose authority the rite is practised, and who gives the inward attestation, as the experience of being baptized opens in the believing soul new avenues for the arrival of the Holy Spirit.

BAR.—Aram. word for ‘son’; used, especially in NT times, as the first component of personal names, such as Bar-abbas, Bar-jesus, Bar-jonah, etc.

BARABBAS (Mt 27:22-25 = Mk 15:14 = Lk 23:18-20 = Jn 18:11-12).—A brigand, probably one of those who infested the Ascent of Blood (wh. see). He had taken part in one of the insurrections so frequent during the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate; and, having been caught red-handed, was awaiting sentence when Jesus was arraigned. It was customary for the procurator, by way of gratifying the missionary preaching of the Apostles, to release a prisoner at the Passover season, letting the people choose whom they would; and Pilate, reluctant to condemn an innocent man, yet afraid to withstand the clamour of the rulers, saw here a way to save Jesus. He judged would probably have succeeded had not the malignant priests and elders incited the people to choose Barabbas.

Barabbas, like Barholameus and Bartimaeus, is a patronymic, possibly ‘son of the father’ (i.e. the Rabbi). According to an ancient reading of Mt 27:25, the brigand’s name was Jesus. If so, there is a dramatic absurdity in Pilate’s presentation of the Mt. 27:22. To the multitude: ‘Which of the two do ye wish me to release to you—Jesus the bar-Abba or Jesus that is called Messiah?’

BARACHIEL.—Father of Elihu, ‘the Buzite’ (Job 32:4).

BARACHIAH.—See ZACHARIAH.

BARAK (‘lightning’).—The son of Abinoam; he lived at a time when the Children of Israel, having recovered from its overthrow by Joshua (Jos 11:16-32), was taking vengeance by oppressing Israel. He is called from his home in Kedesh-naphthali by Deborah to deliver Israel. He gathers an army of 10,000 men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. With this force, accompanied by Deborah, without whom he refuses to go forward, he encamps on Mt. Tabor, while the enemy under Sisera lies in the plain on the banks of the Kishon. At the word of Deborah, Barak leads his men down to battle, and completely defeats Sisera. The latter flees; Barak pursues him, but on reaching his hiding-place finds that he has been already slain by Jael, the wife of Heber. The glory of the victory, therefore, does not lie with Barak, but with Deborah, who was his guiding spirit, and with Jael who slew the enemy’s leader (Judg 4, 5).

BARBARIAN.—The Eng. word is used in Ac 28:14, Ro 14, 1 Co 14, Col 3 to translate a Gr. word which does not at all connote savagery, but means simply ‘foreign,’ ‘speaking an unintelligible language.’ The expression first arose among the Greeks in the days of their independence, and was applied by them to all who could not speak Greek. When Greece became subject to Rome, it was then extended to the Greeks and Romans. There may be a touch of contempt in St. Luke’s use of it, but St. Paul uses it simply in the ordinary way: see esp. 1 Co 14:14. A. Soutar.

BARBER.—See Hair.

BARCHUS.—1 Es 5:2 = Barkos of Ezr 2:43 and Neh 7:46.

BARHUMITE.—See BAHRUM.

BARIAH.—A son of Shemahah (1 Ch 3:16).

BAR-JEUS.—The name of ‘a certain Magian, a false prophet, a Jew’ (Ac 13:1) whom St. Paul, on his visit to Cyprus, found in the retinue of Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul. The title Elymas (v. 9) is equivalent to Magus (v. 6), and is probably derived from an Arabic root signifying ‘wise’. The meaning of the Magian was half-mystical, half-scientific; amongst them were some devout seekers after truth, but many were mere tricksters. In the apostolic age such men often acquired great influence, and Bar-jesus represents, as Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 70) says, ‘the strongest influence on the human will that existed in the Roman world, an influence which must destroy or be destroyed by Christianity, if the latter tried to conquer the Empire.’ By way of reviving the Jews, to release a prisoner so intelligent to be deceived by the Magian’s pretensions, the motive of whose opposition to the Christian teachers is expressed in a Benzon addition to v. 5, which states that Sergius Paulus ‘was listening with much pleasure to them.' In St. Paul's judgment on this false prophet (v.14) there is a play upon words: Elymas was full of deceit and not of wisdom: Bar-jesus, i.e. son of Jesus, had become a son of the devil.' This is Pauline (cf. Ph 39). J. G. TURKER.

BAR-JONAH.—See BAR, and JOHN (No. 6).

BARKOS.—Ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:46, Neh 7:1; called Barchus in 1 Es 5:1).

BARLEY (Arabic sarif).—As in ancient times, so to-day barley (Arab. sarif) is the most plentiful cereal of Palestine. It is the chief food of horses (1 K 4:36), mules, and donkeys, oats being practically unknown. It is still used by the poor for making bread (Jg 7:13, Jn 14:13) etc. in the villages, but not in the cities. barley was the special ritual offering for jealousy (Nu 5:1). The barley harvest (Ru 1:2) precedes that of wheat: it begins around Jericho as early as March, and in Jerusalem and the neighbourhood at the end of May.

BARN.—See AGRICULTURE, 3, and GARNER.

BARNABAS.—A surname given by the Apostles to Joseph, the Levite, whose first recorded deed (Acts 4:36) was the sale of his property and the devotion of its proceeds to the needs of the Christian community. In this generous act St. Luke sees a proof that Barnabas is, in accordance with the popular etymology of his name, a man of heartfelt service. His kindly introduction of Saul to the Christians at Jerusalem disarmed their fears (9:7); his broad sympathies made him quick to recognize the work of grace amongst the Greeks at Antioch (11:19), and to recognize the fitness of his gifted friend for that important sphere of service (v.20). After a year's fellowship in work at Antioch, Barnabas and Saul were appointed to convey the 'relief' sent thence to the brethren in Judaea (v.13). From Jerusalem they brought back, as a helper, John Mark, the cousin of Barnabas (12:18; cf. Col 4:10).

The church at Antioch solemnly dedicated Barnabas and Saul to missionary service (13:2); with John Mark the two friends sailed for Cyprus, and from this point, with three exceptions, their names occur in the order 'Paul and Barnabas.'

Barnack (PApC ii. 411) explains these three passages thus: 14:2 is accounted for by v.13, and 15:2-3 by the closer association of Barnabas with the Jerusalem church. At Lystra (14:14), as doubtless at other places, Paul was the chief speaker; he was also the more prominent figure at the Jerusalem conference (15:25, Gal 2:2). See PAUL). Between Paul and Barnabas 'there arose a sharp contention' concerning John Mark (15:38), and they agreed to work apart; Gal 2:12 also records Paul's adverse judgment of Barnabas' attitude in regard to the circumcision controversy. But the interesting reference to Barnabas in 1 Co 9 affords welcome proof of St. Paul's familiarity with the work of his friend. All that is definitely known of Barnabas after he had been Paul's helper was that with his cousin Mark he 'sailed away unto Cyprus' (Ac 15:24). For the spurious Epistle attributed to Barnabas, see CANON OF NT, § 2.

BARDUS.—A name occurring in 1 Es 5:4 (om. in Ezr. and Neh.).

BARREL, 1 K 17:5. 18:15.—The large earthenware jar (so Amer. RV) used for fetching water from the well, storing grain, etc., elsewhere rendered pitcher. See HUN, 9.

BARENESS.—See CHILD.

BARSABBAS.—See JESUS (In NT), 5, and JUDAS (In NT), 6.

BARTACUS.—Father of Apsine (1 Es 4:6).

BARTHOLOMEW.—One of the Twelve, mentioned only in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10:3-2 Mk 3:17-26 Lk 6:14). Jerome says that he wrote a Gospel, preached to the Indians, and died at Badaropolis in Armenia. Bartholomew is really not a name, but a patronymic—Bar Talmay 'son of Talmay' (cf. 2 S 13:16). See NATHANIEL.

DAVID SMITH.

BARTIMAEUS (Mk 10:46).—A blind man whom Jesus, on His way to the last Passover, healed at the gate of Jericho—as He was leaving the city, according to Mt. (20:19) and Mk. (10:46), who condense the story of what befell at Jericho; as He approached, according to Lk. (18:35), whose fuller narrative preserves the proper order of events. Bartimaeus is not a name but a patronymic (cf. Bartholomew), and St. Mark, for the benefit of his Gentile readers, gives the interpretation of it, 'the son of Timeus.'

DAVID SMITH.

BARUCH ('blessed').—1. Son of Netaah, the son of Mahseah and brother of Seraiah (Jer 51:19); known from Jer 36: 45. 32:1-14 43: 3: by Jeremiah's side in the conflict with Jehoiakim (b.c. 604), again during the last siege of Jerusalem (587-6), and again amongst the Judeans left behind after the Second Captivity. 'Baruch' the scribe, named in Jer 36:9 along with Jeremiah the prophet, is already the recognized attendant and amanuensis of the latter; he seems to have rendered the prophet over twenty years of devoted service. He belonged to the order of 'princes,' among whom Jeremiah had influential friends (26:36); Baruch's rank probably secured for Jeremiah's objectionable role' (ch. 36) the hearing that was reserved for other words. When he cast in his lot with Jeremiah, Baruch made a heavy sacrifice; he might have 'sought great things for himself,' and is warned against his natural ambition (45:4). The promise that Baruch's name shall be given him 'for a prey' wherever he goes, placed where it is (45:9), suggests that he survived his master, to act as his literary executor. The Book of Jeremiah (see art.) owes much to this loyal secretary, though the final arrangement of the materials is far from satisfactory. Tradition adds nothing of any certainty to the references of Scripture; see, however, Jos. Ant. x. 17., 1. 7. For the Apocrypha writings attached to his name, see APOCRYPHA and APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

G. G. FISHER.

BARZILLAI.—1. The name of a chieftain of Gilead who brought supplies to David and his army at Mahanaim (2 S 17:7). After the death of Absalom, Barzillai went across Jordan with the king, but declined to go into exile (19:17). On his deathbed David bade Adriel his son to 'shew kindness to the sons of Barzillai' (1 K 2:7). His descendants are mentioned in Ezr 2:46, Neh 7:12. 2. The Meholathite whose son Adriel is said to have married Mehalad (Mavab, cf. 1 S 18:10) the daughter of Saul.

BASALOTH.—1 Es 5:4=Bazith of Ezr 2:42 or Bazith of Neh 7:4.

BASCAMA.—An unknown town of Gilead (1 Mac 13:9).

BASE.—To be base is in mod. English to be morally bad, but in AV it is more no more than to be of humble birth or lowly position. In 1 K, however, the word is sometimes used in the sense of morally low, mean, as Dt 13:11.

BASEMATH.—1. One of the wives of Esau. In Gn 26:4 (P) she is called the daughter of Elon the Hittite, while Gn 26:18 (prob. R) she is said to have been Ishmael's daughter, and sister of Nebaioth. But in Gn 28:2 (P) Esau is said to have taken Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael, the sister of Nebaioth, to be his wife; and in Gn 36:1 the first mentioned of Esau's wives is Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. There is manifestly a confusion of names in the text, which cannot be satisfactorily explained. 2. A daughter of Solomon, who became the wife of Abihamass, one of the king's officers (1 K 4:7).

BASHAN.—The name of the territory east of the Sea of Tiberias. It was the kingdom of Og, the Rephaim opponent of Israel, and with his name the country is almost immediately associated (Nu 21:32, Dt 29, Neh 9:12 etc.). The territory was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, with a reservation of two cities, Golan and Be-esherath (Asharoth in 1 Ch 6:8), for the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21:12). In the time of Jehu the country was smitten by Hazael (2 K 10:32). It was noted for mountains (Ps 68:1), lions (Dt 32:3), oak trees (Is 9:13, Ezk 27:26, Zec 11:17) and especially cattle, both rams (Dt 32:19) and bullocks (Ezk 39:4); the bulls and kine of Bashan are typical of cruelty and oppression (Ps 22:3, Am 4:1).

The extent of the territory denoted by this name cannot be exactly defined till some important identifications can be established, such as the exact meaning of ‘the region of Argoz’ included (in the kingdom of Og, Dt 8:3 etc.), where were three score great cities with walls and brazen bars, administered for Solomon by Ben-geber of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 4:14). It included Salecah (Salkhot, on the borders of the desert), Edrei (ed-Der’a?), Asharoth (perhaps Tell Ashareh), and Golan, one of the cities of refuge, the name of which may be preserved in the Yozlan, the region immediately east of the Sea of Tiberias.

BASILISK.—See SERPENT.

BASKET.—The names of a round score of baskets in use in NT times are known from the Mishnah (see Krengel, Das Hausgerät in der Mishnah, pp. 39–45). They were made of willow, rush, palm-leaf, and other materials, and used in an endless variety of ways, for purely domestic purposes, in agriculture, in gathering and serving fruit, and for collecting the alms in kind for the poor, etc. Some had handles, others lids, some had both, others had neither. In OT times the commonest basket was the sald, made, at least in later times, of peled willows or palm-leaves. It was large and flat like the Roman cantilurn, and, like it, was used for carrying bread (Jn 6:16) and other articles of food (Jg 6:19), and for presenting the meal-offerings at the sanctuary (Ex 29:9). Another (dad), also of wicker-work, probably resembled the calathus, which tapered towards the bottom, and was used in fruit-gathering (Jer 25:2). In what respect it differed from Amos’ ‘basket of summer fruit’ (Am 8:1) is unknown. A fourth and larger variety was employed for carrying home the produce of the fields (Dt 28:8 ‘blessed shall be thy basket and thy kneading-trough’, RV), and for presenting the first-fruits (269).

In NT interest centres in the two varieties of basket described in the Evangelists. In the Synoptics, accounts of the feeding of the 5000 and the 4000 respectively, the kophinos and the sphyris. The kophinos (Mt 14:13) is probably to be identified with the exceedingly popular kophos of the Mishnah, which ‘was provided with a cord for a handle by means of which it was usually carried on the back’ (Krengel), with provisions, etc., and which, therefore, the disciples would naturally have with them. The Jews of Juenal’s day carried such a provision basket (cophinos). The sphyris or sprosis (Mt 15:5, Mk 8:1), from its use in St. Paul’s case (Ac 9:6), must have been considerably larger than the other, and might for distinction be rendered ‘hamper’.

BASON (Amer. RV ‘basket’).—Chiefly the large bowl of bronze used by the priests to receive the blood of the sacrificial victims (Ex 27:22, 1 K 7:42 etc.). It is only found in secular use, if the text is correct (Am 6:5, otherwise LXX, see BOWL). Similar basins of silver were presented by the princes of the congregation (Nu 7:69); those destined for Solomon’s Temple were of gold (1 K 7:42). The basins of Ex 12:3, 2 S 17:6 were probably of earthenware. A special basin was used by Jesus for washing the disciples’ feet (Jn 13).

BASSAI (AV Bassa), 1 Es 5:8—Bassai, Ezr 2:7, Neh 7:8.

BASTHAI (AV Basta), 1 Es 5:8—Bassai, Ezr 2:4, Neh 7:8.

BAT (‘atátáphil’).—The bat is a familiar object in Palestine, where no fewer than seventeen varieties have been identified. The two commonest are the horse-shoe bat (Rhinolophus ferrum equinum) and the long-eared bat (Plecotus auritus). All varieties in Palestine are insectivorous except one, the Xanteharpia appytetaca, which eats fruit. Bats flit about on noiseless wings by the score on warm summer evenings, especially in the Jordan Valley, and they are to be found in great numbers in ruins, old tombs, and caves all over the land, giving rise to many tales of ghostly habitation (Isa 22:16). They are counted as unclean ‘fowl,’ though a little separate from the birds, in Lv 11:11, Dt 14:11.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BATH.—A liquid measure; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH, BATHING.—The latter term is most frequently used in our RV in connexion with purification from ceremonial defilement—contact with holy things, with the dead, etc. (see article CLEAN AND UNCLEAN)—and in this sense denotes the washing of the body with water, not necessarily the total immersion of the body in water. Hence the RV has rightly rendered ‘wash’ in many cases for ‘bath’. Bathing in the modern and non-religious sense is rarely mentioned (Ex 2:19 Pharaoh’s daughter, 2 S 11:6 RV Bathsheba, and the curious case 1 K 22:23). Public baths are first met with in the Greek period—they were included in the ‘place of exercise’ (1 Mac 1:3)—and remains of such buildings from the Roman period are fairly numerous. Recently a remarkable series of bath-chambers have been discovered at Gezer in connexion with a building, which is supposed to be the palace built by Simon Maccabaeus (Illust. in PBFS, 1905, 294 ff.).

The Hebrews were well acquainted with the use of mineral and vegetable alkaloids for increasing the cleansing properties of water (Joz 2:8, RV ‘soap,’ ‘lye’). In the History of Susanna v.17 is a curious reference to ‘washing-balls.’

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BATH-RABBIM (‘daughter of multitudes’).—The name of a gate of Heshbon, near which were pools, to which the Shulammite’s eyes are compared (Cp 7:1).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BATHSHEBA (1 Ch 3:2; Bathshua: This may be a mere textual error).—Wife of Uriah the Hittite, seduced by David (2 S 11:2–4), and afterwards married to him (V.17). The child died (129), but another son, Solomon, was subsequently born (129). Bathsheba, instigated and supported by Nathan, successfully combated Adonijah’s attempt to secure the throne (1 K 11:4–12). Acting as Adonijah’s intercessor in the matter of Abishag, she was most respectfully received by Solomon, but her unwise request was refused (1 K 2:12–15).

BATTLE.—See WAR, also names of places where the chief battles were fought.

BATTLE AXE.—See AXE. 1 (f).

BATTLE BOW.—See LONG. 1 (d).

BATTLEMENT.—See FORTIFICATION. HOUSES.

BAVAY.—The son of Henadad (Neh 3:31); rebuilt a portion of the wall of Jerusalem; called in v.5 BINAI.

BAY.—See COLBUS. 3.

BAYITH (‘house’).—Occurs as a proper name in Is 15:1, but the true sense is uncertain.
BAY-TREE

BAY-TREE (‘cèrdûẖ, Ps 37:31) is probably a mistranslation for 'a tree in its native soil' (RV). Many authorities, however, would here emend the Heb. text to read ‘eres, "cedar."

BAZLITH (Neh 7:42), BAZLUTH (Ezr 2:42 = Basaloth, 1 Es 5:2).—Founder of a family of Netănûhm who returned with Zerubbabel.

BEDELL—The probably correct tr. of the Heb. bâdél, which in Gn 2:8 is classed with gold and onyx as a product of the land of Havilah, and in Nu 27:1 is described as characterizing the 'appearance' (RV) of manna. Bâdél is the fragrant yellow resin of the tree Balsamodendron mukul, growing in N.W. India, Afghanistan, Beluchistan, and at one time perhaps in Arabia.

E. W. G. MAsterMAN.

BE, —To be is to exist, as in 'To be, or not to be, that is the question.' This primary meaning is found in Gn 5:21. 'Enoch walked with God; and he was not'; He 11:11, 'he that cometh to God must believe that he is.' The auxiliary use is later. In 1011 'be' and 'are' were interchangeable auxiliary forms in the pres. indic. plu., as Ps 107:6. 'Then are they glad because they be quiet.'

BEALAH ("J" is lord.).—A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:35).

BEALOTH (Jos 15:53).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah. See BAALAH.

BEAM.—1. A tree roughly trimmed serving as support of the flat roof of an Eastern house (2 K 6:14, Ezr 6:13, Mt 7:28, Lk 6:41), or more elaborately dressed (2 Ch 34:11, RV, Ca 112) and gilded (2 Ch 37:6). See HOUSE, MOT. 2. The weaver's beam (see SPINNING AND WEAVING). 3. See BALANCE.

BEANS (pôl, Arab. fid'ī).—A very common and popular vegetable in Palestine, used from ancient times; they are the seeds of the Vicia faba. The bean plant, which is sown in Oct. or Nov., is in blossom in early spring, when its sweet perfume fills the air. Beans are gathered young and eaten, pod and seed together, cooked with meat; or the fully mature beans are cooked with fat or oil. As the native of Palestine takes little meat, such leguminous plants are a necessary ingredient of his diet (2 S 17:26). In Est 4:6 read of bees being mixed with barley, lentil, millet, and fitches to make bread.

E. W. G. MAsterMAN.

BEAR (dābb).—The Syrian bear (Ursus syriacus, Arab. dâbb) is still fairly common in Hammon and the Anti-Lebanon, and is occasionally found in the Lebanon and east of the Jordan; it is practically extinct in Palestine. It is smaller and of a lighter colour than the brown bear (Ursus arctos). It is a somewhat solitary animal, eating vegetables, fruit, and honey, but, when hungry, attacking sheep (1 S 17:42) and occasionally, but very rarely, to-day at any rate, human beings (2 K 2:24). The fierceness of a bear robbed of her whelps (2 S 17:8, Pr 17:1, Hos 13:9) is well known. Next to the lion, the bear was considered the most dangerous of animals to encounter (Pr 28:19), and that it should be subdued was to be one of the wonders of the Messiah's kingdom (Is 11:7).

E. W. G. MAsterMAN.

BEARD.—See HAIR.

BEAST.—1. In OT (1) behēmôth, commonly used for a quadruped, sometimes in 'cattle'; see Gn 6:7, 21, Ex 9:2, 10, 16, Lv 11:23 etc. (2) chayyâd, used of animals in general but specially 'wild beasts'; see Gn 21:5, Sg 2:3, 16, etc. (3) bēfr sometimes in 'beasts' and sometimes 'cattle'; see Gn 45:19, Ex 22:2 etc. (4) šâh, 'wild beasts,' Ps 6:9, 8:2.

2. In NT (1) thêrōn: Mk 1:13, Ac 28:1 (a viper), Tit 1:12, He 12:17, Ja 3:4, and over 30 times in Rev. (2) zoôn, of the 'beasts' (AV), or 'living creatures' (RV), round about the throne (Rev 5:6, 8, 11, 14, 17; etc.)

E. W. G. MAsterMAN.

BEAST (in Apocalypse).—In Revelation, particularly ch. 22, are symbolic pictures of two beasts who are represented as the arch-opponents of the Christians. The first beast dominates the book, and as his number 666—a numerical symbol most easily referred to the Emperor Nero, or the Roman Empire. In the former case the reference would be undoubtedly to the myth of Nero redivivus, and this is, on the whole, the most probable interpretation.

If instead of 666 we read with Zahn, O. Holtzmann, Spitta, and Erbes, 616, the number would be the equivalent of the Galus Cesar, who in 616 BC was set up by the Senate to protect the city of Rome. This view is, in a way, favoured not only by textual variations, but by the fact that Revelation has used so much Jewish apocalyptic material. However this may be, it seems more probable that the reference in Rev 17:8-11, as re-edited by the Christian writer, refers to Nero redivivus, the incarnation of the persecuting Roman Empire, the two together standing respectively as the Antichrist and his kingdom. As in all apocalyptic writings, a definite historical ruler is a representation of an empire. Until the Messiah comes His subjects are at the mercy of His great enemy.

The present difficulty in making the identification is due not only to the process of redemption, but also to the highly complex, and for the modern mind, all but unintelligible fusion of the various elements of the Antichrist belief (see ANTICHRIST). See SMALLER BEASTS.

BEATING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 8.

BEATUS.—This word comes from the Latin abstract beatus, used in Vulg. of Ro 4:4, where David is said to 'pronounce the beatitude' or blessedness of the forgiven soul. Since the time of Ambrose the term has been used to describe the particular collection of sayings (cast in the form of which Ps 32: is an OT specimen) in which Christ depicts the qualities to be found in members of His kingdom—as an introduction to the discourse of prayers of intercession (Mt 6:12—Lk 6:21). Each of these sayings follows the form 'Blessed (happy) are . . . because . . .

Mt. records eight of these general declarations, with a special application of the last of them; Lk. has only four, to which are added four corresponding Woes. There is no guarantee that even Mt. gives all the Beatitudes pronounced by Jesus on different occasions, or again that those he does give were all pronounced on that occasion. It is at least possible that in other parts of the NT we have quotations from sayings of the same kind. Thus 1 P 4:4, Ja 1:19, Rev 14:12 might easily be supposed derived from words of Jesus. According to the prevailing view of the history of our Gospels, the Beatitudes are derived from an early collection of Logia, or sayings of Jesus, in the original Aramaic language. To a very large extent the authors of 211 and Lk. seem to have used identical translations of this document; but in the Beatitudes there is a considerable divergence, together with some significant agreements in phrasing. Putting aside Nos. 8, 1, 7 in Mt., which have no counterparts in Lk., we see the following main lines of difference—(1) Lk.'s are in the second person, Mt.'s in the third, except in the verses which apply No. 8 (50—11; 2) Lk.'s are apparently external: the poor, the hungry, those that weep, receive felicitation as such, instead of the commiseration ('Woe') which the world would give them. But since in Lk. disciples are addressed, the divergence does not touch the real meaning. A certain distinction in which the hardships of the present, sanctified to the disciple as a precious discipline, will be transformed into abiding blessedness. Such a reversal of the order of this life involves here, as elsewhere, the cutting down of those whom men count happy (cf. Is 65:17, Lk 11:28, 16:19, Jr 11:10). The paradoxical form of the sayings in Lk. produces a strong impression of originality, suggesting that here, as often elsewhere, the author has interpreted the words which Lk. has transcribed unchanged. Mt. has arranged them according to the BEE (deborah).—The bee (Apis fasciata) is a very important insect of Palestine. Wild bees are common, and stores of their honey are often found by wandering Bedouins. Some may perhaps be the domesticated honey, e.g., 'orange flower,' 'thyme,' etc.; he carries his hives to different parts according to the season. Many now keep bees in hives of European pattern, but the ordinary native still universally uses the primitive tube hive. This is like a wide drain-pipe of very rough earthenware, some 3 ft. long and about 8 in. in diameter, closed at the end with mud, leaving a hole for ingress and egress. A number of hives are piled one above the other. A few years ago, while the owner of several swarms of bees was transferring his brittle mud hives on donkey-back, one of the ass's stummed and in falling broke one of the hives. In a moment the whole swarm fell on the unfortunate animals and on a fine horse standing near. One donkey was quickly stung to death, and all the other animals were severely injured. In LXX, 2 and 14, and in those who have been compared to a swarm of locusts. A swarm of bees should settle in a carcass (Jg 14:14) is certainly an unusual occurrence, as indeed is suggested in the narrative, but the dried-up remains of animals, little by little, but hide by hide, so plentiful by the roadsides in Palestine, often suggest suitable places for such a settlement. Honey has probably always been plentiful in Palestine, but it is very doubtful whether 'a land flowing with milk and honey' could have meant the product of bees alone. See HONEY and Vine. In the LXX there is an addition to Pr 6:4, in which the bee is, like the ant, extolled for her diligence and wisdom.

BEELIADE (Ba'al knows).—A son of David, 1 Ch 14:7, changed in conformity with later usage (see Im Qoheleth) into Eliaad (El 'knows') in 2 S 5:11.

BEELISARU (1 Es 8).—One of the leaders of those Jews who returned to Jerusalem under Ezra. See Ezer.

BEELJEZEBUB.—See BAALJEZEBUB.

BEER (a well).—1. A station in the journey from Arnon to the Jordan, mentioned Nu 21:18, with a postel extract commemorating the digging of a well at this spot. The context indicates the neighbourhood, but further identification is wanting. Perhaps the words translated 'from the wilderness,' which immediately follow this extract (Nu 21:18), should be translated (following the LXX) 'and from Beer,' or 'the well.' It is generally identified with Beer-elm (well of mighty men), mentioned Is 15:9, and in the second part of the compound name it may be conjectured that there is reference to the event commemorated in the song (Nu 21:16). 2. The place to which Jotham ran away after uttering his parable (2 S 15:21). Its position is unknown.

BEER.-1. The father of Judith, one of Ess's wives (Gn 30:24), sometimes wrongly identified with Anah (ibid. see). 2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Is 1:1).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (The well of the Living One that seeth me).—A well between Kadesh and Beroth.

where the fleeing Hagar was turned back (Gen 16:8), where Isaac met his bride (24:2), and where he dwelt after Abraham's death (25:19). "Ain Mushuha, about 30 miles S.W. of Beerseba, has been suggested as a not improbable identification. It is a station where are several wells, on the caravan route from Syria to Egypt.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BEEROTH—(wells).—A Gibeonite city, usually called in communion with Zophrah (Zophrah). Choraz-Jeiram (Jos 21, Est 20, Neh 7:29); assigned to the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18:22, 2 S 4); the home of Rechab, murderer of Ish-bosheth (2 S 4), and of Nahari, armour-bearer of Joab (2 S 23:22). Birc, about 10 miles from Jerusalem on the main road to the north, is the usual identification, and there seems no special need for objecting thereto. The circumstances and date of the flight of the Beerothites to Gittaim (2 S 4) are not recorded.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BEER-SHEBA.—A well-spring of Abraham (Gen 21:21), where Hagar was sent away (Gen 21:22), and where he made a cairn, called after Abimelech, from which the name is alleged to take its name ("well of the covenant," according to one interpretation). Isaac after his disputes with the Philistines settled here (Gen 26, 27), and discovered the well Zibiah, another etymological speculation on Zebibah (Jos 19:41). Hence Jacob was sent away (Gen 28:20), and returned and sacrificed on his way to Egypt (Gen 33:9). It was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jos 15:5), but set apart for the Simeonites (19:52). Here Samuel's sons were judged (1 S 8), and thither Elijah fled before Jezebel (1 K 19:2). Zibiah, the mother of Joash, belonged to Beerseba (2 K 12). It was an important holy place: here Abraham planted a sacred tree (Gen 21), and theophanies were vouchsafed to Hagar (v.1), to Isaac (26:20), to Jacob (46:2), and to Elijah (1 K 19). Amos couples it with the shrines of Bethel and Gilgal (Am 9), and oaths by its names are denounced (8:11). It is recognized as the southern boundary of Palestine in the frequent phrase 'from Dan unto Beerseba' (Jg 20:1, etc.). Seven ancient wells exist here, and it has been suggested that these gave its name to the locality; the suffixed numeral being perhaps due to the influence of the synonymous pre-Semitic language, as in Kiria th - arba ("Tetrapolis"). The modern name is Bir es-Soba, where extensive remains of a Byzantine city; the ancient city is probably at Tell es-Soba, about 2 miles to the east. Till recent years the site was deserted by all but Bedouin; now a new town has sprung up, built from the ruins of the ancient structures, and has been made the seat of a sub-governor.

BE-E-SERTHAN (Jos 21:7).—See ASHEROTH.

BEETLE (charrgal).—In RV 'cricket' (Lv 11:19), probably a grasshopper or locust. See LOCUST.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BEFORE.—In Gen 11:8 'Haran died before his father Terah,' the meaning is 'in the presence of' as RV, literally 'before the face of.'

BEHEADING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10.

BEHEMOTH.—The hippopotamus (Job 40:4), as leviathan (41:1) is the crocodile. It has been suggested that the ancient Babylonian Creation-myth underlies the poet's description of the two animals (Gunkel, "Schöpf. u. Chaos", 61 ff.). This is doubtful, but the myth undoubtedly reappears in later Jewish literature; 'And he cut them into two parts, a female named Leviathan to dwell in the abyss over the fountains of waters. But the male is called Behemoth, which occupies with its breast (1) an immemorial desert named Dendain ('En 60', cf. 2 Es 6:3-5). Apoc. Bar 39, Bamba thura 74b). Behemoth is rendered by 'beasts' in Is 30:11. This may be correct, but the oracle which follows says nothing about the 'beasts of the south,' either the text is corrupt or the title may have been prefixed because Rahab, another name for the monster, occurs in v.2. The psalmist confesses, 'Behemoth was I with thee' (Ps 90:7). The LXX understood this to be an abstract noun, 'Beast-like was I with thee'; others substitute the simple word 'a beast,' etc.

BEKA (Av Bekah).—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BEL, originally one of the Bab. triad, but synonym in OT and Apocr. with Merodach, 'the younger Bel,' the tutelary god of Babylon (Jcr 50:21, Is 46, Bar 6:5). See also BALAI ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA. 'Bel and the Dragon' (in art. APOCRYPHA, § 7).

BELA.—1. A king of Edom (Gn 36:37, 8, cf. 1 Ch 1:41). The close resemblance of this name to that of 'Balaam, the son of Beor,' the seer, is noteworthy, and has given rise to the Targum of Jonathan reading 'Balaam, the son of Beor' in Gn 36:8. 2. The eldest of the sons of Benjamin (Gn 46:21, Nu 26:8) [patronym. Belial's], 1 Ch 7:8). 3. A Reubenite who was a dweller in the 'deserted city' (1 Ch 3:5) 4. A city of the district of 'this Bela, like the Edomite king mentioned above, seems to have been traditionally connected with the Ephruthites. 4. A name of Zosar (Gn 14:4).

BELEMUS, 1 Es 24:1 (1 LXX).—See BISHALAM.

BELIAL (Beliar).—This word, rendered by AV and RV as a proper noun in the majority of OT passages, is in reality a compound, meaning 'worthlessness,' whence 'wickedness,' 'destruction,' and as such is construed with another noun. In the sense of 'wickedness,' it occurs in 1 S 3:1 as 'daughter of wickedness,' i.e. 'a wicked woman' (cf. Dt 13:15, Jg 20:21, 1 S 20:1; 23:17, 24:2, 2 S 21:29, 1 K 21:12, 13, 2 Ch 13, Pr 6:16, 19), for similar usage). As 'destruction,' it is found in Ps 12 (cf. 2 S 22:41) and Nah 1:13 (note in Nah i: independent use, 'man' understood; RV 'wicked one'; others, 'destroyer'). Having such a meaning, it is used by St. Paul as a name for Satan (personification of unclean heathenism, 2 Co 6:17), the Greek text spelling it 'Belias' (AV and RV 'Belial'), a variation due to the harsh pronunciation of 'i' in Syriac.

N. KOENIG.

BELIEF.—Older Eng. (akin to hef and love) for the Lat.-French 'faith,' which displaced it in AV everywhere except in 2 Th 2:12. RV follows AV except in Ro 10:14, where it restores 'belief,' after Tindale, in continuity with 'believe.' Unbelief' held its ground as the antonym (Mt 13:14, etc., Ro 3:3 etc.). In modern Eng., 'faith' signifies ethical, 'belief' intellectual, credence; 'faith,' trust in a person; 'belief,' recognition of a fact or truth beyond the sphere of sensible observation or demonstrative proof. See FAITH.

G. G. FINDLAY.

BELL.—A number of small bronze bells, both of the ordinary shape with clapper and of the 'bell and silt' form, have been found at Gezer (PEFSt, 1904, 354, with illus.). The bells of 'pure gold' (Ex 25:2), which alternated with pomegranate ornaments on the skirt of the high priest's robe (28:37), were doubtless of one or other of these forms. Their purpose is stated in v.24, with the underlying idea is obscure (see also the Greek). The 'bells of the horses' of Zec 14:15 represent another word akin to that rendered 'cymbala.' Whether these ornaments were really bells or, as is usually supposed, small metal discs (cf. the crescents of Jg 28:14) is uncertain.

BELLOWS.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 2.

BELMAYM (Jth 4:7) — It seems to have lain south of Dothan, but the topography of Judith is very difficult. Bileam in Manasseh lay farther north than Dothan.

BELOVED.—See LOVE.
BELSHAZZAR.

BELSHAZZAR. —Son of Nebuchadnezzar, last king of Babylon before its capture by Cyrus (Dn 5). The name is sometimes variously given: Baltazar, Bar 1st [so also LXX and Theod., in Daniel]; and Josephus says he was son of Nabonidus. There is no doubt that Belshazzar, son of Nabonidus, is meant. He was regent in Babylon during the latter part of his father's reign. It is probable that he was in command of Babylon on its surrender, as he had been in command of the army in Akkad the 11th year of his father's reign.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

BELTGESHAZAR. —Nebuchadnezzar is said to have created this name for the youthful Daniel (Dan 1). The Babylonian form would be Bel-ta'us-tu-ur ("protect his life") or, according to 48, Bel-ba-ta-us-tu-ur. The LXX and Theodotion employ Beltgezar both for it and for Belshazzar (ch. 5); and pseudo-Epiphanius repeats a legend that Nebuchadnezzar wished to make the two men co-heirs.

J. TAYLOR.

BEN ("son"). —A Levite, 1 Ch 15[15], omitted in parallel list in v.9 in both MT and LXX. The latter omits it also in the first-named passage.

BEN-ABINADAB (AV 'son of Abinadab'). —One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4:1).

BENJAH ("Jah hath built"). —I. A brave soldier from Kabzel in Judah (2 S 23:10), captain of David's bodyguard (8th 20th). He became a partizan of Solomon's, married to "the mighty men," the Cherethites and Peletites, with him (1 K 1:7; 2:4). He played an important role in the young king's coronation (v.28, 44), and was subsequently ordered to dispatch Joshe a place as commander-in-chief he then found (2 S 23:4) one of the thirty who formed the second class of David's heroes (2 S 23:11). He came from Pirathon in Mt. Ephraim (2 S 23:6, cf. Jg 12:19). 1 Ch 27:1 assigns him to the command of the course for the month twenty-four thousand and Ephraimites under him. 3. Some ten obscure persons of this name appear in 1 Ch 4:15-17, 11, 29 18, 31, 19, 4, 2 Ch 20:15, 19, Eze 11:1, 12.

J. TAYLOR.

BENAMMI ("son of my blood-relative" or 'son of my father's kinsman'). —The story (Gn 19:3) purports to explain the name Ammon (v.20). Notwithstanding the fact that incestuous marriages were common amongst these people, it is most likely that the narrative is a product of the bitter hatred which was excited by prolonged contests for the territory E. of Jordan.

J. TAYLOR.

BEN-DEKER (AV 'son of Dekar'). —One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4:1).

BENEFACTOR. —Lk 22:16, 19 "they that exercise authority over them (the Gentiles) are called benefactors." The word is an exact tr. of the Gr. Euergetes, a title of honour borne by two of the Gr. kings of Egypt before Christ's day. Ptolemy II. (324-272) and Ptolemy VIII. (38-187). Hence RV properly spells with a capital, 'benefactors.'

BEN-JAEKAN. —A station in the journeyings, mentioned Nu 33:28 (cf. Dt 10, and see BEEROTH-BENJAEKAN).

BEN-GEBER (AV 'son of Geber'). —Patronymic of one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers who had charge of a district N.E. of the Jordan (1 K 4:19).

BEN-HADAD. —The name of three kings of Damascus in the 9th cent. B.C.

1. Benhadad I., the son of Tab-rimmon of Damascus. At the instance of Asa of Judah he intervened against Baasha of Israel, and took from him valuable territory on his northern border. For this service Benhadad received from Asa costly treasures from the Temple and royal palace (1 K 15:19-20).

2. Benhadad II., son of the preceding, was an able general and statesman. He was at the head of a league of western princes who successfully opposed the attempts of Shalmaneser II. of Assyria to conquer western Syria. At the battle of Karkar in B.C. 854 he had Ahab of Israel as one of his chief allies. In his time war with Israel was the rule, he being usually successful. But Ahab was more fortunate in the campaigns of 856 and 855, which were followed by a treaty of peace with concessions to Israel (1 K 20). On the resumption of hostilities in the third year thereafter, Benhadad was victorious (1 K 22). He was assassinated by the usurper Hazael about B.C. 843 (2 K 15:18).

3. Benhadad III., son of Hazael, probably the same as the Mar'i of the Assyrian inscriptions. Under him Damascus lost his father's conquests in Palestine (2 K 13:25), and he also suffered heavily from the Assyrians.

J. F. McCUNN.

BEN-HAIL ("son of might"). —A prince sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17).

BEN-HANAN ("son of a gracious one"). —A man of Judah (1 Ch 4).

BEN-HESED (AV 'son of Hessed' [=kindness]). —One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers who had charge of a district in Judah (1 K 4:19).

BEN-HUR (AV 'son of Hur'). —One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4).

BENINU (perhaps 'our son"). —One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10).

BENJAMIN. —1. The youngest son of Jacob by Rachel, and the only full brother of Joseph (Gn 30:21, [JE] 35:21 [P]). He alone of Jacob's sons was not born. J (Gn 35:8) puts his birth near Ephrath in Benjamin. A later interpolation identifies Ephrath with Bethlehem, but cf. 1 S 10:1, P, however (Gn 35:25, 26), gives Padder-aram as the birth-place of all Jacob's children. His mother, dying soon after he was born, named him Benoni ('son of my sorrow'). Jacob changed this ill-oomened name to the more auspicious one Benjamin, which is usually interpreted 'son of my right hand,' the right hand being the place of honour as the right side was apparently the lucky side (cf. Gn 48:14). Pressed by a famine, his ten brothers went down to Egypt, and Jacob, solicits for his welfare, did not allow Benjamin to accompany them; but Joseph made it a condition of his giving them corn that they should bring him on their return. When Judah (Gn 43:3) or Reuben (42:24) gave security for his safe return, Jacob yielded. Throughout the course of events Benjamin is a tender youth, the idol of his father and brothers. A late editor of P (Gn 46:23) makes him, when he entered Egypt, the father of ten sons, that is more than twice as many as Jacob's other sons except Dan, who had seven.

The question is, What is the historical significance of these conflicting traditions? Famin, 'right hand,' appears to have been used geographically for 'south,' and Ben- y'min may mean 'son(s) of the south,' i.e. the southern portion of Ephraim. Benoni may be connected with On in the tribe of Benjamin. The two names may point to the union of the two related tribes, and the persistence of the traditions that Benjamin was the full brother of Joseph, whereas the other Joseph tribes (Manasseh and Ephraim) are called sons, would indicate not only a close relationship to Joseph, but also a comparatively early development into an independent tribe. On the other hand, it is possible that the youngest son, P gives Canaan as his native land. This points to a traditional belief that the tribe was the last to develop. This and the fact that Shimel, a Benjaminite, claims (2 S 15:21) to be 'of the house of Joseph,' suggest that the tribe was the offshoot of the latter.

The limits of the tribal territory are given by P in Jos 18:1-29. Within it lay Bethel (elsewhere assigned to Ephraim), Ophrah, Geba, Gibeon, Ramah, Mizpeh, Gibeah, all primitive seats of Canaanitish worship and important centres in the cultus of Israel (cf., e.g., Bethel, Am 7:18). Jericho, where in early times there may have been a cult of the moon-god (järēchāh = 'moon'), and Jerusalem are also assigned to Benjamin. Zl 33:1, as commonly but not universally interpreted, also assigns Jerusalem to Benjamin, though later it belonged to Judah. Anathoth, the birth-place of Jeremiah, also lay in Benjamin (Jos 21:13 [P]). In the Blessing of Jacob's Twelve Sons (49:15-24), Jericho and Jericho are assigned to Benjamin. Zl 33:1, as commonly but not universally interpreted, also assigns Jerusalem to Benjamin. The statement is all the more important, since in this 'Blessing' we have certainly to deal with sånt stateet posz eventum. The rugged and unfriendly nature of the tribal territory doubtless contributed to martial hardness. The tribe participated in the war against Sisera (Jg 5:14). A late and composite story is found in Jg 19-21 of an almost complete annihilation of the tribe by the red sea inhabitants. Later the tribe gave to united Israel its first king, Saul of Gibeah. It had in Asa's army, according to 2 Ch 14:7, 380,000 picked warriors—an exaggeration of course, but a very significant one in this connexion. Benjamin, under Sheba, a kinsman of Saul, led in the revolt against David when the quartet provoked by David's partisanship broke out between Judah and the northern tribes (1 Ch 12:24). From the first this tribe was loyal to the house of Saul and violently opposed to David (cf. 2 S 16:20). In the revolt against the oppressors of Rehoboam it joined with the North (1 K 12:22). A variant account joins it with Judah (12:19), but this is only a reflexion of later times. The history of this tribe is unimportant after David. Besides Saul and Jeremiah, St. Paul also traced descent to this tribe (Ph 3:5). See also TIRES. 2. A great-grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 7:1). 3. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Est 10:19; prob. also Neh 2:12 [24]). JAMES A. CRAIG.

BENJAMIN GATE.—See TEMPLE.

BENO ('his son').—In both AV and RV a proper name in 1 Ch 24:23, 27, but we should perhaps render, 'of Jazliah his son, even the sons of Merari by Jazliah his son' (Oxy. Heb. Lex. a.v.).

BERON.—See Benjamin.

BERON.-A man of Judah (1 Ch 4:7).

BERON (Nu 23:29).—Prob. = Baal-meon (wh. see).

BERA.—King of Sodom at time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gen 14:15).

BERACHAH ('blessing').—1. One of Saul's brethren who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:2). 2. 'The valley of blessing,' where Jehovah gave thanks for victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, who had marched from Engedi to Tekoa (vv. 7-8). The name survives at the ruin Berakhat on the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, west of Tekoa.

BERIAH.—A man of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:1). BERE (1 Mac 9:5).—See BENZA, 3.

BERED.—1. An unknown place, mentioned but once (Gn 10:15) as an indication fixing the site of Beer-lahai-roi. The identification with Halasah, which has been suggested, is mere guess-work. 2. See BECHER, No. 1. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BERIA.—A division of an Asherite clan (1 Ch 27:9).

BERIAH.—1. Son of Asher (Gn 46:21, Nu 26:44, 1 Ch 7:26). 2. Son of Ephraim, begotten in the days of mourning occasioned by the death of Ephraim's four sons, who were killed by the men of Gath while cattle-raiding; hence the false etymology, ber-ah = 'in affliction' (1 Ch 7:26). 3. A Benjaminite at Alalon, who, with Shema, put the Gittites to flight (2 Ch 27:8). 4. Son of the Levite Shime (1 Ch 23:31). He and his brother Jeshub had not many sons, and therefore were counted as a single family.

BERITES.—Descendants of Beriah, No. 1 (Nu 26:4).

BERITES.—2 S 20:8. The reading Bichrites is suggested, though not actually given, by LXX and Vulg. See art. SHEBA.

BERNICE or BERENICE.—Sister of Agrippa II (Ac 25:26). Married her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis.

BERODACH-BALADAN.—See MINDOCH-BALADAN.

BEREA.—1. A town in the district of Macedonia called Emathia. The earliest certain reference to it occurs in an inscription of the end of the 4th cent. B.C. After the battle of Pydna (a.c. 168) it was the first city which surrendered to the Romans. In winter a.c. 40-48 it was the headquarters of Pompey's infantry. In St. Paul's time there was a Jewish community there to which he preached the gospel with success (Ac 17:14). It was a populous town, and is in modern times called Verraia by Greeks, Karadcira by Turks, and Ber by Slavs.

2. The place where Antiochus Epiphanes caused Menelaus, the ex-high priest, to be put to death (2 Mac 19). It is now the well-known Haleb or Aleppo, with about 100,000 inhabitants.

3. Mentioned 1 Mac 9, perhaps the same as Beeroth (Jos 19:7) or Beorth (1 Es 10:26); modern Birah, about 10 miles N. of Jerusalem. A. SOUTER.

BEROTH.—1 Es 6:15 = Beeroth of Ezr 2:5.

BEROTHAH, BEROTHAI.—A city of Syria, depopulated by David (2 S 8:8), and named by Essek as a limiting point in his ideal restoration of the kingdom (2 K 14:7). It was a populous town, and is in modern times called Verraia by Greeks, Karadcira by Turks, and Ber by Slavs.

BEROTHAI.—See Jews and Precious Stones.

BERZELUS.—See ZORZELUS.

BESODEIAH (Neh 3:6).—Mesubban, the son of Besodeiah, took part in repairing the Old Gate.

BESOM (lit. 'sweeper') occurs only fig. Is 1:23, 'I will sweep it [Babylon] with the sweeper of destruction.' One such besom of twigs the writer remembers having seen in the museum of Egyptian antiquities in Cairo.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BESOR (Brook).—A torrent—swallow, apparently S. or S.W. of Ziklag (1 S 30:14, 15). It is probably the modern Wady Ghuzzah, which empties itself into the sea S.W. of Gaza.

BESTIALITY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

BETAH (2 S 8:3).—See TIMNAH.

BETANE (Jsh 18).—A place apparently south of Jerusalem, and not Bethany. It may be the same as Beth-anoth.

BETEN (Jos 10:15).—A town of Asher, noticed next to Achshaph. The site is doubtful. In the fourth century it was shown 8 Roman miles east of Pтолемаис (Acco). It may be the present village of Planes.

BETH.—The second letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such used in Ps 119 as the heading of the second part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

BETHABARA.—Mentioned once only, in 1 Th, as the scene of John's baptism; the principal codices, followed by the R.V. here read Bethany. There is no clue to the position of Bethabar, except that it was probably in or near Galilee (cf. Mt 3:4). Identification with a ford named 'Abdah, about 12 miles south of the outlet of the Lake of Galilee, has with some plausibility been suggested.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-NAPHTALI.—A town of Naphtali, now the village 'Asalawa, in the mountains of Upper Galilee.

BETH-AROTH—Jos 19:61—A town in the mountains of Judah, near Gedor. It is the present Bet 'Arabah, S.E. of Hahul.

BETHANY.—A village about 15 stadia (2010 yards or about 1 mile) from Jerusalem (Jn 11:16) on the road from Jericho, close to Bethphage and on the Mount of Olives ( Mk 11, Lk 19:39). It was the lodging-place of Christ when in Jerusalem (Mk 11:1). Here lived Lazarus and Martha and Mary (Jn 11), and here He raised Lazarus from the dead (Jn 11). Here also He was entertained by Simon the leper, at the feast where the woman made her offering of ointment (Mt 26:6, Mk 14). From 'over against' Bethany took place the Ascension (Lk 24:51). In this case the topographical indication agrees exceptionally with the constant tradition which fixes Bethany at the village of el-'Arariyyeh, on the S.E. of the Mount of Olives beside the Jericho road. The tomb of Lazarus and the house of Martha and Mary are definitely pointed out in the village, but of course without any historical authority. For a possible Bethany in Galilee, see BETHABARA.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-ARABA ('place of the Arabah' [wh. seel. Jos 15:8 15:27]).—A place in the Jericho plain, apparently north of Beth-hoglah, in the 'wilderness.' The name has not been recovered.

BETH-ARIEL (Jos 10:4 only).—The site is quite uncertain. It is said to have been spoiled by Shalmaneser (perhaps Shalhantaneser III.), and may have been in Syria. Two places called Arbel exist in Palestine, one (now Irblid) west of the Sea of Galilee (Jos. Ant. xii. 1, 1), the other (Irblid) in the extreme north of Gilead, both noticed in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onom. s.v. 'Arbela').

BETHASMMOTH (1 Es 5:4).—For Bethazmaveth. See Azmaveth.

BETH-AVEN ('house of iniquity,' or 'idolatry').—Close to Ai (Jos 7:4), by the wilderness (1521), north-west of Michmash (1 S 13), and on the way to Aljaon (1421), still inhabited in the 8th cent. n.c. (Hos 5:9). The 'calves of Bethaven' were probably those at Bethel close by (Hos 10). Bethel is probably meant also in Hos 4:5 (see Am 5:10 (Aven).

BETH-AMZAVETH (Neh 7:24).—See Azmaveth.

BETH-Baal-Meon (Jos 13:17).—See Baal-Meon.

BETH-Barah (Jg 7:26).—Near Jordan and the valley of Jezreel. Some suppose it to be the same as Bethabara, in which case the guttural has been lost in copying.

BETHBASI (1 Mac 4:33 44).—Josephus reads Bethoglah. The name has not been recovered.

BETH-BIRI (1 Ch 4:21).—A town of Simeon, perhaps textual error for Beth-lebaoth, Jos 19:9—Bethbooth, Jos 19:2. The ruin Beth on the west slopes of the Debrir had rightly been intended.

BETH-CAR ('house of a lamb').—A place mentioned once only, 1 S 7:21, as the terminus of the pursuit of the Philistines under Samuel's guidance. The site is quite unknown, save that it must have been somewhere near Jerusalem, on the west.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-DAGON ('house of Dagon').—1. A city of Judah (Jos 15:16), somewhere in the Shephelah. The name is preserved in the modern Beit Dajan, some 4 miles S.E. of Jaffa. This, however, is quite a modern village. Near it is a Roman site, named Khurbet Dajan. The Biblical Beth-dagon is still to seek. 2. A border city in the tribe of Asher (Jos 19:7), not yet discovered.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM ('house of two fig-cakes').—In Jer 45:23 mentioned with Dibon and Nebo; the next camp to Dibon before Nebo (Nu 33:4).

BETH-EDEN (Am 1:17).—See Eden (House of).

BETHEL.—1. On a rocky knoll beside the great road to the north, about 12 miles from Jerusalem, stands the modern Bethin, a village of some 400 inhabitants, which represents the ancient Bethel. Four springs furnish good water, and in ancient times they were supplemented by a reservoir on Inire, 300 yards south of the town. Luz was the original name of the town. The name Bethel was first applied to the stone which Jacob set up and anointed (Gen 28:19). See Bethel. But 'the place' (v.21, etc.) was evidently one with holy associations. It was visited by Abraham, who sacrificed here (12S). This may have induced Jacob to come hither on his way to the north, and to lay his return from Paddan-aram. From an eminence to the east almost the whole extent of the plains of Jericho is visible. There may have been the scene of Lot's selfish choice (Gen 13), 'Bethel' in the Sibylline Oracles prevailed over 'Luz,' and the town came to be known by the name of the sanctuary, the neighbourhood of which lent it distinction.

Bethel, a royal Canaanite city. (Jos 12:5), fell to Joshua in the division of the land (19:25), but he failed to make good his possession. It was finally taken by Ephraim (Jg 1:7, 1 Ch 7:23). Hither the ark was brought from Gilgal (Jg 20:17, LXX), and Bethel was restored to its place of sacrifice (1 S 10:5). The prophetess Deborah dwelt between Bethel and Ramath (Jg 4:5). In judging Israel, Samuel went from year to year in circuit to Bethel (1 S 10:5). No doubt the ancient sanctity of the place led Jeroboam to choose Bethel as the site of the rival shrine, which he hoped might counteract the influence of the house of the Lord at Jerusalem (1 K 12:25). It became the great sanctuary of the Northern Kingdom, and the centre of the idolatrous priests who served in the high places (2 K 10). At Bethel Jeroboam was denounced by the man of God out of Judah (13:1). It was one of the towns taken from Jeroboam by Abijah, king of Judah (2 Ch 13:14). It is noteworthy that Elijah is silent regarding the 'call-worship at Bethel, and that a school of the prophets, apparently in sympathy with him, flourished there (2 K 2:4). But the denunciations of Amos (3:14 5:25) and Hosea (Hos 4:1 6:4, etc.) lack nothing in vehemence. It was tenanted at Bethel, who was brought by the king of Assyria to teach the mixed peoples, who lived in the country during the Exile, the manner of the God of the land (2 K 17:30). Bethel was reoccupied by the returning exiles (Es 2:19, etc.). We find it in the hands of Hachidde (1 Mac 5:34), it was one of the towns 'in the mountains' taken by Vespasian in his march on Jerusalem (Jos. B. J. r. ix. 9). 2. A town in Judah, not identified, called in different places, Bethul, Bethel, and Bethuel (Jos 19:1, 1 S 30:29, 1 Ch 4:39). W. Ewino.

BETH-EMEK ('house of the deep valley', Jos 19:7).—A town of Zebulun in the border valley, east of Acco, apparently near Cabul. The name has not been recovered.

BETHER ('mountains of cutting'—or 'of divisions', Ca 2:17).—If a proper name, the famous site of Bether, near Jerusalem, might be intended. Bether is celebrated for the resistance of the Jews to Hadrian under Bar Cochba in A.D. 135. The site was recognized by Canon Williams at Bifer, south-west of Jerusalem—a village on a cliff in a strong position, with a ruin near it called 'Ruins of the Jews,' from a tradition of a great Jewish massacre at this place. See Molabathion.

BETHESDA.—A reservoir at Jerusalem, remarkable (according to a gloss inserted in the text in some author-
BETH-EZEL

(Mic 1:12) — Perhaps 'place near,' see AVM: mentioned with Zaanann and Shaphir. It seems to have been a place in the Philistine plain, but the site is unknown. According to some it is = Azel of Zec 4:7.

BETH-GADER (1 Ch 2:27) mentioned with Bethlehem and Kiriat-jeanin. It may be the same as Geder, Jos 18:25.

BETH-GAMUL (Jer 4:23) — A place in Moab, noticed with Dibon, Kiriataim, and Beth-memon. It is now the ruin Umm el-Jemdi, towards the east of the plateau, south of Medeba.

BETH-GILGAL (Neh 12:29, AV 'house of Gilgal'), perhaps identical with Gilgal to the east of Jericho. See Gilgal.

BETH-HACHEREU (place of the vineyard'), Mt 2:2 (Jer 6:6). — It appears to have had a commanding position for a beacon or ensign. Tradition fixed on Herodium south of Bethlehem, probably because it was a conspicuous site near Tekos, with which it is noticed. A possible site is at Karim, west of Jerusalem, where there are vineyards.

BETH-HARAM was situated in 'the valley-plain of the Jordan' (Jos 13:17). In Nu 32:29 Beth-haran. Its site has been recovered at Tell Raimeh at the mouth of the Wady Houbin, 6 miles east from the familiar bathing-place of pilgrims in the Jordan. It was rebuilt and fortified by Herod Antipas when he became tetrarch, and in honour of the Roman empress was called Livia or Libias. A Merril (East of the Jordan, p. 389) gives reasons for believing that it was in the palace here that Herod celebrated his birthday by the feast recorded (Mt 14:1-12, Mk 6:17-20), and that the Baptist's head was brought hither from Macherus, 20 miles south.

BETH-HARAN (Nu 32:28). See BETH-HARAM.

BETH-HOGHAL ('place of the partridge'), Jos 15:15. — In the Jericho plain. Now the large spring called 'Ain Hisjud, 'partridge spring,' south-east of Jericho.

BETH-HORON. — The upper and nether, two towns represented by the villages Beit 'Ur el-foka and Beit 'Ur el-taha, said to have been built by Sheerah (1 Ch 7:19). Their position, as commanding the ancient great high-road from the mountain plain into the heart of the mountains of Benjamin, made these places of great importance, and several celebrated battles occurred in their neighbourhood. Here Joshua defeated the Canaanites (Jos 10:14-28). Solomon fortified both these cities (2 Ch 8:8, 1 K 4:17). By this road Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Judah. Here Judas Maccabaeus defeated the Syrian general Seron (1 Mac 3:19-25) and five years afterwards Nicanor (71-68); more than 200 years later the Jews at the same place beat back the Roman army under Cestius Gallus. In few places in Palestine can we with greater precision set history in its geographical setting; the whole ancient road, with abundant traces of Roman work, can be followed throughout, and the two Beit 'Urs, less than two miles apart, stand sentinel above the road as the two Beth-horons did in ancient times. The Beth-horons were on the frontier between Benjamin and Ephraim (Jos 19:14 and 19:18). They belonged to the latter (Jos 21:19), and followed the Northern Kingdom. Possibly Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 2:10) was from here. E. W. G. Masterman.

BETH-JESIMOTH (the 'place of the desert'). — The S. limit of the encampment on 'the plains of Moab' at the close of the journeyings (Nu 33:19). In Jos 12:19 it is mentioned as in the S. of the Arabah towards the Dead Sea. In 13:20 it is assigned to Reuben; and in Mk 6:5 it is spoken of as belonging to Moab. Eusebius places it 10 miles S. of Jericho. Some reins and a well at the N.E. end of the Dead Sea bear the name of Susaimeh, which may be a modification of Jeshimoth; and this situation suits the biblical narrative.

BETH-LE-APHRAH (AV 'house of Aphrah'). — The name of a town apparently in Phil. territory, whose site is quite unknown (Mic 1:14). In the call 'at Beth-le- Aphrah roll thyself in the dust,' there is a double play upon words, 'Aphrah containing a punning allusion to 'aphar (dust), and kipphaisha (roll thyself) to Petshi (Philistine).

BETH-LEBAOTH (Jos 19:9 'house of lionsesses'), — A town of Simeon. See BETH-BINN.

BETHLEHEM ('house of bread' or, according to some, 'of the god Lakhmu'). — The name of two places in Palestine.

1. Bethlehem of Judah, otherwise Ephrath or Ephrathah, now represented by the town of Betl Lahm, 5 miles S. of Jerusalem. On the way thither Rachel was buried (Gen 35:19); hence come the two plays of the Plague of Adoniad—adventures are related in Jg 17.19. It was the home of Elimelech, the father-in-law of Ruth (Ru 1:1), and here Ruth settled with her second husband Boaz, and became the ancestress of King David, whose connexion with Bethlehem is emphasized throughout his history (1 S 16:1-17 20:29 etc.). The Philistines here had a garrison during David's outlawry (2 S 23:4, 1 Ch 11:12). Here Asaiah was hounded (2 S 23:4), and hence came Ishinah, one of the mighty men (2 S 23:8, cf. 21:19). Reboam fortified it (2 Ch 11:9), and here the murderers of Gedaliah took refuge (Jer 41:1). Whether the Salmon referred to in 1 Ch 2:45, 46 'father of Bethlehem' (whatever that expression may exactly mean) be the same as the Salmon who was father of Boaz (Ru 4:17) —a theory the Greek version seems to justify—is doubtful. The town had some sanctity, and is indicated (Ps 132:2) as a suitable place for the Tabernacle. The birth of the Messiah there is prophesied in Mic 5:4 (quoted Mt 2:5, Jn 7:42), a prophecy fulfilled by the birth of Christ (Mt 2:1-4, Lk 2:1-4). Here Herod sent to seek the new-born Christ, and not finding Him ordered the massacre of the infants of the city (Mt 2:16). The modern town, containing about 8000 inhabitants, is Christian and comparatively prosperous. Within it stands the basilica of the Nativity, founded in the 4th century (about 380), and restored by Justinian (about 560) and many later emperors. Within it are shown grottoes in which the various events of the Nativity are localized with the usual unreasoning definiteness.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun, a place named but once (Jos 19:15), in enumerating the towns of that tribe. It is identified with Betl Lahm, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. It is probable that this was the home of Ebz, the judge (Jg 12:16), as almost all the judges belonged to the northern tribes. R. A. S. Macalister.

BETH-LOMON (1 Es 5:9). — For Bethlehem of Judah.

BETH-MAACAH. — A descriptive epithet of the city of Abel (2 S 20:18), where 'Abel and B.' should be 'Abel of B.' (cf. 1 K 15:5, 2 K 10:31). See Abel (07)

BETH-MACAH.

BETH-MARATHOTH (place of diversions) J 19, 19, 1 H 4). — A city of Simeon in the Shephelah plains, near Ziklag, deserted in David's time; site unknown.

BETH-MEON. — See Baal-Meon.
BETH-MERHAK

(Beth-Merhak (2 S 15^b RV, for AV 'a place that was far off'); RV 'the Far House').—Stade and others understand it to mean the 'last house of the city'. Some scholars think it is identical with the town called known between Jerusalem and Jericho.

BETH-MILLO

(Jg 9^b RVm; 2 K 12^b AVm, text 'house of Millo').—See Millo.

BETH-NIMRATH

('place of the leopard,' Nu 32^2 etc., called Nimrah v.), and, some think, Nimram 15^b, see Nimrā. It was in the territory E. of Jordan allotted to Reuben. It is represented by the modern Tell Nimrā, 6 miles E. of the Jordan, about 10 miles N. of the Dead Sea, on the S. bank of Wady Shabb.

W. Ewing.

BETH-PAZZEZ

(Jos 19^b).—A town of Issachar near En-rannim and En-haddāh. The name has never been recovered.

BETH-PFELT

(RV; in AV Beth-palet, Jose 15^b).—Beth-Phelet, Neh 11^b. —The Paltite, 2 S 28^b, called by scribal error Pelonite in 1 Ch 11^b 29^b, was an inhabitant of this place. The site was south of Beer-sheba, but is unknown.

BETH-POR

—a city belonging to Reuben (Jos 13^b), located most probably some four or five miles north of Mt. Hermon near the Phaeh ravine. Hittite and Israelite ruins are found in the ravine (Wady Hsdbn probably), the Israelites encamped (Dt 21^b 4^b). Moses was buried in the valley 'over against Beth-por' (Dt 44^b). Conder suggests a site several miles to the S., near the Ruins of Abu al-Minyeh, but the impression given by Nu 25^b-8 is that the city was not so far distant from the plain of Shittim.

G. L. Robinson.

('house of figs').—The place where Christ, on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem, sent His disciples to fetch the ass (Mt 21^b, Mk 11^b, Lk 19^b). It must have been close to Bethany, and is traditionally identified with Abu Dis, a village that satisfies this condition.

R. A. S. Macalister.

BETH-RAPHA

('house of the giant').—An unknown place mentioned in 1 Ch 4^b.

BETH-REHOB

—a town or district near Laish (Jg 18^b), whose inhabitants joined the Ammonites against David (2 S 10^b). Its site is unknown.

R. A. S. Macalister.

BETHSAIDA

—A place on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, whither Christ went after feeding the five thousand (Mk 6^b, cf. Lk 9^b), and where He healed a blind man (Mk 8^b); the home of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (Jn 1^b 12^b). It was denounced by Christ for unbelief (Mt 11^b, Lk 10^b). The town was advanced by Herod the tetrarch from a village to the dignity of a city, and named Julias, in honour of Caesar's daughter. The situation is disputed, and, indeed, authorities differ as to whether or not there were two places of the same name, one east, one west of the Jordan. Et-Tell, on the northern shore of the sea, east of the Jordan, is generally identified with Bethsaida Julias; those who consider that the narrative of the crossings of the lake (Mk 8^b) requires another site west of the Jordan, seek it usually at 'Ain ez-Tabaghah near Khan Minyeh. The latest writers, however, seem inclined to regard the hypothetical second Bethsaida as unnecessary (see Sancd, Sacred Sites of the Gospel, p. 41), and to regard et-Tell as the scene of all the incidents recorded about the town.

R. A. S. Macalister.

BETH-SHEAN, BETH-SHAN

—the site of this ancient stronghold, allotted to Manasseh, although in the territory of Issachar (Jos 17^b, Jg 1^b), is marked by the village of Beitsām, in the throat of the Vale of Jezreel, where it opens into the Ghūr. Manasseh failed to eject the Canaanites, but at a later date they were reduced to servitude. Here the Phœnicians disencouraged the bodies of Saul and his sons (1 S 31^b).—During the Greek period it was known as Scythopolis; but the ancient name again prevailed in the form of Bēṣām. After changes of fortune in the Maccabean struggle, and in the time immediately succeeding, it attained considerable prosperity as a member of the Decapolis (1 Mac 12^b, Jos. Ant. xiv. v. 3, BJ III. iv. 7, etc.). There must always have been a strong admixture of heathen inhabitants (Jos. Vita 6; Antia Zarah l. 4). It is now in the hands of a body of Circassians.

W. Ewing.

BETH-SHEMESH

('house' or 'temple of the sun').—

1. A town in Judah (Jos 15^b etc., called Er-Shemesh in Jos 19^b) allotted to the children of Aaron (Jos 21^b). Hither the ark was brought when sent back by the Philistines, and the inhabitants were smitten because of their profane curiosity (1 S 6). Here Amaziah was defeated and captured by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 K 14^b1). It was one of the cities taken by the Philistines in the time of Ahaz (2 Ch 28^b). It is identified with the modern 'Ain Shemesh, on the S. slope of Wady es-Surud, 15 miles W. of Jerusalem. 2. A city in Issachar (Jos 19^b), unidentified. 3. A city in Naphtali (Jos 19^b), unidentified. 4. A city in Egypt, a seat of heathen idolatry (Jer 44^b), identified with the ancient Heliopolis, called 'Ain Shemesh by the Arabs (Wallis Budge, The Nile, 261f.).—W. Ewing.

BETH-SHITTAH

or Beth-satta, the acacia, Jg 7^b, —In the vicinity of Abel-meholah. It is the present Shuita, a village on a knoll, in the Jezreel valley.

BETHSURA

(1 Mac 4^b 8^b 6^b, 7^b 10^b 4^b 11^b 14^b, 2 Mac 13^b).—The Greek form of Bethuram, in 2 Mac 11^b Bethsuron.

BETH-TAPPUAH

('place of apples,' Jos 15^b).—A town of Judah in the Jebusite mountains (see Tappuah in 1 Ch 2^b). Now the village Taffah, west of Hebron.

BETHUEL,—1. The son of Nahor and Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Laban and Rebekah (Gn 22^b, 24^b 21^b, 25^b 28^b). In Gn 25^b (P) he is called 'Bethuel the Syrian.' 2. 1 Ch 4^b; or Bethul (Jos 19^b). See Bethuel, 2.

BETHUL (Jos 19^b).—See Bethuel, No. 2.

BETHULIA.—The locality of the scenes of the Book of Judith (Jth 4^b, 7 etc.). If not a synonym for Jerus-alem itself, it is an unknown site south of the plain of Jezreel. Mt'nyah from the similarity of the name, Semur from its commanding position, and even Shechem, have all been suggested as possible sites.

E. W. G. Masterman.

BETH-ZACHARIAS

(1 Mac 6^b 20^b).—A village on the mountain pass, south of Jerusalem and west of Bethelhem, now the ruin Beit Sokaria. It was the scene of the defeat of the Maccabean hosts by Syrian forces.

BETH-ZUR

('house of rock,' Jos 15^b, 1 S 30^b [in LXX], 1 Ch 2^b, 2 Ch 11^b, Neh 3^b).—The Bethura of 1 Mac 4^b etc. A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, fortified by Rebhoboam, and still important after the Captivity. Judas Maccabaeus here defeated the Greeks under Lyons in a.c. 165. It is the present ruined site, Beit Suv, on a cliff west of the Hebron road, near Hulul.

BETOLION (AV Betholius, 1 Es 52^b; in Est 2^b Bethel).—Fifty-two persons of this place returned from captivity with Zerubbabel.

BETOMASTHAIM

(Jth 15^b, AV Betomasthem).—BETOMESTHAIM (46, AV Betomasthem).—Apparently N. of Bethulia and facing Dothan. There is a site called Der or Massias W. of the Dothan plain, but the antiquity of this name is doubtful.

BETONIM (Jos 13^b).—In N. Galilee. The name may survive in that of the Betuin district, the extreme N. of Galilee.

BETROTHING.—See marriage.

BEULAH ('married' [of a wife]).—An allegorical name applied to Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah (Is 62^b, 1). She was no longer to be regarded as God, as she had been during the Captivity, but married

1. The Name.—The word 'Bible' strictly employed is the title of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, though occasionally by a loose usage of the term it is applied to the sacred writings of pagan religions. It is derived from a Greek word Bible—is originating in bibles, the inner bark of papyrus (paper)—literally meaning 'Little Books'; but since the diminutive had come into common use in late popular Greek apart from its specific signification, the term really means simply 'books.' It is the Gr. tr. of the Heb. word for 'books,' which is the oldest designation for the Jewish Scriptures as a collection (see Da 9). The title Holy Bible is due to the LXX, who called the Scriptures 'holy.' It is found as early as the 1st cent. among the Jews (1 Mac 12.2, Ro 1.2, 2 Ti 3). The Greek word Bible is first met with in this connexion in the introduction to Sirach, written by the grandson of Sirach, the phrase 'the rest of the books' implying that the Law and the Prophets previously named, as well as those books subsequently known as the 'writings,' are included. It is used in the Hebrew sense, for the OT; by the unknown author of the Christian homily in the 2nd cent. designated The Second Epistle of Clement (xiv. 2). It does not appear as a title of the whole Christian Scriptures before the 5th cent., when it was thus employed by Greek Church writers in the list of the canonical books. Thence it passed over into the West, and then the Greek word Bible, really a neutral plural, came to be treated as a Latin singular noun, a significant grammatical change that you would not get with the Gr. singular of the unity of Scripture. The word cannot be traced in Anglo-Saxon literature, and we first have the English form of it in the 14th century. It occurs in Piers Plowman and Chaucer. Its use by the Church, as the name for the OT, is seen in the MSS. of the Vulgate (1570) and is approved by the national Church of England. It is used for the whole of the Christian Scriptures, and not only for the OT, as in the Authorized Version. The name 'Bible' is the permanent English name for the Scriptures, as Luther's use of the corresponding German word fixed that for Continental Protestants.

2. Contents and Divisions.—The Jewish Bible is the OT; the Protestant Christian Bible consists of the OT and the NT, but with the Apocrypha included in some editions; the Roman Catholic Bible contains the OT and NT, and also the Apocrypha, lastly the Samarian Bible. The main division is between the Jewish Scriptures and those which are exclusively Christian. These are known respectively as the OT and the NT. The title 'New Testament' is uniformly used, since it really means 'New Covenant.' It appears to be derived from the Latin word testamentum, 'a will,' which is the tr. of the Gr. diatheke, itself in the classics also meaning 'a will.' But the LXX employs this Gr. word as the tr. of the Heb. berith, a word meaning 'covenant.' Therefore 'testament' in the Biblical sense really means 'covenant,' and the two parts of our Bible are the 'Old Covenant' and the 'New Covenant.' When the Prophets used the word meaning 'will' while they had ready another word meaning 'covenant' (viz. synonym), the answer has been proposed that they perceived the essential difference between God's covenant with men and men's covenants one with another. The two are arranged on equal terms. But God's covenants are made and offered by God and accepted by men only on God's terms. A Divine covenant is like a will in which a man disposes of his property on whatever terms he thinks fit. On the other hand, however, it may be observed that the word diatheke is also used for a covenant between man and man (e.g. Dt 77). The origin of this use is to be found as applied by Christianity to the arrangement of the gifts of Scripture is Jeremiah's promise of a New Covenant (Jer 31), endorsed by Christ (Mt 16.6, L 11), and enlarged upon in NT teaching (e.g. Gal 4, He 8). Here, however, the reference is to the Divine arrangements and pledges, not to the books of Scripture, and it is by a secondary usage that the books containing the two covenants have come to be themselves designated Testaments, or Covenants.

The Jewish division of the OT is into three parts known as (1) the Law, (2) the Prophets, and (3) the Writings, or the Sacred Writings (Hagiographa). The 'Law' consisted of the first 5 books of our Bible (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy), ascribed to Moses; and it was treated as peculiarly sacred, the most holy and authoritative portion of Scripture. It was the only part of the Hebrew Scriptures accepted by the Samaritans, who worshipped the very document containing it almost as a fetish. But the name 'Law' (Heb. Torah, Gr. Nomos) is sometimes given to the whole Jewish Bible (e.g. Jn 10). The 'Prophets' included not only the utterances ascribed to inspired teachers of Israel, but also the chief historical books later than the Pentateuch. There were reckoned to be 8 books of the Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets) and 11 of the Hagiographa (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, and Chronicles). Thus there were reckoned to be in all 24 books. Josephus reckoned 22—probably joining Judges to Ruth and Lamentations to Jeremiah. The list was reduced to this number by taking Samuel, Kings, Ezra and Nehemiah, and Chronicles as one book each, and by making: the books of the Minor Prophets. Ezra is not divided from Nehemiah in the Talmud or the Massora.
BIBLE

The books now known as the Apocrypha were not in the Hebrew Bible, as they became part of the LXX. They were found in the LXX, which represents the enlarged Greek Canon of Alexandria. From this they passed into the Latin versions, and so into Jerome’s revision, the Vulgate, which in time became the authorized Bible of the Roman Catholic Church. They were not accepted by the Protestants as Divinely inspired, but were printed in some Protestant Bibles between the OT and the NT. In their old order they were interspersed with the OT books as though forming part of the OT itself. The Apocrypha consists of 14 books (1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, The Rest of Esther, The Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch with the Epistle of Jeremy, The Song of the Three Holy Children, The History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, 1 and 2 Maccabees).

Thus slowly formed, probably the first collection of any of its books was the bringing together of the Synoptic Gospels into one volume (called by Justin Martyr: 'The Memoirs of the Apostle'). Subsequently the fourth Gospel was included in this volume. Tatian’s Diatessaron is a witness to this fact. Meanwhile collections of St. Paul’s Epistles were being made, and thus there came to be two volumes known as 'The Gospel' and 'The Apostle.' The former was early called a prophetical book standing by itself. Gradually the other NT books were gathered in—probably forming a third volume. Thus the NT—like the OT—consisted of three parts—the Four Gospels, the Pauline Writings, and the remaining books. The similarity may be traced a step further. In both cases the first of the three divisions held a primacy of honour—the Law among the Jews, the Gospels among the Christians. The composition of the NT consists of 27 books, viz., Four Gospels, Acts, 13 Epistles of St. Paul, Hebrews, James, 2 Epistles of St. Peter, 3 of St. John, Jude, Revelation.

Within the books of the Bible there were originally no divisions, but at the beginning of the NT in the case of the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles, the first two parts were always indicated as separate poems, and elsewhere in the case of definite statements of differences of contents, such as the Song of Miriam, the Song of Deborah, ‘the work of Sisera’, and ‘the words of King Lemuel’ (in Prov.). For convenience of reading in the synagogues, the Law was divided into sections (called Parashot). Selections from the Prophets (called Haphtarah) were made to go with the appointed sections of the Law. The first indications of divisions in the NT are ascribed to Tatian. They did not break into the text, but were inserted in the margins. The earliest divisions of the Gospels were known as ‘titles’ (topic); somewhat similar divisions were indicated in the Epistles by ‘headings’ or ‘chapters’ (Kephalaia), a form of which with more numerous divisions than the ‘titles’ was also introduced into the Gospels. These divisions were made on the basis of the composition of the sections and supposed to have been arranged by Ammonius of Alexandria in the early part of the 3rd cent., and therefore known as the Ammonian Sections. These are much shorter than our chapters. Thus in Matthew there were 68 ‘titles’ and 355 ‘Ammonian Sections’; in Mark the numbers were 48 and 236, in Luke 83 and 342, and in John 18 and 232 respectively. The chapters in the Acts and the Epistles are ascribed to Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria (subsequently bishop of Suld, in Sardinia) in the 6th century. These chapters nearly corresponded in length to the Gospel ‘titles.’ Thus there were in Acts, 19 in Romans, etc. A still smaller division of the books of Scripture is that of the stichoi, a word used for a line of poetry, and then for a similar length of prose, marked off for the payment of copyists. Subsequently it was employed for the piece of writing which a reader was desired to read without taking breath, and the marks of the stichoi would be helps for the reader, indicating where he might pause. In Matthew there were 2560 stichoi; the same Gospel has 1071 modern verses. Stephanus calculates 19,241 stichoi for the 7959 modern verses of the whole NT—giving an average of nearly 28 stichoi per verse. Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro is credited with having made our present chapter divisions. The stichoi of the Diatessaron were the basis of the chapter divisions in the NT during the intervals of a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons. Whether he actually invented these arrangements or copied them from some predecessor, they were first published in Stephens’ Greek Testament of 1661.

3. Historical Origin.—The Bible is not only a library, the books of which come from various writers in different periods of time, and who were not always contemporaneous, but it is also a means whereby the Christian Church has been guided in its teaching. It is quite clear that the idea of a Bible was present in the minds of the first Christians. The Jewish Law was already known to the Christian Church as a whole, and was used for guidance. The Gospels were written by those who had been eye-witnesses of the life of Christ, and were used for the same purpose. The Epistles were written by the apostles and other early Christians, and were used for the same purpose. The books of the Old Testament were also used for the same purpose. The Christian Church, therefore, had a Bible, but it was not a collection of books, as we understand the word, but rather a collection of writings, which were used for the same purpose. The Christian Church was guided by these writings, and these writings were called the Bible.
other books), P (the Priestly Code, represented especially by Leviticus, the author of which revised the earlier parts of the Law-books and inserted additions into them). But D and E are closely interwoven, in an instruction that they have both been revised, and the result of this revision gives us the composite narrative known as JE. Thus we have now the three strata, viz. (1) JE, the prophetic element, written in the spirit of the prophets dated about b.c. 700; (2) D, the moral and legal element, seen especially in Deuteronomy, dated about b.c. 620; (3) P, the priestly element, dated about b.c. 444. The author of P appears to have revised the whole work and given it as the complete Law. This may have been done by the Ephrathites during the Exile, so that the Law-book brought up to Jerusalem would be the Pentateuch (or the Hexateuch), or it may have been after the Return, in which case the Law-book would be only P. But in any case the whole work after its completion underwent some further slight revision before it assumed its present form. See Hexateuch.

If now we ask not what was the first complete book of the OT, but what was the first portion of the OT actually written, it is not easy to give a reply. The literature of most peoples begins with ballads. Possibly the first decrees of Deborah are a ballad, should be assigned to it the place in the chronological order of Hebrew writings. Such a ballad would be handed down in tradition before it was put into writing. Then scholars have in Exodus, the Book of the Covenant, may have come down in tradition or even in writing, from a remote antiquity. The code of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, b.c. 2255-2152, was a written law nearly 1000 years earlier than the time of Moses. The striking resemblance between some of the laws of Israel and some of these Babylonian laws points to a certain measure of dependence. This independence may be due to the patriarchal period. If so, it would have been possible for the Jews in the Exile to have access to this venerable code at the very time P was being constructed.

There is much less ground for question of the dates of the NT books. The earliest date possible for any of them is A.D. 44 for James; although, as Prof. Harnack holds, perhaps this is almost the latest written book of the NT. Laying aside the much disputed question of the date of James, we have I Thessalonians, as apart from this the earliest written NT book. Following the usually accepted chronology, the date of this Epistle is A.D. 53 (Harnack, A.D. 49; Turner, A.D. 51). The latest written NT book is 2 Peter, which was written to a late decade of the 2nd century. Apart from this Epistle, which stands quite by itself as a pseudonymous work, and James, which may be either the earliest or one of the latest NT books, the latest written works are the Johannine writings, which cannot be earlier than the end of the 1st century. Thus we have a period of about 50 years for the composition of the bulk of the NT writings, viz. the second half of the 1st cent. A.D.

4. Original Languages.—The bulk of the OT was written in Hebrew, and without vowel points. Hebrew is the Israelite dialect of the Canaanite language, which belongs to the Semitic family, and is closely allied to Aramaic. Some portions of the OT (viz. documents in Ezr 4-6 and 7b-10, Dan 2-7 and a few scattered words and phrases elsewhere) are in Aramaic, the language of Syria, which was widely known, being found in Babylonia, Egypt, and Arabia. After the Exile, since Aramaic then became the everyday language of the Jews, Hebrew was relegated to a position of honourable neglect (the language of the law and the prophets); and Aramaic came into general use. Probably the earliest writings which are embodied in the NT were in this language. When Papias says that Matthew wrote 'the oracles of the Lord in the Hebrew dialect,' he would seem to mean Aramaic. Since Jesus taught in Aramaic, it is not likely that His discourses were translated into the more archaic language; it is more probable that they were written down in the very language in which they were spoken. Similarly, it is likely that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was in Aramaic. But, however far we may go with Dr. Marshall and Dr. Abbott in allowing that Aramaic writings are to be found between b.c. 700 and 300, the moral and legal element, seen especially in Deuteronomy, dated about b.c. 620; (3) P, the priestly element, dated about b.c. 444. The author of P appears to have revised the whole work and given it as the complete Law. This may have been done by the Ephrathites during the Exile, so that the Law-book brought up to Jerusalem would be the Pentateuch (or the Hexateuch), or it may have been after the Return, in which case the Law-book would be only P. But in any case the whole work after its completion underwent some further slight revision before it assumed its present form. See Hexateuch.

If now we ask not what was the first complete book of the OT, but what was the first portion of the OT actually written, it is not easy to give a reply. The literature of most peoples begins with ballads. Possibly the first decrees of Deborah are a ballad, should be assigned to it the place in the chronological order of Hebrew writings. Such a ballad would be handed down in tradition before it was put into writing. Then scholars have in Exodus, the Book of the Covenant, may have come down in tradition or even in writing, from a remote antiquity. The code of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, b.c. 2255-2152, was a written law nearly 1000 years earlier than the time of Moses. BICHRI — the compilation of which in whole or part is assigned to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. Later, with indications as late as the 7th cent. A.D., in its present form is the Jerusalem Targum, known as the Targum of pseudo-Jonathan. This is more free and interpolated with 'Haggadic' elements. The official Targum of the Professors bears the name of Jonathan, living in Palestine in the 3rd cent. A.D., it received its final shaping in Babylon in the 5th century. The Targums of the Hagadot are much later in date.

The oldest versions of the NT are the Syriac and the Latin, both of which may be traced back in some form to the 2nd cent. A.D., but there is much difference of opinion as to the original text of the former. First, we have the Peshitta, literally, the 'simple' version, which has been traced by Tatian's Didascalicon, which may be distinct from either of these. While it is admitted that a primitive text underlying the Peshitta may be as ancient as any of these versions, scholars are fairly agreed that the Peshitta, as we know it, is considerably more recent than Tatian and the Syriac Gospels, both of which may be assigned to the 2nd cent. A.D. The earliest Latin Version appeared before the end of the 2nd cent. and probably in North Africa, whence Latin was the language commonly used, while Greek was then the language of Christian literature at Rome. Tertullian knew the North African Latin Version. Some later several attempts were made in Italy to translate the NT into Latin. The confusion of text induced Damasus, bishop of Rome, to commit to Jerome (A.D. 325) the task of preparing a reliable Latin version of the Bible. This came to be known as the Vulgate, which for 1000 years was the Bible of the Western Church, and which, since the Council of Trent, has been honoured by Roman Catholics as an infallibly correct rendering of the true text of Scripture. Augustine refers to a version which he calls 'itala,' but it has not been shown that this was probably Jerome's version. The NT was early translated into Coptic, and it appeared in three dialects of that language. The Sahidic Version, in Lower Egypt, can be traced back to the 4th century. The Bohalitic, formerly used at Alexandria, has been assigned to as early a date as the 3rd cent.; but Prof. Burkitt shows reasons for bringing it down to the 6th. It has not been used ecclesiastically by the Copts. Lastly, there is the Fayumic Version, represented by MSS from the Fayum. The original Gothic Version was the work of Ulilias in the 4th century. He had to invent an alphabet for it. This work may be considered the first literary product in a Teutonic language. The Ethiopic and Armenian Versions may be assigned to the 5th century. Subsequent ages saw the Georgian Version (5th), the Anglosaxon (8th to 11th), the Sarbono (9th). The Reformation period—from Wycliff onwards—saw new translations into the vernacular; but the great age of Bible translation is the 19th century. The American Bible Society now produces the Scriptures in over 400 languages and versions.

BICHRi. — 'Sheba the son of Bichri' (2 S 20 v) should rather be 'Sheba the Bichrite,' i.e. a descendant of Becher (Gen 46:11). BIDKAR. — An officer of Abah and afterwards of Jehu (2 K 9:2).

BIER. — See Mourning Customs, Tomb.

BIGTHA. — A eunuch of Ahasuerus (Est 1:10).

BIGTHAN (Est 2:20), or BIGTHANA (67).—One of the two eunuchs whose plot against the life of Ahasuerus was discovered and foiled by Mordecai.

BILDAD. — See Job.

BILÉAM (1 Ch 6:6).— A Levitical city of Manasseh, the same as Bileam of Jos 17:19, Jg 1:34, 2 K 9:6; prob. the mod. Bel'sam (see Moses on Jg 13:19).

BILGHAI. — See Bilgah.

BILHÁH. — 1. A slave-girl given to Rachel by Laban (Gen 30:2 (P)), and by her to Jacob as a concubine (Gen 30:6 (JE)); the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen 30:7 (JE) 35:23 (P) 46:21 (R), 1 Ch 7:5). She was guilty of incest with Reuben (Gen 35:23 (P)). The etymology is uncertain. These narratives and genealogies probably embody early traditions as to the origin and mutual relations of the tribes, rather than personal history. Tribes are traced to a concubine ancestress, because they were 'a bond of a connection to Israel. 2. A Simeonite city (1 Ch 2:41) = Baalath (Jos 15:20), Bagal (Jos 19, 1 Ch 8:20). Site uncertain.

BILHÁN.— 1. A Horite chief, the son of Ezser (Gen 36:6 = Ch 1:10). 2. A descendant of Benjamin, son of Jediael, and father of seven sons who were heads of houses in their tribe (1 Ch 7:4).

BILSHAN ('Inquirer'). — A companion of Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:18, Neh 7:16 = Beisarim, 1 Esd 8:6).

BIMHAL ('son of circumcision'). — A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:8).

BINDING AND LOOSING. — See Power of the Keys.

BIRD. — 1. In OT: (1) 'êph, tr. 'birds' or 'fowl,' usually joined with 'of heaven' or 'of the air'; see Gn 1:24, Lv 17:15, 2 S 21:19, Jer 49:4, Ezek 39:12. (2) 'ayid, usually tr. 'fowl' (AV) and 'birds of prey' (RV); Gen 15:10, Job 28:15, Is 18:4, Ezek 39:4. (3) tsippôr (cf. Arab. asfar), small birds like sparrows which twitter: Gn 7:4, Lv 14, Ps 54:11 (cf. 4:11); 6:17. (4) ba'al êndâh, 'possessor of a wren': Pr 1:11. (5) birds: Gen 8:7, Mt 13, Lk 13:10, Acts 15:35 (cf. AV). (6) corne, 'birds of prey': Rev 18:10 (AV). (7) Birds abounding in Palestine, and evidently did so in ancient times. They were sympathetically watched and studied: we read, for example, of the migrations (Jer 8:23), their care of their young (Dt 32:12, Mt 2:19 etc.), the helplessness of their young (Pr 27:18, 1 Esd 16 etc.), their nesting (Ps 104:24, 37); indeed, every phase of bird life is touched upon. There are many references to the names of the fowlers (see Snares). Birds are added into clean and unclean. In some cases they were allowed as sacrificial offering (Lv 11, 14-17). It is a curious thing that the dog is not apparently (unless, as some think, in 1 K 4, under the 'fatted fowl'-barbarum 'ablist) mentioned in the OT, although a beautifully modelled clay dogs of an early period occur rather than the OT records, was found during the recent excavations in Gezer. All birds mentioned by name in the Bible are dealt with in separate articles.

BIRSHA (etym. and meaning unknown).—King of Gomorrah at the time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn 14).

BIRTH.—See CHILD, CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 1.

BIRTHDAY.—Birthday celebrations are mentioned only in connexion with royalty, viz. Pharaoh's birthday (Gn 40, 20), the time of the coronation of that Antiocho of Epiphanes (2 Mac 67), and the birthday feast given by Herod Antipas (Mt 14, Mk 6). The 'day of our king,' to which Hosea refers (7), may have been the anniversary either of the king's birth or of his accession. Some authorities (e.g. Ebersheimer, Life & Times of Jesus, i, 672) regard Herod's feast as celebrating the anniversary of his accession—view based on a mistaken analogy of the Talmudic passage Aboda zara l. 3 (see the full discussion in Schürer, G.J.V i. 438-441).

BIRTHRIGHT.—See FINNSTORM.

BIRZAIT (1 CH 7).—Apparently a town of Asher, probably Bir ez-Zeit, near Tyre.

BISHOP (Lat. episcopus, Gr. episkopos).—(1) A man consecrated to the office of superintendent of the churches, who is the representative of the authorities of the church in the particular district he is charged with, or of the universal church. (2) The head of the members of a church in a particular time.

The word 'bishop' is used in the NT 97 times, in the N.T. 14 times (in the NT there are found five times in Ac 20, St. Paul reminds the elders of Ephesus that the Holy Ghost has made them bishops over the flock: in Ph 1 he sends a greeting to the sheep in Ephesus, with bishops and deacons; 1 Ti 3 speaks of the shepherd and bishop of your souls.

In the OT the word 'elder' is used from early times of an official class having jurisdiction both civil and religious, so that when synagogues were built, the elders of the city would naturally be the elders of the synagogue, with the right of regulating the services and excluding offenders.

In NT times the idea would be carried over to the churches. It is indirectly recognized in Lk 22, but we cannot infer the existence of elders from Ac 5, for the 'young men' who carry out Anania are simply 'the young men' in v. 18 when they carry out Sapphira. There were clear cases of Christian elders at Jerusalem. In Ac 11, 30 (A.D. 30) the Synagogue of the circumcision receive the offerings from Barnabas and Saul. In 15 (A.D. 50) they take part in the Conference: in 21 (A.D. 58) they join in the welcome to St. Paul. Earlier than this may be Js 4, where there are tenants to denote officials. After this we hear no more of them till the Pastoral Epistles and 1 Peter.

For the last two hundred years it has been generally agreed that bishops and elders in the NT and for some time later are substantially identical. For (1) bishops and elders are never joined, like bishops and deacons, as distinct classes of officials. (2) Ph 1 is addressed 'to bishops and deacons.' Had there been an intermediate class of elders, it could not well have been omitted. So 1 Ti 3 speaks of the elders, though (5) there were elders at Ephesus, and had been (Ac 20) for some time. Conversely, Tit 1 describes elders instead, and nearly in the same words. (3) The bishop described to Timothy, the elders of Ac 20, like the 1 Ti 5, those described to Titus, and those of I P 5, all seem to hold a subordinate position, and to have rather pastoral duties than what we should call episcopal.

The same persons are called elders and bishops (Ac 20, 28). The words are synonymous in Clement of Rome, and (by implication) in the Teaching of the Apostles and in Polycarp. Ignatius is the first writer who makes a single bishop ruler of a Church; and even he pleads no Apostolic tradition. The general equivalence of the two offices in the Apostolic age seems undeniable; and if there were minor differences between them, none have been clearly traced. In the NT there are not even the original denoted offices at all. The words rather describe functions. Thus Ph 11 to bishops and deacons' (no article) will mean 'such as oversee and such as serve'-that is, the higher and the lower. In other titles they may bear. This would seem proved by Tit 17 that thou appoint elders, . . . for the bishop (overseer) must be blameless.' The argument is that the elder must be so and so, because the bishop is so and so. This is a repetition if the bishop is only the elder under another name, and bad logic if he is a ruler over the elders; but it becomes clear if the 'bishop' is not a defined official, but an overseer generally Then, the elder being a particular sort of overseer, the argument will be from a general rule to a particular case.

3. Appointment.—At first popular election and Apostolic institution seem to have gone together. The Seven (Ac 6) are chosen by the people and instituted by the Apostles with prayer and laying-on of hands. In the case of the Lycaonian elders (Ac 14, 22) the Apostles 'appointed' them with prayer and fasting. Similarly the elders in Crete (Tit 1, 5) are 'appointed' by Titus, and apparently the bishops at Ephesus by Timothy. In these cases popular election and laying-on of hands are not mentioned; but neither are they excluded. 1 Ti 5 does not refer to ordination at all, nor He 6 to ordination only. The Bishop is one of the laying-on of hands in restoring offenders, while the other takes the place of all occasions of laying-on of hands. In any case Timothy and Titus would have to approve the candidate before instituting him, so that the description of his qualifications is no proof that they had to select him in the first instance. Conversely, popular election of bishops is very prominent (Clement, and Teaching) in the next age; but neither does this exclude formal approval and institution. The elders are already attached (1 Ti 4) to the Apostles in the conveyance of special gifts; and when the Apostles died out, they would act alone in the institution to local office. The development of an episcopate is a further question, and very much a question of words if the bishop in the later sense was gradually developed upward from the elders. But the next stage after this was that, while the bishop instituted his own elders, he was himself instituted by the neighbouring bishops, or in still later times by the bishops of the provincial or by a metropolitan. The outline of the process is always the same. First popular election, then formal approval by authority and institution by prayer, with (at least commonly) its symbolic accompaniments of laying-on of hands and fasting. The outline of the process is always the same. 3. Duties.—(1) General superintendence: Elders in Ac 20, 1 Ti 5, 1 P 5, ruling badly; bishops in 1 Ti 5. Indicated possibly in 1 Co 12, 'helps, governments;' more distinctly in Eph 4, 'pastors and teachers,'
BISHOP'S BIBLE

BLAIN

In pointed contrast to 'apostles, prophets, and evangelists,' whose office was not local. So 1 Th 5 22 'those that are over you,' Ro 12 2 'be that ruleth,' and He 13 17, 21 'them that have the rule over you,' remind us of the bishops and elders who rule (1 Ti 5 17). So, too, 'elders' in Clement, on being bishop or elders, for these bishops plainly have no earthly superior, so that they must be themselves the rulers.

Under this head we may place the share taken by the elder in Jerusalem (Ac 15) in the deliberations of the Apostolic Conference, and (Ac 21 18) in the reception held by James; (b) elsewhere (1 Ti 4 14) in the laying-on of hands on Timothy, whether that corresponds to ordination or something else.

(2) Teaching: 1 Th 5 12 rulers admonishing in the Lord; 1 Ti 3 the bishop apt to teach; 1 Ti 5 double honour to the elders who rule well, especially those who hold in word and teaching; 2 Ti 1 7 the bishop must be able to teach, and to convince the gainsayers. Yet 1 Ti 5 seems to imply that elders might rule well who toiled in other duties than word and teaching; and if so, these were not the sole work of all elders.

Teaching is rather connected with the local ministry of apostles, prophets, and evangelists: but in their absence the whole function of public worship would devolve on the local ministry of bishops and deacons. This is quite plain in the teaching and in Clement. (3) Pastoral care: This is conspicuous everywhere.

To it we may also refer: (a) visiting of the sick (Ja 5 14) with a view to anointing and cure—not as a viaticum at the approach of death; (b) care of strangers and a furtor for the poor (1 Ti 5 1, 2 Ti 1), the bishop to be a lover of strangers. H. M. Watkin.

BISHOP'S BIBLE.—See English Versions.

BIT, BRIDLE.—The Hebrews were doubtless well acquainted with the bit, but there is no clear mention of it as distinct from the bridle, the words for which in Gr. and Lat. include both. In Ja 3 3 the context is decisive for 'bridle' (RV and AV 'bit'); in Ps 232 for 'bit and bridle' we should probably render 'bridle and halter,' and so in the other passages where the two Hebrew words respectively occur, e.g. 'bride,' Fr br, but 'halter,' Job 30 12.

In Ps 39 'bride' should certainly be 'muzzle' (cf. the corresponding verb in Dt 29 10). The crocodile's 'double bridge' (Job 40 19) is a bit, jaws, but the text is doubtful. A. R. S. Kennedy.

BITIAH ('daughter,' i.e. worshipper, 'of Jat')—The daughter of a Pharaoh, who became the wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 4). Whether Pharaoh is to be taken here as the Exxyn, royal title or as a Heb. proper name, it is difficult to determine.

BITTHON (2 S 2 2 'the gorge,' probably not a proper name).—A ravine leading to Mahamah.

BITHYNIA.—A district in the N.W. of Asia Minor, which had been a Roman province since B.C. 74. For administrative purposes it was generally binned with the province of Pontus, which bounds it on the E., under one governor. The province was senatorial till about A.D. 165, and governed by a procurator. The younger Pliny governed it from A.D. 111-113 by a special commission from the emperor Trajan. Paul and Silas were prevented by the Spirit from preaching in Bithynia (Ac 16 1), and the beginnings of Christianity there are unknown. It is probable that it came by the Black Sea. That there were churches there after St. Paul's time is certain from the address of the First Epistle of Peter, which was probably written A.D. 75-80.

BITTER HERBS (merḥēm, Ex 12 9, Nu 9).—The bitter herbs of the modern Jewish Passover in Palestine are especially lettuce and endive. Other salads, such as parsley, cress, chicory, and water-cress, are also commonly eaten, indeed are prime favourites. The author of La 3 24, in using the same word merḥēm (tr. 'bitterness'), doubtless had more bitter anese plants in his mind, perhaps the colocynt or Eccilesium daterum, the wild gourd of 2 K 4 19. See, further, PASSOVER.

BITTER WATER (lit., as RV, Water of Bitterness, Nu 14).—See JEALOUSY.

BITTERN (ls 14 23 34, Zeph 2 4).—Although the bird otisname—the Botaurus stellaris—is found in Palestine, especially in the Huleh marshes, the philological evidence is quite against this translation. The Heb. word is kippōd, and is generally accepted as the equivalent of the Arab, kunyūth, 'porcupine.' This animal suits the Scriptural requirements at least as well as the bittern. It (the Hydrus cristatus) is common all over Palestine. Large specimens measure as much as 2 ft. from the nose to the tip of the spines. The porcupine is a vegetable-eating, nocturnal animal; it is solitary in its habits, and very timid of man. It glides about in the twilight or starlight in a most weird way, giving vent at times to peculiar short grunts. When roused to self-defence, the porcupine is most dangerous; its erect quills, which pierce like a needle, make it most difficult to capture.

In all respects the porcupine is a likely to be an abode of the inhabitant of deseolate ruins untridden by the foot of man. Porcupines are eaten by both felahin and Bedouin.

BITUMEN, asphalt, or mineral pitch is an inflammable viscid substance, composed of hydrocarbons of the same series as those which constitute mineral oil or petroleum. It has in fact been described as 'petroleum hardening by evaporation and oxidation,' and may vary in consistency from a solid to a semi-liquid condition. It occurs both in Mesopotamia and Palestine. The springs at Kit, on the Ephrathah, 150 miles above Babylon, are mentioned by Herodotus (1 179), and still yield an abundant supply. There are similar springs at Kalat Sherkat, on the Tigrit, 60 miles S. of Nineveh (Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains, ii. 467). In Pal. it is found at Hæbehah, near Mt. Hermon, and in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea (hence called Asphalaitis Limen by Josephus [BJ iv. viii. 4] and Locus Asphalites by Pliny [HN v. xv. 15]). Some of the limestone strata in the last-named locality are highly bituminous, and masses of bitumen are known to float on the Dead Sea itself after earthquakes. In the OT there are three Heb. words which denote some form of this substance.

In the Flood-story körper (LXX asphalotos, EV pitch) is used in the construction of the ark (Gen 6 14). Hêmar (Gen 19 24 and RV slime) also indicates bitumen. It was employed by the early Babylonian builders (Gr 11, LXX asphalatos). Bitumen pits or wells, into which the pitchy liquid (LXX asphalatos) oozed from the earth, are mentioned as occurring in the Vale of Siddnīm, i.e. the Dead Sea basin (Gen 14 18). This is quite in keeping with the nature of the region, though such wells are not now found in it.

In Ex 2 24 hêmar is one of the substances with which the ark of bulrushes was made watertight, the other being sēpheth (EV 'pitch'). LXX includes both in the general rendering asphalopîsia, and they probably denote the more solid and the more liquid varieties of bitumen respectively. Zepheth also occurs twice in Is 34 11 (LXX psaleu, EV 'pitch'). The context makes it probable that the reference is again to bitumen.

James Patrick.

BIZIOTHIAH (Jos 15 39).—A corruption for bënôthēh 'her villages,' referring to Beerheba (cf. also Neh 11 9).

BITZAH (Est 10).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of King Ahasuerus.

BLACK.—See COLOURS, 2.

BLAIR.—A blain is an inflammatory swelling on the body. In one of the plagues of Egypt the blight became a "blain breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast" (Ex 9 11). See Botch. Medicine, BLASPHEMY

The modern use of this word is more restricted in its range than that of either of the OT or the NT. 1. In the former it is narrower in its scope than in the latter, being almost universally confined to language or deeds (1 Mac 2:29-30 derogating from the honour of God and to the worship of men (Lv 19:26; cf. 1 K 21:18, 2 K 19:26 etc.). The contemptuous scorning of sacred places was regarded as blasphemy (see 1 Mac 26:22f, cf. Ac 6:12), as was also the light and irreverent utterance of the sacred Name (Is 5:28; Ezek 36:24, Dt 23:1), the degradation of Jehovah-worship by conformity to pagan rites (Ezk 20:20), and the continued wilful transgression of Divine commands and despising of the word of the Lord (Nu 15:29). The insinuation of the local deity sticks on the Sabbath seems to be a concrete example of blasphemy (Nu 15:31).

2. When we come to the NT, the word is found more frequently, and is employed in a manner more nearly allied to the usage of classical writers. The EV has accordingly tr. it often as 'railling' or slanderous talk generally (Mt 15:12=Mk 7:26, Eph 4:29, Col 3:1, Ti 6:2, Jude 5), looked at, however, on its ethical and religious side. It is also, as a correlative verb, treated in the same way (Mt 15:26=Mt 27:28, Lk 22:29,23:39, Ro 3:14, 14:9, 1 Co 5:10, Ti 3:5, 1 P 4:1-2, 2 P 2:11, Jude 8, 9, 15), and is also the derived adjective (2 Ti 3, 2 P 20).

One of the most frequent of the charges brought by the Jews against Jesus was that of blasphemy, and when we inquire into the meaning of the accusation, we find that it was the application to Himself of Divine attributes by the Jews (Mt 26:63; Lk 19:40, 41; 22:66-71). It is interesting also to notice that this is the word put by the author of the Acts into the mouth of the town-clerk of Ephesus when he was appeasing the riotous mob who were persuaded that St. Paul and his companions had invaded the local deity (Ac 19:16).

3. The legal punishment for blasphemy was death (Lv 24:17), and so the Jews claimed the life of Jesus, as the just and lawful outcome of His words and teaching (Jn 10:30, Mt 27:28). The prevailing-martyr Stephen, for his life, too, on a charge of blasphemy (Ac 6:12, 7:59), when his enemies, in a violent and sudden fit of rage, forgot the limitation imposed on them as vessels of the Roman Empire (cf. Jn 18:12, see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, Additional Note at loc.). On the 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost,' see art. Tit, xii. 1. J. R. Willis.

BLESSEDNESS. The substantive does not occur either in AV or RV of the OT, and has rightly been expunged from the RV of Ro 4:4, Gal 4:5, where alone it had place in the AV of the NT. 'Blessed' and 'happy' are found in both Testaments as a varying translation of the same Heb. or Gr. word; 'blessed' greatly preponderates. The Biblical blessedness represents a conception of happiness, in which the religious relation is taken into account, with its emotions and its issues. In the OT these issues sometimes lie rather in material prosperity—life, long life, wealth, children, outward peace—but it is recognized that the conditions of these are spiritual (Ps 1), and in not a few instances the inward and spiritual is itself represented as the condition of true happiness (e.g. Ps 32 [but see v.16], Pr 4:7 [but see 3:12]).

In the NT the stress is decisively shifted to the spiritual content of blessedness, which may consist with the most adverse earthly conditions (Mt 5:6, 11, Lk 6:20, Ja 1:12). The thought of compensation in future reward is not absent, even from the 'Beatitudes' (esp. in their Lukan form, Lk 6:20-23), but the reward is clearly only the consummation of a blessedness already attained by the poor in spirit, the meek, the merciful, etc. In the teaching of Jesus the summum bonum appears now as place in the Kingdom of God, now as eternal life (e.g. Mt 20:20, Mk 10:28, Js 3:4-8), and both are described as a present possession (Lk 17:11-19, Jn 3:16). Finally, in the Johannine writings the religious relation, already in the OT an essential condition of blessedness (e.g. Ps 22:23f), is made supreme and in itself all-sufficing. Eternal life is personal union with Christ, revealer of the Father, by trust and fellowship (e.g. Jn 5:24, 17, 1 Jn 5:20). For so man becomes partaker of the life of Him who is Himself the 'blessed God' (1 Ti 1:3, 6f).

BLOOD. Among all primitive races the blood, especially of human beings, has been and is regarded with superstitious, or rather, to be just, religious awe. The Hebrews also always looked with peculiar sanctity as the seat of the soul (nephesh), that is of the principle of life (Lv 17:11 the life (Heb. nephesh) of the flesh is in the blood). From this fundamental condition of blood as the vehicle of life may be derived all the manifold social and religious beliefs and practices with regard to it, which play so large a part in Scripture. BOANERGES (Mk 3:6), 'Sons of Thunder.'—The Master's appellation of James and John. Jerome takes it as a reference to their fiery eloquence. Others derive it rather from their fiery disposition in early days (cf. Lk 9:54-5). It would thus be a playful yet serious sobriquet, constantly reminding them of their besetting sin and warning them to overcome it. David Smith.

BOAR. The wild boar (Arab. khanzer) is quite common in the Jordan Valley, especially in the red thicketts near the Dead Sea. It is also found on Mount Tabor. It is still noted for its destructiveness (Ps 80:5). Though a forbidden food in the Moslem, as well as the Jew (Lv 11:7, Dt 14:3), the flesh is eaten by the nominally Moslem Bedouin of Palestine. BOCHERU BOCHERU.—A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 18:26).

BOCHIM ('weepers,' Jg 20).—Unknown as a geographical site. Possibly the orig. reading was Bethel.

BODY in OT represents various Heb. words, especially that for 'flesh.' In Ex 24:11 it means, by a common idiom, 'the framework of heaven'; there is no personification. Body in NT, though the body may be the seat of sin and death (Ro 6:6; 7), is not treated with contempt (Ro 12:1, 1 Co 6:18); Ph 3:1 is a well-known mistranslation. Accordingly it could be used metaphorically of the Church, Christ being sometimes the Head and sometimes the Body itself. C. W. EMMET.

BODY-GUARD.—See ARMY, § 1, GUARD.

BOHAIRI VERSIONS.—See att. TEXT (O'and NT).

BOHAN.—A son of Reuben, acc. to Jos 19:13 (both F). The stone of Bohan is mentioned in these two passages as forming a mark of division between Judah and Benjamin. It is impossible to identify the site where it stood.

BOIL.—See MEDICINE.

BOILLED.—The boll of a plant is its seed-vessel or pod. Cf. Fitzherbert, 'The bolls of flax... made dry with the sun to get out the seed.' Thus Ex 9:11 'the boll was boiled,' means it had reached the seed stage. But the Heb. means only that it was in flower.

BOLT.—This word, which appears six times in AV (1 Si 19:12; 2Co 11:14), is the rendering of a Heb. word signifying 'the place at the head;' 'head-place,' has rightly disappeared from RV, which gives 'head' throughout. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOLT.—See HOUSE, § 6.

BOND.—1. See BAND. 2. See BILL. 3. See CHAIN.

BONDAGE, BONDMAID, BONDMAN, etc.—See SLAVE, SLAVERY.

BONES is used widely in OT as a synonym for the body, living or dead, or the person (Ps 43:5; 51). As the solid framework of the body, the bones are the seat of health and strength, so that breaking, rotteness, dryness of the bones are frequent figures for sickness or moral disorder (Pr 14:30; 17:2, 69:22). 'Bone of my bone!' answers to the English phrase 'of the same blood'; but the concluding words of Eph 5:28 should be omitted. In Lk 24:36 the unique expression seems to emphasize the nature of the Resurrection body, as different from the ordinary 'flesh and blood.' See Gibson, Thirty-Nine Articles, p. 188.

BONNET.—With the exception of Is 3:20, this is the AV designation of the special headdress of the rank and file of the priesthood according to the priestly writer (Ex 29:29, etc., RV head-tire). It consisted of a long swathe of fine white linen wound round the head—note Ex 29:20 'bind (or wind) head-tires'—to form an egg-shaped turban. Cf. Jos. Ant. 11. viii. 3; and Rich, Dict. Rom. and Or. BOOK.—1. A roll of papyrus or parchment; see WRITING. 2. A sacred or canonical document (Dn 99); see CANON of OT. 3. 'Book of life,' etc.; see next art. and ENCYCLOPEDIAS.

BOOK OF LIFE.—The legalistic conception of morality which existed among the Jews involved a record of the deeds of life on the basis of which the final judgment of God would be given. Allied with this was another conception, derived from the custom of enrolling citizens (Jer 22:14; Neh 7:11; 12:24; cf. Ex 32:30), of a list of those who were to partake of the blessings of the Messianic Age. A second natural step was to conceive of God as keeping two sets of books, a Book of Life (Dn 12:1, Mal 3:16, Ps 69:10) for the righteous, and a Book of Death for the wicked (Jub xxx 20-22).

To have one's name blotted out from the Book of Life was equivalent to complete condemnation (Eth. Enoch 108).

In the Apocalyptic writings of Judaism the Final Judgment was to be based upon the records contained in the books supposedly kept by the archangels. In some cases Rabbinical thought elaborated the figure until each man was to read and sign his record. The judgment of God was thus supposed to be based upon absolute justice, and determined by the balance of recorded good and evil deeds. In the NT are to be found references both to the books of records (Rev 20:12; cf. Dn 7:10, Eth. Enoch 89:16), and to the books containing a list of those who were to enjoy eternal life (Lk 10:14, Ph 4:19, He 12:2). Rev 3:19-21. SHAILEY MATTHEWS.

BOOT.—See ARMOUR, § 2 (d), DRESS, § 6.

BOOT.—The Heb. sukkah (note Gn 33:17) RVW was a simple structure made of the branches of trees, which the peasant erected for rest and shelter in his field or vineyard (Is 1:9). In AV and RV it is variously rendered booth, cottage, hut, pavilion, tabernacle, tent. The booth was also a convenient shelter for cattle (Gn 35:20) and for the army in the field (2 S 11:11). A. R. BOSOR (1 Mac 5:20).—A town in Gilead. The site is uncertain.

BOSORA (1 Mac 5:4).—Mentioned with Bosor. Apparently the great city of Bozrah—the Roman Bostra on the E. of Bashan, which is not mentioned in the Bible.

BOSST.—Only Job 15:19, where it is doubtful whether metal boxes for strengthening the shield are implied in the figure, or whether we should render 'the stout curves of his bucklers.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOTCH.—A botch (connected with 'best' and 'boss') is a swelling, an eruption in the skin. It occurs in reference to Dt 28:24 'the botch of Egypt.' See BLAIN, MEDICINE. The modern word is 'boil;' which is also the more common word for the same Heb. in AV. For the Eng. word see Milton PL xli. 189—'

'Botches and blains make all his flesh imbosc.'

BOTTLE.—Although glass was not unknown in Palestine before B.C. times, the various words rendered 'bottle' in AV denote almost exclusively receptacles of skin. In RV the NT revisers have wisely introduced skins and wine-skins in the familiar parable (Mt 9:15), but their OT collaborators have done so only where, as in Jos 6:1, the context absolutely required it. These skins of the domestic animals, in particular of the goat, were used not only, as we have seen, for wine, but for water (Gn 21:14), milk (Jg 4:19), oil, and other liquids. They were doubtless used, as at the present day, both tanned and untanned. In later times (Mishna), the larger skins sometimes received a coating of pitch on the inside, and were furnished at the neck with a reed to serve as a funnel.

The 'potter's earthen bottle' of Jer 19:10 was a narrow-necked wine-jar, which might also be used for honey (1 K 14:28 EV 'cruse'). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOTTOMLESS PIT.—See ABYSS.

BOW, BATTLE BOW.—See ARMOUR, 1 (d).

BOWELS.—The bowels are in Biblical language the seat of the emotions. Hence Ps 40:4 'Thy law is in the midst of my bowels,' i.e. the object of my deepest affection.
BOWL

— It is impossible to distinguish with certainty between the numerous words rendered, somewhat indiscriminately, 'cup,' 'bason,' and 'bowl.' The wandering Bedouin of to-day make little use, for obvious reasons, of the fragile products of the potter's art, preferring vessels of skin, wood, and copper. The 'lordly dish' with which Sisera was served (Jg 5:28) was a bowl, doubtless of wood; so too, perhaps, Gideon's bowl (6:11) which bears the same name. For ordinary domestic purposes bowls of glazed or unglazed earthenware were preferred, of which specimens in endless variety have been unearthed (see Pottery). Among the wealthier classes silver and even gold (1 K 18:11) were employed. Of one or other of these were doubtless the large bowls—the word elsewhere used for the sacrificial basons (wh. see)—from which the nobles of Samaria quaffed their wine (Am 6:6). Similar, probably, were the large wine-bowls, distinguished from the smaller cups, to which Jeremiah refers (Jer 35:4 RV and AV 'pots').

From the above are to be distinguished the bowl or reservoir for the oil of the 'candlestick' (Zec 4:4), the golden cup-like ornaments of the Tabernacle lampstand (Ex 25:30 AV 'bowls,' RV 'cups'), and the 'bowls of the chapters' (2 Ch 4:8) RV and AV 'pompons'. See, further, Cup, Basin, Vial.

For an important ritual use of bowls and vases, lately discovered, see House, § 3.

BOX.—The nature of the prophet's 'box of oil' (2 K 4:1, RV vial, as 1 S 10:4 AV) is unknown. Was it another name for 'the horn of oil' of 1 K 11:2? 2. For the elabster box (Mt 20:1), RV curse see Jewels and Precious Stones, ad fin. 3. For Judas' money-box (Jn 12:4 AV 'bag,' RV 'box') see Bag. 4. Nothing is known of the perfume boxes (lit. 'houses, i.e. receptacles of perfume (or perhaps ointment!)) of the Jerusalem ladies (Is 31:4 AV and RV 'tablets').

BOX-TREE (tseah'dthur, Is 41:19 60:5, Ezk 27:5).—Whether the tseah'dthur was the box-tree (Buxus longifolia) or the sherihin, mod. Arab. for theypress (Cupressus sempervirens), as RV adopts, or, as others propose, a kind of juniper, is quite unsettled. So good an authority as Post rejects the first as improbable.

BOZEZ (1 S 14:1).—A steep cliff on one side of the Michmash gorge opposite Seneh. It seems to be the northern cliff, a remarkable bastion of rock E. of Michmash.

BOZKATH.—A town of Judah (Jos 15:26, 2 K 22:1) in the plain near Lachish and Eglon. Unknown.

BOZEAH ('fortification').—1. An Edomite city only known as the place of origin of Jobab, son of Zerah, one of the Edomite kings (Gn 36:29, 1 C 14:1). It was, however, of such importance in the kingdom of Edom that it is coupled with the name of the latter in poetic parallelisms (e.g. the denunciation in Is 34:1; cf. Jer 49:3). The reference in Is 63:10 and Heb. 'dyed garments' of Bozrah, and in Mic 2:12 to 'sheep of Bozrah,' may indicate the industries for which it was noted. The guesses that have been made at its identification are of no importance. 2. A Moabite city denounced by Jeremiah (49:5), and also unknown.

BRACELETS.—See Ornaments, § 4.

BRAMLLE.—See Thorns.

BRAN.—The burning of bran for incense is mentioned in Bar 6:6 as an accompaniment of the idolatrous worship of the women of Babylon.

BRANCH.—1. The great variety of Heb. words rendered by our 'branch' may be gathered from the following list of passages, in each of which a different term is used: Gn 40:6, Ex 29:8, Nu 13:14, Is 16:10, 37:13, Jer 11:14, Zec 4:6, Ps 104:15, Job 15:18, 18:4. In the following verses RV or RVm adds or substitutes another word: Is 18:7 ('spreading branch') 259 ('song'), Ezk 17:21 ('top,' 'lofty top'), Ps 80:7 ('Heb. 810; RVm of Gn 49:10, in like manner has 'Heb. daughters'), Pr 11:2 ('leaf') Job 8:17 ('shoot'). In the NT four Greek words are translated 'branch,' but RVm points out that 'layers of leaves' are meant at Mk 11:12, and at Jn 12:21 palm-branches are in question. 2. 'Branch' is used figuratively for human offspring (Job 15:14), especially for the scion of a royal house (Dn 11:1), also for persons in lofty station (Is 9:1). The Heb. neter, properly signifying 'sprout' or 'shoot,' but rendered 'branch' (Is 11:1), is a designation of the Messianic king; not improbably this was in the Evangelist's mind when he wrote Mt 2:2. We have the same English term at Jer 23:20 255, where another word, tseamach, is a title of the Messiah, intimating that this 'shoot' should arise out of 'the low estate' of the restored remnant. Zec 3:16, following Jeremiah, actually makes Tseamach a proper name. The 'Targ. on Jer. and Zech. unhesitatingly substitutes for it 'the Messiah.'

J. Talton.

BRASS.—See Coal and Firepan.

BRASS.—Brass is an alloy of copper and zinc, the general use of which is comparatively modern. In ancient times its place was supplied by bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. Where 'copper' or 'brass' occurs, we must understand either bronze or copper itself. In some of the references, such as those to mining (Dt 8:9 'out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass') and smelting (Job 22:18 'iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is brought out of the stone') it is clear that copper alone can be meant, and RVm adopts this rendering everywhere (see on Gn 40). Copper is not found in Palestine proper, but in the Lebanon and Hermon (possibly the 'mountains of brass' of Zec 9:12). Weapons of copper have been found at Tell el-Hesay (dating from c. B.C. 1500). From very early times copper was largely worked by the Egyptians in the Sinaitic peninsula, where traces of the mining and smelting are still to be seen. A full account of these operations and their remains is given in Flinders Petrie's Researches in Sinai.

BRAVERY.—In Is 28:8 'the bravery of their thinking ornaments,' bravery means splendour, ostentation. The word is connected with 'brag.'

BRAZEN SEA.—See Temple.

BRAZEN SERPENT.—See Serpent [Brazen].

BREACH.—'Breach' is a literal trans. of the Heb. In 2 S 6:1 and Ch 13:1 'the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah,' and in Job 16:11 'He breaketh me with breaches upon breach.' The word in such places is used figuratively of an outburst of wrath.

BREAD.—The pre-eminence of bread in the diet of the Hebrews is shown by the frequent use in OT, from Gn 28:2 onwards, of 'bread' for food in general. It was made chiefly from wheat and barley, occasionally mixed, more especially in times of scarcity, with other ingredients (Ezk 4:11; see Foon). Barley was earlier in the main breadstuff of the peasantry (Jg 7:19) and poorer classes generally (Jn 6:11, cf. Jos 10:1, v. x. 2). The first step in bread-making, after thoroughly sifting and cleaning the grain, was to reduce it to flour by rubbing, pounding, or grinding (cf. Nu 11:1). In the next process, East yet extinct in Egypt for certain grains, the grain was rubbed between two stones, the 'corn-grinders' or 'corn-grinders,' of which numerous specimens have been found at Lachish and Gezer (PB 82, 1905; 230; 1903, 118; cf. Erman, Egypt. 180 for Hilt, of actual use). For the other two processes see Mortar and Mill respectively. Three qualities of flour are distinguished—a coarser sort got by the use of the pestle and mortar, the 'beaten (RV 'brusled')

BREASTPLATE.—See Armour, 2 (q).

BREASTPLATE (of the High Priest).—In the directions for the official dress of the high priest, as laid down by the priestly writer, a prominent place is occupied by the breastplate or pectoral. The fuller designation 'the breastplate of judgment' (Ex 28:14, 15) is significant of the purpose of the breastplate, which was to form a fitting receptacle for pouch for the Urim and Thummim (wh. see), by means of which judgment was pronounced. The special directions for the making of the breastplate are given in Ex 28:18-28 (cf. 30:2-6). It was made of an oblong piece of richly wrought linen, which, folded in two, formed a square of half a cubit, or 9 inches, in the side. Attached to the outer side were four rows of precious stones in gold settings, twelve in all, each stone having engraved upon it the name of a tribe 'for a memorial before J' continually' (28:19). The breastplate was kept in position by means of two cords of 'wreathen work' of gold, by which it was attached to a couple of gold 'euches' (probably rosettes of gold filigree) on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, while the lower part was fastened to the ephod by a 'lace of blue' (28:27) at each corner.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—Jesus was Mary's first-born (Lk 2:7), and she subsequently (according to the view accepted in the present article) bore to Joseph other sons, James, Josephus, Judas, and Simon, and several daughters (Mt 13:54-56; Mk 6:3). During His ministry the Lord's brethren did not believe in Him. They sneered at Him (Jn 7:4-5), and once they concluded that He was mad, and wished to arrest Him and convey Him away from Capernaum (Mk 3:21-22). After the Resurrection, however, convinced by so tremendous a demonstration, they joined the company of the believers (Ac 1:14).

In early days, partly at least in the interests of the notion of Mary's perpetual virginity, two theories were promulgated in regard to the 'Brethren of the Lord.' (a) They were supposed to be sons of Joseph by a former marriage, having thus no blood-relationship with Jesus. So Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Epiphanius. (b) They were held to be His cousins, sons of Mary, the wife of Alphæus (Mt 27:56—Mk 15:46); 'brother' here implying only kindship, as Alphæus himself must be Lot's 'brother' (Gn 19:14), and Laban calls Jacob, his sister's son, his 'brother' (298). So Jerome and Augustine. That Mary, the wife of Alphæus and mother of James the Little, was a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, is an inference from Jn 19, where it is supposed that only three women are mentioned: (1) His mother, (2) His mother's sister, viz., Mary, the wife of Clopas (=Alphæus), and (3) Mary Magdalene. But there are probably four: (1) His mother, (2) her sister Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee (cf. Mt. = Mk.), (3) Mary, the wife of Clopas, and (4) Mary Magdalene. It is very unlikely that two sisters should have been named Mary; and moreover, James, the son of Alphæus, was an Apostle (Mt 10:4—Mk 3:18—Lk 6:14), and none of the Lord's brethren was an Apostle in His lifetime (cf. Ac 1:14-21).

BRIEFS.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 5.

BRICK.—The use of sun-dried bricks as building material in OT times, alongside of the more durable limestone, is attested both by the excavations and by Scripture references (see HOUSE). The process of brick-making shows the same simplicity in every age and country. Suitable clay is thoroughly moistened, and reduced to a uniform consistency by tramping and kneading (Nah 3° RV 'go into the clay, and tread the mortar'). It then passes to the brick-moulder, who places the measured quantity in his mould, an open wooden frame with one of its four sides prolonged as a handle, wiping off the superfluous clay with his hand. The mould is removed and the brick left on the ground to dry. Sometimes a greater consistency is given to the clay by mixing it with chopped straw and a refuse of the threshing-floor, as related in the familiar passage Ex 5°-12. As regards the daily 'tale of bricks' there referred to, an expert moulder in Egypt to-day is said to be able to turn out no fewer than 'about 3000 bricks per day!' (Vigouroux, "Dict. de la Bible," 1893). The Egyptian bricks resembled our own in shape, while those of Babylonia were generally as broad as they were long. According to Flinders Petrie, the earliest Palestine bricks followed the Babylonian pattern.

There is no evidence in OT of the making of kiln-burnt bricks, which was evidently a foreign custom to the author of Gn 11. The brickkiln of 2 S 12°, Nah 3° is really the brick-mould (so RV). In the obscure passage Jer 43° RV has brickwork. A curious ritual use of bricks as incense-altars is mentioned in Is 61°-6.

Reference may also be made to the use of clay as a writing material, which was introduced into Palestine from Babylonia, and, as we now know, continued in use in the main quarters till the time of Haszeel and beyond. Plans of buildings, estates, and cities were drawn on such clay tablets, a practice which illustrates the command to Ezekiel to draw a plan of Jerusalem upon a brick (cf., see elaborate note by Haupt in "Ezekiel" (PB), 98 ff.). A. R. S. KENNE DLY.

BRIE/D, BRIDGROOM.—See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGE.—Only 2 Mac 12° AV, where RV reads the proper name Gephorun. For the extreme antiquity of the arch see Arch.

BRIDLE.—See Btt.

BRIER.—See Thorns.

BRIGANDINE.—The 'brigand' was originally simply a light-armed irregular foot soldier, and the coat of mail which he wore was called a 'brigandine.' The word is used in Jer 46° 51° (RV 'coat of mail'). See Armour.

BRIMSTONE, or sulphur, is one of the chemical elements. It is found in volcanic regions both uncombined as a deposit and also as a constituent of the gases (sulphur dioxide and sulphur trioxide (hydrogen sulphydrine) which are exhaled from the earth or dissolved in the water of hot springs. Such sulphur springs are abundant in the Jordan Valley and on the shores of the Dead Sea. The account of the destruction of the Cities of the Plain (Gn 19°, 18, Lk 17°) states that the Lord rained upon them 'brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven,' and the most generally accepted view is that the disaster was due to an eruption of petroleum, caused by an earthquake. This is more probable on geological grounds than a volcanic eruption. In either case the 'brimstone' would not be solid sulphur, but the choking gasses mentioned above, which would accompany the rain of fire (see Driver, in loc.: Tristram, Land of Israel, 332; Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 1291.). This passage suggests the imagery of a number of others in which 'fire and brimstone' are agencies of destruction (Ps 11°, Ezek 38°, Rev 9°, 14°, 19° (21°, 24°). In the last the peculiar feature of the 'lake' may be a reminiscence of a volcanic crater filled with molten lava and exhaling sulphurous fumes (cf. the great mountain burning with fire, Rev 9°). In Dt 28° there is a warning that if Israel is disobedient, their whole land will be 'brimstone and salt,' like the desolate region round the Dead Sea. In Is 34° a similar threat is uttered against Edom. In Is 30° the 'breath of the Lord' kindling Tophet, is like a stream of brimstone.
BROWN

The body to which this love belongs is called 'the brotherhood' in 1 P 2:1 (also 5:9), where 'love to the brotherhood' is associated with respect for humanity and fear of God as a fundamental Christian instinct (cf. 1 Th 4:10, Gal 6:20). St. Paul describes this affection as the mutual 'care' of 'members' of 'one body' (1 Co 12:22-27): it forbids envy, unkindness, schism; it animates, and virtually includes, all services and duties of Christians towards each other (1 Co 13, Gal 5:13)); it is the first 'fruit of the Spirit' (Gal 5:16, of which 5:17, the fruit of God's love to us and the test of our love to God (1 Jn 2:5-6), 'the fulfillment of the law' (Ro 13:8-9), and the crown of Christian purity (1 P 15); the Cross supplies its model and its inspiration (Eph 4:25-6, 1 Jn 3:8). When St. Paul speaks of 'love,' he means 'brother-love' in the first place, but not exclusively (Gal 6:1, 1 Th 5:8, 12, Ro 13:8-9; cf. Mt 5:44-48 etc.). Amongst the manifestations of philadelphia, hospitality (philoxenia) is conspicuous (He 13:1-2, 1 P 4:7-10, 1 Jn 3:11), also 'communication' or 'ministering to the necessities of the saints' (Ro 12-15, 13:8-10, 1 Jn 2:11). The prominence, and strangeness to the world, of this feature of primitive Christianity are strikingly attested by the Epistle to Diogneta, § 1, Tertullian's Apol., § 39, and (from outside) Lucian's de Morte Peregrini, xii. 18, and Julia's Epist. 49.

BROWN.—See Colours, § 2.

BRUIT.—A bruit (pronounced as bruite) is a rumour of (Fr. bruit, from bruire to roar). Thus 2 Mac 4:3 the bruit of his manliness was spread everywhere; Nah 3:9 'all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the bands over thee.'

BUCKET.—See House, 9.

BUCKLE.—See Ornaments, § 5.

BUCKLER.—See Armour, 2 (g).

BUCEGAN.—A descriptive epithet applied to Haman in Ad. Est. 12a RV (AV has 'Agagite'). Bucegus occurs in Homer (II, xiii. 204, Od. xvi. 19) as a term of reproach = 'bully' or 'braggart.' Whether the Sept. intended it in this sense, or as a gentile adjective, is wholly uncertain.

BUILDER.—See Arts and Crafts, 3.

BUKKI.—1. Son of Jobg, a prince of the tribe of Dan, and one of the ten men entrusted with the task of dividing the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel (Nu 34:21). 2. Son of Abishua and father of Uzi, fifth in descent from Aaron in the line of the high priests through Phinehas (1 Ch 6:41, Exz 74). In 1 J Is 46 he is called Bocca, for which Borith is substituted in 2 Es 15.

BUKKIAH.—A Levite of the sons of Heman, and leader of the sixth band or course in the Temple service (1 Ch 25:12).

BUL.—1 K 6:4, the Canaanite name for the month which the Babylonians termed Marcheshvan. See Tmr.

BULL, BULLOCK.—See ox.

BULRUSH.—See Reen.

BULWARK.—See Fortification and Siegecraft.

BUHNAH ('intelligence').—A man of Judah, a son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2:23).

BUNCH.—Besides meaning bundle (of hyssop, Ex 12:19), Heb. 'something tied together' and cluster (of raisins, 2 S 16:1, 1 Ch 12:8, Heb. 'something dried'), bunch is used also for the hump of a camel in Is 58:7. Cf. Shaka. Rich. III. 1. iii. 248—

'This pious bunch-back'd toad.'

BUNDLE.—A bundle of money is spoken of in Gn 42:28, of myrrh in Ca 14, of life in 1 S 25:25 (on wh. see Eep. Times, xvii. 450); also in Jer 10:19 RV a bundle for a journeyman (Dean's Jer. p. 214); and in NT of tares (Mt 13:24) and of sticks (Ac 28:17).

BUU, Neh 9:10,118, but in each case perhaps the text is corrupt.

BURDEN.—The word so rendered in the OT is derived from a root which means 'to lift' or 'carry.' It has the two senses of an actual burden and a moral utterance.Instances of the former are 2 K 5:7, Neh 13:4, Nu 4:4. Related usages are frequent; in Is 22:9 the word suggests the pressure of something hanging on heavily. In Nu 11:13 the privilege of government, in Ps 88:2 the responsibility for sin. The second sense is that of a solemn utterance, and the marginal alternative 'oracle' (Is 14:20 et al.) is to be preferred: it was our tendency to explain the use of the word as due to the threatening character of the utterance; but many of the utterances are not threatening (cf. Zec 12:9, 14:7; in Pr 30:17 and 31:1 RV puts 'oracle' in the text and 'burden' in the margin), and the word-play in Jer 23:20 involves a reproof of the men who were disposed to regard the oracle of God as literally a burden. Most utterances of the prophets, moreover, were of necessity of their occasion minatory. 'Burden' in this second usage denotes simply something taken up solemnly upon the lips, both weighty in itself and weighty in its communication. It is not used of merely human utterances, but always conveys with it the suggestion of Divine inspiration, actual or falsely assumed (La 2:20). In the NT, Ac 21:1 is an instance of the literal use. The figures are easy. The word is used for the ordinances of the Law as interpreted by the Pharisees (Mt 23, Lk 11:4), for the prohibitions of the Apostolic decree (Ac 15:28; cf. Rev 21), for the pressure and load of life (Mt 20:4), for an exacting or even legitimate charge upon others (2 Co 11:12f.), for the imagined difficulties of following Christ (Mt 11:28). Two other kinds of burdens with their right treatment are contrasted. Other men's errors and sorrows must be shared in sympathy (Gal 6:1); though in the service of Christ there can be no transfer of obligations, but each man must carry his own kit and do his own duty (Gal 6:11).—R. W. MOSS.

BURIAL.—See Mourning Customs, Tomb.

BURNING.—See Crimes and Punishments, § 11.

BURNING BUSH.—See Job.

BURNT-OFFERING.—See Sacrifice.

BUSH (seneh, Ex 3:1, De 33:1).—The 'burning bush' has traditionally been supposed to be a kind of harrame (Rubus), of which Palestine has several varieties, but one of the thorny shrubs of Sinai of the acids family would seem more probable. Sacred bushes and trees are common in Palestine and Arabia. 'In (or at) the bush' in Mt 12:15 Lk 20:17 the passage dealing with the burning bush (RV 'in the place concerning the bush').

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BUSHEL.—See Weights and Measures.

BUTLER.—See Cupbearer.

BUTTER.—See Food, Milk.

BUZ.—1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah, and nephew of Abraham (Gn 22:22). Elihu, one of the friends of Lot (Job 32), is called a Buzite, and may have belonged to a tribe of that name against which judgments are denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 29:2). 2. A man of the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5:9).

BUZI.—The father of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. 1) and consequently a member of the priestly house of Zadok. Of the man himself nothing is known. Jewish writers were led to identify him with Jeremiah partly by a supposed connection of the name with a verb meaning 'deepse,' and partly by a theory that when the father of a prophet is named it is to be understood that he also was a prophet.

BUZITE.—See Buz.
BY.

BY—In the Authorized Version is generally used for the agent and by for the instrument. Thus Mt 1:22, 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of (RV 'by') the Lord by (RV 'through') the prophet.' In 1 Co 4:4, 'I know nothing by myself,' by means contrary to, against, as in Hamilton's Catechism, 1559 (the Tabli), 'Jugis quihilk fur lufe of reweirds dos only thing by the ordour of justices'; also fol. vii., 'curst thair quihilk gaiasis by ye commandis of God.'

BY AND BY.—In AV 'by and by' means immediately, not as after some time. Thus Lk 21:11 'the end is not by and by' (RV 'immediately').

BYWAY.—See ROADS.

CAB.—See Weights and Measures.

CABBON (Jos 19:49).—A town of Judah near Eglon. See Machhena.

CABIN.—The Eng. word 'cabin' is now chiefly confined to an apartment in a ship, but was formerly used of any small room. It occurs in AV for the cell (which is the word in AV and RV) in which Jesus was confined (Jcr 37:15). Cf. Spenser, FQ v. i. 25:—'So long in secret cabin there he held Her captive to his sensual desire.'

CABUL (Jos 19:17, 1 K 9:6).—A town of Asher on the border of Zebulun. The district was ceded by Solomon to Tyre. Prob. the large village Kabul, R. of Acco.

CÆSAR.—This is the cognomen or surname of the gens Julia, which was borne, for example, by its most illustrious representative, Calixtus Julius Cæsar. The emperor Augustus (b.c. 29-A.d. 14) had it by adoption, and was officially named 'Imperator Caesar Augustus.' His stepson, the emperor Tiberius, officially 'Tiberius Caesar Augustus' (A.D. 14-37), had it through his adoption by Augustus. It was borne also, amongst other less important persons, by the emperor Calixtus Caesar Germanicus (nicknamed 'Caligula,' 'Boots') (A.D. 37-41), who was a son of Germanicus, the adopted son of the emperor Tiberius. These alone among the Roman emperors had it as a family name, but all the emperors bore it as a title except Vitellius (A.D. 69), and hence we find it continued in the title Kaiser and Czar. The beginning of this use is seen in the NT. There the name is found always, except twice (Lk 21:3), by itself, or simply equal to 'the Emperor.' The remaining emperors of the 1st cent. are Claudius (wh. see), Nero (wh. see), Galba (9 June 68-15 Jan. 69), Otho (15 Jan.-25 Apr. 69), Vitellius (2 Jan. 69-20 Jan. 1 Dec. 70), Vespasian (69-79), Titus (71-99), Domitian (81-96), Nerva (96-98), Trajan (97-106). A. SOUTER.

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.—In Ph 4:2, 'they that are of Cæsar's house' send special greetings to the Philippians. St. Paul wrote from Rome, where he was in semi-captivity, and of the Christians in Rome belonged to the efficient and talented body of slaves and freedmen who worked in the Imperial palace and performed varied service for the emperor Nero. The number of these servants was very large, and amongst them were accountants, governors of provinces, secretaries, stewards, etc., as well as a great many officials concerned with humble duties. They were persons of influence and often of considerable wealth, drawn from all nations within the Empire. The testimony of inscriptions makes it certain that most of the persons named in Ro 16 were of Cæsar's household. A. SOUTER.

CÆSAREA (mod. Kaisarâteh).—A city rebuilt by Herod the Great on the site of Strato's Tower, on the coast of Palestine, between the mouth of Dora. Its special features were—a large harbour protected by a huge mole and by a wall with 10 lofty towers and colonn; a promenade round the port, with arches where sailors could lodge; a temple of Augustus raised on a platform, and visible far out at sea, containing two colossal statues of Rome and the Emperor; a system of drainage whereby the tides were utilized to flush the streets; walls embracing a semicircular area stretching for a mile along the sea-coast; two aqueducts, one of them 8 miles in length, displaying Caesar's engineering skill; an amphitheatre capable of seating 20,000 persons; a theatre; a court of justice, and many other noble structures. The city took 12 years to build, and Herod celebrated its completion (A.D. 10-13) with sumptuous games and entertainments which cost £120,000. Herod used the port for his frequent voyages. Here he condemned to death his two sons Alexander and Aristobulus. After the death of Herod's successor Archelaus, Cæsarea became the official residence of the Roman procurators of Palestine (broken only by the brief interval during which it was under the independent rule of Herod Agrippa I., who met his tragic death here in a.c. 44 [Ac 12:14]). The fifth of these, Pontius Pilate, ordered a massacre in the hippodrome of Cæsarea of those Jews who had flocked to implore the removal from Jerusalem of the profane eagle standards and images of the Emperor recently introduced. Only on their baring their necks for death and thus refusing to submit, did Pilate revoke the order, and direct the envoys to be removed. Christianity early found its way here, Philip probably being the founder of the Church (Ac 8:1), while Paul passed through after his first visit to Jerusalem (Ac 19:3). Cæsarea was the scene of the baptism of Cornelius (Ac 10). Here also the Holy Spirit for the first time fell on a Gentile, thus inaugurating the Gentile Pentecost (v. 44). Paul may have passed through Cæsarea (Ac 18:2) at the time when numbers of Jewish patriots, captured by Oomans, had here been crucified by Quadratus, legate of Syria. It was at Cæsarea, that Paul's arrest in Jerusalem was foretold by Arabus (Ac 21:13). Here he was imprisoned for two years under Felix (Ac 23). During that time a riot broke out between Greeks and Jews as to their respective rights, and Felix ordered a general massacre of the Jews to be carried out in the city. On the recall of Felix, Nero sent Porcius Festus, who tried Paul (Ac 25:8) and also allowed him to state his case before Herod Agrippa II. and Bernice (Ac 26). The wickedness of the last procurator, Gaius Florus, finally drove the Jews into revolt. A riot in Cæsarea led to a massacre in Jerusalem, and simultaneously 20,000 of the Jewish population of Cæsarea were slaughtered. During the Great War, Cæsarea was used as the base for operations, first by Vespasian, who was here proclaimed Emperor by his soldiers (A.D. 69), and latterly by his son Titus, who completed the destruction of Jerusalem. The latter celebrated the birthday of his brother Domitian by forcing 2500 Jews to fight with beasts in the arena at Cæsarea. The city was made into a Roman colony, renamed Colonia Prima Plovia Augusta Caesarea, released from taxation, and recognized as the capital of Palestine.

Several Church Councils were held at Cæsarea. It was from A.D. 200 to 431 the residence of the Metropolitan bishop. of Palestine. Origen taught there, and Eusebius was its bishop. In A.D. 529 the Christians were massacred by Jews under Aba Obeda. In 638 it surrendered to the Moslems under Abu Obeida. It was recovered in 1102 by Baldwin I., when Moslem occupation ceased. The Caliph, however, reoccupied it in 1182. This is not explained by the chroniclers; probably it was thought of it as something which rendered Cain sacrilege; so that, according to a deeply rooted Semitic conception, it would be a defilement and a crime to touch him (see art. Abel). Thus, and he dwelt (v. 4) in the land of Nod ('Wanderland').

The fact that the story appears to describe conditions long subsequent to those of the first pair has led many writers to hold that Cain is the eponym of a tribe, and that the tradition was intended to explain the wild and wandering life of Arabian nomads. This kind of life, so different from the prosperous peace of settled agricultural communities, must have been the result of a primitive curse, incurred by some crime. And the narrative relates that the settled, agricultural Cainite tribe ruthlessly destroyed members of an adjacent tribe of pastoral habits; that the fear of strict blood-revenge was so great that the Cainites were obliged to leave their country, and become wandering nomads; and that some tribal sign or badge—such as a tattoo, or incisions in the flesh—was adopted, which marked its possessors as being under the protection of the Cainitic god. It is further conjectured, owing to the formation of the two names from the same root, that 'Cain' stands for the Kenites (cf. Nu 24:21, Jg 4:7 with RV). See Driver, Genesis, p. 72.

(6) vv.17-24 seem to contain a different tradition, but incorporated also by J. Cain's erection of a city scarcely seems to harmonize with his being a fugitive and a wanderer in fear of his brother. The question was, however, to explain the origin of early arts and social conditions—e.g. the beginnings of city-life (v. 17), polygamy (v. 18), nomad life (v. 19), music (v. 20), metallurgy (v. 21).

2. The value of the story lies, as always, in its religious teaching. We know not of how much crude superstition and polytheism the tradition may have been divested by the prophetic writer who edited it. But in its present form, the connexion of Cain with Adam and Eve suggests the thought of the terrible effects of the Fall; the next generation reaches a deeper degree of guilt; Cain is more hardened than Adam, in that he feels no shame but boldly tries to conceal his crime; and the punishment is worse; it is not merely to work the ground with labour, but Cain would not henceforth receive from the earth her strength. The story teaches also the sacredness of human life, the moral holiness of God, and the truth that a result of sin is a liability to succumb to further sin (v. 25).

3. In the NT Cain is referred to in He 11, Jude 1, 1 Jn 3. The latter passage must be explained by v. 19. The children of God—poca children of God—cannot sin; and conversely the children of the devil cannot do righteousness or love one another. Cain, then, murdered his brother because he belonged to the latter category, and his brother to the former.

A. H. M. NEIL.

CAIN.—1. The son of Enos and father of Mahaleel (Lk 3:38). See KENAN. 2. The son of Arphaxad (Lk 3:38), which follows LXX of Gn 10:4 110). The name is wanting in the Heb. text of the last two passages.

CAKE.—See BREAD.

CALAH.—The Kolach of the inscriptions, one of the great fortresses which must have stood to the fall of Nineveh (cf. Jon 4:8 and the Greek writers) were supposed to mark up that city. Both Nineveh and Calah were, however, always separate in structure and in administration. Calah lay on the site of the great modern mounds of Nimrud, as was first proved by the explorer Layard.
CALAMOLALUS

In Gn 10:11 it is said to have been founded by Nimrod, and, along with Nineveh and other cities, to have formed part of the great city. It was the capital, or at least the chief royal residence, under several of the greatest Assyrian kings, whose palaces have been excavated by modern explorers. Here also was found the famous black obelisk of Shalmaneser II.

CALAMOLALUS (1 Es 5:8).—A corrupt place-name, probably due to a conglomeration of the two names Lod and Hadid in Ezr 2:9 (cf. Neh 7:7).

CALAMUS.—See Reed.

CALCOL.—A Judahite, a descendant of Zerah (1 Ch 2:9), otherwise described in 1 K 4:18 (where AV has Chalcol) as a son of Mahol, famous for wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon.

CALDRON.—See House, § 9.

CALEB (‘dog,’ one of the numerous animal names in the OT which testify to early totemistic conceptions).—The son of Jephunneh (Nu 13:13). As an individual, he appears as one of the spies who were sent to ‘spy out the land’ of Canaan. He represented the tribe of Judah, and, together with Joshua, advocated an immediate attack upon the land; the fear of the people he denounced as rebellion against Jahweh (Nu 14:9); this, however, is resented by the people, who threaten to destroy him and Joshua. The carrying of the ark was threatened by the appearance of the Shekinah (‘the glory of the Lord’) in the tabernacle (v.21). As a reward for his faithfulness Caleb is specially singled out for Jahweh’s favour (Nu 14:14, 18, 20, 30, 34). He is thus one of the greatest champions of Jahweh.

As a name of a das, Caleb (=Calebites) formed a branch of the children of Kenaz, an Edomite tribe, who settled in the hill-country north of the Negeb; they had possessions also in the Negeb itself (Jos 14:17-19, 1 S 30:4, 1 Ch 2:44); they ultimately became absorbed in the tribe of Judah.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

CALEB-EPHRAHTAH.—Named in 1 Ch 2:24 as the place where Hezron died. It is not improbable, however, that we should read: ‘after Hezron died, Caleb came unto Ephrath the wife of Hezron his father.’

CALENDAR.—See Time.

CALF, GOLDEN.—The incident of ‘the golden calf’ is related in detail in Ex 32 (cf. Dt 9:24), a chapter which belongs to the composite Prophetic source of the Pentateuch (JE). At the request of the people, who had begun to despair of Moses’ return from the mount, Aaron consented to make a god who should go before them on the journey to Canaan. From the golden ear-rings of their wives and children he fashioned an image of a young bull; this, rather than ‘calf,’ is the rendering of the Heb. word in the present connexion. The view that ‘calf’ is diminutive and sarcastic for bull is precluded by the use of the word elsewhere to denote the young but mature animal. A ‘feast to Jh’ was proclaimed for the following day, and an altar erected on which sacrifice was offered. The sequel tells of Moses’ return, of the destruction of the image, and finally of Moses’ call to his tribesmen, the sons of Levi, to prove their zeal for the pure worship of Jh by taking summary vengeance on the backsliders, 3000 of whom fell by their swords.

A few centuries later, new images again emerge in the history of Israel. Among the measures taken by Jeroboam I. for the consolidation of his new kingdom was one which was primarily designed to secure its independence of the rival kingdom of the South in the all-important matter of public worship. With this end in view, perhaps also with the subsidiary purpose of reconciling the priesthood of the local sanctuaries to the new order of things, Jeroboam set up two golden ‘calves,’ one at Bethel and the other at Dan, the two most important sanctuaries, geographically and historically, in his realm (1 K 12:28-32, 2 Ch 11:14). Of the workmanship of Jeroboam’s ‘calves,’ as of that of Aaron, it is impossible to speak with certainty. The former probably, the latter possibly (cf. Ex 32:20), consisted of a wooden core overlaid with gold. The view that the Heb. term necessarily implies that the statues were small, has been shown above to be groundless. It is also uncertain whether the other chief sanctuaries of the kingdom were at a later period provided with similar images, the leading passage (Am 8:14) being capable of a different interpretation.

With regard to the religious significance of this action on the part of Jeroboam, it is now admitted on all hands that the bulls are to be recognized as symbols of Jh. He, and He alone, was worshipped both in the wilderness (see Ex 32 ‘a feast to Jh’) and at Bethel and Dan under the symbol of the golden bull. For the source of this symbolism we must not look to Egypt, as did the scholars of former days, but to the primitive religious concepts which, however, have been the object of much discussion by modern scholars.

A comparison of Ex 32 with 1 K 12:28 shows that the two narratives have a literary connexion, of which the former is an embodiment, and the latter an explication. Thus, it is not improbable that the story of the golden calf of Bethel was a part of the tradition which Jeroboam acquired from the Canaanites, and was an episode in the same story of the golden calf of Dan.

CALTITAS.—The name of a city which is said to have been burnt by a certain David (1 Ch 19:13, 18; 2 Ch 14:15), and which is perhaps identical with the modern Calan (Kulanhu), now six miles from Arpad.

CALLISTHENES (2 Mac 8:4).—A Syrian, captured by the Jews in a small house, where he had taken refuge after the great victory over Nicanor and Corgias, in 165 (cf. 1 Mac 4:30). At a festival in celebration of the victory, the Jews burnt Callisthenes to death, because he had set fire to the portals of the Temple (cf. 1 Mac 4:39).

CALNEH, CALNO.—1. Calneh is associated in Gn 10:13 with Babylon, Erech, and Accad as the earliest cities of Shinar. The Talmudic assertion that ‘Calneh means Nippur’ receives some support from the age and importance of Nippur, but it is not known that this was ever the name of that city. Kultum, the early name of an important city near Babylon, may be meant.

2. Calneh, linked with Hamath and Gath in Am 6:5, is probably the Kullin (Kullan) associated with Arpad and Hadrach, Syrian cities, in the Assyrian ‘tribute’ lists. Kullanhu now six miles from Arpad.

3. Calno,
CALVARY
compared with Carchemish in Is 10', is probably the same as No. 2.
C. H. W. Johns.
CALVARY (Lk 23-39).—See Golgotha.
CALVES OF THE LIPS. — Hos 10 (AV 'so will we render the calves of our lips'; RV . . . . . [the offering of our lips'], an obscure passage. A very slight change of the MT yields the LXX and Syr. rendering 'the fruit of our lips.'
CAMEL.—The bones of camels are found among the remains of the earliest Semitic civilization at Gezer, B.C. 3000 or earlier. They are day beasts. These magnificent beasts may sometimes be encountered coming across the Jordan into Galilee or on the Jericho-Jerusalem road. The C. dromedarius is kept chiefly for burden-bearing, and enormous are the loads thus transported, especially by a good camel, stone, furniture, and百货, which the patient animals carry: 600 to 800 lbs. are quite average loads. Their owners often ride on the top of the load, or on the empty baggage-saddle when required. Moslem women and children are carried on a kind of palanquin—the camel's furniture of Gn 31 M. For swift travelling a different breed of camel known as hajin is employed. Such a camel will carry a Moslem's baggage at eight to ten miles an hour, and keep going eighteen hours in the twenty-four. These animals are employed near Beerseba, and also regularly to carry the mails across the desert from Damascus to Baghdad. They may be the 'camels' of Ez. 31 M. Camels are bred by countless thousands in the lands to the E. of the Jordan, where they form the most valuable possessions of the Bedouin, as they did of the Midianites and Amalekites of old (Jg 20). The Bedouin live largely upon camels and the Bactrian, two-humped camelus bactrianus, which comes from the plateau of Central Asia. This latter is to-day kept in considerable numbers by Turkomans settled in the Jazulus, and long common. It is able to traverse deserts quite unadapted to the slender foot of the horse and the sea. On slippery soil, rock or mud, the camel is, however, a helpless flounderer. The camel's food is chiefly thorn (chopped straw), kurusseneh, beans, oil-cake, and occasionally some grain. There seems, however, to be no reserve of our lips'); etc. (Mt 19), as types of ordinary Oriental proverbs (cf. the Talmudic expression 'an elephant through a needle's eye') than to weave fancied and laboured explanations. The present writer agrees with Fosh that the gate called the 'needle's eye' is a fabrication. E. W. G. Markman.
CAMEL'S HAIR.—See CAMEL, DRESS, § 1.
CAMON.—See KAMON.
CAMP.—See WAR.
CAMPHIRE (köppher, Ca Th 41 M) is the henna plant (Lawsonia alba), a small shrub which may still be found in Egypt. It is a great favourite with the people of Palestine to-day, and a 'cluster' of the flowers is often put in the hair; the perfume is much admired. It is also extensively used for staining the hands (especially the nails), the feet, and the hair; it stains an ochre-red, but further treatment of the nails with a mixture of lime and ammonia turns the colour almost black. Old women frequently redye their hair, and Moslems their beards, by means of henna. E. W. G. Markman.
CANA.—A Galilean village, where Christ turned water into wine (Jn 2) and healed with a word a nobleman's son who lay sick at Capernaum (4 M). Nathanael was a native of this place (21). Three 'Canes' have been suggested as identifications of one of which would satisfy the meagre indications. These are Canatan el-Jalut, perhaps the most probable, north of Suffurieh; 'At el-Kana, east of Nazareth; and Kana, north-east of Nazareth, the same town. The last is the site fixed upon by ecclesiastical tradition. R. A. S. Macalister.
CANAAN.—See next art.; HAM, PALESTINE.
CANAANITES.—A name given in the J document to the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine (e.g. Gn 24-7 85, Ex 33 17 13 2; Nu 14: 45 21. 5. Jg 11. 5, 17, 28, 29, 30, 31).
In this usage the E document concurs, though the E document generally calls them 'Amorites' (vii, sec.). The E document (Nu 13) says that the Canaanites dwell by the sea, and the Amorites in the mountains. All the writers unite in calling Palestine the land of Canaan. Opinion differs as to whether the people were named from the land or the land from the people. The earliest usage in the el-Amarna tablets (where it is called Kinyah and Kinyah) and in the Egyptian inscriptions of the XIXth dynasty, seems to confine the name to the low land of the coast (cf. KIB v. 50 41, 151. 50; and Müller, Asien und Europa, 205 ff.). The Phoenicians, much later, on their coins called their land Canana; and two or three Greek, as Chana or Chana, which they called Chon (cf. Schroder, Phn. Sprache, 6 ff.). A view proposed by Rosenmüller has been held by many modern scholars, viz. — that Canaan means 'lowland,' and was applied to the seacoast of Palestine, as opposed to the central range and the Lebanon. If this view were correct, the Canaanites would have received their name after settling in the coast-land. This view has been proved incorrect by Moore (Proc. of Am. Or. Soc. 1800, p. 127 ff.). Probably 'Cana'anite' was a tribal name, and the people gave their name to the land (cf. Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine, 68). It appears from Dt 4 that the language of the Canaanites differed only dialectically from that of the Amorites. Both peoples were therefore closely related. Probably the Canaanites were a later wave of Amorites. In Is 19 Hebrew is called 'the language of Canaan—a stammering tongue substituted by the Moabitite Stone, the Phoenician inscriptions, and the Hebrew idioms in the el-Amarna tablets. It appears from the latter that the Canaanites had given their name to the country before B.C. 1400. Paton connects their migration with that movement of races which gave Babylonia the Kassite dynasty about B.C. 1700, and which pushed the Hyksos into Egypt. Probably their coming was no later than this. (cf. Jg 3,1-3). Canaan, as Assyrians called them, Israel did not at first conquer. After the time of Solomon, however, those resident in the high lands who had not been absorbed into the Israelitish tribes (cf. ISRAEL, §§ 8, 11), were reduced to task-work. The coming of the Philistines pushed the Canaanites out of the maritime plain south of Mt. Carmel, so that ultimately the Phoenicians were the only pure Canaanites left. The leading Phoenician cities were such commercial centers that 'Canaanite' afterwards became equivalent to 'trader' (cf. Hos. 12:9, Is 28:1, Zeph 1:11, Ezek 17:14, 51:9).

CANANÉAN OR CANAANITE occurs in Mt 10:5 and Mk 3:18 as a designation of Canaan, one of the disciples of Jesus. The first is the correct reading, the Gr. Kanaâtos being the transliteration of kanan'âyâ (a late Heb. derivative from kanan'âd, 'Jealous'). It is rendered in Lk 6:16 and at 13:34 by Zeilâs (zéilâs). The Canaanites or Zealots were a sect founded by Judas of Gamala, who headed the opposition to the census of Quirinius (A.D. 6 or 7). They bitterly resented the domination of Rome, and would fight have hastened by the sword the fulfillment of the Messianic hope. During the great rebellion and the siege of Jerusalem, which ended in its destruction (A.D. 70), their fanaticism made them terrible opponents, not only to the Romans, but in their own countrymen.

CANDACE.—Queen of Ethiopia. A eunuch belonging to her, in charge of her treasure, was baptized by Philip (Ac 8:26). The name was borne by more than one queen of the Ethiopians. Candace who invaded Egypt in B.C. 22 (Strabo is, of course, earlier than this. A Candace is perhaps named on one of the pyramids of Meroe. See CUS. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

CANNIS.—A town named with Haran and Eden (Ezek 27:24), not identified. Mea (Gesch. der Stadt Hârân, 34) suggests that it may be a clerical error for bêne, i.e. bêne Eden, 'sons of Eden' (see Gutho, Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.). W. EWIN.

CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT—1. Explanation of terms.—The word 'Testament' is the Eng. tr. of the Gr. Douxôtes, which in its turn represents the Heb. Berôth or 'Covenant.' The epithet 'Old' was introduced by Christians after the NT had come into being. Jews recognize no NT, and have a polemical interest in avoiding this designation of their Holy Scripture. The Gr. word kanôn, meaning primarily a measuring-rod, a rule, a catalogue, was applied by Christian authors of the 4th cent. to the list of books which the Church admitted to be authoritative, as the sources of doctrine and ethics. In investigating how the Hebrew race formed their Bible, these later appellations of their sacred books have to be used with the reservations indicated in 2.

2. The three periods of formation.—Briefly stated, the process of forming the OT Canon includes three main stages. Under the influence of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Law (Torah) as in the Pentateuch was set apart as Holy Scripture; at some date prior to B.C. 200, the Prophets (Neîhîm), including the prophetic interpretation of history in the four books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings—had been constituted into a second canonical group; by B.C. 129, most, though not all, of the remaining books ranked as Scripture. This third group was defined, and the OT Canon finally fixed, by the Synod of Palestinian Jews held at Jannia, near Joppa, about the year A.D. 90.

3. Pre-cannonical conditions.—(a) The art of writing. The formation of language and the invention of writing must precede the adoption of a sacred book. An Israelite had no sacred language in its main features an inheritance from the common ancestors of the Semites; even its religious vocabulary was only in part its own creation. As to writing, the Semites in Babylon had used the cuneiform syllabic script, and Egypt had invented the hieroglyphs before the Hebrews had arisen as a separate race. But, happily, for the Canon, an alphabet had become the possession of some of the Semitic family before the Hebrews had anything to put on record. The provincial governors of Canaan about B.C. 1400 sent their reports to Egypt in Babylonian cuneiform; whereas Mesha, king of Moab, and Panammu, king of Ya'dî in North Syria, in extant inscriptions from about B.C. 900, make use of an Aramaic alphabet. After B.C. 1400, and some time before B.C. 900, must therefore be placed the genesis of the Hebrew alphabet.

(b) Absence of any must have had definite convictions as to the attributes of Jehovah before they could judge whether any given prophet or document were true or false. The life depicted in the book of Genesis reveals a non-writing age, when religious experience and unwritten tradition were the sole guides to duty. The Sinaitic legislation, although it formed the basis of national life, did not till late in the monarchy penetrate the popular consciousness. Mosaic Law provided that Divine guidance should be given through the voice of prophets and of priests (Dt 18:14-19:21, 21:24); with these living sources of direction, it would be less easy to feel dependence on a book. The symbolism of a sacrificial system compensated for the want of literature. It was only after books of various kinds had become prevalent that the utility of writing began to be appreciated. Isaiah (30:8), about B.C. 740, perceives that what is inscribed in a book will be permanent and indisputable. On the other hand, Hosea (8:12), about B.C. 745, sees a limit to the efficacy of a copious literature. The exponents of the traditional Law appear to have applied it with arbitrary freedom. Even the high priest in Josiah's reign had apparently had no occasion to consult the Law-book for a long period. Variations appear in the reasons annexed even to the Decalogue; and the priests who offered incense to the golden serpent in the Temple of Hozekiah cannot have regarded the Tables of the Law in the light of canonical Scripture.

4. Josiah's reformation.—The first trace of a Canon is to be found in the reign of King Josiah about B.C. 621. By this time the Northern Kingdom had disappeared with the Fall of Samaria (B.C. 722). It had left behind, as its contribution to the future Bible, at least the Books of Hosea, Amos, and Micah, which are not prophetic. In Josiah's reign, Isaiah 1., Amos, and Micah, had delivered their message a century ago, and their words were
5. Inspiration recognized in the Bk. of Deuteronomy. —A book identified on satisfactory grounds with our Deuteronomy (excluding possibly the preface and the additional sections at the end) is known to have been in circulation among the Hebrews in the treasuries of the Temple during the Deuteronomic period in the time of Josiah. Indeed, the former Ch. 11 is a translation of the latter.

6. Pentateuch made canonical. The next stage in the growth of the Canon is found in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (n.c. 537-444); much had happened in the intervening 170 years. The captivity in Babylon (n.c. 586-536) intensified national feeling and made their books more precious to the exiles. Temple ceremonial had now no place in religious practice; and spiritual aspiration turned to prayer and reading, both public and private. Fresh expositions of the Mosaic Law were prepared by the prophet Ezekiel (n.c. 592-570), and by the anonymous priest who put the Law into the hands of the scribes (c. 520). The Mosaic code was not only expanded and amplified, but it was also transformed into a literature of the prophetic type. The purpose of the prophets was to make the people of God aware of the Divine presence in their midst, and to call them to repentance and renewal. They were the voices of God, speaking to the people of the land, and their messages were recorded in the books of the Prophets.

The canon of the Old Testament is completed. The books of the Prophets and the writings of the Hagiographa are recognized as canonical, and their authority is acknowledged by the Jewish nation. The canon includes the Books of the Law, the Books of the Prophets, and the Books of the Writings. The final form of the canon was fixed by the Ezra-Nehemiah period (n.c. 516-444), and it was accepted by the Jewish community as the authoritative text of the Hebrew Scriptures. The canon was recognized by the rabbis as the authoritative text of the Hebrew Bible, and it was used in the study of the Torah, the study of the Prophets, and the study of the Writings. The canon was accepted by the Jewish community as the authoritative text of the Hebrew Bible, and it was used in the study of the Torah, the study of the Prophets, and the study of the Writings. able in an age when the Priestly Code was the dominant influence. The book about Daniel, published during the Maccabean persecutions (B.C. 165), quickly won recognition and proved its religious worth.

(b) Prologue to Sirach.—The earliest testimony to the existence of sacred books in addition to the Law and the Prophets is given in the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus. The grandson of ben-Sira wrote in Egypt about B.C. 182, and made a Greek translation of his kinman's 'Wisdom.' In the preface he refers three times to 'the Law, the Prophets, and the books of our fathers.' He speaks of Greek versions of these books. But this statement does not say that the third group was definitely completed. In the 1st cent. A.D. the Alexandrian codex of Hillel and his school was still called 'the books of our fathers.'

(c) New Testament.—The NT expresses a doctrine of Holy Scripture; it acknowledges a threshold division (Lk 24:44); it implies that Chronicles was the last book in the roll of the OT (Mt 23:18, Lk 11:48); but it does not quote Esther, Cant., Ecc., and leaves undecided the question whether these disputed books were as yet admitted to the Canon.

(d) Philo.—Philo of Alexandria (d. A.D. 40) acknowledges the inspiration of Scripture (the Mosaic Law pre-eminently), and quotes many of, but not nearly all, the later apocryphal OT books. His use of apocryphal books for information only, suggests, however, that he did know of a Palestinian limit to the third group.

(e) Josephus.—Josephus (A.D. 100), defending his earlier book against adverse reviews, maintains that Jewish records had been made by trained historians. The elegant inconsistencies of Greek narratives had no place in his history.

'It is not the case with us,' he says (c. Apion, i. 8), 'to have trivial books being boldly put before one another as a entertainment for the idle hours of an age. We have books beginning with history, and containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in... To write a history or a genealogy, or to charge the time has passed, no book has ventured either to add or to remove or to alter a syllable; and it is the invariable custom of every Jew from his youth to consider these books as the teaching of God, to abide by them and, if need be, cheerfully to lay down life in their behalf.'

The number 22 is probably due to his reckoning, with the LXX, Ruth and Judges as one, and Lamentations and Jeremiah as one. It is less likely that he refused to count Cant. and Ecc. as Scripture. His words reveal the profound reverence now entertained for the OT as a whole, although individuals may still have cherished objections to particular books.

(f) Synod at Jamnia.—The completion of the Hebrew Canon must be associated with a synod held at Jamnia, near Jerusalem, where the Sanhedrin settled after Jerusalem was taken by Titus (A.D. 70). The popularity of the Alexandrian OT, including Apocrypha, and the growing influence of NT books caused the Rabbinical teachers to remove all doubt as to the limits of their Scripture. 'All Holy Scriptures define the hands (the Hebrew phrase for are canonical): Canticles and Ecclesiastes define the hands.' Such was the dictum at Jamnia (c. A.D. 90) to which Rabbi Akiba (d. A.D. 136) appealed in dismissing the possibility of reopening discussion on the limits of the Canon.

9. Text.—The Hebrew Bible was now complete. Elaborate precautions were taken to secure an unchangeable text; and a system of vowel-signs was invented some centuries later to preserve the old pronunciation. It has been considered strange that the oldest dated MS of the OT should be so recent as A.D. 916, whereas the Greek Bible and NT are found in MSS of the 4th and 5th centuries. This may be due to the requirement of the Synagogue that the copy in use should be perfect, and that any roll deficient in a word or letter be repressed and destroyed. The vigilant care of copies in use lessened the interest in superseded MSS.

10. Relation of the Church to the OT.—The NT freely acknowledges Divine inspiration in the OT. Such a formula as 'All this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet' (Mt 19:8) implies that the Supreme Disposer of events had intended His purpose through the prophets. Postergy, therefore, of the OT as a subordinate standard as compared with His own words and the teaching of the Apostles. He did not report the word of the Lord as received by vision or hearing, but in the name of the Lord; He was not a prophet, but the Lord's Prophet. He used any book in itself adequate to determine the communion between the Living God and living men; all Scripture must be illuminated by the Spirit sancti. The 24 Hebrew books are valid for the Church only in so far as their authority is sanctioned by the NT. But, subject to this limitation, the OT remains profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness (2 Ti 3:16).
CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

2. The Formation of the Canon in the 2nd Century.—The very earliest reading of NT books in the church must have occurred in the church in the case of particular churches, which of course were read in those churches; next come the circular letters (e.g. Eph., 1 Peter), which were passed round a group of churches. Still later, repeated lists of books were constructed in church fellowship. Thus the Muratorian Fragment (c. 170) which is found in only one very early manuscript, acknowledges the NT books in the following order: Gospels, Acts, Epistles (OT in the order of the OT). But this does not mean that there was a church council which fixed the NT books as in a church lectionary. During the obscure period of the post-Apostolic age we have no indication of the use of epistles in church worship. Clement of Rome assumed that the church at Corinth was acquainted with 1 Corinthians, although he was writing nearly 40 years after St. Paul had sent that Epistle to the church, and a new generation had arisen in the interval; but there is no proof or even probability that Clement read the Epistle at the services. The earliest references to any such reading point to the Synoptic Gospels as alone having this place of honour, together with the OT prophets, and was the case in the worship described by Justin Martyr (1 Apol. iv.).

A little later, Justin’s disciple Tatian prepared his Harmony (Diatessaron) for use in the church at Edessa. This was a collection of 1740. Justin’s version of all four Gospels, i.e. it included John. It is a Gospels probably known to Justin, though not included in his Memoirs of the Apostles. As yet no epistles are seen in the place of honour of church reading side by side with them. Justin’s Scriptures were evidently intended long before this collection had been made by Marcion (c. A.D. 140) in his effort to reform the Church by recasting attention to the Pauline teaching which had fallen into neglect. Marcion’s Canon consisted of a mutilated Gospels of St. Luke and 10 Epistles of St. Paul (the 3 Pastoral Epistles being omitted). Although other early Church writers evidently allude to several of the Epistles (e.g. Clemens Rom., Ignatius, Polycarp, Barnabas), there is no evidence of any use of them, and the probability is that they were not used at all in the Church. This indicates that the author’s church as a whole acknowledges the Apostles of Peter, and that he associates himself with the majority of his contemporaries, even though he admits that there are some dissenters. Lastly, though the Canon admits Hermas for private reading, but not for use in the church services. We have here, then, most of our NT books; but, on the one hand, Hebrews, 1 and 2 Peter, James, and one of the 3 Epistles of John are not mentioned. They are not named to be excluded, like the Apocrypha; they are not excluded, as the Apocrypha is in the Canon. The Apocalypse, however, is the last book in the order of the NT.

Pasing on to the commencement of the 3rd cent., we come upon another anonymous writing, an anti-gambling tract entitled Concerning dice-players (de Aleatoribus), by Prof. Harnack attributes to Victor of Rome (A.D. 200–230). In this tract the Shepherd of Hermas and the Didache are both quoted as Scripture. The author refers to three divisions of Scripture: (1) Prophetic writings—the OT Prophets, the Apocalypse, Hermas; (2) the Gospels; (3) the Apostolic Writings—Paul, 1 John, Hebrews.

Neither of these Canons can be regarded as authoritative either ecclesiastically or scientifically, since we are ignorant of their sources. But the two both indicate a crystallizing process, in the Church at Rome about the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd centuries, that was tending towards our NT, though with some curious variations. The writing of the author is probably based on the Gospels of the LXX and the NT, and in the main on Irenaeus in their citations from most of the NT books as authoritative—a condition very different from that of Justin Martyr half a century earlier. Two influences may be recognized in bringing this result about: (1) use of church councils, (2) authoritative appeals against heresy—especially Gnosticism. It was necessary to settle what books were accepted by the Gnostics, who, however, interpreted them allegorically. What was needed was a standard of what was authoritative, and what was not.

Near this period we have the earliest known Canon after that of Marcion, the most ancient extant list of NT books in the Catholic Church. This is named the Muratorian Fragments, of whose authorship, if it is a real person, nothing is known. This list was first printed in 1558 by Cini, who found it in a 7th or 8th cent. monk’s common-place book in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published it in 1740. The fragment is a mutilated extract of a list of NT books made at Rome probably before the end of the 2nd cent., since the author refers to the episcopalsee of Pius as recent (nuperrine temporibus nostris), and Pius I., who died in A.D. 157, is the only Episcopate of Rome which is not mentioned by the early fathers. The list of the Muratorian Fragment is thus: Gospels, Acts, Epistles (most of the Epistles, but excluding Hebrews, though it subsequently refers to ‘an Epistle to the Laodiceans,’ and another ‘to the Alexandrians forged under the name of St. John’); Gospels and a few Epistles are included in the Canon of Pius I. The list of the Muratorian Fragment is: Gospels, Acts, Epistles (most of the Epistles, but excluding Hebrews, though it subsequently refers to ‘an Epistle to the Laodiceans,’ and another ‘to the Alexandrians forged under the name of St. John’); Gospels and a few Epistles are included in the Canon of Pius I. This indicates that the author’s church as a whole acknowledges the Apocalypse of Peter, and that he associates himself with the majority of his contemporaries, even though he admits that there are some dissenters. should be read in church and what books should be appealed to in discussion. The former was the primary question. The books used at their services by the churches, and therefore admitted by them as having a right to be so employed, were the books to be appealed to in it. The second question, the fact of church sanction, was auxiliary. Canonical books were the books read at public worship. How it came about that certain books were so used and others not is by no means clear. Prof. Harnack's theory seeks to solve the problem in a two-fold fashion. If we can show that the first class of books was fairly and universally accepted, though disputed by some (but apparently all admitted by Eusebius himself), contains James; Jude; 2 Peter—regarded in another place (i.e. 5) as spurious; 2 and 3 John, and Revelation (doubtfully). The second class, consisting of books which the Roman church had not recognized, was not generally accepted. The two groups of books, taken together, make up our present NT. They, and not the books of our previous category, form the canon of the NT.

4. Therefore, we find Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 165–220) acknowledging the 4 Gospels and Acts, and 14 Epistles of Paul (Hebrews being included), and quoting 1 and 2 John, 1 Peter, Jude, and the Apocalypse. He makes no reference to James, 2 Peter, or 3 John, any of which he may perhaps have known, as we have no list of NT books from his hand, for he does not name these books to reject them. Still, the probability as regards some, if not all, of the rest is that he did not know them. In the true Alexandrian spirit, Clement has a wide and comprehensive idea of inspiration, and therefore no very definite conception of Scriptural exclusiveness or fixed boundaries to the Canon. Thus he quotes Eusebius, Eusebius, the Presbyter of Rome, Hermas, the Preacher of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Sibylline Writings as in some way authoritative. He was a literary eclectic who delighted to welcome Christian truth in unexpected places. Still, he had a more or less fixed canon which he knew respectively as 'The Gospel' and 'The Apostle' (see Euseb. HE vi. 14). Origen (A.D. 184–253), who was a more critical scholar, treated questions of canonicity more scientifically. He acknowledged the canons of the OT and some parts of the Apocalypse, such as 1 Mac.; and in the NT the 4 Gospels, Acts, 13 Epistles of Paul, Hebrews (though the latter as of doubtful authorship; nevertheless he refers to it in his homily on Joshua he seems to include it among St. Paul's works, since he makes them 14, when he realizes that 'God, thundering on the 14 trumpets of his [i.e. Paul's] Epistles, threw down even the walls of Jericho, that is all the instruments of idolatry and the doctrines of the philosophers'), 1 Peter, 1 John, Revelation. He does not directly mention the Epistles of James or Jude, although he seems to refer to the one in connection with Peter, James, and Jude, and the 4 Evangelists as represented by Isaac's servants—if we are to trust Rufinus' version. He mentions 2 Peter and 3 John and 2 of disputed genuineness, and refers to the Gospel of the Hebrews in an apologetic tone, the Gospels of Peter and James, and the Acts of Paul, and quotes Hermas and Barnabas as Scripture, while he admits that, though widely circulated, Hermas was not accepted by all. It is a significant fact, however, that he wrote no commentaries on any of those books that are not included in our NT.

3. The Settlement of the Canon in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries.—An important step towards the settlement of the Canon on historical and scientific lines was taken by Eusebius, who, with his wide reading and the great library of Pamphylia to resort to, also brought a firm and judicious mind to face the problems involved. Eusebius saw clearly that it is not always possible to give a definite affirmative or negative answer to the question whether a certain book should be in the Canon. Therefore he drew up three lists of books—(1) The books that are admitted by all, (2) the books which he is disposed to admit although there are some who reject them, (3) the books that he regards as spurious. A fourth class, which really does not come into the competition for a place in the Canon, consists of the books of heretical works which 'are to be rejected as altogether absurd and impious' (HE ii. 25). The first class, consisting of the books universally acknowledged, contains the 4 Gospels; Acts; the Epistles of Paul—which in one place (iii. 3) are reckoned to be 14, and therefore to include Hebrews, although in another place (vi. 14) Hebrews is placed in the second class, among the disputed books; 1 Peter; 1 John; and Revelation (doubtfully.

4. The second class, consisting of books which are fairly and universally accepted, though disputed by some (but apparently all admitted by Eusebius himself), contains James; Jude; 2 Peter—regarded in another place (i.e. 5) as spurious; 2 and 3 John, and Revelation (doubtfully). The second class, consisting of books which the Roman church had not recognized, was not generally accepted. The two groups of books, taken together, make up our present NT. They, and not the books of our previous category, form the canon of the NT.
CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Apocryphal writings. Nevertheless he himself accepts it. He notes that 2 and 3 John have been attributed to a presbyter whose tomb at Ephesus is still pointed out. His personal influence of Augustine and the acceptance of Jerome’s Vulgate as the standard Bible of the Christian Church gave fixity to the Canon, which was not disturbed for a thousand years. No Council had pronounced it to be canonical. Within the different councils settlement was made, but allowed to mature slowly and come to its final state, the Apocalypse, and only our seven others. There were indeed local councils that dealt with the question; but their decisions were binding only on the provinces they represented, although, in so far as they were not disputed, they would be regarded as more or less normative by those other churches to which they were sent. As representing the East we have a Canon attributed to the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 41), and another by Clement of Alexandria, which he says is genuine. It is given in the MSS variously as a 60th and as part of the 56th appended in red ink. Half the Latin versions are without it; so are the Syriac versions, which are much older than the oldest MSS of the canons. It closely resembles the Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem, from which Westcott supposed that it was inserted into the canons of Laodicea by a Latin hand. Its genuineness was defended by Hefele and Davidson. Jülicher regards it as probably genuine. This Canon contains the OT with Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremy, and all our NT except the Revelation. Then in the West we have the 3rd Council of Carthage (397), which was omitted from the Council of Trent. Tertullian claims that “handed down from the Apostles, the Canons of the Divine Scriptures nothing be read in the Church under the title of Divine Scriptures,” and appends a list of the books thus authorized in which we have the OT, including the Apocrypha, and just our seven books. Here we have a whole province speaking for those books; when we add the great authority of Augustine, who belongs to this very province, and the influence of the Vulgate, we can well understand how the Church should now be considered fixed and inviolable. Thus the matter rested for ten centuries.

4. Treatment of the Canon at the Renaissance and the Church. The question of Canonization was revived by the Renaissance and the Reformation, the one movement directing critical, scholarly attention to what was essentially a literary question, the other facing it in the interest of religious controversy. Eviatar Ben-Hur writes: “The arguments of criticism, estimated by the rules of logic, lead me to disbelieve that the Epistle to the Hebrews is by Paul or Luke, or that the Second of Peter is the work of that Apostle, or that the Apocalypse was written by the Evangelist John. All the same, I have nothing to say against the contents of these books, which seem to me to be in perfect conformity with the truth. If, however, the Church were to declare the titles they bear to be canonical, then I would condemn my doubt, for the opinion formulated by the Church has more value in my eyes than human reasons, whatever they may be—‘a most characteristic statement, revealing the scholar, the critic, the timorous soul—and the satirist (7).” Within the Church of Rome even Cardinal Cajetan—Luther’s opponent at Augsburg—freely discusses the Canon, doubting whether Hebrews is St. Paul’s work, and whether, if it is not, it can be canonized. He also mentions doubts concerning the five General Epistles, and gives less authority to 2 and 3 John and Jude than to those books which he regards as certainly in the NT. The Reformation forced the question of the authority of the Bible to the front, because it set that authority in the place of the old authority of the Church. While this chiefly concerned the book as a whole, it could not preclude inquiries as to its contents and the rights of the several parts to hold their places there. The general answer as to the infallibility of the Church is an appeal to ‘the testimony of the Holy Spirit’ Calvin especially works out this conception very distinctly. The difficulty was to apply it to particular books of the Bible so as to determine in each case whether they should be allowed in the Canon. Clearly a further test was requisite here. This was found in the ‘analogy of faith’ (Analogia Fidei), which was more especially Luther’s principle, while the testimony of the Holy Spirit was Calvin’s. With Luther the Reformation was based on justification by faith. This truth Luther held to be confirmed (a) by its necessity, (b) by universal concurrence, (c) by its availing, (d) by the practice it brought peace, assurance, and the new life. Then those Scriptures which manifested supported the fundamental principle were held to be ipso facto inspired, and the measure of their support of it determined the degree of their authority. Thus the doctrine of justification by faith is not accepted because it is found in the Bible; but the Bible is accepted because it contains this doctrine. Moreover, the articles of faith were divided and arranged in grades according as it does more or less clearly, and to Luther there is a ‘NT within the NT,’ a kernel of all Scripture, consisting of those books which set forth the truth; therefore as he wrote: ‘John’s Gospel, the Epistles of Paul, especially Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 Peter—these are the books which show thee Christ, and teach all that is needful, and blessed for thy soul, if you read, see, or hear any book, or any other doctrine. Therefore is the Epistle of James a mere epistle of straw (eine rechte strohener Epistel) since it has no character of the gospel in it’ (Preface to NT, 1522; the passage is more especially Luther’s principle, while the testimony of the Holy Spirit was Calvin’s. Nevertheless, while thus discriminating between the values of the several books of the NT, he includes them all in his translation. Luther’s friend Carlstadt has a curious arrangement of Scripture in three classes, viz. (1) The Pentateuch and the 4 Gospels, as being ‘the clearest luminaries of the whole Bible; (2) the Prophets; and (3) the others. (3) The other canons, viz. 13 of Paul, 1 Peter, 1 John; (3) the Hagiographa of the Hebrew Canon, and the 7 disputed books of the NT. Dr. Westcott writes of the 1st class that the omission of the others was due to its being included with Luke. Calvin is more conservative with regard to Scripture than the Lutherans. Still in his Commentaries he passes over 2 and 3 John and the Revelation with the utmost notice; and he refers to 1 John as ‘the Epistle of John,’ and expresses doubts as to 2 Peter; but he adds, with regard to the latter, ‘Since the majesty of the Spirit of Christ exhibits itself in every part of the Epistle, I feel a scruple in rejecting it wholly, however much I fail to recognize in it the genuine language of Peter’ (Com. on 2 Peter, Argument). Further, Calvin acknowledges the existence of doubts with respect both to James and to Jude; but he accepts them both. He allows full liberty of opinion concerning the epistles of Hebrews; but he states that he has no hesitation in classing it among Apocryphal writings. In spite of these varieties of opinion, the NT Canon remained unaltered. At the Council of Trent (1546) for the first time the Roman Catholic Church made an authoritative statement on the Canon, uttering an anathema (anathema sit) on anybody who did not accept in its integrity the books contained in the Vulgate. Thus the Apocryphal is treated as equally canonical with the OT books; but the NT Canon is the same in Roman.
Catholic and Protestant Canons. Translations of the Bible into the vernacular of various languages laid the question of the Canon to rest again, by familiarizing readers with the same series of books in all versions and editions.

6. The Canon in Modern Criticism.—In the 18th cent. the very idea of a Canon was attacked by the Deists and Rationalists (Toland, Diderot, etc.); but the critical study of the subject began with Semler (1771–8), who pointed out the nearly reductions in the Canon and attacked the very idea of a Canon as an authoritative standard, while he criticized the usefulness and theological value of the several books of the NT. Subsequent controversy has dealt less with the Canon as such than with the authenticity and genuineness of the books that it contains.

In the views of extreme negative criticism canonicity as such has no meaning except as a historical record of Church opinion. On the other hand, those who accept a doctrine of inspiration in relation to the NT do not connect this very closely with critical questions in such a way as to affect the Canon. Thus doubts as to the authorship of the Pastoral Epistles, 2 Peter, James, etc., have not given rise to any serious effort to remove these books from the NT. The Canon rests mainly on tradition and usage. But the justification for it when this is sought is usually found (1) in the Apostolic authority of most of the NT books; (2) in the Apostolic atmosphere and association of the remaining books; (3) in the general acceptance and continuous use of them in the churches for centuries as a test of what is important; and (4) in their inherent worth to-day as an expression of Christian experience. It cannot be said that these four tests would give an indefeasible right to every book to claim a place in the Canon if it were not already there—or, at all events, in the Canon of Judae; but they close the burden of proof on those who would disturb the Canon by a serious proposal to eject any of its contents; and in fact no such proposal—as distinct from critical questions of the dates, authorship, historicity, etc., of the several books—is now engaging the attention of scholars or churches.

CANOPY.—A loan-word from the Gr. καρπόν, a mosquito-net. It is used to render this word in the description of the bed of Holophernes with its mosquito-curtain (Jth 10th etc.); also in I s 4th RV for Heb. χύμφαρ in the sense of a protective covering. This Heb. word is becoming naturalized in English to denote the canopy under which a Jewish bridegroom and bride are left while the wedding ceremony is being performed.

CANTICLES.—See Song of Songs.

CAP.—See Dress, § 5 (e).

CAPER-BERRY (σπορικήνας).—Ec 12th RV; Av 'destif.' The RV tr. is supported by the LXX, Pesh. and the Misraim. The caper-berry is the fruit of Capparis spinosa, a common Palestinian plant, which, largely on account of its habit of growing out of crevices in walls, has been identified with the hyssop (wh. see). Various parts of the caper plant are extensively used as medicine by the felahin. The familiar capsers of commerce are the flower buds. The 'failure' of the caper-berry in age may have been its ceasing to act as a stimulant, either as an aphrodisiac or a stomachic.

E. W. G. MARTERMAN.

CAPERNAUM.—The headquarters of Christ in His Galilean ministry, after His rejection at Nazareth (Mt 4th, Jn 25th). Here He healed the centaurion's paralysed servant (Mt 8th, Lk 7th), provided the half-shekel for the Temple tribute (Mt 17th), taught in the synagogue (Mt 17th, Lk 7th), provided meat to the multitudes (Mt 4th, Lk 9th), healed a nobleman's son by a word from Cana (Jn 4th). For its unbelief He denounced the city (Mt 11th, Lk 10th). Though it was evidently a town of considerable importance, the site is forgotten and is a matter of dispute. The two sites most frequently in favour are Tell Hum and Khan Minyeh, both on the north side of the Sea of Galilee, the former about midway between the latter and the mouth of the Jordan. At Tell Hum are extensive ruins, including the remains of a pagoda. Khan Minyeh does not contain any remains, and, as these seem all to be Arab, the balance of probability is on the side of Tell Hum, whose name should probably be written Tidhum, and regarded as the town of the brother of Simon the Zealot, the son of the city's name (see the latest discussion on the subject in PEFS 1907, p. 220). If the remains at Tell Hum are not Capernaum, it is difficult to say what important city they represent (see Sanday's art. 'Capernaum' in Hastings' DC).

CAPHR or KAPH.—Eleventh letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 11th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CAPHARALAMA (1 Mac 7th).—Apparentiy near Jerusalem. Kfr Shuud, the village of Sillam, is possibly intended.

CAPHIRA (1 Es 5th).—A town of Benj. inhabitants of which returned with Zerubbabel; called in Ezr 2nd Chephirah; cf. Neh 7th.

CAPHTOR.—The region whence the Philistines came to Palestine (Am 9th, Jer 47th). Hence in Dt 2nd Caphtorim means the Philistines. In Gn 10th Caphtorim is used of the country itself in place of Caphtor; it should be placed in the text immediately after Caalumih. Many identifications of Caphtor have been attempted. The favourite theory has been that it means the island of Crete (cf. CRETE). Next in favour is the view that Caphtor was the coast of the Egyptian Delta. It has also been identified with Cypros. The correct theory is suggested by inscriptions of Rameses III. of Egypt (c. B.C. 1200), who tells of his having repelled a great invasion by enemies who had entered Syria and Palestine from the north. The leaders of these barbarians were called Purusati, which (Kt R. A. S. MACDONALD). Compare the similar case ANNIBAL, NABAB, etc. See CRETE.

CAPPADOCIA.—A large district in the mid-eastern part of Asia Minor, formed into a Roman province in A.D. 17. It was administered by a procurator sent out by the reigning emperor, being regarded as an unimportant district. In A.D. 70 Vespasian united it with Armenia Minor, and made the two together a large and important frontier province, to be governed by an ex-consul, under the title of legatus Augusti pro praetore, on the emperor's behalf. The territory to the N. and W. of Cilicia, the kingdom of the client-king Antiocbus, was incorporated in it at the time, and it afterwards received various acquisitions of territory. Jews from Cappadocia are mentioned in Ac 2nd, and their presence there (c. B.C. 130) is implied in I Mac 15th where a letter in their favour is addressed by the Roman Senate to king Aratus. Cappadocia was not visited by St. Paul, probably as insufficiently Romanized, but it was one of the provinces to which 1 Peter (7 about A.D. 70–80) was sent. A. SOUTER.

CAPTAIN.—This word occurs very frequently in the OT (AV and RV), and appears to have been favoured by the translators as a comprehensive term to denote any officer, or a military commander, whatever its size might be. In modern military language it means especially the commander of a company of infantry, numbering about 100 to 110 men, and is quite unsuitable as a translation. It represents in OT 13 different Hebrew words. In Ezekiel it is often used for the secular head of the Messianic kingdom: 'prince' will there and often elsewhere do as a rendering: 'officer' and 'chief' will suit other passages. There are further places where none of these words will do as a translation. In the NT it translates four Greek words, and means: (1) In 189 Aretas was a Roman military officer and a tribune of the soldiers, in command of about 1000 men, constituting the garrison of Jerusalem (hence Rev 6:7, 19:4 in a general sense); (2) Lk 22:41, Ac 4:6, etc., the captain of the Temple, a Levite, who had under him a body of police, probably themselves also priests, whose duty it was to keep order in the Temple at Jerusalem and guard it by night; (3) H 2 Ch 8:11 (RV 'author') leader, initiator; (4) Ac 28:13 AV Captain of the guard [wanting in RV], a doubtful reading and of doubtful sense. See also ARTY, § 2. A. SOUTER.

CART.—CAPTIVITY. — See ISRAEL, I. 23.

CARBASION (1 Es 9:9).—A corrupt name of one of those who put away their 'strange' wives. It seems to correspond to Meremoth in Ex 10:24.

CARAVAN.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

CARBUNCLE.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

CARCAS (Ex 17:14).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of King Ahaseurus.

CARCHEMISH was the northern capital of the Hittite empire, but was probably also of consequence before the era of the Hittites, as it commanded the principal ford of the Euphrates on the right bank, was at first indispensable to travel and commerce in Northern Syria. It was shown by George Smith to have lain on the site of the modern Jerablus or Hiempor. It was an obstacle to the march of the invading Egyptians about B.C. 1600. Several Assyrian kings, according to the annals, were defeated in the vicinity, and the place was captured and destroyed after a battle by Sargon in B.C. 717 (cf. Is 10:9), after which it became the capital of an Assyrian province. Here Nebuchadnezzar defeated Pharaoh-necho in B.C. 606, and then ended the latest native Egyptian régime in Asia (Jer 49:22-29).

CAREFULNESS.—Careful and carefulness do not express approbation in the English of the Bible, as they do now. To be careful is to be too anxious, to worry. 'Be careful for nothing,' says St. Paul (Ph 4:6), and 'I would have you without carefulness' (1 Co 7:31). Later on—as in Jg 18:18—'they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure.'

CARY (S.W. of Asia Minor) is mentioned only in 1 Mac 15:32 as one of the districts to which the Roman Senate sent a letter in favour of the Jews in B.C. 139-138. It was free at that date, with its inland states federated. The more important States, Rhodes, etc., are separately named. A. SOUTER.

CARTES occurs in the Kethibh of the Heb. text and margin of RV in 2 S 20:9, where the Kethib has Cherethites, and in RV of 2 K 11:11, where the AV has captivators (R.V. executed); the Cartes were possibly Phil. mercenaries from Caria, as the Cherethites were from Crete.

CARMEL.—A town on the mountains south of Hebron, in the territory of Judah (Jos 19:25). Here Saul set up a memorial of his conquest of the Amalekites (1 S 15:5), and here Nabal (1 S 25:3) and Uzziah (2 Ch 26:16) had property. It was the home of Hezir or Hezro, one of David's Ammonite followers (2 S 20:4, 1 Ch 11:19). It is identified with Kurmus, about 10 miles E.S.E. of Hebron. 2. A hilly promontory by which the sea-coast of Palestine is broken, forming the south side of the bay of Acco. It continues as a ridge running in a S.E. direction, bordering the plain of Esdrælon on the S., and finally joining the main mountain ridge of the country in the district round about Samaria. On this ridge was Jokneam, reduced by Joshua (Jos 19:24). The promontory which included in the territory of Asher (15:28) was probably the scene of Elijah's sacrifice (1 K 18), and hither after Elijah's translation Elisha came on the way to Samaria (2 K 4:44). Elisha was for a time established here (45). The fruitfulness of the land is alluded to (Is 20:15, Am 1:11); it was wooded (Mic 7:8), a fact which made it a good hiding-place (Am 9). The head of the Shulamite is compared to Carmel (Ga 7:2).

The mountain seems from a very early period to have been a place of sanctuary. In the list of Tabunites iii. of places conquered by him in Palestine, Maspero sees in one name the words Rosh Kodesh, 'holy headland,' referring to Carmel. The site was probably chosen for the sacrifice whereby the claims of Baal and Jehovah were tested, but it was already holy ground. An altar of Jehovah existed here before Elijah (1 K 18:22). The traditional site is at the E. end of the ridge, but it is probably a mere coincidence that on the bank of the river Kishon just below there is a mound known as Tell el-Kaisa, 'the mound of the priest.' Tacitus (Hist. II. 76) refers to the mountain as the site of an oracle; the Druids held the traditional site of the sacrifice of Elijah sacred; and the mountain has given its name to the Carmelite order of friars.

CARMEL, 1. A Judahite, the father of Achab (Jos 15:18, 1 Ch 2:7). 2. The Carmel of 1 Ch 4:1 should probably be corrected to Chelebi, i.e. Caleb (cf. 1 Ch 2:18). 3. The eponym of a Reubenite family (Gn 46:13, Ex 6:1, 1 Ch 5), the Carmelites of Nu 26:29.

CARMONIANS (2 Es 15:84). AV Carmelitans.—A people occupying an extensive district north of the entrance to the Persian Gulf, between Persia and the Caspian Sea. They are said to have resembled the Medes and Persians in customs and language. The name survives in the present town and district of Kermanshah. In the above verse the reference is probably to Sapor I. (A.D. 240-273), the founder of the Sassanid dynasty, who, after defeating Valerian, overran Syria, and destroyed Antioch.

CARNAIM, 1 Mac 5:24, 41, and Carnion, 2 Mac 12:29, as (R.V. Carnaim).—The ancient Asheroth-karnaim (wh. see).

CARNELIAN.—See Agate under JEWELS.

CARNION.—See CARNAIM.

CAROB (Lk 18:11) R.V.—See IBERS.

CARPENTER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1.

CARPUS.—An inhabitant of Troas, with whom St. Paul stayed, probably on his last journey to Rome (2 Tl 4:13). The name is Greek, but we have no means of proving his nationality.

CARRIAGE.—This word is always used in the AV in the literal sense of 'something carried,' never in the modern sense of a vehicle used for carrying. Thus Ac 21:11 'we took up our carriages' (R.V. 'baggage').

CASHSilina.—One of the wise men or counsellors of king Ahaseurus (Est 1:4).

CART, WAGON.—The cart, like the chariot, is an Asiatic invention. The earliest wheeled carts show a light framework set upon an axle with solid wheels (illus. in Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. [1878], I. 249). The type of cart in use under the Hebrew monarchy may be seen in the Assyrian representation of the siege of Lachish (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, ii. pl. 28), where women captives and their children are shown seated in wagons with a low wooden body (cf. 1 S 6:7), furnished with wheels of 6 and 8 spokes. They were drawn by a pair of oxen (Nu 7:7, 7—exceptionally two cows (1 S 6:9)—yoked to a pole which passed between them, and were used for the transport of 118 persons (Gn 43:7) and goods (Nu i.c.), including sheaves of grain to the threshing-floor (Am 2:2). The rendering 'covered wagon' (Nu 7:7) is doubtful. For the threshing-wagon, see AGRICULTURE, § 8.

A. R. S. Kennedy.

CASEMENT.—Only Pr 7* AV; RV 'lattice,' as Jg 6:11, where the same word is used in both places in the window. Cf. also the Heb. text of Sir 42:11: 'Let there be no lattice to the room where thy daughter dwells.' See, further, HOUSES, § 7.

CASPISH.—A settlement in the neighbourhood of Ahab (wh. see) in North Babylonia (Est 5:3), whose site has not been identified.

Casluhim.—A name occurring in Gn 10:27, 1 Ch 1* in connexion with the names of other peoples there spoken of as descended from Miriam, esp. the Caphtorim and Philistines.

Casphor (1 Mac 5* = AV Casphon; 2 Mac 12* = Casphin) —Near a large lake in Gilead. The site is unknown.

Cassia.—1. giddah, Ex 30:24, Ezek 27:19; 2. qetes 5th, Pr 7:18. Both these words apparently refer to some kind of cedared wood. The cedared bark from the Cinnamomum cassia is very similar in smell to precious and resembles in texture the cedared wood. E. W. G. Masterman.

Castanet.—See Music and Musical Instruments.

Castle.—1. In Gn 25:16, Nu 31:* 1 Ch 6:4, an obsoleto, if not erroneous, rendering of AV in a word denoting a nomad 'encampment' (so RV). 2. In 1 Ch 11:17 AV speaks of the 'castle' of Zion, the citadel or acropolis of the Jebusite city, but RV renders as in 2 S 5:7, 'stronghold.' A different word (bôrah) is used of the castle or fort which in Nehemiah's day defended the Temple (Neh 2:7), and of the fortified royal residence of the Persian kings at Susa (Neh 1, Est 1* etc.; RV 'palace,' marg. 'castle'). The fortress in Jerusalem to which the authors of the books of Maccabees and Josephus give the name of Acre, is termed 'the castle' in 2 Mac 4:5, 5:10 AV, where RV has throughout 'citadel' (so also 1 Mac 1:4 and elsewhere). See, further, CITY, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 4.

A. R. S. Kennedy.

Castor and Pollux.—See Dioscuri.

Catz.—This animal is mentioned only in the Apoc (Ep. Jer v.9 [Gr. 5]). There are two species of wild cat in the Holy Land.

Caterpillar.—See Locust.

Catholic Epistles.—The title of 'Catholic' was given early to the seven Epistles which bear the names of James, Peter, Jude, and John. There is much uncertainty as to the meaning of the title. Perhaps the most probable explanation is that this group of Epistles was looked upon as addressed to the Church generally, while the Pauline Epistles were written to particular churches and were called forth by local circumstances.

Cathua (1 Es 5:1).—One of the heads of families of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity. It appears to correspond to Giddel in Est 2:17; cf. Neh 7:45.

Cattle.—The word commonly used in O.T is mignah, meaning primarily possession of wealth—oxen, camels, sheep, and goats being the only wealth of peoples in a nomadic stage of civilization. It includes sometimes horses and asses, e.g. Ex 9, Job 11. The word is also sometimes rendered 'possessions' (e.g. Ec 2:7), 'flocks' (Ps 78:6), and 'herds' (Gn 27:10). Other words rendered in RV 'cattle,' see Beazl. See also OX, SHEEP, SHEPHERDO, etc.

E. W. G. Masterman.

Cauda (AV wrongly Clauda; now Goudha) is an island off the S. coast of Crete. St. Paul's ship, sailing from this church into the Libyan sea, and landing at Cape Matalla, was making in a N.W. direction, when a sudden strong wind coming from E.N.E. drove it along at a rapid rate for about 23 miles, till it got under the lee of Cauda (Ac 27:14). Such a change of wind is frequent there at the present day. A. Soutter.

Gaul.—The Eng. word 'caul' is used (1) in Is 3*: for a veil of net-work. (2) In Ex 29:4, Lv 3*: for the fatty mass at the opening of the liver (wh. see). (6) In Hos 13:3 for the heifer.

Causey.—This Eng. word was used in the original edition of AV in 1 Ch 26:18, and in the margin of Pr 15:4 and Is 7:5. It is now found only in Pr 15:4 marg., being changed in modern editions in the other places into causeway. The Heb. word is literally 'a raised way,' and is used of a public road, but never of a street in a city. The word 'causey' is still used in Scotland for the raised footpath by the side of a road or street.

Cave.—The soft limestone hills of Palestine abound in caves, natural and artificial; and these must have attracted attention from a very early period. The aboriginal race of Horites were cave-dwellers, and the excavation at Gezer has revealed remains of a probably analogous race in W. Palestine. Lot (Gen 19) and David (1 S 22:1 etc.) dwelt for a time in caves; and their use as places of hiding and refuge is illustrated by many passages, e.g. Jos 10:4, Jg 6:1, 1 K 18* etc. Caves were also used, at all periods in the history of Palestine, for sepulture, as in the case of King Zerubbabel (23). Probably the most remarkable series of caves yet discovered in Palestine are the great labyrinths tunnelled in the hills round Beit Jibrin; one of these, in Tel Sanchash, contains sixty chambers united by doors and passages, and groups containing fourteen or fifteen chambers are quite common in the same hill. Another artificial cave near Beit Jibrin contains a hall 80 ft. high and 400 ft. long; it has now fallen in. Other groups of caves, only less extensive, occur in various parts of Palestine on both sides of the Jordan. Little or nothing is known about the history of these great excavations; no definite information about their origin has yet been yielded by them, so far as they have been scientifically explored.

R. A. S. Macalister.

Cedar (eres).—The finest of the trees of Lebanon, the principal constituent of its glory (Is 35:26); it was noted for its strength (Ps 29:3), its height (2 K 19:21) and its majesty (1 K 4:31, 2 K 14:10, Zn 3:11, 19). Its wood was full of resin (Ps 104:18), and, largely on that account, was one of the most valuable kinds of timber for building, especially for internal fittings. It was exceedingly durable, being not readily infected with worms, and took a high polish (cf. 1 K 10:4, Ca 17: Jer 22:13). It was suitable, too, for carved work (Is 44:12). In all these respects the 'cedar of Lebanon' (Cedrus Libani) answers to the requirements. Though but a dwarf in comparison with the Indian cedar, it is the most magnificent tree in Syria; it attains a height of from 80 to 100 feet, and spreads out its branches horizontally so as to give a beautiful shade (Ezk 31:3); it is evergreen, and has characteristic egg-shaped cones. The great region of this cedar is now the Cilician Taurus Mountains beyond Mersina, but small groves survive in places in the Lebanon. The most famous of these is that at Kadisha, where there are upwards of 400 trees, some of great age. In a few references eres does not mean the Cedrus Libani, but some other conifer. This is specially the case where 'cedar-wood' is used in the ritual of cleansing after defilement by contact with a leper (Lv 14:4) or a dead body (Nu 19). Probably eres here is a species of Juniper, Juniperus Sabina, which grows in the wilderness. The reference in Nu 24: 2 to 'cedar trees beside the waters' can hardly be the Lebanon cedar, which flourishes on bare mountain slopes.

CEDRON.—See Kidron.
CEDIL, CEILING.—See Ciele, Cieling.
CEILAR.—See House.
CENCHEBEUS.—A general of Antiochus v. Sidetes, who was given the commission of the sea-coast, and sent with an army into Palestine in order to enforce the claims of Antiochus against Simon Maccabaeus. In a battle which took place in a plain not far from Modin the Jews gained a complete victory over Cenchebeus, and pursued the Syrians as far as Kidron and the neighbourhood of Ashdod (1 Mac 16:16; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3).
CENSE.—See Firepan, Incense.
CENSUS.—See Quirinus.
CENTURION.—A centurion was a Roman military officer, corresponding in the number of infantry commanded by him (200) to the modern ‘captain,’ but in his status like our non-commissioned officers. The passage to the higher ranks was even more difficult in his case than it is amongst our non-commissioned officers. However, the chief centurion of a legion, known as the ‘centurion of the first (chief) pike,’ was sometimes promoted to the equestrian order. The Capernaum centurion (Mt 8:5-10, Lk 7:1-10) was probably in Herod’s army, but in the modern army thus called. Some of those mentioned in the NT were on special service in command of their units, and separated from the cohorts or legions of which they formed a part. A. Souter.
CEPHAS.—See Peter.
CHAEBIS.—One of the three rulers of Bethulia (Jth 8:9, 10).
CHADISAI.—AV ‘they of Chadassia,’ 1 Es 5:2.—They are mentioned as returning, to the number of 422, with Zerubbabel. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.
CHERAES (AV Cherass) held command at the fortress of Gaza, i.e. probably Jazer in the trans-Jordanic territory (see 1 Mac 5:9). He was slain upon the capture of Gaza by Judas Maccabaeus (2 Mac 16:21-22).
CHAFF.—See Agriculture, § 3.
CHAIN is used in two different senses. 1. Chains for securing prisoners are denoted by a variety of words in OT and NT, which are also rendered by ‘bonds’ or ‘ fetters,’ although the monuments show that ropes were more generally used for this purpose. 2. A chain of precious metal was worn as a sign of rank, as by Joseph and Daniel, or purely as an ornament. See Ornaments, § 2.
A. R. S. Kennedy.
CHALCEDONY.—See Jewels and Precious Stones.
CHALDAEA, CHALDEANS.—The Heb. Kadosh is generally rendered ‘Chaldees’ (Gen 11:9), and in Jer 50:1 51A 24B 25B and often, is used for ‘Babylonian.’ The word is derived from the Bab. name Kaddu for the district S.E. of Babylon proper, on the sea-coast as it then was. From n.c. 1000 onwards its capital was Babel. The people were Arameans, independent and aggressive. In the time of Babylonian weakness they pushed into the country, and Merodach-baladan was a Chaldaean usurper. Nabopolassar was also a Chaldaean, and, from his time, Chaldeans meant Babylonians. The Chaldeans were Semites and not the same as the Assyrians, Chashu, or Chasites, who conquered Babylon, and ruled from the 19th cent. n.c. onwards, but they came through, and probably had absorbed a part of, the country to which the Chassites had already assured the name Kashti.
The name as applied since Jerome to the Aramaic portions of Daniel and Ezra is incorrect. The use of the term ‘Chaldean’ (Dn 1:1 and often) to denote a class of astrologers is not found in native sources, but arose from a transfer of a national name from the Babylonians in general, and occurring in Sennacherib, Diodorus, etc. It can hardly be older than Persian times.
C. H. W. Johns.
CHALK-STONES (Is 27:1 only).—The expression is of much interest, as showing that the practice of burning limestone and slaking with water was followed in Pal. in OT times.
CHALLENGE.—To ‘challenge’ in the language of AV is to estaim, as in Golding’s tr. of Calvin’s Job, p. 578; ‘Job never went about to challenge such perfection, as to have no sins in him.’ The word occurs in Ex 19, in the heading of Is 46 ‘By his omnipotence he challengeth obedience,’ and in Job 3:6 AVm.
CHALPHI (AV Calphi).—The father of Judas, one of the two captains of Jonathan Maccabaeus who stood against the Syrians at Hazor in N. Galilee (1 Mac 11:17).
CHAMBER.—Now obsolete, is used by AV in a variety of connexions where modern usage employs ‘room,’ e.g. ‘bed-chamber,’ ‘upper chamber,’ etc. See generally, House. For the Temple chambers, see Temple.
CHAMBERLAIN.—In OT the word occurs in 2 K 23:1 and repeatedly in Est., where the original is ‘eunuch’ (arbe), but it is generally believed that this name is not to be taken always in a literal sense, and hence it is often rendered by the word ‘officer.’ In Esther, however, the chamberlain evidently belongs to that class of persons who are entrusted with the special care of the harems of Oriental monarchs. In NT at Ac 12:26 it is said that the people of Tyre and Sidon sought the favour of Herod Agrippa through the mediation of Blasus ‘the king’s chamberlain,’ showing that the office was one of considerable influence. The word occurs again in AV in Ro 16:23, but is rendered in RV more accurately ‘treasurer of the city.’
CHAMBERS OF THE SOUTH.—See Stars.
CHAMELEON.—The chameleon (Chamaeleom variegata) is a very common Paleaite lizard. It may be found on hot days clinging with its bird-like feet and prehensile tail to the trees, or passing with slow and deliberate walk over the ground. It is remarkable for its marvellous protective gift of changing the colour of its skin to resemble its surroundings, and for its eyes which, moving independently, one looking backwards while the other looks to the front, give it an unusual range of vision. Even to-day it is supposed by the ignorant, as in olden times, to live upon air. In reality it lives on small insects, catching them by means of its long sticky tongue, which it can protrude and withdraw with extraordinary quickness. Two words in Lv 11:31 are rendered ‘chameleon’ in the Eng. versions. To the AV koch is so translated, but in the RV we have ‘land crocodile’ (see Lizard); while in the RV tinnehemath—‘mole’ in AV—is tr. ‘chameleon.’ Both renderings are very uncertain. See M.L.S.
E. W. G. Masterman.
CHAMOIS (zemer, Dt. 14:9).—The tr. of zemer as ‘chamois’ in RV and as ‘camelopard,’ i.e. giraffe, in LXX, are both certainly incorrect, as neither of these animals occurs in Palestine. Tristram suggests the wild sheep, Ovis tragelaphus, an animal about 3 feet high with long curved horns. It is well known to the Bedouin.

CHAMPAGNE.—This spelling in modern editions of AV has replaced champion (Dt 11:10, Jth 5:1) and cham-gian (Ezk 37 marg.) of the 1611 edition of AV. The word means an open plain.
CHANCELLOR

CHANCELLOR.—See BEELTATHUS and REHUM.

CHANGES OF RAIMENT (Gn 45:2, Jg 14:4, 2 K 55).—A literal tr. of a Heb. expression which not merely changes of garments in the modern sense, but implies that the 'changes' are superior, in material or texture or both, to those ordinarily worn. Hence 'gala dresses,' 'fetial robes,' or the like, may be taken as a fair equivalent. Gifts of such gala robes have always been common in the East as special marks of favour or distinction. Cf. Dress, § 7.

CHANUNEUS (AV Chanuneus), 1 Es 8:6.—A Levite, answering to Merari, if to anything, in the parallel list in Ezr 8:1.

CHAPHENATHA (1 Mac 12:7).—Close to Jerusalem on the east. Unknown.

CHAPITER.—See Temple.

CHAPMAN.—A Chapman is a trader, the word being still used in some places for a travelling merchant. It occurs in 2 Ch 16:9 AV and RV, and also in 1 K 10:11 RV. The Amer. RV has 'trader' in both places.

CHARAHA L (AV Charaathal), 1 Es 5:8.—A name given to a leader of certain families who returned under Zerubbabel. But 'Charaathal' leading them and Allar' is due to some perversion of the original, which has 'Cherub, Addan, Immer,' three names of places in Babylonia, from which the return was made (Ezr 2:42; cf. Neh 7:14).

CHARAX (2 Mac 12:6, RV 'to Charax,' AV 'to Charrax').—East of Jordan, and apparently in the land of Tob. Unknown.

CHARIA, 1 Es 5:35—Harsha, Ezr 2:36, Neh 7:74.

CHARGER.—An obsolete word for a large flat dish on which meat was served. The Amer. RV everywhere substitutes 'platter,' e.g. Nu 7:16, Mt 14:18 and parallels.

CHARIOT.—The original home of the chariot was Western Asia, from which it passed to Egypt and other countries. In OT chariots are associated mainly with war-like operations, although they also appear not infrequently as the 'carriages,' so to say, of kings, princes, and high dignitaries (Gn 50:4, 2 K 59, Jer 17:4; cf. Ac 21:28, the case of the Elisha eunuch) in times of peace. When royal personages drove in state, they were preceded by a body of 'runners' (2 S 15:1, 1 K 15).

The war chariot appears to have been introduced among the Hebrews by David (2 S 8:6 LXX), but it did not become part of the organized military equipment of the State till the reign of Solomon. This monarch is said to have organized a force of 1400 chariots (1 K 10:26, 2 Ch 11), which he distributed among the principal cities of his realm (1 K 9:19, 10:19). At this time, also, a considerable trade sprang up in connexion with the importation of chariots and horses. It was not from Egypt, however, which was never a horse-breeding country, that these were imported as stated in the corrupt text of 1 K 10:26, but from two districts of Asia Minor, in the region of Cappadocia and Cilicia, named Mysri and Kuü (see Skinner, Cent. Bibl., in loc.). In the following verse a chariot from Mysri is said to have cost 600 shekels of silver (see Money), and a horse 150, but the Gr. text gives 500 shekels and 50 shekels respectively. Similarly in 2 K 7 the reference is to the chariots of the Hittites and their allies of Mysri.

Until the Macedonian period, when we first hear of chariots armed with scythes (2 Mac 15:3), the war chariot of antiquity followed one general type, alike among the Assyrians and the Egyptians, the Hittites and the Syrians. It consisted of a light wooden body, which was always open behind. The axe, fitted with stout wheels with 6 or 8 spokes (for the Heb. terms see 1 K 10:27), was set as far back as possible for the sake of greater steadiness, and consequently a surer aim. The yoke was fixed into the axle, and after passing beneath the floor of the chariot was bent upwards and connected by a band of leather to the front of the chariot. The horses, two in number, were yoked to the pole. Traces were never used. In Assyrian representations a third sometimes appears, evidently as a reserve. The body of the chariot naturally received considerable decoration, for which, and for other details, reference may be made to Wilkinson's Anc. Egyp. (1878), ii. 224-241, and Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies (1864), ii. 1-21, where numerous illustrations are also given. The 'chariots of iron,' the ancient Canaanites (Jos 17:16, Jg 11:47) were chariots of which the woodwork was strengthened by metal plates.

In Egypt and Assyria the normal number of the occupants of a war chariot was two—the driver, who was often armed with a whip, and the combatant, an archer whose bow-case and quiver were usually attached to the right-hand side of the car. Egyptian representations of Hittite chariots, however, show three occupants, of whom the third carried a spear to do battle with his comrades. This was almost certainly the practice among the Hebrews also, since a frequently recurring military term, shed-eth, signifies 'the third man,' presumably in such a chariot.

Mention may be made, finally, of the chariots set up at the entrance to the Temple at Jerusalem, which were destroyed by Josiah. They were double-baz dedicated originally to J, although they are termed by the Hebrew historian 'chariots of the sun' (2 K 23:10), their installation having been copied from the Babylonian custom of representing Shamash, the sun-god, riding in a chariot.

CHARITY.—The word 'charity' never occurs in AV in the sense of almsgiving, but always with the meaning of love. It comes from the Vulg. caritas, which was frequently used to translate the Greek agape, probably because amor had impure associations, and because diletio (which is sometimes so used) was scarcely strong enough. Wycliff followed the Vulg., as did afterwards the Rhenish translators. Tindale and the Genevan Version preferred 'love'; but in the Bishop's Bible 'charity' was again often used, and the AV followed the Bishop's in this. In the LXX however, 'charity' never occurs, the Gr. agape being everywhere rendered 'love.'

For Feast of Charity (Jude 12 AV) see LOVE FEAST.

CHARK.—See AMULETS AND CHARMS; and MAGIC INCANTATION AND SORCERY.

CHARME (1 Es 5:8).—Called Harim, Ezr 2:36, Neh 7:74. The form in 1 Es is derived from the Heb., and not from the Gr. form in the canonical books.

CHARMS (Gn 46:10).—Son of Melchiel, one of three rulers or elders of Bethulia (3th 6th 8th 10).

CHASE.—See HUNTING.

CHASEBA (1 Es 5:8).—There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHASTEY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, and MARRIAGE.

CHEBAR.—A canal in Babylonia (Ezk 18) beside which the principal colony of the first Exile of Judah was planted. It has been identified by the Pennsylvania expedition with the canal Kabor, named in cuneiform documents of the time of Artaxerxes I. It apparently lay to the east of Nippur. The name means 'great.' Hence for 'the river Chebar' we may read 'the Grand Canal.'

CHECKER WORK.—A designation applied in 1 K 11: (only) to the net-ornament on the pillars before the Temple.
CHELLOLaM.—An early king of Elam, who, according to Gn 14, exercised dominion over a considerable part of Western Asia. His vassals, Amraphel, king of Shinar, Arioch, king of Ellasar, and Tidal, king of Golim, helped him to defeat the Canaanite princes of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, who had rebelled against him after having acknowledged his authority for twelve years. Chedor-lamer and his allies defeated the Canaanite princes in the valley of Siddim, and sacked Sodom and Gomorrah. But the story relates that they were in turn defeated by 'Abram, the Hebrew,' who surprised them by night and recovered the spoil of Sodom and his nephew Lot. The name of Chedor-lamer is a purely Elamite name (Kudur-Lagamar or Kutur-Lagamar), though it has not yet been found upon the inscriptions as that of an early king of Elam. But the recent excavations of M. de Morgan at Susa confirm the Biblical story, by revealing the considerable part which Elam played in the early history of Western Asia.

CHEEKS.—The seat of health and beauty (Ca 11^2 51^3). To be smooth, and to have the climax of health, were signs of violence. That the command in Mt 51^3 is not to be interpreted literally is shown by Christ's own protest in Jn 18^9.

CHELAL.—One who had married a foreign wife (Exr 19^9 10^9).

CHELUS.—From the text (Jth 11) this place is supposed to have been situated S.W. of Jerus. near Beiane and N. of Kades and the 'river of Egypt,' i.e. the Wady-el-Attak; but any certain identification is impossible.

CHELOD.—Jth 11^b reads, not as AV and RV 'many nations of the sons of Chelod assembled themselves to battle,' but 'there came together many nations unto the array (or ranks) of the sons of Cheleu.' It is not certain whether the 'many nations' are allies of Nebuchadrezzar or of Arphaxad, or whether they came to help or to fight the 'sons of Chelod.' Probably v.15 summarizes v.14; hence 'sons of Chelod' should be Nebuchadrezzar's army. But he is, in Jth., king of Assyrians, not Chaldeans. No probable conjecture as to Aram. original has been made.

CHELUB.—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 41^1). 2. The father of Ezri, one of David's superintendents (1 Ch 27^2).

CHELUBAI (1 Ch 28).—Another form of Caleb. Cf. 1 Ch 21^2 4, and see Caleb, and Carmi, No. 2.

CHELUSHI.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^9).

CHEMARIAM.—In RV this word is found only in Zeph 1^4; but the original of which it is the transliteration is used also at 2 K 23^8 and Hos 10^8, and in both instances Chémârim is placed in the margin of AV and RV. Chémârîm, of which Chémârim is the plural, is of Aram. origin, and when used in Syr. carries no unfavourable connotation. In the Heb. of the OT, however, Chémârim always has a bad sense; it is applied to the priests who conducted the worship of the calves (2 K 23^8, Hos 10^9), and to those who served the Baalim (Zeph 1^4). Kimchi believed the original significance of the verbal form was 'to be black,' and explained the use of the noun by the assertion that the idolatrous priests were black garments. Others take the root to mean, 'to be sad,' the chumra being a sad, ascetic person, a monk or priest.

CHEMOSH.—The national god of the Moabites (Nu 21^2); in Jg 11^b probably 'Chemosh' is a scribal or other error for 'Milcom' (whe. sh), who held the same position among the Ammonites. His rites seem to have included human sacrifice (cf. 2 K 3^31). It was for this 'abomination of Moab' that Solomon erected a temple (1 K 11^7), later destroyed by Josiah (2 K 23^14).

CHENAANAH.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7^7). 2. The father of Zedekiah the false prophet in the reign of Ahaz (1 K 22^1, 2 Ch 18^14).

CHENANI.—A Levite (Neh 9^1).

CHENANIAH.—Chief of the Levites at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15^2 7), named among the officers and judges over Israel (26^9).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI ("village of the Ammonites,' Jos 13^8).—A town of Benjamin. Probably the ruin Keft 'Ana near Bethel.

CHEPHIRAH ("village,' Jos 9^13 18^9, Ezr 2^22, Neh 7^23).—Connected of the four, and there is good ground that with the Hebrews; re-peopled after the Captivity, having belonged to Benjamin; called in 1 Es 7^4 Caphira. Now Keftreh S.W. of Gibeon.

CHEQUER WORK.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING.

CHERAN.—One of the children of Disbon, the son of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36^9, 1 Ch 19^1).

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.—These were mercenary soldiers, who probably began to attach themselves to David whilst he was an outlaw (2 S 22^9 etc.), and subsequently became the king's bodyguard and the nucleus of his army (2 S 15^4 19^17 20^27; 1 K 18^3 4, 1 Ch 18^3). Benahad, whom Jospehus calls 'captain of the guard' (Ant. viii. xi. 8), was their commander. They accompanied David in his retreat from Jerusalem (2 S 15^5), fought against Absalom (2 S 20^9 28), acted as Solomon's bodyguard at his coronation (1 K 18^3 4). The Cherethites were a Philistine clan (1 S 30^6), dwelling on the coast (Ezk 25^4, Zeph 2^9); and the name Pelethites may have been a corrupt form of Philistins.

CHERITH.—The 'brook' by which Elijah lived (1 K 17^1 4) was 'before,' i.e. on the E. of Jordan. The popular identification of Cherith with the Wady Kelt between Jerusalem and Jericho is unwarranted.

CHERUB.—Sp 22^9, Neh 7^4).—One of the places from which certain families, on the return from Babylon, failed to prove their register as genuine branches of the Israelite people. See Charaathlan.

CHERUBIM.—1. The most important passage for determining the origin of the Hebrew conception of the cherub was Ps 104. The poem, in describing the sanctuary of Jehovah, represents the God of Israel as descending to earth on the black thunder-cloud: 'He rode upon a cherub and did fly, yea, he soared on the wings of the wind.' According to this passage, the cherub is a personification of the storm-cloud, or, as others prefer to interpret, of the storm-wind which bears Jehovah from heaven to earth.

2. We shall next discuss the part the cherubim play in the religious symbolism of the OT. In the Tabernacle there were two small golden cherubim, one at each end of the mercy-seat. It was these figures that invested the ark with its special significance as an emblem of the immediate presence of Jehovah. Cherub figures were embroidered on the curtain separating the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place, and on the other tapestries of the sanctuary. In the Temple two huge cherubim of olive wood, overlaid with gold, overshadowed the ark with their wings (1 K 28:4). Cherubim figures were also found among the other decorations of the Temple (1 K 24:13). In both sanctuaries they are figures of religious symbolism; they act as bearers of Deity, and are consequently emblematic of Jehovah’s immediate presence. Hence we have the phrase ‘Thou that artest on the cherubim’ (Ps 80:1 et al.). In Ezekiel’s Inaugural vision (ch. 1) the four composite figures of the living creatures are in a later passage termed cherubim (10:7). They support the firmament on which the throne of Jehovah rests, and in this connexion we again have them as bearers of Deity. In the Paradise story, the cherubim perform another function; they appear as guardians of the tree of life (Gen 3:24). A different version of this story is alluded to by Ezekiel (28:14); according to this prophet, a cherub expels the prince of Tyre from Eden, the garden of God. In both these passages they perform the function of guardians of sacred things, and in view of this it is probable that, in the Temple and Tabernacle, they were looked upon as guardians of the contents of the ark as well as emblems of the Divine presence.

3. As to the figures of the cherubim in the sanctuaries we have no clue, and Josephus is probably correct when he says that no one knows or can guess their form. The prophet Ezekiel and the records of Babylonian art assist us in solving the enigma. The prophet’s living creatures were composite figures, each having the face of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. We are not to suppose that these forms correspond exactly to those things that the prophet had seen, but he worked out these figures in his gorgeous imagination, combining elements Hebrew and Babylonian. The native element is to be seen in an unsuspected source, but the treasured influence of Babylonia, as it were, a blending of elements and in a way suited to the high ideas of Babylonian art there can be no question of the true. The huge composite figures with human head, eagle’s wings, and bull’s body, which were placed over the gates of temples and palaces in Babylonia, supplied the prophet with the material for his vision. The writer of the story of the Garden of Eden had some such figures in mind. Basing his conjecture on Ezekiel’s vision, Schultze (OT Theol. i. p. 204) imagines that the cherubim in the Temple were composite figures with feet of oxen, wings of eagles, mane of lions, and human bodies and faces, standing upright and spreading their wings over the ark. This view is somewhat problematic. Cheyne and Dillmann prefer to associate them with the griffon, which so often appears in mythology as a guardian of sacred treasures. The former asserts that the Hebrew cherubim were of Assyrian origin. It is not correct to suppose that they were directly borrowed either from the Babylians or the Hitittites, but the Hebrew imagination combined foreign and native elements as they suited to its purpose. The derivation of the Heb. word from the Bab. kururu, a designation of the steer-god, is, although advocated by Delitsch, exceedingly uncertain and is denied by Zimmer. We are now in a position to judge the meaning of the cherubim in view of the nature of the cherubim,—that they were (1) real, (2) symbolic, and (3) mythical. That they were higher angelic beings with actual existence is now generally discarded. They were in reality creations of the imagination, the former being borrowed from mythological sources and afterwards invested with a symbolic meaning.

4. In Jewish theology the cherubim are one of the three highest classes of angels, the other two being the seraphim and ophimhim, which guard the throne of the Most High. They appear as youthful angels in Rabbinical literature. Philo allegorizes them as representing two supreme attributes of God—his greatness and authority; he also mentions other views (for Jewish ideas, cf. JE K.). The living creatures of the Apocalyptic vision are borrowed from Ezekiel’s imagery. Starting with this passage (Re 5:6), and borrowing elements from Jewish theology, some Christian theologians have incorrectly maintained that the cherubim of Scripture were apocalyptic spiritual essences.

James A. Kelso.

CHESED.—One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gen 22:3). He is obviously here introduced into the genealogy of the Terahites as the presumptive father of the Kaslim or Chaldeans. This probably represents a different tradition from that in P, where Ur of the Chaldees (i.e. Kasdim) is spoken of as the dwelling place of Terah (Gen 11). Nahor’s father.

CHESIL (Jos 19:10).—The LXX reads Bethel, probably for Bethul, as in the parallel passage, Jos 19:1, and Chesil of MT is prob. a textual error.

CHESTNUT TREE (‘armôn, Gn 30:1, Ezk 31:). RV plane).—There is no doubt that the RV is correct. The chestnut tree is only an exotic in Palestine, but the plane (Arab. dib) is one of the finest trees of the land. It attains great development; a wonderful specimen, which has a small room or shop within its hollow trunk, is to be seen in one of the streets of Damascus. The trunk peels its outer layer annually, leaving a white streaky surface. It flourishes specially by waterscourses (Sir 24:31).

CHESULLOTH (Jos 19:18).—The same as Chislath-tabor, Jos 19:18. A place on the border of Zebulun. Now the ruin Jezzâl at the foot of the Nazareth hills, in the fertile plain W. of Tabor.

CHETH.—Eighth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 8th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CHEZIB (Gn 28:19).—See Acchiz, No. 2.

CHIDON.—The name, acc. to 1 Ch 12:9, of the threshing-floor where Uzziah was struck dead for rashly touching the ark (see Uzzai). In 2 S 6 the name is given as Nacon. No locality has ever been identified with either name.

CHIEF OF ASIA.—Ac 19:1; RV ‘chief officers of Asia; RVm ‘Aristarch.’ See AMARCHE.

CHILD, CHILDREN.—1. Value set on the possession of children.—Throughout the Bible a noteworthy characteristic is the importance and happiness assigned to the possession of children, and, correspondingly, the intense sorrow and disappointment of childless parents. Children were regarded as Divine gifts (Gn 4:23). As the children were the judges of God’s future the heritage of the earth (Ps 127:1). It followed naturally that barrenness was looked upon as a reproach, i.e. a punishment inflicted by God, and involving, for the woman, disgrace in the eyes of the world. Thus, Sarah was despised by her more fortunate handmaid Hagar (Gen 16:1); Rachel, in envy of Leah, cried, ‘Give me children or else I die’ (Gn 30:1). Hannah’s rival taunted her to make her fret, because the Lord had shut up her womb (1 S 1:8); Elisabeth rejoiced when the Lord took away her ‘reproach among men’ (Lk 1:46). ‘He maketh the barren woman to keep house and to be a joyful mother of children’ (Ps 113:9). Not only is there natural parental affection set forth in these and similar passages, but also a strong sense of the worldly advantages which accompanied the condition of parenthood. A man who was a father did not bear the same title as his son; a rich man’s position was dignified and influential; his possessions were secured to his family, and his name perpetuated.

‘Be fruitful and multiply’ was a blessing desired by every married couple—for the sake of the latter part of the blessing, the necessary accomplishment of fulness—replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over all the earth involved expansion of property and increase in importance and wealth.

2. The filial relationship.—The position of children was one of complete subordination to their parents. Gn 22, 11 and 13, and the sacrifices to Moab of children by their parents (Lv 18:20-24, 2 K 23:1, Jer 32:28) indicate that the father had powers of life and death over his children; these powers are limited inDt 21:15. Observance and disregard of children towards their parents were strongly enjoined (Ex 20:12, Lv 19:3, Dt 27:19, Fr 11 etc.). Any one smiting or cursing his father or mother is to be put to death (Ex 21:14, 15). Any one who is disrespectful to his parents is accursed (Dt 17:9). Irreverence on the part of children towards an older person is visited by a signal instance of Divine judgment (2 K 22:4). Several passages in the Book of Proverbs urge care, even to severity, in the upbringing of children (Pr 30:13 and 15, 22-29 etc.). The outcome of this dependence of children upon their parents, and of their subordination to them, was an intensely strong sense of the closeness of the filial bond, and a horror of any violation of it. A child who could bring himself to defy his father and break away from his home life was indeed no longer worthy to be called a son (Lk 15:21). The disobedience of Israel is beset in particular by the suspicion that it appears to him like the most heinous crime, the rebellion of children against a loving father: 'Surely they are my people, children that will not err . . . In his love and in his pity he doth deal toward them, and he bare them and carried them all the days of old. But they rebelled' (Is 63:10-13). In this connexion some of the sentences in our Lord's charge to the Twelve must have fallen upon startled ears (Mt 10:37-39). Children are expected to find in the footsteps of their parents and to resemble them. Hence such expressions as 'Abraham's children,' which carried the notion of resemblance in character. Hence also the figurative use of the word 'child': 'children of transgression,' 'children of disobedience.' Phrases like these are closely connected with others in which the words 'children' or 'sons' are used in a spiritual sense conveying the ideas of love and trust and obedience. St. Peter speaks of 'Mark, my son,' in touching anxiety for their spiritual welfare, St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, addresses them: 'My little children'; and St. John, in his Epistles, le fond of the same expression.

3. The feeling for childhood.—Tenderness towards childhood, appreciation of the simplicity, the helplessness, of children, affection of parents for their children, and childhood for its parents: all these are features of the Bible which the most superficial reader cannot fail to observe. There are many touching and vivid examples of and references to parental love. All the sons and daughters of Jacob rose up to comfort him for the loss of Joseph, but he refused to be comforted (Gn 47:29). 'If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved' (43:3), is his despairing cry when Benjamin also is taken from him—Benjamin, 'a child of his old age, a little one . . . and his father loved him' (44:4). Hannah dedicated her little son to the service of the Lord in gratitude for his birth; and then year by year 'made a little vesture' and brought it to him' (1 S 2:20). David fasted and lay all night upon the ground praying for the life of his sick child (2 S 12:18). The brief account of the death of the Shunammite's boy is a passage of restraint and lilt pathetic beauty (2 K 4:18). Isaiah's feeling for the weakness and helplessness of children is displayed in the mention of the words first articulated by his own son (Is 8:5); and in his description of the time when the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and all the little children shall sit in the seat of Moses (Isa 11:15-17). Thus the relation is not merely formal but ethical, and on both sides. The Divine Fatherhood towards Israel is manifested in protecting and redeeming love: it involves the Divine faithfulness, to which His people may make appeal in their extremity (Jer 31:11, 33:16, 54:19). The child carries with it the obligation of filial response: 'a son honoureth his father . . . if then I be a father, where is mine wild beasts and handle the ass and the adder (11:4). Zechariah dreams of the happy time when Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets (Zec 8:5). The beauty of a child's humble simplicity is acknowledged by the Psalmist, who likens his own to a weaned child with its mother (Ps 131:1); unconsciously anticipating the spirit of One, greater than he, who said that only those who became as little children should in any wise enter the kingdom of heaven (Mt 18:3), and who thanks to His Father for revealing the things of God to 'babes' (Mt 11:25).

CHILDREN (SONS) OF GOD

E. G. ROMANES

CHILDREN (SONS) OF GOD.—There are a few passages in the OT in which the term 'sons of God' is applied to angelic beings (Gn 6:4, Job 1:6, 21:18; cf. Dn 3:28 RV). Once the judges of Israel are referred to as 'gods,' perhaps as appointed by God and vested with His authority (but the passage is very obscure; may the words be ironical?); and, in parallel phrase, 'sons of the Most High' (Ps 80:2, cf. Jn 10:23; also, Ps 29:1, 89 RVm).

With these exceptions, the term, with the correlative one of 'Father,' designates the relation of God to men, with varying fulness of meaning. It is obvious that the use of such a figure has wide possibilities. To call God 'Father' may imply little more than that he is creator and ruler of all men, father of gods and men; or it may connoto some phase of His providence towards a favoured individual or nation; or, again, it may assert that a father's love at its highest is the truest symbol we can frame of God's essential nature and God's dispensation towards all men. Similarly, men may conceivably be styled 'children of God' from mere dependence, from special privilege, from moral likeness, or finally from a full and willing response to the Divine Fatherhood in filial love, trust, and obedience. It is, therefore, not surprising that the Scripture facts present a varying and progressive conception of God as Father and of men as His children.

I. IN THE OT.—The most characteristic use of the figure is in connexion with God's providential dealings with His people Israel. That favoured nation as a whole is 'His son,' He their 'Father'; it is because this tie is violated by Israel's ingratitude and apostasy that the prophets rebuke and appeal, while here, too, lies the hope of final restoration. Thus Hosea declares that God loved Israel and called His son out of Egypt (Hos 11, cf. Ex 4:29 'Israel is my son, my firstborn'); and, in spite of the Divine rejection of the Northern Kingdom (Hos 2:4, 'Lo-ammi, 'not my people'), prophesies that it shall still be said to them 'you are the sons of the living God' (11:1). So too Isaiah: 'I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me . . . Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider' (11:9). In Deuteronomy the same figure is used (19:9 and 11:14-16), and in the Song of Moses (Dt 32) receives striking development. God is the 'Father' of Israel, whom He begat by delivering them from Egypt, nourished in the wilderness and established (vv. 6-10, 16): the people are His 'sons and daughters,' His 'children' (v. 18, 30). Yet they are warned that this sonship has moral implications, and may be forfeited by neglect of them (v. 4 'they have dealt corruptly with me, they are not my children'); and the blessing is given of the bringing in of the Gentiles through a sonship based, not on national privilege but on faith and obedience (v. 29, cf. Ro 10:12, 14-16).

Thus if the relation is not merely formal but ethical, and on both sides. The Divine Fatherhood towards Israel is manifested in protecting and redeeming love: it involves the Divine faithfulness, to which His people may make appeal in their extremity (Jer 31:11, 33:16, 54:19). The child carries with it the obligation of filial response: 'a son honoureth his father . . . if then I be a father, where is mine

The Psalms have been left for separate reference. For if the religion of Israel had really attained to any clear conception of God as Father and of men as His children it must most naturally find utterance in these compositions, in which we have at once the devoutest expression of the personal religious consciousness and the chosen vehicle of the worship of the congregation. But the dominating conception is of God as King and of man as His servant. Thus, the Divine care for man and the Divine help are set forth under a wealth of imagery: God is shield, rock, fortress, refuge, shepherd, light, salvation, but not Father. Twice only is the name used of Him, not as appellative but in simile, to describe His tender mercies. He is 'a Father of the fatherless' (Ps 68:1); 'Like a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him' (103:14, cf. Is 66:14). Once the term 'thy children' is applied to 'Israel, even the pure in heart' (Ps 73:1); and in several passages the term 'son of God' is used of the theocratic king, as representing ideal Israel (Ps 2); see also Ps 89, 2, 21, 71, 113.

It cannot, then, be said that in the OT we have a doctrine of men as 'children of God,' springing from, and developed under, a conception of God as essentially in the analogous way. Nor is it clear that later Judaism made any advance towards this closer and more individual conviction of sonship.

Bouset affirms that 'the belief comes to light, more and more frequently the nearer we approach to Jesus' own time, that God is the Father of each individual believer' (Jesus, p. 113, Eng. ed.). But against this may be set the judgment of Wendt: 'In the later Judaism, down to the time of Jesus, there was by no means a development of the conception of God . . . inclining to a more prevalent use of the word Father. Nevertheless, the development proceeded in the way of enhancing to the utmost the idea of God's transcendent greatness and judicial authority over men. According to the Pharisaic view, the moral relation of man to God was one of legal subjection (Teaching of Jesus, i. 190).

The relevant passages in the Apocrypha, at least, leave the gulf unbridged between OT and NT (To 13, Wis 5:14, Sir 23:4, 26:10, 51:14, Ad. Est 16:19), and nowhere does the Lord's teaching appear in sharper contrast to current religious ideas than in relation to the Divine Fatherhood (e.g. Jn 8:12-43).

II. In the NT. —The outstanding fact is that in the sayings of Jesus Christ, and as in His teaching generally, the characteristic name for God is 'Father.' He enters into full inheritance of the OT conception of the Divine power and transcendence, proclaims a Kingdom of God, and develops its meaning for His disciples; but the King is also Father, and the stress of Christ's teaching on this side is not on the Kingship but on the Fatherhood of God. In what unique sense He knew God as 'His own Father,' Himself 'Son of God,' we shall here inquire (see Jesus Christ), noting only how simply, in the deepest experiences of joy or trouble, His faith uttered itself in the name 'Father' (Mt 11:25, Lk 23:46). But there was that in His religious consciousness which He could freely share with His disciples, and so of God': the faint and halting analogy of the OT became through Him a clear and steadfast revelation of the Divine Fatherhood, and of sonship, in its fullest sense, as the prototype of the normal relation of human to divine, to be conferred by God upon men through faith in Christ, attested by the indwelling Spirit and His fruits. 'Ye are all sons of God, through faith, in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3:26); 'The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God' (Ro 8:16); 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God' (Ro 8:14). It is as 'children of God' that his converts have a moral mission to the world (Ph 2:16).

honour? (Mal 1:4). But such response is, of necessity, not only national, but also, and first, individual; and the way is opened for a conception of God as Father of every man (cf. Mal 2:10), and of all men as, at least potentiell, 'children of God.'

The Psalms have been left for separate reference. For if the religion of Israel had really attained to any clear conception of God as Father and of men as His children it must most naturally find utterance in these compositions, in which we have at once the devoutest expression of the personal religious consciousness and the chosen vehicle of the worship of the congregation. It is as 'children of God' that his converts have a moral mission to the world (Ph 2:16).
CHILDREN, SONG OF THE THREE

The idea of sonship as a Divinely conferred status is expressed by St. Paul under the Roman custom of 'adoption' (wh. see), by which a stranger could be legally adopted as 'son' and endowed with all the privileges of the 'child' by birth (Eph 1:3, Ro 8:1). The figure suggests four points of analogy. To the Romans, St. Paul makes moral appeal on the ground that in exchange for the 'spirit of bondage' they had received the 'spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father' (Ro 8:15). In the passage Gal 4:4-5 he likens the state of the faithful under the Law to that of 'young children needing a tutor; 'heirs,' yet, because under guardians, differing nothing from 'bondservants.' The Law as 'tutor' has led them to Christ, in whom they are now 'sons of God'; Christ has 'redeemed' them from the bondage of Law that they might 'receive the adoption of sons,' and, because they are sons, 'God's glory' is revealed to our hearts (Ro 8:15). Thus this ultimate realization of sonship is 'to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8:29), so will deliverance from the 'bondage of corruption' reveal the 'sons of God,' and all creation shall share in 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8:19). This ultimate realization of sonship is 'to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8:29), so all creation shall share in 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8:19).

St. Paul further conceives of sonship as looking forward for its full realization. We are 'waiting for our adoption, to wit the redemption of our body' (Ro 8:23). As Christ was Son of God first by His resurrection, so 'declared to be the Son of God with power' (Ro 1:4), so will deliverance from the 'bondage of corruption' reveal the 'sons of God,' and all creation shall share in 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8:19). This ultimate realization of sonship is 'to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8:29), so as to deliverance from the 'bondage of corruption' will reveal the 'sons of God,' and all creation shall share in 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8:19).

4. Other NT writers.—The opening chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews emphasize the greatness and finality of the revelation through the Son, who, in stooping to redeem men is not ashamed to call them 'brethren'; they are 'children', whose nature He shares, 'sons' who through Him are brought to glory (He 2:9-15). And at the close of the Epistle the writers are exhorted to regard suffering as the Divine chastening, which marks them out as 'sons' and comes from 'the Father of spirits' (12:1-13). If the Epistle of St. James suggests a universal view of the Fatherhood of God in the phrases 'the God and Father,' 'the Lord and Father,' 'the Father of lights' (Ja 1:17), it also endorses the deeper spiritual sonship under which he will be brought up forth by the word of truth' (1:18). The same metaphor of spiritual birth is used by St. Peter. In 1 P 1:2 this birth, as in James, is through the 'word' of God; in 1 P 3:18 it is attributed to the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and is joined with the Pauline thought of an inheritance yet to be fully revealed. The name 'Father' appears as the distinctively Christian name for God—'if ye call him Father' (1 Th 5:14). But the idea of sonship is not developed; the thought does not occur in the enumeration of Christian privileges in 2:10-18, where the phrase 'sons of the living God' is absent from the reference to Hoses, though found in the corresponding reference by St. Paul (cf. 1 P 2:10 with Ro 8:15).

Finally, in Revelation we meet with this figure of sonship, with emphasis on its ethical side, in the vision of the new heaven and the new earth: 'He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God and he shall be my son' (Rev 21:7, cf. v.4).

CHILDREN, SONG OF THE THREE.—See APOCYTHA, p. 429.

CHILDEAB.—The second son of David by Abigail, the widow of Nabal the Carmelite (2 S 3). In 1 Ch 3 he is called Daniel.

CHILLAGH (Rev 10th R.V.).—See BAND.

CHILIASM.—A peculiar doctrine of the future, based upon a developed and literalized exposition of the typological pictures of the NT. "It is not a literal doctrine of the Millennium (whence its name from Gr. chilioi), that is to say, the period of 1000 years between the resurrection of the saints and that of the rest of the dead, of the visible appearance of Christ to them—His Kingdom of risen saints and defeat an equally literal Antichrist, and of the Last Judgment.

The germ of developed Chiliasm is to be found in the teaching of the Apostles, and particularly in Rev. 20, but it seems to have had no great prominence in doctrinal development until the middle of the 2nd cent., when it spread from Asia Minor, particularly among the Jewish Ebionites. Justin Martyr believed in the early reign of Christ, but knew that some orthodox Christians did not. Papias describes the coming Kingdom with the extravagant imagery of the Jewish Apocalyptic. The Montanists were extreme chiliasm, but Origen opposed the doctrine. Augustine may have said to have given the death-blow to the chiliasm expectation in the early Church by his identification of the Church with the Kingdom of God on earth, and throughout the Middle Ages his view obtained. A revival of chiliasm conceptions came with the Reformation, when attention was again concentrated on NT teaching. The fanatics among the reforming sects, particularly the Anabaptists, opposed the speedy establishment of Christ on earth, apparently taking some steps towards preparation thereof. The Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions, however, condemn the chiliasm, and the leadership, and the expectation of the speedy coming of Christ, did not attempt to literalize descriptions of this event. Throughout the 17th cent. the chiliasm views again appear—a fact doubtless due, as in the time of the early Church and of the Reformation, to persecution. The view, however, was never regarded as strictly orthodox, although advocated by prominent writers on both the Continent and in England.

In modern times Chiliasm has been championed by a number of prominent theologians, but particularly by sects like the Mormons, the Second Adventists, and, as pre-millenarians, by many professional evangelists. There is, however, no uniformity in these views, except as to the belief in the coming of the Millennium (see MILLENNIUM), in which all share. The opinions as to the nature of the Kingdom also range from extremely serious views like those of certain of the early Church Fathers to the highly speculative views of men like Oetinger. At the present time, outside of the circle of the pre-millenarians, chiliasm views have little influence, and the tendency is strong to substitute belief in social evolution, under the inspiration of Christianity, for the cataclysmic establishment of a literal kingdom by Jesus at His second Advent.

S. MILLER, MATHEWS.

CHILLION and Mahlon were the two sons of Elemelech and Naomi (Ru 12-3). They married women of the Moabites—Mahlon marrying Ruth, and Chillon Orphah (Ru 40)—and after a sojourn of ten years in Moabite territory died there. "Chillon means 'stickly.' Neither of these names occurs elsewhere in the Bible. The two names occur in varying order in Ru 1:3 and 4, so that no conclusion can be drawn as to which was the elder.

CHILMAD occurs in Ezk 27:27 at the close of the list of nations that traded with Tyre. The name has been thought to be the Aram. form of Charmane, a town on the Euphrates mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. 1. 8. 10). George Smith identified Chilmad with the modern Kaludha near Baghdad—but neither of these conjectures has much probability.

CHIMHAM.—Probably the son (cf. I K 27) of Barzillai the Gileadite, who returned with David from beyond Jordan to Jerusalem after the death of Absalom (2 S 19:41). See further, GURANT—CHIMHAM.

CHIMNEY.—See HOUSE, § 7.

CHINNERETH.—A city (Dt 31; Jos 11 [In latter spell Chinneroth]) which gave its name to the Sea of Chinnereth (Nu 34:4, Jos 12:27, the OT designation of the Sea of Galilee). The site of the town is uncertain, but it follows Rakkath (probably Tiberias), and may have been in the plain of Gennesaret (cf. I K 10:26).

CHIOS.—An island in the Egean Sea opposite the Ionia; it lies near Asia Minor. In the 6th cent. B.C., the inhabitants were the richest of all the Greeks. The city was distinguished in literature also, and claimed to be the birth-place of Homer. Up to the time of Vespasian it was, under the Roman Empire, a free State. The chief city was also named Chios. St. Paul passed on it his last voyage in the Egean Sea (Ac 20:15).

CHISLEV (AV Chisleu, Neh 1; Zec 6; also Tnm.)—Father of Eldad, Reuben's representative for dividing the land (Nu 36:20).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, Jos 19:12.—See CHISLOTH.

CHITHLISH (Jos 19:14, AV Kithlish).—A town in the Shephelah of Judah. The site is unknown.

CHITTIM (1 Mac 1:83; 92; also Ramban, etc.)—As shown by the appositional phrase 'your god-star,' this name refers to the Assyrian Kartashu, the planet Saturn (cf. Nibir, war-god), whose temple, Bai Nibir, in the province of Chittim (Nu 34:4, Jos 12:27), is mentioned by the Egyptian governors of this city as early as c. 1450. The translation of the word as an appellative ('pedestal') by some is to the vocalization of the Massoretes, who are supposed to have considered it a common noun. However, it is more probable that they, considering of its reference, substituted for the original vowels those of the word shiquqat (abomination) — an epithet often applied to strange gods.

K. Nozert.

CHLOE (it is mentioned only in 1 Co 1:11).—St. Paul had been informed of the dissenions at Corinth prob. by some of her Christian slaves. Chloe herself may have been either a Christian or a heathen, and may have lived either at Corinth or at Ephesus. In favour of the latter is St. Paul's usual tact, which would not suggest the invidious mention of his informants' names, if they were members of the Corinthian Church.

CHOBA (Jth 4; Ghobai 15, noticed with Damascus).—Perhaps the land of Hobab (wh. see).

CHOIR (Neh 12:43).—See PRAISE.

CHOLA.—An unknown locality mentioned in Jth 15.

CHOLER is used in Sir 31:2 34:24 in the sense of a disease, 'perhaps cholera, diarrhoea'—Ost. Eng. Dict. (R.V. 'colic'); and in Dn 8:11 in the sense of bitter anger. Both meanings are old, and belonged indeed to the Lai. choleres as early as the 3rd and 4th centuries.

CHORAZIN.—A place referred to only in the demarcation by Christ (Mt 11:19, Mk 10:14). It is with probability identified with Kerioth, north of Tell Hum, where are remains of pillars, walls, etc., of basilil.

CHORBE (AV Corbe), 1 Es 5:9=Zaccai, Ezr 2:17, Neh 7:4.

CHOSAMÆUS (1 Es 9:29).—It is not improbable that the Gr. reading is due to a copyist's error, especially seeing that the three proper names that follow Simeon in the text of Ezr 2:17 are omitted in 1 Eedras.

CHRIST.—See Jesus Christ, and Messiah.

CHRISTIAN.—This name, from very early times the distinctive title of the followers of Jesus Christ, occurs only thrice in NT (Ac 11:26, 1 P 4:14).

1. Time and place of origin.—Our only information on this point comes from Ac 11:26. It was in Antioch, and in connexion with the mission of Barnabas and Saul to that city, that the name arose. It has sometimes been suggested that the infrequent use of 'Christian' in the NT points to a considerably later origin, and that the author of Ac 15:11-29 has there assigned it to so early a date than the fact that the founding of the first Gentile church appeared to him to be an appropriate occasion for its coming into use.

But apart from St. Luke's narrative, we possess an historian of Christ and early Christianity, to have 'traced the course of all things accurately from the first,' his own non-employment of the word as a general designation for the disciples of Christ suggests that he had reason other than a genuine historical one for referring to the origin of the name at all.

2. Authors of the name.—(1) It is exceedingly unlikely that it was originally adopted by the Christians themselves. As the NT shows, they were in the habit of using other designations—'the disciples' (Ac 11:26 and passim), 'the brethren' (Ac 14:8; Ro 16:10 and constantly), 'the election of God' (Ac 9:12, 10:12, 'believers' (Ac 5:14, 1 Ti 4:12), 'the Way' (Ac 9:19). But in NT times we never find them calling themselves Christians. In Ac 26:8 it is King Agrippa who employs the name. And though in 1 P 4:16 it comes from the pen of an Apostle, it shows that he is using it as a term of accusation on the lips of the Church's enemies.

(2) It cannot have been applied to the followers of Jesus by the Jews. The Jews believed in 'the Christ,' i.e. the 'Anointed One,' the Messiah; and they ardently looked for Him to come. But it was their passionate contention that Jesus of Nazareth was not the Messiah. Yet it is in Paul's letters to the Galatians and Romans that the term 'Christ' occurs most frequently. The NT authors clearly saw that the use of their term was unlikely to meet with the approval of the Jews; and the solution of the problem is to be found in the fact that many of the early Christians were Jewish converts. They had no longer the feeling of rejection by their Jewish brethren which actuated the Hellenistic Jews of Antioch. The Church was no longer only a Jewish sect. It was now a new body, differing in some respects from the Jewish church, but at the same time the natural development of it. The name "Christian" was a natural one for such a body. It was, then, in the sense of 'the followers of the Christ of the Nazarenes' that the new sect chose to call itself. (See also section on "Christianity," chap. iv.)

3. The spread of the name.—Originating in this casual way, the name took deep root in the soil of human speech, and the three passages of the NT in which it occurs show how widely it had spread within the course of a single generation. In Ac 26:8 we find it on the lips of a Jewish ruler, speaking in Cesarea before an audience of Roman officials and within 20 years after it was first used in Antioch. A few years later St. Peter writes to 'the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia' (1 P 1:1); and it is clear that 'Christian' was then a name which the Church had yet adopted as its own, he assumes that it was perfectly familiar to the 'elect' themselves over a vast region of the Dispersion; and further implies that by this time, the time probably of Nero's persecution (A.D. 64), Christianity to be called a Christian was equivalent to being liable to suffer persecution for the sake of Christ (44). It was later still that St. Luke wrote the Book of Acts; and when he says that the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (Ac 11:26), he evidently means that this word was assumed by which they were to be commonly known, though his own usage does not suggest that they had evven yet assumed it themselves.

Outside of the NT we find Tacitus and Suetonius testifying to the designation Christianus (or 'Christian') being popularly used in Rome at the time of the Neronian persecution; while from Pliny, early in the 2nd cent., we learn that by his day it was employed in Roman courts of law. As to the meaning, it was the same:
he was himself accustomed to put to persons brought before him on a charge of being followers of Christ. By the time of Polycarp's martyrdom (soon after the middle of the 2nd cent.), the term of accusation and cross-examination has become one of joyful profession. 'I am a Christian' was Polycarp's repeated answer to those who urged him to recant. It was natural that those who were called 'to suffer as Christians' should come to glory in the name that brought falsehood. And so a name given by the outside world in a casual fashion was adopted by the Church as a title of glory and pride.
In this, its first appearance by and by, and in this meaning was simply 'a follower of Christ.' The Antiochenes did not know who this Christ was of whom the preachers spoke; so little did they know that they mistook for a proper name what was really a designation of Jesus. But, taking it to be His personal name, they called Christ's disciples 'Christians,' just as Pompey's followers had been called 'Pompeians,' or the adherents of Caesarean 'Caesarians.' No doubt they used the word with a touch of good-humoured contempt—the Christians were the followers of somebody or other called Christ. It is contemp again, but of an interan kind, which they seem to be conscious of, when Agrippa's words to St. Paul, 'With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian!' (Ac 26:28). In 1 Peter a darker shadow has fallen upon the name. Nero has made it criminal to be a Christian, and the word is now one not of scorn merely, but of hatred and fear.
The State ranks a Christian with murderers and thieves and other malefactors (cf. 1 P 4:4 with v.4). On its adoption by the Church, deeper meanings began to be read into it. It testified to the dignity of the Church's Lord—the Anointed One, the rightful King of that Kingdom which hath no end. It proclaimed the principle that belonged to Christians themselves, for they too were anointed with the oil of God to be a holy generation, a royal priesthood. Moreover, in Greek the word Christos ('anointed') suggested the more familiar word chrestos ('gracious'). The Christians were often misnamed 'Christians,' from an idea that the founder of their religion was 'one Christos.' And this heathen blunder conveyed a happy and beautiful suggestion. It is possible that St. Peter himself is playing on the word 'Christ' when he writes (1 P 2:2),
'If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious (chrestos).' And by and by we find Tertullian reminding the enemies of the Church that the very name 'Christian,' which they applied to Christ's people in error, is one that speaks of sweetness and benignity.

5. The historical significance of the name.—(1) It marked the distinct emergence of Christianity from Judaism.
and the recognition of its right to a separate place among the religions of the world. Hibberto, outside, Christianity had been only a Jewish sect (cf. the words of Galio, Ac 18:4, 4-), nor had the first Apostles themselves dreamed of it as a religious kingdom excluding the synagogues and Temple. But the Antiochenes saw that Christ's disciples must be distinguished from the Jews and put into a category of their own. They understood, however dimly, that a new religion had sprung up on the earth, and by giving its followers this new name, they helped to quicken in the mind of the Church itself the consciousness of a separate existence. (2) It marked the fact, not heretofore realized, that Christianity was a religion for the Gentiles. Probably it was instituted in Antioch not to appeal to Jews, but to Christ, but preached Him 'unto the Greeks also' (Ac 11:28), that the inhabitants discerned in these men the heralds of a new faith. It was not the way of the Apostles to propagandize Christianity in the market-place. Christianity appeared in Antioch as a universal religion, making no distinction between Jew and Gentile. (3) It is not without significance that it was first in Antioch that the Christians received up in the universal faith. Paul saw this clearly—helped to it without doubt by his experiences at this very time.
And so Antioch became the headquarters of mis-We
ional labours, and through him the headquarters of aggressive Christianity in the early Apostolic age (136-146, 156-166, 168-170). It served as a stepping-stone for that movement, inevitable from the day when Christianity was first preached unto the Gentiles, and spread from Antioch, not by Rome, but to the other parts of the world, the mother-city also of the universal Church.

(4) The name marked the fact that Christianity was the religion of a book or a dogma, an idea or an institution, but a faith that centered in a Person.
The men of Antioch were mistaken when they supposed that Christ was a personal name, but they made no mistake in thinking that He whose name they took upon themselves to be confessed was the Person mentioned in this new faith. By calling the disciples Christians they became unconscionable prophets of the truth that Christianity, whether regarded from the side of historical revelation or of personal experience, is all summed up in the Person of Jesus Christ.

J. C. LAMBERT.

Christianity.—When the name 'Christian' (see preceding art.) had come to be the specific designation of a follower of Jesus Christ, it was inevitable that the word 'Christianity' should sooner or later be used to denote the faith which Christians profess. The word does not occur in the NT, however, and first makes its appearance in the letters of Ignatius early in the 2nd century. But for 1800 years it has been the regular term for the religion which claims Jesus Christ as its founder, and recognizes His Person and work the sine qua non of its belief and existence.

Christianity presents itself to us under two aspects—objective and subjective, past and present, world-historical and personal. It is a great fact of universal history, but also a truth of personal experience. It is the revelation given from above, but also an appropriation from within. We must think of it therefore
(1) as it was historically revealed to the world; (2) as it is realized in the life of the individual.

I. Christianity as a Historical Revelation.—In dealing with this part of the subject two opposite mistakes must be avoided. (1) First the mistake of those who confound history with dogma, principles with institutions, and read back into Christianity as a Divine revelation the later creeds and rites and orders of the Church. It was inevitable that the Christian religion in the course of its history should clothe itself in outward forms, but it is not to be identified with the form that it has assumed. In dealing with the subject, we are limited, of course, by the plan of this work, to the Biblical material.
But apart from that, the view taken in the present chapter is that, in seeking to discover Christianity in its essential nature, we must accept the NT as our authority and norm, inasmuch as there alone we find the historical record of the life and self-witness of Jesus Christ, and also the writings of that Apostolic group which ministered in the immediate light of His manifestation as that was given not only in His life on earth, but in His death and resurrection and their extraordinary spiritual results.

(2) On the other hand, we must avoid the error of those who, wishing to preserve 'back to Christ,' and demand the substitution of the Christ of history for the Christ of dogma, assume that nothing that is supernatural can be historical, and that the Christ whom we find in the NT—the Christ of the Incarnation and the Resurrection and the Anointing, the Christ who wrought His miracles and claimed to be the Son of God, and was so accepted by those who had known Him in the flesh and subsequently knew Him in the Spirit—is not the Jesus of the gospel of John. To this the apostle St Paul seized upon this truth when he saw in the altar at Athens inscribed 'To an Unknown God,' an unconscious appeal to the Christian missionary to declare the God and Father of Jesus Christ (Ac 17:22). He saw through this that Judaism had no more accounts for Christianity than the soil accounts for the mighty tree which springs out of it. While carefully relating Himself to Judaism, Jesus no less carefully discriminated between the permanence and the passing in its institutions. He claimed the right not only to give a fresh reading of its ancient laws (Mt 5:22, 23), but even to abrogate certain laws altogether (v. 27). He set His authority to the substitution of 'them of old time' (Mt 5 passim), but above Moses (19:11, 22:21), in John (5:39) and Solomon (Mt 12:41), Abraham (Jn 8:35) and David (Mt 22:45). It was this freedom of Jesus in dealing with the old religion that astonished His hearers: 'He taught them as having authority, and not as their scribes' (7:14). Moreover, His attitude of independence towards Judaism is illustrated by the opposition of the Jewish leaders to the Church. He contrasted the standing proof that He and His religion did not grow out of Judaism but grew out of Judaism by any process of natural evolution. St Paul sets the immense difference between the two religions in the clearest light of history. These differences were therefore, with the original application of the name 'Christianity' that in seeking for the meaning of the word 'Christianity' we should make full use of the Apostolic testimony regarding Christ.

As a religion appearing in history, Christianity had its historical relations and its historical root. (a) It was related to all the old ethnic faiths, and to every religious experience of vision and longing, of striving and despair, that has been a part of man ever known. The study of Comparative Religion is enabling us to realize this as it has never been realized before; but the NT makes the general truth perfectly plain. God speaks to man in the visible world (Ro 1:20). He writes His revelation on the natural heart (2 Cor 3:3). He never leaves Himself without witness (Ac 14:7). And on their part men grope through the darkness after God (Ac 17:27), being dimly conscious of the truth that they are also His offspring (v. 30). And when Christ comes, He comes not only as the Light of the world (Jn 8:12), but as the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into it (19)—a statement which implies that even apart from His historical manifestation in Judæa, the heavenly Christ was the Light and Life of all men, and that there is a sense in which a soul may be 'naturally Christian' as Tertullian said.

(b) But while Christianity was and is related to all the ethnic faiths, it was deeply rooted in the soil of the OT. In the pagan religions we find many anticipations of Christianity, but in Judaism there is a definite and Divine preparation for it. Law and prophecy, past history and future hope, the two testaments, all contributed directly and indirectly to this great result. St Paul declares that 'the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ' (Gal 3:24). The Evangelists draw attention again and again to the fact, so evident to every discerning reader of Scripture, that the prophets were heralds of the Christ who was to come. The author of Hebrews shows us that the ministries of Tabernacle and Temple were examples and shadows of Christ's heavenly priesthood. In the Fourth Gospel we find Jesus Himself affirming that 'salvation is of the Jews' (Jn 4:4), and in that very sermon in which He sets forth the manifesto of His own Kingdom, He proclaims that He came to fulfill and not to destroy the Law and the Prophets of Israel (Mt 5:17).

2. But notwithstanding its historical connections with the past, Christianity was a new and unique revelation. Its religions, its churchly structure, is history; this new revelation of God through Jesus Christ is history. (a) It is a revelation of God through the life and in the persons of Jesus Christ. Upon this there is no disagreement whatever of those who call themselves Christians are practically agreed. 'God was in Christ' (2 Co 8:4); and in the human face of Jesus there so shone the brightness of the Eternal Glory (4:4) that he that hath seen Him hath seen the Father (Jn 14:9). In His teaching Jesus revealed God to us as our Father in heaven; in His own tenderness and pity and boundless love for men He showed us what the heavenly Fatherhood really means. And so, as we read the Gospels, the same assurance grows in us looking on the face of Jesus Christ we are seeing right into the heart of the invisible God.

There are those, however, who, while fully admitting all this, yet hesitate to recognize the personal revelation of the Divine nature in human form. For them Jesus as the Revealor has the worth of God without being Himself God. But this is not the Christ who is presented to us in the NT; and if we fall short of the NT view of Christ, our Christianity will not be the Christianity of the NT. If, on the other hand, we can bring the Epistles as our authorities, we must hold upon their evidence not only that 'God was in Christ,' but that He so dwell in Christ that Christ Himself was God; and that historical Christianity is nothing less than an immediate revelation of the Divine nature through the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ.
CHRISTIANITY

(b) Christianity is the religion not only of the revelation of God but of the redemption of man. The paganism that feared altars to an unknown God proved importunate to redeem human life from the dominion of evil (see Ro 1:20), while the visions of the Divine that came to true Israelites only made them more deeply conscious of their sin and need (cf. Is 6). Th. the Church is announced in His very name; He came 'to save his people from their sins' (Mt 1:21). His own testimony runs: 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19:10).

St. Paul sets before us as the Divine Reconciler and Redeemer. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5:18, cf. Ro 5:20); He sent forth His Son that we might have redemption through His blood, and might receive the forgiveness of sins (Lk 23:38). The Christian's vision of Him is not as He was in the Old Testament, but as He is in the New Testament, where the Saviour is so described: 'He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature. For in Him all things were created, both in the heavens and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or rulers or powers-all things have been created through Him and for Him. He is before all things, and in Him all things hold together' (Col 1:15-17). The doctrine of the Trinity, the mystery of the Incarnation, the person of the Holy Spirit, and the atonement of Christ, are all revealed in this majestic vision of Him who is the light of the world, the true light that enlightens every man coming into the world (Jn 1:9).

(c) Christianity is the religion of perfected character. Whatever may be the case with other faiths, Christianity permits of no divorce between religion and morality. It is the pure laws of justice and of mercy, the purest laws in the world. Judaism was based upon a natural law of perfect morality and purity. But the law which Jesus gave and which His Apostles enforced is broader and loftier beyond comparison—a law for heart and mind as well as for the outward life, forbidding unreasonable anger equally with murder (v.21), and unholy desire no less than adultery (v.14). Moreover, Christ not only joined this heavenly standard of character, but exemplified it personally. It is not a theory and ideal that He sets before us, but one that has been realized in a human life. The ethics of Jesus are the ethics of His own example; 'the mind of Christ' is the Christian's in-dwelling and law of life (Phil 2:5).

(d) Christianity is the religion of a regenerated society. It has the promise not of personal perfection only, but of the establishment of a Society pure, blessed, and wonderful in its nature. The Kingdom was the characteristic word of Jesus in proclaiming His message; and so both Mt. and Mk. describe His gospel as the 'gospel of the Kingdom' (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:14). And as of a Divine King is the first implication of the word, the second is the harmonious relation of the subjects of the Kingdom to one another. Love is the rule of the Kingdom (Mt 20:29; Jn 13:34; 15:17); and love from its very nature is the fulfilling of all social law (Ro 13:8, 10; Gal 5:14). The Church which Christ established is the organization of this social Kingdom for moral and religious ends (Mt 16:18, 18). And when Christ's people shall have been joined together in a perfect unity, they shall have shared those things in harmony of brotherly love and mutual co-operation, even as they are severally joined to Him who is their Head (Ro 12:3; 1 Co 12:12; Eph 2:15; 5:18). When the Church is fulfilled in the kingdom of heaven, there will come the realization of that perfect Society which is variously shadowed forth in the NT under the figures of a Kingdom from which there have been cast forth all things that cause stumbling (Mt 16:20), a glorious Church without spot or wrinkle or any such thing (Eph 5:27), a Holy City, the New Jerusalem, 'descending out of heaven from God' (Rev 21:2).

II. Christianity as a Personal Experience.—Christianity is not only a revelation in history, but a reality of personal life. Without Christians there would be no Christianity. What is it then that constitutes men Christians, and so translates the historical fact of the revelation of Jesus Christ into the religion which has lived through the centuries and surrounds us to-day?

Fundamental to Christianity, regarded as a historical revelation, may all be summed up in the fact of Christ, so, when it is considered as a personal reality, it may all be included in the faith that lays hold and appropriates Christ. The whole effort of Jesus during His earthly ministry was directed to this end—to secure faith in Himself. And when His death and resurrection and the experiences of Pentecost had revealed Him to His followers as the Son of God and the only begotten Son of God, they became the first demand of the Christian preacher (Ac 2:22, 38; 3:16; 11:10, 13:11, etc.). So much was this the case, that the first disciples were called 'Christians' (Ac 11:26) and they were baptized in the name of Jesus Christ (Ac 10:47; 11:15; Acts 2:41), while others were distinguished from them as unbelievers (Ac 14:1, 1 Co 6:1 and passim). And as Christ had shown Himself to be, not the revealer of the Father and the redeemer of men, but the Son of God, to whom He gave the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins (Ac 2:38). So St. Paul in like manner, when the Philippian jailor cried out in the night, 'What must I do to be saved?' replied, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved' (Ac 16:30, 31)—words which contain in brief the essence of the Apostolic testimony as to the way of salvation. And when we would learn from the NT how the Christian life of faith which has begun, through faith in Christ dwells in our hearts (Eph 3:17). This is the secret of that abiding in Christ which secures Habitation in us (Jn 15:6), and results in the fruitfulness that makes us worthy to be called His disciples (v.4).

2. The next principle of the Christian life is obedience. Between faith and obedience there is no opposition any more than between the roots of a tree and its fruits and flowers. And yet, in the one case as in the other, the secret spring of life and its outward manifestations may be distinguished and regarded as the root and the fruit of Christianity, as we have seen, is the religious principle of faith; but from that root there grows an ethical practice bringing life into conformity with all divine laws. The actual conduct of perfectly Christian people has always served as the world's rough test of Christianity. As applied by the world, it is a rude, imperfect test; for the obedience wrought by faith is a product far too fine and subtle to be fully judged by the world's coarse thumb and finger.' The law by which a Christian walks is a law that it needs a Christian mind to appreciate. But though often roughly applied, the test of obedience to God is an unfolding garden of what claims to be Christianity. It was Christ Himself who said, 'Therefore by your fruits you shall know them. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7:21).

3. The third great principle is love. For Christianity is social as well as ethical and religious. It is a Divine Kingdom whose subjects stand in a definite relation not only to the King but to all their fellows. Now love is the proper attitude of every Christian to all those of whatsoever name for whom Christ died; and love binds men together as they are bound by nothing else. Even worldly kingdoms are beginning to learn, through the gradual infiltration of Christian ideas into the general mind, that neither force nor mutual self-interest is the true bond of society, but the brotherhood of love. How to produce and secure such brotherhood remains the difficulty for the statesmen of the world. But Jesus, who first gave clear utterance to this great social law, also furnished the sufficient motive for giving effect to it within His own Kingdom. His love to strangers inspires His disciples to love one another (Jn 13:15), and also to love all men after the example of the Divine "philanthropy" (Mt 5:42; cf. Tii 3:8, Ro 5:8). And so the faith in Christ which in the ethical sphere brings us into obedience to God, fills the social sphere with the bloom and fragrance of a universal love to man. Thus once more we are brought back to Him who is at once the object of Christian faith and its 'leader and perfecter' (He 12:2). And whether we think of Christianity as revealed or realized, as a historical manifestation of the Divine or a present human experience, we may justly say that it is all comprehended in Jesus Christ Himself.

CHRISTOLOGY.—See Person of Christ.

CHRISTOLOGIES, I. AND II.—1. Position in Canon.—It is quite clear from linguistic and other considerations that Chron.-Ezr.-Neh. originally formed one book. As the first part of this great work dealt with a period which was already covered by Samuel and Kings, it was omitted, to begin with, in the formation of the Canon; while the latter part of the book, dealing with the ecclesiastical life of Jerusalem after the Exile, was granted a place. Only as the liturgical and ritual interest became more predominant did the Chronicler, as late as 1 Enoch, cast a glimpse of a future Kingdom, containing matter of special importance from that point of view. Hence the book was included in the Canon after Ezr. and Neh., which had originally formed its second and concluding portion. In the English Bible, which follows the LXX, the original order has been restored, but Chron. is the last book in the Hebrew canon. Its Hebrew name is Dibhare Hayyim, i.e. 'the Annals.' The LXX entitled it the Paralipomena, or 'things left out,' a reference to the fact that Chron. contains much not found in the earlier narratives of Samuel and Kings. Our word 'Chronicles' is the Anglicized form of Chronicon, the name given to the book by Jerome in translating Dibhare Hayyim.

2. Aim.—The key to the understanding and estimation of Chron. lies in a clear grasp of its aim. It is not history, as we understand the term, but history rewritten from a late standpoint, with the intention of carrying back into a remote past the origin of customs which the writer considered to be vital for true faith. He is concerned with the history of Judah, and that history interests him only in so far as it has special reference to the worship and institutions of the second Temple. This determines his choice of matter, and the treatment of such facts as he selects. The Northern Kingdom, politically so much more important than the kingdom of Judah, hardly comes within his range of view, and is referred to only when the narrative absolutely necessitates it.

3. Contents.—With this clue the contents of the book are easily grouped.

(i) 1 Ch 1-9, Adam to the death of Saul. These chapters are filled mainly with genealogical tables, but history, as we understand the term, is not here the ecclesiastical interest is more prominent: Judah and Levi have the greatest space given to them (28-42 6).

(ii) 1 Ch 10-29, from the death of Saul to the accession of Solomon.

(iii) 2 Ch 1-9, the reign of Solomon.

(iv) 2 Ch 10-36, from the division of the kingdom down to the fall of Jerusalem, and the restoration edict of Cyrus.

In the minds of the Chronicler the most carefully chosen, with the object of bringing out the importance of Judah, the greatness of the line of David, the religious value of Jerusalem, and the position of the Levites. A comparison of the narrative in Chron. with the earlier narratives of Samuel and Kings will do more than anything else to convince the reader of the pragmatism of the Chronicler.

(a) Omissions in Chronicles.—The whole career of Samuel; the reign of Saul except its close; the struggle David had to establish himself on the throne; the story of Uriah and Bathsheba; the story of Ammon and Tamar; Absalom's rebellion and David's flight; the Job's characteristic or Oriental intrigue attending Solomon's accession; his alliances with foreign women and his idolatries in later life; his struggle against disaffection and rebellion; practically the entire history of the Northern Kingdom—all these sections are omitted, with the view of suppressing what might be held to be discreditable to the religious heroes.

(b) The additions to the narrative show how the Chronicler's thoughts ran. He gives, as we should have expected, full statistical lists (1 Ch 12); he describes at length matters that have to do with the gradual elevation of the sanctuary at Jerusalem (1 Ch 13, 15, 16); he details the ordering of the Temple ministry and the genealogies of the temple members (1 Ch 23-26). There is a large class of additions connected with ritual, and especially with musical matters, a fact which has led to the suggestion that the writer was perhaps one of the temple musicians (2 Ch 25:2-8; 15:18-20; 16:14). He also handles historical events as to make them bear out his particular theory of the working of Providence. To love God is to be blessed; to sin against God is immediately to feel the inevitable. His view was that the religious meaning of particular events is pointed out to us by the wrong-doers by prophets of the Lord (1 Ch 10:18, 2 Ch 12:13-14; 15:15-16; 16:9-20; 21:12; 29:14). In 2 Ch 28 the removal of the daughter of Pharaoh, whom Solomon had married, from the city of David to the house that he had built for her, is said to have been occasioned by the house of David having become too holy because of the coming of the ark. The compiler of Kings assigns no such reason for the removal to the new house (1 K 3:7, 94). It was a stumbling-block to the later writer that so bad a king as Manasseh should have enjoyed so long a reign, and so he describes him as a battering-pendent king. He thought of any such change (cf. 2 Ch 33:11-12 with 2 K 21 and Jer 15).

(c) Alterations have been made in the narrative with the view of removing what seemed offensive to the later age. Kings distinctly says that Asa and Jehoshaphat did not abolish the high places, although they did what was right in the sight of the Lord (1 K 15:14). Such a confession of well-doing is incredible to the Chronicler, so he says that the high places were abolished by these kings (2 Ch 14 175). He finds it necessary to change several narratives in the interests of the Levites, who were not assigned so important a place in matters of ritual under the monarchy as in the days when he was writing (cf. 1 Ch 13, 15 with 2 S 6; 2 Ch 6 with 1 K 8). According to the original account (2 K 11), Jehoada was assisted in his rebellion against Athaliah by the foreign bodyguard. In 2 Ch 23 the bodyguard is replaced by the Levites. The rule of the second Temple did not allow aliens to approach so near to the sacred things.

4. Historicism.—It is thus evident that Chron. is not to be considered as history, in the modern sense, but as a compilation of the earlier narratives of Samuel and Kings, in the light of the writer's own point of view. The use of the word. The events of the time with which the writer was concerned occurred in a particular religious interest. Some facts have been stated not simply as 103 they were in themselves, but as they appeared to one whose vision was influenced by his theological viewpoint. Of course, they have been suppressed when they interfered with the conveying of the impression that David and Solomon were almost immeasurable kings. To a past age were attributed the customs and ceremonial of a distant age, driven by the writer lived. The Priest's Code was supposed to have been recognized and observed by David even before the Temple was built. Again and again an anachronism has been committed that the Levites might have the place of honour in the record. Some special features of this method of writing history are:

(a) Exaggerated numbers.—Every one has felt difficulty with regard to these numbers. Palestine to-day is by no means the same inhabited. In the total that one of its inhabitants is only about 600,000. At its greatest prosperity the number may have reached 25 millions. But we read (2 Ch 12:10) that Abijah with 400,000 king's men, was an inhabitant of Jerusalem. This figure has been exaggerated to 900,000 in the Chronicles. The name of Jephthah has been raised to 700,000, 150,000, and 300,000, the latter figure being probably a round number. Other examples could be multiplied of numbers more than twice as great as the evidence indicates. These numbers seem to have been inserted to convey the impression of a glorious past, rather than to record the facts of the times. But it cannot be denied that the number of inhabitants of the world has continued to increase, owing to the small number of people who have perished in wars and massacres.

(b) Anachronisms creep in to show that the writer was carrying back to that earlier day the customs and names of his own time. 1 Ch 23:15 says that 1,000 men had the tasks of the gatekeepers. It is said that the number of Levites in the tabernacle was 60,000. The number of the gatekeepers must have been very small when compared with the number of the people. Another example is found in 1 Ch 22:30, where it is said that 600,000 men were present when the ark was brought into the temple. This figure is too large to be true, and the writer has probably exaggerated it to impress the reader with the size of the army.

The importance of a fixed era by which to date events was not discovered by the Hebrews until after their national existence came to an end. All the endeavours to fix such an era were unsuccessful. The writer of the Chronicles may have intended to convey the impression that the building of Solomon's temple was 480 years from the Exodus (1 K 6:1)—belonging to the post-exilic period. During the existence of the monarchy all that was thought necessary was to date by the year of the reigning king. If we had a complete series of public documents for all the reigns, this would answer very well for historical purposes. But what has actually come down to us is at best only a fragmentary series of notices based in part on official records.

Numerical statements there are in plenty in the Bible, and among them all those in the Books of Kings most deserve attention as the basis for a scientific chronology. At first sight their accuracy seems to be guaranteed, because they check each other for the time covered by the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Not only does the author give us the length of the reigns in the two lines, but he also tells us that the king of Judah would reign over 20 years, and the king of Israel would reign over 40 years. The writer of the Chronicles has, however, been very careless in counting the years. The statement that the king of Judah would reign over 20 years is often wrong. For example, we learn that Jehoshaphat of Judah came to the throne in the fourth year of Ahab of Israel; also that Ahab reigned 22 years. Yet we are told that Ahab, who followed Ahab after his death, came to the throne in the Seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat, and in addition that Athaziah's brother Jehoram, who could be crowned only after the two years' reign assigned to the latter, succeeded in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22:5-7, 2 K 9:3).

This example makes us give up the synchronisms and turn our attention to the length of reigns, where we have reason to suppose that the figures are drawn from earlier documents. The history gives a convenient point of division at the accession of Jehu in Israel and of Athaliah in Judah, for these two came to the throne in the same year. The two sets of lengths of reigns ought to give the same sum for the period. But they do not. In one line we find 95 years and in the other 98.

It is possible that the discrepancy here is due to the mode of reckoning. The reigns are given as so many years without regard to fractions, yet it will be manifest that few if any reigns are an exact number of years. Where the method of dating by reigns is in vogue, the fractions may be treated in two ways. If a king dies in the tenth year of his reign, for example, the calendar year may continue to be called his tenth; and the next calendar year will be the first of his successor. But it will also be possible to begin at once to date by the first year of the new king, making the old king's reign of ten years. In this latter case the public records will show more years (judging by the dates) than there actually are, by one in each reign. According to this method, the number of years from David to Solomons first year was 400, which cannot be far from correct. The next period, however,—from Athaliah to Hezekiah, and from Jehu to the fall of Samaria,—gives us greater difficulty. Here we find the possibility of considerable error in older chronology, which can be shown by a simple example. If we regard the year 840 of the old chronology, when in the new period the year ran from 840 to 841, the difference is considerable. For in the old period, the years 840 to 841, when the death of Hezekiah is recorded, are in the new period 842 to 843. The difference in the two periods is considerable. The question which of these systems is the earliest is still unsettled. It may be said to have only an academic interest, since we know that no one of them gives us authentic data for the antiquity of the world.

Fortunately our appreciation of the Bible does not depend upon the accuracy of its dates. In general the picture it gives of the sequence of events from the time of the Judges down to the Fall of Jerusalem is correct. Of late years we have received welcome light on the dates of certain Biblical events from the Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions. These empires had made advances in accurate chronology; and, contrary to what has been supposed, the dates of the Bible, for officially recognized periods in the regulation of the calendar. While they did not date from a fixed era, they had a reckoning of time which secured accuracy for their historical records. Each dynasty for an official period had its own calendar, with an eponym, and records were kept showing the series of eponyms with brief notes of the events in each one's year. These lists have come down to us in fragmentary form, but we are able by them to correct some of the dates of our Hebrew history. The accuracy of the Babylonian system has been tested by its records of eclipses as far back as the year b.c. 763.

More than a hundred systems of Biblical Chronology have been invented or reckoned out,—another testimony to the uncertain nature of the Biblical data. The received system, which has found a place in the margin of our reference Bibles, is well known to be that of the renowned Archbishop Usher. By the Babylonian method, Usher noted by the end of the Babylonian captivity, there would be 630 years from the Creation to the Flood. The uninstructed character of the numbers in this table is now generally conceded. The conclusions made from the time of the fall of Samaria are of much greater importance. We have been able to determine the length of time from the Creation to the coming of the Messiah would be 4000 years.

Four thousand is 100 generations of 40 years each. Among those familiar with the OT figures will recall how common it is to find 40 years as a round number. The 40 years of the wilderness wandering, 40 years of peace in the time of several of the Judges, 40 years each for David and Solomon, are sufficiently marked. Then we recall the 450 years from the Exodus to the building of the Temple,—12 generations of 40 years each. It is probable also that a similar term was counted from the building of the Temple to its rebuilding under Darius or to the end of the Exile, while it is not without significance that the duration of the Northern Kingdom was calculated to be 240 years.

All this shows that these late Biblical writers were dominated by a theory. It must be noticed also that more than one theory had an influence. The Greek translators, working in the second century before Christ, had a Hebrew text which differed considerably from our modern version of numbers. They reckoned nearly 600 years more from the Creation to the Flood than the sum in our Bible, while from the Flood to the Call of Abraham they made nearly 600 more. The copy of the Pentateuch which circulated among the Samaritans has a still different system. The question which of these systems was the earliest is still unsettled. It may be said to have only an academic interest, since we know that no one of them gives us authentic data for the antiquity of the world.

Fortunately our appreciation of the Bible does not depend upon the accuracy of its dates. In general the

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT—

In this article it is proposed first to examine the books of the NT, so as to determine as far as possible their relative chronology,—that is, the length of time between the principal events narrated; and then to investigate the points of contact between the NT and secular history, and thus to arrive at the probable dates of the incidents in the former. It must, however, be remembered that the Gospels and Acts are not biographies or histories in the modern sense of the term—a religious object; they wished to teach contemporary Christians to believe (Jn 20), and were not careful to chronicle dates for the benefit of posterity. Sir W. G. Russell points out (St. Paul the Prophet, p. 18) that a want of the chronological sense was a fault of the age, and that Tacitus in his Agricola is no better (until the last paragraph) than the sacred writers. It must also be noted that reckoning in old times was inclusive. Thus 'three years after' (Gal 1) means 'in the third year after' (cf. Ac 19; 18 with 20); 'three days and three nights' (Mt 12) means 'from to-day to the day after to-morrow' (Mt 17). Cf. also Gn 42.17.

1. RELATIVE CHRONOLOGY—

1. Interval between our Lord's birth and baptism. This is determined by Lk 2 to have been about 30 years, but the exact interval is uncertain. The RV translates: 'Jesus himself, when he was thirty years old, began to be (lit. beginning) to teach (cf. Mk 4), was about thirty years of age, and so most moderns, though the word 'beginning,' standing by itself, is awkward; it perhaps denotes the real commencement of the Gospel, as Eph. 1). The opening of the gospel to the Childhood is introductory (Plummer). The difficulty of the phrase was early felt, for the Old Synagogue and the Pharisees omitted the participial phrase, and Clement of Alexandria renders: 'began to be about 30 years of age,' which can mean only that Jesus was 20 years old. Irenaeus (H. E. iv. 46) says that Jesus was baptized 'beyond 30 years old,' having 'not yet completed his 30th year.' He 'then possessing the full age of a teacher.' The translation of AV is judged to be grammatically impossible, though it is odd that the Greek-speaker Irenaeus did not discover the fact, unless we are to suppose that his Latin translator misrepresents him. Let us, then, take the RV translation; but what is the meaning of 'about 30 years' (Turner)? "Chronology of NT in Hastings' DB— the most complete modern work on the subject in English) and Plummer (St. Luke, in loc.) think that any age from 28 to 32 would suit; but Ramsay, who remarks that St. Luke's authority for early chapters, as far as he is veracious, is very good, concludes that he could not have been ignorant of the real age, that the phrase must mean 30 plus or minus a few months. There seems to be some doubt as to the age of Jesus, it being too late to question the age which had varied; but we may follow Irenaeus in thinking that 30 was the full age when a public teacher began his work. On this point, then, internal evidence helps us a latitude of several months, whether of a few months or even of a few years.

2. Duration of the ministry.—Very divergent views have been held on this subject. (a) Clement of Alex- andria (Strom. ii. 22), and other 2nd-century Fathers, the Clementine Homilies (xvii. 19, 'a whole year'), and the Valentinians (quoted by Irenaeus, ii. xxii. 1), apply the 'acceptable year of the Lord' (Is 61:2; cf. Mk 2:15) literally to the ministry, which lasted one year only. The Valentinians believed that Jesus was baptized at the beginning, and died at the end, of His 30th year. A one-year ministry has also been advocated by Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 212f.). *Origen also (cf. below). The latter excuses the 'passover' from Jn 6. This view is said to be that of the Synoptists, who, however, give hardly any indications of the passing of time. (b) The other extreme is found in Irenaeus (c. e. iv. 46). It was the Fourth Evangelist who did the Fourth Evangelist's work. He takes the feast of Jn 6 to be a Passover, but does not mention that of Jn 9. He considers, however, that the Passovers mentioned in Jn. are not exclusive; that Jesus was a little less than 30 years old at His baptism, and over 40 when He died. This appears (he says) from Jn 8:31, which indicates one who had passed the age of 40; and likewise, that those who came to Him at this time were not 'passed through every age,' and in the decade from 40 to 50 'a man begins to decline towards old age.' He declares that this tradition came from 'John the doorkeeper' through those who were conversant with Jesus in Asia with him—i.e. probably Pappas; and that the same account had been received from other disciples. But here Irenaeus almost certainly makes a blunder. For a 3rd cent. tradition that Jesus was born A.D. 9, was baptized A.D. 46, and died A.D. 58 at the age of 49, see Chapman in JThSt viii. 590 (July, 1907). (c) Eusebius (HE i. 10), followed as to his results provisionally by Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 212f.), makes the ministry last over three years ('not quite four full years'), and this till lately was the common view. Melito (c. a. 160) speaks of Jesus working miracles for three years after His baptism (Ant. Nic. Chr. Lib. xxii. p. 155). (d) Origen and others, followed by Turner (op. cit. p. 409 f.), Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB, p. 610f.), and Hotchcock (art. 'Dates' in Hastings' DCG, p. 415f.), allow a little more than two years for the ministry ('Judas did not remain with us so much as three years with Jesus,' cf. Cés. ii. 12.

Indications of a ministry of more than a single year are found in the Synoptics; e.g. Mk 20 (harvest) 6th (spring, 'green grass'), for the length of the journeys of 5th-10th shows that the spring of 6th could not be that of the Crucifixion. Thus Mk implies at least a two years' ministry. In Lk. also we see traces of three periods in the ministry; 28-40, preaching in the wilderness of Judaea and in Nazareth and Galilee, briefly recorded; (2) 41-69, preaching in Galilee and the North, related at length; (3) 61-11-9, preaching in Central Palestine as far as Jerusalem. Ramsay (op. cit. p. 212) takes each of these periods as a whole, roughly to one year. In Jn. we have several indications of time; 21, 3 (Passover), 4th (four months before harvest; harvest near), 5th ('a feast' or the 'feast'), 6th (Passover, but see below). The first three (10th, Dedication, winter). In two cases (5-6) there is a question of text; in 5 the reading 'a feast' is somewhat better attested, and is preferable on internal grounds, for the 'feast' might mean either Passover or But the idea that the phrase 'the feast' is an unlikely one. If so, we cannot use 6 as an indication of time, as any minor feast would suit it. In 6 Hort excises the 'passover' (Westcott-Hickerson, N.T. Greek, App. p. 77 f.). But this is against all MSS and VSS, and rests only on the omission by Irenaeus (who, however, merely enumerates the Passovers when Jesus went up to Jerusalem; yet the mention of 6th has been added to his argument), and probably on Origen (for him and for others added, see Turner op. cit. p. 408); on internal grounds the omission is very improbable, and does not in reality reconcile Jn. and the Synoptics, for the latter speak of the 3rd one, not as we have seen, imply more than one single year's ministry. The note of time in Jn 6 seems to point to (say) January ('there are yet four months and then three other months the spiritual harvest was already ripe — the fields . . . are white already unto harvest'), though Origen and others less probably take the former clause to refer to the spiritual, the latter to the material, harvest) and by Hort (cf. below) (see Westcott, Com. in loc.). We may probably conclude then that in the ministry, as related in Jn., there were not fewer than three Passovers, and that it therefore lasted at least rather more than two years. If this is the case it is clear that the length of the ministry? Irenaeus thought that he mentioned only one of them; and though his chronology is clearly wrong, and based (as was that of his opponents) on a single year, this he had not seen fit to deny. The evidence for the length of the ministry is far from clear.

3. Interval between the Ascension and the conversion of St. Paul.—We have no certain internal evidence as to the length of this interval. Ac 21.11-13 may imply a long or a short time. We have to include in this period the spread of the Church among the Hellenists, the election of the Seven, and the death of Stephen, followed closely by St. Paul's conversion. For this period Ramsay allows 24 to 4 years, Harnack less than one year; but these conclusions come rather from external chronology (see II.) than from internal considerations. It is quite probable that in the early chapters of Acts St. Luke had not the same exact authority that he had for St. Paul's travels, or even for his Gospel (see Lk 117).—St. Paul's missionary career.—The relative chronology of St. Paul's Christian life may be summarized by a study of Acts combined with Gal 1:2. Indications of time are found in Ac 11:31 18:19. 10 20: 11 21:4. 22:4. 11 28: 27. 3 27: 11 31, 11. 8, With these data we may reconstruct the chronology, but there is room for uncertainty (1) as to whether the visit to Jerusalem in Gal 2 was that of Ac 11:31 or that of Ac 15, and whether the 'three years' and 'fourteen years' of Gal 1st 2nd are consecutive (so Lightfoot, Rackham), or concurrent (so Ramsey, Turner, Harnack); (2) as to the length of the First Missionary Journey; and (3) as to the later journeys after the Roman imprisonment. If the 'three years' and 'fourteen years' are consecutive, a total of about 16 years (see above) would be indicated by the interval between the conversion and the visit of Gal. 2nd. But as the interval at Tarsus is indeterminate, and the First Journey may have been anything from one to three years, all systems of relative chronology can be made to agree, except in small details, by shortening or lengthening those periods.

For a discussion of some of the doubtful points see art. GALATIANS [Ep. to the]. § 3, and for the details of the events see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 5 ff.

The following table, in which the year of St. Paul's conversion is taken as 1, gives the various events. Ramsey's calculation is taken as a basis, and the differences of opinion are noted in brackets [H- = Harnack, T- = Turner, R- = Ramsay, L- = Lightfoot].

2. First visit to Jerusalem, Acts 9:22, Gal 1:21, 'three years' after his conversion.
3. 4-11. At Tarsus and in Syria-Cilicia, Acts 9:22, Gal 1:21 [so HR, but T gives two years less, L three years less].
5. 13. Second visit to Jerusalem, with alms, Acts 11:26 [= Gal 2, R, 7].
6. 14-16. First Missionary Journey, to Cyprus, 13:1; Pamphylia, 13:1, to Southern Galatia, 13:1; to Corinth, 13:1, Ionium, 13:2; Lystra, 14:7; Derbe, 14:7, and back by Attala to Antioch, 14:7 [so HR; TR give one year less].
7. 17. Apostolic Council and third visit to Jerusalem, Acts 15:1-29; so Sunday and most of the 1st of July.
8. 18-20. Second Missionary Journey, from Antioch through Syria-Cilicia to Derbe and Lystra, Acts 15:20-25; through the Phrygo-Galatian region of the provinces Galatia to Troas, 16:6; to Macedonia, 16:4; Athens, 17:1; and Corinth, 18:1, where 18 months are spent; thence by sea to Ephesus, 19:1; Jerusalem (fourth visit), 182; and Antioch, where 'some time' is spent, 198.
9. 21-24. Third Missionary Journey, from Antioch by the 'Galatian region' and the 'Phrygian region,' 18:2, to Ephesus, 19:2. The second year and three months are spent, 19:16; by Troas 2 Cor. 2:25; to Macedonia, 19:4; and Corinth, 20:6 (see 2 Cor. 13:5), where three more years are spent; thence by sea to Corinth, 21:1; Miletus, and Cesarea, 22:21; fifth visit to Jerusalem, 23:1; and arrest, 21:22; imprisonment at Cesarea, 23:9.
12. 27. Arrival at Rome, 298.
13. (and) 29 (early). Archippus's remaining.
14. 29-34. Unforeseen death [so L; G gives one year less, T two years less].

11. POINTS OF CONTACT WITH GENERAL HISTORY.

It will be useful to give the dates of the earlier emperors, and those of the procurators of Judea. Some of the latter dates are approximate only, information as to them is derived from Josephus's Antiquities, and to some extent from his Jewish Wars (BJ).

1. Date of the nativity.—Early chronology is in such confusion that it is very difficult to assign exact dates to the various events, and the early Fathers give us little or no guidance. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1. 21) says that our Lord was born 194 years 1 month before the death of Augustus; but his dating of Commodo is wrong (see below). The calculation of our Christian era, due to Dionysius Exigius in the 6th cent., is obviously wrong by several years. Even the dating by the regnal years of emperors is open to considerable doubt, as it is not always certain from what epoch calculation is made; e.g. whether from the death of the predecessor, or from the association of the predecessor as co-emperor. For the birth of Christ, the locations have been found in the death of Herod, the Lukan census, and the Star of the Magi.

(a) Death of Herod.—This probably took place b.c. 4, possibly b.c. 3. His son Archelaus (Mt. 2:22) who succeeded him in his dominions with the title of ethnarch, was deposed (Dion Cassius, iv. 27) in the conspiracy of Leopoldus and Arruntius (A.D. 6), either in his ninth (so Joseph MJ 11 viii. 3) or in his tenth year (so Act. xviii. xiii. 2; and the Life, § 1, speaks of his tenth year). This would give the above dates for Herod's death; for various considerations which make b.c. 4 the probable date see Turner, op. cit. p. 404. We must then place our Lord's birth one or two years before at least, for Herod slew the male children of two years old and under (Mt 2:23), and we have to allow for the sojourn in Egypt.

(b) The Lukan census (Lk 2:1-5) would suit the result just reached; see art. LUKÉ [GOSPEL ACC. TO]. § 9.

(c) The Magi. Kepler calculated that the date of the Nativity from a conjunction of planets, which he believed the 'star in the east' to be (Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?), p. 215 ff. But it is impossible to build chronological results on such an uncertain basis.

The date arrived at by Ramsay from these considerations is b.c. 6 (summer), by Turner, b.c. 6 (spring) or b.c. 7. We must remain in ignorance of the day and month. The calculations which give Dec. 25 and Jan. 6 are both based on a fanciful exposition and a wrong date for the Crucifixion; see the present writer's art. 'Calendar' in Hastings' DB, i. 261 f.

2. The Baptism of our Lord.—According to St. Luke (3:19) John began to preach in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Pilate being procurator. Eusebius (HE I. 10) says that Christ was baptized in the fourth year of Pilate's governorship, and (HE I. 9) that Pilate was appointed before the death of the emperor Tiberius; the latter statement is quoted from Josephus (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2), but the former seems to be Eusebius' own deduction from St. Luke. But Pilate cannot have reached Palestine before A.D. 20 or 22, as Herod Antipas died shortly before Tiberius' death in A.D. 37, and no date later than A.D. 27 is possible for our Lord's baptism, if we take into account the date of the Nativity and St. John the Baptist's statement of an. J. 3'd age. It is probable, therefore, that Pilate's accession to office and John's appearance as a preacher both belong to the same year, say A.D. 26. Does this, however, suit St. Luke's phrase, 'the 15th year of the rule (or hegemony) of Tiberius,' for that is the exact phrase? The 15th year from the death of Augustus would be Aug. A.D. 28 to Aug. A.D. 29. Ramsay supposes (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 104) that the rule of Tiberius' is dated from the grant by Augustus of a share in the government of the provinces just before he celebrated his triumph over the people of Pannonia and Dalmatia, Jan. 16, A.D. 12; and thus bring us to c. 25-26. This leaves a gap of counting years not is found elsewhere, but it is quite a possible one. Turner inclines to the same supposition.

3. The rebuilding of the Temple.—In Jn 29, at a Passover not long after the Baptism, the Jews say that the Temple was 46 years in building, which, since the Temple was hardly completed at the outbreak of the War (Joseph. Ant. xix. i. 7), can only mean that the rebuilding had begun 46 years before the Passover in question. But the rebuilding began in Tiberius' 18th year de facto (ib. xv. xi. 1; for the computation of BJ L. xxi. 1, see Turner, p. 405); i.e. the Passover of B.C. 19 would be that of the first year of the rebuilding, and the Temple was not finished until the 46th year. This would agree with the result already reached.

4. Date of the Crucifixion.—The Fathers seem to have known nothing certainly as to the exact year of our Lord's death. Clement of Alexandria (loc. cit.), who believed in a one-year ministry, gives the 16th year of Tiberius, 424 years before the Destruction of Jerusalem (this would be A.D. 28), which was 123 years 10 months 3 days before the death of Constantius (this would be the latter 7 years too late). A common tradition (Tertullian [?], Adv. Jud. 8 [Patr. Lat. i. 565]; Lactantius, Div. Inst. iv. 10, de mort. Pers. 2 [Patr. Lat. vi. 474, vii. 194]) assigns the Crucifixion to the beginning of the 18th year of Tiberius, i.e. A.D. 33 (so Eusebius, HE 1. 6), for Josephus (Ant. xvii. iii. 4, 6) relates that Calaphas was deposed just before he tells us of the death of Herod Philip, which occurred in the 20th year of Tiberius, i.e. A.D. 32-34, reckoning from Augustus' death; Josephus' order has every appearance of being chronological.

Now, it is not certain on which day of the month Nisan the Friday of the Passion fell. We must put aside Westcott's suggestion that our Lord died on a Thursday, as contradicting entirely the Eastern idea of the "third day" and "after three days" (see above). But the Synoptists would suggest that our Lord ate the Passover with the disciples on 14th Nisan, and died on the 15th, while Ju. would lead us to suppose that he died on 14th Nisan at the time of the killing of the lambs. The determination of this difficult question will only affect the chronological investigation if in a particular year only Nisan 15 or only Nisan 14 can positively be said to have fallen on a Friday. But there is some uncertainty in the reckoning of Nisan.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

The Jewish months were lunar, and (in early times at least) the first day of the month was not that of the true new moon, but that on which it was first visible. This would be some 30 hours later than the true new moon. But it seems certain that the Jews at the time of the Gospel narrative had some sort of calendrical rules or some rough cycle to determine the first day of a lunar month. The phrase, "in the month Nisan," never have been sure of observing the Passover all on the same day, and the difference of a cloudy or of a bright sky on a particular day would introduce confusion. Thus we take great care not to date from the true new moons, and of the days when the moon may have been presumed to have been first visible, from A.D. 27 to 36 inclusive, is given by Dr. Salmon (Intro., lect. xix.). This result is that in A.D. 27, 30, 33, 34, one or other of the two days Nisan 14 and 15 might have fallen on a Friday. We may omit the first and last of these years, and have left A.D. 30 and 33. But A.D. 29, which has the best traditional support, is also calendrically possible. Taking the equinox as March 21, Nisan 14 that year would be Sunday, April 18; the moon would have been first visible on Monday, April 4. But the equinox was not that year, according to Josephus and Turner (op. cit. p. 411 f.) gives an argument for believing that Nisan in A.D. 29 was really the month before that supposed by Salmon. In case Nisan 14 fell on one of these days, it would be 19th or 20th of March of 18 a Friday. Thus A.D. 29 is admissible, and the choice almost certainly lies between it and A.D. 30; for A.D. 33 is hard to fit in with the calculation as to the Nativity, and no doubt that year was selected because of the dating of the 'fourteenth year' of Lk. 39 from the death of Augustus. Of the two years, then, A.D. 30 is chosen by Lightfoot, Salmon, and Wieseler; A.D. 29 by Turner, and in this conclusion Ramsay now joins. This, however, has been generally condemned by most modern critics. But the choice between these two years should be determined by internal evidence of the Gospels rather than by the chronological investigations, which are too uncertain to be trustworthy.

5. Arethas and the occupation of Damascus.—Turner deduces the earliest possible date for the conversion of St. Paul from the incident of 2 Co 11, and accordingly assigns A.D. 38 for the first visit of E. to Jerusalem, A.D. 35 or 36 for the Conversion. But, in the opinion of the present writer, for reasons stated in art. ARETHAS, the incident cannot be used in determining the chronology at all. If it is so used, the date is consistent with the view that the second visit synchronizes with the Apostolic Council (above, i. 4). Ramsay, however (St. Paul, p. xiv.), adduces as an external support for his date (A.D. 33) for St. Paul's conversion, a 4th cent. oration found in St. Chrysostom's works, which says that Paul served God 33 years and died at the age of 68. If he died in A.D. 67, this would give A.D. 33 for the Conversion. But Patristic chronology is very unsatisfactory.

6. Herod Agrippa the Elder received Herod Philip's tetrarchy and the title of king early in A.D. 37 from Caligula, and somewhat later Antipas' tetrarchy (Josephus, Ant. xix. 6). And Claudius gave him the whole of his grandfather's kingdom, which he held for three years till his death, "as he had governed his tetrarchies three other years" (ib. x. 6). We see from his coins, which were issued up to his ninth year, that he died in A.D. 44 or 45; probably his 'second year' began with the Nisan next after his accession in A.D. 37.
CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Of these two dates, then, Josephus enables us to choose a.D. 44. This fixes Ac 12th, though the events of Ac 12th need not have been immediately before Agrippa's death; and gives a.D. 41 for his accession to Herod the Great's dominions. It is therefore probable, but not certain, that the Cornellius episode (Ac 10) must be dated before a.D. 41, as it is not likely that a centurion of the Italic cohort would be stationed at Cesarea during Agrippa's semi-independent rule (see art. CORNELIUS).

7. The Famine.—This was predicted by Agabus, and happened in the reign of Claudius (Ac 11th). If we can date the famine, it will help us to fix St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, as this was occasioned by the sending of alms through him to the famine-stricken Christians there. In Claudius' reign there were many famines, and not 'at the instigation at the same time. We read of Helens, queen of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, arriving at Jerusalem in the middle of the famine, apparently in the procuratorship of Tiberius Alexander, probably after the summer of a.D. 46 (Joseph. Ant. xx. i. 5, v. 2). Orosius, a Spanish writer who visited Palestine a.D. 415, puts the famine in Claudius' fourth year, i.e. in a.D. 44 (Hist. vij. 6), but Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 68) shows that his dates at this period are too early; thus we arrive at a.D. 45. It is probable that a bad harvest in a.D. 45 resulted in a famine in a.D. 46, and St. Paul's visit might not then be either in the middle of the famine, or at any rate during the preceding winter, when the bad harvest showed that the famine was imminent.

8. Sergius Paulus.—The term of office of this proconsul cannot be dated (for the inscription referring to him has not been found), nor can we fix any year for Agrippa's death (see above), as the proconsuls in a.D. 51, 52, are known to St. Paul's visit to Cyprus must have been before that.

9. Claudius' expulsion of the Jews.—The edict (Ac 18th) is therefore the first. The Chronicles are defective for the early years of Claudius, speaks only of the expulsion of astrologers in a.D. 52 (Ann. xii. 52). Suetonius (Claudius, § 25) says that the edict was due to Claudius' desire to rid his dominions of all superstitious practices, a confusion not unnatural in a heathen writer. Orosius (Hist. vii. 6) quotes Josephus as saying that the decree was made in the ninth year of Claudius, i.e. a.D. 49, but this should probably be (as above, 7) a.D. 50. Josephus, as a matter of fact, does not refer to the matter at all, so that Orosius' authority must have been some other writer. The arrival of Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth (Ac 18th) is accompanied, of course, by the arrival of Christea's associate. Orosius' statement must have been later than this, perhaps in a.D. 51 (so Ramsay; Turner puts it one year, Harnack three years earlier).

10. Gallo.—Achaia had been made a senatorial province by Claudius in a.D. 44, and the procuratorship of Gallo, who seems to have arrived at the end of St. Paul's stay at Corinth (Ac 18th), was no doubt several years later than this. Gallo was brother to Seneca, who was in disgrace a.D. 41-49, but was recalled and made prior in a.D. 50. Pliny (HN xxxi. 32) says that Gallo became consul; this was probably after his procuratorship in Achaia. He is said by Seneca (Ep. 104) to have caught fever in Achaia, and this is the only indication outside Acts of his procuratorship. The probability is that he did not hold this office while Seneca was out of favour at Court, and therefore a.D. 50 would be the earliest year for the incident of Ac 18th. 10. It may have happened some few years earlier.

11. The Passover at Philippi.—Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 289 f.) considers that St. Paul left Philippi on a Friday (Ac 20th). He traces back the journey from the departure from Troas ('v'), on the assumption that some religious celebration at Troas were on what we call Sunday night. But would any Eastern call this 'the first day of the week' (see art. 'Calendar,' I. 1 in Hastings' DCG)? If Ramsay's calculation be accepted, the further assumption is that St. Paul was in haste to reach Jerusalem, left Philippi on the morrow of the Passover, which therefore fell on Thursday. But in a.D. 57 it is calculated that it did so fall (April 7), and this therefore is Ramsay's date for St. Paul's fifth visit to Jerusalem and his arrest there. There is a triple element of doubt in this calculation—(a) as to the date on which Troas was left, (b) whether St. Paul started his journey after the Passover, and (c) the calculation of the Passover. We must therefore probably dismiss this element in calculating the years, though Ramsay's date is for other reasons quite probable.

12. Felix and Festus.—Felix married Drusilla, sister of Agrippa ii., not long after his latter's accession to the tetrarchy of Herod Philip and Lyssanias (c. a.D. 52-53); for she had married Azizus of Emesa on Agrippa's accession, and 'no long time afterward' became his wife. So Festus (Acts, xvi. 23) was a certain Harnack (Chronologie, p. 233 f.), who interprets Eusebius assuming that Felix came into office in a.D. 51.

The date of Festus' arrival is greatly disputed. Lightfoot, Wieseler, and others argue that this cannot have been before a.D. 60 or 61, because of Ac 24th, and because Josephus' description of the events which happened under Felix implies the lapse of many years. But for these events five or six years are amply sufficient; for many years, it is said (see above), though Eusebius (Chronicle), followed by Harnack, says that Festus arrived in the second year of Nero, i.e. Oct. a.D. 55 to Oct. a.D. 56. But Eusebius probably makes the first year of an emperor's reign the year of his accession to his throne (Turner, p. 418), and would therefore make the second year to be Sept. a.D. 56 to Sept. a.D. 57; accordingly Rackham (Acts, p. 454) gives a.D. 57 for Felix's arrival. Another argument for Festus' arrival is that Felix was acquitted, after his recall, through the influence of his brother Pallas (Joseph. Ant. xx. viii. 9), and this could only have been (it is said) while Pallas was still in office (Josephus says that Pallas 'was at that time held in the highest honour by' Nero). But he was dismissed just before Britannicus' 14th birthday, in the spring of a.D. 55 (Tacitus, Ann. xii. 44 f.). This, however, would make Festus' arrival in any case too early; it would be in the summer of a.D. 54, before Claudius' death, which contradicts Eusebius (Chron., and HS ii. 22). Harnack supposes that Festus wrote 'fourteenth year of his birth' in error for 'fifteenth.' It is, however, preferable to suppose that Pallas still retained influence even after he had left office. Turner suggests that at any rate the acquittal of Felix, when accused by the Jews, shows that Toppina had not yet acquired her influence over Nero. This began in a.D. 58, though he did not marry her till a.D. 62, the year of Pallas' murder by him. This consideration, then, militates against Lightfoot's date (a.D. 60 or 61). Harnack's date (a.D. 55) comes from following Eusebius; and accordingly he dates the events of Acts two or three years at least before Ramsay and Turner. Even that early date, if Pallas was still in office when Felix was acquitte, is not likely to reconcile with Turner's statement. It does not seem safe to rely on Eusebius' chronology in this case, considering that in other cases it is so inaccurate.

13. Persecutions of Nero and Domitian.—(1) Death of St. Peter and of St. Paul.—There is no good reason for supposing that the two Apostles died on the same day or even in the same year, though we may probably conclude that they both lived to a great age. The joint commemoration is due to their bodies having been transferred to the Catacombs together on June 29, a.D.
CHURCH

—1. The word ekklesia, which in its Christian application is usually tr. 'church,' was applied in ordinary Greek usage to the duly constituted gathering of the citizens in a self-governing city, and it is so used of the Ephesian assembly in Ac 19:34. It was adopted in the LXX to tr. a Heb. word, qōdāh, signifying the nation of Israel as assembled before God or considered in a religious aspect (Jg 21:1; 1 Ch 29:1; Dt 31:12 etc.). In this sense it is found twice in the NT (Ac 7th Rev. 'church,' Eph 2nd Rev. 'congregation'). The term is practically equivalent to the familiar 'synagogue' which, however, was more frequently used to translate another Heb. word, betḥān. This will probably explain our Lord's words in Mt 18:20. For 'synagogue' was the name regularly applied, after the Babylonian exile to local congregations of Jews formally gathered for common worship, and from them subsequently transferred to similar congregations of Hebrew Christians (Ja 2:9). To call it the 'ekklesia' can hardly refer directly to communities of Jesus' disciples, as these did not exist in the time of the Galilean ministry, but rather to the Jewish congregation, or its representative court, in the presence to which the disputants might belong. The renewal of the promise concerning binding and loosing.
CHURCH

In v. 15 (cf. 1619) makes against this interpretation. And the assurance of Christ's presence in v. 20 can have reference only to gatherings of disciples. But it may well be that we have these sayings brought together by Matthew in view of the Christian significance of ecclesia. There is no evidence that ecclesia, like 'synagogue,' was transferred from the congregation to the religious assemblies with which it was associated in its local embodiment. But, though not the technical term, there would be no difficulty in applying it, without fear of misunderstanding, to the synagogue.

And this would be the more natural because the term was usually applied to Jerusalem in its historical rather than in its ideal aspect (see Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 12).

2. Ecclesia is used constantly with its Christian meaning in the Pauline Epistles. Its earliest use chronologically is probably in 1 Th 1. But the growth of its use is best studied by beginning with Acts. Here the term first occurs in 5:12 applied to the Christians of Jerusalem in their corporate capacity. In 19:18, Peter is represented as standing up 'in the midst of the brethren.' Thus from the first Christians are a brotherhood or family, not a promiscuous gathering. That this family is considered capable of an ordered extension is evident (a) from the steps immediately taken to fill a vacant post of authority (1 Th 5:12), and (b) from the way in which converts receiving baptism are spoken of as adding to the church (2 Th 3:14) and making the church 'new' (cf. RV) which continues in the Apostles' teaching, and the bond of a common table and united prayer (2 Th 2).

This community is now called 'the assembly of the brethren' (49), the word used, as compared with its employment elsewhere, suggesting not a throng or crowd, but the whole body of the disciples. In Ex 12 we have the phrase 'the whole assembly of the congregation (Gr. synagogē) of Israel.' When, therefore, it became necessary to Israél for its historic use 'the believers,' ecclesia, the alternative to 'synagogue,' was not unnaturally chosen. For the disciples meeting in Jerusalem were, as a matter of fact, the true Israel (Gal 6:2), the little flock to whom was to be given the Messianic Kingdom (Lk 12:4). Moreover, they were a Christian synagogue, and, but for the risk of confusion, might have been so called. The name, therefore, as applied to the primitive community of Jesus, is on the one hand universal and ideal, on the other local and particular.

In either case the associations are Jewish, and by these the subsequent history of the name is determined.

4. As its conceptions spread to the local units of the brotherhood it came to be called ecclesia (Ac 2:13, 14; 15:20; 21 etc.), the original community being now distinguished as 'the ecclesia in Jerusalem' (81). Thus we have the familiar use of the Pauline Epistles, e.g. the ecclesia of the Thessalonians (1 Th 1), of Laodicea (Col 4:16), of Corinth (1 Co 1:1); cf. 1 P 5, Rev 2:1 etc. They are summed up in the expression 'all the ecclesia of Christ' (Ro 16:9). This language has doubtless given rise to the modern conception of 'the churches'; but it must be observed that the Pauline idea is territorial, the only apparent departure from this usage being the application of the name to sections of a local ecclesia, which seem in some instances to have met for additional worship in the houses of prominent disciples (Ro 16:5, 1 Co 16:5 etc.). The existence of independent congregations of Christians within a single area, like the Hellenistic and Jewish synagogues (see Ac 6:1-4), does not appear to be contemplated in the NT.

The conception of a Catholic Church in the sense of a constitutional federation of local Christian organizations is not a Christian concomitant of the ecclesia phrase. It is first found in Ignatius (c. A.D. 115; see Lightfoot, Apol. Fathers, Pt. 2, ii. p. 310). But in the 1st cent. the Church of Jerusalem, as the seat of Apostolic authority (Ac 6:1-8), still exercises an influence upon the other communities, which continues during the period of transition to the world-wide society. At Jerusalem Saul receives the right hand of fellowship and recognition from the pillar Apostles (Gal 2:9). Thence Apostles go forth to confirm and consolidate the work of evangelists (Ac 8:1). Thither missionaries return with reports of newly-founded Gentile societies and contributions for the poor saints (Ac 15:23, 1 Co 16:4). This community is so solidly based on the authority of the extension of Christianity (Ac 15:22-29). Till after the destruction of the city in A.D. 71 this church continued, under the presidency of James the Lord's brother (Gal 2:4, Ac 13:21, 15:21), and then of other members of the Christian 'royal family' (Tit. 3:11, 19, 20), to be the typical society of Jesus' disciples.

5. But already in the NT that ideal element, which distinguished the primitive fellowship as the Kingdom of Messiah, as it were, to express itself in a concrete form of the ecclesia which, while it never loses touch with the actual concrete society or societies of Christians, has nevertheless no constitutional value. It is scarcely possible to suppose that the adoption of the name ecclesia for the Christian society was altogether unrelated to the celebrated use of the word by the Lord Himself in His conversation with the disciples at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:18-19). Two questions with regard to this passage may be dismissed. The first is that it was interpolated to support the growth of ecclesiastical authority in the 2nd cent.; this rests solely on an assumption that began with the phrase 'ecclesia' has been substituted for 'kingdom' in our Lord's utterance through subsequent identification of ideas. But the occasion was one that Christ evidently intended to signalize by a unique deliverance, the full significance of which would not become apparent till interpreted by later experience (cf. Mt 10:6, Jn 6:6). The metaphor of building as applied to the nation of Israel is found in the OT (Jer 33:11; cf. Am 9, Ps 102:17). There is therefore to be understood the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom; and that the use of the less common word ecclesia, far from being unintentional, is designed to connect with the new and enlarged in a concrete form of the spiritual associations of Jehovah's congregation, and to discourage the temporal aspirations which they were only too ready to derive from the promised Kingdom.

6. The Kingdom of God, or of Heaven, is a prominent conception in the Synoptic Gospels. It is rather the Kingdom than the King that Christ Himself proclaims (Mt 1:27, 3, cf. Mt 4:17). The idea, partially understood by His contemporaries and commended by Jesus. It had been outlined by prophets and apocalyptic writers. It was to realize the hopes of that congregation of Israel which had been purchased and redeemed of old (Ps 74), and of which the Davidic monarchy had been the pledge (Mic 4, Is 52 etc.). Typical passages are Dn 2, 4. This was the Kingdom which the crowd hailed at the Triumphal Entry (Mt 21:1). Christ begins from the point of Jewish expectation, but the Kingdom which He proclaims, though not less actual, surpasses any previous conception in the minds of His followers. It is already present (Lk 11:20, 17th RVM) in His own Person and work. It is revealed as a historical institution in the parables of the Tares (Mt 13:24) and the Drag-net (13:28). Other parables present it as an ideal which no historical institution can satisfy, e.g. Treasure hid in a field (13:44), a merchant seeking goodly pearls (13:45), a grain of Mustard Seed (13:31, 32). We cannot solve the problem involved in Christ's various presentations of the Kingdom by saying that He uses the word in different senses. He is dealing with a tropical spurious, post-Apostolic conception, the elements of which have been brought home by those utterances of Jesus which refer its realization to the end of the age. Daniel's prophecy is to be realized only when the Son of Man shall come in His Kingdom (24:14). It is not that the blessed are to inherit what nevertheless was prepared for them from the beginning of time (25:34). And all views of the Kingdom which would limit it to an externally organized community are proved to be insufficient by a declaration like that of Christ (Mt 19:28). But even when contemplated ideally, the Messianic Kingdom possesses those attributes of order and authority which are inseparable from a society (Mt 19:28).

It is hardly to be doubted, therefore, that the name ecclesia, as applied to the primitive community of Christians at Jerusalem, even if suggested rather than by the synagogue than by our Lord's declaration to St. Peter, could not be used without identifying that society with the Kingdom of God, so far as this was capable of realization in an institution, and endowing it with those ideal qualities which belong thereto. The descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples at Pentecost, following as it did the establishment of the Kingdom (Ac 2:31), connects the Church with the Kingdom, and the scattering of its members after Stephen's death (Ac 8:1, 4) would not begin to furnish a basis for the wider extension of the society which was to accompany the establishment of the Kingdom (Ac 1:8). It is natural enough, in a later age, is, in the absence of a wider ecclesiastical organization, not yet possible. It is still further from the truth to assert that St. Paul had the conception of an invisible Church, of which the local communities were at best typical. 'We have no evidence that St. Paul regarded membership of the universal ecclesia as invisible' (Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 189). The method by which the Apostle reached his doctrine of the Church is best illustrated by his charge to the elders at Mileus to feed the flock of God over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers (Ac 20:28). Here the local congregation is the Church, and the Church purchased with His precious blood (v.28), a real community of which visibility is an essential characteristic, but which by the nature of the case is incapable of a complete manifestation in history. The passage combines in a remarkable degree the three elements in the Divine Society, namely, the redeemed congregation of Israel (Ps 74:2), the Kingdom or ecclesia of Messiah (Mt 19:28), and the body established upon the Atonement (Col 1:16-22, Eph 2:11). All three notes are present in the teaching of the Epistles concerning the ecclesia. It is the historical fact of the inclusion of the Gentiles (Eph 2:9) that is the starting-point. Those nations which under the old covenant were alien from the people of God (Eph 2:11) are now included in the vast citizenship or polity (v.12) which membership in a local ecclesia fulfills as it did the expectation of Israel from the beginning (v.12). This expectation of Israel was realized by the Messianic Kingdom (Mt 19:28), and as such the immediate object of redemption (525); but through the reconciliation of the Cross extended (20), and, as it were, reincorporated on a wider basis (v.13), as the sphere of universal forgiveness (v.14), the home of the Spirit (v.15), and the one body of Christ (4:25 etc.), in which all have access to the Father (v.17). The Interrelated figures of growth and building (4:12-16), under which it is presented, witness to its organic and therefore not exclusively spiritual character, Baptism, administered by the local ecclesia and resulting in rights and duties in respect of them, is yet primarily the method of entrance to the ideal community (Ro 6:1-14, 1 Co 12:1-12, Gal 3:21-29, Eph 4). It is through a declaration like that of Christ (Lk 16:18) that the Messianic Kingdom is profaned by misuse of sacred ordinances at Corinth (1 Co 11:20); becomes at Ephesus the pillar and ground of the truth (1 Ti 3:15).

That St. Paul, in speaking of the Church now in the local now in the universal sense, is not dealing with ideas connected only by analogy, is proved by the ease with which he passest from the one to the other use (Col 1:11-12, cf. 14:1-2 and Eph. 5:25). The Church is essentially visible, the shrine of God (1 Co 3:17), the body of Christ (Eph 1:22 etc.); schism and party strife involving a breach in the unity of the Spirit (4:3). Under another figure the Church is the bride of Christ (Eph 5:25). It is the temple of the Holy Spirit, His counterpart or fulness (1:12), deriving its life from Him as He does from the Father (v.1, 1 Co 11:12).

Thus the Biblical view of the Church differs alike from the materialized conception of Augustine, which identifies it with the constitutionally incorporated and eccumenical society of the Roman Empire, with its canons and hierarchical jurisdiction, and from that of the Church which Luther has interpreted, as regards souls as the inward spiritual union of believers with Christ (Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr. p. 287). The principle of the Church's life is inward, so that 'the measure of the stature of fullness of Christ's' remains the object of Christian hope (Eph 4:13). But its manifestation is outward, and includes those ministries which, though marred, as history shows, by human fault and sin, are to be found in the Church for the building up of the body (v.11, 13). Just as members of the legal Israel are recognized by our Lord as sons of the Kingdom (Mt 8:3), so the baptized are the called, the saints, the members of the body. There is no warrant in the NT for that sharp separation between membership in the legal worshipping Church and the Kingdom of God which is characteristic of Ritschlism.

The Church in its corporate capacity is the primary object of redemption. That point is fully and definitively asserted (Eph 5:5-7, Ac 20:28, 1 Th 2:13), involved in the conception of Christ as the second Adam (Ro 5:12-21, 1 Co 15:22-28), the federal head of a redeemed race; underlies the institution of the Church (Eph 1:10), and is expressed in the Apostolic teaching concerning the two Sacraments (see above, also 1 Co 10:14-15, 13:14-24).

The Church is thus not a voluntary association of justified persons for purposes of mutual edification and common worship, but the body in which the individual believer normally realizes his redemption. Christ's love for the Church, for which He gave Himself (Eph 5:2), constituting a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people of possession (1 P 2:9) through His blood (Eph 2:19), completes the parallel, or rather marks the identity, with the historical Israel. Membership in Abraham's covenantate race, of which circumcision was the sign (Ga 17:14), brought the Israelite into relation with Jehovah. The sacrifices covered the whole 'church in the wilderness' (Ac 7:38), and each worshipper approached God in virtue of his inclusion in the holy people. No foreigner might eat of the Passover (Ex 12:43). The propitiatory ritual of the Day of Atonement was expressly designed for the consecration of the whole nation (Lv 16). So the sacrifice of the Cross is our Passover (1 Co 5:7). Other figures of the Christian congregation are the Paschal feast (v.8, cf. He 13:10-14). In Christ those who are now fellow-citizens have a common access to the Father (Eph 2:19, 10:17). Through the Mediator of a new covenant (12) those that are consecrated (10:4, 21) are come to the Church of the first-born (12:28), which includes the spirits of the perfected saints (59). In the fellowship of God's household (Eph 2:18, He 10:25). See also following article.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT. — 1. The general development seems clearly clear, though its later phases fall beyond NT times. The Apostles were the originators of the churches and therefore regulated and supervised the first arrangements; then were added sundry local and unlocal rulers; then the local died out, and the local settled down into the three permanent classes of bishops, pastors, and deacons. The chief disputed questions concern the origin of the local ministry, its relation to the other, and the time and manner in which it settled down under the government of (monarchical) bishops.

2. Twice over St. Paul gives something like a list of the chief persons of the Church. In 1 Co 12:2 he counts up—first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers; then poeures; then gifts of healing, helps, governments, kinds of tongues. 'It will be noticed that all the words after the first two plainly describe functions, not offices.
A few years later (Eph 4:11) he tells us how the ascended Lord himself gave some as apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the work of service (diakonos)—they are all of them 'deacons' (diakonos), whatever more they may be.

3. At the head of both lists is the Apostle. The Apostles were no longer to the Eleven, or to the number twelve, though twelve was always the ideal number (1 Co 15:24; Rev 21:4; perhaps Ac 21:6). Whether Matthias remained an Apostle or not, Paul and Barnabas were certainly Apostles (e.g. Ac 14:4); and was James the Lord's brother (Gal 1:19). The old disciples Andronicus and Junias (not Junia) were 'notable' Apostles (Ro 16:7). On the other hand, Timothy seems excluded by the conjunction of several Epistles (e.g. 2 Co 8, 9), and Apollos by the evidence of Clement of Rome, who most likely knew the truth of the matter.

The Apostle's first qualification was to have seen the Lord (Ac 12:1, 1 Co 9:1); for his first duty was to bear witness of the Resurrection. This qualification seems never to have been relaxed in NT times. A direct call was also needed, for (1 Co 12:28, Gal 1; Eph 4:11) human authority could change an Apostle. The call of Barnabas and Saul was acknowledged (Ac 13:1) by a commission from the church at Antioch; and if Matthias remained an Apostle, we must suppose that the direct call was represented by some later Divine recognition.

Therefore the Apostle was in no sense a local official. His work was not to serve tables, to preach and to make disciples of all nations, so that he led a wandering life, settling down only in his old age, or in the sense of making, say, Ephesus or Corinth his centre for a while. The stories which divide the world among the Twelve are legends; the only division we know of was made (Gal 2:1) at the Conference, when it was resolved that the Three should go to the Jews, Paul and Barnabas to the Gentiles. With this preaching went the founding and general care of churches, though not their ordinary government. St. Paul interferes only in cases of gross error or corporate disorder. His point is not that the Galatians are mistaken, but that they are altogether falling away from Christ; not that the Corinthian is a bad defender, but that the Church sees no great harm in the matter. He does not advise the Corinthians on further questions without plain hints (1 Co 6:10 11:17) that they ought to have settled most of them for themselves.

4. Next to the Apostle comes the shadowy figure of the Prophet. He too sustained the Church, and shared with him (Eph 2:28, 3) the revelation of the mystery. He spoke 'in the spirit' words of warning, of comfort, or it might be of prediction. He too received his commission from God and not from men, and was no local officer of a church, even if he dwelt in the city. But he was not an eye-witness of the risen Lord, and 'the case of all the churches was one'. Women also might prophesy (1 Co 11:1), like Philip's daughters (Ac 21:1) at Cæsarea, or perhaps the mystic Jezebel (Rev 2:20) at Thyatira. Yet even in the Apostolic age prophecy (1 Th 5:20) is beginning to fall into discredit, and it was false prophets who flourished (1 Jn 4:1). There is much dispute as to the name of the Apostle. Yet this may be the reason for the marked avoidance of the name 'Apostle' by and of St. John.

5. It will be seen that St. Paul's lists leave no place for a local ministry of office, unless it comes in under 'helps and governments' on 'pastors and teachers.' Yet such a ministry must have existed almost from the first. We have (1) the appointment of the Seven at Jerusalem (Acts 6); (2) elders at Jerusalem in the years 44, 50, 58 (11:19; 21:1, appointed by Paul and Barnabas in every church about 48 (14:28), mentioned Ju 5:1; at Ephesus in 58 (Ac 20:17), mentioned 1 P 5; (3) Phoebe a deaconess at Cenchrea in 58 (Ro 16:1), bishops and deacons at Philippi in 63 (Ph 11). Also in the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy at Ephesus about 66 is (1 Ti 3:4) in charge of four orders: (1) bishops (or elders) (5:19); (2) deacons (5:17); (3) deaconesses (5:9) ('women' in Gr. without the article) cannot be deacons); (4) widows. With Titus in Crete only bishops are mentioned (Tit 1:5). To these we add (6) the prominent quasi-episcopal positions of James at Jerusalem, in 44 (Ac 12:22), and in 50, and in the (3) of Timothy and Titus at Ephesus and in Crete.

To these we must add (1) the 'young men' (naiadai) who carried out Ananias (Ac 9:27). The tacit contrast with presbyters is of age, not office, for it is nemesis with the Sapphira; (2) the indefinite prostastomai of 1 Th 5:12 and 1 Co 12, and the equally indefinite hospodarion of some unknown church shortly before 70 (He 13:11). If these are officials, we can say no more than that there are several of them; (3) the arrest of churches in Asia. [These cannot safely be taken literally.]

6. The questions before us may be conveniently grouped round (a) the last order of bishops, (b) elders, and (c) deacons. The use of these three terms have denoted functions of oversight and service rather than definite offices. The elder carries over a more official character from the synagogue; but in any case there is always a good deal of give and take among officials of small societies. If so, we shall not be surprised if we find neither definite institution of offices nor sharp distinction of duties.

(1) Deacons. The traditional view, that the choice of the Seven in Ac 6 marks the institution of a permanent order of deacons, is open to serious doubt. The opinion of Cyprian and later writers is not worth much on a question of this kind, and even that of Irenæus is far from decisive. The vague word diaconos (used too in the context of the Apostles themselves) is balanced by the avoidance of the word 'deacon' in the Acts (e.g. 21:8 Philip the evangelist, one of the Seven). Since, however, Phoebe was a deaconess at Cenchrea in 58, there were probably deacons there and at Corinth, though St. Paul does not mention any; and at Philippi we have bishops and deacons in 63. In both cases, however, the doubt remains, how far the name has settled into a definite office. See art. Deacon.

(2) Elders. Elders at Jerusalem receive the offerings in 44 from Saul and Barnabas. They are joined with the Apostles at the Conference in 50, and with James in 58. As Paul and Barnabas appoint elders in every city on their first missionary journey, and we find elders at Ephesus in 58, we may infer that the churches generally had elders, though there is no certain mention of them till the Pastoral Epistles and 1 Peter. Probably Ju 5:19 is earlier, but there we cannot be sure that the word is official.

The difference of name between elders and bishops may point to some difference of origin or duties; but in NT (and in Clement of Rome) the terms are practically equivalent. Thus the elders of Ephesus are reminded (Ac 20:4) that they are bishops. In the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy appoints bishops and deacons. Titus, 'elders and deacons, though Timothy also (1 Tim 5:17) has elders under him. The qualifications of the elder, as described to Titus, are practically those of the bishop as given to Timothy, and it is added (Tit 1:7) that the elders must be such 'because the bishop must be blameless.'—which is decisive that the bishop's office was at least as wide as the elder's. Moreover, in both cases the duties implied are ministerial, not what we call episcopal. If the elder's duty is to rule (1 Tim 5:17), he does it subject to Timothy, much as a modern elder rules subject to his bishop.
CHURCHES, ROBBERS OF

(3) Bishops. See Bishop.

CHURCHES, ROBBERS OF—This is in Ac 19:17 an AV mistranslation (RV has 'robbers of temples'). Even the RV is inexact. The word ought to be translated simply 'sacred persons,' that is, persons acting disrespectfully to the goddess of Ephesus. In 2 Mac 4:8 (RV 'author of the sacrifice') the expression is applied to Lyons, arrheus, bishop of Menelaus the high priest, who perished in a riot caused by sacrifice (Acts 170).

CHUSI (4th-7th), mentioned with Arkedeb (Akrebite), is possibly Kudzu, 5 miles S. of Schekem and 5 miles W. of Akhrebe.

CHUZA (Amer. RV CHUZA).—The steward of Herod Antipas. His wife Joanna (wh. see) was one of the women who ministered to our Lord and His disciples (Lk 8:3).

CIELED, CEILING (Amer. RV 'ceil'd, 'celing').—The latter occurs only 1 K 6:8, where it has its modern signification (reading, however, 'unto the beams [or rafters] of the ceiling'). The verb, on the other hand, should everywhere be rendered 'panelled' (2 Ch 3:1, Jer 22:4, Ezek 41:4, Hag 1:1 'your panelled houses'), the reference being to the panels of cedar or other costly wood with which the inner walls were lined. See House, § 4.

CILICIA.—A district in the s.e. corner of Asia Minor, which at times was divided into two portions. The Roman province Cilicia, which is alone referred to in the NT, stretched from a little E. of Corycus to Mt. Amanus, and from the Cilician Gates and Anazarbus to the sea. For administrative purposes it was combined with Syria and Phocis. The sense of the unity of Syria and Cilicia is seen clearly in Gal 1:28 (also in Ac 15:4). The capital of the province was Tarsus (Acts 11:19). The other portion to which the name was applied was the client-kingdom of King Antiochus, which was under the suzerainty of Rome, and included Cilicia Trachea (Rugged Cilicia) to the W., as well as a belt surrounding the Roman province on the N. and E. Neither district has as yet been thoroughly explored.

CIRCUIT occurs 4 times in AV: 1 S 7:16 (a late and doubtful passage, acc. to which Samuel went on circuit to various high places); Job 22:15 (RvM and Amer. RV 'vault,' i.e. the vault of heaven), Ps 19:10 (of the sun's course in the heavens), Ec 1 (of the circuits of the wind). Besides retaining these instances, RV substitutes 'made [make] a circuit' for AV 'fetch a compass' in 2 S 5:2, 2 K 3:3. See Compass.

CIRCUMCISION.—This rite is not of Israelite origin; there are some good grounds for the belief that it came to the Israelites from the Egyptians. The fact of a rite being used for its performance (Jos 5:2, 5) witnesses to the immense antiquity of the rite. Its original meaning and object are hidden in obscurity. A theory that it was regarded as a necessary preliminary to marriage has much to commend it. Among the Israelites it became the sign of the Covenant People; whoever was uncircumcised could not partake of the hopes of the nation, nor could such join in the worship of Jehovah; he could not be reckoned an Israelite (Gen 17:14). Not only was every Israelite required to undergo circumcision, but even every slave acquired by a Israelite could be received into the Christian community without circumcision. As is well known, St. Paul gained the day, but it was this question of circumcision, which involved of course the observance of the entire Mosaic Law which was the rock on which union between the early Christians and the Judaizing Christians split. Henceforth the Jewish and the Christian communities drifted further and further apart.

Circumcision in its symbolic meaning is found fairly frequently in the OT; an 'uncircumcised heart' is one from which disobedience to God has not been cut off (see Lev 26:41, Dt 10:19); the expression 'uncircumcised lips' (Ex 6:12, 13) would be equivalent to what is said of Moses, as one who 'spake unadvisedly with his lips' (Ps 106:14, cf. Is 69:7); in Jer 6:6 we have the expression 'their ear is uncircumcised' in reference to such as will not hearken to the word of the Lord. A like figurative use is found in the NT (e.g. Col 2:13).

CISTERN.—In Palestine, the climate and geological formation of the country render the storage of water a prime necessity of existence. Hence cisterns, mostly hewn in the solid rock, were universal in the times, and even before the Hebrew conquest (Dt 6:11; Neh 9:5), both RV). Thus at Gezer it has been found that 'the rock was honeycombed with cisterns, one appropriated to each house [cf. 2 K 18:19] or group of houses' (and) fairly uniform in character. A circular shaft, about 3 feet in diameter and 5 feet deep, cut through the rock, expands downwards into a chamber roughly square or circular in plan, about 15 to 20 feet in diameter and generally about 20 feet deep.... The wall is covered generally with coarse plasters' (PEFS 1903, 111 f.).

A cistern might contain only rain water conveyed from the court or flat roof during the rainy season by gutters and pipes, or might be fed by a conduit led from a spring at a distance. The largest of the innumerable cisterns of Jerusalem, the 'great sea' in the Haram area, which is estimated to have held 3,000,000 gallons, derived its water-supply partly from surface drainages and partly from water brought by a conduit from Solomon's Pools near Bethlemm (Wilson).

The mouth of a cistern, through which the water was sometimes drawn by 12 or 13 wheels (Ec 129), was legally required to have a cover (Ex 218, cf. Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 37). A disused or temporarily empty cistern formed a convenient place of detention, as in the case of Joseph (Gen 3738) and of Jeremiah (Jer 38).

CITY.—The surprisingly large number of places in the 'list of all lands' which receive in Scripture the honourable designation of 'city' is in itself evidence that the OT 'cities,' like the NT 'ships,' must not be evaluated at modern standards. The recent excavations in Palestine have confirmed this conclusion. In his recent work, Canaan d'apres l'exploration recente (1907), the Dominican scholar, Father Vincent, has prepared plans on a uniform scale of the various sites excavated (see op. cit. 27 H. with plates). From these the modest proportions of an ancient Canaanite or Hebrew city may be best realized. The area of Lachish, for example, did not exceed 15 acres; Taanach and Megiddo each covered an area from 12 to 15 acres—an area about equal to the probable extent of the Jebusite city on Ophel captured by David (25 S 58). Gezer, at the time of its greatest expansion, did not exceed 25 acres, or thereby, the circuit of its outer wall being only 1500 yards, about 10 of the present area of the walls of Jerusalem.

With the exception of cities on the seacoast, the situation of the Canaanite city was determined, as elsewhere in that old world, by two supreme considerations: the presence of an adequate water-supply and the capability of easy defense against the enemy. 'The cities of Canaan,' says Vincent, 'were almost invariably perched upon a projecting spur or mountain slope, or upon an isolated eminence in the plain: Megiddo, Gezer, Tell-es-Safy [Gath?]: not to mention the hill of the primitive Jerusalem—are characteristic examples of the form and to have been inhabited... The same well-known fact agrees the mention of the 'cities on their mounds' (Jos 1118, Jer 3018 RVm [Heb. 247, the Arabic tella, now so common in the topographical nomenclature of Western Asia).

The relation between the city and the dependent villages was regarded as that of a mother to her children, and her daughters, a point lost in our rendering 'villages' (e.g. Jos 13. 20. 4, and passim), thought to be in the margins from these the city was outwardly distinguished by its massive walls (cf. Nu 13. 26, Dt 4. 41 walled up to heaven), on the construction of which recent excavation has thrown a flood of new light (see FORTIFICATION). Close to, if not actually upon, the walls, houses were sometimes built, as we learn from Jos 20. 18 (cf. 2 Co 11). The streets are now seen to have been exceedingly narrow and crooked. Old maps have a definite plan, a maze of narrow crooked causeways and blind alleys, as at Gezer. Only at the intersection of the more important streets, and especially near the city gates, were broad places (Jer 5. 9, Neh 34. 5, 16 RV—where AV, as often, has 'streets')—the markets (Mt 25. 12, Lk 1611) and market-places (Mt 20. 4, Lk 7fl# of NT—where the citizens met to discuss public affairs, the children to play, and the elders to dispense justice. The importance of the gates, which were closed at nightfall (Jos 23), is treated of in art. FORTIFICATION and Biblecraft, § 5.

During the night the watchmen mounted guard on the ramparts, or went 'about the city' (Cs 3. 6, Es 2. 12, Ps 127). A feature of an Eastern city in modern times was the aggregation in a particular street or streets of representatives of the same craft or occupation, from which the name of the street or quarter was derived (see ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 10).

The houses were assuredly small: in Western ideas (see HOUSE), for the city folk lived their life in the courts and streets, retiring to their houses mainly to eat and sleep. Every city of any importance, and in particular every royal city, had its citadel, or acropolis, as the excavations show, to which the inhabitants might flee as a last defence. Such was the 'strong tower within the city' of Thebes (Jer 94). Indeed the common term for city ('tr') is often used in this restricted sense; thus the 'stronghold of Zion' is re-named 'David's city' or citadel (25 S 5, AV 'city of David'), and the 'city of waters' (127) at Rabbath-ammon is really the 'water fort.'

As regards the water-supply, it was essential, as we have seen, to have one or more springs in the immediate vicinity, to which 'at the time of evening' (Gn 44) the city maidens went to draw water. Against the long rainless summer, and especially against the oft-recurring cases of siege, it was not at all necessary that the city should be provided with open pools and covered cisterns for the storage of water. Mesha, king of Moab, tells in his famous inscription how, as there was 'no cistern in the midst of a certain city, he said to all the people: make you each a cistern in his house' (cf. Os 6).

In the internal affairs of the city the king in Canaanite days was supreme. Under the Hebrew monarchy and later, law and justice were in the hands of the elders of the city (Dt 18. 8, 9, Ru 4 etc.). In addition to these men, possessing the full rights of citizenship—the 'men of the city' par excellence—with their wives and children, the population will have included many slaves, mostly captives of war, and a sprinkling of sojourners and passing strangers (see STRANGERS).

No city, finally, was without its sanctuary or high place, either within its own precincts, as in most cities of note (see HIGH PLACES), or on an adjoining height (15 S 17). With divine or national sanctuaries, too, the city had been founded in far-off Canaanite, or even, as we now know, in pre-Canaanite days, when the foundation sacrifice claimed its human victim (see HOUSE, § 3). The survival of this to this day is also certain to be recognized in connexion with the rebuilding of Jericho, the foundation of which was laid by Hiel the Bethelite, 'with the loss of Abiram his first born,' and whose gates were set up 'with the loss of' his youngest son, Segub (1 K 16. 34 RV).

CLAUDA.—A Roman Christian, perhaps wife of Pudent and mother of Linus (2 Ti 4); but Lightfoot (Clément, l. 76) shows that this is improbable. The two former names are found in a sepulchral inscription near Rome, and a Claudia was wife of Claudius, friend of Martial. If these are identical, Claudia was a British lady of high birth; but this is very unlikely.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN

The words 'clean,' 'unclean,' 'purity,' 'purification,' have acquired in the process of religious development a spiritual connotation which obscures their original meaning. Their primitive significance is wholly ceremonial; the conceptions they represent date back to a very early stage of religious practice, so early indeed that it may be called pre-religious, in so far as any idea of holiness can be said to exist in the epoch in which spell and magic predominated, and that at which germs of a rudimentary religious consciousness can be detected.—In a context of primitive custom, one of the most widespread phenomena is the existence of 'taboo.' Anthropology has yet to say the last word about it, and its general characteristics can be differently summarized. But, broadly speaking, taboo springs from the human fear of the unknown, and by its primitive efficacy, it was therefore to be avoided with great care; they were 'taboo' to him. It would be rash to dogmatize about the origin of this notion; it must probably date back to days prior to any ideas of religious conceptions, and may even be traceable ultimately to instincts which mankind shares with the higher animals. No doubt in later times the idea was artificially extended in deference to the exigencies of ambition and avarice on the part of at least some priests, to the distrust of innovations (cf. Ex 20:27, Dt 27:4, Jos 23), to the recommendations of elementary sanitation, etc. But originally the savage regarded as taboo certain persons, material substances, and bodily acts or states which were considered to possess a kind of transmissible electric energy with which it was very dangerous to meddle; and these taboos were jealously guarded by the sanctions of civil authority, and later of religious belief.

It seems probable that even at such an early epoch taboos could be viewed from two distinct points of view. A taboo might be either a blessing or a curse, according as it was handled by an expert or a layman. Thus produced defilement, but, properly treated, it might remove impurity. A chief or king was taboo, and to touch him produced the primitive equivalent of 'touch', and yet his touch could remove the disease it created. The reasons for this twofold point of view are very obscure, and do not come within the scope of this article. But the differentiation seems to have existed in a confused way at the earliest era. After this notion crystallized into a very vital distinction. On the one hand we find the conception of taboos as expressing an official consecration and dedication to the Divine beings. A sanctuary, a season, a priest or chief, were set apart from common life and placed in a special relation to God or the Divine. On the other hand, certain taboos were tabooed holy. On the other side, certain taboos were held to arise from the intrinsic repulsiveness of the object or condition, a repulsiveness which affected not God and man with all their varying relations; these taboos were due to the essential uncleanness of their object.

With the rise of animistic beliefs and practices this differentiation was reinforced by the dualism of benevolent and malignant spirits. Uncanny energy varied according as it arose from the one or the other class, and much care must be taken to propitiate the one and avert the power of the other. Thus on the one side we find sacrificial ritual, which has as its object to please the good demons, and on the other side we have a cathartic ritual, which aims at expelling evil demons from the body (cf. Lv 16, where the two notions are united in one ceremony). But even after the growth of such refinements, ideas and rules survived which can be explained only as relics of primitive and even primeval taboo customs. A still later stage is seen when rules of purity are attributed to the conscious command of God, and their motive is found in His own origin (Lv 11). The Jewish sacred books teem with references which demonstrate the survival of primitive taboos. Thus Frazer draws especial attention to the Nazirite vows (Nu 6:1-21), to the Sabbath regulations (Ex 35:3), to the views of death (Nu 19:14), and child-birth (Lv 12). Similarly the origin of the conception of holiness may be seen in the idea that it is transmissible by contact (Ex 22:26), or in the penalty for meddling with a holy object (1 S 6:9; 2 S 6:5); whilst allusions to ritual uncleanness occur frequently in Ezekiel, and the legislation on the subject forms a large part of Leviticus and Deuteronomy. In some cases these ideas may have arisen in protest against historical developments of Hebrew custom. Thus it has been supposed that the Nazirite vows originated in the desire for a return to primitive simplicity by way of contrast to the habits of Palestinian Canaanites. But many of the regulations about uncleanness can be explained only by a reference to primitive ritualism, with its conceptions of objects charged with a secret energy which the ordinary man does well to shun.

The word 'clean,' it may be remarked, conveyed originally no positive idea. A clean object was one to which he had not been exposed; a person who had contracted no ceremonial taint. And so again 'purification' meant the removal of a ceremonial taint by ceremonial means, the unclean object being thus restored to a normal condition. Fire and liquids were the best media of purification. Similarly, 'common,' the opposite of 'holy,' merely meant 'dedicated to God,' and expressed no ethical or spiritual notion. In fact, when the conceptions of holiness and uncleanness had been definitely differentiated, the rule would be that, though the holy must be clean, the clean need in no way be holy. Later thought, however, confused the two ideas (cf. Ac 10:9).

UNCLEANNESS IN THE OT.—The consequences of uncleanness and the methods of purification naturally differed in different races. But in the Jewish religion uncleanness was always held to disqualify a man for the performance of any religious rites. In practice a certain amount of laxity seems to have been tolerated (Ezk 22:447), though this did not pass without protest (Ezk 44:4; Is 52:6). But, strictly, an unclean man was debarred from religious offices (Lv 7:19; and nobody could perform them in an unclean place, e.g. in any land but Palestine (2 K 5:7; Hos 9).
The Jewish rules about uncleanness can be roughly classified under five main heads: sexual impurity, uncleaness due to blood, uncleaness connected with food, with death, and with leprosy. This division is not scientific; some rules are equally in place in more than one class; but at present none but a rough classification is possible.

1. Sexual impurity.—All primitive religions display great terror of any functions connected, however remotely, with the organs of reproduction. Sexual intercourse produced uncleaness; and later animism taught that members watch over man and must be averted with scrupulous care. The time when marriage is consummated was especially dangerous, and this idea is clearly seen in To 8h, though this instance is unique in Jewish sacred literature. But, apart from this, the Jews considered all intercourse to defile till evening, and to necessitate a purificatory bath (Lv 15:14). Under certain circumstances, when cleanness was especially important, complete abstinence from women was required (Ex 19:18). This, too, from 1 S 21:4, as if soldiers on a campaign came under this regulation; perhaps because war was a sacred function, duly opened with religious rites (cf. 2 S 11:19), and this may also be the cause of the bridegroom's exemption from military service for a year after marriage (Dt 22:24).

Uncircumcision was regarded as unclean. The reason for this is not obvious: rites of circumcision were performed by every primitive nation at the time of pubery (whether for decorative purposes, or in order to prepare a young man or woman for marriage, or for some other reason), and it is possible that among the Jews this custom had been thrown back to an earlier period of life. Or it may be that they regarded circumcision as imposing a distinct tribe-mark on the infant. The condition of uncleanness might be held as unclean because of the special implication foreign morality. Trousers on strangers are very common in savage nations.

Seminal emission made a man unclean till the evening, and necessitated bathing and washing of clothes (Lv 15:16-17).

Childbirth was universally regarded as a special centre of impurity, though among the Jews we find no evidence that the new-born child was subject to it as well as the mother. The mother was completely unclean for seven days; after that, she was in a condition of modified impurity for 33 days, disqualified from entering the sanctuary or touching any hallowed thing. (These periods were doubled when the baby was a girl.) After this, she had to perform the rite of purification. She must offer a lamb of the first year and a pigeon or turtle dove, though poorer people might substitute another pigeon or dove for the lamb (Lv 12, cf. Lk 2:22).

Analogous notions may perhaps be traced in the prohibition of any sexual impregnation (Dt 22:28), any mingling of different species (Dt 22:11, Lv 19:15), and in the disqualifications on eunuchs, bastards, and the Ammonites and Moabites, the offspring of an incestuous union (Dt 23:3-4); though some of these rules look like the product of later refinement.

Human excreta were sources of uncleanness (Dt 23:12), but the directions on this subject very possibly date from the period of magical spells, and arose from the fear lest a man's excrement might fall into an enemy's hands and be used to work magic against him.

The prohibition to priests of woolen garments which caused them to be unclean with leprosy was possibly an extension of a similar notion (Ezk 44:17-18). Finally, the abstinence from eating the shew of the thigh, which in Gn 32:28 is explained by a reference to the story of Jacob, may have originated in the idea that the thigh was the centre of the reproductive functions.

2. Uncleanness due to blood.—The fear of blood dates back in all probability to the most primeval times, and may be in part instinctive. Among the Jews it was a most stringent taboo, and their aversion from it was reinforced by the theory that it was the seat of life (Dt 12:18). A clear instance of the all-embracing nature of its polluting power is seen in Dt 22:14. The same idea would probably cause the abstinence from eating beasts of prey, carrion birds, and animals which had died without being bled (Ezk 4, Ex 22, Lv 17). To break this rule caused defilement (1 S 14, Ex 22:30). Such a taboo is so universal and constant that it cannot reasonably be accounted for by the Jewish hatred for heathen offerings of blood.

The taboos on menstrual blood and abnormal issues must come under this category, for they concern impurity. Menstruation was terribly feared; it was exceedingly dangerous for a man even to see the blood. The woman in such a condition was unclean for seven days; her impurity was highly contagious (Lv 15:29-33). Similarly, abnormal issues preclude appearance uncleanness for seven days after they had stopped. The purification required was the offering of two turtle doves and two young pigeons. A man had also to explain the separate items we know as menstruation rules, and to wash himself (Lv 15:11). The man was unclean for seven days, though he was not in the guilty state himself.

But, as we have seen, this theory of the law of uncleanness extends beyond the biological. Much of the law appears to be based on the idea of sympathetic taboo; they were not eaten from the fear lest their qualities should be imparted to the consumer. In later times some animals might be tabooed from fear of the excrement, and the excrement of these animals, though usually they were to the human taste, were tabooed. It may be that the uncleanness of blood was connected with the institution of the sacrifice. As sacrifices were blood offerings, it may be that the idea was that certain substances were polluted by contact with the altar and were thus unclean. This idea is found in many religions, and the Jews followed the general pattern. Thus, no one could ever come in contact with the altar, and a man became unclean for seven days; it was necessary to sprinkle him with water and wash his garments before he could approach the altar again (Lv 16:19). It was necessary, however, to sprinkle the top of the altar itself with water (Lv 16:19).

3. Uncleanness connected with food.—Anthropology no longer explains all taboos as surmised from primitive animism, though no doubt this explanation may account for some. It appears rather that 'toleratolly' was the more general phenomenon. For reasons which cannot here be given, in many cases, blood of all kinds was treated as sacred, and tabooed accordingly; it might be that the animal was very useful or very dangerous or very strange; the savage had no concept of the animal as a separate entity, and any animal was liable to be tabooed. For instance, a group in the Solomon Islands had a taboo on a species of bird, and in the case of a relative of the so-called white magpie, who was treated with the same respect as the magpie itself. The savage was not aware of the fact that there were many beings that resembled magpies, and the idea was that the whole species was to be tabooed. This is the explanation of the taboo on the eagle, the hawk, and the eagle, and the taboo on birds of prey which was common in many cultures.

The food laws reinforce the idea of contamination. There is a great variation among the different cultures. But it is plain that the idea is not a unique phenomenon in this case; it is found in many cultures. It is known that the food laws were not always the same in different countries, and that they varied according to the food available. It is clear, however, that the laws were not based on the idea of the same food being consumed in the same way. There were some differences, but the general idea was that the taboos were based on the idea of contamination. This idea was not uncommon in many cultures, and it is clear that the idea of contamination was not a unique phenomenon in this case.

4. Uncleanness connected with death.—Death, as well as birth, was a source of danger to the savage. The animistic horror of ghosts and theories of a continued existence after death, gave a rationale for such terror; but it probably existed in pre-animistic days, and the precautions exercised with regard to dead bodies were derived partly from the intrinsic mysterious-ness of death, partly from the value of a corpse for magical purposes. Among the Jews a corpse was regarded as exceptionally defiling (Hag. 2:19). Even a grave caused infectious uncleanness, and graves were whitened in order to be easily recognizable. He who touched a corpse was unclean for seven days (Nu 19:15). Purification was necessary on the fourth and seventh days; and on the latter the unclean person also washed his clothes and bathed. A corpse defiled a tent and all open vessels in it. For similar reasons, warriors needed purification (Nu 31:14-18), a murderer defiled the land and had to flee to a city of refuge, where he must remain till the death of the high priest (Nu 35). It has been suggested that this provision was due to the notion that the high priest, the temple, and its inhabitants were consecrated by the blood of sacrifice. This notion is partly based on Lev 14:3-8, perhaps because of their heathenish association.

The ritual of purification from corpse-defilement, described in Nu 19, must be of high antiquity. The purifying medium was water, the blood and ashes of a red heifer, with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. This was sprinkled over the unclean person on the third and seventh days, and the priest and attendants who performed the ceremony were themselves defiled by it till evening, and needed purification (cf. Dt 21). The ritual thus unites the three great cathartic media, fire, water, and aromatic woods: the three first, and the last, perhaps, were originally considered to be efficacious in expelling the death-demons by their scent.

5. Uncleanness connected with leprosy. — Orientalists consider leprosy the one specially unclean disease, which required not only purification but cleansing (cf. Nu 12:1). It appears to have been a kind of leprous disease, and Lv 13 gives directions for its diagnosis. If pronounced unclean, the leper was excluded from the community (cf. 2 K 7:1). He could not attend a synagogue service in a walled town, though in open towns a special part of the synagogue was often reserved for lepers. If he was cured, he must undergo an elaborate process of purification (Lv 14). In brief, the ritual was as follows: (a) the sacrifice of one bird and the release of another, perhaps regarded as carrying away the demon; (b) purification by sprinkling water, and removing the blood of the dead bird; used at this stage; (c) sprinkling of clothes, shaving of the hair, and bathing of the body; then (d) after seven days' interval this second process was repeated; and finally (e) on the eighth day sacrifices were offered, and the man ceremonially cleansed with the blood and oil of the sacrifice.

11. Uncleanness in the NT. — Legal casuistry carried the cathartic ritual to a high pitch of complexity, and Jesus came into frequent conflict with the Jewish lawyers over the point (cf. Mk 7:1). He denounced it energetically (Lk 11:39, Mt 15:19), and, by insisting on the supreme importance of moral purity, threw purificational ideas into a subordinate position. The force of this teaching was not at once recognized (cf. Ac 10:6). The decree in Ac 15:29 still recommends certain taboos. But St. Paul had no illusions on the subject (cf. Ro 14:1, 1 Cor. 10:27), C. J. G. Runciman, The Unclean Man (T. & T. Clark). In practice he made concessions to the scruples of others (Ac 21:24, Ro 14:21) as Jesus had done (Mk 1:46); and it was recognized that a man who had scruples must not be encouraged to violate them. But it was inevitable that with the process of time and reflection, ceremonial prohibitions and ritualistic notions of cleanness should disappear before the Christian insistence on the internal elements in religion. There are certain survivals of such notions even now, and ceremonialism is not extinguished. But the idea of defilement is very narrow, and in the case of such ritual regulations as survive, on grounds that accord better with the spirit of Christianity and the ideas of civilized society.

CLOUT.—Jer 38:11-12 'old cast clouts.' The word is still used in Scotland for clothes (as in 'dish-clout'), but for clothes only contemptuously. Formerly there was no contempt in the word. Sir John Mandevelle (Travels, Macmillan's ed., p. 73) says, 'And in that well she washed often-times the clouts of her son Jesus Christ.' The verb 'to clout' occurs in Jos 9:9, of shoes (Amer. RV 'patched').

CLUB.—Only Job 41:13 RV, for AV 'dart.' The stout shepherd's club, with its thick end probably studded with nails, with which he defended his flock against wild beasts, is rendered by 'rod' in Ps 23:3 and elsewhere.

CINIDUS.—A city of Caria, in S.W. of Asia Minor. It was the dividing point between the S. and W. coasts of Asia Minor, and at this point St. Paul's ship changed its course in the voyage to Rome (Ac 27:7). It contained Jewish inhabitants as early as the 2nd cent. n.c. (1 Mac 15:5), and had the rank of a free city. A. Scouler.

COAL.—Mineral coal was unknown in Bible times. Wherever 'coal' (or 'coals') is mentioned, therefore, we must in the great majority of cases understand wood or charcoal. Several species of wood used for heating purposes are named in Is 44:14, to which Ps 120:12 adds 'coals of broom' (RVM). In two cases, however, the 'live coal' of Isaiah's vision (Is 6:6) and the 'coals' on which was 'a coal take haken' for Elijah, the Heb. word denotes a hot stone (RVM—see Bread). The charcoal was generally burned in a brazier (Jer 36:32, RV, AV 'hearth') or chafing-dish, 'the pan of fire' of Ezek 12:5. See further, House, § 7.

Coal, or rather charcoal, supplies several Scripture metaphors, the most interesting of which is illustrated by the expression of the wise woman of Tekoa, 'thus shall they quench my coal that is left?' (2 S 14:1). By this she means, as shown by the following words, the death of her son and the extinction of her family, an idea elsewhere expressed as a putting out of one's lamp (Pr 13:9).

A. R. S. Kenney.

COAST.—Coast, now confined to the shore of the sea, was formerly used of the border between two countries, or of any locality of any place. When St. Paul 'passed through the upper coasts' (Ac 19:1), he was in the interior of Asia Minor. Here he gathered all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof ('Mt 2:9).

COAT.—See Dresses, § 2 (a), 4.

COAT OF MAIL.—See Armour, Arms, § 2 (c).

COCK.—Mt 26:50, Mk 13:41, 14:41, Lk 22:54-56, 40, Jn 13:18, 14:37. Cocks and hens were probably unknown in Palestine until from two to three centuries before Christ's time. In the famous painted tomb at Marissa (see MAKEDONIA), a work of about n.c. 200, we have the cock depicted. Cocks and hens were introduced from Persia. The absence of express mention of them from the Law, and the fact that it is a 'clean' bird, have made it possible for the Jews for many centuries to sacrifice these birds on the eve of the Day of Atonement—a cock for each male and a hen for each female in the household. Talmudic tradition finds references to the cock in Is 22:9, Job 38:4, and Ps 50:10, but all these are very doubtful. The 'cock-crowing' was the name of the 3rd watch of the night, just before the dawn, in the time of our Lord. During this time the cocks crow at irregular intervals. E. W. G. Masterman.

COCKATRICE.—See SERPENT.

COCKER.—Sir 30:7 'Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid,' that is 'pamper.' Cf. Shaks, King John v. 1. 70—'Shall a beardless boy, A cocker'd silken wanton, brave our fields,' and Hul (1111), 'No creatures more cocker their young than the Asse and the Ape.' The word is not found earlier than the 15th century. Its origin is obscure.

COOKIE (bo'khe). Job 31:19. 'AV 'stinking weeds' or RV'M 'noisome weeds' are both more correct. Sir J. Hooper has suggested 'stinking arums,' which are common Palestine plants, but the more general rendering is safer. E. W. G. Masterman.

COOEI-SYRIA, 'Hollow Syria,' is properly the great hollow running N. and S. between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges (1 Es 4:24; Strabo, xvi. 2). It corresponds to the Biq'ath ha-Lebān on of Jos 11:17 etc.; possibly also to Biq'ath Aven of Am 1. The first element of the name persists in the modern name of the valley S. of Baalbek, -l-Bugd-. The Orontes drains the valley northward, and the Litānī southward, both rivers rising near Baalbek. The soil is rich, producing splendid crops of wheat, etc., while some of the finest vineyards in Syria clothe the adjoining slopes.

'Coele-Syria' came to have a wider signification, covering indeed, with Phoenicia, all the beleagued territory S. of the River Eleutherus (2 Misc. 3 etc.; Strabo, xvi. 755). In 1 Es 21 etc., Coele-Syria and Phoenicia denote the whole Persian province, stretching from the Euphrates to the borders of Egypt. Josephus reckons the country had some Jordan to Coele-Syria (Ant. i. 1. 5, 2, 8, 5 etc.), including in it Scythopolis, the only member of the Decapolis west of the river.

W. Ewing.

COFFER occurs only in 1 S 6:11, 12, and the Heb. term 'argoz, of which it is the tr., is also found nowhere else. It appears to have been a small chest which contained (7) the golden figures sent by the Philistines as a guilt-offering.

COFFIN.— Gn 50:24 only (of the disposal of Joseph's body in Egypt). Israelitish burial rites (see Mourning, Crowns, Toms) did not include the use of coffins.

COLOR.—See BAY, LEGION.

COINS.—See MONEY.

COL-HOZEH (° seeing all).—A Judahite (Neh 3:10, 11).

COLIUS (1 Es 9:4).—See Calitas, Keliah.

COLLAR.—See ORNAMENTS, § 2.

COLLEGE,—This stands in AV (2 K 22:1, 2 Ch 34:2) for the Heb. mishneh, which RV correctly renders 'second quarter,' the quarter of the city lying to the north (Zeph 1:1), and possibly referred to in Neh 11, where our version reads 'second over the city.' The idea of a 'college' came from the Targ. on 2 K 22:4, 'house of instruction.' J. Taylor.

COLONY.—The word colonia is a pure Latin word, which is written in Greek letters in the only place where it occurs in the Bible (Ac 16:28), and expresses a purely Roman institution. It is a piece of Rome transported bodily out of Rome itself and planted somewhere in the Roman Empire. In other words, it is a collection of Roman citizen-soldiers settled on a military road to keep the enemies of the Empire in check. These retained thir citizenship of Rome and constituted the aristocracy of every town in which they were situated. Their constitution was on the model of Rome and the Italian States. A number of places are mentioned in the NT which were really colonia, but only one, Philippi, is so named, and the reason for this naming is no doubt that the author of Acts was proud of this city, with which he had some connexion. Philaid Antioch, Lystra, Corinthus, and Potidæa, not to mention others, were colonie. Sometimes these coloniae were merely settlements of veterans for whom their generals had to find a home.

A. Scouler.

COLOSSAE was an ancient city of Phrygia (Roman province Asia), at one time of great importance, but dwindling later as its neighbour Laodicea prospered. It was situated in the upper part of the coast of the Lycaon, a tributary of the Maeander, about 10 miles from Laodicea, and 13 from Hierapolis. The three cities naturally formed a sphere of missionary labour for Epaphras (Epaphroditus), an inhabitant of Colossi (Col 2:1). Timothy (Col 1:1), and others. St. Paul himself never visited any of them (Col 2:1). It has been suggested with great probability that in Rev 19:14 the single church of Laodicea must represent the main church in the region of the Lycaon valley also. The church in Colossi had developed Judaizing tendencies which St. Paul found it necessary to combat in the Epistle which has come down to us. If, as seems certain, the epistle from Laodicea (Col 4:16) is our ‘Epistle to the Ephesians,’ it also was read in the church at Colossi. Both letters were carried from Rome by Tychicus, who was accompanied by Onesimus, whose master Philemon was an inhabitant of Colossi. See also following article.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

1. AUTHENTICITY.-This Epistle is one of the ten Epistles of St. Paul included in Cardinal's collection (a.n. 140). It appears to have been accepted without question as genuine both by Churchmen and by heretics, and is referred to by the Muratorian Fragment, by Irenæus, and by Clement of Alexandria in his authenticity. Its authenticity has been decided until the early part of last century, and was then contested only on internal grounds of style and subject-matter. As to the first objection, the Epistle is marked, to a greater extent than St. Paul's earlier writings, by certain ruggedness of expression, a want of finish that borders on obscurity. The vocabulary also differs in some respects from that of the earlier Epistles, and this is amply accounted for by the difference of subject. As a matter of fact, the resemblances in style to St. Paul's other writings are as marked as the differences in any case arguments from style in disproof of authenticity are very unreliable. The later plays of Shakespeare, as compared with those of his middle period, show just the same development of the sense and want of fluency and finish.

The argument from subject-matter is more important. The Epistle was regarded by earlier German critics as presupposing a fully developed system of Gnostic teaching, as such belongs to the middle of the 2nd cent., and a corresponding development of Christology. But a more careful study of the Epistle has shown that what St. Paul has in view is not a system of teaching, but rather a tendency. Words like péróma, to which later Gnosticism gave a technical sense, are used in this Epistle with their usual non-technical signification. Our study of early Christian and Jewish thought has shown that Gnostic tendencies date from a much earlier time than the great Gnostic teachers of the 2nd cent., and are, indeed, older than Christianity. The Christology of the Epistle certainly shows an advance on that of St. Paul's earlier Epistles, especially in the emphasis laid on the cosmic activity of the pre-incarnate Christ. This may be accounted for in part by the special purposes of the Epistle (see below), and in part by the development in St. Paul's own historical ideas. It is irrational to deny the authenticity of an Epistle claiming to be St. Paul's, merely because it shows that the mind of the Apostle had not remained stagnant during the period of imprisonment that must have given him special opportunity for thought. (See Ephesians.)

Many German critics, such as Harnack and Jülicher, are now in agreement with the leading British scholars in accepting the Epistle as St. Paul's. The authenticity of the Epistle is sustained by its close relation to the Epistle to Philemon, the Pauline authorship of which is hardly seriously disputed. (On the relation of our Epistle to the Epistle to the Ephesians see Ephesians.)

2. INTEGRITY AND TEXT.-The integrity of the Epistle is now generally admitted, though certain obserubences in the text have given rise to some conjectural emendations. Holtzmann attempted to prove that this Epistle and the Epistle to the Ephesians (Epaphroditus), an inhabitant of the original Epistle of St. Paul's, which he tried to reconstruct by extracting a Pauline nucleus of about forty verses; but his conclusions have not been accepted by others. More recently, von Soden has proposed the rejection of about nine verses, but not on any adequate grounds. It would have been no easy task to interpolate a genuine Epistle of St. Paul's, jealous-a new motive and in the power of a new life. The third section of the Epistle (5:8-4) applies this principle to various relations of life—the mutual relation of Christians, husbands and wives, children and fathers, slaves and masters; and lastly, to the relation of St. Paul to them, and to their relation with the world. The closing section (6:1-4) deals with personal matters—his mission of Tychicus, with whom St. Paul tactfully associates Onesimus; with St. Mark's proposed visit, in connexion with which St. Paul writes a word of special commendation, showing how completely his former discord has been healed. Then follow a warm commendation of Tychicus, greetings from Luke and Demas, instructions for exchanging letters with the neighbouring Church at Laodicea, and a final message from Arppus, who had apparently succeeded, in Epaphras' absence, to the supervision of the Colossian Church.

J. HOWARD B. MASTERMAN.

COLOURS.—The colours named in OT and NT, as in other ancient literatures, are in some instances more or less pure, and of these several are used with considerable latitude.

1. White as the colour of snow in Is 1:14, of the teeth described as milk-white (Gn 49:2), and of horses (Zec 1:6, AV); also of wool (Rev 14:4)—the prevailing colour of the Palestinian sheep being white (see CA 9:6)—and of garments (Ec 9:9, Mk 9:9). Gray (and grey) occurs only in the expression 'gray hairs,' while grisled (lit. 'gray head') apparently means black, not white spots (Gn 31:15, Zec 6:2, cf. 6 below). Green is not a colour adjective (in Est 1:4 read RVm), but a noun signifying green plants and herbs, as e.g., in Gn 2:4-15. A kindred word rendered greath (Lv 13:14, 14) is probably a greenish yellow, since it is also used in Ps 68:4 of 'yellow gold.'

2. The darker colours likewise merge into each other, bluish-brown or reddish-brown, for example, not being clearly distinguished. Black is the colour of hair (Ca 5:2 'black as a raven'), of horses (Zec 6:4, Rev 6:6), and of ink (2 Co 8). In Ca 1:5 the same Heb. word signifies dark-coloured sheep (AV 'black'). Laban's black sheep (Gn 29:30, RV) were probably dark brown (AV 'brown').

3. Red is the colour of blood (2 K 3:9), and of grape juice (Is 63:4). The same word is used of the reddish-brown colour of the 'red beifer' of Nu 19, and of the chestnut horse of Zamariah's vision (11, AV 'red'), although the precise colour distinction between the latter and his companion, the sorrel (AVm 'black' in Zec 6:7, 'silver' in Rev 6:6, and of ink (2 Co 8), is also used of the dyeing of objects (11, AV 'red') in Nu 21:8; but in OT scarlet is most frequently mentioned as one of the four liturgical, or, as we should say, ecclesiastical colours (see below). Vermilion is mentioned as a pigment (Jer 2:32, Ezek 23:27).

5. Associated with scarlet in the Priests' Code of the Pentateuch are found two colours, 'argalmada rendered purple, and *ethaheth rendered blue.' In reality these are two shades of purple, the red tone predominating in the blue tints in the latter. Since blue predominates in our modern purple, it would be well to drop the cumbersome terms red-purple or purple-red, and blue-purple or purple-blue, in favour of the simpler names purple and violet, and in the margin of Ez 19 in AV, S1 (AV). Both shades were obtained by the use, as a dye, of a colourless fluid secreted by the gland of a shell-fish, the murex trunculus, which was found in great quantities on the Phoenician coast. Hence Tyre became the chief seat of the manufacture of the purple cloth for which Phoenicia was famous throughout the ancient world (cf. Ezk 27:17, 18). Purple raiment is repeatedly mentioned in Scripture as worn by kings and nobles. It was as an offertory of the Jews that the Lord was derivatively robed in purple ( Mk 15:19, Jn 19).

In the Priests' Code, as has been noted, from Ex 25 onwards, 'violet' (AV 'blue'), 'purple,' and 'scarlet' are used—and always in this order—to denote the fine linen thread, spun from yarn that had been dyed these colours (see esp. Ex 35:3), which, with the natural white thread, was employed in weaving the rich material for the various hangings of the Eng. (a) physical, or (b) mental refreshment of an active kind (invigoration, encouragement)—obscure meanings. In modern use it denotes (c) mental refreshment of the softer kind (consolation). Sense (d) appears in Gn 18, Jg 19:4, Ca 31:2, etc.; the tenderer signification (c) appears in Mt 5:3, 2 Co 12:9, etc. For the above Gr. noun, however, AV fourteen times writes 'consolation' (interchanging 'comfort' and 'consolation' in 2 Co 1:3), alike in sense (b) and (c): this RV replaces seven times (in Paul) by 'comfort.' 'Comfort' is also in AV the rendering of a second and rarer group of Gr. words denoting consolation (in sorrow); so in Jn 13:21. AV 'comfort' (cf. AV and RVJ), 1 Th 2:25, 54; the original of 'comfort' (soothing) in Col 4:1 is an isolated expression kindred to the last. 'Of good comfort' in Ph 2:17 renders a fourth Gr. word—*en goood harts, cheerful, while 'of good comfort' in Mt 18:2 = *oL good cheer in v.3 and elsewhere (so RV here, and in Mt 10:4).

For OT and NT, comfort has its source in the tender love of God for His people, and for the individual soul; it is mediated (in the NT) by the sympathy of Christ, the visitings of the Holy Spirit, the help of brethren, and the hope of glory; it counteracts the troubles of life, and the discouragement of work for God: see esp. Jn 16:27, Ro 5:2, 2 Co 1:20, 2 Th 2:16, G. G. FINDLAY.

COMMENTS / 149

COMMENTARY (2 Ch 13:4 24' AV).—The Heb. (midrash) has been adopted into English. But the Midrash is not exactly what we understand by a commentary; it is an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, especially a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (Driver).
COMMERCIE.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

COMMON.—In Ac koinonia is synonymous with ceremonially unclean (cf. Mk 7, and see CLEAN and UNCLEAN).

COMMUNICATION.—While ‘conversation’ in AV means manner of life, conduct, ‘communication’ means conversation, talk. So Col 3: 8 ‘filthy communication’ (RV ‘sabotage speaking’) and elsewhere. The verb to communicate is now used in a restricted sense, so that its occurrence in AV, where it has the general meaning of making common cause with one, may be misunderstood. Cf. the Rhenish tr. of Jn 4: 4: ‘For the Jewes do not communicate with the Samaritane’ (AV ‘have no dealings with’).

COMMUNION (Gr. koinonia).—In EV koinonia is (1) ‘common in’ only 3 passages (Ac 10 16, 2 Co 6: 15, 2 Co 8: 15), while it is frequently rendered ‘fellowship’ (AV 12, RV 15 times), and twice ‘distribution’ or ‘distribution’ (Ro 15, 2 Co 9: 3 [RV has ‘contribute.’ in both cases; AV ‘contribute.’ in the first passage, ‘distrib.’ in the second]). But it is ‘communion’ that brings us nearest to the original, and sets us in the path of the right interpretation of the word on every occasion when it is used in the NT.

Koinonia comes from an adj. which means ‘common,’ and, like ‘communion,’ its literal meaning is a common participation or sharing in anything. Similarly in the NT the concrete noun koinonia is used of a partner in the ownership of a fishing-boat (Lk 5: 10); the verb koinoino of sharing something with another, whether by way of giving (Ro 12, Gal 2: 10, Phil 4: 15, 1 Ti 5: 8); and the adj. koinonos (1 Ti 6: 8) is rendered ‘willing to communicate.’

1. Koinonia meets us first in Ac 2: 47, where RV as well as AV obscures the meaning not by using the word ‘fellowship,’ but by omitting the def. article. The verse ought to read, ‘And they continued steadfastly in the apostles’ teaching and the communion, in the breaking of bread and the prayers.’ And the meaning of ‘communion’ in this case can hardly be doubtful. The reference evidently is to that ‘having all things common’ which is referred to immediately after (v. 42.), and in the manner and extent of which St. Luke explains more fully at a later stage (4: 35, 46). It appears that the ‘communion’ was the regular expression for that ‘community of goods’ which was so marked a feature of the Christianity of the first days, and which owed its origin not only to the unselfish enthusiasm of that Pentecostal period and the expectation of the Lord’s immediate return, but to the actual needs of the poorer Christians. Jews, cut off from the means of self-support by the social ostracism attendant on outward communion from the synagogue (Jn 2: 4, 12: 16). 2. The type of koinonia in Jerusalem described in Ac 2: 42–47 has apparently disappeared very soon, but its place was taken by an organized diakonia, a daily ministration to the poor (6: 4). And when the Church spread into a larger world free from the hostile influences of the synagogue, those social conditions were absent which in Jerusalem had seemed to make it necessary that Christ’s followers should have all things common. But it was a special feature of St. Paul’s teaching that Christians everywhere were members one of another, sharing each other’s wealth, whether material or spiritual. And in particular he pressed constantly upon the wealthier Gentile churches the duty of taking part in the diakonia carried on in Jerusalem on behalf of the poor saints. In this connexion we find him in 2 Co 8: 1 using the striking expression ‘the koinonia of the diakonia [the communion of the ministration]’ to the saints.’ The Christians of Corinth might have expected a union of Christians with their brethren in Jerusalem on the occasion of their parting to them out of their own abundance. Hence, by a natural process in the development of speech, the koinonia, from meaning a common participation, came to be applied to the gifts which enabled that participation to be realized. In Ro 15: 2 and 2 Co 9: 4, accordingly, the word is properly enough rendered ‘contribution.’ And yet in the Apostolic Church it could never be forgotten that a contribution or collection for the poor brethren was a form of Christian communion.

For the first, however, comp. undoubtedly had a larger and deeper sense than those technical ones on which we have been dwelling. It was out of the consciousness of a common participation in certain spiritual blessings that Christians were compelled to manifest their partnership in these specific ways. According to St. Paul’s teaching, those who believed in Christ enjoyed a common participation in Christ (if not half which bound the giving up or in another, that unity (1 Co 1), cf. v. 16). In the great central rite of their faith this common participation in Christ, and above all in His death and its fruits, was visibly set forth; the cup of blessing was a communion of the blood of Christ; the broken bread a communion of the body of Christ (1 Co 10: 16). Flowing again from this common participation in Christ there was a common participation in the Holy Spirit, for it is from the love of God as manifested in the grace of Christ that there results that ‘communion of the Holy Ghost’ which is the strongest bond of unity and peace (2 Co 13: 1, cf. v. 13, Ph 2: 1). Thus the communion of the Christian Church became a community spiritual and material, open to all the members but also peculiar to them, so that the admission of a man to the communion or his exclusion from it was his admission to, or exclusion from, the body of Christ. And this is the sense in which the Jerusalem Apostles gave ‘the right hands of communion’ to Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2: 9), that was a symbolic recognition on their part that these missionaries to the uncircumcision and Gentiles were true disciples of Christ, and that they shared with themselves in all the blessings of the Christian faith.

4. We have seen that in its root-meaning koinonia is a partnership either of good or of evil. But it was applied to Christian duties and obligations as well as to Christian privileges. The right hands of communion given to Paul and Barnabas were not only a recognition of grace received in common, but mutual pledges of an Apostolic service to the circumscription on the one hand and the heathen on the other (Gal 2: 9). St. Paul thanks God for the ‘communion’ of the Philippians in the furtherance of the gospel (Ph 1), and prays on behalf of Philemon that the ‘communion’ of his faith may become effectual (Philem 6), i.e. that the Christian sympathies and charities inspired by his faith may come into full operation.

5. In all the foregoing passages the koinonia seems to denote a mutual sharing, whether in privilege or in duty, of Christians with one another. But there are some cases where the communion evidently denotes a more exalted partnership, the partnership of a Christian with Christ or with God. This is what meets us when St. Paul speaks in Ph 3: 9 of the communion of Christ’s sufferings. He means a drinking of the cup of which Christ drank (cf. Mt 20: 22), a moral partnership with the Redeemer in His pains and tears (cf. Ro 8: 17). But it is St. John who brings this higher koinonia before us in the most absolute way when he writes ‘Our communion is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ’ (1 Jn 1: 3, cf. v. 4), and makes our communion in the fellowship of the Spirit in such a capacity that if people. Yet, through the koinonia or communion is now a higher power, it has still the same meaning as before. It is a mutual sharing, a reciprocal giving and receiving. And in his Gospel St.
COMMUNITY OF GOODS

John sets the law of this communion clearly before us when he records the words of the Lord Himself, 'Abide in me, and I in you' (Jn 15:4). The communion of the human and the Divine is a mutual activity, which may be summed up in the two words grace and faith. For grace is the spontaneous and unstinted Divine giving as revealed and mediated by Jesus Christ, while faith is the ideal form of the reception of a soul when receiving the Divine grace, surrendering itself without any reserve unto the Lord.

J. C. LAMBERT.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS.—See Communion.

COMPASS.—A 'compass' is the space occupied by a circle, or the circle itself: Pr 8:11 'he set a compass upon the face of the deep' (AVm and RV 'a circle') usually explained of the horizon, which seems to be a circle resting on the ocean. To 'fetch a compass' (Nu 34:1, Jos 15:2, 2 S 5:2, 2 K 3:9) is to make a circuit or simply 'go round.' The tool for making a circle is a compass (Is 44:6).—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1.

COMPASSION.—See PITY.

CONANIAH.—1. A Levite who had charge of the tithes and offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31:11). 2. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35:16); called in 1 Es 11' Jecomiah.

CONCOMITAT.—A name applied contemptuously by S. Paul (Ph 3:9) to the merely fleshly circumcision (Gr. katoimom; the ordinary word for 'circumcision' is perimene).

CONCORDANCES.—The Latin word concordantia, for an alphabetical list of the words of Scripture drawn up under such headings as to the places where they occur, was first used by Hugo de Sancto Caro, who compiled a Concordance to the Vulgate in 1244. This was revised by Arbottus (1990), and became the basis of a Hebrew Concordance by Isaac Nathan (1437-45). Nathan's work was revised and enlarged by John Buxtort, the elder, whose Concordantia Bibliorum Hebraicæ (1632) held the place of standard Concordance for two centuries, and served as the model for many others. John Taylor's Hebrew Concordance adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf (2 vols, folio, Norwich, 1754-57), is another link in the succession. The first Concordance to the English Bible is that of John Marbeck (folio, London, 1560). The earliest Concordance to the Septuagint is Conrad Kircher's (1607). The first Greek NT Concordance was published at Basle anonymously in 1546. In the use of the following lists it will be understood that, while the most recent works, other things being equal, are to be preferred, there is so much common material that many of the older works are by no means obsolete.

2. Greek.—The Septuagint.—Bagster's Handy Concordance of the Septuagint: Hatch-Redpath's Concordance of the Septuagint and other Greek Versions of the OT, with two supplemental fasciculi (Clarendon Press, 1892-97). This is the standard work, replacing The Englishman's Concordantia Graecarum Versionum vulgo dicta LXX Interpretum (2 vols. Amst. 1718).

(b) The NT.—The Englishman's Greek Concordance of the NT (Bagster); C. F. Hudson, Greek Concordance to NT revised by G. H. Robinson (more recently published by Professor K. J. Alford's concordantia manualis NT graeci (1890); Bruder, Concordantia omnium vocum NT graeci (1888). All these works are now superseded by Mouilton-Geden's Concordances to the Greek Testament (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1897).

3. English.—Until recent times the standard work was Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1st ed. 1758). Cruden's is truly a marvellous work, and was frequently copied, without acknowledgment, in subsequent productions. It was even issued in abridgment—the most useless and provoking of all literary products. More recent works are Eadie's Analytical Concordance to the Hebrew and English Versions of the Holy Scriptures, 2nd edn. (1894), and Thong's Concordance to RV of NT (1892).

CONCUBINE.—See FAMILY, MARRIAGE, § 9.

CONCUPISCENCE.—Concupiscence is intense desire, always in a bad sense, so that it is unnecessary to say 'evil concupiscence' as in Col 3. The reference is nearly always to sexual lust.

CONDUIT.—See JERUSALEM.

CONEX (EV tr. of shaphan, RVm rock badger)._The Hyrax syriacus, called by the Arabs nôth, and the glanam bensi Israel (the sheep of the children of Israel). The coney is a small rabbit-like animal, with short ears and a mere stump of a tail. It has stiff, ashish-brown hair, with a softer, lighter-coloured coat on the belly; it is nocturnal in its habits, and lives in holes in the rocks. Conies are very plentiful along the rocky shores of the Dead Sea, and also in the Lebanon, especially above Sidon; they can, however, be seen as a rule only between sunset and sunrise. They are gregarious in their habits, and disappear into their rocky fastnesses (Ps 104:24, Pr 30:29) with the greatest rapidity on the slightest approach of danger. The Bedouin, when hunting them, lie hidden for many hours during the night close to their holes. They feed on grass and sweet-smelling herbs, and their flesh is esteemed for eating by the Bedouin; they do not actually 'chew the cud' (Lyn syn 'V', though they work their jaws in a way that resembles a ruminant. Structurally the coney is so peculiar as to have an order, the Hyracoidea, to itself. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CONFESSION.—This word in AV means perfume (Ex 30:35), and 'confectionary' (1 S 24:10), means perfumer.

CONFESSION.—In Eng. the words 'confess,' 'confession' denote either a profession of faith or an acknowledgment of sin; and they are used in EV in both of these meanings.

1. Confession of faith.—(a) In the OT the word 'confess,' 'confession' is found in Is 1 K 9:3; 2 Ch 6:9. But the acknowledgment of God as God and the proclamation of personal trust in Him meet us continually in the lives or on the lips of patriarchs, prophets, and apostles. The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance (1876) gives 'confession' as its chief meaning, and so does the English Revised Version. In 1 S 14:27, though the word 'conceit' (Lyn 'V') is used, the meaning is clearly brought out.

(a) The meaning of confession.—In the earlier period of our Lord's ministry, confession meant no more than the expression of belief that Jesus was the expected Messiah (Jn 1:11). Even the title 'Son of God' (Mt 3:17, cf. Jn 1:14) at this stage can be understood only in its recognized Messianic sense (Ps 2:7). A great advance in faith and insight is marked by St. Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:16), though it is surprising to find that Peter and the other Apostles professed the highest point reached by Apostolic belief and profession during the Lord's earthly ministry, and that confession now gathers expressly round the Person and the Name of Jesus Christ. Moreover, the idea of confession has been elaborated, its immediate relation to faith and vital importance for salvation being clearly brought out.

(b) The Confession of the Lord's Resurrection.—As the first confession of the Lord's Resurrection was that of the blind man at the Pool of Siloam, the Marcan account (Mk 9:7) gives a similar early confes-

tion, confession of Christ carried with it readiness to bear witness to that supreme fact (Jn 20:20, Ro 10:1); and this of course implied an acceptance of the historical tradition as to His marvellous life and character which made it impossible for death to hold Him (cf. Ac 2:4). All that was at first demanded of converts, however, may have been the confession 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12:1; cf. Ph 2:10, Ti 1:1); a view that is confirmed by the fact of their being baptized 'into (or in) the name of the Lord' (Ac 8:17, 19). At a later period the gesture of heresy made a more precise confession necessary. In the Johannine Epistles it is essential to confess, on the one hand, that 'Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (1 Jn 4:1, 2 Jn 1), and, on the other, that 'Jesus is the Son of God' (1 Jn 4:14). With this developed type of confession may be compared the gloss that has been attached to the narrative of the Ethiopian eunuch's baptism (Ac 8:38, see RVm), probably representing a formula of acknowledgment of local classes of sin, for instance in the Penitential Psalms and in such prayers as those of Ezra (10:1), Nehemiah (13:1), and Daniel (9:5). It is fully recognized in the OT that confession is not only the natural expression of penitent feeling, but the condition of the Divine pardon (Lv 5:6, Ps 32:2, Pr 28:13).

(2) In the NT 'confess' occurs but seldom to express acknowledgment of sin (Mt 22:15, Mk 1:1, Ja 2:4), in the petition for forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:10, Lk 11:4), in the excommunication of the Church (Ac 5:11), as a universal human need (Lk 11:116). He never confesses sin on His own account or shares in the confessions of others.

(a) Confession to God.—This meets us at many points in our Lord's teaching—in His calls to repentance, in which confession is involved (Mt 4:17— Mk 1:15, Lk 11:9-13 24-26), in the petition for forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:10, Lk 11:4), in the parables of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15:8-21) and the Pharisee and the Publican (18:12). It is very noteworthy that while He recognizes confession as a universal human need (Lk 11:111), He never confesses sin on His own account or shares in the confessions of others.

(b) Confession to man.—Besides confession to God, Christ enjoins confession to the brother whom we have wronged (Mt 5:23-24), and He makes it plain that human as well as Divine forgiveness must depend upon readiness to confess (Lk 17:3). In Ja 5:18 (RV) we are told to confess our sins one to another. The sins here spoken of are unlooked for sins against God as well as sins against man. But the confession referred to is plainly not to any official of the Church, much less to an official with the power of granting absolution, but a mutual unburdening of Christian hearts with a view to prayer 'one for another.'

CONFIRMATION.—The noun 'confirmation' is used only twice in AV (Ph 1:1, He 6:2), the reference in the first case being to the establishment of the truth of the gospel, and in the second to the ratification of a man's baptism by an oath. The verb 'confirm' is found frequently in both OT and NT, in various shades of meaning, but with the general sense of strengthening and establishing. The only questions of interest are (1) whether 'confirm' is used in NT to denote the ecclesiastical rite of Confirmation; and (2) whether that rite is referred to under the 'laying on of hands.'

1. There are 3 passages in Acts (14:26; 18:1-2) in which Paul and Barnabas, or Judas and Silas, or Paul by himself, are said to have confirmed 'the souls of the disciples,' 'the brethren,' 'the churches.' In none of these is there any indication of the performance of a rite, and the natural suggestion is that the word is used simply of a spiritual strengthening.

2. In the 'Order of Confirmation' in the Book of Common Prayer, 'the laying on of hands' has been that are baptized and come to years of discretion,' as performed by the bishop, is said to be done 'after the example of Thy holy Apostles.' Presumably the reference is to such passages as Mt 10:1-13). In the passages in Acts, however, the imposition of hands is associated with the impartation of extraordinary spiritual gifts, while of He 6:2 no more can be said than that in the early Church the act appears to have been closely associated with baptism. That it might precede baptism instead of following it is shown by Ac 9:17-18); which further shows that it might be performed by one who was not an Apostle or even an official of the Church. In all likelihood it was simply a natural and beautiful symbol accompanying prayer (Ac 9:17), which had come down from OT times (Gn 48:5), and had been used by Christ Himself in the act of blessing (Mt 19:15). See, further, laying on of hands.

CONFESSION.—See BAN, § 2, EXCOMMUNICATION.

CONFESSION OF TONGUES.—See Tongues [Confusion Of].

CONGREGATION, ASSEMBLY.—In AV these terms are both employed to render either of the two important Heb. words ἡ τριάδος and γάλακτος, with a decided preference, however, in favour of 'congregation' for the former, and 'assembly' for the latter. In RV, as we read in the Revisions' preface, an effort has been made to secure greater uniformity on these points. While somewhat more widely distributed, although neither is frequent in pre-exilic literature; ἡ τριάδος, which is not used in the prophetic or Deuteronomic sources of the Pentateuch, is found at least 118 times in the Psalms alone, where it denotes the theocratic community of Israel as a whole, the church-nation in its relation to J.' The full designation, as found in Nu 1:5 and a score of times elsewhere, is 'the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel,' which is the equivalent of the Deuteronomic phrase 'all the assembly (γάλακτος) of Israel' (Dt 31:16, RV and AV 'congregation'). In the older and more secular writings the same idea would have been expressed by 'the sum of the people' of Israel, as in 2 S 24.

It is extremely doubtful if there is any valid ground for the attempt to find a distinction between the two expressions 'congregation' and 'assembly,' even within P itself, as if 'assembly' represented either 'pickled members of the congregation' (EBR col. 345), or the latter in its capacity as an assembly of worshippers. For instance in the same verse, where we have 'congregation' and 'assembly' as synonymous terms, as in Lc 4:1, Nu 16:2, RV and in the priestly redaction of Jg 20:1, the whole body of the people being intended.
in every case. The only two passages which seem to imply that the 'assembly' was a limited section of the 'congregation,' viz. Ex. 12, Nu 14 (all the assembly of the congregation, etc., clearly show confiate readings (cf. LXX.). What is the difference, finally, can be detected between 'the assembly of J's' of Nu 16:20 (cf. Dt 23:1;) and 'the congregation of J's' of 27:15— all 2 passages?

In the LXX 'ασυναγωγις' is in most cases rendered by συναγωγος andἐκκλησια, while in other cases it is being used, according to Schürer, without essential distinction to signify the religious community of Israel, in this agreeing, as has been argued above, with the original and with our AV. This Jewish usage explains how, while synagogue is occasionally found in early Patristic literature in the sense of 'the Christian congregation,' its rival finally gained the day. The Christian synagogue became 'the Church,' while the Jewish Church remains 'the synagogue' (see under Synagogue, Synagogal).

The expression solemn assembly, in which 'solemn' has its etymological, but now obsolete, sense of 'stated,' appointed (lit. 'yearly,' σεμνοστα) represents a third Holl) which is incapable of any religious gathering (Am 5:5, Is 11:2, K 10:20), but afterwards limited to those appointed for the seventh day of the Feast of Unleavened Cakes (Maasoth, D1 16), and the eighth of the Feast of Booths (Lv 23h, Nu 29).

'Holy convocation' occurs frequently in the Priestly sections of the Pentateuch (esp. Lv. 17-26 [h]).

The 'moot of the congregation,' in the uttermost part of the land (Is 16:1), to which the assembled Babylonian, Babylonian of the gods. An echo of this mythical conception is probably to be found in the similar phrase Ps 48:4. For tabernacle of the congregation see Tabernacle.

CONIAH (Jer 22:30—) Jehoiashin (wh. see).

CONSCIENCE.—The term occurs 30 times in the NT; it signifies joint knowledge. The two words known together may be two motives, two deeds, etc.; or the composition instituted may be between a standard and a volition, etc. Self or others may be judged, and approval (Ac 24:4, Ro 9:3, Ac 11:1, Ti 3:15, 2 Ti 1:3, He 3:3, 1 P 3:22, 1 P 3:22) or disapproval (Jn 8:3, He 10:30) may be the issue. The conviction that a certain course of conduct is right is accompanied by a sense of obligation, whether that course receives (Ro 13) or fails to secure (1 P 2:4, Ac 4:19) legal confirmation. The belief on which the consciousness of duty depends is not necessarily wise (1 Co 8:7, 10, 1 Co 16:1, though the holders of the belief should receive careful consideration on the part of more enlightened men (Ro 15, 1 Co 8:10—25). Unfaithfulness to moral claims leads to fearful deterioration, resulting in confusion (Mt 6:25—) and insensitiveness (1 Ti 4:1, Tit 1:9).

1. Sphere.—The additional conscience is volition in all its manifestations. That which merely happens and offers to us no alternative movement lies outside morality. Let there be a possibility of choice, and conscience appears. Appetites, so long as they can be controlled; incentives of action admitting preference; purposes and desires.—all deeds and institutions that embody and give effect to human choice; all relationships that allow variations in our attitude give scope for ethical investigation, and in them conscience is directly or indirectly implicated. Conscience makes a valuation. It is concerned with right, wrong; worthi-ness, unworthiness; good, bad; better, worse. This appraisement is ultimately occupied with the incentives that present themselves to the will, in regard to some of which (envy and malice, for instance) there is an immediate verdict of badness, and in regard to others a verdict of better or worse. The dispositions that are commended by the Saviour's conduct and teachings—purity of heart, meekness, mercifulness, desire for righteousness, etc.—are recognized as worthy of honour. The conscience centerizes the selfishness of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18), and assents to the injunction of considerateness and justice (Ph 2:2). The rightness of many general statements is discerned intuitively, and is carried over to the deeds that agree therewith. Sigid emotional accompaniments of penitence and remorse, as well as the glow incident to the hearing of noble deeds—all anticipations of the Lord’s ‘Well done!’ are instances of moral feeling. These pleasures and penalties are those by themselves. They are as distinct from those of sensation and intellect as colours are distinct from sound. That pleasures are qualitatively different is rightly maintained by J. S. Mill, though his empirical theory was not helped by the opinion. In consciousness we know that sorrow for sin is not of the same order as any physical distress, nor is it to be ranked with the feeling of disappointment when we are beaten in a scientific inquiry. The difference between the moral and the unmoral emotions is one of kind and not of quantity, of worth and not of amount: some pleasures low in the scale of value are very intense, some are pain, and yet are preferred by good men to any physical or intellectual delights. It should be noticed that the pleasure attendant upon a choice of conduct known to be wrong is a delight for a while to that which has been discarded, interfere with the satisfaction due to the change that has been made. Converts are haunted by denounced beliefs, and their peace is disturbed, beside the main current of emotion there is a stream which comes from past associations and habits.

4. Education of conscience. (1) No training can improve the idea of right. (2) Malevolent feelings (as vindictiveness, the desire to give pain gratuitously) are known by all to be wrong: immediately they are perceived at work, they are unconditionally condemned. (3) The imperative which is the moral equivalent in a moral conviction is intuitively discerned. ‘I do not know how to impart the notion of moral obligation to any one who is entirely devoid of it’ (Sidgwick). (4) The feeling of dishonour comes to us without tuition when we have refused compliance with known duty. Belonging to a moral order, we are made to react in certain definite ways to truths, social relations, etc. Their experience is enough to quell the action certain moral states, just as the feelings of cold and heat are ours because of the physical environment, and because we are what we are. We can evoke while we cannot create elementary moral qualities. ‘An erring conscience is a chimera’ (Kant). ‘Conscience intuitively recognizes moral law; it is supreme in its authority; it cannot be educated’ (Caldwood). These sentences are not intended to deny that in the application of principles there is difficulty. One may readily admit the axioms of geometry, and yet find much perplexity when asked to establish a geometrical theorem on the truth of which directly or indirectly flows from the axioms. The Apostle Paul prayed that his friends might improve in moral discrimination (Ph 18, Col 1). We have to learn what to do, and often the problems set by our domestic, civic, and church relations are hard even for the best and wisest to decide. The scheme of things to which we belong has not been constructed with a view to saving us the trouble of patient, strenuous, and sometimes very painful investigation and thought.

5. Implications.—Of the many implications the following are specially noteworthy. The feeling of responsibility suggests the question, to Whom? Being under government, we feel after the Ruler if haply we may find Him. Jesus tells us of the ‘Righteous Father.’

The solemn voice of command is His. The preferences which we know to be right are His. The pain felt when righteous demands are resisted, and the joy accompanying obedience are not His from the first, and decent. Neither our higher self nor society can be the source of an authority so august as that of which we are conscious. To the best minds we look for guidance; but there are limits to their rights over us, and how ready they are to refer us to Him before whom they bow! We are made to be subjects of the Holy One. Admitting that we are in contact with Divine Authority, and that His behests are heard within, the encouraging persuasion is justified that He sympathizes with the soul in its battles and renders aid (Ph 2:18). The inference is that the God with whom we have to do makes it fitting for us to say that conscience is man’s capacity to receive progressively a revelation of the righteousness of God. But is law the last word? May there not be mercy and an atonement? Cannot the accusing voices be hushed? May the man who admits the sentence of conscience be pardoned? Conscience is a John the Baptist preparing the way for the Saviour, who has a reply to the question ‘What must I do to be saved?’

CONSECRATION.—See Clean and Unclean, Narrative.

CONSOLOATION.—See Comfort.

CONSUMPTION.—The Heb. word (kidash) which is translated ‘consummation’ in Dn 9:27 is rendered ‘consumption’ in Is 10:28, these Eng. words having the same meaning. Cf. Foxe, Actes and Mon., Christ shall sit . . . at the right hand of God till the consumption of the world.” Consumption occurs also with the same meaning in Is 10:28 (Heb. kishāyûn). But in Lk 26:29, Dt 28:20 it is used of a disease of the body. See Medicine.

CONTENTMENT.—1. The word does not occur in the OT, but the duty is implied in the Tenth Commandment (Ex 20:17), and the wisdom of contentment is enforced in Pr 10:27, 17 by the consideration that those who seem most enviable may be worse off than ourselves. But the bare commandment ‘Thou shalt not covet’ may only stir up all manner of coveting (Ro 7:9); and though a man may sometimes be reconciled to his lot by recognizing a principle of compensation in human life, that principle is far from applying to every case. It is not by measuring ourselves with one another, but only by consciously setting ourselves in the Divine presence, that true contentment can ever be attained. Faith In God is its living root (cf. Ps 62:11 with v. 5; also Hab 1:12). In the NT the grace of contentment is explicitly brought before us. Our Lord incalculately over His warnings against covetousness (Lk 12:15), positively by His teaching as to the Fatherhood of God (Mt 6:25-34) and the Kingdom of God (v. 39, cf. v. 14). St. Paul (Ph 4:11-12) claims to have learned the secret of being content in whatsoever state he was. The word he uses is erkatē, lit. ‘self-sufficient. It was a characteristic word of the Stoic philosophy, implying an independence of everything outside of oneself. The Apostle’s self-sufficiency was of a very different kind (see v. 19), for it rested on that great promise of Christ, ‘My grace is sufficient for thee’ (2 Co 12). Christian contentment comes not from a Stoic narrowing of our desires, but from the sense of being filled with the riches of Christ’s grace. For other NT utterances see 1 Ti 6:8, He 13:5.

J. C. LAMBETH.

CONVENIENT.—This Eng. word often has in AV its primary meaning of belonging, as Ro 1:1: ‘God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient’ (RV ‘fitting’). So in the trans. of Agrippa’s Van Artes (1684) ‘She sang and dance’d more exquisitely than was convenient for an honest woman.’
CONVERSATION.—In EV the word is always used in the same sense of 'behaviour,' 'conduct.' In the OT, AV gives 'behaviour' (Ps 31:5, 25f.), representing Heb. derek = 'way' (cf. RV and RVM). In the NT it is used in AV to render three sets of words. (1) The noun anastrophe, 'behaviour' (Gal 1:2, Eph 4:1, 1 Ti 4:4, He 10:37, Ja 4:14, 1 P 5:1, 1 Ti 6:5, 2 P 2:18, 3 J 3:6), RV substituting in each case 'manner of life,' 'manner of living,' 'life,' 'living,' or 'behaviour'; the vb. anastrophesthai = 'to behave oneself' (2 Co 1:14, Eph 2:9). (2) The noun politiauma = 'citizenship' or 'commonwealth' (Th 2:3f.) and the vb. politieusthai = 'to act as a citizen' (Ph 1:1). (3) tropos = 'manner,' 'character,' lit. 'turning' (He 13:7). Cf. RV and RVM throughout. The main point to notice is that in every case 'conversation' in the Bible refers not to speech merely, but to conduct.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CONVERSION.—The noun occurs only in Ac 15:18 (epistrophee), but in AV 'convert' is found several times both in OT (Heb. reshaph) and NT (Gr. epistrophe, reshaph) to denote a spiritual turning. RV in most cases substituting 'turn.' 'Turn' is to be preferred because (1) in the Eng. of AV 'convert' meant no more than 'turn'; (2) 'turn' has come to be employed in a sense that often goes beyond the meaning of the originals. RV has further corrected AV by giving act. 'turn' for pass. 'be converted' in Mt 17:5, 15%, Mk 4:1, Lk 222, Jn 129, Ac 282, where the Gr. vbs. are reflexive in meaning. In OT TEM is used to denote a turning, whether of the nation (Dl 304, 2 K 175 etc.) or of the individual (Ps 511, Is 555 etc.). In NT epistrophe, reshaph are used esp. of individuals, but sometimes in a sense that falls short of 'conversion' as the conscious change implied in becoming a Christian. Mt 183 was spoken to true disciples, and the 'conversion' demanded of them was a renunciation of their foolish ambitions (cf. v.). Lk 226 was addressed to the leader of the Apostles, and his 'conversion' was his return to his Master's service after his fall. In Acts and Epp., however, 'convert' or 'turn' is used to denote conversion in the full Christian sense (Ac 311 118, 148 [cf. 153 'conversion'], 2 Co 31, 1 Th 1). Conversion as a spiritual fact comes before us repeatedly in the Gospels (Lk 729, 153, 193, 233, 4) and in the history of the Apostolic Church (Ac 217, 47, 9, 11, 13 etc.). RV brings out the fact that in the NT conversion (as distinguished from regeneration [wh. see]) is an activity of the soul itself, and not an experience imposed from above. This view of its nature is confirmed when we turn to the Epistles (Ac 529, cf. 1411, 202 associated with it as the elements that make up the moral act of turning from sin and self to God in Christ.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CONVIVE.—Adams (Serm. ii. 38) says: 'Whatsoever is written either for our instruction or destruction; to convert us if we embrace it, to convince us if we despise it.' This is the meaning of 'convince' in the AV. It is what we now express by convince. Thus Jude 16 to convince all that are unregenerated by them or their ungodly deeds.

CORD, ROPE.—Hebrew possesses a considerable number of words rendered, without any attempt at uniformity, by 'cord,' 'rope,' and a variety of other terms. It is difficult for the English reader to recognize the same original in the Psalmist's bow 'string' (Ps 115) and the 'green WITHES' (RVM 'new bowstrings') with which Samsmon was bound, or against the taut ropes of Is 3322 (EV 'rope') and the ships 'tacklings' of v. 8. The former set were probably of animal sinews or gut, the latter of twisted flax. The stronger ropes were of three strands (Ec 4:11). No doubt the fibres of the palm and, as at the present day, goats' hair were spun into ropes. The process of rope-making from leather thongs is illustrated on an Egyptian tomb, the 'web of work' (lit. 'the city') of leather (see RVM), where, however, gold wire is the material used. Ec 12 speaks also of a silver cord, and Job 412 of a 'rope of rushes' (see RVM). The Gr. word for the cords of our Saviour's scourge (Jn 19:19) and the ropes of Ac 2742 also denoted originally such a rope. The everyday use of cords for binding evil-doers suggested the metaphor of the wicked man 'holding with the cords of his sin' (2 P 2:9), or as the hunter's snares comes the figure of Ps 140:1; 'also the cords of death' of Ps 116 RV.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CORINTH was the capital of the Roman province Achaia, and, in every respect except educationally (see ATTICA), the most important city in Greece in Roman times. It was also one of the most important stations on the route between E. and W., the next station to it on the E. being Ephesus, with which it was in close and continual connexion. Its situation made it a leading centre of Christianity. It possesses a position at the S. extremity of the narrow isthmus which connected the mainland of Greece with the Peloponnese. Its citadel rises 1500 feet above sea-level, and it was in addition defended by its high walls, which not only surrounded the city but also reached to the harbour Lechaeum, on the W. (14 miles away). The other harbour, Cenchreae, on the E., on the Saronic Gulf, was about 8 miles away. The view from the citadel is splendid. The sea poverty of the country and the shelter provided by two quiet seas made the Corinthians a maritime people. It was customary to haul ships across from the one sea to the other on a made track called the Dillokos. This method at once saved time and protected the sailors from the dangers of a voyage round Cape Malea (S. of the Peloponnese). Larger ships could not, of course, be conveyed in this way, and in their case the goods must have been conveyed across and transshipped at the other harbour. The place was also crowded with traders and other travellers, and we find St. Paul speaking of Gaius of Corinth as 'my host and of the whole Church' (Ro 16). The city had been destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C., but exactly a hundred years afterwards it was refounded by Julius Cesar as a colonia, under the name Aeneas Julius Corinthus (see COLONIA). A number of Roman names in the NT are found in connexion with Corinth: Cripsus, Titius Justus (Ac 183), Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Quatus (Ro 2). Fortunatus (1 Co 16). The population would consist of (1) descendants of the Roman colonists of 48 B.C., the local aristocracy; (2) resident Romans, government officials and business men; (3) a large Greek population; (4) other resident strangers, of whom Jews would form a large number (their synagogue Ac 16). Of these the rapper (Ac 189, Ro 169, 1 Co 9), and the hatred against him in consequence led to a plot against his life. The church, however, consisted chiefly of non-Jews (see 1 Co 129).

St. Paul did not at first intend to make Corinth a centre of work (Ac 185), but a special revelation altered his plans (Ac 1810), and he remained there at least 18 months. The opposition he met in the Jewish synagogue made him turn to the Gentiles. St. Paul left the baptism of his converts almost entirely to his subordinates, and he himself baptized only Stephen (1 Co 108), Cephas (Ro 169), and Carians, the ruler of the synagogue (1 Co 116). Some weeks after his arrival in Corinth, St. Paul was joined by Silas and Timothy, returning from Macedonia. News brought by Timothy (1 Th 34) led him to write there the First Ep. to the Thess. (1 Th 34), and the Second was probably written there also, immediately after the receipt of an answer to the First. While St. Paul was in Corinth, Gallio came there as proconsul of the second grade to govern Achaea, probably in the summer of the year 52 A.D. The Jews brought an action before him against St. Paul, but Gallio, rightly recognizing that their court could take no cognizance of a case involving a Christian, dismissed the case and thus silenced the Jews of Corinth. He was thus declared to be in no way an opponent against Roman law, and in future he relied more on his relation to the State, against the enmity of the local synagogue. He then permitted the Hellenistic population to show their hatred to the Jews (Ac 187).

It was in Corinth that St. Paul became acquainted with Priscus and Aquila (Ac 185), and he made them his assistants and housekeepers (1 Co 186); and he lived in their house during all his stay. They worked at the same industry as himself, and no doubt influenced his plans for later work. They also left for Ephesus with him.

Christianity grew fast in Corinth, but the inevitable dissensions occurred. Apollo had crossed from Ephesus to Corinth (Ac 187, 2 Co 38) and done valuable work there (Ac 188, 18 Co 188). He unreasonably helped to bring down the temple of Athena, which he had built, and the temple was destroyed. The inhabitants of Corinth, by popular influence of the Empire, transferred the worship of Athena to the goddesses, who were regarded as Christian deities. St. Paul was quite within the law to stop this practice, and he did so. St. Paul spent three months in Greece, chiefly no doubt at Corinth, in the winter of 55-56. Whether the Corinthians contributed or not to St. Paul's collection for the poor Christians at Jerusalem must remain uncertain (but see p. 159).  § 2 of 7th.

A. SOTER.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Occasion of the Epistle. — Some four or five years had elapsed since St. Paul's first evangelization of Corinth when he addressed the present Epistle to the Christians in that great centre of commerce. No doubt there had been frequent communications, especially during the Apostles' stay in Asia, for the journey between Corinth and Ephesus was a very easy one: but the communications were probably by letter only. A former epistle is not mentioned in the Acts (Ch. 105), in which St. Paul had written his disciples 'to have no company with fornicators'—advice which was no doubt considered hard to obey in the most picturesque and pleasure-loving city of the world, and which to some extent is modified in the present Epistle (1514); and a letter from the Corinthians to St. Paul is the immediate object of the Apostle's writing on the present occasion (7). But before answering it, he reproves the Corinthians for certain errors and abuses. He had heard of from the [household] of Chloe (11), namely, schism and party spirit, a bad case of incest, and litigiousness; for 'they of Chloe' seem to have been St. Paul's informants on all these matters. Chloe was perhaps a woman of importance who carried on a trade in Corinth, as Lydia of Thyatira did at Philippi (Ac 1649). She therefore not improbably belonged to Asia Minor— the reference to her seems to imply that she was not a Corinthian,—and they of Chloe would be her apostles and leaders. Hence there was trouble between Ephesus and Corinth. Having reproved the Corinthians for these abuses, St. Paul answers the questions put in their letter to him, as to marriage and other social questions; perhaps also, as to the doctrine of the resurrection, and the collection for the poor of Judaea. We may consider these topics in order.

2. The state of the Corinthian Church. — It will be remembered that the majority of the Christians at Corinth were Gentiles, though there were some Jews among them (Ro 156, 1 Co 71 129, 129.), including such influential men as Crispus (Ac 185) and (probably) St. Paul himself (1 Co 156). It is not unlikely that the severest censures of the Corinthians that led to most of the evils for which St. Paul rebukes them (6th 129). The Apostle, though he had not intended to stay long in Corinth when he first went there, destined to return to Macedonia (1 Th 21), yet, when his wish was found to be impracticable, threw himself with all his heart into the task of making heathen Corinth, the famous trade centre which lay at one of the greatest communication in the Empire, into a religious centre for the spread of the gospel (cf. Ac 188). The difficulties were not those with which he had met in Athens, where the philosophic inhabitants demanded of him. At Corinth the vices of the city had lowered the prestige of public opinion; and when St. Paul preached Christ crucified with all plainness of speech (1 Co 117), many heard him gladly, but retained with their nominal Christianity their old heathen ideas on morals. He preached no longer 'wisdom' to the Jewish lawyer or the Greek sophist (18), but salvation to the plain man; the Gentiles had no sense of sin, and the preaching of personal salvation was the means to that end. Without the rise of the middle classes. It certainly included men of means (118.). Still, the upper classes and the learned were everywhere less attracted by Christianity than were the poorer, with certain conspicuous exceptions, such as St. Paul himself.

It has been debated how far the Church was organized at Corinth at this time. The ministry is included referred to in these Epistles; the 'bishops and deacons' of 151 are not mentioned; but we read of apostles, prophets, and teachers (129). It would, however, be unsafe to conclude that there was not a settled local ministry at Corinth. St. Paul had certainly established presbyters in every Church on his First Journey (1 Co 15), and as apparently in Asia on his Second (207). In this Epistle the regular ministers are perhaps not explicitly mentioned, because they were the very persons who were most responsible for the disorders (Gough, Westminster Com. p. xxxvi), while in ch. 12 the possession of 'spiritual gifts' is the subject of discussion, and the mention of the regular ministry would not be germane to it. A settled order of clergy is implied in 7th. 12. M.

3. Party Spirit at Corinth. — It is more correct to say that there were parties in the Church than that the Corinthians had made solutions. We read, not of rival organizations, but of factions in the one organization. It is noteworthy that Clement of Rome (Cor. 1, 47), writing less than 50 years later, refers to the factions then prevalent in the Church. The dispositions were perhaps a straining of favourite pettinesses of their cities could never combine together for long. In St. Paul's time there was a Paul-party, and also an Apollos-party, a Cephas-party, and a Christ-party (12), though the words 'but 1 [of] Christ' are interpreted by Estius (Com. ed. Stutien, II.)
110) and many Greek and Latin commentators, and also perhaps by Clement of Rome (see below, § 10), as being St. Paul’s own observation: You make partiles, taking Paul, Apollos, Cephas as leaders, but I, Paul, am not such a leader. If, however, we take the more usual interpretation that there were four parties, we may ask what lines of thought they severally represented. The Apollos-party would probably consist of those who disapproved St. Paul’s being sufficiently eloquent and philosophical (cf. 2 Cor 10, 2 Cor 11). The Cephas-party would be the party of the circumcision, as in Galatia. At Corinth the great dispute was, the law not as men insistently; it seems to have grown when 2 Corinthians was written (see § 7 (c) below). The Christ-party, it has been conjectured, was the ultra-Latitudinarian party, which consisted of Paul’s teaching about liberty (cf. Ro 8); or (Alford) consisted of those who made a merit of not being attached to any human teacher, and who therefore slighted the Apostleship of St. Paul. Another view is that the Christ-party consisted of the Judaizers mentioned in 2 Cor. and Gal. as denying St. Paul’s Apostleship (Gouge, p. xxii.: cf. 2 Cor 10 where St. Paul’s opponents claim to be peculiarly Christ’s); but it is not easy in that case to distinguish from the Cephas-party. There is no sufficient reason for deducing from 1 Cor. 4 that St. Peter had visited Corinth, and that this party consisted of his personal disciples.—St. Paul, then, reproves all these parties, and most emphatically those who are Christians, who scolded him by his name. They were united by baptism with Christ, not with him (11th).

4. Moral Scandals (ch. 5).—A Christian had married his (probably heathen) step-mother. Perhaps his father had been separated from her on his becoming a Christian, but (if 2 Cor 12 refers to this incident) was still alive; and the son thereupon married her. The Corinthian Church, in the low state of public opinion, did not even enforce the law (7:2), and St. Paul, in his letter to St. Paul. St. Paul reproves them for tolerating such fornication as is not even among the Gentiles (the word ‘named’ of the AV text has no sufficient authority). There is a difficulty here, for the heathen tolerated even more inhuman connections, as between a man and his half-sister. Ramsay (Exp. vi. [i. 110) supposes the Apostle to mean that the Roman law forbade such marriage. The Roman law of affinity was undoubtedly very strict, and Corinth, as a colony, would be familiar with Roman law; though the law was not usually put in force. The Jews strongly denounced such connexions (Am 2). The Apostle says nothing of the punishment of the heathen step-mother (cf. 1 Cor 5), but the man is to be delivered unto Satan (5, cf. 1 Tim 1).

This phrase probably means simple excommunication, including the renouncing of all intercourse with the offender (cf. 5), though many take it to denote the infliction of some miraculous punishment, disease, or death, and deny that the offender of 2 Cor 3 and 7 is the incestuous Corinthian of 1 Cor 5. Ramsay conjectures that the phrase is a Christian adaptation of a pagan idea, that a person wronged by another but unable to retaliate should consign the offender to the gods and leave punishment to be inflicted by Divine power; Satan would be looked on as God’s instrument in punishing the offender and the latter, being cast out of the Christian community, would be left as a prey to the devil.

5. Legal Scandals.—St. Paul rebukes the Corinthians for litigiousness, 6–8. This passage is usually interpreted as suppressing heathen imperial tribunals by voluntary Christian courts for all cases, such as the Jews often had. Ramsay (Exp. vi. [i. 274) suggests that the Apostle, who usually treats Roman institutions with respect, is not here considering serious questions of crime and fraud at all, nor yet law courts whether heathen or Christian, but those smaller matters which Greeks were accustomed to submit to arbitration. In Roman times, as this procedure developed, the arbiters became really judges of an inferior court, recognized by the law, and the magistrates appointed them. In this view St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for taking their disputes from among the heathen instead of from among their Christian brethren.

6. Questions of Moral Sin and of Marriage (6:1-7:11).—Probably the passage 6:1-11 is part of the answer to the Corinthian letter. The correspondent had said, ‘All things are lawful for me.’ But all things (the Apostle replies) are not expedient. ‘I would not that ye should be ignorant, brethren, concerning your own state.’ St. Paul tells the Corinthians that they are essentially holy, and the body for meat, (i.e. just as food is natural to the body, so is impurity). But both are transitory, and the body as a whole is for the Lord; in virtue of the perfect marriage was brought into the spiritual character of the body. True marriage is the most perfect symbol of the relation between Christ and the Church (6:13; cf. Eph 5:22-33). In ch. 7 the Apostle answers the Corinthians’ questions about marriage. It is usually thought that they wished to extol asceticism, basing their view on our Lord’s words in Mt 19:11, that they suggested that celibacy was to be strongly encouraged in all, and that the Apostle, though agreeing as an abstract principle, yet, because of imminent persecution and Jesus’ immediate return (7:23), replied that in many cases celibacy was undesirable. But Ramsay points out that such a question is strictly natural to both Jewish and Gentile society. The better heathen tried to enforce marriage as a cure for immorality; while the Jews looked on it as a universal duty. Ramsay supposes, therefore, that the Apostle in giving his marriage counsel supposes it to be possible that St. Paul pleads for a voluntary celibacy. Against this it is urged that the Essenes (a Jewish sect) upheld non-marriage. But it is difficult to think, in view of 11:1-3, that St. Paul approves such a creed. He seems to be essentially the higher one, and the married life only a matter of permission, a concession to weakness. After positive commands as to divorce (7:8-9) the Apostle returns to the double question of marriage, and says in 7:11, that it is not for the sake of the converted that St. Paul pleads for a voluntary celibacy. clubs. The pagan feast meant a brotherhood or special union of bond; but the two kinds of brotherhood were incompatible. A Christian who, out of complaisance, attends an idol feast, is really entering a hostile brotherhood.

(c) Digestion on Forbearance (9:1-10:13).—St. Paul says that he habitually considers the rights of others as well as his own rights as an apostle to the full; he implies that the Corinthians should not press their liberty so as to scandalize others. This passage shows how little as yet the Judaisers had been at work in Corinth. St. Paul announces his position as an Apostle, and the right of the Christian minister to live of the Gospel, but will not use his rights to the full (9:14 RV). He teaches self-denial and earnestness from the example of the Jewish givers (9:14), and shows that the Israelites, in spite of all their privileges, fell from lack of this self-discipline. It is noteworthy that he speaks of "our fathers" (10:1). Perhaps, having addressed the Gentiles in particular in ch. 9, he now turns to the Jewish section of the Corinthian church; he refers to a Rabbinical legend in 10:1. Or he may be considering the whole church as being the spiritual descendants of Israel.

8. Christian Worship (11:1-15:40).—(a) Veiling of Women.—In reply (as it seems) to another question, St. Paul says that it is the Christian custom for men "praying or prophesying" to have their heads uncovered, but for women they must veil. This answer to an insignificant trivial matter is an instance of the application of Christian principles to Christian ceremonial. The Jews of both sexes, by custom, had veiled and with a veil before the face (cf. 2 Co 3:17); therefore St. Paul's injunction does not follow Jewish custom. It is based on the subordination of the woman to the man, and is illustrated by the existence of regulated ranks among the Gentiles. It seems to be the meaning of 11:5.

(b) The Eucharist.—The Corinthians joined together in a social meal—somewhat later called an Agape or Love-feast—and the Eucharist, probably in imitation both of the Last Supper and of the Jewish and heathen feasts, was taken in common. To this combination the name 'Lord's Supper' (here only in NT) is given. But the party-spirit, already spoken of, showed itself in this custom; the Corinthians did not eat the Lord's supper, but their own, because of their factions. St. Paul therefore gives the narrative of our Lord's Institution as he himself had received it, strongly condemning those who make an unworthy communion as 'guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord,' and inculcates preparation by self-probation.

It is chiefly this passage that has led some to think that the writer of the Epistle is quoting the Synoptic Gospels (see below, § 10); the Lukan account, as we have it in our English version, in fact runs parallel with the passage, and the deduction is not improbable. Even if our Lukan text is right, the result is only what we should have expected, that the companion of the Epistle took his master's form of the narrative, which he would doubtless have frequently heard him use liturgically, and has incorporated it in his Gospel. As a matter of fact, it is improbable that the custom was really much shorter than the Pauline, and that some early scribe has lengthened it to make it fit in with 1 Co 11:24 (Westcott-Hort, N.T. in Greek, ii. Appendix, p. 64).

(c) Spiritual Gifts (chs. 12-14).—The public manifestation of the presence of the Spirit known as 'speaking with tongues' (see art. Tongues [Gifts]), seems to have been very common at Corinth. After the magnificent digression of ch. 13, which shows that all of spiritual gifts love is the greatest, that it alone is eternal, that without all other gifts are useless, St. Paul applies a principle that spiritual gifts are meant to an end, not an end in themselves; and he therefore upholds 'prophecy' (i.e., in this connexion, the interpretation of Scripture and of Christian doctrine) as superior to speaking with tongues, because it edifies all present. He says, further, that women are to keep silence (i.e. not to prophesy) in the public assemblies (14:34, cf. 1 Th 2:5). In 11:5 (cf. Acts 21:2) some women are said to have had the gift of prophecy; so that we must understand that they were allowed to exercise it only among women, or in their own households. But possibly the Apostle has chiefly in his mind questions asked by women in the public assemblies (cf. 14:34).

9. The Resurrection of the Body (ch. 15).—This, the only doctrinal chapter of the Epistle, contains also the earliest evidence for our Lord's resurrection. Apparently the Gentiles convert at Corinth felt a great difficulty in accepting the doctrine of the resurrection of the body; it appeared to them as material, a doctrine the truth of which, St. Paul has risen, as many still alive can testify, and that therefore the dead will rise. For his treatment of the subject see PAUL THE APOSTLE, i. 10. The Christian Resurrection does not seem to be generally accepted at the time of the Epistle; for Clement of Rome, writing to Corinth, strongly emphasizes the doctrine (Cor. 24ul).

St. Paul concludes the Epistle with directions about heretics, as being of concern to the church of Corinth. But it is in Galatia and Judea, and with personal notices and salutations.

10. Date and genuineness of the Epistle.—It is referred to as St. Paul's by Clement of Rome, c. A.D. 95 (Cor. 13:3).—But St. Paul's care in his phrasing the Epistle of the blessed Paul' that he knew only one Epistle to the Corinthians, as early as 15th cent. (Lightfoot, chs. 143, li. 143). There are other clear allusions in Clement. Ignatius (Eph. 181.) refers to 1 Co 12:2 and probably 20: Polycarp (§ 11) quotes 1 Co 6:1 as Paul's; and quotations are found in the ecumenical Councils in Justin Martyr, and in the Epistle to Diognetus; while Ireneus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian at the end of the 2nd cent. quote the Epistle fully. Of the 2nd cent. heresies the Ophites and Bardanes of Gnauin claim it. It is in fact one of the four 'canonicals' of the 2nd cent. of St. Paul. See art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, i. 2, for the general arguments adduced against their genuineness. Against that of our Epistle in particular it has been alleged that it is dependent on Rom. and Gal. (2nd cent., cf. 15:32), with personal notices and salutations.

If so, what is its date? Relatively to the rest of the Pauline chronology, it may be approximately fixed. In the year of his arrest at Jerusalem, St. Paul left Corinth in the early spring, after spending three months there (Ac 20:6). He had therefore arrived there in late autumn or early winter. This seems to have been the visit to Corinth promised in 2 Co 12, which was the third visit. The two visits in all must have therefore preceded 2 Cor. (some think also 1 Cor.), and in any case an interval of some months between the two Epistles must be allowed for. In 1 Co 16:1 the Apostle had announced his intention of wintering in Corinth, and it is possible that the visit of Ac 20:7 is the fulfilment of this intention, though St. Paul certainly did not carry out all his plans at this time (2 Co 1:11). If so, 1 Cor. would have been written from Ephesus in the spring of the year before St. Paul's arrest at Jerusalem.

This date is favoured by the allusion of Philemon, which suggests to many commentators that the Easter festival was being, or about to be, celebrated when St. Paul wrote. It is a little doubtful, however, whether the Gentile churches kept the annual as well as the weekly feast of the Resurrection at this early date; see art. 'Calendar, The Christian,' in Hastings' Dict. 1. 236.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. p. 275) thinks that we must date our Epistle some six months earlier, in the second autumn before St. Paul's arrest. The events alluded to in 2 Cor. require a long interval between the Epistles. Moreover, the Corinthians had begun the collection for the poor Jews 'a year ago' when St. Paul wrote 2 Cor. (8:24), and it seems, therefore, that at least a year must have elapsed since the injunction of 1 Cor 16:2.

It is suggested, however, that we should rather translate the phrase 'last year,' and that to one who used the Macedonian calendar, and who wrote in the autumn, 'last spring' would also be 'last year,' for the new year began in September. On the whole, however, the argument about the Easter festival seems to be precarious, and the conditions are probably better satisfied if a longer interval be allowed, and the First Epistle put about 18 months before St. Paul's arrest. The absolute, as opposed to the relative, date will depend on our view of the rival schemes given in art. Chronology of the NT, § ill.

A. J. MACLEAN.

CORINTHIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO.—1. Circumstances of the Epistle. The circumstances of our second Epistle are more difficult to discover than those of any other of St. Paul's Epistles. The historical situation has been well described as a 'trackless forest,' and as a result the authors of commentaries on both the Second Epistle and the Romans are very cautious.

We may best start by noticing that the Epistle was clearly written when the Apostle was burdened by some great anxiety, perhaps physical, but assuredly spiritual (1:8). This anxiety seems to have been connected with at least three things: (a) a message of Titus; (b) a letter St. Paul had written to Corinth, either our 1 Cor., or an Epistle now lost (77); (c) the treatment of some offender at Corinth, either the guilty one of 1 Cor. 5, or some读主的 opponent of St. Paul's authority.

In 13 we read of a projected third visit (for such seems the most natural interpretation of the words), and this presupposes a second visit of which we have no record. Four questions thus need be answered. (1) Why Titus' mission should have caused anxiety? (2) What was the letter that led to St. Paul's concern as to its effect? (3) Who was the offender referred to? (4) When did the second visit take place?

2. St. Paul and Corinth.—The Church was founded in 53 or 54 on the Second Missionary Journey (Ac 18:1). St. Paul remained there two years. After leaving, he kept up relations (2 Cor 12:17). This is confirmed by the Ephesian on the Third Missionary Journey in 56 (Ac 19:17) that he could resume personal intercourse. While there, he heard of the terrible immorality, and wrote a short letter (1 Cor 5), ordering them to have no intercourse with fornicators. This letter, now lost, may be referred to in 2 Cor 11:14; and if so, it may have contained a statement that he would come to Corinth before going to Macedonia. This project, however, was altered (1 Cor 16:16). About the same time (A.D. 56) he possibly paid a second visit from Ephesus to Corinth, which caused him great pain and grief (2 Cor 2:12; 13:13).

Then in the spring of 57 he wrote 1 Cor., and on the strength of his Apostolic authority order the punishment of the incestuous person (1 Cor 5:4). At the same time he sent Timothy on a mission (1 Cor 4:17 16:10) to support and supplement his letter. It is possible that he returned with it, and news that the Church refused to carry out St. Paul's orders, or possibly that there was a growing opposition to his authority among some Judaising ring-leader. Then followed the mission of Titus, carrying with him a letter, our 1 Cor., of which 2 Cor 7:5-7 speaks, in which St. Paul insisted on Church discipline. Paul leaves Ephesus owing to riot (Ac 19), expects to see Titus in Troas, but does not meet him until they reach Macedonia in the summer or autumn of 57 (2 Cor 2:13). The news Titus brought from Corinth is mixed. The majority of the Church had obeyed his orders and punished the offender (2 Cor 2:4), but the Judaizers had grown stronger in opposition to the Apostle, with inconsistency, false Apostleship, boasting, and money-making. They were also probably endeavouring to thwart his collections for Jerusalem (1 Cor 16, 2 Cor 8-9). Not least of all the still existing danger for Gentile converts of relapsing into heathenism and impurity (2 Cor 6:7 12:3-12). As a result of this news, St. Paul writes our 2 Cor., in which (1) he expresses great satisfaction at the good news of discipline combated against evildoers, and (2) justifies the collection for Jerusalem, and (3) vindicates his Apostolic authority. Then followed a visit (the third) to Corinth, and a stay of three months (Ac 20:9).

The most uncertain point is the place of the second visit. As above stated, it is thought by some to have taken place before our 1 Cor., written, though others suggest it should come after Timothy's mission and as a result of his failure. On this view, however, it is difficult, if not impossible, to account for Titus' mission. It is also urged that the ambition of Paul is indicated in his assertion in 1 Cor. 9:17 that his visit cannot be found anterior to our 1 Cor., and it must therefore be removed altogether from the sphere and circumstances of our two Epistles. This is also under St. Paul's Apostolic authority. The theory makes out a strong and almost convincing case for a different set of circumstances in 2 Cor. from those in 1 Corinthians. There is equal probability, however, as to the latter. For (1) the most probable it is one now lost, and not our 1 Corinthians. Denney (Expos. Bible) considers the connexion between 1 and 2 Cor. so close as to need no hypotheses of additional Epistles now lost. He would explain 2 Cor. entirely out of Corinthians. Bernard favours this view (so formerly Plummer). On the other hand, Geddes places the second visit between our 1 and 2 Cor., which visit is thought to be the painful and last one in 2 Cor 11:28. The following, modified, conclusion of Robertson (Hastings' DB I, 495), is, in my view, the most satisfactory scheme of events:—(1) Foundation of Church at Corinth (Ac 18:1-5). (2) Apollos at Corinth (2 Cor 1:19, 1 Cor 1:12). (3) St. Paul at Ephesus (Ac 19). (4) The second visit to Corinth if before our 1 Cor.) (4) Lost letter of 1 Cor? (perhaps announcing the plan of 2 Cor 1:19). (5) Some would put second visit to Corinth here. (6) Visit of Stephanas and others from Corinth to St. Paul at Ephesus (1 Cor 1:17). (7) Asking for advice on certain matters (1 Cor 7:18). (8) 1 Cor. sent by Titus and the 'brother' (2 Cor 12:24). (9) St. Paul determines to pay a double visit to Corinth (2 Cor 1:9). (10)辇车 news from Corinth through Titus to St. Paul. (11) Titus severe letter sent. (11) Titus sent to Corinth (2 Cor 7:5-10), with, on the whole, favourable results. (12) Titus returns to St. Paul with 2 Corinthians. (13) Titus sent to Corinth with 2 Corinthians. (14) St. Paul's visit to Corinth and three months' stay (Ac 20:9).

It is interesting to note the happy results of this letter. Not only did the Apostle go again to Corinth, but actually wintered there. Still more it was during these three months that he wrote his great Epistle to the Romans, the quiet tone and massive strength of which bear witness to the restfulness of the Apostle's mind and heart, as well as to the complete victory over the Judaizers. Not least of all, his favourite project—the collection for Jerusalem—was brought to a successful completion, and the Church of Corinth had some of its members included in the delegation to Jerusalem (Ac 15). This vigorous Epistle was therefore not in vain, and Corinth and the whole Church have been the gainer by it in the overruuling providence of God. 3. Date.—1 Cor. was written in the spring of 57, and 2 Cor. probably in the same year, though it is impossible to say definitely what was the exact interval between them. The all-engrossing topic of the collection for Jerusalem (chs. 8, 9) indicates the date. The time of the Third Missionary Journey St. Paul had left Asia (18), and had passed through Troas (28), and was in Macedonia (24'. 29). From Ac 20 we know that he wintered at Corinth, and so 2 Cor. fits in exactly with Ac 20. Waite (Speaker's Com.) therefore suggests October 57 and not earlier. This would suit the circumstances of Timothy's and Titus' visits, and account for a great change at Corinth towards St. Paul. Godet would put just over a year between the two Epistles, arguing that such a change of circumstances and tone could not have arisen within a few months.
CORINTHIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO

4. Integrity.—There is no ground for supposing that the letter is not now in its original form. Recent attempts to separate it into two letters and to identify one of them (chs. 10-16) with the supposed lost painful Epistle, are not only not convincing in their arguments, but also have the great weight of textual criticism on the Church tradition against them. It is impossible to suppose that all trace of such textual changes could have been entirely removed. Our authorities for the text are thus of a sufficient time elapsing for so serious a modification of the original text. The subject-matter entirely agrees with the situation described above. The strong feeling for a harmonious conclusion was written, and the conflicting emotions which swayed the Apostle, amply account for its ruggedness and abruptness.

5. Character.—Not even Galatians gives so full a revelation of the Apostle's mind and soul as does 2 Corinthians. It has been rightly called 'Paul's Apologia,' and as 1 Cor. is the first chapter of Ecclesiastical History, so 2 Cor. is the first chapter of Ecclesiastical Biography. It reveals the personal character of the great Apostle of the Gentiles in its twofold aspect of tenderness and strength, gentleness and severity, meekness and indignation. In questioning his Apostolic authority, the Corinthians were really questioning the gospel of Jesus, and indirectly the Master be loved and served. We are not surprised, therefore, to notice the vehemence of his vindication and the torrent of irony and denunciation with which he overwhelm his opponents.

CORNF. —This term may be taken to include,—(1) Barley; (2) Wheat; (3) Fitches; (4) Lentils; (5) Beans; (6) Millet; (7) Rye, wrong translation for 'Vetches;' (8) Pulse—for most of which see separate articles. Rye and oats are not cultivated in Palestine.

CORNELIUS.—A 'proselyte of the gate' or 'devout man' (Ac 10, see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 6), whose baptism was a step forward towards admitting the Gentiles into the Church. He was a Roman centurion of the Italic cohort (see art. BAND). An inscription recently discovered near Vienna shows that an Italic cohort was stationed in Syria c. A.D. 69, and this makes St. Luke's statement (once said to be an anachronism) quite probable. If the presence of such an officer in Cassarea was not possible during the semi-independent rule of Agrippa (a.d. 41-44), we must date the episode before that; but we cannot assert such an impossibility.

CORNER, CORNER-STONE.—1. The special sanctity which in the Hebrew mind attached to corners is to be regarded as an inheritance from certain primitive and widely-spread animistic conceptions. Several of these were taken up and, so to speak 'regularized' in the later legislation (cf. the remarks on Azazel under ATONEMENT [Day of]). Examples will be found in the ideas associated with the corners of the altar (2 Enoch 90), usually termed the 'horns' (Altar, § 7), the unclean corners of the field (Lv 19:1; Agriculture, § 3), the corners of the beard and head-hair (v.29) and of the upper garment or cloak (Fringes).

2. Another illustration is found in the importance attached among many peoples to the corner-stone in the foundation course of every important building, which was laid with religious rites, including, in early times, the burial beneath it of a human victim (see House, § 3). The corrected text of Is 28:16 speaks of 'a precious foundation corner-stone,' which is neither Zion (as usually interpreted), nor the future Messiah, but a calm trust in J", hence the prophet adds 'he that trusts shall not be moved' or 'put to shame' (LXX, cf. 1 P 2:3 and Kittle, Bib. Heb.). Jer 31:10 and Job 28:16 both associate the corner-stone with the foundations. Hence the figurative use of the word for the chief men of the State, as its 'corners,' i.e. supports and defences (Jgs 20:1, I S 14:16 cf. marr.), Is 28:16, 27:15, Zec 8:10. On the other hand, the stone of Ps 118:12 which became 'the head of the corner' (RV)—the reference is to Zion—is understood by many to be the corner-stone of the topmost course, cf. the head stone of Zec 5:6. (cf. from the 'foundation' text). In NT this passage and Is 22:22 receive a Messianic application, Jesus Christ being both the foundation and the head of His Church (Mt 21:14), Ac 4:11, 1 P 2:6.

CORNET.—See Music and Musical Instruments.

CORRUPTION.—Jewish anthropology conceived of man as composed of two elements, the physical body and the soul. At death the soul went to Sheol, and the body decayed. The term 'corruption' came, therefore, to stand for the physical aspects of that state which followed death and preceded the resurrection. In this sense it is used in Ac 237. 11 33-34, 1 Co 15:31-54; cf. also 1 Co 15:12-14. There is no evidence that it had a moral force, although some have found such an implication in Gal 6:1, where the reference is rather to a belief that the wicked will not share in the glories of the resurrection. Neither is it a term to indicate annihilation, which idea does not seem to have been held by the Palestinian Jews. Jesus through His resurrection is represented (J Ti 1:19) as having brought life and incorruption to light. The resurrection as a part of salvation is thus placed in sharpest contrast with the condition of the personality following physical death, since, as St. Paul says (2 Co 5:1), for a man who is saved, the decomposition of the physical body is but an occasion for the assumption of an incorruptible heavenly body.

COS.—An island off the coast of Caria, S.W. of Asia Minor, famous for its fertility and beauty. It was a Doric colony, and a great seat of the worship of Apollo and of the study of medicine. Its position made it also an important place from a trade point of view, as it lay on the cross lines of traffic between Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. It is uncertain whether Cos, which had been a faithful ally of the Romans, was incorporated in the province of Asia in B.C. 139 (see CARIA), but it certainly was a part of it in the time of Augustus. Its trade connexion made it one of the Jewish centres of the Aegean. The Jews there, who were favoured by the Romans in B.C. 138 (1 Mac 15:9), was a place on the route of the Jewish pilgrims to Jerusalem (cf. Ac 21:1). Herod the Great was a benefactor of the people of Cos.

COSAM.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:27).

COSMOGONY.—See Creation.

COSSEANS.—A name adapted from the Greek form of Bab. Kusah, a semi-barbarous people inhabiting the mountain regions between Elam and Media proper. They answer to Cush (wh. see) in Gn 10:8 and 29:17) as distinguished from the African Cush. They were a powerful people between the 18th and the 12th centuries n.c., during which time Babylonism was ruled by a Coscean dynasty.

COTTON is the better tr. (so RVm) of karpas, which in AV and RV is tr. 'green,' Est 1:6. It was either muslin or calico.

E. W. G. Masterman.

COUCH.—See House, § 8. The verb 'to couch' occurs in Dt 23:8 'the deep that coucheth beneath.' The word means simply to lie down, but it is used almost exclusively of animals, as is the Heb. word also. The subterranean deep, says Driver, is perhaps pictured as a gigantic monster.

COULTER.—Only 1513: for the word elsewhere rendered 'paw-shore,' and so it should be here, as the Hebrew plough, like its Syrian representative to-day, had no couler. See Agriculture, § 1.

COUNCIL.—See Sanhedrin. For the Council of Ac 15, Gal 2, see Paul, Galatians [Et. to], § 3.

COUNSELLOR.—This is the spelling in modern editions of the AV. In the ed. of 1611 it is 'counsellor,' except in Est 8:6, Pr 120:15, 15, where the spelling is 'counsellour.' The word is used mostly of a king's counsellor, or more generally of one who gives counsel. But in Dn 2:29 it means a justice; and in Mk 6:5, Lk 6:10, it is used of Joseph of Arimathea as a number of the Sanhedrin. In Dn 3:17 46 the peculiar word rendered 'counsellor' in AV is bestatinely translated by Driver 'minister'; RV retains 'counsellor.'

COUNTERVAIL.—To countervail (Est 7:4, Sir 6:3) is to make up for, give an equivalent in More's Utopia: 'All the goodes in the worlde are not lyable to countervayle man's life.'

COURAGE.—In Dn 11:12 'courage' is the rendering of the Heb. word for 'heart'; in Am 20:19 'courageous' is literally 'most of heart.' Elsewhere in the O.T. the root-ideas of the words generally used are 'to be firm' ('âdimite) and 'to be strong' (châzq). Courage, being a quality of mind, has manifold manifestations, as, e.g. in the sufferer's endurance, the reformer's boldness, and the saint's 'wrestling' (Eph 6:18), as well as in the soldier's valour. Professor Sorley says that moral courage is 'the control of the fear of social evils (disgrace or ridicule from those who determine the opinion of the community), whereas the ordinary application of courage is to the fear of physical evils' (Baldwin, Dict. of Philosophy, 1, 259).

In the NT the Gr. noun for 'courage' is found only in Ac 28:4. The corresponding verb is rendered uniformly in the RV 'be of good cheer'; but a later form of the same verb occurs six times, and in is tr. in RV 'be of good courage.' The rarity of the word 'courage' implies no disparagement of the virtue, for exhortations to 'be strong,' and to 'fear not' are frequent. T. H. Green, comparing Greek and Christian ideals of virtue (Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 277 ft.), shows how greatly the conception of moral heroism has been widened. Courage or fortitude is defined as 'the will to endure even unto death for a worthy end'; therefore the Christian may be courageous 'in obscure labours of love as well as in the splendid heroism at which a world might wonder.'

COURT.—See House, § 2; Justice; Tabernacle; Temple.

COUSIN.—Elizabeth is called Mary's 'cousin' in Lk 1:36, and the relationship is often understood in the modern sense of that word. But 'cousin' in the English of 1611 meant no more than kinman or kinswoman. The relationship between Mary and Elizabeth is not known.

COVENT.—The term is of frequent occurrence in the Bible, and is used in the general sense of a compact or agreement between parties, and also in the more technical and legal sense of an arrangement entered into by God, and confirmed or sealed with the due formalities. The Hebrew word (serat) has a similarly wide signification; whilst the Greek (diatetēskē) is used alike in the classics and NT, and is employed in the further sense of ‘testament’ or ‘will,’ though Aristophanes (Av. 430) is a good witness for the meaning of mutual agreement. The rendering ‘testament’ is retained by the RV in two places only (He 7:12; cf. margin of Gal 3:19), and is perpetuated in the titles given to the two main parts of the Bible (see Testaments).

As for the formalities in concluding a covenant, the primitive way seems to have been for the two parties to swallow each a drop of the blood of the other, thus becoming covenant-brothers. This actual mingling of blood soon became distasteful, and substitutes were found, such as the cutting of sacrificial animals into two parts, between which the parties passed hand in hand (Gn 15:10, 17, Jer 34:18), the meat probably being eaten afterwards in a joint meal. This ritual appears to have been inherited from the nomadic period, and it afterwards generally gave way to a solemn oath or invocation of God, combining a pledge to observe the covenant (Gn 26:3, He 6:17) and the imprecation of a curse on non-observance (Dt 27:26). Sometimes a hand mark is used to seal the place of the oath (Jos 22:18; 1 Ch 28:9, 17v. 22: 1 Ch 29:29 marg., 1 Mac 6:16), or was added to it (Ezk 17:2). In very early times an agreement between two men was sometimes confirmed by setting up a pillar or a heap of stones (Gn 31:44), or the혈서' (Gn 21:31). When God was Himself directly one of the parties, and an obligation was thought to be assumed by Him rather than by both, a token was substituted (Gn 9:12; but in these cases the transaction takes the form chiefly of a pledge or assurance, though the idea of some obligation upon the other party is often implicit. Compacts would often be made or confirmed at a shrine; and the god sanction being added (Gn 31:32, 33, Jer 32:11, 22, 23), or a sacrificial meal accompanied the act (Gn 26:31, 34; 1 S 38). Sprinkling of sacrificial blood (Ex 24, Zec 9:9, He 9:11) was a specially solemn indication of the cutting of the blood of the compact, and the obligations undertaken; and its significance survives and is deepened in the death of Christ (He 10:13 and in the Eucharist (Mt 26:26, Mk 14:22, Lk 22:17, 1 Co 11:25).

The covenants referred to in Scripture, there are two classes. 1. Covenants between men.—These, again, are of several kinds, the most frequent being international alliances (e.g. Gn 21:24, Jos 9, Ps 89, Am 1), judicial alliances and covenants (2 S 5, 1 Ch 13, Is 24, Jer 18:11, Dt 28:29-30), and of marriage (Pr 27:9, Mal 2:14). By an easy metaphor, a covenant in the sense of an imposed will may be made with the eyes (Job 31); or, in the other sense of agreement, with the stones (Job 50), but not with Leviathan (Job 41), because of his greatness and intractability, nor wisely with death either in scorn of God (Is 26:10) or in yearning (Wis 118). In Dn 11:11 the ‘prince of the covenant’ is sometimes rendered ‘a prince in league with him;’ but if the other translation be correct, ‘covenant’ will represent the nation as a religious community (cf. Dn 11:36, 38, Ps 74:2), and the prince will be the high priest, Cnaas m., who was deposed by Antiochus about B.C. 167. Similarly in Mal 3:1 the ‘messenger of the covenant’ may be the attendant of God, His instrument in dealing with the nation (cf. Rv 14).

2. Covenants between God and men.—The idea of a covenant between God and man, or ‘covenant’ (cf. Gn 2:17, 11:11, 16:5; 26:2, 39:3, 42:2) has been found by some writers in Sir 17, which is more easily interpreted of the transactions on Horeb (Dt 5:2). In Ps 23:5, as in 55:27, the word has its fundamental meaning of an alliance of friendship, with a specific allusion in the former case to the Deuteronomic covenant of the tenth verse. In other cases the technical meaning of an agreement with signs and pledges is more conspicuous. The Noahian covenant (Gn 6:8-22) has the object of ensuring the stability of natural law. The covenant with Abraham (Gn 15:1-21) was confirmed in its promise to Isaac and Jacob (Ex 2:24, Lv 26:42, Ps 105:1), and ensured a blessing through their seed to all nations, circumstances being adopted as the token (cf. Ac 7:9, 1 Mac 14). Of still greater significance was the covenant at Horeb or Sinai (Ex 19:10-24, 21: et al.), which was renewed in the plains of Moab (Dt 29), and is frequently referred to in the OT, as was rightly a covenant 'given to Israel by God, with appointed promise and penalty, duly inscribed on the tables of the covenant (Dt 9:24-20, ) which were deposited in the ark (Dt 10:2, 1 K 8:2, 2 Ch 5:2, He 9). Elsewhere the covenant is described as act forth in words (Ex 24:7, Dt 29) and written in a book (Ex 24:7, 2 K 23). Amongst other covenants of minor importance are that with Phinehas establishing an everlasting priesthood in his line (Nu 25:12), and that with David establishing an everlasting kingdom (Ps 89), Jer 33:7; cf. 2 S 7). Joshua and the people covenant to serve Jehovah and the people (2 K 21). Hezekiah and the people solemnly agree to reform the worship (2 Ch 29:5); Josiah (2 K 23) and Ezra (18) lead the people into a covenant to observe the Law. Whilst the Sinai covenant is thus often referred to as the charter of the Jewish dispensation, the establishment by God of a new constitution was contemplated by a series of prophets (Jer 31:34; Ez 36:24, Is 59:5-6, 61:4, Ezk 16:50, 20:24). Some of the pledges were new, and not contained in their original form, whilst the Messianic Servant becomes 'for a covenant of the people' (Is 42:6, 49:15; cf. 'messenger of the covenant,' Mal 3:1). The Sinai covenant is thus referred to as 'the first-born of the covenant', and is contrasted with the ancient covenant, even that with Abraham, was everlasting (Gn 17), and still stands in its supreme purpose (Lv 26:44-45, Ac 3:24, Ro 11:8) of making men the people of God, the new elements constituting mainly in the adoption of more effective influences and inspiration. The Exile is sometimes thought of as marking the dissolution of the Old Covenant (Jer 31:34), though the idea was not fully introduced until much later. The act of making the New Covenant is compared with the transactions in the wilderness (Ezk 20:7), on God's part there is forgiveness with the quickening of the inner life of man (Ezk 36:26). And the activity and the blessedness are associated with the Messianic expectations (Jer 33:7, Ezk 34:24-26, Lk 16).

In the later OT writings the word 'covenant,' as appears from the previous citations, has lost much of its technical signification, and does not always denote even a formal act of agreement, but becomes almost a synonym, and that without much precision, for the conditions of religion (Ps 105:7). St. Paul recognizes a series of covenants (Rv 4, Eph 2) on an ascending scale of adequacy (2 Co 3, Gal 4:4; cf. He 7:17; and if Sinai is but a stage (Gal 3:19) in the course from Abraham to Christ.

Of special phrases, two or three may present some difficulty. 1. A covenant of salt (Nu 15:17, 2 K 3:3) in perpetuity, the eating of salt together being a token of friendship as sealed by sacred hospitality. The salt of the covenant (Lv 2:13) has probably the same primary suggestion, as a natural accompaniment of the sacrificial meal, and with it constituting an inviolable bond. Sometimes the two are parallel divisions and examples are cited from the books of the Old and of the New Covenant respectively. The name 'Book of the Covenant' (see next article) is given.
COVENANT, BOOK OF THE

CovenaThe most ancient and complete Hebrew law known to the world is the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments. It is the first chapter of this book. The following is a brief outline of the contents of the Ten Commandments:

1. Be not covetous (Ex 20:15).
2. Do not steal (Ex 20:16).
3. Do not bear false witness (Ex 20:17).
4. Do not commit adultery (Ex 20:18).
5. Honor the Sabbath (Ex 20:19).
6. Honor thy father and mother (Ex 20:20).
7. Do not kill (Ex 20:21).
8. Do not commit robbery (Ex 20:22).
9. Do not take a wife outside of marriage (Ex 20:23).
10. Do not bear false witness against thy neighbor (Ex 20:24).

COVENANT, BOOK OF THE.

The oldest code of Hebrew law which has come down to us is contained in Ex 20:1-17. It received its name from the revision of it in Ex 24:1, and that of it is demonstrated by the promises attached to the keeping of it (230:2). The correct term used in the Hebrew is "mishpatim," or "judgments." The close proximity of the Ten Commandments (20:2-17) to the Sin in the Garden of Eden (2:8-17) might lead us to think that both codes were given at the same time. But the Book of the Covenant is certainly not a law that was "delivered" in the sense of "revelation," but a series of decisions gradually gathered together and then incorporated by the compiler at this particular place in the Book of Exodus, with the intention of bringing the ancient codes together.

1. Contents.—This fall into two broad divisions:

(a) Moral laws (Ex 20:1-17): (1) of life (Ex 20:12); (2) of detail (Ex 20:13-17).

(b) Judicial laws (Ex 20:18-23): (1) of property (Ex 20:18-21); (2) of persons (Ex 20:22-23).

2. Date.—As to the date of the Book of the Covenant, there is no evidence save what the document itself affords us. But the state of society reflected in it is primitive. Agriculture is the industry of the people. The laws of blood-revenge were entering into being. The woman has as yet no property in herself; there is no clear conception of a State. The code would thus seem to be dated from the days of the desert wandering, and be older than the Decalogue itself. See, further, artt. Exodus and Hexateuch.

COVETOUSNESS.—In the Bible, covetousness is a crime. In the Ten Commandments it is put under the ban along with murder, adultery, theft, and slander (Ex 20:14, Dt 5:18). Achan was guilty of this crime, and was stoned to death (Jos 7:3-26). Every occurrence of the word "covetousness" in the OT is connected with a prohibition or a curse (Ps 108:29, Pr 29:6, Is 58:7, Hab 2:21). In the NT adultery and covetousness are usually classed together (1 Co 6:19, 10, Col 3:2, 2 P 2:4). The conjunction of sensual sin and love of money probably rests upon the authority of Jesus (Mc 12:28, 34). The Apostles declared that the worshipper of Baal and the worshipper of Venus and the worshipper of Mammon belong to one and the same class. (Lk 12:15, Ro 13:12). Grasping avarice is in line with the spirit of self-sacrifice taught in the NT as is the selfish indulgence in drink or the grosser indulgence in vice. The Bible puts the covetous man in the same category with the murderer and the thief. The man who needs to study anew the Bible teaching concerning covetousness, as found in Jer 22:13, Mc 2:12, Lk 12:15, Ro 7:7, Eph 5:5, 1 Ti 6:6, He 13:15, and other passages. No covetous man has any inheritance in the Kingdom of God.

D. A. HAYES.

COZBI.—The Midianitess slain by Phinehas (Nu 25:1-14).

COZEBAR.—1 Ch 4:13—Chabib, No. 2.

CRACKNELS.—See Bread.

CRAFT, in the sense of 'trade,' survives in RV only in Rev 18:18 'no craftsman of whatever craft.' In Ac 18:19 fr. 'trade' or 'business' has been substituted for AV 'craft.' 'Craftsmen' and 'craftsmen,' however, are retained. See list under Arts and Crafts.

CRANE.—In Is 38:7 and Jer 8:7 & 8 & 51 is rendered in AV 'crane,' RV correctly 'swallow' [wh. see]. In the same passage engr 'agur' is rendered in AV 'crane.' The crane (Grus communis) is the largest bird which visits W. Palestine; its length is four feet. They arrive in large flocks in the winter (Jer 8:9).
CRATES

ing note is strangely described (Is 38:15 EV) as "cluttering," and this makes the translation somewhat doubtful.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CRATES.—A deputy left in charge of the citadel at Jerusalem (Acre) when the regular governor, Sostratus, was summoned to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with the high priest Menelaus (2 Mac 34). Crates was "over the Cyprians": probably he was sent to Cyprus shortly afterwards, when, in n.c. 165, Antiochus obtained possession of the island.

CREATION.—One of the most convincing proofs of the composite authorship of the Pentateuch has always been found in the existence side by side of two independent and mutually irreconcilable accounts of the creation of the world. The first, Gn 1:1—2:4a, forms the introduction to the description (v. 5) of the pre-existent, a dark formless watery abyss, out of which the world of light and order was to be evolved. Whether this chaotic matter owed its origin to a prior creative act of God, or was brought into being as the result of a delicate process of grammatical construction which cannot be adequately explained here; but, looking to the analogy of the Babylonian Creation-story (see below), it seems probable that the chaos is conceived as pre-existent, and that the representation of the chapter fails short of the full dogmatic idea of creation as production out of nothing,—an idea first unambiguously expressed in 2 Mac 72.

The work of creation then proceeds in a series of eight Divine acts, viz.: (1) Creation of light and separation of light from the primeval darkness, vv. 3:4; (2) division of the chaotic waters by the firmament, vv. 4:1—4; (3) separation of land and sea, vv. 4:10; (4) clothing of the earth with vegetation, vv. 5:1—12; (5) formation of the heavens—bodies, vv. 4:14—15; (6) production of fishes and birds, vv. 5:19—22; (7) land animals, v. 5:31; and (8) the creation of man in the image of God with dominion over the creatures, v. 5:32. The most remarkable formal feature of the record is a somewhat artificial but carefully planned and symmetrical arrangement of the eight works under a scheme of six days. The creative process is divided into two parallel paragraphs, each embracing four works and occupying three days, the last day in each division having two works assigned to it. There is an obviously designed, though not quite complete, correspondence between the two series: (1) light and darkness; (2) waters and firmament; (3) dry land and terrestrial animals; (4) trees and grasses; and (on the sixth day) the appointment of man and animals. The significance of the six days' scheme is revealed in the closing verses (21—2), where the resting of the Creator on the seventh day is regarded as the antitype and sanction of the Jewish Sabbath-rest. It is not improbable that the scheme of days is a modification of the original cosmogony, introduced in the interest of the Sabbath law; and this adaptation may account for some anomalies of arrangement which seem to mar the consistency of the scheme.

In the narrative of J (21—4), the earth as originally made by Jehovah was an arid lifeless waste, in which no plant could grow for lack of moisture, and where there was no man to till the ground (v. 2). The contrast of man's superiority to the other creatures is here expressed by placing his creation, not at the end as in P, but at the beginning (v. 24); followed by the planting of the garden in which he was to dwell and from whose trees he was to derive his food (vv. 5, 9, 15—17); the forming of beasts and birds to relieve his solitude and awake his craving for a nobler companionship (vv. 18—25); and lastly of the woman, in whom he recognizes a part of himself and a helpmeet for him (vv. 26—28). The expression of reference to the welfare of man in each act of creation makes it doubtful whether a systematic account of the origin of things was contemplated by the writer, or whether the passage is not rather to be regarded as a poetic clustering of ideas generated by reflection on fundamental facts of human life and society. It is probable, however, that it contains fragments of a fuller cosmogony which has been abridged and utilized as a prologue to the story of Paradise and the Fall. As in either case, the divergence from the account of P is so obvious as to preclude the attempt to harmonize the two, or to treat the second as merely supplementary to the first.

Much ingenuity has been expended in the effort to bring the Biblical record of creation into accord with the facts disclosed by the modern sciences of Geology and Astronomy. Naturally such constructions confine their operations to the systematic and semi-scientific account of Gn 1; for it has probably never occurred to any one to vindicate the scientific accuracy of the statements of J. But it is to be remembered that to admit the unique claim of the first chapter to be a revealed cosmogony, the difficulty of harmonizing it with the teachings of science is seen to be insurmountable without a modification of the record, and that the narrative must be taken as a whole, and it must be shown that there is a genuine parallelism between the order of days and works in Gn 1 and the stages of development recognized by science. Thus the universe has reached its present form. This has never been done; and after making every allowance for the imperfection of the geological record, and the general insecurity of scientific hypothesis as distinguished from actual fact, enough is known to make it certain that the required correspondence can never be made out. Thus the formation of the sun and moon after the earth, after the alternation of day and night, and even after the emergence of plant-life, is a scientific impossibility. Again, the rough popular classifications of Genesis (plants, aquatic animals, land animals, etc.) are, for scientific purposes, hopelessly inadequate; and the idea that these groups originated as wholes, and in the order here specified, is entirely contrary to the 'testimony of the rocks.' But, however, the whole conception of the universe on which the cosmogony of Genesis rests opposes a fatal barrier to any valid reconciliation with scientific theory. The world whose origin is here described is a solid expanse of earth, surrounded by and resting on a sea or ocean, and surmounted by a rigid vault called the firmament, above which the waters of a heaven ocean are spread. Such a world is unknown to science; and the manner in which such a world was conceived to have come into being cannot really represent the processes by which the very different world of science and fact has been evolved. This fact alone would amplify the emphatic verdict of Professor Driver: 'Read without prejudice or bias, the narrative of Gn 1 is a stair-case, not with the facts revealed by science: the efforts at reconciliation . . . are but different modes of obliterating its characteristic features, and of reading into it a view which it does not express' (Westm. Com. 'Genesis,' p. 26).

To form a correct estimate of the character and religious value of the first chapter of Genesis, it has to be borne in mind that speculative theories of the origin of the universe were an important element of all the higher religions of antiquity. Many of these cosmogonies (as they are called) are known to us; and amidst all the diversity of representation which characterizes them, we cannot fail to detect certain underlying similarities. If anything, we suggest a common source, either in the natural tendencies of early thought, or in some dominant type of cosmological tradition. That the Hebrew cosmogony is influenced by such a tradition is proved by the striking likeness to the Babylonian stories of creation as contained in cuneiform tablets from Ashurbanipal’s library, first unearthed in 1872. From these Assyriologists have deciphered a highly coloured mythology, closely related to the origin of the world in the form of a conflict between Marduk, god of light and supreme deity of the pantheon of Babylon, and the power of Chaos personified as a female monster named Tiamat (Heb. Tehom). Wide as is the difference between the polytheistic assumptions and fantastic imagery of the Babylonian narrative and the sober dignity and elevated monothemism of Genesis, there are yet coincidences in general outline and in detail which are too marked and too numerous to be ascribed to chance. In both we have the conception of chaos as a watery abyss, in both the separation of the waters into an upper and a lower ocean; the formation of the heavenly bodies just fast can be created is paralleled with remarkable similarity; special prominence is given to the creation of man; and it may be added that, while the order of creation differs in the two documents, yet the works themselves are practically identical.

In view of this pervading parallelism, it is clear that the Hebrew and Babylonian cosmogonies are very closely related; and the only question open to discussion is which of them represents the more faithfully the particular tradition on which each is based. Looking, however, to the vastly higher antiquity of the Babylonian narrative, to its conformity (even in points which affect the climatic conditions) to the Euphrates Valley, and to the general indebtedness of Israel to the civilization of Babylon, it cannot reasonably be doubted that the Hebrew narrative is dependent on Babylonian models; though it is of course not certain that the particular version preserved in the tablets referred to is the exact original by which the Biblical writers were influenced.

From this point of view we are able to state the significance of the Scripture account of creation in a way which does justice to once to its unrivalled religious value and to its lack of scientific corroboration. The material is derived from some form of the Babylonian cosmogony, and shares the imperfection and errors incident to all pre-scientific speculation regarding the past history of the world. The Scripture writers make no pretension to supernatural illumination on matters which it is the province of physical investigation to ascertain. Their theology, on the other hand, is the product of a revelation which placed them far in advance of their heathen contemporaries, and imparted to all their thinking a minuteness of imagination and a subtlety of conception that instinctively rejected the grosser features of paganism, and transformed what was retained into a vehicle of Divine truth. Thus the cosmogony became a classical expression of the monothestic principle of the OT, which is here embodied in a detailed description of the genesis of the universe that lays hold of the mind as no abstract statement of the principle could do. In opposition to the heathen theogonies, the world is affirmed to have been created, i.e. to have originated in the will of God, whose Personality transcends the universe and exists independently of it. The spirituality of the First Cause of all things, and His absolute sovereignty over the material He employs, are further emphasized in the idea of the word of God as the agency through which the various orders of existence were produced; and the repeated assertion that the world in all its parts was ‘good,’ suggests that it perfectly reflected the Divine thought which called it into being. When to these doctrines we add the view of man, as made in the likeness of God, and marked out as the crown and goal of spiritual life, we see the distinctive character of the Hebrew cosmogony as the resultant of two successive processes: it unifies the cosmogony of Gn 1 from all similar compositions, and entitles it to rank amongst the most important documents of revealed religion.

CREATURE.—In AV ‘creature’ is used in the general (and original) sense of ‘what is created.’ Thus 2 Co 5:18 ‘if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature’; Ti 4:10 ‘for every creature of God is good.’ In Ro 1:25, 26 ‘it is not merely living creatures in the modern use of the word that wait for deliverance, but the whole creation of God (as AV itself has it in v. 25).’

CREDITOR.—See Debtor.

CREED (or Credo [AS. credo], taken from the first word of the Latin confession of faith—Greek ‘symbol’ (symbolon, symbolum)).—An ecclesiastical (non-Biblical) term, signifying ‘the faith’ objectively and as explicitly declared, ‘the articles of Christian belief’ drawn up in systematic and authoritative form. The Creeds—denote the three great historical Confessions of the early Church—‘the Apostles’, the Nicene or Constantinopolitan (325, 381 A.D.), and the Athanasian (of Latin origin, 6th century)—‘the Creed’ commonly means the latter. This last can be traced, in its simplest form, to the 2nd century; see Lamy’s Hist. of the Creeds, or Swete’s Apostles’ Creed. Shaped in their developed form by doctrinal controversy and Conciliar definition, the Creeds owe their origin to the necessities of worship and the instincts of public confession in the Church, felt at baptism to begin with. Christian believers formed the habit, when they met, of reciting their common faith, and this recitation assumed a fixed rhythmical form; so that the creed is akin to the hymn and the doxology. Its beginnings are visible in the NT—see Mt 16:16, Mt 28:19, Ro 10:9, 1 Ti 3:16 (RV), Eph 4:14, 1 Ti 3:16, 1 Jn 4:1; and further back, for the OT and the Synagogue, in the Shema of De 6:42.

G. G. FINDLAY.

CREEPING THINGS.—In the EV this term is the tr. of two distinct words, which have no etymological connexion, and in usage are not synonymous. The Hebrew words are remes and sheeret. It is unfortunate that the latter term is tr. ‘creeping thing,’ for the root means to swarm. It includes both terrestrial and aquatic animals which appear in great swarms; in Gn 1:10 it refers to the terrestrial creatures that appear in the waters. These latter passages it includes insects, as locusts, crickets, and grasshoppers (Lv 11:22-23), together with the smaller quadrupeds as the weasel and mouse, as well as reptiles proper (Lv 11:24-28). Bymologically remes signifies that which slides or creeps, and for its usage the two crucial passages are Gn 1:14 and 1:46. In the latter the entire animal kingdom is popularly divided into four classes: beasts, birds, creeping things, and fishes (cf. Hos 2:10). In Gn 1:24 the land animals are put into three groups: cattle, creeping things, and beasts of the earth. By eliminating the first and third classes, which respectively include domesticated quadrupeds, and the wild animals, we see that the expression ‘creeping things’ is, roughly speaking, equivalent to our term ‘reptiles,’ exclusive of those which are aquatic. Delitzch defines remes as the smaller creeping animals that keep close to the earth; Dillmann as creatures which move along the ground either without feet or with imperceptible feet. From this discussion it is evident that the two terms are not interchangeable. Terms. Remes has also a wider signification: in Ps 104:25 it is used of marine animals, in Gn 2 (EV ‘moving thing’) it includes all living creatures. See, further, the careful discussion by Professor Driver in Hastings’ DBI. 517f.

JAMES A. KEIZOR.
CRESCENS. — A companion of St. Paul in his final imprisonment, sent by him to Galatia (2 Ti 4:18), i.e. either to Asiatic Galatia, or possibly to Gaul. A late Western tradition treats him as the founder of the Churches of Thessalonica and of Mayence. His martyrdom is honored in the Roman Martyrology on June 27, in the Greek Menologion on May 30, and there he is treated as one of the seventy disciples, and a bishop of Chaledon.

CRESCENTS. — See Aulumen, § 4, and Ornamentum, § 3.

CRETE, CRETANS. — Crete, the modern Candia, is an island 690 miles S. of Greece proper, about 160 miles long, and varying in breadth from 30 to 7 miles, with mountains as high as 7000 feet. It is about equidistant from Europe, Asia, and Africa, and was inhabited from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge. The researches of Mr. Arthur J. Evans and others have revealed traces of a very ancient civilization, including an alphabet hitherto unknown. In historical times it was famed for its archers, who were valued in the armies of Europe. It was conquered by Rome in B.C. 67, and became, in conjunction with the district Cyrenaica on the N. of Africa, a Roman senatorial province, governed by a proconsul. Jews were early to be found there, and were very numerous. Some were present at Pentecost in the year of the crucifixion (Ac 2:11). St. Paul’s ship, on the voyage to Rome, was stranded along the Cretan coast close in (Ac 27:7), and came to Fair Havens near Lasea. These places were on the S. coast, which had few harbours.

The epithets which a native of the island, the poet Pindar, prefixed B.C. 600, flung at the Cretans, are quoted in a somewhat un-poetical manner in the Epistle to Titus (1:12). Epimenides styled them ‘always liars, evil beasts of prey, lazy gluttons.’ Such vituperation, though countenanced by others also, must not be taken too seriously. The ancients were much given to it, and it probably reveals as much of the natures of the persons who used it as of those to whom it was applied. Greeks in general are not, and Cretans not, famous for truthfulness, for instance. When and by whom Christianity was planted in Crete cannot be said. It is probable that it was well established there in the 1st century. In the Epistle to Titus we find Titus introduced as having been left by St. Paul in charge of the churches. A. Scurre.

CRIB is the modern manger (Lk 2:7), which contained the fodder for oxen (Pr 14:4), asses (Is 1:17), and doubtless other stock as well.

CRICKET. — L. 112 (AV ‘beetle’). See Locust.

CRIME. — In 1611 the word ‘crime’ had not lost its early meaning of ‘occasional,’ whence Ac 22:24 ‘the crime laid against him’ (RV ‘matter,’ but in Ac 23:19 the same Gr. word is translated ‘charge’ in both AV and RV). It is possible, that in Job 31:17 ‘crime’ is used in the more modern sense; elsewhere it means ‘charge.’

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. — The term ‘crimes’ is here used loosely in the sense of punishable offences, including not merely crimes (crimina) in the sense of breaches of the criminal law in the modern sense, and torts (dedita) or breaches of the civil law, but also those offences in the sphere of religion and worship to which definite penalties were attached. Within the limits of this article it is possible to present only a summary of the more important and typical punishable offences recognized in the various Hebrew law-codes. The latter, indicated by the usual symbols, are: (1) BC, the code of Yavneh and of the Rabbis of the Covenant, Ex 20:23-23, with which for convenience sake is joined the Decalogue of Ex 20:15-27; (2) D, the Deuteronomical Code, Dt 12-28; (3) H, the Holiness Code, Lv 17-20; and (4) P, the great collection of laws known as the Priest’s Code, and comprising the rest of the legislative material of the Pentateuch. In the case of P alone it will be necessary to name the books (Ex., Lv., or Nu.) to which reference is made.

The penal offences of the Pentateuch may be conveniently grouped into three branches: (1) against God, (2) against man, and (3) against the individual.

1. A. CRIMES AGAINST GOD, or offences in the sphere of religion and worship. — Although it is impossible to enumerate all the misdemeanours of every kind were in the last resort offences against J., who was regarded as the only fountain of law and justice, it will be convenient to group under this head those belonging to the sphere of religious belief and its outward expression in worship. Among these the first place must be given to the worship of heathen deities—condemned in the strongest terms in BC (from 20th onwards) and D—and of the heavenly bodies, D 17 (cf. 4:19). The penalty is death under the ban (BC 22b, D 13f) (see Band), or by stoning (D 17h). Inseparable from this form of apostasy is the crime of idolatry, entailing the curse of God (D 27b), blasphemy, or profanation of the Divine name, is forbidden in all the codes; the penalty is death by stoning (H 24m).

2. The punishment for doing ‘any work on the Sabbath day’ is death, but only in the later legislation (Ex 31a (probably H 35f); cp. the very late Haggadic section, Nu 15:32). For the select of ordinances required, the expression is a familiar phrase, such as ‘fail to observe the fast of the Day of Atonement (H 23h), or to keep the Passover (Nu 9f), an offender is liable to be cut off from the people’ (see below). This was also the punishment prescribed for a number of offences that may be grouped under the head of sacrilege, such as partaking of blood (Lv 7f, F), and the unauthorized manufacture and use of the holy anointing-oil (Ex 30f).

3. B. CRIMES AGAINST SOCIETY. — As the family, according to Hebrew ideas, was the unit of society, the crimes that mar the sanctities of family life may be considered first. Such pre-eminently was adultery, severely condemned in all the codes, the punishment for both parties being death (D 22h, H 20h). In a case of seduction the man was required to marry her whom he had wronged, if her father gave consent (D 22m), giving the latter a ‘down,’ i.e. the usual purchase price (see Marriage), estimated in D 22a at 50 shekels of silver. On the other hand, the penalty for rape, if the victim was betrothed, was death (D 22m), as was for unnatural crimes like sodomy (H 18f 20f, ‘thou shalt not lie with mankind as with womankind’) and bestiality (BC 22b, H 20h).

The marriage of near kin is forbidden in H 18f under seventeen heads (see Marriage). Incest with a step-mother or a daughter-in-law was punishable by the death of both parties (H20h), while for a man to marry ‘a wife and her mother’ was a crime that could be expiated only by the death of all three, and that, as many hold (see below), by being burnt alive (ib. v. 1h). Ordinarily prostitution is condemned by H 19f (cf. D 22h)—for a priest’s daughter the punishment was even death by burning (21h)—while the wide-spread heathen practice of establishing religious prostitutes, male and female, at the local sanctuaries is specially reprobated in D 23f, in which the male prostitute is to be recognized under the inexact term ‘sodomite,’ and the contemptuous ‘dog.’

4. To carry disrespect for one’s parents to the extent of smiting (BC 21b), or cursing them (BC 21b, H 20b), or even of showing persistent contumacy (D 21h), entailed the extreme penalty of death at the hands of the local authorities.

5. Everything that would tend to impair the impartial and effective administration of justice is emphatically condemned in the Hebrew codes, the giving and receiving of bribe, in particular, being forbidden
CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS

even in the oldest legislation (BC 23rd 'for a gift blindeth them that have sight'). Against those who would defeat the ends of justice by perjury and false witness, the law is rightly severe (D 191°). 'Tale-bearing (H 196°), and the spreading of a report known to be false (BC 238°), are condemned, while in the more heinous case of a man slandering his newly-wedded wife, the eldest of the city are to amerce him in an hundred shekels (D 226°-2)

8. Property had also to be protected against theft (BC 208°) and burglary (222°), with which may be classed the crime of raising the house-kings of a neighbour's property to increase one's own (D 191°), and the use of false weights and measures (D 235°, H 196°). The earliest code likewise deals with trespass (BC 228°), and arson or wilful fire-raising (58°). Vestiges of the penalty, for wrongfully setting fire to a house in order to appropriate its contents (BC 229°), are found in the form of burning down one's own dwelling (D 217°, D 246°). Murder naturally has a place in the penal legislation of all the codes from BC 206° onwards. The legislators, as is well known, were careful to distinguish murder deliberately planned and executed (BC 211°, D 191°), and unpremeditated homicide or manslaughter (BC 214°, D 195°, and esp. F, Nu 35°-37°). The former, with certain exceptions (BC 238°), carried with it the same form of punishment in accordance with the fundamental principle laid down in Gn 9°; in the case of the 'man-slayer' special provision was made for the mitigation of the ancient right of blood revenge (see Revue [Critique] of). Punishments.—From the earliest period of which we have any record two forms of punishment prevailed as the means of vindicating the house-kings of retaliation and restitution. Retaliation, the zas talionis of Romano law, received its classical expression in the oldest Hebrew code: 'thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe' (BC 212°). The talio, as has already been mentioned, was specially applicable in cases of injury from assault. When life had been taken, whether intentionally or unintentionally, the right of enforcing the zas talionis lay with the dead man's next of kin (see Kén [Next of]). In BC restitution varies from fivefold for an ox, and fourfold for a sheep that has been stolen and thereafter killed or sold, to twofold if the animal is still in the thief's possession (BC 224°), and finally to a simple equivalent in the case of wilful damage to a neighbour's property (58°, v 14°). Compensation by a money payment was admitted for loss of time through bodily injury (BC 217°), for loss of property (v 14°-20°), but not, in Hebrew law, for loss of life, except in the cases mentioned BC 216°. The payments of 100 shekels and 50 shekels respectively ordained in D 224° appear to the modern eye as fines, but fail in reality under the head of compensation paid to the father of the women in question.

9. In the penal code of the Hebrews there is a comparative lack of what may be termed intermediate penalties. Imprisonment, for example, has no place in the Pentateuch codes as an authorized form of punishment, although frequent cases occur in later times and apparently with legal sanction (see Ezr 7°). The unit of the stocks also was known to the Jewish (Jer 20°), as well as to the Roman authorities (Ac 16°). Beating with rods and scourging with the lash were also practised. The former seems sanctioned in D 250°, but late Jewish practice substituted a lash of three thongs, thirteen strokes of which were administered (cf. 2 Co 11°). Many, however, would identify the punishment of this passage of D with the favourite Egyptian punishment of the bastinado. Mutilation, apart from the talio, appears only as the penalty for indecent assault (D 251°).

10. The regular form of capital punishment was death by stoning, which is prescribed in the Pentateuch as the penalty for eighteen different crimes, including Sabbath-breaking. 'For only one crime—murder—is it the penalty in all the codes. The execution of the criminal took place outside the city and according to D 17° the witnesses in the case cast the first stone (cf. Jn 8°). In certain cases the dead body of the malefactor was impaled upon a stake; this, it can hardly be doubted, is the true rendering of D 217° (AV 'hang him on a tree'), and of the same expression elsewhere. Hanging or strangulation is mentioned only as a manner of suicide (2 S 17°, Mt 27°). Crucifixion, it need hardly be said, was a Roman, not a Jewish, institution. Beheading appears in Mt 14°, Ac 12°, Rev 20°.

11. The meaning of the expression frequently found in P, 'to be cut off from his people, from Israel,' etc., is uncertain; most probably it denotes a form of excommunication, with the implication that the offender is handed over to the judgment of God, which also seems to be intended by the banishment of Ezr 7° (note margin). A similar division of opinion exists as to the nature of burning alive (ch. 19°), which is reserved for exceptionally severe cases of prostitution (H 21°) and incest (206°). Here the probability seems in favour of the guilty parties being burned alive (cf. Gn 38°), although many scholars place it immediately after the condemnation except in cases of capital punishment for a very extreme form of punishment known to the codes, in that a whole community was involved, is that of total destruction under the ban of the first degree (see Ban) prescribed for the crime of apostasy (BC 299°) and more fully D 13°-17°.

CRIMSON.—The word ἐρυθώ, tr. in Is 1° 'crimson' and in Lk 4° 'scarlet,' is usually tr. 'worm' (wh. see), exactly as the Arab. ḏādēh, the common word for worm; is to-day also used in Palestine for the imported cochineal insect. The Palestine insect is the female Coccus ulicis of the same Natural Order as the American C. cacti; it feeds on the holm-oak.

CRISPING PINS.—Is 3° AV; RV satchel (see Bag).

CRISPUS.—The chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Ac 18°). Convinced by the reasonings of St. Paul that Jesus was the Messiah, he believed with all his house. The Apostle mentions him (1 Co 1°) as one of the few persons whom he himself had baptized.

CRITICISM.—Biblical criticism is divided into two branches: (1) Lower Criticism, which is concerned with the original text of Scripture—the Hebrew of the OT and the Greek of the NT—by reference to (a) the external evidence of MSS., versions, and editions; (b) the nature of documentary literature, and (3) the intrinsic evidence of the inherent probability of one reading as compared with a rival reading, judged by such rules as that preference should be given to the more difficult reading, the shorter reading, the most characteristic reading, and the reading which accounts for the alternative readings (see Text of the NT); (2) Higher Criticism, which is concerned with the interpretation of the contents of Scripture, comparing the various sections of each one with another, or comparing the books in their entirety with one another, and bringing all possible light to bear upon them from history, literature, antiquities, manners, etc.

The title of the second branch of criticism is often misunderstood in popular usage. The Lower Criticism being little heard of except among experts, while the Higher Criticism is often mentioned in public, the true distinction being suggested is not perceived, and the latter phrase is taken to indicate a certain arrogance on the part of advanced critics, and contempt for the older scholarship. Then the word 'criticism' is also taken in its popular sense as implying captiousness and faultfinding. Further, the most startling, and therefore the most generally observed, results of criticism being destructive of preconceived notions, eventually has been regarded as a negative process, and even as an attack on the Bible. It is not to be denied that there are Higher Critics whose arguments may be covered with that learning, argument, and logic of which there are also Higher Critics who are not only loyal to the Divine revelation in Scripture, but whose work may be described as a renovating criticism. Hieff is neutral, it has no bias; it is a scientific process. The champions of accepted views are compelled to use this process when arguing with scholars who take up positions with which they disagree. But, strictly speaking, it is not a controversial weapon. It is a powerful instrument for ascertaining dates in the history of the Bible, speaking, however, that a certain amount of odium has been attached to the title—however unwarrentably—perhaps it would be better to substitute a phrase less liable to misinterpretation—such as the expression 'Historical method.' For in point of fact it is in the application of this method, which has been found so fruitful in other regions of study, to the Bible, that the actual work of the Higher Criticism is carried on. The several parts of Scripture are viewed in their places in the total development of the literature to which they belong, with regard to the spirit of the times in which they were produced, and their light on the problem of their own origin and purpose. In place of the external evidence of testimony confined to man, attention is now given more care to the internal evidence of literary and doctrinal characteristics.

Traces of the 'Higher' Criticism are to be discovered among the Fathers, e.g. in Origen with his discussion of the authorship of Hebrews, in Dionysius of Alexandria's critical objections to the ascension, the Revelation to the author of the Fourth Gospel, etc. It was revived at the Renaissance by Reuchlin and Erasmus, and it was fearlessly pursued by Martin Luther. But the scientific development of the method began with Michaelis (1750) and Semler (1771), especially the latter, for Michaelis did not fully develop his critical views till he issued the 4th ed. of his Introduction to the NT (1788). Eichhorn went further in raising a criticism of the NT Canon (1804), and was opposed by Hug, a Roman Catholic writer, in a very scholarly work. A little later came de Wette (1826), who pursued the new critical method with moderation and great precision of scholarship. Credner followed on similar lines (1836). Meanwhile Guericke, Osnabrun, and Neander opposed the contemporary trend of criticism. A new departure was taken by Ferdinand Christian Baur in 1821, who introduced the 'tendency' criticism, the result of which has come to be known as the 'Tübingen hypothesis,' according to which there was a sharp division in the early Church between St. Paul and the Twelve Apostles, and that Baur regarded the several NT books as in some cases inspired by the tendency of one or other of these parties, and as in other cases written with a view to effect a reconciliation between them in the interest of a subsequent Catholic unity. Zeller (1842) and Schwengler (1846) followed on the same lines. A little later (1850) one of Baur's disciples, Albrecht Ritschl, threw a bombshell into the Tübingen camp by starting from the same position as his master, but advancing to very different conclusions. The Tübingen hypothesis was advocated in England by S. Davidson; but its extreme positions have been given up by most scholars, although it had a later representative in Litzmann, and its spirit has been continued in Pfeiderer.

Meanwhile new problems have emerged, represented in a free critical manner by the Holtmanns, Weizsäcker, Wieland, while the Ritschlian method has been most widely adopted among the Rüpertists. The work of the latter is of extreme negative position with regard to the Gospels, but he has since modified it, and Van Manen has argued against the genuineness of all St. Paul's Epistles. In the second half of the last century, the Gospels and the genuineness of all the Pauline Epistles were maintained by Lightfoot, Westcott, Hort, and others in the first rank of scholarship. Zahn, with his conservative, put forth the hypothesis which the tendency of the mediating school represented by Harnack and Jülicher is to admit the genuineness of much the greater part of the NT, the exceptions with which this school is especially Epp., 2 Thess., the Pastoral, 1 and 2 Peter, James. There is a tendency to connect the Fourth Gospel more closely with St. John, even among those who do not attribute it immediately to the pen of the Apostle.

which is adopted in RVm. See LEVIATHAN. (2) Hapyth qâneb, 'the wild beast of the reeds,' Ps 65:9 RV, is thought by many to be the crocodile or the hippopotamus as symbolizing Egypt. (3) In Jer 14:5 'animus is in RVm 'crocodiles.' See DRAGON. For 'land crocodile' see LEZARD. The crocodile probably still exists in the Nahal or Zerqa, S. of Mount Carmel, called by Pindar the Crocodile River. It is supposed to have been brought there by some Egyptian settlers. A dead crocodile was brought from there to the late Rev. J. Zeller of Nazareth. Herr Schumacher reports that he saw one there, and quite recently a number of crocodiles' eggs were brought from this river and sold in Jerusalem. A stuffed specimen is in the P.E.F. museum, London.

E. W. G. MANTERMAN.

CROSS.—The cross in its literal sense is dealt with under CRUCIFICATION, but there are certain spiritual uses of the word in the NT that call for separate consideration. (1) It is a symbol of self-sacrifice.—According to the Gospels, James the Just, on at least three occasions, affirmed the necessity for those who would follow Him of taking up the cross (Mt 10:38; Mk 8:34=Mt 16:24=Lk 9:23; [Mk 10:34 only in AV; Lk 14:27]). The words imply a prophetic anticipation of His own experience in Galley, but even although on Christ's earliest use of them this special application was hidden from His disciples (cf. Mt 16:20-21), the figure of bearing one's cross would convey properly an edge or weight to the 'crown of thorns' or 'martyr's crown.' In Galilee, this word had been crucified after the rebellion under Judas the Gaulonite (Jos. Ant. xvi. 10, B. ii. v. 2); in Jerusalem, as we see from the execution of two robbers side by side with Jesus, a crucifixion must have been an ordinary incident of the administration of Roman law. And as it was usual to compel a crucifer to carry to the place of execution the transverse beam (patibulum) of his own cross, Christ's figure would have a meaning as plain as it was wretched. But for the cruces, His disciples of their own free will were to take up the cross and follow Him.

(2) It is a thing of shame.—The author of Hebrews tells us how Jesus endured the cross, despising shame' (12:2). Both to the Roman and to the Jew the death of the cross was the most shameful death a man could die—to the former because reserved by Roman usage for slaves, foreigners, or desperate criminals; to the latter because it came under the curse denounced by the Jewish Law upon any one whose dead body hung upon a tree (Dt 21:2; cf. Gal 6:1). To Jew and Gentile alike this was the great 'stumbling-block of the cross' (Gal 6:1; 1 Co 1:13). And even St Paul himself regards 'the death of the cross' as the very lowest point in Christ's long pathway of humiliation (Ph 2:8).

There are certain theological uses of the word peculiar to the Pauline writings. St Paul makes the cross a summary of the gospel. Thus 'for the preaching of the gospel' in 1 Co 1:17 he substitutes in v.18 'the word of the cross,' and in v.19 he extends the preaching of Christ crucified' (cf. 2). Again in Gal 6:2 he speaks of suffering persecution 'for the cross of Christ,' where the meaning evidently is 'for the confession of faith in the Christian gospel.' And when he gleories in 'the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v.14), the cross is used, as the clauses following show, to epitomize the saving work of Jesus both for us and in us.

(4) Further, in the Pauline theology the cross is set forth as a sign of reconciliation. It is through the blood of his cross' that Christ has effected a reconciliation between God and man (Col 1:20). He took out of the way the bond written in ordinances that were against us, nailing it to the cross' (Gal 2:19). It is 'through the cross' that He has reconciled the Gentile and the Jew, abolishing that 'law of commandments' which rose between them like a middle wall of partition (Eph 2:14-15); there are glimpses of a still wider reconciliation accomplished by Jesus through his cross—"a reconciliation of all things unto God the Father, whether they be things upon the earth or things in the heavens' (Col 1:20; cf. Eph 1:10).

(5) Once more, the cross is to St Paul the symbol of a mystical union with Christ Himself. In the great figure of the Gospels (Mt 10:38) cross-bearing stands for the imitation of Christ. St Paul goes deeper, and sees in the cross made by Christ from which the angel springs a possession of the indwelling life of Christ (Gal 2:20). The old man is crucified (Ro 6:6), that a new man may rise from the dead (cf. v.5). The flesh is crucified, with its passions and lusts (Gal 5:24), that the Christian may live and walk by the Spirit (v.25). Yet this mysticism of the cross never causes the Apostle to lose sight of the cross as the means of an objective redemption. On the contrary, he regards the two as inseparably connected. In the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, does so because through it (a) the world—the sphere of external ordinances—is crucified unto him; and (b) he himself is crucified unto the world (Gal 6:14).

CROW occurs once in Apoc. (Bar 68), where the helplessness of idols is illustrated by the remark that 'they are as crows between heaven and earth.' See also RAVEN.

CROWN.—1. In the OT.—The word represents several Heb. terms with distinct meanings. (1) שׁעֵר, proper noun 'mark of separation or consecration' (cf. 2Sa 15:38; Jer 13:18, 25; 15:10). Originally it was not more than a fillet to confine hair that was worn long (W. R. Smith, RSP p.483). It is used of the crown set upon the forehead of the high priest (Ex 29:9 etc.), a plate of pure gold, engraved with the engraving 'Holofernes,' and also of the crown worn by Heb. kings (2S 14:11; 2K 11:18). In both cases it was the symbol of consecration. (2) נֵצֶר, properly 'mark of separation or consecration' (I. e., 'nazar' to separate, consecrate'; whence נֵצֶרֹת—'Nazirite'). Originally it was no more than a fillet to confine hair that was worn long (W. R. Smith, RSP p.483). It is used of the crown set upon the forehead of the high priest (Ex 29:9 etc.), a plate of pure gold, engraved with the engraving 'Holofernes,' and also of the crown worn by Heb. kings (2S 14:11; 2K 11:18). In both cases it was the symbol of consecration. (3) קֶתֶר, similar in meaning to (2) but without the idea of consecration, is used in Est. (1:19; 2:6) to denote the diadem of a Persian king or queen. (4) אָדוֹת, the word that is most frequent and of the most general significance. It is applied to the crown worn by kings, whether Jewish (2S 12:30 etc.) or foreign (1Ch 23:5; Est 8:1 cf. 9:1), to the wreath worn at banquets (Is 62:3, Ezk 23:26); but also in a fig. sense, as when, e. g. a virtuous woman is called her husband's crown (Pr 12:4), or Mary head the crown of old age (16:16); and the crown of the of the God people (Is 28:5). (5) גְּדוֹדָה is the crown or top of the head, as in the expression 'from the sole of his foot even unto his crown' (Job 2:3); (6) Gn 49:10, Dt 32:38—'moulding.' (7) נֵצֶר, correspond to) in Pr 14:18; נֵצֶר (corresponding to (2) above) is found in Ps 65:103, Cs 3:3, Is 23:17, kathar (corresp. to (3)) in Pr 14:18, 37:5, 21:12 (corresponding to (2)) in Nah 1:7.

2. In the NT.—In AV 'crown' represents two Gr. words: (1) stephanos (whence stephanō, 'to crown'); (2) diadēma; (3) diadem); the former being the badge of merit or victory, the latter (found only in Rev 12:19 19:18) the diadem distinction, the distinction noted observed in LXX, where (2) in each case rendered 'diadem.' The stephanos (properly 'wreath'=Lat. corona) was the garland given as a prize to the victors in the games (1 Co 9:24; cf. 2 Ti 2:5). It is the word applied to our Lord's 'crown of thorns' (Mt 27:29, Mk 15:17, Jn 19:2). It is used figuratively of the 'crown of righteousness' (2Ti 4:8; 1Re 5:9), 'of life' (1Co 15:19), 'glory' (11V 5). St Paul applies it to his converts as being his joy and reward (Ph 4:1 Ti 2:24); and in Rev. it is 169 employed in various symbolical connexions (4. 10 69 97 120 144).

J. C. LAMBERT.

CRUCIFIXION.—1. Its nature.—Crucifixion denotes a form of execution in which the condemned person was affixed in one way or another to a cross (Lat. cruc and their cruces). The Gr. term rendered 'cross' in the Eng. NT is σταυρος (staurōs = 'crucify'), which has a wider application than we ordinarily give to 'cross,' being used of a single stake or beam as well as of a cross composed of two beams. The crucifixion of living persons does not meet us on OT ground (unless it be in Ezr 6:9; see RV), though death by hanging does (Est 7:9). The σταυρος of LXX here renders the Heb. תַּלָּח — 'title' — a projecting peg (seide) astride of which the victim was intended to sit, thereby leaving the straight arms and hands, which might otherwise have been torn away from the nails. Finally the feet were fastened to the lower part of the upright, either with nails (Lk 23:33) or cords.

The cross was not a lofty erection — much lower than it is usually represented in Christian art (cf. Mt 27:37). Hanging thus quite near the ground, Jesus, in the midst of the last agonies, was all the time humbled, sometimes exposed to the physical tortures and mental sufferings of the crucified by giving him a stultifying draught. This was offered to Jesus before He was nailed to the cross; but He refused to take it (Mt 27:38). He would drink every drop of the cup that His Father had given Him, and go on to death with an unclouded consciousness.

2. Its origin and use.—The origin of crucifixion is traced to the Phoenicians, from whom it passed to many other nations, including the Greeks and Romans. Among the latter it was exceedingly common, but was confined almost exclusively to the punishment of slaves, foreigners, or criminals of the lowest class, being regarded as inconsistent with the dignity of any Roman citizen (cf. Cic. in Verr. i. 5. v. 61. 66). This explains why, as tradition affirms, St. Paul was beheaded, while St. Peter and other Apostles, like the Master Himself, were put to death on the cross.

3. Forms of the cross.—The primitive form was the crux simplex—a single post set upright in the earth, to which the victim was fastened; or a sharp stake on which the victim was impaled. The Roman cross was more elaborate, consisting of two beams, which, however, might be put together in different ways. Three shapes are distinguished: (1) The crux commissa (T), shaped like a capital T, and commonly called St. Andrew's cross; (2) the crux immissa (+), the form with which we are most familiar; (3) the crux decussata (X), shaped like the letter X, and known as St. Andrew's cross.

Early Christian tradition affirms that it was on (2) that Jesus died (e.g. Iren. Hist. ii. 24 § 4; Justin, Trypho, 91); and this is confirmed by the statements of the Gospel as to the 'title' that was set above His head (Mt 27:36, Mk 15:27, Lk 23:38, Jn 19:19).

4. Method and accompaniments of crucifixion.—These are very fully illustrated in the Gospel narratives of the death of Jesus, to which we shall now especially refer. Immediately after being condemned to the cross, a prisoner was brutally scourged. [In the case of Jesus the scourging appears to have taken place before His condemnation (Jn 19:1), and to have been intended by Pilate as a compromise with the Jews between the death sentence and a verdict of acquittal (Lk 23:19).] The cross-beam (patibulum), not the whole cross, was then laid on his shoulders, and borne by him to the place of execution, while its titulus (Jn 19:19, Gr. τίτλος, Eng. 'title') or tablet of accusation hung around his neck, or was carried before him by a herald. If it was only the potibulum that Jesus carried, the probable failure of His strength by the way, leading to the incident of the Roman (Mt 27:38), must be attributed to the weight of His burden, but to sheer physical exhaustion aggravated by loss of blood through scourging, as well as to the anguish that pressed upon His soul.

Arrived at the place of execution, which both with the Romans and the Jews was outside of the city (see art. GOLGOTHA), the condemned was stripped of his clothing but he was then detailed to carry out the sentence, and immediately appropriated it as their lawful booty (Mt 27:38). He was then laid on the ground, the cross-beam was thrust beneath his shoulders, and his hands were fastened to the extremities, sometimes with cords, but more usually, as in the case of Jesus (Jn 19:22, Lk 23:33, cf. Col 2:16), with nails. The beam was next raised into position and securely fixed to the upright already planted in the ground. On the upright was a projecting peg (seide) astride of which the victim was intended to sit, thereby leaving the straight arms and hands, which might otherwise have been torn away from the nails. Finally the feet were fastened to the lower part of the upright, either with nails (Lk 23:33) or cords.

The cross was not a lofty erection — much lower than it is usually represented in Christian art (cf. Mt 27:37). Hanging thus quite near the ground, Jesus, in the midst of the last agonies, was all the time humbled, sometimes exposed to the physical tortures and mental sufferings of the crucified by giving him a stultifying draught. This was offered to Jesus before He was nailed to the cross; but He refused to take it (Mt 27:38). He would drink every drop of the cup that His Father had given Him, and go on to death with an unclouded consciousness. But for this we could hardly have had those 'Seven Words from the Cross' which come to us like the glorious rays that shoot from a sun sinking in awful splendour.

In crucifixion the pains of death were protracted—sometimes for days. Even when the victims were nailed and not merely tied to the cross, it was hunger and exhaustion, not loss of blood, that was the direct cause of death. Sometimes an end was put to their sufferings by the crucifragium — the breaking of their legs by hammer-strokes. It is not likely that in ordinary circumstances the Jews would induce a Roman governor to pay any attention to the law of Dt 21:23. But, as the day following our Lord's crucifixion was not only a Sabbath, but the Sabbath of Passover week, Pilate was persuaded to give orders that Jesus and the robbers crucified with Him should be raised (Lk 23:46, Jn 19:40). The soldiers broke the legs of the robbers first, but when they came to Jesus they found that He was already dead. One of them, either in sheer brutality or to make sure of His death, ran a spear into His side. The blood and water that gushed out (Jn 19:34, cf. 1 Jn 5:6) have been held by some medical authorities to support the opinion that the crucified Son of God died of a broken heart. His death being certified, Joseph of Arimathea, who had begged the body from Pilate, removed it from the cross and laid it in his own sepulchre (Mt 27:56). J. C. LAMBERT.

CRUELTY.—The word 'cruelty' has nearly disappeared from our Bibles. The RV has introduced 'rigour' and 'violence' in its stead. However, many instances of cruelty remain in the OT records, and some of them seem to have the sanction of Scripture. Such passages as Dt 20:16, Jos 6:19, 23; 13:12 no longer trouble the devout student of the Bible as they once did. He now recognizes the fact that in the Bible we have a faithful record of the slow evolution of spiritual ideals, and that the revelation of the NT brands as un-Christian and inhuman many things that were written by the ancient scribes and some things that were done by ancient saints. The spirit of Elijah may not be the spirit of Christ (Lk 9:54); and 'un-Christian' kindness is the law of the Christian life.

D. A. HAYES.

CRUSE.—See HOUSE, § 9.

CUB.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

CUB in Ezk 30:5 is almost certainly a corruption of LIVY (i.e. Libya), as was read by LXX. The 'Libya' of AV is a mistranslation of a Hebrew word (Nah 3:9, where Lybiams are mentioned along with Cush (Ethiopia), Egypt, and Puth, as here; also 2 Ch 12:16).
CUBIT

CUBIT.—See Weights and Measures.

CUCKOW (shaackle, Lv 11:9, Dt 14:2, RV 'seamew,' following LXX).—Although cuckoos are common in Palestine, and their voices may be heard all over the land in the spring, yet there is good reason for regarding this translation. The Heb. root implies 'leaness,' and the 'unclean' bird referred to must have been some kind of gull. E. W. G. Masterman.

CUCUMBERS.—Two varieties of cucumber are very common in Palestine. The Cucumis sativus (Arab. khýdr), a smooth-skinned, whitish cucumber of delicate flavour, is a prime favourite with the Arabs. It is cool and juicy, but for cultivation requires abundant water. The second (C. chate, Arab. [in Jerusalem] jagqéz, [in Syria] gîthîbah) is a long slender cucumber, less juicy than the former. The reference in Nu 11:9 is probably to the latter, which is an Egyptian plant. The 'lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (Is 19:16) is the rough booth erected by the owner, raised, as a rule, high up, poles, from which he may keep guard over his ripening vegetables. When the harvest is over, the 'lodge' is not taken down but is allowed to drop to pieces. It is a dreary ruin of poles and dried branches during more than half the year. E. W. G. Masterman.

CUM.—See Talitha Cumi.

CUMMIN.—The seed of an umbelliferous plant, the Cuminum cyminum (syriacum), widely cultivated in and around Palestine. It is used to flavour dishes, and, more particularly, bread; in flavour and appearance it resembles caraway; it has long been credited with medicinal properties; it certainly is a carminative. It is even now beaten out with rods (Is 28:25). Tithes of cummin were paid by the Jews (Mt 23:23).

CUN.—See Berithoth.

CUNNING.—As a subst. 'cunning' in AV means either skill or knowledge; as an adj. either skilful or wise (we cannot say knowing, for that adj. has also degenerated). It is the pres. participle of the Anglo-Saxon verb cunning, which meant both 'to know' and 'to be able.' In the Preface to the Wyclifite version of 1888 we read of the Holy Sprit, author of all wisdom and cunninge and truth.

CUP.—1. In OT the rendering of various words, the precise distinction between which, either as to form or use, is unknown to us. The usual word is קְס (kós, the ordinary drinking-vessel of rich (Gn 40:9, 14) and poor (2 S 1:12) alike, the material of which varied, no doubt, with the rank and wealth of the owner. Joseph's dividing cup (גֶּבֶל, Gn 42:24) was of silver, and, we may infer, of elaborate workmanship, since the same word is used for the bowl (AV) or cups (RV), i.e. the flower-shaped ornamentation, on the candlestick of the Tabernacle. That the גֶּבֶל was larger than the קְס is clear from Jer 39:6. The קָסָר of 1 Ch 23:17 were more probably flagons, as RV in Ex 25:25 37:26 (but Nu 4:4 RV 'cups'). The עָגוֹל (Is 22:24) was rather a basin, as Ex 24, than a cup (EV).

In NT ποτήριον is the corresponding name of the ordinary drinking-vessel (water Mt 10:8 etc., wine 25:23 etc.). The 'cup of blessing' (1 Co 10:16a) is so named from the קְס הָבָרְדֶּקְקַה of the Jewish Passover (wh. see. also Eucharist).

2. The word 'cup' has received an extended figurative application in both OT and NT. (a) As in various other literatures, 'cup' stands, esp. in Psalms, for the happy fortune or experience of one's earthly lot, mankind being thought of as receiving this lot from the hand of God, as the guest receives the wine-cup from the hand of his host (Ps 16:5 23:5 73:12 etc.). But also, conversely, for the bitter lot of the wicked, Ps 114 (cf (c) below), and in particular for the sufferings of Jesus Christ, Mt 20:22, Mk 14:28, Lk 22:42, 19:28. (b) Another figure (the 'cup of salvation' (lit. 'of deliverances'), Ps 16:1. The reference is to the wine of the thank-offerings, part of the ritual of which was the festal meal before J (cf. vss. 13f.). (c) By a still bolder figure the punitive wrath of the offended Deity is spoken of as a cup which the guilty, Israelites and heathen alike, must drain to the dregs. So Jer 25:15 (the wine-cup of fury), Ezk 23:28-34, Is 51:17 ('the cup of trembling,' RV 'staggering'), Zec 12:11 (RV 'cup of reeling'), Ps 75:4, Rev 14:18, 16:18, for all which see the commentaries. (d) Lastly, we have 'the cup of consolation' offered to the mourners after the funeral rites, Jer 16 (cf. Pr 31:11). The holder of this office was brought into confidential relations with the king, and must have been thoroughly trustworthy, as part of his duty was to guard against poison in the king's cup. In some cases he was required to taste the wine before presenting it. The position of Nehemiah as cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus was evidently high. Herodotus (i1. 34) speaks of the office at the court of Campylus, king of Persia, as 'an honour of no small account,' and the narrative of Nehemiah shows the high esteem of the king, who is so solicitous for his welfare that he asks the cause of his sadness (2). The cupbearers among the officers of king Solomon's household (1 K 10:10) impressed the queen of Sheba, and they are mentioned among other indications of the grandeur of his court, which was modelled upon courts of other Oriental kings.

CUPBOARD (1 Mac 15:32)—A sideboard used for the display of gold and silver plate. This is the earliest meaning of 'cupboard'; cf. Gesenius (1922), 'her mistress ... set all her plate on the cubboorde for shew.'

CURSE.—See Ban and Excommunication.

CURTAIN.—See Tabernacle.

CUSH in OT designates Ethiopia, and is the only name used there for that region. It is the same as the Egyptian Kekh or Kesh. Broadly speaking, it answers to the modern Nubia. More specifically, the Egyptian Kekh extended southwards from the first Cataract at Syene (Ezk 29:11), and in the periods of widest extension of the empire it embraced a portion of the Sudan. It was conquered and annexed by Egypt under the 12th Dynasty (c. 2000 B.C.) and remained nominally a subject country. After the decline of the 22nd (Libyan) Dynasty, the Cushites became powerful and gradually encroached on northern Egypt, so that at length an Ethiopian dynasty was established (the 25th, 729-663), which was overthrown by the Assyrians. Within this period falls the attempt of Tirhakah, king of Cush, to defeat Sennacherib of Assyria in Palestine (2 K 19). In Gn 10:6 Cush is a son of Ham, though his descendants as given in v.7 are mostly Arabian. Surprising also is the statement in 2 Ch 14:3 that Zerah the Cushite invaded Judah in the days of Ass, at a time when the Cushites had no power in Egypt. An attempt has been made to solve these and the assumption of a second Cush in Arabia (cf. 2 Ch 21:14). Instructive references to the Cushite country and people are found in Am 9, Is 18, Jer 13, 15. Cushites were frequent in Palestine, probably descendents of slaves; see 2 S 12:40, Jer 36:8 58:8. These were, however, possibly Arabian Cushites. For the explanation of the Cush of Gn 10:6, and possibly of 29, see Coss.Mans. J. F. McCurdy.

CUSH as a personal name occurs only in the title of Pr. He is described as a Benjamite and was probably a follower of Saul who opposed David.

CUSHAN (Hb ḥāz) = Arabian (?) Cush (wh. see).

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.—King of Mesopotamia, or CUSHI, CUSHITE

Aram-naharaim, first of the oppressors of Israel, from whom Othoniel, son of Kenaz, delivered them after eight years (Jg 5:18, 19). It has been conjectured that he was the name of the Mifann, whose territory once covered the district between the Euphrates and Habor, or that ‘Aram’ is a mistrake for Bâam, ‘Rishahhaim for Rech-hottâ’, ‘the family of the Tohattâ’. The name has not yet received any monumental explanation, and its nationality is unknown. C. H. W. JOnHS.

CUSHI, CUSHITE.—The word CÛSHI occurs in the article in Nu 12', 2 S 18'; without the article in Jer 364, Zeph 11'. With the article it is probably merely an expression of nationality, ‘the Cushite’ (see CUSA). It was looked upon as a disgrace that Moses should have married a Cushite. 2. Without the article the word is used merely as a proper name, which is borne by (1) the great-grandfather of Jehudi, the latter one of Jehokâm’s courtiers (Jer 364); (2) the father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 11).

CUSHION.—See Pillow.

CUSTOM(S). (Mt 17', Ro 197) ‘receipt of custom’ (Mt 9', Mk 2', Lk 5').—This is to be carefully distinguished from ‘tribute’ (wh. see). The customs were paid on the values of goods, in Galilee and Perea to the Herods, but in the Roman province of Judaea to the procurator agent of the Roman government. The ‘receipt of custom’ was the collector’s office. A. SOUTTER.

CUTH, CUTHAH.—One of the cities from which Sargon brought colonists to take the place of the Israelites whom he had deported from Samaria, B.C. 722 (2 K 17'. 28). These colonists intermingled with the Israelite inhabitants who were left by Sargon; and their descendants, the Samaritans, were in consequence termed by the Jews ‘Cuthâans.’ According to the old Arabic geographers, Cuthah was situated not far from Babylon. This view is borne out by the Assyrian inscriptions, from which we learn that Kûtu (or Kûstæ) was a city of Middle-Babylonia. It has now been identified with the modern Tell Erhâd-din N.E. of Babylon. Shores remains of the temple of Nergal (cf. v.9) have been discovered.

CUTHA (1 Es 57).—His sons were among the Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel.

CUTTING OFF FROM THE PEOPLE.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 11.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.—This expression occurs only in Lv 19'. 21'. The former passage runs thus: ‘Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor scar-town, nor mar yourselves in their de-positions, nor cause the flesh of your bodies to hang, for the dead, lest ye defile yourselves’ in the sight of your Lord. The same prohibition otherwise expressed in the original, is found in the earlier Deuteronomistic legislation (Dt 14'). The reference is to the practice, not confined to the Hebrews or even to their Scimitic kinsfolk, of marking incisions in the face, hands (Jer 489), and other parts of the body to the effusion of blood, as part of the rites of mourning for the dead (see MÀRâK, § 4), and by a natural transition, to which the wearing of sackcloth forms a parallel, in times of national calamity. The custom is referred to without condemnation by the pre-Deuteronomistic prophets, see Hos 7' (corrected text, as RvM), and esp. Jer 10'. 41'.

The underlining motive of this practice and the reasons for its legislative prohibition have been variously stated. It may be regarded as certain, however, that the practice had its root in primitive animistic conceptions regarding the spirits of the departed. The object in view may have been either to disfigure the living that they should be unrecognizable by the malignant spirits of the dead, or to make the body, by means of the effusion of blood—which originally, perhaps, was brought into contact with the corpse—to maintain or renew the bond of union between the living and the dead.

CYPRUS.—The explanation just given is confirmed by the allied practice, springing from similar motives, of shaving off the whole (Ezk 449, or part of the beard in token of mourning (Is 15' 229, Ezek 71', Am 8' etc.). Both practices, the incisions and the shaving, are named together in the legislative passages which have cited ‘bodily disfigurement’ (Jer 48'). The name is also used (as in Ezek) for the great-grandfather of Jehudi, the latter one of Jehokâm’s courtiers (Jer 36'; (2) the father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 11').

CYPRESS.—(1) The ‘cypress’ (Is 44'), Rv ‘holm oak’ stands for some tree with very hard wood, the meaning of the root (in Arabic) being to be hard. ‘Holm oak’ is the rendering of the oldest Latin translation. This is the Quercus deëa, a tree now rare W. of the Jordan, but still found in Gilead and Bashan; (2) ‘cypress’ (Is 41' RvM). Both AV and RV have ‘box tree’ (wh. see); (3) ‘beersh (2 S 6' RvM). Both AV and RV have ‘fir wood’ (see also Is 55'). In Palestine to-day cypress are extensively planted, especially in cemeteries. E. W. G. MASkERMAN.

CYRUS.—An island in the N.E. corner of the Levant, within sight of the Syrian and Cilician coasts. Its greatest length is 140 miles, breadth 60 miles. In configuration it consists of a long plain shut in on the N. and the S.W. by mountain ranges. In the OT the name Cyprus does not occur, but undoubtedly the island is referred to under the name Kittim, which is the same as the name of the Phoenician town Kition, now Larnaca. In Gn 10' Kittim is spoken of as a son of Javan, together with Tarshish and Eliashah. This probably implies that the earliest population of Cyprus was akin to the pre-Hellenic population of Greece. In Ezek 27' the isles of Kittim are spoken of as supplying Tyre with boxwood. But the name Kittim is used also of the West generally, as in Dn 11' of the Romans (cf. Nu 24').

The early importance of Cyprus was due to its forests and its copper. Its copper has long ago been exhausted, and owing to neglect its forests have perished. But through the ‘bronze age,’ which for Cyprus corresponded roughly to b.c. 2000 to b.c. 1000, its copper was exported not only to Syria but to Egypt and to Europe. Mixed with the tin brought by Tyrians and Phoenicians from the Hapares, and the West, it provided the metal from which both weapons and ornaments were made. Hence the name copper is derived from Cyprus. When the iron age began, this metal also was obtained from Cyprus.
CYPUS

Doubtless the copper was first exported by Phoenicians, who early founded Kiton and other towns in Cyprus, and introduced the worship of the Syrian Aphroditus, who became known as the 'Cyprian goddess'.

The Greeks themselves were not long behind the Phoenicians in the island.—the settlers were doubtless Peloponnesians displaced by the Dorian invasions, and they used what the Greeks called the Arcadian dialect. They brought with them the Egyptian civilization, as relics found in the island prove conclusively. Paphos, Soil, Salamis were Greek settlements, the last being named from the island off the coast of Mica. But the Greeks soon combined with the Phoenicians. They adopted what was probably in origin a Hittite alphabet, in which every syllable is represented by a separate sign, and this lasted till the 4th century.

Cyprus did not develop as an independent power. Before B.C. 1400 it was made tributary to Egypt. About B.C. 1000 it was given to Phoenicia; and with Phoenicia it passed to the hands of Sargon, the Assyrian, about B.C. 700. Sargon left an inscription at Kiton, and later Assyrian kings record tribute received from Cyprus. About B.C. 500 Amasis of Egypt reduced the island, and it passed with Egypt to Cambyses of Persia in B.C. 522. It took part in the Ionian revolt of B.C. 501, but was quickly reduced, and supplied Xerxes with a fleet in B.C. 480. Then it made repeated attempts to secure the island, but the mixed population prevented any strong Hellenic movement, and it then passed definitely into Greek hands by submission to Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus in B.C. 333. On the division of his empire it fell to the Ptolemies of Egypt, until it was annexed by Rome in B.C. 57. It was made a separate province after the battle of Actium in B.C. 31, becoming at first an 'imperial' province, but later under the Ptolemies as a senatorion, as was the case that in B.C. 131. Luke rightly describes the governor as a proconsul.

Jews first settled in Cyprus under the Ptolemies, and their numbers there were considerable before the time of the Apostles. Barnabas is described as a Cypriot Jew, and he and St. Paul started from Antioch on the first missionary journey; they first passed through Cyprus (Acts 13:38). They landed at Salamis, then a Greek port flourishing with Syrian trade, now deserted—wits its harbour silted up—three miles from Famagusta. Here they preached in the synagogue, where the message was probably not entirely new (Acts 11:18), and then journeyed through 'the whole island' (RV) to New Paphos in the W.—a three or four days' journey, even if they reached nowhere on the way. New Paphos, like Old Paphos, was the seat of the worship of Aphroditus (see Paphos), and was at this time the Roman capital. (For the incidents connected with the proconsul and the magus, see Acts 13:38.)

Besides Barnabas we have mention of Mnason, an 'original convert,' as coming from Cyprus (Acts 21:18), but we have no knowledge of how the Church grew in the island until it included 15 bishops. The Jews of Cyprus took part in the great rising of their race which took place in a.d. 117 (when Trajan was busy with Parthia), and they are said to have massacred 240,000 of the Gentile population. The revolt was suppressed without mercy, and all Jews were expelled from the island.

Under the Byzantine emperors Cyprus suffered much from their misrule, and from the Saracens. Seized in 1191 by Richard Coeur de Lion, it was sold to the Knights Templar. From 1479 to 1567 it was held by the Venetians. After three centuries of Turkish rule it passed under British rule in 1878, by a convention which still requires it to pay tribute to the Sultan. But it has scarce recovered prosperity. Various causes have lessened the rainfall, it is troubled with malaria, and its natural resources were long ago worked out and its forests destroyed. There are no good roads, and communciation is kept up by bullock-carts and mules. Its best ports (Larnaca and Limasol) are open roadsteads.

CYREN. —Capital of Libya (Tripoli) in N. Africa (Ac 21:4), the home of numerous Jews who with the 'Libertines' (freedmen from Rome?) and Alexandrians had a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem (Ac 6:9). Many of these became Christians, as Simon and his sons (doubtless) Mk 15:18, Lucius, Ac 13:1, and those in Ac 11:19, who preached to the 'Greeks' (v.l. 'Hellenists').

CYRINUS.—See Cyreneus.

CYRUS.—Referred to as 'king of the Persians,' 2 Th 2:6, Ezr 1:1, Dan 6:1, 'king of Babylon,' Ezr 6:2. He is regarded in Is 40-48 as specially destined by Jahweh to redeem Israel and execute Divine judgment upon Babylon, to set free the captives and restore Jerusalem and its Temple. He had not known Jahweh before his call, but carried out his mission in Jahweh's name, and is styled 'the friend of Jahweh' and 'Jahweh's anointed.' The Cyrus of whom these high expectations were formed was the founder of the Persian Empire (v.l. 'a Persian'), but his father was also called Cyrus (Kursh, Bab. Kurbag, Heb. Kuresh). He was an Aryan and descended from Achemenes (Hakhamanish). At first he was king of Persia and Anshan or Anzan, an Elamite province, capital at Susa (Shushan), and vassal of Meda. The contemporary cuneiform inscriptions are—(1) a cylinder inscription of Nabonidus, last king of Babylon, from Sippara; (2) an annalistic tablet of Cyrus written shortly after his conquest of Babylon; (3) a proclamation of Cyrus of the same date. Nabonidus' account was written soon after Cyrus, 'a petty vassal' of Astyages (Isuvehag), king of the Medes, his small army had conquered Astyages (n.c. 549). This led to the withdrawal of the Manda from Harran, and left Nabonidus free to restore the temple of Sin there. Cyrus soon took his own master of the Median who was faced by an alliance of Croesus, king of Lydia, Nabonidus of Babylon, and Assyria of Egypt. On the fall of Croesus, Cyrus turned to Babylon, where Nabonidus had long continued his rule by his neglect of the sacred feasts and worship of Marduk. Belshazzar, his son, defended the land, but was defeated at Opis, and on 14th Tamuz, Sippara fell 'without fighting.' On the 16th, Gobryas (Gubaru, Ugarun) entered Babylon without resistance, and Cyrus followed on the 3rd of Marcheshvan, b.c. 539-8, and was received, according to his own account, by all classes, especially by priests and nobles, as a liberator. He claims to have restored to their homes the exiles from Babylonia and their gods, and prays that these gods may daily intercede for him with Marduk and Nahu, whose worshipper he professes to be. Cyrus reigned about nine years from this time, and in the last year banded over the sovereignty of Babylon to his son Cambyses.

The career of Cyrus so impressed the popular imagination, that the classical writers adorn his story with a variety of legendary incidents for which no confirmation can be produced. The policy which Cyrus pursued towards the Jews is variously estimated, but all accounts agree in stating that the Temple was started by him, and in claiming him as a worshopper of Jahweh.

DABBESHEH.—A town in the westward border of Zebulun (Jos 19:11), Identified with Dabbeh, E. of 'Acre.'

DABERATH.—A city said in Jos 18:26 to be a Levitical city in Issachar. Probably it was on the border between the two tribes. It has been identified with Dabareh at the foot of Tabor. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DABBUR.—One of the five scribes who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14:24).

DACUBI, 1 Es 5:2—Kukub, Ezr 2:4, Neh 7:2. DACUB.—See AKBUR, ARMS, § 1 (c).

DAGON.—A god whose worship was general among the Philistines (at Gaza, Jg 16:21, 1 Mac 10:24, 21:11; at Ashkelon, 1 S 5:2; prob. at Beth-dagon [wh. see], which name may have been under Philistine rule]. Indeed, the name Baal-dagon inscribed in Phoenician characters upon a cylinder now in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, and the modern place-name Beit Dajan (S.E. of Nazareth) indicate an existence of Dagon in Phoenicia and Canaan. An endeavour to identify the god with Atargatis (wh. see) is responsible for the explanation of the name as a diminutive (term of endearment) of dag (wh. see) and the Bible, the Luxor, Rel. of Bab. and Assy. (Index).

DIAN, 1 Es 5:4—Rezin, Ezr 2:4, Neh 7:4. The form in 1 Es is due to confusion of Heb. r and l.

DALETH.—Fourth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 19th Psalm to designate the 4th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

DALMANUTHA.—Hither Christ sailed after feeding the four thousand (Mk 8:19). In Mt 15:26 Magnes is substituted. No satisfactory conjecture has yet been offered as to the explanation of either name, or the identification of either place. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DAMATIA.—A mountainous district on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea. More exactly used, it is the southern half of the Roman province Illyricum (wh. see). The writer of the Second Epistle to Timothy makes Thus journey there (2 Ti 4:17). A. W. S. FRERE.

DAPHNE (Est 9:7).—The second son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

DAMARI.—A convert at Athens (Ac 17:9). As women of the upper classes were kept more in the background there than in Macedonia or Asia Minor, she was probably not of noble birth (cf. 17:12). The name is perhaps a corruption of Damalis, 'a hoifer.' The Besan MS omits it.

DAMASCUS.—1. Situation, etc.—The chief city of N. Syria, situated in lat. 33° 30' N. and long. 36° 18' E. It lies in a plain east of the Anti-Lebanon, famous for its beauty and fertility, and watered by the Barada river, the Abana; or, as Daphne (wh. see) is a vassal of that great river. The luxuriance of its gardens has long been renowned: the English traveller W. G. Browne in 1797 noted that the fruit-trees were so numerous that those which died and were cut down were sufficient to supply the town with firewood. Its population is estimated at from 150,000 to 220,000. It derives its modern importance from local manufactures (woodwork, furniture, artistic metal and textile work), from its situation and convenience as a market for the desert cereals, and from its religious significance as the terminus of the annual Syrian pilgrim caravan to Mecca. Railways run from Damascus to Hals, Beyrut, and Nazertab, and the important line to Mecca, begun in 1901, is expected to be finished in 1903. In the tribute lists of Thothmes IV. as Damascene, in his appreciation of the sensuous beauty of the Sodomite, has not forgotten Damascus; the nose of the Shundamite is compared to the 'tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus' (Is 7:8).

The history of Damascus begins in remote antiquity: the time of its foundation is quite unknown; but that a settlement should have been founded in so desirable a locality was inevitable from the very beginning of human association. It was probably already an ancient city at the time of the Tell el-Amarna tablets, on which we meet with its name more than once. It also appears in the tribute lists of Thothmes IV. as Damascene.

2. OF references.—In the Biblical history we first meet with the name of Damascus as a territorial indication in defining the line of Abram's pursuit of the five kings (Gen 14:3). In On 15:19 the name of Abram's brother is given as the MT render Damascus (wh. see) as a name probably corrupt. It is explained in the Aram., Targum, and Syr. as Eliezer the Damascene, which gives sense, though it presupposes a most improbable corruption in the Hebrew text. We must therefore pass this passage by with the remark that it is not unlikely that Abram's servant was a native of Damascus. We hear nothing more of Damascus till 2 S 5:8, 10; 1 K 9:15, 2 Ch 11:26; the city was in the time of Solomon, and became a city of great importance, as a capital and a centre of commercial importance, till its final destruction by the Persians in 528 B.C. As a capital city it was long the seat of the Persian satraps, and later of the Roman governors; under Titus it suffered the ruin which has left nothing of the city but its walls, a few, modern buildings, and a few ancient columns. It was attacked by a Persian army in 249 B.C. under Artaxerxes III. who was defeated and killed near Damascus, the latter being transported to Babylon. The Romans, under Cæsar, and later under Titus, destroyed the city, which is now known as Dama, a Roman city on the site of the old. In 70 A.D. Titus is said to have destroyed the city, and the Temple, and to have brought back about 220,000 of the inhabitants as captives, and to have sold the women to slavery. After this it seems to have suffered from earthquakes, and to have been plundered by the Persians, and by the Greek and Roman invaders, and to have sunk into insignificance. The name después is mentioned in 15 Sect. 29:9 (wh. see) of Ptolemy, and in 21 Sect. 29:9 (wh. see) of Pliny. It is probable that the name was changed by the Romans and by the Byzantine empire, and that the city was called Damascus, or Dama, or Daburieh. It was, however, never an important city, and was called "The land of the Flax" (wh. see). After the fall of the Romans in the 6th century, it seems to have been a district of the Omayyad emirs, and to have been inhabited by the Aramaeans. After the conquest of the Turks, it became a centre of the Druze community, and was called "The land of the Flax.""
3. NT references. — Damascus appears only in conjunction with St. Paul. Here took place his miraculous conversion (Ac 9: 22, 26) with the well-known attendant circumstances, and his escape from Areias (wh. see), the governor in Jerusalem, lying in his bed, and a basket with him, which contained the veil which hid him (Ac 9: 25, 2 Co 11: 25), and hither he returned after his Arabian retirement (Gal 1: 17).

4. Later history. — The late extra-Biblical history is very complicated. In 236 B.C. the city was surrendered to Ptolemy III., the general of Alexander the Great, and during the subsequent Greek-Egyptian wars it fell more than once into the hands of the Ptolemies. In 111 B.C., on the partition of Syria between Antiochus Grypfas and A. Cyzicenus, the latter obtained possession of the city. Its successor, Demetrius Eucrates, invaded Palestine in 88 B.C. and defeated Alexander Janneaus at Shechem. His brother, who succeeded him, was driven out by the Arabian Harithia (Areias). For a while it remained in Arab hands, then, after a temporary occupation by Tigranes, king of Armenia, it was conquered by Metellus, the Roman general. It was a city of the Decapolis. The great temple of the city was by one of the early Christian emperors—probably Theodosius—converted into a church. It is now the principal mosque of the city, but was partly destroyed by fire in 1853. Since 635 Damascus has been a Muslim city, though governed from time to time by different tribes and dynasties of that faith. It was conquered by the Seljuks in 1075. The Crusaders never succeeded in founding a permanent settlement for themselves in the city, now a very large and considerable place, with over 50,000 Christians were massacred by the Muslim population of the city. Few remains of antiquity are to be seen in the modern city, which is attractive principally for its undisturbed Oriental life and its extensive markets and bazaars. The mosque just mentioned, a medieval castle, stands on the site of the palace, the principal place of business. Of course, there are the usual traditional sites of historical events, but those are not more trustworthy at Damascus than anywhere else in Syria and Palestine.

DAMNATION. — The words ‘damn,’ ‘damnable,’ as ‘damnation’ have, through their use in the literature of theology, come to express condemnation to everlasting punishment. But in the English Bible they mean no more than is now expressed by ‘condemn’ or ‘condemnation.’ In some places a better translation than ‘condemnation’ is ‘judgment,’ as in Jn 3: 18, ‘the condemnation of sin.’ See Judgment.

DAN. — According to the popular tradition, Dan was the fifth son of Jacob, and full brother of Naphtali, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid (Gen 30: 4). Rachel, who had no children, exclaimed ‘danannì’ (‘God hath judged me’), and, therefore, he was called Dan. As is the case with so many names, this is clearly a popular etymology. It is probable that Dan was an appellation or titulary attribute of some deity whose name has not come down to us in connexion with it, or it may even be the name of a god as God was (cf. the Assyrian Ashtar-din, Ashur-din, ‘[Ashur is judge],’ Ashur-din-šamši-‘[the moon-god is judge]’ of the period of Hammurabi). Its feminine counterpart is Dinah (Jacob's daughter by Leah), which as the name of the half-sister of Dan is probably reminiscent of some related clan that early lost its identity.

Of this eponymous ancestor of the tribe tradition has preserved no details, but some of the most interesting stories of the Book of Judges tell of the exploits of the Danite Samson, who, single-handed, wrought destruction in the ranks of the Philistines. These are heroic rather than historical tales, yet suggestive of the conditions that prevailed when the tribes were establishing themselves.

P makes Dan a large tribe. With his characteristic love of large numbers he gives the fighting strength of Dan in the Wilderness census as 89,700, more than that of any other except Judah (Nu 1: 26; cf. 29, Moab census). All other data point in the opposite direction. J (Jg 18: 31) speaks of it as a ‘family’; elsewhere Dan is said to have had only one son, Shulam or Shuham (Gen 46: 20, Nu 26: 49). The tribe at first occupied the hill-country in the S. W. of Ephraim, and then attempted to spread out into the valleys of Ajalon and Sorek. That it ever reached the sea, either here or in its later northern home, is unlikely, notwithstanding the usual interpretation of Jg 17: 13, a passage which yields no wholly satisfactory meaning. (But see Moos, Judges, ad loc.).

In this region the Danites were severely pressed by the ‘Amorites = (Canaanites). The major portion were compelled to emigrate northward, where they took possession of the foot of Mt. Hermon an isolated city, Laish or Leshem, situated in a fertile tract of country (Jos 19: 7, Jg 18). This city with its unsuspecting inhabitants the Danites ruthlessly destroyed. A new city was built, to which they gave the name of Dan. In this colony there were only 600 armed men with their families. On their way thither they induced the domestic priest of an Ephraimitic, Micah, to accompany them with his sacred paraphernalia, an ephod, a gold image, and the teraphim. These were duly installed in a permanent sanctuary, in which the descendants of Moses are said to have ministered until the Captivity (Jg 18: 30). That the region round about the city of Dan South was either destroyed by its enemies, or, more likely, absorbed by the neighbouring tribes, is made probable by Jg 18, which ascribes the victory over the Danites (Jos 19: 7) to Joseph, who was to have 'Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path'; and Dt 33: 27, 'Dan is a lion's whelp,' etc. These characteristics are more applicable to a small tribe of guerilla fighters, very likely to strike a quick blow from ambush at a passing troop, than they are to the more sustained measures of warfare of a large and powerful body. See also Judges.

DANIEL. — 1. Two passages in the Book of Ezekiel (14: 20, 28), written respectively about B.C. 592 and 587, mention a certain Daniel as an extraordinarily righteous and wise man, belonging to the same class as Noah and Job, whose piety availed with God on behalf of their unworthy contemporaries. All three evidently belonged to the far-distant past: Ezekiel's readers were familiar with their history and character. Daniel, occupying the middle place, cannot be considered as the latest of them. He certainly was not a younger man than the prophet who refers to him, as the hero of the Book of Daniel would have been. For 11 114 makes the hero to have been carried into captivity in B.c. 606, a mere decade prior to Ezekiel. 2. See ANOAH.

3. A priest who accompanied Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr 8: 1, Neh 10: 9). He was head of his father's house, and traced his descent from Chamar, son of Hama, son of Simeon, son of Judah. All dates from the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes the Great (Artaxerxes Longimanus, art-dark blue, Dan), which probably rests on a corrupt Heb. text. Driver (Daniel, p. xvi.) notes that amongst his contemporaries were 'a Hananiah (Neh 10: 9), a Mishael (8), and an Azariah (10); but the coincidence is probably acci-
DANIEL, BOOK OF

DARIUS

(2) The unity of the book has been impugned by many critics, but it is now generally agreed that the question is settled by the harmony of view and consistency of plan which bind the two halves together. The text has suffered more or less in $^{108}$. It is the nature of the book to be somewhat independent of time and place; hence there are differences in style and detail.

J. TAYLOR.

DANIEL, BOOK OF.—1. Authorship and Date.—The first six chapters of this book contain a series of narratives which tell of (a) the fidelity of Daniel and his friends to their religion, and (b) the incomparable superiority of their God to the deities of Babylon. The remaining six chapters relate four visions seen by Daniel and the interpretation of them. Chs. 1-6 speak of Daniel in the third person; in 7-12 he is the speaker (yet see $^{109}$). But both parts are from the same pen, and the primed facts impression is that of an autobiography. Porphry argued against this in the 3rd cent. A.D., and it is now generally abandoned, for such reasons as the following: (1) In the Jewish Canon Dn. stands in the third division, 'the Prophets,' and it is not a work of a prophet of the 6th cent. It would have been put in the second division, 'the Prophets,' (2) Neither the man nor the book is mentioned in the list of Sir 44-50 (chap. 200); and Sir 48 seems to have been written by one who was not acquainted with the story. (3) There is no reason for believing that a collection of sacred writings, including Jer., had been formed before the reign of Darius. 606 B.C., as implied in Dn 9. (4) The Heb. of Dn. is of a later type than even that of Chronicles. The Aramaic is a West-Syrian dialect, not in use at the Bab. court in the 6th cent. More fabric was employed than was the case in the Heb. author would be familiar with at the close of the Bab. empire. In a document composed prior to the Macedonian conquest we should not have found three Greek words which are not later in use. (5) There are inaccuracies which a contemporary would have avoided. It is doubtful whether Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in B.C. 606 (10-5). The name 'Chaldeans' as designating the learned class is a later usage (29). Belshazzar was not 'the king' (59), nor was Neb. his ancestor (59-11). Darius the Mede never 'received the kingdom' (59). Xerxes did not follow Artaxerxes (119) but preceded him. (6) The relations between Syria and Egypt, from the 4th to the 2nd cents. B.C., are described with a fulness of detail which differentiates Dn 7. 11 from all OT prophecy: see the precision with which the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes is related in ch. 11; the events from 332-175 occur 16 verses after these from 175-164 take up 25; at v. 46 the lines become less definite, because this is the point at which the book was written; at v. 46 prediction begins, and the language no longer corresponds with the facts of history. There is little doubt that Dn. appeared about B.C. 166. Its object was to encourage the faithful Jews to adhere to their religion, in the assurance that God would intercede on their behalf. This was intensively true in the truth in which he believed: to him and to his readers the historical setting was a framework. Not that he invented the stories. We saw in the preceding article that the book of Daniel was separate, its authority was part of the sacred law. This was almost certainly the case with the Maccabean skill.

2. Language, Unity, theology.—(1) From 29 to 79 is in Aramaic. Four explanations have been offered: (a) This section was originally written in Aramaic, about 300, and incorporated, with additions, into the work of 166. (b) The corresponding portion of a Heb. original was lost and its place filled by an already current Aram. translation. (c) The author introduced the new material as speaking what he supposed was their language, and then continued to write it because it was more familiar than Heb. to himself and his readers. (d) The likeliest suggestion is that the entire book was Aramaic, but would not have found admission into the Canon if it had not been enclosed, so to speak, in a frame of Heb., the sacred language.

J. TAYLOR.

DANJAAN.—Job and his officers in taking the census came 'to Danjaan and round about to Zidon' (2 S 24). No such place is mentioned anywhere else in OT, and it is generally assumed that the text is corrupt. It has indeed been proposed to locate Danjaan at a ruin N. of Achzib which is said to bear the name Khan Danjan; but this identification, although accepted by Conder, has not made headway. The reference is more probably to the city of Dan which appears so frequently as the northern limit of the kingdom.

DANNAH (Jos 155).—A town of Judah mentioned next to Debir and Socoh. It was clearly in the mountains S.W. of Hebron, probably the present Adnah.

DAPHNE.—A place mentioned in 2 Mac 4th to which Onias withdrew for refuge, but from which he was decoyed by Andronicus and treacherously slain. It is the modern, Bait el-Mil ('House of Waters') about 5 miles from Antioch. Daphne was famous for its fountains, its temple in honour of Apollo and Diana, its oracle, and its right of asylum. (See Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxiii.)

DARA (1 Ch 2).—See DARRA.

DARDAA.—Mentioned with Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, and Cecele as a son of Mahol, and a proverbial type of wisdom, but yet surpassed by Solomon (1 K 4th). In 1 Ch 2 apparently the same four (Dara is probably an error for Darda) are mentioned with Zimri as sons of Zerah, the son of Judah by Tamar (Gn 38th). See also MAHOL.

DARIO.—See MONEY, § 3.

DARIUS.—1. Son of Hystaspes, king of Persia (n.c. 532-485), well known from the classical historian Herodotus, and, for the early part of his reign, from his own tri-lingual inscription on the rocks at Behistun.
DAVID

He allowed the Jews to rebuild the Temple. The prophets Haggar and Zechariah encouraged the people to go on with the work, and when Tattenai, the Persian governor of Syria, demanded their authority, they alleged a decree of Cyrus. On reference being made to Darius and the decree being found, they appeared before him, confirmed it, and ordered facilties to be afforded for the building. It was completed in the 6th year of his reign (Est 4. 5. 6, Hag 1. 2. 2, Zec 1. 7). Darius the Persian (Neh 2: 20) or Daricus Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings (c. 330-330), 1 Mac 1. 1. 'Darius' in 1 Mac 12 (AV) is an error for the Spartan 'Aratus' (wh. see). 4. 'Darius the Mede' (Dan 11), son of Ahasuerus of the Medes (9: 1), is said (in the Pers. text) to have succeeded to the kingdom of Babylon after Belshazzar's death, and to have been sixty-two years old when he received the kingdom. This account does not answer to what we know of any king called Darius. Gabryas was he who actually received the kingdom for Cyrus, entering Babylon on the 16th of Tamuz, four months before Cyrus made his triumphal entry. He too appointed governors in Babylon (cf. Dn 6), and succeeded in the Babylon, to the point of the power which resulted in the attack which resulted in Belshazzar's death. Whether Gobryas is intended, whether Darius was another name of his, or whether some mistake has crept into the text, cannot be decided without fresh evidence, it is certain that no king of Babylon called Darius succeeded Belshazzar or preceded Cyrus.

DARKNESS.—See Light.

DARKEN.—His sons were among those who returned to Jerushabai (Est 24, Neh 74); called in 1 Es 32 Lozon.

DARK SAYING.—See PARABLE (IN OT), § 1.

DARLING.—Ps 129 Deliver my darling from the power of the dog; 3917 rescue my soul from their destructions. My darling ( Heb. word (yodTah) means an only son. In the Psalms it is used poetically of the psalmist's own life, as his unique and priceless possession.

DARIUS.—See ARMS, ARMS, § 1 (b).

DATHAN.—See KORAH.

DATHEN (1 Mac 5).—A fortress in Bashan. It may perhaps be the modern Dâme in the S. border of the Lejá district, N. of Asherethor-karmaim.

DAUGHTER.—See FAMILY.

DAVID ('beloved').—The second and greatest of the kings of Israel; the youngest of the eight sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite; he belonged to the tribe of Judah. The details of his life are gathered from 1 S 16-1 K 24, 1 Ch 11-299B (besides some scattered notices in the earlier chapters of 1 Ch.), the Psalms which bear on this period, and BK. vii. of the Antiquities of Josephus, though this latter adds but little to our knowledge. It is necessary to bear in mind two points of importance in dealing with the records of the life of David: firstly, the Hebrew text is, in a number of cases, very corrupt (notably in the books of Samuel), and in not a few passages the Alexandrian (Greek) version is to be preferred; secondly, our records have been gathered together from a variety of sources, and therefore they do not present a connected whole; that they are for this reason sometimes at variance with each other stands in the natural order of things.

1. Early years.—David was a shepherd by calling, and he continued this occupation until he had reached full manhood; the courage and strength sometimes required for the protection of flocks made it clear that he was a mere youth when he first appeared upon the scene of public life (1 S 17. 2). There are altogether three different accounts of David's entry upon the stage of life.

(i) 1 S 16-19. David is here represented as having been designated by Jahweh as Saul's successor; Samuel is sent to Bethlehem to anoint him; all the seven sons of Jesse pass before the prophet, but the Spirit does not move to anoint any of them; in perplexity he asks the father if he has more children, when on a sudden the youngest is produced, and Samuel anoints him. Graphic as the story is, it strikes one as incomplete. Samuel does not even know of the existence of Jesse's youngest son. Israel is introduced, and the story of the stripping whom nobody seems to know or care about, and he is left as abruptly as he is introduced. From all we know of Israel's early heroes, a man was not raised to be a leader (not even Jephthah) unless he had first proved himself in some way to be the superior of his fellows. It was, of course, different when the monarchy had been securely established and the hereditary succession had come into vogue; though even then there were exceptions, e.g. in the case of Jehu. This was clearly so in the case of Saul, who had the reputation of being a 'mighty man of valor' (1 S 9); and in the parallel case of the anointing of one to be king while the other was still occupied taking his seat, it is a case of the man who is anointed (see 1 K 19, 2 K 9). The story, therefore, of David's anointing by Samuel strikes one as being an incomplete fragment.

(ii) 1 S 10-15. In the second account, the servants of Saul recommend that the king should send for someone who is a 'cunning player on the harp,' in order that by means of music the mental disorder from which he is suffering may be allayed. The idea is a natural one, and though the proposal, and forthwith sent for; when Saul is again attacked by the malady—said to be occasioned by 'an evil spirit from the Lord'—David plays upon the harp, and Saul 'is refreshed.' In this account David is represented as a grown man, for it is said that Saul made him his armour-bearer.

(iii) 1 S 17. The Greek version omits a large part of this account (vs. 1-3, 5, 7, 18, 19), whilst verses 17-19 have been put together from different sources. According to it, David's first appearance was on the eve of a battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. His father is in the habit of sending him to the Israelite camp with provisions for his three eldest brothers, who are among the warriors of the Israelite army; on one such occasion he finds the camp in consternation on account of the defection of a Philistine hero, the giant Goliath. This man offers to fight in single combat with any Israelite who will come out and face him, but in spite of the high reward offered by the king to any one who will slay him—namely, great riches and the king's daughter in marriage—nobody appears to answer the challenge. David gathers these details from different people in the camp, and, feeling sure of the help of Jahweh, determines to fight the giant. He communicates his purpose to Saul, who at first discourages him, but on seeing his firmness and confidence arms him and bids him go forth in the name of Jahweh. David, however, finds the armour too cumbersome, and discards it, taking instead nothing but five smooth stones and a sling. After mutual defiance, David slings one of these stones; the giant is hit, and falls down dead; David rushes up, draws the sword of the dead warrior, and cuts off his head. Thereupon panic takes hold of the Philistine host, and they flee, pursued by the Israelites, who thus gain a complete victory (see ELISHANAN).

It is worthy of note that each of these three accounts which introduce David to history connects him with just those three characteristics which subsequent ages loved to dwell upon. The first presents him as the beloved of Jahweh (cf. his name, 'beloved'); who was specially chosen, the man after God's own heart, the son of Jesse; the second presents him as the harpist, who was known in later ages as the 'sweet psalmist of Israel'; while the third, which is probably the nearest to actual history, presents him as the warrior-her, just as, in days to come, men would have pictured him whose whole reign from beginning to end was characterized by war.

David's victory over Goliath had a twofold result; firstly, the heroic deed called forth the admiration, withal fear, of all the men of Kedah for his life. The scheme of a covenant of friendship was made between the two, in token of which, and in ratification of which, Jonathan took off his apparel and armour and presented David with them. This friendship lasted till the death of Jonathan, and David's pathetic lamentation over him (2 S 14:27) points to the reality of their love. But secondly, it had the effect of arousing Saul's envy; a not wholly unnatural feeling, seeing the only rival in which David was held by the people in consequence of his victory; the adage—assuredly one of the most ancient authentic fragments of the history of the time—"Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" was not flattering to one who had, in days gone by, been Israel's foremost warrior. For the present, however, Saul could bear his feelings (1 S 19:4-6), as are evidently out of place), intending to rid himself of David in such a way that no blame would seem to attach itself to him. In fulfilment of his promise to the slayer of Goliath, he expresses his intention of giving David his daughter Michal in marriage for his services. The scheme lasts till the death of Jonathan; as David brings no dowry,—according to Hebrew custom,—Saul lays upon him conditions of a scandalous character (1 S 18:3), hoping that, in attempting to fill them, David may lose his life. The scheme fails, and David receives Michal to wife. A further attempt to be rid of David is frustrated by Jonathan (19:17), and at last Saul himself tries to kill him by throwing a javelin at him while playing on his harp; again he fails, for David nimly avoids the javelin, and escapes to his own house. Thither Saul sends men to kill him, but with the help of his wife he again escapes. David seeks refuge in the house of Ramah, a constant companion of Samuel. On Samuel's advice, apparently, he goes to Jonathan by stealth to see if there is any possibility of a reconciliation with the king; Jonathan does his best, but in vain (20:4-6), and David realizes that his life will be in danger so long as he is anywhere within reach of Saul or his emissaries.

2. David as an outlaw.—As in the case of the earlier period of David's life, the records of this second period consist of a number of fragments from different sources, not very skilfully put together. We can do no more here than enumerate brieﬂy the various localities in which David sought refuge from Saul's vindictive pursuit, pointing out at the same time the more important episodes of this outlaw life.

David ﬂees ﬁrst of all to Nob, the priestly city; his stay here is, however, of short duration, for he is seen by Doeg, one of Saul's followers, taking the sword of his late antagonist, Goliath, which was wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod, he makes for Gath, hoping to find refuge on foreign soil; but he is recognized by the Philistines, and fearing that they would take vengeance on him for killing their hero Goliath, he simulates madness (cf. Ps 54 title),—a disease which by the Oriental (even to-day by the Bedouin) is looked upon as something sacred. By this means he ﬁnds it easy enough to make his escape, and comes to the 'cave of Adullam.' Here his relations come to him, and he gathers together a band of desperadoes, who make him their captain. Finding that this kind of life is unfitted for his parents, he takes them to Mizpeh and confides them to the care of the king of Moab. On his return he is advised by the prophet Gad (doubtless because he had found out that Saul had received information of David's whereabouts) to leave the stronghold; therefore he takes refuge in the forest of Hereth. While hiding here, news is brought to him that the Philistines are fighting against Keilah; he hastens to succour the inhabitants by attacking the Philistines; these he overcomes with great slaughter, and thereupon he takes up his abode in Keilah. In the meantime Saul's spies discover the whereabouts of the fugitive, and David, fearing that the king will deliver him up to the Philistines, escapes with his followers to the kill-country in the wilderness of Ziph. A very vigorous pursuit is now undertaken by Saul, who seems determined to catch the fugitive, and the chase is carried on among the wilds of Ziph, Maon, and En-gedi. [Some portions of the narrative here seem to be told twice over with varying detail, cf. 1 S 23:11-18, with 26:15, and 24:1-20, with 26:17.] It is during the present part that Saul falls, and David becomes king of Gath. This time Achish welcomes him as an ally and gives him the city of Ziklag. David settles in Ziklag, and stays there for a year and four months (27), occupying the time by hunting against the Philistines, and making forays on the Geshurites, Amalekites, etc. At the end of this time, war again breaks out between the Israelites and the Philistines. The question arises whether David shall join with the forces of Achish against the Philistines; David himself seems willing to ﬁght on the side of the Philistines (29a), but the princes of the Philistines, rightly or wrongly, suspect treachery on his part, and at the request of Achish he returns to Ramah. It seems to David that Saul has entered here that the place has been sacked by the Amalekites, and forthwith he sets out to take revenge. This is ample and complete; part of the spoil (30a, which he acquires by murdering the elders of Judah and to his friends (30b-2), a fact which shows that there was a party favourable to him in Judah; and this was possibly the reason and justification of the mistrust of the Philistine princes just mentioned. In the meantime the war between Israel and the Philistines ends disastrously for the former, and Saul and Jonathan are slain. David receives news of this during his sojourn in Ziklag. With this ends the outlaw life of David, for, leaving Ziklag, he comes to Hebron, where the men of Judah anoint him king (2 S 24).

3. David as king.—(a) Internal affairs.—For the ﬁrst seven years of his reign David made Hebron his capital. In spite of his evident desire to make peace with the followers of Saul (2 S 9), it was but natural that a vigorous attempt should be made to uphold the dynasty of the late king, at all events in Israel, as distinct from Judah (see I Samoeren). It is therefore just what, we should expect when we read that 'there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David' (9). The ﬁnal victory lay with David, and in due time the elders of Israel came to him in Hebron and anointed him their king. As ruler over the whole land David realized the need of a more central capital; he ﬁxed on Jerusalem, which he conquered from the Jebusites, and founded the royal city on Mt. Zion, 'the city of David' (57). Thither he brought up the ark with great ceremony (62), intending to build a permanent temple for it (77), but the prophet Nathan declares to him that this is not Jehovah's will. David's disappointment is, however, soothe, for the prophet goes on to tell him that though he may not build this house, Jehovah will establish the house of David (i.e. in the sense of lineage) for ever (69). David, too, enters in before Jehovah and offers up his thanksgiving (vy. 18-29).

One of the darker traits of David's character is illustrated by the detailed account of the Bathsheba episode (11^{2}-12^{2}); so far from seeking to curb his passion for her he married her, and thus set in motion events which culminated in the reign of King Solomon.

The marriage was destined to influence materially the history of Israel (see ADONIJAH). But the great political event in the history of the monarchy of King David, so far as the internal affairs of the kingdom were concerned, was the rebellion of his son Absalom.

Of an ambitious nature, Absalom sought the succession, even being deposed, and deposing his father, David, as set about preparing the ground for the final coup is graphically described in 2 S 15^{4}. After four (forty in the EV should be read 'four') years of suchlike crafty preparation, the rebellion broke out. For the revolt, Hezron, the old capital, given by Absalom to the conspirators, was the signal for the outbreak. At first Absalom was successful; he attacked Jerusalem, from which David had to flee; here, following the advice of Ahithophel, who succeeded in inducing Absalom to waste time by lingering in Jerusalem, Ahithophel, enraged at the breach of his plans, and possibly foreseeing the final result must be, leaves Absalom and goes to his home in Giloh and hanges himself (2 S 17^{2}). In the meantime David, hearing what is going on in Jerusalem, withdraws his forces and goes back to the reign of Solomon, and here he gathers his forces together under the leadership of Joab. The decisive battle follows not long after, in the 'forest of Ephraim'; Absalom is completely defeated and his father, David, saves himself by a tree by the head whilst fleeing. Whilst hanging he is pierced by Joab, in spite of David's urgent command that he should not be harmed. The touching account of David's sorrow, on hearing of Absalom's death, is given in 2 S 18^{3-4}. A second rebellion, of a much less serious character, was that of Sheba, who sought to draw the northern tribes from their allegiance; it was, however, easily quelled by Joab (ch. 20).

The following, very briefly, is a list of David's foreign wars; they are put in the order found in 2 Sam., but this order is not strictly chronological; moreover, it seems probable that in one or two cases duplicate, but varying, accounts appear: Philistines (5^{27}-28), Moabites (8^{2}), Zobah (8^{4}), Syrian (8^{3}), Edomites (8^{4}), Ammonites, Syrians (10^{11}), Edomites (8^{2}), and Philistines (21^{2}). David was victorious over all these peoples, the result being a great extension of his kingdom, which reached right up to the Euphrates (cf. Ex 23^{8}, Dt 11^{3-4}). Wars of this kind presuppose the existence of a, comparatively speaking, large army; that David had a constant supply of troops may be gathered from the details given in 1 Ch 27.

While it is impossible to deny that the rôle assigned to him is based on fact (cf. e.g. 1 S 11^{7-9}, 2 S 22^{41}-Ps 15, Am 6^{9}), and he must evidently be regarded as one of the main sources of inspiration for the professional and layman of succeeding generations (see art. PSALMS).

The character of David offers an intensely interesting complex of good and bad, in which the former largely predominates. As lover, warrior, poet, king, theologian, and lawgiver, he stands pre-eminent among the heroes of Israel. His importance in the domain of the national religion lies mainly in his founding of the sanctuary at Zion, with all that that denotes of loyalty, piety, and devotion.

DAY.—See TIME.

DAY OF ATONEMENT.—See ATONEMENT [DAY OF].

DAY OF THE LORD.—The day in which Jehovah was expected to punish sinful Hebrews and the enemies of Israel, and to establish at least the righteous remnant of His people in political supremacy. The Hebrews believed implicitly that Their God Jehovah was certain to defeat all rivals, but, as Amos this view had not reached a definite eschatology, and probably involved only a general expectation of the triumph of Israel and Jehovah's God. With Amos, however, the conception of punishment became less ethically and more moral. The sins of Israel itself deserved punishment, and Amos declared that the nation, with all its guilt, had shown itself hateful to Jehovah, and unless abandoned would bring fearful punishment (Am 2^{2}-3^{4}, 5^{12}-15, 6^{1}). The righteousness of Jehovah demands that the doer of evil should be punished. After Amos the thought of an awful day of Divine punishment was extended from Israel to a world of sinners. According to Zechariah (9^{13}, 14), punishment was now to come upon all wicked persons, both Jews and Gentiles, because of wrong. So, too, the unknown prophet who wrote under the name of Malachi (Ezekiel 30^{2}, 34^{2}, 35^{2}), however, reversed to the same national thought of a 'day of battle,' in which Jehovah would conquer all Israel's foes; and to some extent this same national idea is represented by Joel (3^{11}-47). With the later prophets there is to be seen an element of recompense as well as punishment in Jehovah's acts. Whether Jews or Gentiles, are to be punished, but a pious remnant is to be saved, the beginnings of a new Israel.

It is clear that this conception of a great Day of Jehovah underlies much of the Messianic expectation of apocalyptic literature. The establishment of a remnant of a pious Israel was the germ of the hope of the Messianic kingdom; and the Day of Jehovah itself became the Day of Judgment, which figures so largely in both Jewish and Christian Messianism. It is fact, it is not too much say that the eschatology of Judaism is really a development of the implications of the prophetic teaching as to the Day of Jehovah.

SHAILER MATTHEWS.

DAY'S JOURNEY.—A 'day's journey' (Nu 11^{3}, 1 K 19^{9}, 2 K 22^{4}: cf. three days' journey. Gn 38, Ex 34 etc.: seven days. Gn 19) was not, like the 'sabbath day's journey' (see WEEKS AND MEASURES), a definite measure of length, but, like our 'stone's throw,' 'bow-shot,' etc., a popular and somewhat indefinite indication of distance. This would naturally vary with the urgency and impendiments of the traveler or the caravan. Laban in hot pursuit of Jacob, and the Hebrew host in the wilderness, may be taken to represent the extremes in this matter of a 'day's journey' (see above), although it is scarcely possible to take literally the 'seven days' journey' of the former (Gn 31:23)—from Haran to Gilead, circa 350 miles in 7 days. From 20 to 30 miles is probably a fair estimate of an average day's journey with baggage animals.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

DAYSMAN.—A daysman is an arbiter. The compound arises from the use of the word 'day' in a technical sense, to signify a day for dispensing justice. The same use is found in Gr.; thus 1 Co 4: 'man's judgment' is literally 'man's day.' The word occurs in Job 32:7 'Neither is there any daysman betwixt us' (AV and RV margin 'umpire'). Tindal translates Ex 21:8, 'the daysman appoynteth him' (AV 'as the judges determine').

DAYSPRING.—An old English expression denoting the dawn ('the day springy or dawnynge of the daye gyveth a certeyne lyght before the rayng of the sonne,' Eden, Decades, 1355, p. 264). It occurs in Job 14:8 'Hast thou... caused the dayspring to know his place?'; Wis 16:8 'at the dayspring pray unto thee' (RV 'at the dawning of the day'). Virtually the same expression occurs in Jg 15:8 and 1 Sam 5:13; cf. also (Gn 29:13 and Ps 112:4, both east and west called 'the outgoings of the morning and evening'). In Lk 1:10 the expression 'day spring from on high' probably goes back to a Heb. original which was a well-understood personal description of the Messiah (combining the ideas of 'light' and 'sprout'); it would then be a poetical equivalent for 'Messiah from heaven.'

DAY STAR.—See lucifer.

DEACON.—The Gr. word διάκονος, as well as the corresponding verb and abstract noun, is of very frequent occurrence in the text of the NT, but in EV is always translated 'servant' or 'minister' except in Ph 1, 1 Ti 3:8-13, where it is rendered 'deacon,' these being the only two passages where it is evidently used in a technical sense.

In the Gospels the word has the general meaning of 'servant' (cf. Mt 20:28; 23:13, Jn 2:7-9, St. Paul employs it constantly of one who is engaged in Christian service, the service of God or Christ or the Church (e.g. 2 Co 11:23, Col 1:7-8), but without any trace as yet of an official significance. Once in Romans we find him distinguishing διακονία ('ministry') from prophecy and teaching and exhortation (12:7); but it seems evident that he is speaking here of differences in function, not in office, so that the passage does not do more than foreshadow the coming of the deaconate as a regular order.

In the NT, the word deacon is never once employed, but 6:6, where we read of the appointment of the Seven, sheds a ray of light on its history, and probably serves to explain how from the general sense of one who renders Christian service it came to be applied to a special officer of the Church. The Seven are nowhere called deacon, nor is there any real justification in the NT for the traditional description of them by that title. The qualifications demanded of them (v. 5; cf. v. 6) are higher than those laid down in 1 Timothy for the office of the deacon; and Stephen and Philip, the only two of their number of whom we know anything, exercise functions far above those of the later diacron (6:5-8). But the fact that the special duty to which they were appointed is called a διακονία or ministration (v. 9) and that this ministration was a definite part of the work of the Church in Jerusalem, so that 'the diakonia' came to be used as a specific term in this reference (cf. Ac. 11:19, 12:9, Ro 15:6, 2 Co 8:9, 11:15), makes it natural to find in their appointment the germ of the Institution of the diacron as it meets us at Philippi and Ephesus, in 1 Co 16:1, that belong to the closing years of St. Paul's life.

It is in these Greek cities, then, that we first find the deacon as a regular official, called to office after probation (1 Ti 3:8), and standing alongside the bishop in the ministry of the Church (Ph 1, 1 Ti 3:8-13). As to his functions nothing is said precisely. We can only infer that the διακονία of the deacons in Philippi and Ephesus, like the διακονία of the Seven in Jerusalem, was in the first place a ministry to place a responsible and often private kind—a ministration that is borne out by what is said in 1 Tim. as to the deacon's qualifications.

Comparing these qualifications with those of the bishop, we observe that the difference is just what would be suggested by the names bishop or 'overseer' and deacon or 'servant' respectively. Bishops were to rule and take charge of the Church (1 Ti 3:2); deacons were to 'serve well' (v. 8). Bishops must 'apt to teach' (v. 9); deacons were only called to 'hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience' (v. 9). That the work of the deacon and his fellow-servant the deaconess (wh. see) was of a house-to-house kind is suggested by the warnings given against talebearing (v. 10) and backbiting (v. 10). That it had to do with the distribution of Church moneys, and so brought temptations to pilfering, is further suggested by the demand that the deacon should not be a 'sinner' and that his female equivalent and co-worker should be 'faithful (i.e. trustworthy) in all things' (v. 11).

J. C. LAMBERT.

DEACONESS.—The word does not occur in EV except as a RVm reading in Ro 16:1. In this verse Phoebe is described as 'a diakonos of the church that is at Cenchrea.' AV and RV render 'servant.' RVm 'deaconess.' Against the latter the matter must be noted: (1) There is no evidence of the deaconess (wh. see) in the NT till we come to the Ep. to the Philippians, and it is most unlikely that when Romans was written there would be an official deaconess. (2) Cenchrea was one of the ports of Corinth; and in St. Paul's letters to the Corinthian Church there is a notable absence of any signs of a definite ecclesiastical organization in that city. The conclusion is that the διακονία of Phoebe in Cenchrea, like the διακονία ('ministry') of Stephanas and his household in Corinth (1 Co 16:17), was a gracious but unofficial ministry to the saints (cf. Ro 16:17).

In 1 Ti 3:11, however, although the word 'deaconess' is not used, it is almost certain that female deacons are referred to. AV misleads us by making it appear that the wives of deacons are spoken of. The RVm rendering 'Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things.' And when the whole passage (v. 12-13) is read, it seems evident that the women referred to in v. 12 are διακόνες 'in like manner' as the men described both in v. 8 and v. 11.

We know from Pliny, writing early in the 2nd cent., that by that time there were deaconesses in the Christian Churches of Bithynia (Ep. x. 90). And in the ancient world the need must have been early felt for a class of women who could perform some at least of the duties of the deaconate for their own sex in particular.

DEAD.—See death.

DEAD SEA.—An inland lake 47 miles long and from 2 to 6 miles in breadth, which receives the waters of the Jordan. Its level is 1293 ft. below that of the Mediterranean, being the lowest body of water on the surface of the earth. It has no outlet, and the water received by it is all carried off by evaporation. In consequence, the waters of the Lake are impregnated with mineral substances to a remarkable degree; they yield 25 per cent. of salt, whereas the ocean yields but 4 to 6 per cent.

The modern name is of late origin (first used apparently by Pausanias) and refers to the total absence of life in its waters. It has no Scripture warrant: Hebrew writers speak of it as the 'Salt Sea' (Gn 14:3, Nu 34, 180 Jos 15:2 etc.), the 'sea of the Arabah' (Dt 3:17 4:11), the 'east or eastern sea' (Ezk 47:1, Jl 22). In Arabic it is known as Bahr Lut, 'the sea of Lot,' a name which, however, is more probably due to the direct influence of the history as related in the Koran than to a survival of local tradition. Somewhere near the sea were Sodom and Gomorrah, but whether north or south of it is not settled; the one certain fact about their sites is that the popular belief that they are covered by the waters of the Lake is quite inadmissible.
DEAFNESS

The Dead Sea owes its origin to a fault or fracture produced in the surface of the region by the earth-movements whereby the land was here raised above the sea-level. This fault took place towards the end of the Eocene period; it extends along the whole Jordan valley from the Gulf of Akabah to Hermon; and it may be taken as fairly certain that the general appearance of the Lake has not radically altered during the whole time during which the human race has existed.

Round the border of the Lake are numerous small springs, some bursting actually under its waters, others forming lagoons of comparatively brackish water (as at 'Ata Felekh on the western side). In these lagoons various specimens of small fish are to be found; but in the main body of the water itself life of any kind is impossible.

But the observations tend to show that the surface of the Lake is slowly rising. An island that was a conspicuous feature at the N. end disappeared under the surface in 1892, and has never been seen since.

DEAFNESS.—See Medicine.

DEAL.—A deal is a part or share. It is still in use in the phrase 'a great deal' or 'a good deal.' In AV occurs 'tenth deal' (RV 'tenth part'), the Heb. 'üssārôn being a measure used in meal-offerings. See Weights and Measures, v.

DEATH.—I. IN THE OT.—1. The Heb. term mā'sēth and our corresponding word 'death' alike spring from primitive roots belonging to the very beginnings of speech. One of man's first needs was a word to denote that stark fact of experience—the final cessation of life to which he and the whole animal creation, and the very trees and plants, were all subject. It is, of course, in this ordinary sense of the term as denoting a physical fact that the expressions 'death' and 'die' are mostly used in the Scriptures.

2. The Scriptures have nothing directly to say as to the place of death in the economy of nature. St. Paul's words in Ro 5:12, as to the connexion between sin and death must be explained in harmony with this fact; and for that matter, in harmony also with his own words in Ro 6:23, where death, the 'wages of sin,' cannot be simply physical death. The Creation narratives are silent on this point, yet in Gn 27:1 man is expected to know what it is to die. We are not to look for exact information on matters such as this from writings of this kind. If the belief enshrined in the story of the Fall in Gn 3 regarded death as the ordinary sequel of the penalty of Adam and Eve's transgression, they at any rate did not die 'in the day' of their transgression; v.2 suggeststhat even then, could he but eat of the 'tree of life,' man might escape mortality. All we can say is that in the date of history man's experience of death, as one already familiar with the correlative mysteries of life and death.

3. From the contemplation of the act of dying it is an easy step to the thought of death as a state or condition. This is a distinct stage towards believing in existence of some kind beyond the grave. And to the vast mass of mankind to say 'he is dead' has never meant 'he is non-existent.'

4. Divergent beliefs as to what the state of death are show themselves in the OT. — (a) In numerous instances death is represented as a condition of considerable activity and consciousness. The dead are regarded as 'knowing one's able to impart information and counsel to the living.
Note, the term translated 'wizards' in AV in Lk 10:24-25,
Is 8:19 really denotes departed spirits who are sought unto or inquiries of 'on behalf of the living.' A vivid instance of this belief is furnished in the story of the Witch of En-dor (1 Sm 28:1 f.). So also in Is 14:15, where we have a graphic description of the commotion caused in Sheol by the arrival of the king of Babylon, a description with which we may compare the dream of false 'Clarence' in Shakespeare's Richard II. The phrase reference to the dead under the term 'gods' (âbôtim), as in 1 S 23:14, is noticeable. Whether in all this we have a relic of ancient Semitic ancestor-worship (as e.g.
Charles maintains in his Jowett Lectures on Ecclesiastical or no, it seems to represent very primitive beliefs which survived in one form or another, even after the stern Jewish prohibition of necromancy was promulgated.
They may also have affected the treatment of the dead, who in every age and people have lived on in mystic or 'factice' conceptions; each nation has formed a system of ideas and beliefs according to the stern attitude of the age and the religious influences of the time which have come nearest to them. Such ideas and beliefs are often of a very sceptical character, and make for the idea of the dead as themselves making use of the occuring to such a being as the dead; but the belief is there. (b) In some places death is represented as rival or 'existed' (RV 'in' Shakespeare, with the dream of death, 'the death of the righteous' (Nu 23:10) as desirable thing looks in the same direction.
And why has the righteous' hope in his death' (Pr 14:32)
If minor matters, the several uses of references to death may be merely pointed out. 'Chambers of death,' Pr 7:17; 'gates,' Ps 9:12 (=state); 'bitterness of death,'
1 S 15:5, Ec 7:23; 'terrors,' Ps 55; 'sorrows,' Ps 116 =man's natural dread; 'shadow of death,' Job, Ps., and other places. These last expressions, which are used in the sense of horror and gloom, as well as with reference to death itself.
'the sleep of death,' Ps 139 (to be distinguished from later Christian usage); 'shades of death,' Prov. passim, etc.; 'shades of death,' Ps 130:5 (=things leading to destruction); the phrase 'to death,' as 'vexed unto death,' Jg 13:17; 'sick,' 2 K 20:1 (=an extreme degree).

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—The value of the Apocrypha in connexion with the study of Semitic religious and usage here is not to be overlooked. Notice e.g. Wisdom chs. 1-6, with its treatment of the attitude of the ungodly at death. 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die'), of the problem of the early, untimely death of the good, and of immortality in relation to the ungodly and the righteous; Sterch, in which no clear conception of immortality appears, the best that can be said, to alleviate sorrow for the dead, being that 'the dead is at rest' (885); in which also the fear of death is spoken of as being all rank of men (40), and we ask who they are to whom death comes as a dread foe, and again who may welcome death as a friend (41).

III. IN THE NT.—We may notice the following points: (a) The Pauline doctrine that natural death is the primitive consequence of sin, already referred to, is to be explained as the common Jewish interpretation of the OT account of the Fall, and finds no direct support in the Gospels. The feeling that 'the sting of death is sin' is, however, widely existent in NT. (b) The use of the term 'death' as denoting a certain spiritual state in which men may live and be still destitute of all that is worth calling 'life,' is quite common (Eph 2:2; 5:5, Col 2:12, 1 Ti 5:6, Ja 1:4, Jude 1, Rev 3). (c) A mystical and figurative use of the notion of death as denoting the change from a sinful to a new life is noticeable. The believer, the man spiritually alive, is also 'dead to sin' (Ro 6:1, 1 P 2:5), 'is dead with Christ' (Ro 6, Col 2:10 etc.).

bs':)—1. Rebekah's nurse, who accompanied her mistress to her new home on marrying Isaac (Gu 24:6). She was evidently held in great reverence, as the name of the site of her grave in Bethel shows, Allen-bacuth, the 'terebinth of weeping' (359).

2. The fourth of the leaders, or 'Judges,' of Israel, called also a 'prophetess,' i.e. an inspired woman—one of the four mentioned in the OT—of the tribe of Issachar (Josh 18:27), wife of Lapath, born at Ramath in the hill-country of Ephraim; here the Israelites came to her for judgment and guidance. She was the real deliverer of the Israelites, who had sunk into a state of feebleness and impotence, through the oppression of Jabin, king of Hazor (see Barak). A personality of great power and outstanding character, she was looked up to as a 'mother in Israel' (57), and was instant both in word and in deed in fulfilling her calling of 'Judge.' Her role is the more remarkable in that the general position of women in those days was of a distinctly subordinate character.

Deborah’s Song (Jg 5:2-21) is one of the most ancient and magnificent remains of early Hebrew literature, and is a song of victory, sung in memory of Israel's triumph (under the leadership of Deborah and Barak) over Sisera and the kings of Canaan. The vivid pictures which the poem brings up before the mind's eye make it certain that the writer (whether Deborah or another) lived at the time of the events described. The parallel, and somewhat later, account (in prose) of the same battle (Jg 4:1-4) agrees in the main with the poem, though there are many differences in the details. The Song is divided into four distinct sections:

Praise to Jahweh, and the terror of His approach, vv.1-3.
Condition of Israel prior to Deborah's activity, vv.4-6.
Gathering of the tribes of Israel, vv.7-8.
Victory of Israel and death of Sisera, vv.9-12.

The chief importance of the Song lies in the historical details, and in the light it throws on some of the later events in the history of Israel. Of the first, the main points are that at this time the Israelites had not yet obtained a secure dwelling-place in the mountains, but that there had been formed a great defensive line of forts on the borders of the Jordan, so that even if they were driven from their mountainous districts, they could still manage to hold on the fertile lands of the Plain, and that they had not yet established any distinct tribes among the tribes of Israel; and that the 'twelve tribes' of later times had not yet all come into existence.

Of the latter, the main points are: that Jehovah has brought His people back to their former place in the mountains of Hazor; that He has not yet come to dwell among His people, though He is regarded as specifically the God of Israel; that He comes forth from His dwelling-place to lead His people to battle; and that His might and strength are so great that the very elements are shaken at His approach.

The Hebrew text is in some places (notably in vv.10-12) very corrupt; but the general sense is clear.

DEBT.—1. In OT.—Loans in the OT period were not of a commercial nature. They were not granted to enable a man to start or extend his business, but to meet the pressure of poverty. The borrower they were a misfortune (Dt 28:4); to the lender a form of charbery.

Hence the tone of legislation on the subject. It is forbidden in all three codes (Ex 22:26 (JE), Dt 23:4, Lv 25:25 (H)); it was making a profit out of a brother's distress. In Dt. it may be taken from a foreigner. Fidels were allowed, but under strict conditions (Dt 24:1, Job 24:4). In Dt 15 is a remarkable law providing for the 'letting drop' of loans every seventh year, and the relationship of the law to the Sabbath year in Ex 23:10 (JE), Lv 25:10 (H) is not clear, but the cessation of agriculture would obviously lead to serious financial difficulties, and debtors might reasonably look for some relief. This consideration makes for the modern view, that the passage implies only a special consideration for a year of the creditor's right to demand payment. It may be admitted, however, that apart from a priori considerations the obvious interpretation is a total remission of debts (so the older, and Jewish commentators). Formerly, however, any pacts do not come under the law. The other codes have no parallel, except where the debt may have led to the bondage of the debtor's person.

Historically, the legislation seems to have been largely ignored. In 2 K 4:1-3 a small debt involves the bondage of a widow's two sons (cf. Is 50, Mt 18:24), and Elisha helps her not by invoking the law, but by a miracle.

In Neh 5 mortgaged lands and interest are restored under the pressure of an economic crisis. Nehemiah himself has been a creditor and taken usury. There is an apparent reference to Dt 15 in Neh 10:34. In later times the strictness of the law was evaded by various legal fictions: Hillel introduced the notion of 'contracting out.' That loans played a large part in social life is shown by frequent references in the Prophets, Psalms, and Proverbs (Is 24, Ps 19:37, Pr 19:21). For 15:10 shows that the relation between debtor and creditor was proverbially an unpleasant one. In Ps 37:5-6 it is part of the misfortune of the wicked that he shall be unable to pay his debts; there is no reference to dishonesty. Pr. 22:7, 31:8 warn against borrowing, and Sir 29 has some delightful common-sense advice on the whole subject.

2. In NT.—Loans are assumed by our Lord as a normal factor in social life (Mt 20:15, Lk 18:19). Lk 6:34 suggests that the Christian will not always stand on his rights in this respect. Debit is used as a synonym for sin in Mt 6:12 (cf. the two parables Mt 18:23, Lk 7:40; and Col 2:23). The context of these passages is a sufficient warning against the external and secondary view of sin which might be suggested by the word itself. Christ does not imply that it is a debt which can be paid by any amount of good deeds or retributive suffering.

This word is chosen to emphasize our duty of forgiveness, and it has a wide meaning, including all we owe to God. The metaphor of the money payment has ceased to be prominent, except where it is implied by the context.

DECALOGUE.—See Ten Commandments.

DECAPOLIS.—Originally a league of ten cities, Greek in population and constitution, for mutual defence against the Semitic tribes around them. It must have come into existence about the beginning of the Christian era. The original ten cities, as enumerated by Pliny, were Scythopolis, Pella, Dion, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Gadara, Raphana, Kanatha, Hippus, and Damascus. Other cities joined the league from time to time. The region of Decapolis (Mt 4:25, Mk 2:17) was the territory in which these cities were situated; that is (excluding Damascus), roughly speaking, the country S.E. of the Sea of Galilee.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DECEASE.—The Gr. word eidos ("eudos", "out-going") is translated 'decease' in Lk 5:31 and 2 P 15, the meaning being departure out of the world. In this sense the Gr. word is used also in Wis 8:29, Sir 39:5. The opposite, esiodos, is used of the 'coming' of Christ. The other occurrence of the Gr. word, in Heb 11:28, of the Exod from Egypt (AV and RV 'departure').

DECENCY.—1 Cor 14:4, 'Let all things be done decently and in order,' that is, in a comely, handsome manner; for that is the old meaning of 'decent,' and it is the meaning of the Gr. word used.

DECIUS.—Duly constituted and recognized authorities have the power of decision granted to them in all questions of right in the Bible. Wis 18:1, the judges (1 S 7:1), and the kings (1 K 3:6) can be exercised on occasion. Questions of right between Christian brethren are to be decided by Church courts alone, not by civil authorities (Mt 18:15). The only method of decision sanctioned in the NT is the exercise of godly judgment on the part of the individual to whom authority has been granted. The casting of lots by heathen solders (Mt 26:35) is the solution of a moral crisis; it cannot be cited as an example for the Christian Church. No instance of the casting of lots can be found after Pentecost. The Spirit of a sound mind now decides what is right and what is true.

D. A. HAYES.

DECISION, VALLEY OF.—The phrase is found only in Jl 3:4 'Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision; for the day of Jehovah is near in the valley of decision. This valley is evidently the valley of Jehoshaphat mentioned in the preceding context (v.5-12). The decision is that of Jehovah Himself, His final judgment upon the heathen assembled. The scene of this judgment has been fixed by Jews, Roman Catholics, and Mohammedans in the Valley of the Kidron. The valley of Jehoshaphat has been identified with the Valley of the Kidron since the time of Eusebius. Orelli, Michaelis, Robinson, and others think the valley of this prophecy is purely a symbolic one, the valley of 'Jehovah's judgment,' as the Heb. name Jehoshaphat ('Jehovah hath judged') suggests.

D. A. HAYES.

DECREASE.—What theologians speak of as the 'decrees of God,' and as described in one, immutable, eternal, all-embracing, free, etc., do not receive this designation in Scripture. The equivalents are to be sought for under such headings as Electors, Predestination, Providence, Reprobation. In the EV the term is frequently used in Esther, Ezra, Daniel, with different Heb. and Aram. words, for royal decrees (in Dn 6 EV 'interdict'; in 2 Ev 'law,' elsewhere 'decree'). In the NT also the Gr. word dogma is employed of decrees of Caesar (Lk 2, Ac 17); in Ac 16 it is used of decrees of the Church; elsewhere (Eph 2, Col. 1) it is 'ordinances.' The nearest approach to the theological sense of the term is, in OT, in the Heb. word hōk, ordinarily tr. 'statute,' which is used in various places of God's sovereign appointments in life, law, providence (Job 29, Ps 149, Ps 78, Jer 5, Zeph 2). The Hebrews had not the modern conception of 'laws of nature,' but they had a good equivalent in the idea of the world as ordered and founded by God's decrees; as regulated by His ordinances (cf. Ps 106, 113, Jer 10). The same word is used in Ps 27 of God's 'decree' regarding His king; in Dn 41, 42 (Aram.) we have 'decree' of 'the watchers' and 'the most High.'

JAMES OAKES.

DEDAN.—A north Arabian people, according to Gn 10 descended from Cush, and according to 25 from Abraham through Keturah. The combination is not difficult to understand when we remember the Amban affiliations of the Cushites (cf. Is 21, 4). In Ezk 25, 26 Dedan is placed almost within the Edomite territory, which it must have bordered on the south-east (cf. Jer 25, 49). The Dedanites were among the Amban peoples who sent their native wares to the market of Tyre (Ezk 27). In Ezk 25, 26 read 'Rodan' (Rhodians) for 'Dedan.'

DEDICATION.—See HOUSES, § 3.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE.—After the desecration of the Temple and altar by Antiochus Epiphanes, Judas Maccabaeus re-consecrated them in b.c. 165 on the 25th day of Chislev (December); cf. 1 Mac 4, 20-24, 2 Mac 10. This event was henceforward celebrated by a feast all over the country (Jn 10). It lasted 8 days. There was no suspension of business or labour, and but few restrictions were made to the ordinary synagogal services. The special feature of the festival was the illumination of private houses, whence came its alternative name—'the Feast of Lights.' (There were divergent rules for these illuminations in the various schools of traditionists.) It was an occasion for feasting and jollity: the people assembled at the synagogues, carrying branches of palms and other trees; the services were jubilant, no fast or mourning could begin during the period, and the feast of Jehovah Ebal (Neh 8) was chanted. The resemblances of this celebration to the Feast of Tabernacles were perhaps intentional.

DEFENDED.—In AV 'defended' means 'provided with fences,' 'protected,' 'fortified.' It is used in AV of fortified cities, and once (Zec 11, 3) of a forest.

DEGREES, SONGS OF.—See Psalms.

DEHAYES (AV Delawites, Ezr 4).—The Dehays were among the peoples settled in Samaria by Conon, probably the Abodeh or Abodeh, though the name has been connected with that of a nomadic Persian tribe, the Daot, mentioned in Herod. 1, 135, or with the name of the city Daua, mentioned on Assyrian contract-tablets; but these identifications are very doubtful. S of Dedan (Ezr 2, Neh 7). The name in 1 Es 5, 7 is Dalan.

DEILAH.—The Philistine woman who betrayed Samson into the hands of the Philistines. See SAMSON.

DELOS.—A small rocky island in the Aegean Sea, which played an extraordinary part in history. It was the seat of a wide-spread worship of Apollo, who, with his sister Artemis, was said to have been born there. In b.c. 478 it was chosen as the meeting-place of the confederacy of Greek States united against their common enemy the Persians, and became a rival of Athens. In the 2nd and 1st cents. b.c. it became a great harbour, and was under Roman protection from b.c. 197 to 167. It was later a portion of the Roman province Achaea. It is mentioned in the famous letter of the Romans in favour of the Jews (b.c. 139-138, 1 Mac 15a-25). It was a great exchange, where slaves and other products of the E. were bought for the Italian market. It was the scene of a terrible massacre carried out by Mithradates, king of Pontus, who slaughtered 80,000 Italians there and in neighbouring islands. It never fully recovered, and in the Empire became insignificant.

DELUCE.—1. The Biblical story, Gn 6, 4-9 (6-9) is probably a separate tradition, unconnected with the Deluge (see Driver, Genesis, p. 52). The two narratives of J and P have been combined; the verses are assigned by Driver as follows: J 6-4, 7-4, 7-8, 11b, 17a, 21, 23, 52-2s, 6-13, 16b, 20-27, P 6-22, 77, 7, 11, 12, 16a, 17a, 18b, 21, 23, 24, 41, 49, 51-17. J alone relates the sending out of the birds, and the sacrifice with which J is so pleased that he determines to curse the ground. P alone gives the directions with regard to the size and construction of the ark, the blessing of Noah, the commands against murder and the eating of blood, and the covenant with the sign of the rainbow. In the portions in which the two narratives overlap, they are at variance in the following points. (a) In P one pair of every kind of animal (69-50), in J one pair of the unclean and seven pairs of the clean (7, 2), are to be taken into the ark. (In 7, 2 a reducer has added the words 'two and two' to make J's representation conform to that of P.) The reason for the difference is that, according to P, animals were not eaten at all till after the Deluge (9), so that there was no distinction required between clean and unclean. (b) In P the cause of the Deluge is not only rain but also the bursting forth of the subterranean abyss (8); J mentions rain only (v. 18). (c) In P the water begins to abate after 150 days (8), the mountain tops are visible after 8 months and 13 days (11), and the earth is dry after a year and 10 days (8); in J the flood lasts 40 days (11), and the water had begun to abate before that.

2. The Historicity of the story.—The modern study of geology and comparative mythology has made it impossible to see in the story of the Deluge the literal record of an historical event. (The fact that marine

4. The Babylonian story.—(a) One form of the story has long been known from the fragment of an Egyptian priest of the 3rd c. B.C. It differs in certain details from the other form known to us; e.g. when the ship returned, and while they were still aboard it, a great flood caused a wave which lifted the ship. (b) Another form of the story is that of the flood-stories. (c) It is part of an epic in 12 parts, each connected with a sign of the Zodiac; the flood story is the 11th, and is connected with Aquarius, the "water-bearer." (d) The story, ascribed to Demelius, bears a close resemblance to the Deluge of Genesis and also to the flood-stories. (e) It is part of an epic in 12 parts, each connected with a sign of the Zodiac; the flood story is the 6th, and is connected with Aquarius, the "water-bearer.

3. The Cause of the Deluge.—This is stated to be a great storm, and the bursting forth of the subterranean abyss. It must be studied in connexion with other flood-stories. Such stories are found principally in America, but also in India, Cashmir, Tibet, China, Kamchatka, and in the Polynesian islands. In Lithuania and Greece, earthquakes, on the American coastlands where they frequently occur; the submergence or emergence of islands, in districts liable to volcanic eruptions; among inland peoples, earthquakes are often connected with the bursting forth of the banks of rivers which have been swollen by rains. Sometimes the stories have grown up to account for various facts of observation; e.g. the dispersion of peoples, and differences of language; the red colour, or the pale colour, of certain tribes; the discovery of marine fossils inland, and so on. In some cases these stories have been coloured by the Bible story, owing to the teaching of Christian missionaries in modern times, and often mixed up with other Bible stories, and reproduced with grotesque details by local adaptation. But there are very many which are quite unconnected with the story of Noah. (For a much fuller discussion of the various flood-stories see the valuable art. 'Flood' in Hastings' B.D.B.) It is reasonable, therefore, to treat the Hebrew story as one of these old-world legends, and to look for the causes which lie in the nature and customs of the land rather than to explain it by the bursting forth of the rivers by which it is intersected, and perhaps also, as some think, to the incursion of a tidal wave due to an earthquake somewhere in the Southern Ocean. This world was bounded by very narrow limits, would easily be magnified in oral tradition into a universal Deluge.

DEMEIUS

2. Soter, the son of Seleucus Philepator. In his boyhood he was sent (n.c. 175) to Rome as a hostage, but made his escape after the death of his uncle, Antiochus Epiphanes. Landing at Tripoli, he was joined by large bodies of the people, and even by the bodyguard of his cousin, Antiochus Eupator. Eupator was soon defeated and put to death, and in 162 Demetrius, having taken possession of the throne, was proclaimed king (2 Macc 14: 1; Jos. Ant. xii. x. 1). After seven years, Alexander Balas (wh. see) was set up as a claimant to the crown of Syria (n.c. 153); and he and Demetrius competed for the support of Jonathan (1 Mac 10:8–11; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 1–3). Balas prevailed in spite of the attempts of his rival to oust him (1 Mac 10:41–46). In n.c. 150 a decisive engagement took place, in which Demetrius was defeated and slain (1 Mac 10:41–42; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 4).

Nikator, sent by his father, D. Soter, for safety to Cnidus after the success of Balas seemed probable. After several years of exile he landed (n.c. 147) with an army of Cretan mercenaries on the Cilician coast, and finally in n.c. 138 a fatal defeat was inflicted on Balas (n.c. 138 was the attack of the king of Parthia, by whom, in n.c. 138, he was taken prisoner (1 Mac 1:41–42). Upon regaining his liberty at the end of ten years, he undertook a war against Ptolemy Physkon of Egypt. Having been defeated by Zakarias at Damascus, he fled to the Euphrates, and thence to Tyre, where in n.c. 125 he was murdered (Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 3), possibly at the instigation of his wife Cleopatra (App. Syr. 68; Liv. B.C. 63). See Physkon.

3. Bukabros, grandson of D. Nikator. On the death of his father he established himself in Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 4). When civil war broke out between Alexander Jannaeus and his Phariot subjects, the latter invited the assistance of Demetrius (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 5, 5B/iv. 4), who defeated Jannaeus in a pitched battle near Shechem (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv. 1, 5B/iv. 5). After a chequered career, Demetrius fell, according to the Phariotians, by whom he was detained in captivity until his death (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv. 3).

5. Two persons of the name are mentioned in NT—the one in the riot at Ephesus (Ac 19:24), and a disciple commended by St. John (3 Jn 11). Probably the same name occurs in a contracted form as Demas.

DEMON—The word does not occur in AV. In RV it is substituted for 'devil' in the margin of many passages, and the American Committee was in favour of its adoption in the text. Twice it stands in the text (Dt 32:7, Ps 106:8), representing a root found in both Assy. and Arab., and denoting a species of genii or demi-gods, who were conceived with power for good or evil, and to whom even human sacrifices were offered. So in Bar 4:7; and in the same sense probably 'devils' is used in 1 Co 10:20 and Rev 9:11. For the conception of demon as an influence or spirit, exclusively evil, see Devil; and for the phenomena, see Possession and Exorcism.

DEMOPHON (2 Mac 132).—A Syrian commandant in Palestine under Antiochus Eupator.

DEN.—The five Heb. words represented by 'den' signify respectively 'hollow place' (Is 32:8), 'thicket' (Ps 109), 'place of ambush' (Job 37:26), 'dwelling' (Job 58:9), 'light hole' or 'eyeball' (Is 119); but the last passage may be corrupt. J. TAYLOR.

It is also used elsewhere (Ezr 9, Neh 28:14, 14 etc.) to petty officials in Judah (RV 'rulers,' RV'm 'deputies'). 4. AV and RV of 1 K 22:37 as tr. of nizizz (lit. 'one set up or appointed'), used of the vassal-kings of Edom.

DERBE.—A city in the ethnic district Lycania, and in the region Lycan-Galatia of the Roman province Galatia, on the River Derbe and the Ionus (or Lystra) S.E. to Laranda. The modern villages Losta and Gadestian are built on the ruins of the city or its territory. Amyntas, king of Galatia, had conquered it, and in n.c. 25 it passed with the rest of his territory into the hands of the Romans. From A.D. 41 to 72 it was the frontier city of the province, and was honoured with the prefix Claudia. It was in this period that St. Paul visited it (Ac 14:3), and then retraced his steps to Lystra, etc. On his second journey, coming from Cilicia, he visited it first and then went on to Lystra, as he did also on the third journey. Gatus of Derbe was one of the representatives of Galatia in the deputation which carried the collection for the poor Christians in Jerusalem (Ac 20:1). Derbe was on the whole one of the least important places visited by St. Paul, and appears little in history.

A. SOURIS.

DESCENT INTO HADES.—The general meaning of the word 'hell' (Hades) is 'the unseen, hidden place. It is the shadowy dwelling-place of the spirits of the dead. At first there was no idea of a distinction between good and bad. But such an idea grew up, and the NT our Lord sanctioned the idea. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31), while the soul of Dives was said to be in torment, the soul of Lazarus was taken to the society of Abraham. The promise to the penitent robber (Lk 23:43) 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise,' points to the distinction.

The Apostles seem to have taught from the first that the soul of Christ Himself passed into Hades at His death. This appears in the first sermon of St. Peter (Ac 2:24, when he quotes Ps 16:10, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades,' as a prophecy of the Resurrection. St. Paul also, adapting some words from Dt 30:4, wrote to the Romans (10:7) that it is not necessary to search the depth, since Christ is risen from the dead. His reference to 'the lower parts of the earth' in Eph 4:9 has been interpreted to mean 'came down to earth in the Incarnation': 'Now this, he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?' But the phrase had been used in Ps 63 with reference to Hades, and has probably that meaning in this passage also. Through obedience even unto death, Christ became the Lord of the under world also, and in His descent asserted His Lordship (Ph 2:9).

Thus we find the way prepared for explanation of the difficult passage 1 P 3:18–22: 'Because Christ also suffered once for sins, the righteous, the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing'; cf. 4:8 'For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.'

Until the time of St. Augustine this passage was interpreted to mean that Christ preached to the spirits of men and women who were drowned in the Flood. The Apostle bids his readers take courage from the fact that Christ's death was followed by a quickening of the spirit. If persecution should bring them to death also, similar increase of spiritual energy would follow. There is a reference to the Ascension in 1:23, which marks the crowning of Christ pre-ascending the heavens. See the main reference to the idea that Christ in Noah preached to the men of Noah's time, which was first suggested by St. Augustine. This view, however, though supported in modern times by the great names of Hammond, Pearson, and Barrow, is generally regarded as impossible.

There is one other interpretation, which must be

DEUEL.—Father of Eliashaph, prince of Gad (Nu 14:47).—Reuel, Nu 24: (perhaps the original name).

DEUTERONOMY.

The book consists of three speeches (16th-20th, 26th, 29th-30th) and two poems (chs. 32, 33), all of which are represented as proceeding from Moses and are confined to the plains of Moab just before the crossing of Jordan. The slightest fragments (chs. 27, 31, 34) are considered as belonging to the last days of Moses. Chapters 1-3, however, contain a historical sketch of a passage of speech. Chs. 5-26, 20th-44 are a unity with a formal opening (44th-47) and close (29th); and this section, apart from later additions, is homogenous. Thus chs. 5-11 elaborate those principles concerning Jahweh and His relation to His people which give a peculiar character to the Hebrew polity; chs. 12-20 develop these into a code of law; 20th-44 pronounces blessings on obedience, curses on disobedience. This section, it is now agreed, was written in the Temple in the 37th year of Josiah, (B.C. 622-621), which formed the basis of the reform described in 2 K 23:1. Thus Josiah abolished the high places in Judah and Jerusalem (229th), and confined legitimate worship to the sanctuary at Jerusalem; and this centralization of the cult is the dominating idea of 25:6. Again, Josiah purified the Jahweh-worship from bazaar elements, destroying the Asherah (2 K 23:2, cf. Dt 18:1) and the houses of sodom (2 K 23:4, cf. Dt 18:1) and the houses of sodom (2 K 23:4, cf. Dt 18:1). His opposition to idolatry was directed against the same forms of worship denounced in Deut. (cf. the sun-worship, 2 K 23:4, 7; and the worship of Molech, 23:18, 19; Dt 12:3). The Passover, celebrated in his day at Jerusalem, is stated to have been unique (2 K 23:19); and Deut. forbids the celebration of the Passover elsewhere than in Jerusalem (16:3). The king abolished the superstitions about the services of the Divine will (2 K 23:1), but Deut. forbids (18:12). The demands of the Law-book and the performance of the king are parallel. It is, however, a more difficult question how far the reforms which Josiah instituted in Deut. were new, and how far they were a return to older practices from which the nation had degenerated during the early monarchy. Three other codes can be distinguished in the Pentateuch, and a comparison of these with Deut. helps to determine its place in the development of Israel's religion. An examination of the social legislation in Deut. leads to the conclusion that it is later than the Code of the Covenant (Ex 20-23). Though we are not justified in calling Deut. a deliberate expansion of this legislation, it certainly represents a more developed state of society, as is seen, e.g., in its numerous laws about contracts. And in one particular it contradicts the code at the cardinal point of Exod. left vague: the 'every place where Jahweh records his name' (Ex 20:24) has become 'the place which Jahweh shall choose to put his name there' (Deut. 12:5). When Deut. is compared with the Book of Holiness (Lv 17-26), the codes are seen to be framed for different purposes—Leviticus as a handbook for priests, Deut. as a layman's manual. But their legislation is parallel. Compared with P, Deut. is earlier, for questions left uncertain in Deut. are decided in P. See further, art. HEBREW TEMPLE.

The few references in Deut. to events in Israel's history bear out the conclusion thus reached, for they are dependent on JE, but show no acquaintance with P's history. It is difficult, e.g., to explain the absence of Korah in Dt 16, if the author read Nu 16 in its present form, where Korah from P has been woven into the story. This is one of many instances in which P's history is included in the present, but they support the inference that Deut. was an independent book, before P was incorporated with JE.

There are further indications of the date at which this code was introduced. Thus Deut. insists throughout on one sanctuary, at which legitimate worship can be offered to Jahweh. The extent to which this dominates the code is not to be measured merely by the number of times the command is repeated. Other customs are reasserted in consequence of this change. The Passover alters its character from a family to a national festival (16th). A central tribunal is set up to replace the decisions at the local altars (17th). Asylums for the malefactor are needed (19th), since the village altars where he once found safety (Ex 21:2) are abolished, etc.

Now this was an innovation in Israel. Elijah, far from condemning the high places, is inculcating at the sacrefce which has thrown down the altars of Jahweh (1 K 19:18). When he leaves the polluted land to seek Jahweh, he makes his way not to Jerusalem, but to Horeb (contrast is 20th). Hosea and Amos find much to condemn in the worship which was practised at Bethel and Dan, but never suggest that any worship offered at these shrines was superstitious. Yet we are informed that the teachers of the people of the temple in the 37th year of Josiah (B.C. 622-621), who formed the basis of the reform described in 2 K 22:1, forbids the erection of pillars beside Jahweh's altars (12th); it is difficult to understand how Isaiah (19th) could have associated a pillar with Jahweh's worship, had this law been in the latter's mind; and the worship of the host of heaven—one of the few forms of idolatry specified in Deut.—is not mentioned till it receives severe blame from the prophets of the 7th cent. (Jer 51 13 24 8 19) But this Assyrian cult became a real danger to Israel's religion, when Manasseh came under Eastern influences.

Hezekiah is the first king of whom we learn that he attempted to remove the high places (2 K 18:4). Evidently, however, this was an unpopular step, for the Rabshakeh was able to appeal to the conservative instincts of the nation against a king who practised such questionable innovations (18th). The king implored Hezekiah was a religious, not a political, motive. The splendid monothestic teaching of Isaiah carried with it the inference 'One God, one sanctuary.' Besides, the abuses which were associated with the local shrines compelled the religious leaders of the nation, who had been influenced by the teaching of Hosea and Amos, to go to the root and abolish such worship altogether. The one means of purifying their worship was to sever the tie from the high places with their Canaanitic associa-
DEUTERONOMY

The fall of N. Israel (n.c. 722) carried with it the condemnation of the worship which was practised there, and swept away the worshipers who were attached to it. The destruction of Jerusalem from Samariah threw a glory round the sanctuary of which Jahweh had so signaliy vindicated the inviolability. Probably a body of reformers framed their code in Hezekiah's later years. They did not create a new legislation, they recast and put a new spirit into an older code. It would have been impossible to secure the acceptance of a brand-new code from a whole people.

Under Manasseh there followed a strong reaction, which resorted even to persecution. The reformers' Law-book was forgotten, the reformers themselves may have been martyred. But the code itself survived to be discovered under Josiah, and to become the basis of a pregnant reform.

Opinion is divided as to whether chs. 1–3 are by the hand which wrote the main work. The fact that in 1:16 Moses is represented as speaking to men who had witnessed the Exodus, while in 2:12 that generation is represented as dead, seems decisive that they are not. The chapters may have been added as an historical introduction to a separate edition of the code. The fact that their history is based on JE proves that this must have been early.

Chapters 4–26 belong together, and are a later addition in view of new circumstances, viz., the prospect or the reality of exile.

The Song (32:1–43), with its double introduction (32:1–42) and close (32:43), is a didactic poem, giving an interpretation of Israel's entire history, and bearing traces of influence from the Wisdom literature. It may date from the 7th cent. or the Exile.

The Blessing (ch. 33) dates from a time when N. Israel in the flush of its vigour could anticipate further conquests (v.11), since Eastern Israel had regained part of its lost territory (v.19). It may belong to the reign of Jeroboam II. (n.c. 752–43), by whom the Syrians of Damascus were defeated.

Ch. 27 is difficult to assign. It evidently breaks the connexion of 26 and 28, and as evidently is composite. The Levitical regulations are carried out, what the tribal commissioners did, and there are no blessings uttered at all. There may be early elements in v.47, but it is best to regard the chapter as still a crus.

2. Main principles.—(a) The fundamental principle of the book is the unity of Jahweh, who is God of the whole earth (10:14), and who is more than the God of Israel, since He has relations to other nations apart from their relations to Israel (9:128). This carries with it the consequence that idolatry is the supreme sin (6:17 ff., etc.). To avoid even the possibility of such a crime, intercourse with other nations is severely straitened (7:2, etc.), and older customs of worship are forbidden (16:10, etc.).—(b) As He is God of the whole earth, Jahweh's will is the moral law, and in connexion with its requirements He rewards and punishes (cf. the teaching of Amos). As God of Israel, the fundamental principles of His relation to His people are also ethical.—(c) Yet Jahweh is not merely a lifeless moral principle or glorified code. His love to His people was shown, before they could prove any desert (9:6, etc.). He gave them their land—a gift they must not imagine themselves to have merited (8:22). Hence love is the supreme return for His love (6:5, etc., and cf. Hosea). Hence also there is room for worship and for prayer. Their cult, an expression of their loving gratitude, is to be joyful in character, not like the superhuman doctrines to which national disaster and foreign rites were making them inclined (12:9, etc.).—(d) A religion, the heart of which is loving gratitude, naturally expresses itself in humanity towards all with whom men live, and even towards the lower animals (22:31, etc.-etc.). A religion also with so strong a sense of the Divine personality brings with it respect for human personality (24:1).—(e) As personal and loving, Jehovah cannot be self. Through His self-revelation He is the historic God of Israel. This is emphasized in contrast with the baalim, who, as gods of Canaan, had no historic connexion with Israel. Jahweh has made known Himself and His will by the deeds He has wrought for and among His people. Hence it was a right instinct which led to the addition of chs. 1–3 with their record of Jahweh's past guidance.—(f) This element enters now into the cult. He gives His people an association to the national festivals and weds them to the great events of their past. See especially ch. 26, where all Israel's past is made to enter into the worship of the individual Israelite, and where also emphasis is laid on the truth that the fruits of the land are not from the baalim, but from Jahweh's bounty (cf. Hos 2:23).—(g) Such a religion, with its strong sense of the historic unity of God's dealings with His nation, and His conviction of the reasonableness of God's demands, can and ought to be taught. Children are to have it explained to them (6:7, 11); and means are to be used to bring it to men's thoughts daily (6:7, 11). The observances are thus brought into connexion with great vivifying principles, so that this code becomes the finest illustration of an effort made to bring religious principles home to a nation in its entire work and life.

A. C. WILSON

DEVIL.—The word came into English from Greek either directly or through its Latin transliteration. Used with the definite article, its original meaning was that of the accuser or tempter, whence it soon came to denote the supreme spirit of evil, the personal tempter of man and enemy of God. With the indefinite article it stands for a malignant being of superhuman nature and powers, and represents the conception expressed by the Greeks in the original of our term 'demon.' At first the idea of malignancy was not necessarily associated with these beings, some being regarded as harmless and others as working evil influence; but gradually they were considered as operating exclusively in the sphere of mischief, and as needing to be guarded against by magic rites or religious observances.

1. Earlier conceptions.—Jewish demonology must be traced back to primitive and pre-Mosaic times, when both a form of animism was present in a belief in the ill-disposed activity of the spirit of evil, and a variety of places and objects were supposed to be rendered sacred by the occupation, permanent or temporary, of some superhuman power. Of these views only traces can be found in the earliest parts of Scripture, and the riper development of later ages may fairly be ascribed to foreign, and especially Bab. and Greek, influences. That certain animals were believed to be endowed with demoniac power appears from Gn 3:14, though here the serpent itself is represented as demonic, and not yet as possessed by an evil spirit (Wis 2:4, Ro 16:19). So with the 'he-goats' or satyrs (Lv 17:7, 2 Ch 11:14, Is 13:33, 34), which were evidently regarded as a kind of demon, though without the rich accompaniments of the Greek conception. Their home was the open field or wilderness, where Azzazel was supposed to dwell (Lv 16:11), and whither towards all with whom men live, and even towards the brave and just, let go to carry back the disease (Lv 14:31). On the contrary, the roes and the hinds of the field (Ca 2:7) seem to have been thought of as fann-like spirits, for whose protection a lover might hopefully plead. Under Bab. influence the spirit was conceived as abstracted from any visible form, and as still capable of inflicting injury; hence the need of protection against 'the destroyer' of Ex 12:19. In Greek thought there took place a development partly parallel. The word used by Herodotus for the blessed soul of a hero becomes with Plato an abstraction influence, sometimes beneficent and helpful, but emerges in the orators and tragedies as descriptive of 'demonic', who bring misfortune and even even in cruelty.

2. Later Judaism.—Under these various influences the demonology of later Judaism became somewhat elaborately expanded. The concept of demon, or the devil, was used to embrace three species of existences. (1) It included the national deities, conceived as fallen, but not always as stripped of all power (Ex 12:19, Is 40:26, cf. 14:13).
(2) These were added—a survival with modification of the primitive animism—the spirits of the wicked dead (Josephus, Ant. v. 11, § 5, BJ v. viii. § 3), who were supposed to haunt tombs, or at least to be the men they possessed to do so (Mt 8:28). The devils of later Judaism are typically thought of as invisible spirits, to whom every ill, physical or moral, was ascribed. Their rebellion against the enthusiasm of the Spirit which was the soul of the OT. At times they do His bidding and are the ministers of His wrath, but in this sense are not classed in Scripture as devils; e.g. the 'angels of guidance' in the destroying angels of old (2 S 24:16, K J 119, Is 37:38, Ps 78:41). Yet they were thought to reside in the lower world in an organized kingdom of their own (Job 15:16; cf. Rev 9:11, Eph 2:2, Mt 12:28).
(3) It covered several of the angels as were thought to be once attendants upon the true God, but to have fallen (2 P 2, Jude 4, Ethiop. Enoch chs. 6, 7).
For a variety of personal spirits were interposed between God and mediating agencies according to Bab, and Persian views, or, according to the are mentioned of the second century,
'God of the New Testament. —In the NT., the period of the NT. devils as evil and Innumerable, was general amongst the nations, whether Jewish or Gentile; but in Jesus and His disciples the cruder features of the belief, such as the grotesqueness of the functions assigned to the devils, are not entirely outside the sovereign rule of Jehovah, who is the Lord of all spirits and of the abyss in which they dwell (Enoch 40, Dt 32:30, Job 11, Ps 39:10, Lk 16:14).

3. In the NT.—In the period of the NT. devils as evil and Innumerable, was general amongst the nations, whether Jewish or Gentile; but in Jesus and His disciples the cruder features of the belief, such as the grotesqueness of the functions assigned to the devils, are not entirely outside the sovereign rule of Jehovah, who is the Lord of all spirits and of the abyss in which they dwell (Enoch 40, Dt 32:30, Job 11, Ps 39:10, Lk 16:14).

This opinion is confirmed by the representation of the devil's relation to man and to God, and by many motifs which have been derived to other names.

He is the moral adversary of man (Mt 13:20, Lk 10:19, Eph 4:27, 1 P 5:12), acting, according to the OT, with the pernicious God (cf. Job 14:15), though with an assiduity that shows the function to be congenial, but in the NT. with a power of origination that is recognized, if watched and restrained. Hence he is called the 'tamer' (Mt 4, 1 Th 3), and the 'accuser' of those who listen to his solicitation (Rev 12:11). In hindering and harming men he stands in antithesis to Christ (2 Co 6:14), and hence is fittingly termed the evil and injurious one (Mt 6:10, Jn 12:16, Rev 6:1, 2 Th 3:1, 1 P 5:8, 1 Tm 6:13—but in some of these passages it is open to contend that the word is not personal).

Bent upon maintaining and spreading evil, he begins with the seduction of Eve (2 Co 11) and the luring of men to doom (Jn 8:44). Death, being thus laid upon the world (Ro 5:12, Wis 2:14), by the fear of it he keeps men in bondage (He 2:14). He entices men to sin (1 Co 7:7), as he enticed Jesus, though with better success, places every world obstacle in the way of their trust in Christ (2 Co 4:4), and thus seeks to multiply
'the sons of disobedience' (Eph 2), who may be rightly called his children (1 Jn 3:10).

In the final apostasy his methods are unchanged, and his hostility to everything good in man becomes embittered and insatiable (2 Th 2:3, Rev 20:10).
In regard to the devil's relation to God, the degree of independence and personal initiative is less in the OT than in the NT, but nowhere is there anything like the exact co-ordination of the two. The representation is not that of a dualism, but of the revolt of a subordinate though superhuman power, patiently permitted for a time for wise purposes and for the perpetually deferred day when God will do as he pleases. 'The devil associates himself with the sons of God,' and yet is represented as not strictly classed with them; he has the right of access to heaven, but his activity is subject to Divine consent. Another stage is marked in the Ch. where the statement of 2 S 24:1 is modified as though the devil worked in complete and unshackled opposition to God. In the Book of Enoch he is the ruler of a kingdom of evil, over which kingdom, however, the Divine sovereignty, or at least superiority, stands. The NT preserves the conception in most of its parts. God and the devil are placed in antithesis (Ja 4:4) so 'the power of darkness' and 'the kingdom of the Son of his love' (Col 1:13), as though evil itself, might be ascribed to the permissive will of God, with analogous limitations in each case. The psychical researches of recent years have tended to confirm the belief in spiritual existences, good and bad, and thereby to reconceive his superior authority. He is the stronger (Lk 11:12), and can even now, under the limitations of the moral probation of men, frustrate the devil's designs (Lk 22:38), and destroy his works (1 Jn 5:9), and will eventuate in his total destruction (Rev 20:10), and Christians share in it (Ro 16:20). It becomes complete and final at the Parousia (1 Co 15:23, Ps 130:9).

The personality of the devil must consequently be regarded as taught by Scripture. He is not conceived as the original or only source of evil, but as its supreme personal representative. His existence, like that of evil itself, may be ascribed to the permissive will of God, with analogous limitations in each case. DIBBLAH.—An unknown place mentioned by Ezekiel (6). A variant (prob. correct) reading is Riblah (wh. see). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DIBLAM.—The father of Gomer, Hoesa’s wife (Hos 19). See Hoesa.

DIBON.—1. A city east of the Dead Sea and north of the Arnon, in the land which, before the coming of the Israelites, Sihon, king of the Amorites, had taken from a former king of Moab (Nu 21:30). The Israelites dispossessed Sihon, and the territory was assigned to Reuben (Jos 13:27). 2. The ed. of Dibon is mentioned among those built (or rebuilt) by Gad (Nu 32:34), hence the name Dibon-gab by which it is once called (Nu 32:34). The children of Israel were not able to retain possession of the land, and in the time of Isaiah Dibon is reckoned among the cities of Moab (Is 15).

In Is 15 Dimon is supposed to be a modified form of Dibon, adopted in order to resemble more closely the Heb. word for blood (dwm), and support the play on words in that verse.

The modern name of the town is Dibab about half an hour N. of ‘Arar, which is on the edge of the Arnon Valley. It is a dreary and featureless ruin on two adjacent knolls, but has acquired notoriety in consequence of the discovery there of the Moabite Stone.

2. A town in Judah inhabited in Nehemiah’s time by some of the children of Judah (Neh 11). Perhaps it is the same as Dimonah (Jos 15) among the southernmost cities of Judah.

DIBRI.—A Danite, grandfather of the blasphemer who was stoned to death (Lv 24:11).

DIET.—In AV, apart from Sir 30, where it signifies ‘food,’ this word occurs only in Jer 52, where RV has the more correct ‘allowance,’ i.e., of food, as AV in the parallel passage 2 K 25. In Jer 49 the same word is rendered ‘victuals,’ but RV ‘vom allowance.’

DIMAH.—The name of a city in Judah, probably representing a nation or community.

DIMAH.—A Levitical city in Zebulon (Jos 21). The name is possibly a copyist’s error for Rimmon (cf. 1 Ch 6, Jos 19).

DIMON, DIMONAH.—See DIBON.

DINAH.—The daughter of Jacob by Leah, and sister of Simeon and Levi, according to Gn 35.

This verse appears to have been inserted by a late redactor perhaps the one who added the section 46-47 (cf. v. 24). Nothing is said in 20-30 35-52, where the birth stories of Jacob’s children are given, of other daughters of Jacob, but 37 (J) and 46 (P) speak of all his daughters, P, moreover, clearly distinguishes between his ‘daughters’ and his ‘daughters-in-law.’

In Gn 34 we have a composite narrative of the seizure of Dinah by the Hivite prince, Shechem, the son of Hamor. The probable remnant of J’s story make it appear that the tale, as it was first told, was a very simple one. Shechem took Dinah to his house and cohabited with her, and her father and brothers resented the defilement. Shechem, acting on his own behalf, proposed marriage, promising to accept any conditions Jacob laid down. The marriage took place, and afterwards her full brothers, Simeon and Levi, slew Shechem and took Dinah out of his house. Jacob rebuked them for this, because of the vengeance it was liable to bring upon his house. Jacob thinks only of consequences here. If, as is generally supposed, Gn 43 refers to this act, the reprimand administered was based by him not upon the dread of consequences, but upon the turpitude of a cruel revenge.

The remaining verses of ch. 34 make Hamor spokes-DINNAIETES.—A people settled in Samaria by Osnappar (i.e. probably Ashurbanipal). They have been variously identified with the Din-ja-enti, a tribe of western Armenia, mentioned in inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I.; and with the inhabitants of Desnaier, a Median city, or of Din-Sharru near Susa. The last view seems the most probable.

DINHABAR.—The capital city of king Bela in Edom (Gn 30:8—1 Ch 19). There is some doubt as to its identification. Possibly it is then Elah, E.N.E. from Heshbon.

DINNER.—See Meals, § 2.

DIONYSIA.—A feast in honour of Dionysus, another name of the god Bacchus (2 Mac 6:7). He was the god of tree-life, especially of the life of the vine and its produce. The festival celebrated the revival of the drink-giving vine after the deadness of winter. It was accompanied by orgiastic excesses, themselves at once offensive and, by cause, they renewed fertility of the soil. The most famous festivals of Dionysus, four in all, were held in Attica at various periods of the year, corresponding to the stages in the life of the vine, the Antheia, the Lena, the Lesser and the Greater Dionysia. The Lesser Dionysia was a vintage festival held in the country in December; the Greater Dionysia was held in the city, and it was in connexion with this that the tragedies and comedies were produced in the theatre of Dionysus. Attendance at these plays was an act of worship. In 2 Mac 6:8 we are told that Antiochus compelled the Jews to attend a festival of Dionysus, wearing wreaths of ivy, a plant sacred to the god.

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE.—A member of the University Court of the Areopagus at Athens (Ac 17:34), converted by St. Paul. The writings ascribed to Dionysius are of a much later date. He is by some identified with St. Denis of France.

DIONYSUS.—One of the various names applied to the god who is most commonly called Bacchus. It is probable that, to begin with, he was a god of vegetation in Greece, but in later times he became identified with the vine exclusively. It is supposed that this specialization originated in Thrace. Later still, the worship, under Assyrian and Babylonian influence, took the form of mysteries, like that of Demeter, goddess of bread. Mythology speaks of a triumphal journey taken by the god in India. His worship was widely disseminated over Greek lands, and it was assumed that the Jews would have no objection to it (2 Mac 6:14). Ploemey Philostratus also attempted to force the worship of Dionysus, the god of his family, upon the Jews (3 Mac 29).

DIOSCORINTHUS.—See Time.

DIOSCURI (RVm), or The Twin Brothers (RV), or Castor and Pollux (AV).—The sign or figurehead of the Alexandrian ship in which St. Paul sailed from Malta (Ac 28:11), perhaps one of those employed to bring corn to Rome. The Twins (Gemini) were the protectors of sailors; in mythology they were sons of Zeus and Leda, and were placed in the sky as a constellation for their brotherly love.

DIOSTROPHES.—A person, otherwise unknown, who is introduced in 3 John (v.v.16) as ambitious, resisting the writer's authority, and standing in the way of the hospitable reception of brethren who visited the Church.

DIPHATH occurs in RV and AVm of 1 Ch 19, but it is practically certain that AV Riphath (wh. see) is the correct reading.

DISALLOW.—1 2 Pet., 'a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God'; 2. 'the stone which builders disallowed.' The Eng. word means emphatically disallowed, as in the AV heading to 1 S 29, 'David, marching with the Philistines, is disallowed by their princes.' AV gives 'rejected,' as the same Gr. verb is rendered in Mt 21:124, Mk 11:172, and in Nu 30:1, 8. 'disallow' means no more than disapprove, as in Barlow's Dialogue, p. 83, 'ye can not fynde that they be disallowed of God, but rather approved.'

DISCIPLES.—In the ancient world every teacherhead his company of disciples or learners. The Greek philosophers and the Jewish Rabbis had theirs, and John the Baptist had his (Mk 3:17 'the disciples of John and the disciples of the Pharisees'; cf. Jn 1:28, Mt 19:19). In like manner Jesus had his disciples. The term had two applications, a wider and a narrower. It denoted (1) all who believed in Him, though they remained where He had found them, pursuing their former vocations, yet rendering not small service to His cause by confessing their allegiance and testifying to His grace (cf. Lk 6:19, Jn 4:60, 4. 7). (2) The inner circle of the Twelve, whom He called 'Apostles,' and whom He required to forsake their old lives and follow Him whithersoever He went, not merely that they might strengthen Him by their sympathy (cf. Lk 22:29), but that they might aid Him in His ministry (Mk 9:10, 1), and, above all, that they might be trained by daily intercourse and discipline to carry forward the work after He was gone. These were 'the disciples' par excellence (Mt 10:12-13, 1518, Mk 9:39, Lk 8:49, Jn 11:12 16-17). See also Apostles. David Smith.

DISCOVER.—In AV 'discover' is used in some obsolet meanings. 1. To uncover, make to be seen, as Knox, Hist, p. 250, 'who rashly discovering himself in the Trenches, was shot in the head.'] So Pr 29, 'the voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests,' and similar passages. 2. To disclose, as Shakespeare: "Wise, II. ii. 190, 'I shall discover a thing to you." So Pr 23, 'discover not a secret to another,' etc. 3. To descry, get sight of, as Ac 21, 'When we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand'; 2 Thess 2 they discovered a certain creek.

DISHON. — A son of Seir, Gn 36, 26. = 1 Ch 108, 47.

A son of Anah and grandson of Seir (Gn 36, cf. v. 36 = 1 Ch 14). Dishon should also be read for MT Dishan in Gn 36, 18. Dishan and Dishah are, of course, not individual names, but the eponyms of Hirtie clans. Their exact location is a matter of uncertainty.

DODANIM. — Named in the MT of Gn 16, among the descendants of Javan, or Torians. The LXX and Sam. versions and the parallel passage 1 Ch 11 read Dahanim, i.e. Rhodians. Cf. the reading of Eze 27, 12 under Dedan. J. F. McCurdy.

made for their use. Contact with the world gave them a broader outlook and a wider thought than the Palestinian Jews, and they conceived the idea of converting the world to Judaism. For uses in this propaganda the Sibyllic Oracles and other forms of literature likely to interest Greco-Roman readers were produced.

DODAVAHU

DODAVAHU ('beloved of J,' AV Dodaah).—Father of Eleezer of Maresah, the prophet who counseled Jehoshaphat for entering into alliance with Ahaziah (2 Ch 20:37). DODO (so the Qere, Kethib Dodi).—1. The father of Eleazar, the second of the three captains who were over the 'thirty' (2 S 23:9). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11:18) the nado and also 'the Ahohi' are for the erroneous 'son of Ahohi.' In the third list (1 Ch 27:17) Dodi is described as general of the second division of the army, but the words 'Eleazar the son of' appear to have been accidentally omitted. The traditional spelling (Dodo) is most probably right: the name Dudu has been found on the Tell el-Amarna tablets, apparently as that of an Amorite official at the Egypt. court. 2. A Benjamite, father of Elhanan, one of the 'thirty' (2 S 23:36, 1 Ch 11:18). 3. A man of Issachar, the forefather of Tola the judge (Jg 10:1). DOE.—RV (Fr 53'), AV 'roe,' is in Heb. yə'ādāh, the female òvox. See Wild goat, s.v. Goat.

DOEG.—An Edomite, and chief of the herdmen [or better, 'runners,' reading hā-라도 for hā-םון] of king Saul. When David fled to Nob to Ahimelech (or Abijah) the priest, Doeg was there 'detained before the Lord.' Upon his report Saul ordered Ahimelech and his companions to be slain. The order was carried out by Doeg, and the rest of the king's guard shrank from obeying it (1 S 21:10-15). Doeg is mentioned in the title of Ps. 62.

DOG.—All the Bible references to dogs breathe the modern Oriental feeling with regard to them; they refer to the common parish dogs. These creatures are in all their ways repugnant, and in the majority of cases they have not even outward attractiveness. They live in and around the streets, and act as scavengers. In the environs of Jerusalem, the valley of Hinnom, where sacrificial carcasses are cast out, they may be seen prowling around and consuming horrible, putrid bodies, or lying stretched near the remains of their meal, satiated with their loathsome feast. Whole companies of dogs consume the offal of the slaughter-house. There is not the slightest doubt that they would consume human bodies to-day had they the opportunity; indeed, cases do occur from time to time (cf. 1 K 14:16; 21:11; 2 S 24:20; 2 K 11:23, Jer 15:5, Ps 68:9). All night they parade the streets (Ps 59:9-14), each company jealously guarding that district which they have annexed, and fighting with noisy clamour or carinie stranger who ventures to invade their territory. Such a quarrel may start all the dogs in the city into a hideous chorus of furious barks. In many places these creatures are a real danger, and the wise man leaves them alone (Ps 56:9). To call a man a dog is a dire insult, but by no means an uncommon one from an arrogant superior to one much below him, and to apply such an epithet to himself on the part of an inferior is an expression of humility (2 K 3:9 etc.). A 'dead dog' is an even lower stage; it is an all too common object, an unclean animal in a condition of putridity left unconsumed even by his companions (1 S 24:5 etc.). The feeling against casting bread to a dog is a strong one; bread is sacred, and to cast to it dogs is to even to-day strongly condemned in Palestine (Mt 7:5). The shepherd dog (Job 30:9) is, as a rule, a very superior animal; many of these are handsome beasts of a Kurdish breed, and have the intelligent ways and habits of our best dogs when brought up with people's dogs at home. Greyhounds are still bred by some Bedouin in S. Palestine, and are used for hunting the gazelle; they are treated very differently from the parish dogs. Fr 30:9 is in a doubtful reference to the greyhound; RV has 'war horse,' LXX 'cock.'

The 'price of a dog' (Dt 23:19) evidently has reference to degraded practices of the gādēšīm ('male prostitutes') connected with the worship at 'Ba'al' temples.

DOK.—A fortress near Jericho, where Siron son of the Maccabee, along with two of his sons, was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, 1 Mac 16. The name survives in the modern 'Atin Dēt, 4 miles N.W. of Jericho.

DOLEFUL CREATURE.—See Jacob.

DOMINION.—Lordship, or the possession and exercise of the power to rule. In Col 1:16 the word is used in the plural, along with 'thrones, principalities, and powers,' to denote supernatural beings possessed of the power of lordship, and ranking as so many kings, princes, and potentates of the heavenly regions. The same word in the singular, and inessentially the same meaning, appears in Eph 1:21, where allusion is made to the exaltation of Christ 'far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come.' There is no necessary reference in either of these texts to evil angels, but a comparison of what is written in Eph 1:21-22 shows that 'the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' need not be excluded. Similar indefiniteness is apparent in the other two passages, 2 P 2:4, Jude 4, where the same word is understood by some to refer here to the lordship of civil rulers, or to any concrete representative of such lordship. Others believe that the reference is to angels, either good or evil, as representing some form of supernatural power and dominion, and the reference in the context to Michael, the archangel, not bringing a railing judgment even against the devil, may be thought to favour this view. A third explanation is also possible, and is favoured by the meaning in Jude 4 of 'our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ. Those unwitting men, who deny the Lord Jesus, would not hesitate to despise, set at nought, and rail at all manner of glorious lordships and dignities. See Authority, Power, etc.
Dove.—The words translated ‘dove’ apply equally to doves and pigeons. In Palestine seven varieties of the Columba are found. The most noticeable are: the wood pigeons or ring-doves (Columba palumbus), which fly in great flocks all over the land; the turtle-dove (Turtur communis), a harbinger of spring, arriving in the land in April (Jer 8:14, Ca 198); and the palm turtle-dove (Turtur senegalensis), which is common in a semi-domesticated state in the streets and courts of the East.

Dove's dung.—A fourth part of a 'cush' of this material was sold at a high price in Samaria during the siege (2 K 4:25). The words hort yinm, as they stand, are plain, and no suggested alternative has cleared up the difficulty. It is an example of the actual extent of the siege comparable with the threats of the approaching siege of 2 K 18:27. Whether, as Josephus suggests, the dung was a source of salt, or was used as medicine or as food, it is impossible to say.

Doves'.—Dothaim, an officer of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 19), 4. An officer of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12:26).

DOWRY.—See Marriage.

DRAUGHT.—See Dracm; Money, §§ 4, 7.

DRAUGHTHOUSE (Amer. RV 'draught-house').—2 K 10(20) South of the Mishna, which is in the house of Jehu, according to the last-mentioned passage, turned the temple of Baal in Samaria into public latrines.

DREAMS.—Sleep impressed primitive savages as a great mystery; and they consequently attributed a peculiarity significant to the dreams of sleepers, as phenomena which they could not control by their will or explain by their reason. In the lowest stage of culture all dreams were regarded as objectively real experiences; the god or spirit actually visited the dreamer, the events dreamed actually occurred. Hence any one who was subject to frequent dreaming was looked on as a special medium of Divine energy, and many sought to produce the state by artificial means, e.g. fasting or the use of drugs. In process of time dreams came to be treated rather as Divine warnings than as actual occurrences. Such admonitions could be deliberately sought, e.g. by sleeping in a sacred spot, such as the temples of Asklepios or the great streets and courts they could come unsought, when the gods wished either to reveal or to deceive. (Plato, however, while allowing that the gods may send dreams, denies that they can wish to the DOYAN (On 370). 2 K 6:18; Dotea, Jth 39; Doshalm, Jth 4 etc.).—To-day, b.l. 0, a remarkable isolated hill at the S.E. corner of a great plain Sahl 'Arrâbî; surrounded on three sides by hills (2 K 6:27). Clearly a place suitable for defence, it must have been of importance when the neighbouring high-road, still much used, was a main thoroughfare from Damascus to Egypt. The situation is, too, a choice one on account of its abundant fountan, now used to work a mill and irrigate fruit gardens; two ancient wells and a number of empty cisterns (2n 370) are also found near the foot of the tell. Great herds of cattle, sheep, and goats from the neighbouring abundant pastures, may always been gathered there in the season drinking from the water and basking in the shade. Although there are no ancient remains on the surface, traces of walls may be seen all around the hill top.

Doubt (from Lat. dubilare, 'to hold two opinions,' 'hesitate'). In AV 'doubts,' (vb. and n.). Sometimes renders a Gr. vb. meaning 'to be at a loss' or 'quite at a loss'; in all these instances except Jn 13:23 RV substitutes 'perplexity,' following the AV rendering of Lk 9:20, 2 Co 45. In this sense 'doubt' is now nearly obsolete and is used as it is in the sense of scruple, knotty question, which it bears in Dn 52. It is not dissimilar to its use in the AV of Jn 10:9 (to 'make us to doubt'), where RV, more literally, reads 'hold us in suspense.' Quite archaic also is the use of 'doubt' for 'suspect' instantiated in Sir 69(4) (AV). 2. Elsewhere 'doubt' has a religious signification, standing in express or tacit antithesis to 'faith' (wh. see). (a) In Mt 219, Mk 11:36, Lk 1096, Ac 1089, 11, Ro 142, Ja 1(10), RV, Jude 2(3), EY, it stands for a vb. signifying 'to be divided in mind (judgment)'—the same Gr. word is rendered 'staggered' in AV, 'wavered' in RV, of Ro 451; (b) in Mt 1428 257 'to be of two opinions,' 'to waver,' is the force of the original: the vb. above indicates (1) more subjectively, (2) more objectively, a state of qualified faith, of faith mixed with misgiving, something between whole-hearted faith and doubt. Thus wavering, his power is robbed of its power; hence such hesitation, in regard to Christ and the promises and commands of God, is strongly deprecated and reproved. In the above examples the doubt, affecting the mind of a believer, arises from contradictory circumstances or conscientious scruples; unless this be the case in Mt 289 (cf. Lk 249, noticed below), it has none of the quality of rationalistic doubt or scepticism. (c) Akin to the above is the expression of Lk 129, where 'of doubtful mind' (AV, RV) is the rendering of an obscure Gr. word that seems to mean being lifted into the air, and so agitated, held in suspense or driven by gusts (cf. Eph 44, Ja 145). (d) Another group of expressions remains: Ro 145 'doubtful disputations' (AV), 'decisions of doubts' (RVm); 1 Ti 23 'disputing' (RV) or 'doubting' (AV) as 'reasoning' (Lk 249 RV); 'disputings' (Ph 2B). In these passages arguing is intended, and (in Ro.) more properly, argument, debatable questions. This usage lies on the border between 1 and 2; for the questions referred to, except in Lk 249, did not directly belong to faith, but their agitation disturbed and tended to be taken it.

Thus, for instance, among the Babylonians, the Assyrians, the Arabs, the Egyptians, a profound importance was attached to dreams; there were professional interpreters of them (cf. Gn 40: 4 41, Dn 20), and manuals were compiled to aid the work of elucidation (cf. the Onomasticon of Artemidorus of Ephesus). Wiser theorists might discriminate between dreams, but popular superstition tended to regard them all as to be explained, as far as possible, in accordance with definite rules.

1. Among the Jews.—In both Testaments we find significance attached to dreams (Gn 27: 1 418, Jg 7: 14, Dn 29 70, Mt 19: 21, Lc 2: 21, Jn 1: 37), and in OT especially it seems that a great deal of vulgar superstition existed with regard to such phenomena; similarly necromancy and sorcery, though discouraged by the higher thought of the nation (cf. Dn 18: 13), were undoubtedly practised. We find hardly any traces, however, of dreams being regularly sought; 1 S 28: 6 may be one; and in Gn 28: 19 and 1 K 3: 6 it is possible to suppose a reference to the practice of sleeping in a sacred locality in order to receive a divine communication. On the whole the general trend of OT teaching is as follows:—Dreams may in some cases be genuine communications from God (Job 33: 18, 23: 9), and as such are reverenced (Gn 20: 8 11, 39: 5), though they are not treated as a universal sign of Divine inspiration (cf. Jc 18: 27, Rev 1: 19, 22: 18); but there are false dreams and lying dreams, against whom precautions are necessary; and the idea that habitual dreaming is a certain sign of Divine inspiration is stoutly combated by Jb 27: 21 and Mt 13: 58. Nevertheless, in OT origines is definitely recognized that the interpretation of dreams belongs to God, and is not a matter of human codification (cf. Gn 40).

2. Dressed.—The consideration of dreams is partly a subject for the sciences which treat of the general relations between body and spirit, and partly a matter of common sense. It seems clear that dreams are connected with the dreams of the subconscious mind and that the psychological lies mainly in the region beneath the ‘threshold of consciousness.’ But all dreams and all waking states are states of consciousness, whether it be partial or complete, and as such are subject to law; if any are to be regarded as ‘supernatural,’ it must be owing not to their methods but to their messages. Some dreams convey no message, and can be explained as valuable only by a resort to superstition. Others may be real revelations, and as such figure in the abhorred system of conceptions. In the dream, experience may be intensified and heightened in the dream-state, and thus an insight into Divine truth may be obtained which had been denied to the waking consciousness. Similarly, only the most advanced psychological writers are said to work it out in a dream a mathematical problem which had baffled his waking powers, and Coleridge to have dreamt the poem of Kubla Khan. But under any circumstances the interpretation of a dream ‘belongs to God’; the question whether its message is a Divine communication or not must be answered by an appeal to the standards of consciousness, or in other words to the higher reason. The awakened intelligence must be called in to criticize and appraise the deliverances received in dreams, and its verdict must decide what measure of attention is to be paid to them. Dreams, in short, may be the occasion of suggestions, but they are suggestive not affirmative directions.

DRESS.—The numerous synonyms for ‘dress’ to be found in our EV.—Latin, ‘attire,’ ‘clothes,’ ‘raiment,’ ‘garments,’ etc.—fairly reflect the wider vocabulary of terminology in the original Hebrew and Greek, more especially the former. As regards the particular articles of dress, the identification of these is in many cases rendered almost impossible for the English reader by the curious lack of consistency in the renderings of the translators, illustrations of which will be met with again and again in this article. For this and other reasons it will be necessary to have recourse to trans-literation as the only certain means of distinguishing the various garments to be discussed.

1. Materials.—Scripture and anthropology are in agreement as to the great antiquity of the skins of animals, wild and domesticated, as dress material (Gn 3 3 “coats of skin”; cf. for later times, Hc 11: 9). The favourite materials in Palestine, however, were wool and flax (Pr 31: 27). The finest quality of linen would probably an importation from Egypt (see Linen). Goats’ hair and camels’ hair supplied the materials for coarser fabrics. The first certain mention of silk is in Rev 18: 12, for the meaning of the word so rendered in first 16: 18 is doubted, and the silk of Pr 31: 27 (AV) is really ‘fine linen’ as in RV.

2. Under Garments.—(a) The oldest and most widely distributed of all the articles of human apparel was the loin-cloth (Heb. ’sôr), originally a strip of skin or cloth wrapped round the loins and fastened with a knot. Among the Hebrews in historical times it had been displaced in ordinary life by the shirt or tunic (see below). The loin-cloth or waist-cloth, however, is recorded in much earlier times in a few cases and of interesting survivals in OT, where it is unfortunately hidden from the English reader by the translation ‘girdle,’ a term which should be reserved for an entirely different article of dress (see § 3). Sometimes it is a form of bandage, for example, ‘girding’ of the waist with an ’ēsr of hair-cloth (EV ‘sackcloth’). Certain of the prophets, again, as exponents of the simple life, wore the waist-cloth as a sort of skirt, such as Elijah took (2 K 1: 8), and Jeremiah on another occasion (Jer 13: 1).

The noun and the cognate verb are frequently used in figurative senses, the point of which is lost unless it is remembered that the waist-cloth was almost worn next the skin, as e.g. in J 1: 24, Is 1: 10, the figure in the latter case signifying that righteousness and faithfulness are essential and inseparable elements in the character of the Mezzematic ‘Shoot.’

(b) The aprons of Ac 13: 43 were the Roman semicinctum, a short waist-cloth worn specially by slaves and workmen (see illustr. In Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Antiq., s.v.).

(c) In early times the priests wore a waist-cloth of linen, which bore the special name of the ephod (1 S 28: 4), and which the incident recorded in 2 S 6: 19, as priest, dancing before the ark—shows to have been of the nature of a kilt. By the Priests’ Code, however, the priests were required to wear the under-garment described under Breeches. See, further, Hosen.

(d) In OT, as has been said, the everyday undergarment of all classes—save for certain individuals or exceptional occasions—is the shirt or tunic, a term which reappears in Greek as chiton, and in Latin as tunicum. The uniform rendering of EV is coat, only Jn 19: 19 RVrm ‘tunicle.’ A familiar Assyrian sculpture, representing the shirt and coat of Lachish by Sennacherib, shows the Jewish captives, male and female alike, dressed in a moderately tight garment fitting close to the neck (cf. Job 30: 4) and reaching almost to the ankles, which must represent the kuthnom of the period as worn in towns. That of the peasantry and of most workmen was probably both looser and shorter, resembling in this respects its modern representative, the kamasa (Lat. camisia, our ‘chemise’) of the Syrian fellahin.

As regards sleeves, which are not expressly mentioned in OT—but see RVm at Gn 37: 24 (Joseph) and 2 S 13: 2 (Tamar)—three modes are found. An early Egyptian representation of a group of Semite traders (c. a.e. 2600) shows a coloured sleeveless tunic, which fastens on the left shoulder, leaving the right shoulder bare. The Lachish tunics, above mentioned, have short sleeves reaching half-way to the elbows. This probably repre-
DRESS

The ordinary tunic was made in at least three ways.
(1) It might consist of two similar pieces of woolen or linen cloth cut from a larger web, which were sewed together along the sides and top.
(2) The material for a single tunic might be woven on the loom, and afterwards put together without cutting, in the manner of the Egyptian tunics described and figured in Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. ‘Tunica’ (II. 904).
(3) As we know from the description of the chiton worn by our Lord at the time of His Passion (Jn 19), and from other sources, a third variety was woven ‘without seams’—a special loom (see Spicing and Weaving) and required no further adjustment.

The garment intended by the ‘coats’ of Nu 3. 37 (AV) is uncertain. Most recent authorities favour mantles (so AV; RV has ‘hauntes,’ whence ‘see’). For the ‘coat of mail’ see ARMOUR, 2 (c).

3. The Girdle.—Almost as indispensable as the tunic was the girdle, which varied in material and workmanship. The double rope (1 S 23: 29) and the more elaborate waist-belt of the priests, and the ‘golden girdles’ of Rev 18: 15. Usually it consisted of a long strip of cloth, folded several times and wound round the waist above the tunic, with or without the ends hanging down in front. When work or a journey was in contemplation, the girdle was put on, and part of the tunic drawn up till it hung over in folds. Hence this operation of untying the shoulder girdle became a figure for energetic action. The girdle served also as a sword-belt (2 S 20: 4); through it was stuck the warrior’s sword or spear (Ezk 9: 11), while its folds served as a purse (Mt 10: 20 RV). The special priests’ girdle, termed ‘abath’ (Ex 28: 9 and oft.), was richly embroidered and wound several times round the waist, according to Josephus, and tied in front, the ends falling to the ankles.

4. Upper Garments.—While the kutenoth or tunic was the garment in which the work of the day was done (see Mt 24: 11 RV, Mk 13: 11 RV), men and women alike possessed a second garment, which served as a protection against inclement weather by day and as a covering by night (Ex 22: 11). The two are sharply distinguished in the familiar saying of Jesus: ‘If any man sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also’ (Mt 5: 41).

The commonest name for this upper garment in OT is simlah or salmah. The simlah was almost certainly a large rectangular piece of cloth, in most cases of wool, in more special cases of linen. It was thus the exact counterpart of the kimono, of the Greeks, which we have seen to be its NT name, and the pallium of the Romans. Like them, it belonged not to the class of endymata or garments ‘put on,’ as the tunic, but to the peribolimata or garments ‘wrapped round’ the body.

Since this view is at variance with that of acknowledged authorities (Boessneck, Benzing, Mackie, and art. ‘Dress’ in Hastings’ DB, 639), who identify the simlah with the modern ‘aby,’ the coarse loose overcoat of the modern Syrian peasantry, the grounds on which it is based may be here briefly set forth. (1) If the parallel passages, Ex 22: 11, and Dt 24: 17 on the one hand, and Nu 15: 38 and Dt 22: 13 on the other, are compared, it is shown that three terms are used indiscriminately for the ordinary upper garment of the Hebrews, and, further, that this garment had four corners, to which the tassels were attached (see more fully Fronzo)—a detail which suggests a plain four-cornered plain like the himation, not a made-up garment like the chiton or tunic. (2) The sick woman in Mt 22: 37, and parallel passages, which reached forward in the crowd to touch the tassels of Jesus’ himation from behind, shows that the Jewish upper garment was still worn by being wrapped round the body, over the back from left to right, with one corner and its tassel falling over the left shoulder. (3) That it was the usual prayer-shawl of the modern Jews, with its four tassels, which is the direct descendant of the simlah and the more recent talith of the Mishna, is in favour of the former having the shape now advocated. (4) The clear distinction in NT already referred to, between the two principal garments of the Jews, confirms the conclusion that the typical Jewish upper garment closely resembled, if it was not identical with, the garment known as the himation throughout the Greek-speaking world.

In our EV the simlah is concealed from the English reader under a variety of renderings. Thus, to give but a few illustrations, it is the ‘garment’ with which Noah’s nakedness was covered in Gn 3: 21, and the ‘clothes’ in which the Hebrews bound up their knapsacks (Ex 12: 3); it is the ‘garment’ of Gideon in Jg 9, and the ‘raiment’ of Ruth (3: 3); just as the himation of NT is not only the ‘clokes’ of Mt 26: 4, but ‘the clothes’ of Mt 26: 5 (but ‘RV cloke’); ‘the garment’ of Mt 13, and so on.

Another variety of upper garment, known as the me’ul, is mentioned only in connexion with men of the high priestly order or the priestess (see Ex 28: 11; 29: 21); and of kings (see 1 K 10: 18); which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28). The robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. ‘corner’) which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28). The robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. ‘corner’) which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28). The robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. ‘corner’) which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28). The robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. ‘corner’) which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28). The robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. ‘corner’) which was cut off by David (1 S 24: 7)—of Jonathan (18), and of Ezra (Ezr 8: 29), the little ‘coat’ of the boy-priest and future high priest of the tribe of Levi. It had a hood (in 2 S 13: 28).
as a curtain, and as a shroud. In this last respect it resembled the NDāndinā, the 'linen cloth of Mt 27:40, Mk 15:40RV. It is probably as an upper garment of fine white linen for gala use (cf. Ec 9:9) that the sadding is introduced in Jg 14:4 RV. (AV 'sheets', RV 'linen garments') and Is 23:1.

(e) Mention must also be made of the 'scarlet robe' (chlamys) in which Jesus was arrayed by the Roman soldiers (Mt 27:28, 39). It is the 'pseudo-military cloak worn over their armour by the superior officers of the Roman army. The 'elope' finally, which St. Paul left at Troas (2 Ti 4:2) was the Roman pannula, a circular travelling cape. For the brooch or badge by which an upper garment was sometimes fastened, see ORNAMENTS, 5.

5. Head-dress.—(a) The Hebrews appear at first to have had no covering for the head, except on special occasions, thus, bare-headed as he wore a helmet was worn (see Amos I. 2 (b)). At most a rope or cord served as a fillet, as may be inferred from 1 K 20:14, and as may be seen in the representations of Syrians on the monuments of Egypt. In cases of exposed worship, it is most probable that recourse would be had to a covering in the style of the modern keffiyeh, which protects not only the head but also the neck and shoulders. Jehu's turban, above mentioned, are depicted as a headgear resembling the familiar Phrygian cap. The best attested covering, however—at least for the upper ranks of both sexes—is the twain from (a root signifying 'to bind' or 'to wrap') of Is 62:9, the 'hoof of Is 28:8 (RV 'turban'), and the 'mirc' of Zec 3:8 (RV 'turban or diadem'). A kindred word is used for the high priest's turban, the 'mirc of Ex 28:4, etc., for which see Mirzai. A turban is also implied in Ezekiel's description of a lady's headgear: 'I have bound thee with a sire of fine linen' (Ezk 16:8 RV). The egg-shaped turban of the ordinary priests has been discussed under Bonnet (RV 'headdress').

(b) In regard to the hairdressing of the female sex, we have seen that both sexes of the wealthier classes wore the twain or turban. The female captives from Lachish wear over their tunics an upper garment, which covers the falls down over the shoulder, and the back of the head as far as the neck. Whether this is the garment intended by any of the words rendered veil in AV, as that of Ruth, for example 3:18, RV 'mantle'), or by the 'herchief' of the head of Ezk 13:19 RV, it is impossible to say. The veil, however, with which Rebekah and Tamar covered themselves (Gen 24:25, 38v), was more probably a large mantle in which the whole body was wrapped, like the shawl (d). Indeed, it is impossible to draw a clear distinction in O.T. between the mantle and the veil. The only express mention of a face-veil is in the case of Moses (Ex 34:34).

6. Shoes and sandals.—Within doors the Hebrews went without shoes. Out of doors it was customary to wear either sandals or shoes, mostly the former. The simplest form of sandal consisted of a plain sole of leather, bound to the soles by a leather thong, the 'shoelatchet' of Gn 14:38 and the 'latching of Mk 1:6. The Assyrians preferred a sandal fitted with a heel-cap, by which they are distinguished from the Sultans' attendants on the obelisk of Shalmaneser, who wear shoes completely covering the foot. In Ezekiel's day ladies wore shoes of 'seal-skin' (Ezk 16:8 RV; but see BAGDAD'S SKINAS). The laced boot of the soldier may be referred to in Is 9 (see RV). The sandals were removed not only in cases of mourning (3 S 15:10) and of a visit to a friend, but also of entering a sacred precinct (Ex 31, Jos 5:9); the Jewish priests, accordingly, performed all their offices in the Temple barefoot.

7. It need hardly be said that the taste for 'purple and fine linen' was continued throughout the days of the exiles, as may be seen from the remarkable dress-list in Is 3:22, 24. Richly embroidered garments are mentioned as early as the time of the Judges (Jg 5:6 RV). King Josiah had an official who bore the title of 'keeper of the wardrobe' (2 K 24:4). The 'embroidered robe' (2 K 22:4). Their 'cloke' or garment, however, several times mentioned in OT, were not so many complete outfits, but special gala robes, for which one's ordinary garments were changed. In the East, such robes have existed as a fashion, and therefore served as an expression of esteem from sovereigns and other persons of high rank to the present day.

For what may be termed accessories of dress, see ORNAMENTS, SEAL, ETC.

8. A special interest must always attach to the question of the outward appearance of the Man of Nazareth, so far as it is associated with the dress He wore. This appears to have been at least six to seven centuries, not five, as Edersheim states (Life and Times of Jesus, I. 625). By the 1st cent. it had become usual to wear a linen shirt (chedah) beneath the tunic (see d above). In our Lord's case this may seem that a change of the upper garments (himattia, i.e. mantle and tunic) which He laid aside before washing the disciples' feet (Jn 13). The tunic proper, we know, was 'woven without seam throughout' and therefore fitted closely at the neck, with the usual short sleeves as above described. White linen was the favourite material for both skirt and tunic. Above the tunic was the linen girdle wound several times round the waist. On His feet were leather sandals (Mt 15:31). His upper garment, as has been shown, was of the customary oblong shape—probably of white woolen cloth, as is suggested by the details of the Transfiguration narrative in Mt 9:35—worn at the shoulders and about the neck, with the usual short sleeves as above described. spirit given by God (Gn 27, Ec 12). This conclusion need not be proved further, as this view is implied in all the teaching of the Bible about God, world, man. But, setting aside this new sense of the term, we must consider whether the Bible gives evidence of dualism in the older sense, the opposing of God any antagonist or hindrance in His creating, preserving, and ruling the world. It is held that dualism in three forms can be traced in the Bible—(1) the mythical, (2) the metaphysical, (3) the ethical. Each must be separately examined.

1. Mythical dualism.—In the Babylonian cosmology, Marduk, the champion of the upper deities, wages war against Tiamat, wage of the lower deities; at last he slays her, divides her body, and makes part a covering for the heavens to hold back the upper waters. There is little doubt that the account of the Creation in Gn 1 reproduces some of the features of this myth, but it is transformed by the monotheism of the author (see Bennett’s Genesis, pp. 67–72). Tiamat appears under the name Rahab in several passages (Job 9,3 (RV) 29,).”

2. Metaphysical dualism.—Greek thought was dualistic. Anaxagoras assumed hylã, ‘matter,’ as well as Nous, as the ultimate principles. Plato does not harmonize the world of ideas and the world of sense. Aristotle begins with matter and form. Neo-Platonism seeks to fill up the gulf between God and the world by a series of emanations. In Gnosticism the phûlos and the logos mediate between the essential and the phenomenal existence. St. John (1:14) meets this Greek thought of his environment by asserting that Christ is ‘the Word that is with God and is God, and was made flesh. Against Gnostic heretics St. Paul in Colossians (1:15–20) asserts that the phûlosma, the fulness of the Godhead, dwells bodily in Christ; this dualism is opposed the union of Creator and creation, reason and matter in Christ.

From this metaphysical there resulted a practical dualism in Greek thought, between sense and reason. While Aristotle thought that reason might use sense as an artist his material, Neo-Platonism taught that only by an ascetic discipline could reason be emancipated from the bondage of sense; and Stoicism treated sense as a usurper in man’s nature, to be crushed and cast out by reason. Holsten has tried to show that this dualism is involved in St. Paul’s doctrine of the flesh, and Pfleiderer also holds this position. It is held that St. Paul, starting from the common Hebraic notion of flesh (sarx), ‘according to which it signifies material substance, which is void indeed of the spirit, but not contrary to it, which is certainly weak and perishable, and so far unclean, but not positively evil,’ advances to the question of whether of the flesh ‘as an agency opposed to the spirit,’ having ‘an active tendency towards death.’ ‘From the opposition of physically different substances results the dualism of antagonistic moral principles’ (Pfleiderer’s Paulinism, 1, 52 ff.). This conclusion is, however, generally challenged with good reason, and cannot be regarded as proved. The question will be more fully discussed in art. Flesh.

3. Ethical dualism.—In Persian thought there are opposed to one another, as in conflict with one another,Ormuz and Ahriman, the personal principles of good and evil. While the OT recognizes the power of sin in the world, yet God’s ultimate causality and sole supremacy are affirmed. In post-exilic Judaism, however, there was a twofold tendency so to assert the transcension of God that angels must be recognized as mediating between Him and the world, and to preserve His moral perfection by assigning the evil in the world to the agency of evil spirits under the leadership of Satan, the adversary. While these tendencies may be regarded as inherent in the development of Hebrew monotheism, both were doubtless stimulated by the influence of Persian thought with its elaborate angelology and demonology. In the Apocalyptic literature the present world is represented as under Satan’s dominion, and as wrested from him by a supernatural manifestation of God’s power to establish His Kingdom. This dualism pervades the Apocalypse. In the NT generally the doctrine of the devil current in Judaism is taken over, but the Divine supremacy over the Divine adversary over all evil is always confidently anticipated. (See art. Apoc.

Duke.—The title of ‘duke’ in the AV has a very general meaning. It is an inheritance from the Eng. of earlier versions, in which (after Vulg. dux) ‘duke’ means a leader of a tribe. Later it came to mean a duke, and Wyclif uses this title of Christ, as in his Works (iii. 137), ‘Jesu Christ, ducie of oure batel.’ The title of ‘duke’ is confused in AV to the chiefs of Edom, with the exception of Jos 13:3. ‘Dukes of Shilon,’ and 1 Mac 106 (applied to Jonathan Maccabaeus).

Dulcimer.—This term, which denotes a stringed instrument (? the medieval ‘palestrina’; see Musc, § 4 (1) (b)), is given incorrectly by EV in Dn 3:21 as tr. of campanella (Gr. loan-word), which prob. = ‘bisperpe’; see Musc, § 4 (2) (d).

Duma.—1. Cited in Gn 25:4 (1 Ch 1:5) as among the twelve tribes of Ishmael. The region thus indicated is supposed to be the oasis formerly called by the Arabs Dumman el-Jendel and now known as el-Jer, about three-fourths of the way from Damascus to Medina. The same place may be referred to in the obscure oracle Is 21:6, but the LXX has ‘Idumea,’ and it is possible that Edom is meant. 2. The name of a town in the highlands of Judah (Jos 15:24). The reading is not certain. The LXX and Vulg. indicate Rumah, and not all editions of the Hebrew agree. If the received text is correct, an identification may be plausibly made with ed-Dumaeh 10 miles S.W. of Hebron. J. F. McCown.

Dumness.—See Medicine.

Dung.—1. Used in the East as manure (Lk 19) and for fuel; especially that of cattle, where wood and charcoal are scarce or unattainable. Directions for preparing medicinal cleanliness are given in Dub 25; and in the case of sacrifices the duag of the animals was burnt outside the camp (Ex 29:4, Lv 4th). 11 87, Nu 19). 2. The word is used (a) to express contempt and abhorrence, as in the case of the carcass of Jesebl (2 K 4:27); in that of the Jews (Jer 9:2, Zep 1:11). (b) The spread dung upon the face was a sign of humiliation (Mal 2:2). (c) As representing worthlessness, Paul counted all things but dung that he might win Christ (Ph 3:19).
DURA, PLAIN OF

DURA, PLAIN OF.—The precise locality is uncertain, but it must be in the vicinity of Babylon. Perhaps the name is derived from the Bab. duru—'wall,' which is frequently used as a town name. Oppert (Ex Frede. et Mesop. t. 258) found a small river so named, falling into the Euphrates 6 or 7 miles S.E. of Babylon, the neighbouring mounds being also named Total Dura. A curious Talmudic legend makes this plain the scene of Ezekiel’s vision (37–41), which it regards as an actual event (Schen. 82 b).

J. TAYLOR.

DWARF is the rendering in AV and RV of dog, a word (Ls 216) denoting one of the physical disqualifications by which a priest was unfit for service. The word means thin, lean, small. The conjecture that it here means a dwarf is plausible. But others regard it as denoting an unnaturally thin man—a consumptive, perhaps.

DYING.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 6; COLOURS, 6.

DYSENTERY.—See MEDICINE.

EAGLE.—(1) nesher, Dt 32:4 etc., Ls 11:1 RVm 'great vulture.' (2) ratkhám, Ls 11:4, AV 'gier eagle,' RV 'eagle,' (3) aitea, Mt 24:31 Lk 17:27 (RVm 'vultures'), Rev 4:12 324. The Heb. nesher is the equivalent of the Arab. nfr, which includes eagles, vultures, and ospreys. It is clear from Mt 1:26 enlarge thy baldness as the eagle, that the vulture is referred to. There are noted varieties of eagles and four of vultures known in Palestine. The references to nesher are specially important as applied to the griffon vulture (Gyps fulvus), a magnificent bird, 'the most striking zoological feature of Palestine' (Tristram), found especially around the precipitous gorges leading to various parts of the Jordan Valley. Job 39:27 and Jer 49:28 well describe its habits; and its powerful and rapid flight is referred to in Is 46:12, Dt 28:1, Hab 1:11. Ratkhám corresponds to the Arab. rakham, the Egyptian vulture, a ubiquitous scavenger which visits Palestine from the south every summer.

E. W. G. MASTERSMAN.

EAR.—Both in OT and NT the spiritual disposition to attend, which issues in obedience, is thus designated (e.g. Is 6:11, Mt 11:15, Rev 27). Hence 'to uncover the ear' (RVm, Is 5:9 etc.)—to reveal; the 'uncumbrised ear' (Jer 6:10)—the ear which remains unparalysed and clogged and therefore unable to perceive: hence 'mine ears hast thou opened' (Ps 40:3)—Thou hast enabled me to understand. The perforated ear was a sign of slavery or dependence, indicating the obligation to attend (Ex 21:12, Dt 15:10). The tip of the priest's right ear was touched with blood in token that the sense of hearing was consecrated to God's service (Lev 21:20). The tip of the right ear of a sacrificial animal was perforated as a mark of the owner (Lev 27:26). The tip of the right ear of a slave who fled the owner was pierced to indicate his ownership (Lev 25:37–39). The tip of the right ear of a captive enemy was pierced and tied with a mark of ownership (Dt 21:10). The piercing of an ear was an ancient form of derision (Ps 109:9). The complete act of piercing the ear was an ancient punishment (Ex 21:18, Lev 20:10, Dt 15:10). The piercing of the ear was also a symbol of the dedication of a slave to his master (Dt 15:10). The piercing of the ear was also a symbol of the dedication of a slave to his master (Dt 15:10). The piercing of the ear was also a symbol of the dedication of a slave to his master (Dt 15:10).

E. W. G. MASTERSMAN.

EARING.—Gn 48:14: 'There shall be neither eating nor harvest.' 'Earing' is the old expression for 'ploughing.' The verb 'to ear' (connected with Lat. arare) also occurs, as Dt 21:4 'a rough valley, which is neither cared nor sown.'

EARN.—In 2 Co 1:9, Eph 1:1 St. Paul describes the Holy Spirit as the believer's 'earnest.' The word means 'part-payment,' the deposit being in kind in what is to follow. Cf. Tindale's (1563) use of 'earnest-money;' that assured saving health and earnest-money of everlasting life.' Rabbi Greenstone (JE v. 26) quotes Kid. 3a to the effect that the payment of a perutah, the smallest coin of Palestinian currency, on account of the purchase, was sufficient to bind the bargain. The Gr. word was probably introduced by the Phoenicians. Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 108 f.) shows that in 2 Co 1:11 the verb 'eashteth' connects a legal idea and stands in 'an essential relation to 'earneth' in v. 2. St. Paul represents the relation of God to believers under the image of 'a legally guaranteed security.'

J. G. TASKER.

EAR-RING.—See AMULETS; 2; ORNAMENTS, 2.

EARTH in OT usually stands for one or other of the Heb. words 'etz and 'adam. In AV these are rendered indiscriminately 'earth' and 'ground,' but RV distinguished them by using, to some extent, 'earth' for the former, and 'ground' for the latter. Both words have a wide range of meanings, some of which they possess in common, while others are peculiar to each. Thus 'etz denotes: (a) earth as opposed to heaven (Gn 4:11); (b) dry land as opposed to sea (19:9); 'adam is specially used: (a) for earth as a specific substance (Gn 2:7, 2 Kgs 5); (b) for the surface of the ground, in such phrases as 'face of the earth.' Both words are employed to describe: (a) the soil on which plants grow, 'adam being the more common term in this sense; (b) the whole earth with its inhabitants, for which, however, 'adam is but rarely used; and (c) a land or country, this also being usually expressed by 'etz.' In one or two cases it is doubtful in which of the two last senses 'etz is to be taken, e.g. Jer 22:19 (EV 'earth,' RVm 'land').

In NT the Gr. words for 'earth' are ge and oikoumen, the former having practically all the variety of meanings mentioned above, while the latter denotes especially the whole inhabited earth, and is once used (Heb 26) in a still wider sense for the universe of the future. See, further, art. WORLD.

JAMES PATRICK.

EARTHQUAKE.—The whole formation of the country running in a straight line from the Taurus range to the gulf of Akabah, which therefore includes Central Judaea, reveals a volcanic character of a striking kind. That this large tract was, in days gone by, the scene of frequent and terrible earthquakes, admits of no doubt. Apart from the actual occurrences of earthquakes recorded in the Bible and elsewhere (e.g. at the time of the battle of Actium, in the seventh year of the reign of Herod the Great, Jos. Ant. xv. 2), the often-used imagery of the earthquake bears eloquent testimony to a fearful experience. It is necessary to distinguish between actual earthquakes and those which belong to the descriptive accounts of theophanies or Divine manifestations of wrath, etc. Of the former only one is mentioned in the OT, which that occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Am 1:1, 2; 14); among the latter must be included such references as Ex 10:14, 1 K 19:10, Nu 16:9, Ps 18:8, 77:10, 104; Is 29 etc. In the NT it is recorded that an earthquake occurred at the Crucifixion (Mt 27:3), at the Resurrection (Mt 28:6), and on the night of St. Paul's imprisonment in Philippi (Ac 16:30); further, it is foretold that there shall be earthquakes at Christ's second coming (Mt 24:7, Mk 13, Lk 21); their mention in Rev. is characteristic of apocalyptic literature.

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE.—A common designation of the inhabitants of the Syrian desert, who were partly Aramaic and partly Arabian (Jg 3:24, 32. Ez 25:16, Is 11:14, Jer 49:32, Job 15). Certain of them had obtained great renown for wisdom (1 K 5:19).

J. F. McCurdy.
EAST SEA, EASTERN SEA.—See Dead Sea.

EASTER (AV of Ac 12; RV 'the Passover').—The anachronism of AV was inherited from older MSS which sought to express, as far as possible, expressions which could not be understood by the people.

EBAL.—1. Name of a son of Joktan (1 Ch 1:8; in Gn 10:27 Obal), probably representing a place or tribe in Arabia. 2. A son of Shobal of Seir (Gn 36:4, 1 Ch 1:10).

EBAL.—Now Jebel esh-She'malif, a mountain north of Nabudis (Snechem), 1207 ft. above the valley, 3077 ft. above the sea. Ruins of a fortress and of a building called a little 'gourough' extend on its summit, as a Mohammedan shrine said to contain the skull of John the Baptist. The mountain commands an extensive view over almost the whole of Galilee, which includes part of the oasis of Gilead.

EBAN.—A mountain called a 'holy mountain' (De 32:43; Ps 89:55; Jer 51:27) by the people of Israel. It is 7880 ft. high. It was one of the 'high' mountains in Israel, and a mountain of God.

EBED.—1. Father of Gaal (Jg 9:20). 2. One of those who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8:2).

EBED-MELECH.—An Ethiopian, enuch, by whom Jeremiah was released from the pit-prison (Jer 38:17, 39:13). It is possible that the name Ebed-melech, which means servant of (the) king, may have been an official title.

EBEN-EZER (the stone of help) (LXX 'of the helper').—1. The scene of a disastrous battle in which the ark was lost (1 S 4:4, 5). 2. The name of the stone erected to commemorate an equally glorious victory (7 S 8). The precise situation is uncertain, but it Shen (7 S 7), and 'the mount of the river (De 11:10) modern 'Ain Semiyeh, a little N. of Bethel, the locality is approximately defined. Samuel's explanatory words should be read thus: 'This is a witness that Jehovah has removed them from J.' T. J. Young.

EBER.—1. The eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews (the first letter in both words being the same in the Heb.), the great-grandson of Shem, and 'father' of Peleg and Joktan (Gn 10:2, 11:12). The word 'Eber signifies 'the other side,' 'across'; and 'the' 'Hebrew,' which is in form a gentle name denoting the inhabitant of a country or member of a tribe, is usually explained as denoting those who have come from 'Ahar han-nahar' (see Jos 24:8), or 'the other side of the River' (the Euphrates), i.e. from Haran (Gn 11:26), in Anam-naharaim the home of Abraham and Nahor (Gn 24:1, 17). According to S Syrian, however (Ezr. T. xvi. [1907] p. 23), the word is of Bab. origin, and denoted originally the 'traders' who went to and fro across the Euphrates. In the genealogies in Gn 10, 11 the district from which the 'Hebrews' came is transformed into an imaginary eponymous ancestor. Why Eber is not the immediate, but the sixth ancestor of Abraham, and why many other tribes besides the Hebrews are reckoned as his descendants, is perhaps to be explained (König) by the fact that, though the Israelites were in a special sense 'Hebrews,' it was remembered that their ancestors had long made the region 'across' the Euphrates their resting-place, and many other tribes (Peleg, Joktan, etc.) had migrated from it. What Eber means in Nu 24:10 is uncertain; most probably perhaps, the country across the Euphrates (§ with Asshur, i.e. Assyria).

EBEZ.—A city of Issachar (Jas 12). Possibly the ruin el-Beltlah, east of Carmel.

EBIASAPH.—See Jehoram.

EBONY (κοίνυμ, Ezk 27:12) is the black heart-wood of the date-plum, Diospyros ebenum, imported from S. India and Ceylon. It was extensively imported by Phoenicians, Babylonians, and Egyptians for the manufacture of valuable vessels and of idols.

E. W. G. MASTERTON.

EBRON (Jos 19:21).—A town in the territory of Asher, elsewhere called Abdon (wh. see, 5), which is probably the correct form. It was a Levitical city (Jos 21:21; 1 Ch 6:61). The site has not been identified.

EBUSUS.—See EPHESUS.

ECCHUS.—See EPHESUS.

ECHELON.—See ETHIOPIA.

ECHEBATAN.—See ACHABATH.

ECHELON.—1. Tents and Canonicity. The title has come to us through Jerome from the LXX, in which it was an attempt to express 'He, being the root' ('Kohlai')—the assembly being all who give their hearts to the acquisition of wisdom. The book is one of the third group of Deuteronomistic history (cf. the Heb. Book of Deut.), which were the latest to receive recognition as canonical Scripture. It appears to have been accepted as Scripture by c. n.c. 100. At the synod of Jamnia (c. A.D. 100) the canonicity of Ec, the Song of Solomon, was brought up for discussion, and was confirmed.

2. Author and Date. The book contains the outpourings of the mind of a rich Jew, at the beginning of the 2nd cent. n.c. We may perhaps gather that he was in a high station of life, for otherwise his very unorthodox reflections could hardly have escaped oblivion. He could provide himself with every luxury (2 S 19), though he had private servants and debtors, and living 70-80 seems to imply that his life had been saddened by a woman who was unworthy of him. He was apparently an old man, because his attempts to find the 'sumnum bonum of life in pleasure and in wisdom, which could hardly have been abandoned in a few years, were now bygone memories (117-21). And he lived in or near Jerusalem, for he was an eye-witness of events which occurred at the 'holy place' (8:3). That is all that he reveals about himself. But he is a three-dimensional picture of the state of his country. The king was 'a child'—much too young for his responsible position; and his courtiers spent their days in drunken revelry (108), he was capricious in his favouritism (xv. 4), violent in temper (v. 4), and despotic (§ 4). The result was that wickedness usurped the place of justice (§ 4), and the upper classes crushed the poor with an arrogance from which there was no escape (4); the country groaned under an irresponsible officialism, each official being unable to move a finger in the cause of justice; because he was under the thumb of a higher one, and the highest was a creature of the tyrant (57); and in such a state of social rottenness espionage was rife (108). The only passage which distinctly alludes to contemporary history is 4:14-18, but no period has been found which fits all the facts. In § 8 the historical allusion is improbable, and 9:14-15 is too vague to afford any indication of date.

The book is, or probably, 1-21 only, written under the guise of Solomon. In 2 (according to the most probable interpretation of the verse) the writer appears to throw off the impersonation. But the language and grammatical peculiarities of the writing make it impossible to ascribe it to Solomon, and the Heb. language, which had been pure enough for some time after the return from Babylon, began to decay from the time of Nehemiah. There are signs of the change in Ezr., Neh., and Mal., and it is still more evident in Chron., Es., and Eccl., the latter having the most striking Mashnic idioms. It must therefore be later (probably much later) than Esther (c. n.c. 300), but before ben-Sira, who alludes to several passages in it (c. n.c. 150). It may thus be dated c. n.c. 200.

3. Composition. Of the most striking features of the book is the frequency with which a despairing sadness alternates with a calm pious assurance. Many have seen in this the struggles of a religiously minded man halting between doubt and faith; e.g. Plumptre compares this mental conflict with Tennyson's 'Two Voices'. But the more the book is read, the more the reader feels that this is not so. The contrasts are so sudden; the scepticism is so despairing, and the piety so calm and assured, that they can be explained only on the assumption of interjections by other hands. Moreover, in the midst of the despair and the faith there are scattered proverbs, somewhat frigid and didactic, often with no relevance to the context. The literary history of the writing appears to be as follows: (a) The gnomic character of some of Koheleth's remarks, and the ascription to Solomon, attracted one of the thinkers of the day whose minds were dominated by the Pietistic movement, and he is, as it were, only an observer, of the book of Proverbs. He enriched the original writing with proverbs culled from various sources. (b) But that which attracts also repels. The book as a whole may be seen in the Book of Wisdom, in which (21:27) the writer collects some of Koheleth's despairing reflections; and, placing them in the mouth of the ungodly, raises his voice against them. There were left, however, the time not only gnomic moralizers, but also men of intense, if narrow, piety—men of the temple: afterwards seen in the Maccabees. One of these interpolated eldest quotes (4:18) the words of Solomon. That is the 'judge of God.' In every case except 2:27 [Heb. 4:17-5] his remarks explicitly correct some complaint of Koheleth to which he objected. 12:21 is a postscript to the 'wise man,' and vv 19-20 by the pious man. The additional passages which appear to be due to the former are 4:3, 8-12, 717-42, 51191, 190-3, 414-8, 12141, and to the latter 22:3 463, 17 471 1728, 262, and for 8-14, 11-14, 12-17, 12-19.

4. Koheleth's reflections. (a) His view of life.—After the exordium (1-29), in which, under the guise of Solomon, he explains that he made every possible attempt to discover the meaning and aim of life, the rest of the writing consists of a miscellaneous series of pictures, illustrating his recurrent thought that 'all is a vapour, and a striving after wind.' And the conclusion at which he arrives is that man can aim at nothing, guide himself by nothing. His only course is to fall back upon present enjoyment and industry. It is far from being a summum bonum; it is not an Epicurean theory of life; it is a mere modus vivendi; 'whereby he may not take much account of the days of his vanity' (5:18). And to this conclusion he incessantly returns, whenever he finds life's mysteries insoluble: 2:11, 3811, 57, 8-19, 619, 11-18 (exc. 12), 12-17, 13-17, 17-15. His ideas...It is improbable that he came into immediate contact with any of the Greek schools of thought. It has often been maintained that he shows distinct signs of having been influenced by both Stoic and Epicurean philosophy. Of the latter it is difficult to discern the slightest trace; but for the former there is more to be said. But there is nothing at which a thinking Jew, of a philosophical temper of mind, could not have arrived independently. And it must be remembered that even Stoicism was not a purely Greek product; its founder Zeno was of Phoenician descent, and his followers came from Syria, Cilicia, Carthage, and other Hellenistic (as distinct from Hellenic) quarters. Koheleth occupies (what may be called) debatable ground between Semitic and Greek thought. He has lost the vitality of belief in a personal God, which inspired the earlier prophets, and takes his stand upon a somewhat colourless monothelm. He never uses the personal name 'Jahwe,' but always the descriptive title 'Elohim' (4 times) or 'the Elohim' (16 times), 'the deity' who manifests Himself in the inscrutable and irresistible forces of Nature. At the same time he never commits himself to any definitely pantheistic statements. He has not quite lost his Semitic belief that God is more than Nature, for His action shows evidence of design (30:18; 8:18; 31:11). Moreover, God's work—the course of Nature—is seen as the form of an endless cycle. Events and phenomena are brought upon the stage of life, and banished into the past, only to be recalled and banished again (1:10). And this, for Koheleth, paralyzes all real effort; for no amount of labour can produce anything new or of real profit—one no one can add to, or subtract from, the unswerving chain of facts (19:1-2, 11:15-17); no one can meld with Him that is mightier than the power of the world. And he gains no relief from the expectation of Messianic peace and perfection, which animated the orthodox Jew. There are left him only the shreds of the religious convictions of his father's faith, 'eternal retribution' which has fatalism and altruism among its ingredients.

5. The value of the book for us lies largely in its very deficiencies. The untroubled orthodoxy of the pious man who corrected what he thought was wrong, the moral aphorisms of the 'wise man,' and the Welschmerz of Koheleth with his longing for light, were each examples of the state of thought of the time. And the three classes of the book, the poet, the didactic (1 Co 1:26—the 'scribe' (who clung faithfully to his accepted traditions), the 'wise man,' and the 'sinner of this world.' Each possessed elements of lasting truth, but each needed to be answered, and raised to a higher plane of thought, by the revelation of God in the Incarnation. A. H. McNeile.

ECCLESIASTICUS.—See APOCRYPHA. § 13.

ECLIPSE.—See SUN.

ED.—In the Hebrew (and also in the Greek) text of Jos 229° the name given by the two and a half tribes to the altar erected by them on the east side of Jordan, which has dropped out. Our English translators have filled the gap by inserting Ed as the name of the altar in question. For this they have the authority of a few MSS.

The location of this altar on the east bank of the Jordan is required by the whole tenor of the narrative. The west bank is suggested by y 19° in its present form, and maintained also by AV in v 19°, by a translation of doublet admissibility, 'in the front of the land of Canaan, on the side that pertained to the children of Israel.'

EDDINUS.—One of the 'holy singers' at Josiah's passover (1 Es 19°). In the parallel passage 2 Ch 35:2 the corresponding name is Jeduthun, which is read also, contrary to MS authority, by AV in 1 Esdras. The text of the latter is probably corrupt.

EDEN.—2 Ch 29:24 31:9, a Levite, or possibly two. It is not certain that Eden is the true form of the name LXX has Jodan in the first, Odom in the second passage. When it transcribes Eden elsewhere it is usually in the form Edem. J. Taylor.

EDEN, CHILDREN OF.—The people occupying Beth-Addini (2 K 18:19. Is 37:22) see CANAANITE. See EDEN [HOUSE OF], Telassar (2 K 19:10) may perhaps be Tl Bashir of the inscriptions. J. Taylor.

EDEN GARDEN OF.—Gn 21 relates how God planted a garden in the East, in Eden. A river rose in that land, flowed through the garden, and then divided into four streams. Within the enclosure were many trees useful for food; also the tree of life, whose fruit conferred immortality, and the tree of knowledge, which gave wisdom. God's word was the course of knowledge, they were expelled, and precluded from re-entering the garden. In this account Gn 2:8-12, 31° seems to be interpolations. But the topographical data in 2:8-12° are of especial importance, because they have supplied the material for countless attempts to locate the garden. It has been almost universally agreed that one of the four rivers is the Euphrates and another the Tigris. Here the agreement ends, and no useful purpose can be served by an attempt to enumerate the conflicting theories. Three which have found favour of late, may be briefly mentioned. One is that the Gihon is the Nile. The Phismon the Persian and Arabian rivers are conceived of as a great river, with its source and that of the Nile not far from those of the Euphrates and the Tigris. Another regards Eden as an island not far from the head of the Persian Gulf near the mouths of the Euphrates the Tigris, the Karkh, and the Karun. The third puts Eden near Erebu (once the seaport of Chaldea on the Persian Gulf), and takes the Phismon to be the canal after the Flood in the material. In support of the last-named view a cuneiform tablet is quoted which speaks of a tree or shrub planted near Erebu by the gods. The sun-god and the peerless mother of the gods, in the bab bimm = 'plain.' The Bab. author would conceive of the garden as lying in a district near his own land, hard by the supposed common source of the great rivers. And this, to the Hebrews, is in the East.

Eden, or the garden of Eden, became the symbol of a very fertile land (Gn 13^1), Is 51^1, Ezek 31^1, 13, 14, 31 29. The dirge over the king of Tyre (Ezk 282^1) is founded on a Paradise legend which resembles that in Gn., but has a stronger mythological colouring. The 'garden of Eden' is associated with the well-known and mythical mountain of the gods (y^4); the cherub and the king of Tyre are assimilated to each other; the stones of fire may be compared with the flame of a sword (Gn 3^1). The later literature, however, has many references to the garden of Paradise lost, and the gardens of the Paradise to come (lx. xiii. lv ixviii. etc.). J. TAYLOR.

EDEN, HOUSE OF.—A place or district connected politically with Damascus (Am 1^11; ym Beth-eden). The five suggestions for locality the likeliest is 'Eden or Edem, 20 miles N.W. of Baalheke, on the N.W. slope of Lebanon. Its most formidable competitor, Bit-Adini, a district on either bank of the Middle Euphrates, frequently mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions, is too far—200 miles—from Damascus, and in the days of Amos had long been subject to Assyria. J. TAYLOR.

EDER.—1. Gn 35^9. 'And Israel journeys, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Eder.' 'Eder means 'a flock,' and the phrase Midgul-edar ('flock-tower,' c. Mic 4^9) would have been the appellation given to a tower occupied by shepherds for the protection of their flocks against robbers (cf. 2 K 19^5, 2 Ch 28^6). The tower here mentioned lay between Bethlehem and Hebron (vv.1^1, 2). Jerome mentions a Jewish tradition that this Eder was the site of the Temple, but himself prefers to think that it was the spot on which the shepherds received the angels' message. 2. Jos 15^9. The name of one of the towns of Judah 'in the south,' close to the Edomite frontier; perhaps RH. d-Adar, 5 miles S. of Gaza. 3. 1 Ch 21^3. 24^4. The name of a Merarite Levite in the days of David. 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8^19).

EDINA.—Wife of Raguel of Ecbatana, and mother of Sarah, who became wife of Tobias (To 7^8, 10^11). See Apocrypha, § 8.

EDOM, EDOMITES.—The Edomites were a tribe or group of tribes residing in early Biblical times in Mount Seir (Gn 27^5, 28^9), but excluded territory on both sides of it. At times their territory seems to have included the region to the Red Sea and Sinai (1 K 8^2, Jg 5^1). Edom or Esau was their reputed ancestor. The Israelites were conscious that the Edomites or the tribe of Edom were near kinsmen, hence the tradition that Esau and Jacob were twin brothers (Gn 25^24). That the Edomites were an older nation they showed by making Esau the first-born twin. The tradition that Judah tricked Esau out of his birthright (Gn 27), and that enmity arose between the brothers, is an actual reflexion of the hostile relations of the Edomites and Israelites for which the Israelites were to a considerable degree responsible.

Before the conquest of Canaan, Edom is said to have refused to let Israel pass through its territory (Nu 20^2; 22). Probably during the period of the Judges, Edomites invaded southern Judah (cf. Jdt, Esra and Palestine, etc.). Possibly Nehemiah, who wrote at Jerusalem, founded on the common source of the great rivers. And this, to the Hebrews, is in the East.

Eden, or the garden of Eden, became the symbol of a very fertile land (Gn 13^1; Is 51^1, Ezek 31^1, 13, 14, 31 29). The dirge over the king of Tyre (Ezk 28^2) is founded on a Paradise legend which resembles that in Gn., but has a stronger mythological colouring: the 'garden of Eden' is associated with the well-known and mythical mountain of the gods (y^4); the cherub and the king of Tyre are assimilated to each other; the stones of fire may be compared with the flame of a sword (Gn 3^1). The later literature, however, has many references to the garden of Paradise lost, and the gardens of the Paradise to come (lx. xiii. lv ixviii. etc.). J. TAYLOR.

EDREI.—1. Es 9^18. 600, Ezr 10^4. EDOS, 1 Es 9^18; Iddo, Ezr 10^4.

EDREI, 1. A royal city of Og, king of Bashan (Dt 3^14; Jos 12^14), the scene of the battle at which Og was defeated (Nu 21^34, Dt 8^3); assigned to the eastern division of Manasseh (Jos 13^14). It seems to be the modern ed-Deir a, where are several important remains of antiquity, including a great subterranean cistern.

2. A town in Neophthi (Jos 15^10), not identified.

EDUCATION.—In the importance which they attached to the education of the young, it may fairly be claimed that the Hebrews were facile princes among the nations of antiquity. Indeed, if the ultimate aim of education be the formation of character, the Hebrew ideals and methods will bear comparison with the best even of modern times. In character Hebrew education was predominantly one might almost say exclusively religious and ethical. Its fundamental principle may be expressed in the familiar words: 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge' (Pr 17). Yet it recognized that conduct was the true test of character; in the words of Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, that 'not learning but doing is the chief thing.'

As to the educational attainments of the Hebrews before the conquest of Canaan, it is useless to speculate. On the providence of the 'prophets' has no Scripture warrant. Only once, brought into contact with a civilization which for two thousand years or more had been under the influence of Babylonians and in a less degree of Egypt. The language of the prophets, which is found in the medium of communication not only between the rulers of the petty states of Canaan and the great power outside its borders, but even, as we now know, between Sennacherib's discoveries at Nineveh, but between these rulers themselves. This implies the existence of some provision for instruction in reading and writing the difficult Babylonian script. Although in this early period which is found in only one or two scripts, a limited number of high officials and professional scribes, the incident in Gideon's experience, Jg 8*iv* (where we must render with RVm 'wrote down'), warns us against unduly restricting the number of those able to read and write in the somewhat later period of the Judges. The more stable political conditions under the monarchy, and in particular the development of the administration and the growth of commerce under Solomon, must undoubtedly have furthered the spread of education among all classes.

Of schools and schoolmasters, however, there is no evidence till after the Exile, for the expression 'schools of the prophets' has no Scripture warrant. Only once, indeed, is the word 'school' to be found even in NT (Ac 19*o*), and then only of the lecture-room of a Greek teacher in Ephesus. The explanation of this silence is found in the fact that the Hebrew child received his education in the home, with his parents as his only instructors. Although he grew up ignorant of much that every school-boy knows to-day, he must not on that account be set down as undereducated. Thus, in the first instance, of all, in the truths of his ancestral religion (see Dt 6*iv*-8 and elsewhere); and in the ritual of the recurring festivals there was provided for him objects and themes in history and religion. In the traditions of his family and race—one of which are still preserved in the older parts of OT—he had a unique storehouse of the highest ideals of faith and conduct, and these all are the things that matter.

Descending the stream of history, we reach an epoch-making event in the history of education, not less than of religion, among the Jews, in the assembly convened by Ezra and Nehemiah ( Neh 8*o*), at which the people pledged themselves to accept 'the book of the law of Moses' as the norm of their life in all its relations. Henceforward the Jews were pre-eminently, in Mohammed's phrase, 'the people of the Book.' But if the Jewish community was henceforth to regard the whole of life, not according to the living word of priest and prophet, but according to the requirements of a written law, it was indispensable that provision should be made for the instruction of all classes in this law. To this practical necessity is due the origin of the synagogue (wh. see), which, from the Jewish point of view, was essentially a meeting-place for religious instruction, and, indeed, in expressly so named by Philo. In NT also the teacher or expositor in the synagogue is invariably said to 'teach' ( Mt 4*o*; Mk 1*o*; and passim), and the education of youth continues to the last to be associated with the synagogue (see below). The situation created by this new zeal for the Law has been admirably described by Wellhausen: 'The Bible became the spelling-book, the community a school... Fiery and educational inseparable; whoever could not read was no true Jew. We may excuse that in this way were created the beginnings of popular education.

This new educational movement was under the guidance of a body of students and teachers of the Law known as the Sopherim (lit. 'book-men') or scribes, of whom Ezra is the typical example (Ezr 7*o*). Alongside these, if not identical with them, as many hold, we find an influential class of religious and moral teachers, known as the Sages or the Wise, whose activity culminated in the composition of the Talmud (c. 430-330). The arguments for the identity in all important respects of the early scribes and the sages are given by the present writer in Hastings' DB i. With the coming of the Greeks a new educational force in the shape of Hellenistic culture entered Palestine—a force which made itself felt in many directions in the pre-Maccabean age. From a reference in Josephus (Ant. xix. 4*vi*) it may be inferred that schools on the Greek model had been founded before c. 220. It was somewhere in this period, too, that the preacher could say: 'Of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the soul' (Ec 12*v*).—(Hastings' Hastings')

To appreciate the religious and ethical teaching of the sages, we have only to open the Book of Proverbs. Here life is pictured as a discipline, the Hebrew word disciplinatio (Ant. x. 6*iv*)—reform and training—means that it is useless to attempt to construct the whole of life,' it has been said, 'is here considered from the view-point of a pedagogic institution. God educates men, and men educate each other' (O. Holtzmann).

Give the coming of the Greeks a new educational force in the shape of Hellenistic culture entered Palestine—a force which made itself felt in many directions in the pre-Maccabean age. From a reference in Josephus (Ant. xix. 4*vi*) it may be inferred that schools on the Greek model had been founded before c. 220. It was somewhere in this period, too, that the preacher could say: 'Of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the soul' (Ec 12*vi*).—(Hastings' Hastings')

Passing now, as this brief sketch requires, to the period of Jewish history that lies between the triumph of the Maccabees and the end of the Jewish State in 67*o*, we find a tradition of strict adherence to the law, with no valid reason for rejecting it as untrustworthy—which illustrates the extent to which elementary education, at least, was fostered under the later Maccabean princes. A famous example of the period is the episode of the Golden Calf (Ex 32*vi*-40). The brother of Queen Alexander, is said to have got a law passed ordaining that 'the children shall attend the elementary school.' This we understand on various grounds to mean, not that the schools were first instituted, but that attendance at them was henceforth to be compulsory. The elementary school, termed 'the house of the Book' (i.e. Scripture), in opposition to 'the house of study' or college of the scribes (see below), was always closely associated with the synagogue. In the smaller places, indeed, the same building served for both.

The elementary teachers, as we may call them, formed the lowest rank in the powerful guild of the scribes. They are the 'doctors (lit. teachers) of the law,' who, in our Lord's day, were to be found in 'every village of Galilee and Judaea' (Lk 5*o* RV), and as a rule so frequently in the Gospels and Acts. Attendance at the elementary school began at the age of six. Already the boy had learned to repeat the Shema ('Hear, 0 Israel,' etc., Dt 6*o*), selected proverbs and verses from the Psalms. He now began to learn to read. His only textbooks were the rolls of the sacred Scriptures, especially the and the people devout. The worship of animals was probably restricted to a few sacred individuals in early Egypt, but a degree of sanctity was afterwards extended to the whole of a species, and to almost every species.

1. The History of Egypt was divided by Manetho (who wrote for Ptolemy I. or II.) into 31 dynasties from which the Greeks or 'Shepherd' kings were derived. They were certain for the early times; most authorities in Germany place the 1st Dyn. about B.C. 3300, and the 12th Dyn. at about 2000–1500. These dates, which depend largely on the interpretation of records of astronomical phenomena, may perhaps be taken as the minimum. The allowance of time (200 years) for the dark period between the 12th and the 18th Dyn. seems insufficient; some would place the 12th Dyn. at B.C. 2600–2300, or even an 'whole 'Sothic' period of 1460 years earlier than the minimum; and the 1st Dynasty would then be pushed back at least in equal measure. From the 18th Dyn. onwards there is close agreement.

The historic period must have been preceded by a long pre-historic age, evidenced in Upper Egypt by extensive cemeteries of graves containing fine pottery, instruments in fine exquisitely worked, and in some cases, are strongly sculptured. Tradition points to separate kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt towards the close of this period. Memes, the founder of the 1st Dyn., united the two lands. He came probably from Thes, near Abydos, where royal tombs of the first three Dyns. have been found; but he built Memphis as his capital near the dividing line between the two halves of his kingdom. The earliest pyramid dates from the end of the 3rd dynasty. The stupendous Pyramids at Gizeh are of Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus of the 4th Dyn., from which time we have also very beautiful statues in wood, limestone, and marble, the 6th Dynasty reached its highest excellence. The 6th Dyn. is notable for long inscriptions, both religious texts in the pyramids and biographical inscriptions in the tombs. The first two Dyns., best represented at Abydos, its monuments are concentrated at Memphis, but important records of the 6th Dyn. are widely spread as far south as the First Cataract, parallel with the growing power and culture of the nomarchs. Expeditions were made even under the 1st Dyn. to the copper and turquoise mines in the kingdom of Sinat, and cedar wood was probably then already obtained from Lebanon by sea. Under the 6th Dyn. Nubia furnished troops to the Egyptian armies from the distant south and Near East. The 6th Dyn. is a change of a collapse, probably through insufficient control of the local princes of that time by the nomarchs.

In the next period, the Middle Kingdom (Dyns. 9–17), we see the rise of Thebes; but the 9th and 10th Dyns. were from Heracleopolis, partly contemporary with the 11th Dyn., which eventually suppressed the rival house. The monuments of the 11th Dyn. are almost confined to the neighbourho of Thebes. Under the Ammon, and Senwosret, the 12th Dyn., Egypt was as great as it was in the 4th Dyn., but its power was not concentrated as then. The break-up of the old Kingdom had given an opportunity to a number of powerful families to grow up and establish themselves in local princedoms: the family that triumphed over the rest by arms or diplomacy could control but could not ignore them, and feudalism was the result, each great prince having a court and an army resembling those of the king, but on a smaller scale. The most notable achievement of these Dyns. was the regulation of the lake of Morus by Amenemh III., with much other important work for irrigation and improvement of agriculture. Literature also flourished at this period. The traditional exploits of the world-conqueror Snefris seem to have been developed in late times out of the petty expeditions of Senwosret III. into Nubia, Libya, and Palestine. The 13th and 14th Dyns. are represented by a crowd of royal names and dates, all long, obscure, and some scholars would make them contemporaneous with each other and with the following. The 15th and 16th Dyns. were of the little-known Hyksos or 'Shepherd' kings, excepting a few splendidly engraved with the names of the kings, monuments of the Hyksos are extremely rare. Their names betray a Semitic language, they were probably barbarian, but in the end took on the culture of Egypt, and it is a strange fact that inscribed relics of some of them, Khyan, have been found in places as far apart as at Cossus in Crete and Bagdad; no other Egyptian king, not even Thetmosi III., has quite so wide a range as that mysterious Hyksos. The foreign rulers are said to have oppressed the natives and to have forbidden the worship of the Egyptian deities. The princes of Thesban, becoming more or less independent, formed the 17th Dyn., and succeeded in ousting the hated Hyksos, now probably diminished in numbers and weakened by luxury, from Upper Egypt. The first king of the 18th Dyn., Amenhotep, drove them across the N.E. frontier and pursued them into Palestine (c. B.C. 1650).

The 18th Dyn. ushered in the most glorious period in Egyptian history, the New Kingdom, or, as it has been called on account of its far-reaching away, the Empire, lasting to the end of the 20th Dynasty. The prolonged effort to cast out the Hyksos had welded together a nation in arms under the leadership of the Pharaoh, leaving no trace of the old feudalism; the hatred of the oppressor pursued the 'pest' far into Syria in successive campaigns, until Thetmosi I., the second successor of Amenhotep, reached the Euphrates, and the Pharaoh, Hatshepsut (c. 1500), ruled for a time with less vigorous hands, and the latter cultivated only the arts of peace. Meanwhile the princes of Syria strengthened themselves and united under the leadership of the Thara. Thebes, and an influence still exerted, to Thetmosi III. when he endeavoured to recover the lost ground. This Pharaoh, however, was a great strategist, as well as a valiant soldier: as the result of many annual campaigns, he not only placed his tablet on the bank of the Euphrates, by the side of that of Thetmosi II., but also consolidated the rule of Egypt over the whole of Syria and Phoenicia. The wealth of the conquered countries poured into Egypt, and the temple of the Theban Ammon, the god under whose banner the armies of the Pharaohs of two dynasties had in their victory, was now growing in wealth and power. Thebes, and Amenhotep III. enjoyed the fruits of his predecessors' conquests, and was a mighty builder. His are the colossi at Thebes named Memnon by the Greeks. The empire had then reached its zenith. Amenhotep IV. (c. 1870), in some ways the most striking figure in Egyptian history (the latest discoveries tend to show that the king was not more than 14 years old when the great innovation took place. He may thus rather be a tool in the hands of a reformer, it rapidly declined; the Hitites were pressing into Syria from the north, and all the while the Pharaoh was a dreamer absorbed in establishing a monolithic worship of Aton (the sun) against the polytheism of Egypt and more especially against the Theban and national worship of Ammon. He changed his own name to Amonhotep, built a new capital, the 'Horizon of Aton,' in place of Thebes, and erased the name and figure of Ammon wherever they were seen. Art, too, found in him a lavish patron, and struck out new types, often bizarre rather than beautiful. But for the empire Pharaoh had no thought or leisure. The cuneiform letters found in the ruins of his new capital at el-Amarna show us his detractors and vassals in Syria appealing to him in vain... for support against the intrigues and onslaughts of rebels and invaders. His father Amenhotep III had carried on an active correspondence with the distant kings of Babylonia, Assyria, and Mitanni in Mesopotamia; but after a few years Akhenaten may have lost all influence with them. Shortly after Akhenaten's death the new order of things, for which the heresy and sacrilege of Akhenaten was abolished, its triumph having lasted for but 10 or 15 years. Ammon worship was then restored, and restated on the name and figure of the heretic king and of his god.

Aho the 19th Dyn. was as active in the Delta as in other parts of Egypt, and although Ammon remained the principal god of the State, Piab of Memphis and Rē the sun-god of Helipolis were given places of honour at his side. There is a famous series of reliefs at Karnak of the Syrian war of Seti I. (c. 1300); but his son Ramesses II (c. 1290-1220) was the greatest builder in the Dynasty: he was not indeed able to drive back the Hittites, but he fought so valorously in Syria that they could make no advance southward. They were compelled to make a treaty with Pharaoh and leave him master of Syria as far as Kadesh on the Orontes. Ramesses II was the greatest builder of all the Pharaohs, covering the land with temples and monuments of stone, the inscriptions and scenes upon them in many cases extolling his exploit against the Hittites at the battle of Kadesh, when his personal prowess saved the Egyptian camp and army from overwhelming disaster. Towards the end of his long reign of 67 years disorders multiplied, and his son Amun-hotep III (c. 1220-1186) was equal to the occasion. The latter was victorious everywhere, on sea and on land, and a great incursion from the north, after maiming the Hittite power, was halted back by the Egyptian king, who then established his rule in Syria and Phœnicia over a wider area than his celebrated namesake had controlled. Ramesses II was followed by sons and others of his own name down to Ramesses XIII., but all within glorious reigns. Under them the empire flickered out, from sea to sea and from land to land.

Egypt now (c. 1100) enters upon a new period of history, that of the Deltic Dynasties. Thbes was no longer the metropolis. The growth of commerce in the Levant transferred the centre of gravity northward. After the fall of the New Kingdom, all the native dynasties originated in various cities of Lower, with perhaps Middle, Egypt. The later Ramessides had depended for their fighting men on Libyan mercenaries, and the conquered of the Libyans to settle on the rich lands of Egypt was thus hastened and encouraged. The military chiefs established their families in the larger towns, and speedily became wealthy as well as powerful; it was not unusual for Libyan families of Libyan origin to call themselves ‘native’ dynasties arose. Dyn. 21 was from Tanis (Zoan); parallel with and apparently subject to it was a dynasty of priest-kings at Thbes. The pitiful report of a war in Aegyptus, sent from Lebanon, shows how completely Egypt's influence in Syria and the Levant had passed away at the beginning of this dynasty. The 22nd Dyn. (c. 950-750) arose in Babylonia, or perhaps at Heracleopolis in Middle Egypt. Its founder, Sheshonk I., the Biblical Shishak, was energetic and overran Palestine, but his successors quickly degenerated. The 23rd Dyn., said to be Tanite, was perhaps also Babustite. There were now again all the elements of feud in the country except the central control, and Egypt thus lay as a resolute invader. We find at the end of the 23rd Egyptian Dyn. Pankhi, king of Ethiopia, already in full possession of the Thebaid (c. 730). Tefnakht, prince of Sais, was then endeavouring to establish his sway over the other petty princes of the Delta and Middle Egypt. Pankhi accepted the implied challenge, overthrew Tefnakht, and compelled him to do homage. Tefnakht's son Bocchoris slew him, and completed the restoration of his dynasty, uniting the forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, endeavoured to extend their influence over Syria in opposition to the Assyrians. Tahark (Tirhakah) was particularly active in this endevour, but as soon as Esarhaddon was free to invade Egypt the Assyrian king had no difficulty in taking Memphis, capturing most of the royal family, and driving Tahark southward (c. 670). The native princes were no doubt hostile at heart to the Ethiopian domination: on his departure, Esarhaddon left in the number of 20, with Assyrian garrisons, in charge of different parts of the country; an Assyrian governor, however, was appointed to Pelusium, which was the key of Egypt. None the less the Ethiopian returned as soon as the Assyrian host had withdrawn, and annihilated the army of occupation. Esarhaddon thereupon prepared a second expedition, but died on the way. Ashurbanipal succeeding, reinstated the governors, and the army reached Tanis. On Minikha's death (26th Dyn. 21) he set himself to the country's recovery. They were all brought in chains to Nineveh, but Nîku was sent back to Egypt with honour, and his son was appointed governor of Athribis. Soon after this failure Tahark died: his nephew Tandamane recovered Memphis, but was speedily expelled by Ashurbanipal, who advanced up the river to Thbes and plundered it.

Meanwhile the family of Nîku at Sais was securing its position in the Delta, taking advantage of the protection afforded by the Assyrians and the weakening of the Egyptian power. Nîku himself was killed, perhaps by Tandamane, but his son Psammetichus took his place, extending the 26th Dynasty. Counting his reign from the death of Tahark (c. 664), Psammetichus soon ruled both Upper and Lower Egypt, while in the absence of fresh expeditions all trace of the brief Assyrian domination disappeared. The 26th Dynasty marked the last era of Egypt: Egypt quickly regained its prosperity after the terrible ravages of civil wars and Egyptian and Assyrian invasions. Psammetichus I., in his long reign of 54 years, re-organized the country, safeguarded it against attack from Ethiopia, and carried his arms into S.W. Palestine. His son Nîko, profiting by the long weakness of Assur, swept through Syria as far as Carchemish on the Euphrates, and put the land to tribute, until the following year (c. 605) he was defeated and captured by the Syrian king, and his successor, Ashurbanipal, was hurled him back (c. 605). His successors, Psammetichus II. and Apries (Hophra), attempted to regain influence in Syria, but without success. Apries with his Greek mercenaries became involved in a war with the Medes, who overcame him, and he was deposed by Exekias of Samos, and was replaced by Necho, the last native king of Egypt, who re-established the Theban house, and recovered by force of arms the now totally lost dynasty of Egypt. It was a golden age while it lasted, but it did not prevent the new Persian masters of the East.
from preparing to add Egypt to their dominions. Cyrus lacked opportunity, but Cambyses easily accomplished the conquest of Egypt in B.C. 527, six months after the death of Amasis.

The Ptolemaic Dynasty is counted as the 27th. The memory of its founder was hateful to the Egyptians and the Greeks alike; probably the stories of his mad cruelty, though exaggerated, have a solid basis. Darius, on the other hand (522-486), was a good and considered ruler, under whom Egypt prospered again; yet after the battle of Marathon it revolted. Xerxes, who quelled the revolt, and Artaxerxes were both detested. In anarchy the Libyan headed another rebellion, which was backed by an Athenian army and fleet; but after some brilliant successes his attempt was crushed. It was not till about B.C. 405 that Egypt revolted successfully; thereafter, in spite of several attempts to bring it again under the Persian rule, from which it was finally quelled in 332 after another battle of Marathon.

Throughout the Hellenistic (Ptolemaic and Roman) period the capital of Egypt was Alexandria, the intellectual head of the world. Under the Ptolemies, Egypt on the whole prospered for two centuries, though torn by war and dissension. [In the reign of Philometor (c. B.C. 170) a temple was built by the high-priest Onias for the Jews in Egypt after the model of the temple at Jerusalem (Josh. 9:12), 120 ft. wide by 320 ft. long. The ruins have been identified by Flinders Petrie at Tell el-Yahudieh.] From B.C. 70 there is a conspicuous absence of native documents, until Augustus in B.C. 30 restored the Roman Empire under its new masters, and in the second cent. of their rule was exceedingly prosperous as a rich and well-managed cornfield for the free supply of Rome. 2. Egypt in the Bible is Egypt under the Ptolemaic Dynasty, or, at earliest, of the New Kingdom. This applies not only to the professedly late references in 1 and 2 Kings, but also throughout Abraham and Joseph may belong chronologically to the Middle Kingdom, but the Egyptian name in the story of Joseph are such as were prevalent only in the time of the Deltaic Dynasties. There were wide differences in manners and customs and in the condition of the country and people at different periods of the history of Egypt. In the Biblical accounts, unfortunately, there are not many criteria for a close fixing of the dates of composition. It may be remarked that there were settlements of Greeks in Ptolemaic Egypt. In Ptolemaic days of Jeremiah, and papyri indicate the existence of an important Jewish colony at Syene and Elephantine, on the S. border of Egypt, at an equally early date. The B.C. 600-280 is a naturally show the Egyptians much better acquainted with the eastern Delta, and especially the towns on the road to Memphis, than with any other part of Egypt. For instance, Sais, the royal city of the 26th Dyn., on the W. side of the Delta, is not once mentioned, and the situation of Thebes (No-Amon) is quite misunderstood by Nahum. Of localities in Upper Egypt only Syene and Thebes (No) are mentioned; in Middle Egypt, Heliopolis, Tanis, Memphis (or rather the route to Memphis (Nephep) are Shihor, Shur, Sin, Migdol, Taapanes, Eber, On; and by the southern route, Goshen, Pithom, Succoth, Rameses, beside other places in the Exodus. Zoan was not on the border routes, but was itself an important centre in the East of the Delta, as being a royal city. There are but few instances in which the borrowing of Egyptian customs or even words by the Hebrews can be traced; but the latter were none the less well acquainted with Egyptian ways. The Egyptian mourning of 70 days for Jacob is characteristic (Gen 50:10), so also may be the baker’s habit of carrying on the head (40:17). The assertion that to eat bread with the Hebrews was an abomination to the Egyptians (43:19) has not yet been satisfactorily explained. The Hebrews, no doubt, like the Greeks in Herodotus, slew and ate animals, e.g. the sheep and the cow, which Egyptians in the later days were forbidden to eat by their religious scruples. Circumcision was frequent in Egypt, but how far it was a general custom (cf. Josh. 5:5) is not clear. Prophecies of a Messianic type were current in Egypt, and one is traced back to about the time of the Hyksos domination. (It has been suggested that in this and in the custom of circumcision are to be seen the most notable influences of Egypt on the people of Israel.)

3. Religion.—The piety of the Egyptians was the characteristic that struck the Greeks most forcibly, and their stupendous monuments and the bulk of the literature that has come down to us are either religious or of funerary. An exploration examination of all the phenomena would show that piety was inherent in the nature of the people, and that their religious observances grew and multiplied with the ages, until the Moabites entered. The attempt will now be made to sketch some outlines of the Egyptian religion and its practices, as they appear especially in the last millennium B.C. The piety of the Egyptians then manifested itself in a manifold of worship and cult, and in the death and after-life, and in the number of objects, whether living or inanimate, that were looked upon as divine. The priests (Egypt. ’the pure ones’ or the ‘divine functionaries’) were a special class with sacred privileges and duties. Many of them were pluralists. They received stipends in kind from the temples to which they were attached, and in each temple were divided into four phases or tribes, which served in succession for a lunar month at a time. The chief officiates were filled by select priests entitled prophets, by the Greeks (Egypt. ‘servants of the god’; Ptolemaic a priest or of [K] in On), of which there was theoretically one for each god in a temple. Below the priests in the temple were the pastophori (Egypt. ‘openers,’ i.e. of shrines), and of the same rank as these were the choachytes (Egypt. ‘water-pourers’) in the temple. To the priest, offerings of incense and libations before the figure of the god of the temple. The priests were very attentive to cleanliness, wearing white linen raiment, shaving their heads, and washing frequently. They abstained especially from fish and beans, and were probably all circumcised. The revenues of the temples came from endowments of land, from offerings and other fees. The daily ritual of offering (Egypt. ) was strictly regulated, formulae with magic power being addressed to the shrine, its door, its lock, etc., as it was being opened, as well as to the deity within; hymns were sung and incantations were muttered, and the altar piled with offerings. On festal occasions the god would be carried in procession, sometimes to visit a neighbouring deity. Burnt-offerings, beyond the burning of incense, were usually made in early times, but probably became usual after the New Kingdom. Offerings of all kinds were the perquisite of the priests when the god (image or animal) had had his enjoyment of them. Oracles were given in the temples, not by an inspired priest, but by nodding or signs made by the god; sometimes, for instance, the decision of a god was sought in a legal matter by laying before him a papyrus in which the case was stated. In other cases the enquirer slept in the temple, and the resolution was given in a dream. The oracles of the Theban Ammon (and later) of Buto were political forces: that of Ammon in the Oasis of Siwa played a part in Greek history. The most striking hymn date from the New Kingdom, and are addressed especially to the solar form of Ammon (or to the Aton during Akhenaton’s heresy); the fervour of the worshipper renders them henotheistic, pantheistic, or even theistic in tone. Prayers also occur;
but the tendency was overwhelmingly greater to magic, compelling the action of the gods, or in other ways producing the desired effect. Preservative amulets, over which the formula had been spoken or on which some were engraved, were frequently worn into later dynasties, and no doubt were worn by living persons. The endless texts inscribed in the pyramids of the end of the Old Kingdom, on coffins of the Middle Kingdom, and in the Deir el-Medina, are almost wholly magical formulae for the preservation of the material mummy, for the divination of the deceased, for taking him safely through the perils of the next world, and giving him all that he or she wish to enjoy in the future life. A papyrus is known of spells for the use of a mother nursing her child; spells accompanied the employment of drugs in medicine; and to injure an enemy images were made in wax and transformed by spells into persecuting demons.

Egyptian theology was very complex and self-contradictory; so also were its views about the life after death. These were the result of the amalgamation of doctrines originally belonging to different localities: the priests and people were always willing to accept or absorb new ideas without displacing the old, and to develop the old ones by imagination in different directions. A grotesque development may go on in one attempt to rejoin a vanished system, or, if any had done so, none would abide long by any system. Death evidently separated the elements of which the living man was composed; the corpse was removed from time to time from the grave, and its soul, while at other times the latter would be in the heavens associating with gods. To the ka (life or activity or genius) offerings were made at the tomb; we hear also of the 'shade' and 'power.' The dead man was judged before Osiris, the king of the dead, and if condemned, was devoured by a demon, but if justified, fields of more than earthly fruitfulness were awarded him. The 'shade' and 'power' were received, and the bark of the sun to traverse the heavens gloriously; or, according to another view, he passed a gloomy and feelle existence in the shadows of the underworld, cheated only for an hour, as the sun travelled nightly between two of the hour-gates of the infernal regions. No hint of the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, attributed by Herodotus to the Egyptians, has yet been found in their writings; but spells were given to the dead man by which he could voluntarily assume the form of a lotus, of an ibis or a heron or a serpent, or of the god Ptah, or 'anything that he wished.' Supplies for the dead were deposited with him in the grave, or referred to him by name. Spells and offerings might be brought by his family on appropriate occasions, or might be made more permanent by endowment; but such would not be kept up for many generations.

As to the deities, the king was entitled the 'good god,' was a mediator between god and man as the religious head of the State and chief of the priesthood, and his image might be treated as divine even during his lifetime. A dead man duly buried was divine and identified with Osiris, but in few cases did men preserve their personality became acknowledged gods; such was the case, however, conspicuously with two great scribes and learned men—Imhotep, architect of king Zoser of the 3rd dynasty, and Amenhotep, son of Hap, of the time of Amenhotep III. (18th dynasty), who eventually became divine patrons of science and writing; the former was considered to be a son of Ptah, the god of Memphis, and was the equivalent of Asklepios as god of healing. Persons drowned or devoured by crocodiles were accounted specially divine, and Osiris from certain incidents in his myth was sometimes named the 'Drowned.' The deities proper were (1) gods of portions of the universe: the sun-god Ré was the most important of these; others were the earth-god Geb, the sky-god Shou, and the goddess Nut, with stellar deities, etc. (2) Gods of particular qualities or functions: as Thoth, the god of wisdom, Mea goddess of justice and truth, Mont the god of war, Ptah the artificer god. (3) Gods of particular localities: these included many of classes (1) and (2). Some of them held a wide vogue from a local, mythological, to a universal character, others were the result of a later adaptation, mainly to the needs of the later dynasties, and no doubt were worn by living persons. The endless texts inscribed in the pyramids of the end of the Old Kingdom, on coffins of the Middle Kingdom, and in the Deir el-Medina, are almost wholly magical formulae for the preservation of the material mummy, for the divination of the deceased, for taking him safely through the perils of the next world, and giving him all that he or she wish to enjoy in the future life. called the Osiris Apis—Osirapis or Serapis. With some modification, this Serapis, well known and popular amongst natives and foreign settlers alike, was chosen by Ptolemy Soter to be the preiding deity of his kingdom, for the Egyptians, and more especially for the world at Alexandria. He was worshipped as a form of Osiris, an infernal Zeus, associated with Isis. His acceptance by the Greek world, and still more enthusiastically by the Romans, confirmed the Roman world to spread the Osiris Passion—otherwise the Isis mysteries—far and wide. This Isis worship possessed many features in common with Christianity; on the one hand, it prepared the way for the latter, and influenced its symbols; while, on the other, it proved perhaps the most powerful and stubborn adversary of the Christian dogma in its contest with paganism.

EGYPT, RIVER (RV 'brook,' better 'wady') OF—Tears which in the text are of common origin; according to it, the wady is called the Wady d-Arish, still the boundary of Egypt, in the desert half-way between the border town of Gaza. Water is always to be found digging in the bed of the wady, and after heavy rain the latter is filled with a rushing stream. El-Arish, where the wady reaches the Mediterranean, was an Egyptian frontier post to which the conquerors were bailed and having driven their noses cut off; hence its Greek name Rhinocorus. See also SHHOR, SHUR.

EGYPTIAN, THE.—An unnamed leader of the 'Assassin' or 'Scarii' for whom Claudius Lyasias took St. Paul (Ac 21:19). This man is also mentioned by Josephus as a leader defeated by Felix, but not as connected with the 'Assassins' (Ant. xx. viii. 6). The Egyptian escaped, and Lyasias thought that he had secured him in St. Paul's person. The discrepancy between Josephus and St. Luke here make mutual borrowing improbable. See THEUDAS.

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS.—See Text of NT, §§ 27-29.

EHL.—See AMRAM.

EHUD.—1. The deliverer of Israel from Edom, king of Moab (Jg 3:14-29). The story of how Ehud slew Edom bears witness to the memory of Connubinae; according to it, Ehud was the bearer of a present from the children of Israel to their conqueror, the king of Moab. On being left alone with the king, Ehud plunges his sword into the body of the king, and drags his body into the hill-country of Ephraim. Israel is thus delivered from the Moabite supremacy. 2. Son of Bilhan, a Benjamin (1 Ch 7:19, cf. 8:8).

EKER.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 27:31).

EKBELB (Jth 7:9).—Apparently the town of Akka, E. of Shechem, the capital of Akkabite.

EKRON.—A city in the Philistine Pentapolis, not conquered by Joshua (Jos 13:3), but theoretically a border city of Judah (15:31) and Dan (19:10); said, in a passage which is probably an interpolation, to have been given to the Levites (Jg 18:19). After the captured ark was brought from Ashdod (1 S 5:6), and on its restoration the Philistine lords who had followed it to Beth-shemesh returned to Ekron (1 S 6:4). Ekron was the border town of a territory, always passed in the days of Samuel from the Philistines to Israel (1 S 7:4), and it was the limit of the pursuit of the Philistines after the slaying of Goliath by David (17:52). Its local name was Baal-zebah, whose oracle Baal-shazzer consulted after his accident (2 K 19). Like other Philistine cities, it is made the subject of denunciation by Jeremiah, Amos, Zephaniah, and the anonymous prophet whose writing occupies Zec 9-11. This city is commonly identified with 'Akir, a village on the Philistine plain between Gezer and the sea, where there is now a Jewish colony. For the identification there is no basis, except the coincidence of name; there are no remains of antiquity whatever at 'Akir.

ELAM.—1. 1 Es 9:5 = Elam, Ezr 10:9. 2. 1 K 4:49, father of Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin.

ELAH.—1. A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36:1, 1 Ch 19). 2. Son of Baasha, king of Israel. He had nominal possession of the throne two years or fractions of years (1 K 16:4-14). He gave himself to drunken dissipation, until Zimri, one of his generals, revolted and killed him. The usual expiation of the defeated dynasty followed.

H. P. SMITH.

ELAH ('terebinth').—A valley in the Shephelah, the scene of the battle between David and Goliath (1 S 17:21). It is most likely the modern Wady es-Senat, which, rising in the mountains about Jeba, about 11 miles due S.W. of Jerusalem, runs westward, under various names, till it opens on the Maritime Plain at Tel es-Safa. In the middle of the valley is a watercourse which runs in winter only; the bottom is full of small stones such as David might have selected for his sling.

ELAM.—1. A son of Shem (Gn 10:31-1 Ch 1:10), the eponymous ancestor of the Elamites (see following article).

4. The eponym of a family of which 1254 returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2'), Neh 7', 1 Es 58', and 71 with Ezra (Ezr 87, 1 Es 89). It was one of the Elam Elites who urged Ezra to take action against mixed marriages (Ezr 10'), and six of the same family are reported to have put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10'). Elam acc. to Neh 10' = the Elamites, who were defeated by Elam (1 Ch 26'). They also possessed a council of elders (Neh 2'). 'The other Elamites' = has also 1254 descendants who returned with Zerubbabel. 6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the walls (Neh 12').

ELAM.—An important country of Western Asia, called Elamtu by the Babylonians and Elimagi by the Greeks (sustains, from Shushan or Susa the capital). It corresponds nearly to the modern Choristan, lying to the east of the lower Tigris, but including also the mountains that skirt the plain. The portion south of Susa was known as Anzan (Anzan). In Gn 10:6 (1 Ch 1'7) Elam is called a son of Shem, from the mistaken idea that the people of the Semitic race, who belonged to the great family of barbarous or semi-barbarous tribes which occupied the highlands to the east and north of the Semites before the influx of the Aryans.

Historically Elam's most important place in the Bible is found in Gn 14:18, where it is mentioned as the suzerain of Babylon and therewith all the western country including Palestine. The period there alluded to was that of Elam's greatest power, a little later than B.C. 2500. For many centuries previous, Elam had upon the whole been subordinate to the ruling power of Babylonia, no matter which of the great cities west of the Tigris happened to be supreme. Not many years later, Hammurabi of Babylon (perhaps the Anzaphil of Gn 14) threw off the yoke of Elam, which henceforth held an inferior place. Wars between the two countries were, however, very common, and Elam frequently had the advantage. The splendidly defensible position of the capital contributed greatly to its independence and recuperative power, and thus Susa became a repository of much valuable spoil secured from the Babylonian cities. This explains how it came to be a place of refuge and storehouse, all the more especially as the single monument of Oriental antiquity, was found in the ruins of Susa. A change in relations gradually took place after Assyr began to control Babylonia and thus encroach upon Elam, which, in the meantime, had lost many cities by rain, which happened to drink water from the Chaldaean, especially with the Chaldeans from the south-land. Interesting and tragic is the story of the combined efforts of the Chaldeans and Elamites to repel the invading Persians. The last scene of the drama was the capture and sack of Susa (c. B.C. 645). The conqueror Ashurbanipal (Bib. Onanappur) completed the subjugation of Elam by deporting many of its inhabitants, among the exiles being a detachment sent to the province of Sarmaria (§ 34). We may reasonably infer that Assyr. itself the people went, and fell, Elam was occupied by the rising Aryan tribes, the Medes from the north and the Persians from the south. Cyrus the Persian (born about 590) was the fifth of the Anshan. Elam has a somewhat prominent place in the prophetic writings, in which Media + Elam = Persian empire. See esp. Is 21-22, Jer 49, and cf. Is 22, Jer 25, Ezek 32. Particular interest attached to the part taken by the Elamites in the overthrow of Babylon. An effect of this participation is curiously shown in the fact that after the Exile, Elam was a fairly common name among the Jews themselves (Ezra 2:1, Neh 7:2, 1 Chr 8:26 et al.).

ELASA (1 Mac 9).—The scene of the defeat and death of Judas Maccabaeus. The site may be at the ruin 'Isla', near Beth-horon.

ELASAH ('God hath made').—1. One of those he made the foreign wife (Ezr 10:30). 2. The son of Shaphan, who, along with Gemarish the son of Hilkiah, carried a message from king Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer 29:3)

ELATH (called also Eloth, 'the great trees').—An important Edomite town on the N.E. arm of the Red Sea, near Ezion-geber. It is mentioned as one of the places passed by the Israelites during their wanderings (Dt 20). Close to it king Solomon's navy was constructed (1 K 9:26). Subsequently the town must have been destroyed, as we read in 2 K 14:2 of its being built by Azariah. Later on it was conquered by the Edomites (so RVm). W. O. E. Oesterley.

EL-BERITH.—See BAAL-BERITH.

EL-BETHHEL.—The name which Jacob is said to have given to the scene of his vision on his way back from Paddan-aram, Gn 35:1 (G 72)

ELDAAH.—A son of Midian (Gn 25:6, 1 Ch 1:9).

ELDAD.—One of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the government of the people. On one occasion he and another named Medad were not present with Moses and the rest of the elders at the door of the Tabernacle, and Moses was frightened (Nu 11:24-35).

ELDER (in OT).—The rudimentary form of government which prevailed amongst the Hebrews in primitive times grew out of family life. As the father is head of the household, so the chief of the principal families ruled the clan and the tribe, their authority being ill-defined, and, like that of an Arab sheik, depending on the consent of the governed. In our earliest documents the 'elders of Israel' are the men of position and influence, who represent the community both religious and civil affairs (Ex 4:18: 13:17: 18:19: 19:12: 19:22: 20:27: 31:23): the 'elders' of Ex 24 are the 'nobles' of v.4. Josephus sums up correctly when he makes Moses declare: 'Aristocracy is the best constitution' (Ant. vii. 17). The system existed in other Semitic races (Nu 22:4, Jos 9:4, Ex 24:27, Ps 105:45). After the settlement in Canaan the 'elders' still possessed much weight (Le 4:13: 18:3: 2 Sm 15:27: 17:15: 19:8). And now we find 'elders of the city' the governing body of the town (Ru 4:1, i S 11:1, 1 K 21:11, 2 K 10:51): the little town of Succoth boasted no fewer than seventy-seven (Jg 9:49). Deuteronomy brings into prominence their judicial functions (Dt 16:19: 21:25: 21:21: 22:35: 25:1), which were doubtless infringed upon by the position of the king as supreme judge (1 S 8:6, 2 S 16:1, 1 K 2:19, 2 K 19, Is 1:3, Am 2:9), but could not be abolished (1 K 20:6, 2 K 10:21, 23). During the Exile the 'elders' are the centre of the people's life (Jer 29:4, Ezk 8:12: 14:20, Ezk 5:6: 11:5: cf. Sus 4) and after the Return they continue active (Ezr 10:8, 4, Ps 107:25, Fr 3:1, 11:1 29). It is improbable that the later Sanhedrin is a development of this institution.

ELDER (in NT).—See Bishop: Church Government. 6 (2).

ELEAD.—An Ephraimitite (1 Ch 7:4).

ELEADAH.—An Ephraimitite (1 Ch 7:24).

ELEALEH (Nu 29:37, Is 15:16, Jer 49:14).—A town of the Moabite plateau, conquered by Gad and Reuben, and rebuilt by the latter tribe. It is now the ruined mound of el-`Ali, about a mile N. of Heshbon.

ELEAZAR ('God hath helped').—1. A son of Aaron. It was natural that priestly traditions should have much to say about him. But in earlier writings his name appears only twice, both probably from Ex: Dt 10:1 (his succession to the priestly office at Aaron's death), Joes 24:3 (his death and burial). In P he is the father of a son of Aaron by Elisba, named Nadab, Abihu, and Ithamar (Ex 6:15). With them he was consecrated priest (Ex 28), and was chief over the Levites (Nu 3:38). Nadab and Abihu having died (Lv 10:1), he succeeded Aaron as chief priest (Nu 20:24-26). He took part in the census in cnumb (Nu 26:46), and afterwards played a prominent part in the history of the settlement under Joshua (Jos 14:17, 15:19-21). He married a daughter of Pottiel, and she bore him Pinchas (Ex 6:24). When the Zadokite priests returned from Babylon, they traced their descent to Aaron through Eleazar, ignoring the house of Eli (1 Ch 6:9); in some cases, however, the claim was made through Ithamar (1 Ch 24:1). 2. Son of Ahinadab (1 S 7:1). 3. One of David's three heroes (2 S 23, 1 Ch 11:24). 4. A Levite (1 Ch 23:24). 5. 1 Es 8:3 = Bileger, Ezr 10:4. 6. A priest (Ezr 8:36, Neh 12:1, 1 Es 8:9). 7, 1 Es 9:16 = Bileger, Ezr 10:4. 8. One who took a non-Israelite wife (Ezr 10:9, 1 Es 9:6). 9. A brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 2:48-49, 2 Mac 8:40). 10. A martyr among Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 6:24-31). 11. Father of Josed (1 Mac 8:1). 12. Sire of Eleazar (Sir 50:7), 13. An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1:16). A. H. M'NELIE.

ELECTION.—The idea of election, as expressive of God's method of accomplishing His purpose for the world in both providence and grace, though (as befits the character of the Bible as peculiar as 'the history of redemption') especially in grace, goes to the heart of Scripture teaching. The word 'election' itself occurs but a few times (Ac 9:15, 'vessel of election,' Ro 9:11-13, 'chosen,' Ro 8:29-31, 1 P 2:8, 1 P 2:3, 1 P 2:9, and much oftener (see below): but equivalent words in OT and NT, as 'choose,' 'chosen,' 'foreknowledge' (in sense of 'fore-designate'), etc., considerably extend the range of usage. In the OT, as will be seen, the special object of the Divine election is Israel (eg. Dt 4:7, 77 etc.; but within Israel are special elections, as of the tribe of Levi, the house of Aaron, Judah, David and his house, etc.; while, in a broader sense, the idea, if not the expression, is present wherever individuals are raised up, or separated, for special service (thus of Cyrus, Is 44:4-5, 45:4). In the NT the term 'elect' is frequently used, both by Christ and by the Apostles, for those who are heirs of salvation (eg. Mt 24:35, 1 Jn 3:8, Lk 18, Ro 8, Col 3, 2 Ti 24, Tit 1, 1 P 15), and the Church, as the new Israel, is described as 'an elect race' (1 P 2:9). Jesus Himself is called, with reference to Is 42, God's 'chosen' or 'elect' (One (Mt 12:38, Lk 8, RV, 28); and mention is once made of 'elect' angels (1 T 5:1). In St. Paul's Epistles the idea has great prominence (Ro 9, Eph 1 etc.). It is now necessary to investigate the implications of this idea more carefully.
ELECTION

Election, etymologically, is the choice of one, or of some, out of many. In the usage we are investigating, election usually means presenting themselves, and only, of their own accord by which, in the exercise of His holy freedom, He carries out His purpose (the purpose of God according to election, Ro 9:11). The 'call' which brings the election to the fore is the call of Abraham, Israel, believers are declared to be blessed in Christ, even as he chose them in him—'One in whom is the ground of all salvation—before the foundation of the world' (Eph 1:4). It is strongly insisted on, therefore, that the reason of election is not anything in the object itself (Ro 9:19); the ground of the election of believers is not in their holiness or good works, or even in fides pravissim, but solely in God's free grace and mercy (Eph 1:4); holiness a result, not a cause. They are 'made a heritage, having been foreordained according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1:11); or, as in an earlier verse, 'according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace' (v. 6). Yet, after all this, it is an axiom that there is no election in grace with God (Ro 9:4); that His loving will embraces the whole world (Jn 3:16, 1 Ti 2:5); that He can, never, in even the slightest degree, act partially or capriciously (Ac 10:22, 2 Ti 2:20); and that, as salvation in the case of none is compulsory, but is always in accordance with the saved person's own free choice, so none perishes but by his own fault or unbelief—it is obvious that different problems arise on this subject which can be solved, so far as solution is possible, only by close attention to all Scripture indications.

1. In the OT.—Valuable help is afforded, first, by observing the rebuffing of his ideas in his own time, and is developed in the OT. From the first, then, we see that God's purpose advances by a method of election, but observe also that, while sovereign and free, this election is never an end in itself, but is subordinate, in a means to a wider end. It is obvious also that it was only by an election—that is, by beginning with some individual or people, at some time, in some place—that such ends as God had in view in His Kingdom could be realized. Abraham, accordingly, is chosen, and God calls him, and makes His covenant with him, and with his seed; not, however, as a private, personal transaction, but that in him and in his seed all families of the earth should be blessed (Gn 12:1, etc.). Further elections narrow down this line of promise—Isaac, not Ishmael; Jacob, not Esau (cf. Ro 9:10—1—2); all Israel is grown, and prepared for the national covenant at Sinai. Israel, again, is chosen from among the families of the earth (Ex 19:4, Dt 4:3, Am 3:9), not, however, for its own sake, but that it may be a means of blessing to the Gentiles. This is the ideal calling of Israel which peculiarly comes out in the prophecies of the Servant of Jehovah (Is 41—49)—a calling of which the nation as a whole so fatally fell short (Is 42:21, 43). So far as these prophecies of the Servant point to Christ—the Elect One in the supreme sense, as both Augustine and Calvin emphasize—His mission also was one of salvation to the world.

Here, however, it will naturally be asked—is there not a call, a reason for the same end, as it were, in the greater congruity of the object with the purpose for which it was designed? If God chose Abraham, was it not because Abraham was the best fitted among existing men for such a vocation? Was Isaac not better fitted than Ishmael, and Jacob than Esau, to be the transmitters of the promise? This leads to a remark which carries us much deeper into the nature of God's election. We err grievously if we think of God's relation to the objects of His choice as that of a worker who has prepared a set of tools provided for him, from which he selects that most suited to his end. It is a shallow view of the Divine election which regards it as simply availing itself of happy varieties of character spontaneously present in the mass of mankind, and then raising up some one of them to the height of political or moral eminence. Election goes deeper than grace—even into the sphere of nature. It presides to use a happy phrase of Lange's, at the making of its object (Abraham, Moses, David, Paul, etc.), and often it is quite certain that the question is not simply how, a man of the gifts and qualifications of Abraham, or Moses, or Paul, being given, God should use him in the way He did, but rather how a man of this spiritual build, and these gifts and qualifications, came at that precise juncture to be there at all. The answer to that question can be found only in the Divine ordering; election working in the natural sphere prior to its being revealed in the spiritual, God does not simply find His instruments—He creates them: He has had them, in a true sense, in view, and has been preparing them from the foundation of things. Hence St. Paul's saying of himself that he was separated from his mother's womb (Gal 1:15), cf. of Jeremiah, Jer 1:5; of Cyrus, Is 45:1-etc. Here comes in another consideration. Israel was the elect nation, but as a nation it miserably failed in its vocations to be the light of the world (which, with the personal Church. It would seem, then, as if, on the external side, election had failed of its result; but it did not do so really. This is the next step in the OT development—the election within the path of the OT nation's spiritual and true Israel within the natural, of individual election as distinct from national. This idea is seen shaping itself in the greater prophets in the doctrine of the 'remnant' (cf. Is 11:1; 56:1-2; 61:1-3; cf. 2 Th 2:7, 3:13). God's idea of a godly kernel in Israel in distinction from the unbelieving mass (involved in prophecies of the Servant); and is laid hold of, and effectively used, by St. Paul in the NT. Of that spiritual Israel—saying of himself that he was separated from his mother's womb (Gal 1:15), cf. of Jeremiah, Jer 1:5; of Cyrus, Is 45:1, etc. This yields us the natural transition to the NT conception.

2. In the NT.—The priority in the NT standpoint in regard to election may perhaps now be thus defined. (1) Whereas the election in the OT is primarily national, and only gradually works round to the idea of an inner, spiritual election, the opposite is the case in the NT—election is there at first personal and individual, and the Church as an elect body is viewed as made up of these individual believers and all others professing faith in Christ (a distinction thus again arising between inward and outward). (2) Whereas the promiscuous election in the OT is throughout subordinate to the idea of service, in the NT, on the other hand, stress is laid on the personal election to eternal salvation; and the aspect of election as a means to an end beyond itself falls into the background, without, however, being at all intended to be lost sight of. The believer, according to NT teaching, is called to nothing so much as to active service; he is to be a light of the world (Mt 5:14-16), a worker together with God (1 Co 3:9), a living epistle, known and read of all men (2 Co 3:3); the light has shined in his heart that he should give it forth to others (2 Co 4:6); he is elected to the end that he may show forth the excellencies of Him who called him (1 P 2:9), etc. St. Paul is a 'vessel of election' to the definite end that he should bear Christ's name to the Gentiles (Ac 9:15). Believers are a kind of 'first-fruits' unto God (Ro 16:4, 1 Co 16:26, 1 Th 1:11, Rev 14); there is a 'fulness' to be brought in (Ro 11:9).

As carrying us, perhaps, most deeply into the comprehension of the NT doctrine of election, it is lastly to be observed that, apart from the inheritance of ideas from the OT, there is an existential basis for this doctrine, from which, in the living consciousness of faith, it can never be divorced. In general it is to be remembered that God's providence is everywhere in Scripture represented as extending over all persons and events—nothing escaping His notice, or falling outside of His control (not even the great crime of the Crucifixion, Ac 4:23)—and how uniformly every-thing good and gracious is ascribed to His Spirit as its author (e.g. Ac 11:18, Eph 2:5, Ph 2:3, He 13:8—21). It cannot, therefore, be that in so great a matter as a soul’s regeneration (see Regeneration), and the trans-planting of it out of the darkness of sin into the light and blessing of Christ’s Kingdom (Ac 26:18, Col 1:13, 1 P 2:10), the change should not be viewed as a supreme triumph of God in that soul, and should not be referred to an eternal act of God, choosing the individual, and in His love calling him in His own good time into this felicity. Thus, also, in the experience of salvation, the soul, conscious of the part of God in bringing it to itself, and only realizing its spiritual presence on Him for everything good, will desire to regard it and will regard it; and will feel that in this thought of God’s everlasting choice of it lies its true ground of security and running (Ro 8:28, 31, 39). It is not the soul that has chosen God, but God that has chosen it (cf. Jn 15:16), and all the comforting and assuring promises which Christ gives to those whom He describes as ‘given’ Him by the Father (Jn 6:37, 40, etc.)—as His ‘sheep’ (Jn 10:4 etc.)—are humbly appropriated by it for its consolation and encouragement (cf. Jn 6:38). On this experiential basis Calvinist and Arminian may both agree, though the latter leaves the specu-lative question still unsolved of how precisely God’s grace and human freedom work together in the production of this great change. That is a question which meets us whenever God’s purpose and man’s free purpose touch, and probably will be found to embrace unsolved element till the end. Start from the Divine side, and the work of salvation is all of grace; start from the human side, then God’s grace is necessary and sufficient. The elect, on any showing, must always be those in whom God is regarded as effecting its result; the will, on the other hand, must be freely won; but this winning of the will may be viewed as itself the last triumph of grace—God works through the means to His end. If this is true, then the reality of God’s presence in the work of regeneration (Ph 2:16, He 13:21—23). From this highest point of view the antimony disappears; the believer is ready to acknowledge that it is not nothing in itself, nor his own will, that has brought him into the Kingdom (Ro 9:24), but only God’s eternal mercy. JAMES OOO.

ELECT LADY.—See John [Epistles, ch. 5].

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL.—Upon the ‘parcel of ground’ which he had bought at Shechem, Jacob built an altar and called it El-eloe-Israel, ‘El, the god of Israel,’ Gn 33:19 (E). This appears a strange name for an altar, and it is just possible that we should emend the text, and read with the LXX., ‘he called upon the God of Israel.’

EL ELOY.—See God, and Most High.

ELEMENT.—A component or constituent part of a complex body. The ancient philosophers inquired after the essential constituent elements, principles, or substan-ces of the physical universe; and many supposed them to consist of earth, air, fire, and water. As used in the NT the word always appears in the plural.

1. In 2 P 3:5-6 the physical elements of the heavens and earth are referred to as destined to destruction at the sudden coming of the Day of the Lord, ‘by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat.’ In the same sense the apocryphal Book of Wisdom (7:27) employs the word, and speaks of ‘the constitution of the world and the operation of the elements.’ It should be observed also that the later Jewish angelology con-ceived three different elements and all the heavenly bodies as animated by living spirits, so that there were angels of the waters, the winds, the clouds, the hail, the frost, and the various seasons of the year. Thus we read in the NT Apocalypse of the four angels of the four winds, the angel that has power over fire, the angel of the waters, and an angel standing in the sun. And so every element and every star had its controlling spirit or angel, and this concept of the animism of nature has been widespread among the nations (see Angel).

2. The exact meaning of the phrase ‘elements of the world’ in the four texts of Gal 4:2, and Col 2:16 has been found difficult to determine. (a) Not all interpreters, both ancient and modern, understand the ‘elements’ mentioned in these passages to refer to the physical elements possessed and presided over by angels or demons. It is argued that the context in both these Epistles favours this opinion, and the express statement that the Galatians ‘were in bondage to them that by nature are no gods,’ and the admonition in Colossians against ‘philosophy, vain deceit, and wor-shipping of the angels,’ show that the Apostle had in mind a current superstitious belief in cosmic spiritual beings, and a worshipping of them as princes of the powers of the air and world-rulers of darkness. Such a low and superstitious bondage might well be pronounced both ‘weak and beggarly.’ (b) But probably the majority of interpreters understand by these ‘elements of the world’ the ordinances and customs of Jewish legalism, which tied the worshipper to the ritualism of a ‘worldly sanctuary’ (cf. He 9:6). Such a bondage to the letter had some adaptation to, and was still the discipline of signs and symbols, and was a bond of a tenebrous kind, it would be ‘weak and beggarly thing in comparison with conscious living fellowship with the Lord Christ. For the sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ are not to remain little children, or in a state of dependence nothing different from that of a bond-servant, but receive the fulness of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, and cry ‘Abba, Father.’ Such are no longer ‘held in bondage under the rudiments of the world,’ for Christ sets them free from dependence of His ordinance. He has made sacrifices, observance of times and seasons, which all belong to the elementary stages and phases of the lower religious cults of the world. It should be noticed that both these interpretations of the texts in Gal. and Col. claim support in the immediate context, and both will probably long continue to find favour among pains-taking and critical expositors. But the last-mentioned interpretation seems to command widest acceptance, and to accord best with the gospel and teaching of St. Paul.

3. The word is found also with yet another meaning in He 5:6, where the persons addressed are said to need instruction in the rudiments of the first elements or the oracles of God. Here the term ‘rudiments’ or ‘elements,’ is obviously used in an ethical sense. By these ‘elements of the beginning of the oracles of God’ the writer means the primary and simple truths of the God’s revelation of Himself in the prophets and in Christ. These are the A B C of the Christian religion.

M. S. TERRY.

ELEPH (Jos 19:23 only).—A town of Benjamin, probably the present village Liffe, W. of Jerusalem.

ELEPHANT—Job 40:24 Avm, but RVm correctly ‘hippopotamus’ (see BHMMT). The use of elephants in warfare is frequently noticed in the Books of Maccab-ees (e.g. 1 Mac 3:24 6:4 8:17, 2 Mac 14:13). See also XIV.

ELEutherus (1 Mac 11:29-30).—A river which separated Syria and Phoenicia, and appears to be the mod. Nahor el-Kebir or ‘Great River,’ which divides the Lebanon in two north of Tripoli.

ELIHANAN (‘God is gracious’).—1. The son of Jacob according to 1 Ch 26:26; of Zarephath according to 2 S 21:14; in the former text he is represented as slaying Lahmi the brother of Goliath, in the latter as slaying Goliath himself. A companion of the Hebrew ELI (possibly an abbreviated form of Etit, 'God is high').—The predecessor of Samuel as 'judge,' and high priest in the sanctuary at Shiloh. Excluding in the final centuries of his life, even the time he occupies the position of greater interest. Thus in his interviews with Hannah, in the first one it is she in whom the chief interest centres (1 S 1:13); in the second it is the child Samuel (1 S 2:25). The next time he is mentioned it is only as the father of Hophni and Phinehas, the whole passage being occupied with an account of their evil doings. Again, in 2 S 22:35, Eli is mentioned only as 'a man of God' who uttereth his prophecy of evil. And lastly, in his dealings with the boy Samuel the whole account (ch. 3) is really concerned with Samuel, while Eli plays quite a subsidiary part. All this serves to illustrate the personality of Eli as that of a humble-minded, good man of weak character; his lack of influence over his sons only serves to emphasize this estimate.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.—See ELOH, ELOH, etc.

ELIAB ('God is father').—1. The representative, or 'prince, of the tribe of Zebulun, who assisted Moses and Aaron in numbering the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 1:8). 2. The father of Daithan and Abiram (Nu 16:7). 3. The eldest brother of David, and thought by Samuel to have been destined for kingship in Israel on account of his beauty and stature (1 S 16:7). He is mentioned as being a warrior in the Israelite camp on the occasion of Goliath's challenge to and defiance of the armies of Israel; he rebukes his younger brother David for his presumption in mixing himself up with the affairs of the army; his attitude towards David, after the victory of the latter over Goliath, is not mentioned. 4. One of the musicians who were appointed by the Levites, at David's command, to accompany the procession which was formed on the occasion of bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15:19). 5. One of the Gadites who joined David, during his outlaw life, in the hold of the wilderness (1 Ch 12:6). 6. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:6); see ELIHU No. 1. 7. One of Judith's ancestors (Jth 8). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELIABHA.—One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23:25, 1 Ch 11:23).

ELIAMIL ("God will establish").—1. The son of Hilkiah, who was over the household of king Hezekiah, and one of the three who represented the king during the interview with Sennacherib's emissaries (2 K 18:19, Is 36:3). In Is 22:28-31 (v. 31 seems to be out of place) he is contrasted favourably with his predecessor Shebnah (who is still in office), and the prophet prophesies that Eliakim shall be a 'father' in the land. 2. The name of king Josiah's son, who reigned after him; Pharaoh-neco changed his name to Jehoakim (2 K 23:3). 3. In Neh 12:9 a priest of this name is mentioned as one among those who assisted at the ceremony of the dedication of the wall. 4. The son of Abiud (Ml 1). 5. The son of Melea (Lk 3). The last two occur in the genealogies of our Lord.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELIALI (1 Es 9:4).—The name either corresponds to Rimmi in Ezr 10:6 or is unrepresented there.

ELIAM.—1. Father of Bithheba, whose first husband was a Hittite, 1 S 11:1 (= 1 Ch 3, where Eliam is called Ammish). 2. Son of Aishophel the Gilonite, and one of David's heroes (2 S 23:4). It is not impossible that this Eliam is the same as the preceding.

ELIAONIAS (1 Es 8:5).—A descendant of Phath- moab, who returned from Babylon with Esdras. In Ezr 8:1 Elihoenai.

ELIAS.—See ELIAB.

ELIAH.—1. The high priest who was contemporary with Nehemiah. He was the son of Joiakim, grandson of Jeshua the son of Joiadak, the contemporary of Zerubbabel (Neh 12:9, Ezr 3:2), and father of Joiada (Neh 12:13). He assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem during Nehemiah's governorship (Neh 3). He can have had no sympathy with the exclusive policy of Ezra and Nehemiah, for both he himself and members of his family allied themselves with the leading foreign opponents of Nehemiah. See JOJAD, NO. 2, TOHIAH, AND SARSALAT. 2. A singer of the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife, 5. A son of Elioenai (1 Ch 3:18). 3. The name of a priestly house (1 Ch 24:19). 4. Father of Jehohanan, to whose chamber in the Temple Ezra resorted (Ezr 10): possibly identical with No. 1.

ELIASIB (1 Es 9:10).—A high priest in the time of Neh.

ELIASIBUS (AV Eliasurus, 1 Es 9:9).—One of the 'holy singers,' who put away his strange wife. In Ezr 10:9 Elashish.

ELIASIMUS, 1 Es 9:9 = Ezr 10:9 Elashish.

ELIASIS (1 Es 9:9).—This name and Enasibus may be duplicate forms answering to Elashish in Ezr 10:9.

ELIATHAH.—A Hemanite, whose family formed the twentieth division of the Temple service (1 Ch 25:7).

ELID.—Son of Chilet, and Benjamin's representative for dividing the land, Nu 34:1 P (perh. = Eidel, one of the elders, Nu 11:27: E).

ELIEHOENAI.—1. A Korahite (1 Ch 26:9). 2. The head of a family of exiles that returned (Ezr 8:21); called in 1 Es 8:6 Eliesionias.

ELIENAI. — A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:9).

ELIEZER (cf. Eleazar). — 1. Abraham's chief servant, a Damascene (Gen 15:2 AV, RVM. The construction here is difficult, but the words can hardly be rendered as a double proper name as RV, 'Damnesek Elezer.' Whatever the exact construction, the words, unless there is a corruption in the text, must be intended to suggest that Eleazer was in some way connected with Damascus.) This same Eleizer is prob. the servant referred to in Gn. 24. 2. A son of Moses by Zipporah; so named to commemorate the deliverance of Moses from Pharaoh (Ex 2:21). 3. The son of Becher, a Benjamite (1 Ch 7:4). 4. The son of Zichri, captain of the tribe of Reuben in David's reign (1 Ch 27:4).

5. The son of Dodavahu of Mareshah, who prophesied that the ships of Hiram, which Jehoshaphat had built in co-operation with Ahaziah (2 Ch 20:29).

6. One of the chief men whom Ezra sent to Casiphia to find Levites and Netophim to join the expedition to Jerusalem (Ezr 8:7). 7. A priest, a Levite, and a son of Harim, who married 'strange women' (Ezr 10:16; [1 Es 9:4 Eleazar]).

10. One of the priests appointed to blow with the trumpets before the ark of God when David brought it from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15:18). 11. A Levite (1 Ch 26:20). 12. An ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3:23).

ELIHOREPH. — One of Solomon's scribes (1 K 4:6).

ELIHU. — 1. An ancestor of Samuel (1 S 11); called in 1 Ch 6:9 Elieel, and in 1 Ch 6:7 Eliah. 2. A variation in 1 Ch 27:14 for Elijah, David's eldest son (1 S 18:3). 3. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:8).

6. An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8).

ELIJAH. — 1. Elijah, the wealthiest figure among the prophets of Israel, steers across the threshold of history when Ahab is on the throne (c. n.c. 876-854), and is last seen in the reign of Ahaziah (854-853), although a posthumous activity is attributed to him in 2 Ch 21:19.

A native of Tishbite in Gilead (1 K 17:1), he appears on the scene unheralded; not a single hint is given as to his birth and parentage. A rugged Bedouin in his hairy mantle (2 K 19), Elijah appears as a representative of the nomadic stage of Hebrew civilization. He is a veritable incarnation of the austere morals and the purer religion of an earlier period. His name ('Jeh is God') may be regarded as the motto of his life, and expresses the aim of his mission as a prophet. Ahab had brought on a religious crisis in Israel by marrying Jezebel, a daughter of the Tyrian king Ethbaal, who, prior to his assuming royal purple, had been a priest of Melkart, the Tyrian Baal, and in order to ascend the throne had stained his hand with his master's blood. True to her early training and environment, Jezebel not only persuaded her husband to build a temple to Baal in Samaria (1 K 16:31), but became a zealous protagonist of the gods of the Phoenicians, and developed into a cruel persecutor of the prophets and followers of Jehovah. The foreign deity, thus supported by the throne, threatened to crush all allegiance to Israel's national God in the hearts of the people.

Such was the situation, when Elijah suddenly appears before Ahab as the champion of Jehovah. The hearts of the people were to be chastened by the drought (177). It lasts three years; according to a statement of Menander quoted by Josephus (Ant. viii. xiii. 2), in the reign of Ithobaal, the Biblical Ethbaal, Phoenicia suffered from a terrible drought, which lasted one year. Providence first guides the stern prophet to the brook Cherith (Wady Kelt in the vicinity of Tiberias) where the ravens supply him with food. Soon the stream becomes a bed of stones, and Elijah flees to Zarephath in the territory of Sidon, where he is supported by a widow. The woman, to whose household (cf. Lk 4:26, Ja 5:19). The barrel of meal did not waste, and the cruse of oil did not fail. Like the Good Prophet of the N.T., he brings glad tidings of a bereaved mother by restoring her son to life (1 K 17:17, cf. Lk 7:11).

The heavens have been like brass for months upon months, and vegetation has disappeared. The hearts of Ahab's subjects have been mellowed, and many are ready to return to their old allegiance. The time is ripe for action, and Elijah throws down the gauntlet to Baal and his followers. Ahab and his chief steward, Obadiah, a devoted follower of the true God, are up to the brim. They happen by chance in search of grass for the royal stables, when the latter encounters the strange figure of Jehovah's relentless champion. Obadiah, after considerable hesitation and reluctance, is persuaded by the prophet to announce him to the king (1 K 18:19). As the two meet, we have the first skirmish of the battle. 'Art thou Elijah?' is the monarch's greeting; but the prophet's reply puts the matter in a true light: 'I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house.' At Elijah's suggestion these two sons of Baal are summoned to Carmel by a trial by fire. The priests of the Tyrian deity, termed 'prophets' because they practised the mantle of fire, are to be gathered about an altar upon an altar without kindling the wood. From morn till noon, and from noon till dusk, the fire is not to be extinguished. Elijah's assurance is that the first shall be used up, and the wood prepared, and laid upon the water and earth is poured over it, until everything about the altar is thoroughly soaked as the trench is full. At the prayer of Elijah, fire falls from heaven, devouring the wood, stone, and water as well as the victim. The people are convinced, and shout, 'Baal is God: Jehovah has the same rights as Kishon's flood, as old as Je (Jo 2:19), is red with the blood of Jehovah's enemies. The guilt of the land has been stoned and the longings of the prophets answered. The sanctity and implacable Jehovah now threatens the life of the prophet who has dared to put his mission to death. Jehovah's spirits rise into a storm of anger against his enemies. The reaction, so natural after an achievement like that on Carmel, and Elijah prays that he may be permitted to die. In this address of granting his petition, God here and now ministers to the prophet's physical needs. On the strength of that food he journeys forty days until he reaches Horeb, where he receives a new revelation of Jehovah (1 K 19:4-8). Elijah takes refuge in a cave, perhaps the same in which Moses hid (Ex 33:2), and hears the voice of Jehovah. What doctrine has grown out of this experience, and what the reaction? Elijah says, 'I have been very jealous for Jehovah, God of Hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant; thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away.' Then Jehovah reveals His omnipotence in a great wind, earthquake, and fire; but we read that Jehovah was not in these. Then followed a still small voice (Heb. lit. 'a sound of gentle stillness'), in which God made known His true nature and His real character (1 K 19:14). After hearing his complaint, Jehovah gives His faithful servant a threefold commission: Hesed is to be anointed king of Judah, Jeu of Israel, and is to proclaim in the prophetic order. Elijah is further encouraged with information that there are still 7000 in Israel who have not bowed the knee to Baal (1 K 19:18). As far as we know, only the last of these three commissions was executed by the prophet himself, while the first and the second, made his headquarters in the wilderness of Damascus (v. 15); the other two were carried out either by Elijah or by members of the prophetic guild (2 K 9:1-17).

Elijah is also the champion of that civic righteousness which Jehovah loved and enjoyed on His people. Naboth owns a vineyard in the vicinity of Jezreel. In the spirit of the Israelitish law (Lv 25:9, Nu 36:3) he refuses to sell his property to the king. But Jezebel, equal to the occasion, at her suggestion false witnesses are bribed to swear that Naboth has cursed God and the king. The citizens, thus deceived, according to their law, stone the local inhabitant to death. And in his way to take possession of his ill-gotten estate, meets his old antagonist, who pronounces the judgment of God upon him. Which place did he lick the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine, is the prophet's greeting. A female child of his house shall be swept off by an awful fate (1 K 21:21, 22). By the ramparts of Jezebel itself, the dogs will devour the body of Jezebel (v. 29). These predictions, although delayed for a time on account of the repentance of Abah, were all fulfilled (1 K 22:9, 2 K 9:30, 10:8).

ELISHA

A true son of Abah and Jezebel. Meeting with a serious accident, after his fall he sends a messenger to Ekron to inquire of Baal-zebub, the Baal, concerning his recovery. Elijah intercepts the emissaries of the king, bidden them return to their master with this word from Jehovah: 'Is it because there is no God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? Thou shalt not come down from the bed whither thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. Ahaziah recognizes the author of this message, and sends three captains of fifty's to capture the prophet, who calls down fire from heaven on the first two. The third approaches him in a humble spirit, and at God's bidding Elijah accomplishes the same, and his power is demonstrated to the astonished palace and reiterates the message of doom (2 K 1).

Like all the great events of his life, the death of this great man was accompanied by his faithful follower Eliezer, he passes from Bethel to Jericho, and from thence they cross the Jordan, after Elijah has parted the waters by striking them with his mantle. As they go on their way, buried in conversation, there suddenly appears a chariot of fire with horses of fire, which parts them asunder; and Elijah goes up by a whirlwind to heaven (cf. Ez 1).

In the history of prophecy Elijah holds a prominent position. Prophecy had two important duties to perform: (1) to extirpate the worship of heathen deities in Israel, (2) to raise the religion of Jehovah to ethical purity. To the former of these two tasks, which predates the prophet, he appears as the representative of OT prophecy (Mt 17:1, Mk 9:2; Lk 9:29). The prophet whose 'word burned like a torch' (Sir 48:1) was a favourite with the later Jews; a host of Rabbinical legends have built up around his name: according to the Rabbis, Elijah was to precede the Messiah, to restore families to purity, to settle controversies and legal disputes, and perform seven miracles (cf. JE, E; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., on Mt 17:16; Schmidtgen, Hor. Heb., ii. 518 ff.). Origen mentions an apocryphal work, The Apocrypha of Elijah, and maintains that 1 Co 2:4 is a quotation from it. Elijah is found also in the Koran (vi. 55, xxxvii. 129-130), and many legends concerning him are current in Arabic literature.

2. A Benjamite chieftain (1 Ch 8:27).

3. 4. A priest and a layman who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:28).

JAMES A. KELSO.

ELIKA.

—One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23).

ELIM.

—One of the stations in the wanderings of the children of Israel (Ex 15:19, Nu 33:38); apparently the fourth station after the passage of the Red Sea, and the first place where the Israelites met with fresh water, it was previously divided by an abundant stream (cf. Ex 15:27, twelve wells and seventy palms). If the traditional site of Mt. Sinai be correct, the likeliest place for Elim is the Wady Ghurandat, where there is a good deal of vegetation, especially stunted palms, and a number of water-holes in the sand; but some travellers have pushed the site of Elim farther on, and placed it almost a day's journey nearer to Sinai, in the Wady Tayibe, where there are again palm trees and a scanty supply of brackish water.

ELIMELECH.

—The husband of Naomi and father of Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Bethlehem-Judah (cf. 1 S 17:12). He is spoken of as if he were the head of a clan in the tribe of Judah (cf. Ru 2:4). This would be the Horonites (1 Ch 2:2, cf. Gn 46:20).

ELOIENAI.

—1. A Shimeite chief (1 Ch 4:4). 2. A Benjamite chieftain (1 Ch 7:4). 3. A descendant of David who lived after the Exile (1 Ch 3:31). 4. A son of Pashhur who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:9); called in 1 Es 8:22 Elnomos. 5. A son of Zattu who had committed the same offence (Ezr 10:9); called in 1 Es 9:4 Elidas.

6. A priest (Neh 12).

ELONIAS.

ELIPHAL.

—One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11:18), called in 2 S 23:28 Eliphaltah.

ELIPHALT.

2. 1 Es 9:24 = Ezr 10:2 Eliphalt.

ELIPHAZ.

—1. Eliphaz appears in the Edomite genealogy of Gn 36 (and hence 1 Ch 1:25) as son of Esau by Adah (vv. 24-25), and father of Amalek by his wife concubine Timnah (vv. 26-27). 2. See Job (Book of).

ELIPHELEHU.

—A doorkeeper (1 Ch 15:4, 9).

ELIPHELET.

—1. One of David's sons (2 S 5:14, 1 Ch 14:7 (AV Eliphelet), 1 Ch 20:5). 2. Eliphelet of 1 Ch 14:7. The double occurrence of the name in Chronicles, as if David had had two sons named Eliphel, is probably due to a scribal error. 2. One of David's mighty men (2 S 23:4 = Eliphalt of 1 Ch 11:28). 3. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8:9). 4. One of the sons of Adonikam who returned from exile (Ezr 8:27 = Eliphealt of 1 Es 8:9). 5. A son of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:26 = Eliphelat of 1 Es 9:9).

ELISABETH.

—The wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist (Lk 1:13). The Hebrew form of the name is Elisheba (Ex 6:19). Elisabeth was of a priestly family, 'the kinswoman' of Mary (Lk 1:40), whom she greeted as the mother of the Messiah (v. 41).

J. G. TASSBER.

ELISEUS.

—The AV form of Elisha (wh. see) in NT.

ELISHA.

—Elisha was a native of Abel-meholah, which was situated in the Jordan valley 10 Roman miles from Scythopolis, probably on the site of the modern 'An Hâshêm. His father was a well-to-do farmer, and so Elisha is a representative of the newer form of Hebrew society. On his return from Horeb, Elisha cast his mantle upon the youth, as he directed his father's servants at their ploughing. The young man at once recognized the call from God, and, after a hastily-devised farewell feast, he left the parental abode (1 K 19:19), and even after he was known as the man 'who poured water on the hands of Elijah' (2 K 3:21). His devotion to, and his admiration for, his great master are apparent in the closing scenes of the latter's life. A double portion, of Elisha's spirit (cf. the right of the firstborn to a double portion of the patrimony) is the summum bonum which he craved, in order to receive this boon he must be a witness of the translation of the mighty hero of Jehovah; and as Elisha is whisked away in the chariot of fire, his mantle falls upon his disciple, who immediately makes use of it in putting the waters of the Jordan. After Elisha has recrossed the river, he is greeted by the sons of the prophets as their leader (2 K 2:4).

After this event it is impossible to reduce the incidents of Elisha's life to any chronological sequence. His ministry covered half a century (a.c. 855-798), and during this period four monarchs, Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Joash, sat on the throne of Israel (2 K 3:23, cf. 13:2). The story of Elisha was borrowed by the author of the Book of Kings from some prophetic work of the Northern Kingdom; and, without any regard for sequence in time, he has arranged the incidents concerning the prophet's mission to subserve a purpose of his own. In our canonical Book of Kings, the larger part of Elisha's activities is placed within the reign of Jehoram (2 K 3:23, cf. 9:25). He may have reached the zenith of his career in those twelve years, but all the restorations of the land cannot be crowded into this short period.

His name, Elisha (= 'God is salvation'), like that of his master, tersely describes his character and expresses his spirit in a spirit of grace, so that his name is an expression of his spirit, making his benignant presence felt. He sweetens a spring of brackish water at Jericho (2 K 2:12) at a time of need, he renders a poisonous mess of pottage harmless for men who were the shepherds of the prophet (4:4), he multiplies the oil for the prophet's widow, who finds herself in dire extremity (4:14). At the prophet's command, as at the bidding of a greater than Elisha, the leavened bread is multiplied (4:4). His sympathy goes out to a practical way for the man who has lost his axe (6:27). One of the most beautiful stories in the whole range of Scripture is that of the entertainment of Elisha in the home of the Shunammite. Her hospitality and prophetic presence make the act of the prophet form a charming picture. In the restoration of her son to life, Elisha performs one of his greatest miracles (4:23). In his treatment of the Syrian captives, the prophet declares the authority of the Lord, and the enemy are returned to their own land (2 K 6:24).

The familiar incident of the healing of the leprous man of Naaman not only gives an idea of the influence and power of the prophet, but the story is suggestive of the profoundest spiritual truths (2 K 5:1-15).

The contrast between the spirit of master and disciple may be over-emphasized. Elisha could as sternly correct and rebuke the mocking youth out of the spirit of Sinai (2:24), and no touch of pity can be detected in the sentence that falls on Gehazi (2:22). The estimate of Elisha at the beginning of the LXX (4:24) is according to all the facts of the OT narrative;

'Eliah it was who was wrapped in a tempest; And Elisha was filled with his spirit; And in all his days he was not moved by the fear of any ruler, And no one brought him into subjectión.'

This severer side of the prophet's character appears in his public rather than in his private life. In the Moab-Itish campaign, the allied kings seek his counsel. His address to Jehoram of Israel, 'What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and the prophets of thy mother,' indicates that Elisha had not forgotten the past and the conflicts of his master (3:11). Later, the relations between the reigning monarch and the prophet seem more cordial, for the man of God reveals the plans of the Syrians to Israel's king (6:10). This change of attitude on the part of the prophet may be due to the fact that Jehoram attempted to do away with Baal worship (3:9); but Elisha has not forgotten the doom pronounced upon the house of Ahab by Elijah. While Jehu is commanding the forces besiegling Ramoth-gilead, Elisha sends one of the sons of the prophets to anoint as king, and thus he executes the commission which Elijah received from Jehovah at Horeb (1 K 19:16).

Elisha's relations with the Syrians are exceedingly interesting. On one occasion he appears to be at rest at home in Damascus as in Samaria. Ben-hadad, suffering from a severe ailment, hears of his presence in his capital, and sends Hazael to the man of God to inquire concerning the matter concerning the heart of the messenger, and predicts both the king's recovery and his assassination by Hazael (2 K 8:28). Nothing is said of a formal anointing, but in this connexion Elisha seems to have carried out the commission of Elijah (1 K 19:16). The blockades of Samaria (2 K 6:22-23) probably falls in the reign of Jehoahaz. That the prophet is held by king and statesmen responsible for the straits to which the city has been reduced, is an eloquent tribute to his political influence. In this connexion Elisha's prediction of deliverance is speedily fulfilled. Under Joash, Israel was hard pressed, and she might have dwindled to insignificance (17:7), but Elisha was still the saviour of his country. Joash weeps over him as he lies on his deathbed: 'My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof.' Directing the monarch to perform a symbolic act, the prophet gives him assurance of victory (13:12). Even after his burial his bones had the power to perform a beneficent miracle (13:21).

An incident in the life of Elisha throws light on the prophetic state. Before declaring the course to be taken in the campaign to the three kings, he asks for a minstrel. The music induces the ecstatic state, and then he prophesies (3:24). The supernatural abounds in his life; in many instances he has the power of prediction (4:39, 8:27, 24:9, 15:12, 13, 14). But some of his deeds are not miracles in the modern sense (2:19, 4:25, 6:34).

JAMES A. KELSO.

ELISHAH.—The eldest son of Javan (Gen 10:4), whence the Tyrians obtained the purple dye (Eze 28:16). The latter favours identification with S. Italy or Sicily, or Carthage and N. African coast, both districts famous for the purple dye. Elissa, or Dido, the traditional foundress of Carthage, may indicate Elissa as an early name of Carthage, and Synccelus gives the gloss 'Elissa, whence the Sikelol.' The Targum on Ezek gives 'the province of Italy.' The Tell el-Amarna tablets include letters to the king of Egypt from the king of Alashua, Egyptian Alas, which has been identified with Cyreus, known to Sargon, king of Assyria, as the land of the Ionians, Javan. There are difficulties in all these identifications, possibly because the name itself denoted different districts at different epochs, and no certainty can yet be attained.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ELISIAPHAT.—One of the captains who helped Jehoiada to install king Joash (2 Ch 23).

ELISHEBA.—Daughter of Ammihud and wife of Aaron (Ex 28:6).

ELISHUA.—A son of David (2 S 3:5; 1 Ch 3:3; also 1 Ch 2:33 noted by Ex 40:11, 1 Ch 23:34).

ELIJU—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1:1).

ELIZAPHAN.—1. Prince of the Kohathites (Nu 3:29, 1 Ch 15:1, 2 Ch 20:19) — Elizaphan (Ex 6:24, Lv 10:16).
ELIZUR

ELKANAH (‘God hath acquired’).—1. A son of Korah (Ex 6v3). 2. An Ephraimite, husband of Peninnah and Hannah; by the former he had several children, but Hannah was for many years childless. Her rival mocked her for this, and in her distress Hannah conceived and bore a son, Samuel. Afterwards three sons and two daughters were born to them (see Hannah, and Samuel). 3. The son of Assaf (1Ch 6v27). 4. The father of Zophah (Zuph), a descendant of 3 (1Ch 6v32, 33). 5. A Levite who dwelt in a village of the Netophathites (1Ch 9v39). 6. One of the mighty men who came to David at Ziklag (1Ch 12v8). 7. A door-keeper for the ark (1Ch 23v25). 8. A high official, 'next to the king,' at the court of Ahaz (2Ch 24v13).—W. O. E. Ostepley.

ELKIAH.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8v3).

ELKOSITE.—See Nahum.

ELLASAR.—Arioch king of Ellasar was allied with Chedorlaomer in the campaign against the kings of the plain (Gen 14v1). He has been identified with Rim-sin, king of Larsa, and consequently 'Ellasar' is thought to be for al-Larsa, 'the city of Larsa.' Larsa, modern Senkereh in Lower Babylonia on the east bank of the Euphrates, was celebrated for its temple and worship of sun-god Shamash. O. H. W. Jersoms.

ELM.—Hos 4v7 AV, but RV 'terebinth.' See also PINE.

ELMADAM.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3v26).

ELNAM.—The father of one of David's mighty men (1Ch 11v9).

ELMATHAN.—1. The father of Nebuah, the mother of Jehoiachin (2K 24v6). 2. The son of Achbor, the chief of those sent to Egypt to fetch Uriah, who had offended Jehoiakim by his prophecy (Jer 26v20); and one of those who had entreated the king not to burn the rolls (36v9). It is possible that he is identical with No. 1. 3. The name occurs no fewer than three times in the list of those sent for by Zerubbabel when he encamped near Ahava (Ezr 8v2). In 1Es 8v11 there are only two corresponding names, the second of which is Elnathan.

ELUHIm.—See God.

ELUST.—See Hezekiah.

ELOI, ELOI, LAMASABACHTHANI.—These Aram. words occur in Mk 15v24, being an Eng. transliteration from the Greek. The underlying Aram. would be Elish, Elish, l'mma shabuqan. The δ in Eloi is probably a local pronunciation of δ as waw or w, as in some Syriac dialects. Dalman, however, maintains that our Lord spoke the first two words in Hebrew and the other two in Aramaic. In this case Eloí represents the Heb. Elokí, 'my God.' For sabachtsi the Codex Sinaiticus reads sabanki, which may be the original reading. It is more correct; but on that very account it may be a gloss. Lamma for Laram. /mma = for what? Why? has many variants in Gr. MS's, as llma, lamma, lima.

In the parallel passage in Mt 27v46 we find Eli, Eli (though Cod. Sin. reads Eloi and B Eloit). Eli is a Heb. word, here, as elsewhere, borrowed in Aramaic. The Aram. word for 'forsake' is sh-baq for which the Heb. equivalent is 'qid. In Heb. 'bass thou forsaken me?' would be 'qabkhtu. This explains the reading of Codex D. zaphkhtanéi, which some cautious literary scribe substituted for sabkhtanéi, both in Mt, and Mk.

ELON.—('Terebinth').—1. Of the tribe of Zebulun, one of the minor judges (Jgs 12v11). All that is told of him is simply that he judged Israel for ten years, that he died, and was buried in Elon in Zebulun. 2. A son of Zebulun (Gn 46v18, Nu 26v9, where the gentile name Elionites occurs). 3. A littlite, the father-in-law of Esau (Gn 26v36). 4. An inhabitant of Zebulun (Gn 14v6).

ELON—BETH—HANAN.—See preceding article.

ELOTH.—See Elath.

ELPAAL.—A Benjamite family (1Ch 8v12, 14).

EL-PARAN (Gn 14v).—See Paran.

ELFLET (1Ch 14v, AV Elpalet).—One of David's sons.—Elipeletel No. 1.

EL-SHADDAIL.—See God.

ELTEKEH.—A town in Dan associated with Ekron and Gibbethon (Jos 19v42), probably the Altakr mentioned by Sennacherib as the locality of his defeat of the Philistines and Egyptians in the time of Hezekiah just before his capture of Megiddo. It was a Levitical city. Its modern site is uncertain. C. H. W. Johns.

ELTEKON (Jos 15v9).—A town of Judah, noticed with Maarath and Beth-anoth. Site unknown.

ELTOIAD (Jos 15v9).—A town in the extreme S. of Judah, given to Simeon (19v8); probably = Tola (1Ch 4v7). The site is unknown.

ELUL (Neh 6v4, 1Mac 14v2).—See TIME.

ELUZAI.—One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1Ch 12v9).

ELYMAIS.—This name, which represents the OT Elam, was given to a district of Persia, lying along the southern spur of Mt. Zagros, S. of Media and N. of Susiana. In 1Mac 6v4, according to the common reading, which is adopted by the AV, Elymais is named as a rich city in Persia. No such city, however, is mentioned elsewhere, except by Josephus, who is simply following 1Mac. There can be no doubt, therefore, that we should correct the text and read with RV, 'in Elymais in Persia there was a city.'

ELYMAS.—See Bar-Jesus.

ELZAPHAN.—See Elzaphan.

EMADABUN (1Es 6v6).—One of the Levites who superintended the restoration of the Temple. The name does not occur in the parallel in Ezra 3; it is probably due to a repetition of the name which follows, Habubun.

EMATHIES (1Es 9v7).—Athath, Ezr 10v3.

EMBALMING.—This specifically Egyptian (non-Israelitish) method of treating dead bodies is mentioned in Scripture only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen 50v23, 24).

EMBROIDERY AND NEEDLEWORK.—Embroidery is the art of working patterns or figures on textile fabrics with woolen, linen, silk, or gold thread by means of a needle. The process was exactly described by the Romans as painting with a needle (acu pingere).

The Hebrew word for embroidery (qimgal) is rendered by AV in Jgs 5v28, and Ps 45v8 by 'needlework,' for which RV substitutes 'embroidery.'—In the former passage, however, render 'a piece of embroidery or two' for 'embroidery on both sides,' and in Ezk 16v10, 11, 12, by 'brodered work' or brodered garments,' which RV retains. Similarly in connexion with certain fabrics of the Tabernacle and the high priest's girdle, for 'wrought with needlework' RV has the more literal rendering 'the work of the embroiderer' (Ex 26v32, 27v32 etc.), whom AV also introduces in the parallel.

An entirely different word, the real significance of which is uncertain, is also rendered in AV by 'embroder. 'thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen' (Ex 28:29), for which RV has: 'thou shalt weave the coat in chequer work' (for which see Spinning and Weaving). So for a 'brodered coat' (Ex 28:9) RV has 'a coat of chequer work.'

The art of embroidery was an invention of the Babylonians, from whom it passed, through the medium of the Phrygians, to the Greeks and the other nations of the Western world. Many cloths are still preserved showing that the art was also practised in Egypt. No actual specimens of Babylonian embroidery have survived, but the sculptures of Assyrian palaces, notably a sculptured figure of Ashurnasirpal, show the royal robes ornamented with borders of the most elaborate embroidery. The various designs are discussed, with illustrations, by Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldea and Assyria, ii. 355 ff.

If, as is generally believed, the Priests' Code was compiled in Babylon, we may trace the influence of the latter in the embroideries introduced into the Tabernacle screens and elsewhere (Ex. vii. 4). In the passages in question the work of 'the embroiderer' (rōqām) is distinguished from, and mentioned after, the work of the 'cunning workman' (ḥabah, lit. 'designer,' in Phoenician 'weaver'), who appears to have woven his designs, and the fabric after the manner of the city. See Spinning and Weaving. The materials used by both artists were the same, linen thread dyed 'blue, purple, and scarlet,' and fine gold thread, the preparation of which is minutely described, Ex. 28:19.

An illustration in colours of the sails which Tyre imported from Egypt, 'of fine linen with brodered work' (Ezk. 27:19), may be seen in the frontispiece to Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, vol. ii.

A. R. S. KENNEY.

EMEK-KEZIZ (Jos 18:3, AV 'Valley of Kezin,' mentioned among the towns of Benjamin).—A place apparently in the Jordan Valley near Jericho. The site is unknown.

EMERALD.—See Jewels and Precious Stones.

EMERODS.—See Medicine.

EMMANUEL.—See Immanuel.

EMMAUS.—1. A village sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, where the risen Christ made Himself known to two of His disciples (Lk. 24:13). There is no clue to the position of this place, and it has been sought in Kubeh, N.W. of the city; in Kalam, W. of it; in Khamus, N.W. of the city; and in Urías to the S. The traditional site is Emmaus Nicopoli (Amwas), W. of Jerusalem, which, however, is much too far—20 miles—from the city.

2. Emmaus Nicopolis, now 'Amwas, on the main Jerusalem-Jaffa road, the scene of the defeat of Gogias by Judas (1 Mac 3:16, 37 4:27), held and fortified by Baccides (1 Mac 9:4). R. A. MACALISTER.

EMMER (1 Es 9:22) = Ezr 10:16 Immber.

EMMETRUTH (1 Es 5:4).—A corruption of Immmer in Ezr 2:48.

ENAIM.—A Judaean town in the Shephelah (Jos 18:36 'Enam'); Gn 38:14, AV 'in an open place,' RV 'in the gate of Enaim'; vi. 36, AV 'openly,' RV 'at Enaim.' From the narrative in Gn 38 we gather that it lay between Adullam and Timnah. The site is not identified. Conder suggests Khirbet Wadi Alim, near Beth-shemesh and En-gannim. W. EWING.

ENAN.—Prince of Naphtali at the first census (Nu 1:18 26:78 82 10:2 P).

ENASIUS (1 Es 9:22) = Ezr 10:16 Eliasib. The form is probably due to reading ας as Ν.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA.—One of the stations in the itinerary of the children of Israel, where they encamped after leaving Eltim, Nu 33:16. If the position of Eltim be in the Wady Gharemeh, then the camp by the sea is on the shore of the Gulf of Sues, somewhere south of the point where the Wady Tylebeh opens to the coast. The curious return of the line of march to the seashore is a phenomenon that has always arrested the attention of travellers to Mt. Sinai and if Mt. Sinai be really in the so-called Sinaiic peninsula, the camp can be located within a half-mile.

ENCHANTMENT.—See Magic Division and Sorcery.

EN-DOR.—A town of Manasseh in the territory of Issachar (Jos 19:21); the home of a woman with a familiar spirit consulted by Saul on the eve of the battle of Gilboa (1 S 28): and, according to a psalmist (84:10), the scene of the rout of Jabin and Sisera. It is identified with Endur, south of Tahor, where are several ancient caves.

R. A. MACALISTER.

EN-EGLAIM.—A locality on the Dead Sea, mentioned along with En-geedi (Ezk 47:8). It has not been identified, but is not improbably 'Atim Feshkhat (Robinson, B.B. ii. 489). Tristram (Bible Places, 93) would make it 'Atim Hafak (Beth-hofkah). In any case, it probably lay in the southern part of the Jordan.

ENEMESSAR.—Name of a king of Assiyria in Gr. MSS of To 1st, where the Syriac and Lat. give Shelmaneser, who is probably meant. The corruption is best accounted for by the loss of sh and the transposition of m and n; but naturally many explanations may be offered without conviction.

ENNEUS (1 Es 5:1).—One of the twelve leaders of the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel. The name is omitted in the parallel list in Ezr 2, which gives only eleven leaders; but answers to Nabamani, Nu 27.

EN-GANNIM.—1. Jos 15:9. A town of Judah noticed with Zanoah and Eshtaol; perhaps the ruin Umm Tma in the valley near Zanoah. 2. Jos 19:21 (in 1 Ch 6:4 Anem). A town of Issachar given to the Leviites; now Jenin, a town on the S. border of Esdraelon, with a fine spring, gardens, and palms. It marked the S. limit of Galilee, and appears to have been always a flourishing town.

EN-GEDEI ('spring of the kid').—A place 'in the wilderness' in the tribe of Judah (Jos 19:9), where David for a time was at hiding (1 S 23:9 24:1). Here the Moabites and Ammonites came against Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20:9). The Shulammite compares her beloved to henna flowers in En-geedi (Cp 1:4); and in Ezekiel's idealistic vision of the healing of the Dead Sea waters, a picture is drawn of fishers here spreading their nets (Ezk 47:12). An alternative name is Hazazon-tamar, found in Gn 14:2 and 2 Ch 20. There is no doubt of the identification of En-geedi with 'Atim Jidy, a spring of warm water that breaks out 330 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea, about the middle of its W. side. It once was cultivated, but is now given over to a wild semi-tropical vegetation.

ENGLISH VERSIONS.—1. The history of the English Bible begins early in the history of the English people, though not quite at the beginning of it, and only slowly attains to any magnitude. The Bible which was brought into the country by the first missionaries by Adan in the north and Augustine in the south, was the Latin Bible; and for some considerable time after the first preaching of Christianity to the English no vernacular version would be required. Nor is there any trace of a vernacular Bible in the Celtic Church, which still existed in Wales and Ireland. The literary language of the educated minority was Latin; and the instruction of the newly converted English tribes was carried on by oral teaching and preaching. As time went on, however, and monasteries were founded, many of whose inhabitants were imperfectly instructed in which language the 'higher' parts of the Latin Bible; and, on the other, for continuous versions or paraphrases, which might be read to, or by, whose skill in reading Latin was small.

2. The earliest form, so far as is known, in which this demand was met was the poem of Caedmon, the work of a monk at Whitby in the third quarter of the 10th cent., which gives a metrical paraphrase of parts of both Testaments. The Wessex version (which in Bodleian MS. d. 707) belongs to the end of the 10th cent., and it is doubtful how much of it really goes back to the time of Caedmon. In any case, the poem as it appears does not appear to be later than the 8th century. A tradition, originating with Bale, attributed an English version of the Psalms to Alcuin, bishop of Sherborne (d. 797), but it appears to be quite baseless (see A. S. Cook, Bibl. Quat. in Old Eng. Prov. iv. 172-177). In 1878, Professor H. G. A. Hasted published a Psalter in an 11th cent. MS at Paris (partly in prose and partly in verse) has been identified, without any evidence, with this imaginary work. The well-known story of the death of Bede (in 735) shows him engaged on an English translation of St. John's Gospel (one early MS (as St. Gall) represents this as extending only to John 6; but so abrupt a conclusion seems inconsistent with the course of the narrative), but of this all traces have disappeared. The scholarship of the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, which had an important influence on the textual history of the Latin Vulgate, did not turn itself with unwarrantable translations, and no further trace of an English Bible appears until the 9th century. To that period is assigned a word-for-word translation of the Psalter, written between the lines of a Latin Psalter MS of the same period (in the British Museum), which was the progenitor of several similar glosses between that date and the 12th cent.; and to it certainly belongs the attempt of Alfred to educate his people by English translations of the works which he thought most needful to them. He is said to have undertaken a version of the Psalms, of which no portion survives, unless the prose portion (Ps 1-50) of the above-mentioned Paris MS is a relic of it; but we still have the translation of the Decalogue, the summary of the Mosaic law, and the letter of the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15:28-35), which he prefixed to his code of the 10th cent., being probably the only portion of the Paris MS, and the interlinear translation of the Gospels in Northumbrian dialect inserted by the priest Aldred in the Lindisfarne Gospels (British Museum), which is repeated in the Ruward Gospels (Bodleian) of the same century, with the difference that the version of Mt. is there in the Mercian dialect. This is the earliest extant translation of the Gospels into English.

3. The earliest independent version of any of the books of the Bible has likewise generally been assigned to the 10th cent., but if this claim can be made good at all, it can apply only to the last years of that century. The version in question is a transliteration of the Gospels in the dialect of Wessex, of which six MSS (with a fragment of a seventh) are now extant. It was edited by W. Skeat, The Holy Gospels in Anglo-Saxon (1871-1877); two MSS are in the British Museum, two at Cambridge, and two (with a fragment of another) at Oxford. From the number of copies which still survive, it must be presumed to have had a certain circulation, at any rate in Wessex, where it continued to be used into the 12th century. The earliest MSS are assigned to the beginning of the 11th cent.: but it is observable that Ælfric the Grammariian, abbot of Eynsham, writing about 990, says that the English at that time 'had not the evangelical doctrines among their writers ... those books which had been translated into English,' prefacing his Ælfric's Homilies, edited by B. Thorpe, London, 1848-46. In a subsequent treatise (Treatise concerning the Old and New Testament, ed. W. M. Ramsay, London, 1623), Ælfric says that the date of the first extant revised version to be about 1010, see Dietrich, Ztschr. f. hist. Theol. 1856, quoted by Cook, op. cit., p. lxiv.) he speaks as if no English version of the Gospels were in existence, and refers his readers to his own homilies on the Gospels. Since Ælfric had been a monk at Winchester and abbot of Cerne, in Dorset, it is difficult to understand how he could have failed to know that by this time, the so-called A. S. version had been produced and circulated much before 1000; and it seems probable that it only came into existence early in the 11th century. In this case it was contemporaneous with another work of translation, due to Ælfric himself. Ælfric, at the request of Ethelweard, son of his patron Æthelmar, caldorman of Devonshire and founder of Eynsham Abbey, produced a paraphrase of the Heptateuch, homilies containing epitomes of the Books of Kings and Job, and brief versions of Esther, Judith, and Maccabees. These have the interest of being the earliest extant English version of the narrative books of the OT. (The Heptateuch and Job were printed by E. Thwaites (Oxford, 1898). For the rest, see Cook, op. cit.)

4. The Norman Conquest checked for a time all the vernacular literature of England, including the translations of the Bible. One of the first signs of its revival was the production of the Ormulum, a poem which embodies metrical versions of the Gospels and Acts, written about the end of the 12th century. The main body of English literature of the period is confined, however, to the 14th, for the benefit of the Norman settlers in England, translations of the greater part of both OT and NT were produced during the 12th and 13th centuries. Especially notable among these were the version of the Apocalypse, because it was frequently accompanied by a series of illustrations, the best examples of which are the finest (and also the most quaint) artistic productions of the period in the sphere of book-illustration. Nearly 90 MSS of this version are known, ranging from the first half of the 12th cent. to the first half of the 13th (see F. Berger, La Bible Française au Moyen Âge, p. 78 ff.). It is known under the title of the Apocalypse en Français (Paris, 1901); and New Palaeographical Society, part 2, pl. 38, 39), some having been produced in England, and others in France; and in the French period, it reappears in an English dress, having been translated apparently about that time. This English version (which at one time was attributed to Wykoff) is known in no less than 16 MSS, which fall into at least two classes [see Miss A. C. Pauels, A Fourteenth Century English Biblical Version (Cambridge, 1902), pp. 24-30]; and it is noteworthy that from the second of these is derived the version which appears in the revised Wykoff Bible, to be mentioned presently.

5. The 14th cent., which saw the practical extinction of the general use of the French language in England, and the rise of a real native literature, saw also a great revival of vernacular Biblical literature, beginning apparently with the Book of Psalms. Two English versions of the Psalter were produced at this period, one of which enjoyed great popularity. This was the work of Richard Rolle, hermit of Hampole, in Yorkshire (d. 1349). It contains the Latin text of the Psalter, followed verse by verse by an English translation and commentary. Originally written in the northern dialect, it soon spread over all England, and many MSS of it still exist in which the dialect has been altered to suit southern tastes. Towards the end of the 14th cent. Rolle's works suffered further change, the commentary being re-written from a strongly Lollard point of view, and in this shape it continued to circulate far into the 16th century. Another version of the Psalter was produced contemporaneously with Rolle's, somewhere in the West Midlands. The authorship of it was formerly attributed to Wulfstan of Shoreham, vicar of Chart Sutton, in Kent, but for no other reason than that in one of the two MSS in which it is preserved (Brit. Mus. Add. MS 17376, the other being at Trinity College, Dublin) it is bound up with the religious poems. The diary, however, proves that this authorship is impossible, and the version must be put down as anonymous. As in the case of Rolle's translation, the Latin and English texts are intermixed, verse by verse; but there is no commentary. [See K. S. Böhlman, The Earliest Complete English Psalter (Early English Text Society), 1891.]

The text is not the text of the only part of the Bible of which versions came into existence in the course of the 14th century. At Magdalen College, Cambridge (Pepys MS 2498), is an English narrative of the Life of Christ, compiled out of a re-arrangement of the Gospels engaged in an open war with the Papacy and war, most of recently, too, a group of MSS, which (so far as they were known at all) had been regarded as belonging to the Wyclifite Bible, has been shown by Miss Anna C. Fanes in her Fourteenth Century historians (Cambridge, 1903) to contain an independent translation of the NT. It is not complete, the Gospels being represented only by Mt 1–6, and the Apocalypse being entirely omitted. Though this is, indeed, to have consisted of the four larger Catholic Epistles and the Epistles of St. Paul, to which were subsequently added 2 and 3 John, Jude, Acts, and Mt 1–20. For all MSS of this version, the oldest being one at Selwyn College, Cambridge, which was written about 1400. The prologue narrates that the translation was made at the request of a monk and desired, although, as he says, it is at the risk of his life. This phrase seems to show that the work was produced after the rise of the great party controversy which is called that of Wyclif.

With Wyclif (1320–1384) we reach a landmark in the history of the English Bible, in the production of the first complete version of both OT and NT. It belongs to the late period of Wyclif's life, that in which he was engaged in an open war with the Papacy and war, most of the official chiefs of the English Church. It was connected with his institution of 'poor priests,' mission preachers, and formed part of his scheme of appealing to the people in general against the doctrine of the supremacy of Rome. The NT seems to have been completed about 1380, the OT between 1382 and 1384. Exactly how much of it was done by Wyclif's own hand is uncertain. The greater part of the OT (as far as Baruch 32) is assigned in an Oxford MS to Nicholas Hereford, one of Wyclif's principal supporters at that university; and it is certain that this part of the translation is in a different style (more stiff and pedantic) from the rest. The NT is generally attributed to Wyclif himself, and he may also have completed the OT, which Hereford apparently had to abandon abruptly, perhaps when he was summoned to London and excommunicated in 1382. This part of the work is free and vigorous in style, though its interpretation of the original is often strange, and many sentences in it are conveyed very little differing from the Latin originals. Such as it was, however, it was a complete English Bible, addressed to the whole English people, high and low, rich and poor. That this is the case is proved by the character of the copies which have survived. (About forty are preserved, and they are large folio volumes, handsomely written and illuminated in the best, or nearly the best, style of the period; such is the fine copy, in two volumes (now Brit. Mus. Egerton MSS 617, 618), which once belonged to Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, uncle of Richard II. Others are plain copies of ordinary size, intended for private persons or monastic libraries; for it is clear that, in spite of official disfavour and eventual prohibition, there were many people in England who had the Bible in their hands and read it.

Wyclif, indeed, enjoyed advantages from personal repute and influential support such as had been enjoyed by no English translator before him. He was a scholar, of a kind not found up to that time, whose name is preserved in two of his MSS, that of Balliol, holder of lives successively from his college and the Crown, employed officially on behalf of his country in controversy with the Pope, the friend and counterpart of John of Dunwich and other prominent monks, and enjoying as a rule the strenuous support of the University of Oxford, Wyclif was in all respects a person of weight and influence in the realm, who could be silenced or isolated by no means, with the exception of those such as Arundel. The work that he had done had struck its roots too deep to be destroyed, and though it was identified with Lollardism by its adversaries, its range was much wider than that of any one sect or party.

Wyclif's translation, however, though too strong to be overthrown by its opponents, was capable of improvement by its friends. The difference of style can be seen Hereford and other scholars with, and with the stiff and unpopular character of the work of the former, and the imperfections inevitable in a first attempt on so large a scale, called aloud for revision; and the second Wyclifite Bible, the result of a very complete revision of its predecessor, saw the light not many years after the Reformer's death. The second version is in full of Wyclif's most intimate followers; but the evidence is purely circumstantial, and rests mainly on verbal resemblances between the translator's preface and known works of Wyclif, together with the fact that a copy of this preface is found attached to a copy of the earlier version which was once Purvey's property. What is certain is that the second version is based upon the first, and that the translation is the work of Wyclif and Wyclifite opinions. This version speedily superseded the other, and in spite of a decree passed, at Arundel's instigation, by the Council of Blackfriars in 1408, it must have circulated in large numbers. Over 100 copies are still in existence, many of them small pocket volumes such as must have been the personal property of private individuals for their own use. Others belonged to the greatest personages in the land, and copies are still extant in the hands of poster Wyclif, Henry VII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth.

At this point it seems necessary to say something of the theory which has been propagated by the Roman Catholic historian, Abbot Gasquet, to the effect that the versions which pass under the name of 'Wyclifite' were not produced by Wyclif or his followers at all, but were translations authorized and circulated by the heads of the Church of England, Wyclif's particular enemies. [The Old English Bible, 1897, pp. 102–178.] The strongest argument adduced in support of this view is the possession of copies of the versions in question both by kings and princes of England, and by religious houses and persons of unquestioned orthodoxy. This does, indeed, prove that the translation of the English Bible and its possessors by the authorities of the Catholic Church was not so inconsiderable as it is sometimes represented to have been, but it does not go far enough to disprove the Wyclifite authorship of the versions which could be connected, as the names of leading supporters of Wyclif, such as Hereford and Purvey, etc., with the manufacture of the Wyclifite Bible more than the evidence of orthodoxy ownership, of many of the copies in question dates from times long after the cessation of the Lollard persecution. Dr. Gasquet also denies that there is any real evidence connecting Wyclif with the production of the English Bible at all; but it is clearer to make this assertion he has to ignore several passages in Wyclif's own writing which refers to the importance of a vernacular version (to the existence of his own version he could not refer, since that was produced only at the end of his life) and to do violence alike to the Wyclifite translation and to the natural interpretation of passages written by 221
Wyclif's opponents (Arundel, Knyghton, and the Council of Oxford in 1408) in which Wyclif's work is mentioned and condemned. Further, Dr. Gasquet denies that the Lollard controversy reached the point of the circulation of the Scriptures in the vernacular, or were charged with so doing by the ecclesiastical authorities who prosecuted them; and in particular, he argues that the charges against the Lollards were not brought against the general circulation of the Bible, but against Richard Hun and the Bishop of Lollarck, who was condemned by Bishop Robert in London in 1514. If, however, has been shown conclusively that the depositions of the witnesses against the Lollards were received as quasi-irrelevant; that the charges brought against them were not sufficient by themselves to make a general possession of vernacular Bibles; and that the charges against Richard Hun and the Bishop of Lollarck in his possession, are taken verbatim from the prologue to the version which we now know as Purvey's. It is true that Dr. Gasquet makes the explicit statement that we shall look in vain in the edition of Wycliffe Scriptures published by Foshall and Madden for any trace of these errors; yet the errors found by Hun's prosecutores in the prologue to the Bible, but a writer in the Church Quarterly Review (Jan. 1901, p. 292 ff.) has printed in parallel columns the charges against Hun and the corresponding passages in Purvey's prologue, which leave no possibility of doubt that Hun was condemned for possessing a copy of the version which is commonly known as Purvey's, as a matter of fact the Lollard version. The article in the Church Quarterly Review must be read by everyone who wishes to understand Dr. Gasquet's theory, for it is shown there that the charge, which had been adduced as decisive to the unsoundness of Dr. Gasquet's historical position. It is impossible to divorce the two passages, of the preachers of Lollard and the words of the Bible. The Bible a translation the prologue to which (to quote but two phrases) speaks of 'the pardon of the blasphemy of Lollard and declares that 'towards the pride and unceasing love of God and of his law, and reprove synne in weic of charitie, is matir and cause nowe whal preists and other men, and cleene hem long fraystikis, and riseter of debate and of treson agen the king. In the face of this evidence it will be impossible in future to deny that the Wycliffe Bible is identical with that which we now possess, and that it was at the time of the persecution of its owners by the authorities of the Church. That the English version was partial and incomplete, not the University of Oxford, and under their protection copies of the vernacular Bible could be produced and circulated. It is, moreover, likely, not to say certain, that as time went on the Wycliffe version of the period would often be forgotten. Apart from the preface to Purvey's edition, which appears only rarely in the extant MSS, there is nothing in the translation itself which would betray its Lollard origin; and it is quite possible that in the 15th and 16th century, it was used without any suspicion of its connexion with Wyclif. Sir Thomas More, whose good faith there is no reason to question, appears to be disturbed; otherwise it can only be supposed that the orthodox English Bibles of which he speaks, and which he expressly distinguishes, from the Bible which caused the condemnation of Richard Hun, have wholly disappeared, which is hardly likely. If this be admitted, the rest of More's evidence fails to the ground. The history of the Wycliffe Bible, and of its reception in England, would in some points bear some of its clearer, and at first sight plausible, theory of Abbot Gasquet has failed to stand examination, and is it to be hoped that it may be allowed to lapse.

10. With the production of the second Wycliff verse the history of the manuscript English Bible comes to an end. Purvey's work was on the level of the best scholarship and textual knowledge of the age, and it satisfied the requirements of those who needed a vernacular Bible. That it did not reach modern standards in these respects goes without saying. In the first place, it was translated from the original Greek and Hebrew, with which there is no reason to suppose that Wycliff or his assistants were familiar. Secondly, its exposition is often deficient, and some passages in it must have been wholly unintelligible to readers not familiar even of some parts of the AV, so that it is small reproach to Wycliff and Purvey; and on the whole it is a straightforward and intelligible version of the Scriptures. A few examples of this, the first complete English Bible, and the first version in which the English approaches sufficiently near to its modern form to be generally intelligible, may be given here.

In 1414, Dr. Gasquet says, we do not have a satisfactory, and where is it? Yet when in god, and in spirit in a new version of my rule be many dwelling-yngs: if any thing laze I hadde it to them, and as I go to make reed to you, and as I goe to make reed to you, until after we wisten or whither thou goest, and how we werte the weye. Injune seith, I am wyse and alle: no can cometh to the fadur, but he me. If ye be not hanke me, soothly ye hadden knowe also my fadur; and afterwaide ye schuln nowe knowe, and ye han nowe hym.

Co 11v-20. But whanne I wole this thing, whether I use unstidfastnesse? othert the things that I thinke, I thynke after the flesh, that at me be it and it is not. But good is trewe, for sure word that was at you, and you are nothynge, but is it in hym. Forwille thesus eretikis of god, which is preched among you be us, me and syluon and syluon, ther was not in hym in is, but is, but was in hym. Forwille many ouer beo hibesceus of god, in thilke is ben fullfylid. And therfor and bi him we seemo Amen to to oure glory.

Eph 3rd-5. For grace of this thing I bowe my knes to the fadur of oure lord Iesu christ of whom the facetness, that he have cometh to you after the richesse of his glory, vertu to be strengthened bi his spirit in the ynder man, thin on to maye rootid and grounded in charite, moue comprehende with alle seynis which is the breede and the lengthe and the heighth, and the vertu, which is above, and the more excellent thanne seynis, that ye be fullid in all the pleaste of god. And to hym that is myghty to do ali things more plentuous than ye se, or undepronde bi the vertu that worchith in us, to hym be glorie in the churche and in crist iesus in to ali the generacions of the worlds. Amen.

11. The English manuscript Bible was now complete, and no further translation was issued in this form. The Lollard controversy died down amid the strain of the French wars and the passions of the wars of the Roses; and when, in the 16th century, religious questions once more came to the front, the situation had been fundamentally changed through the invention of printing. The first book that issued from the press was the Latin Bible (popularly known as the Mazarin Bible), published by Fust and Gutenberg in 1455. For the Latin Bible (the form in which the Scriptures had hitherto been mainly known in Western Europe) there was indeed so great a demand, that no less than 124 editions of it are said to have been issued before the end of the 15th century; but it was only slowly that scholars realized the importance of using the printing press for the circulation of the Scriptures, either in their original tongues, or in the vernaculars of Europe. The Hebrew Psalter was printed in 1477, the complete OT in 1488. The Greek Bible, both OT and NT, was included in the great Complutensian Polyglot printed in 1514-17, but not published till 1522. The Greek NT (edited by Erasmus) was first published by Froben in 1516, the OT by the Aldine press in 1518. In the way of vernacular versions, a French Bible was printed at Lyons about 1478, and another about 1487; a Spanish Pentateuch was printed (by Jews) in 1497; a German Bible was printed at Strassburg by Mentelin in 1466, and was followed by eighteen others (besides many Psalters and other separate books) between that date and 1522, when the first portion of Luther's translation appeared. In England, Caxton inserted the main part of the OT narrative in his translation of the Golden Legend (which in its original form already contained the Gospel story), published in 1483; but no regular English version of the Bible was printed until 1525, with which date a new chapter in the history of the English Bible begins.
about 30 he had taken for the work of his life the translation of the Bible into English. He was born in Gloucestershire, where his family seems to have used the name of Hutchins or Hychins, as well as that of Tindale, so that he is himself sometimes described by both names; and he became a member of Magdalen Hall (a dependency of Magdalen College) at Oxford, where he definitely associated himself with the Protestant party and became known as one of their leaders. He took his degree as B.A. in 1512, as M.A. in 1515, and at some uncertain date is said (by Foxe) to have gone to Cambridge.

If this was between 1511 and 1515, he would have found Erasmus there; but in that case it could have been only an interlude in the middle of his Oo, and moreover, and perhaps it is more probable that his visit belongs to some part of the years 1515 to 1520, as to which there is no definite information. About 1520 he became resident tutor in the house of Sir John Walsh, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire, to which period belongs his famous saying, in controversy with an opponent: 'If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough shall know more of the scriptures (and more of the law) than thou.' With this object in view he came up to London in 1525, and sought a place in the service of Tunstall, bishop of London, a scholar and patron of scholars, of whom Erasmus had spoken favourably; but here he received no encouragement. He was sent to the production of that bible, however, taken in being at Monmouth, in whose house he lived as chaplain and studied for six months; at the end of which time he was forced to the conclusion 'not only that there was no possibility that the king's English Bible should be translated, but that there was no place to do it in all England.'

13. About May 1524, therefore, Tindale left England and came to the free city of Hamburg, and in the course of the next 12 months the first stage of his great work was completed. Whether during this time he visited Luther at Wittenberg is quite uncertain; what is certain, and important, is that he became acquainted with Luther's writings. In 1525, the translation of the NT being finished, he went to Cologne to have it printed at the press of Peter Quentel. Three thousand copies of the first ten sheets of it, in quarto, had been printed off when rumours of the work came to the ears of John Cochleus, a bitter enemy of the Reformation. To obtain information he approached the printers (who were also engaged upon another work for him), and having lost his tongue with wine he learnt the full details of Tindale's enterprise, and sent warning forthwith to England. Meanwhile Tindale escaped with the printed sheets to Worms, in the Lutheran disposition of which place he was secure from interference, and proceeded with his work at the press of Peter Schoeffer. Since, however, a description of the Cologne edition had been sent to England, a change was made in the format. The text was set up again in octavo, and without the marginal notes of the quarto edition; and in this form the first printed English NT was given to the world early in 1526. About the same time an edition in small quarto, with marginal notes, was also issued, and it is probable (though full proof is wanting) that this was the completion of the interrupted Cologne edition. Three thousand copies of each edition were struck off; but so active were the enemies of the Reformation in their destruction, that they have nearly disappeared off the face of the earth. One copy of the octavo edition, complete but for the loss of its title-page, is at the British Museum; and another four was bound from the Early Library, to which it once belonged; and an imperfect copy is in the library of St. Paul's Cathedral. Of the quarto, all that survives is a fragment consisting of eight sheets (Mt 1-22) in the British Museum.

14. The hostility of the authorities in Church and State in England was indeed undisguised. Sir T. More attacked the translation as false and heretical, and as disregarding ecclesiologists, who, however, found the bishops, with Henry's assent, decreed that it should be burnt; and burnt it was at Paul's Cross, after a sermon from Bishop Tunstall. Nevertheless fresh supplies continued to pour into England, the money expended in buying them up by the Reformation party being paid for the production of fresh editions. Six editions are said to have been issued between 1526 and 1530; and the zeal of the authorities for its destruction was fairly matched by the zeal of the Reformers for its circulation. It was, in fact, evident that the appetite for an English Bible, once fairly excited, could not be wholly balked. In 1530 an assembly convoked by Archbishop Warham, there met at the bishops' cross, and condemned the translation of Tindale, and asserting that it was not expedient at that time to divulge the Scripture in the English tongue, announced that the king would have the NT faithfully translated by learned men, and published 'as soon as he might see their manners and behaviour meet, apt, and convenient to receive the same.'

15. Tindale's first NT was epoch-making in many ways. It was the first English printed NT: it laid the foundations, and much more than the foundations, of the AV 1611; it set on foot the movement which went forward without a break until it culminated in the production of that Bible which was the first English Bible that was translated directly from the original language. All the English manuscript Bibles were translations from the Vulgate, but Tindale's NT was taken from the Greek, and was by Erasmus, published in 1516, 1519, and 1522. As subsidiary aids he employed the Latin version attached by Erasmus to his Greek text, Luther's German translation of 1523, and the Vulgate; but it is abundantly clear that he exercised independent judgment in his use of these materials, and was by no means a slavish copyist of Luther. In the marginal notes attached to the quarto edition of the NT, however, he was far more abundant; for (as far as can be gathered from the extant fragment) more than half the notes were taken direct from the German Bible, the rest being independent. It is in this connexion with Luther, rather than in anything to be found in the work itself, that the secret of the official hostility to Tindale's version is to be found. That the translation itself was not seriously to blame is shown by the extent to which it was incorporated in the AV, though no doubt to persons who knew the Scriptures only in the Latin Vulgate its divergence from accuracy may have appeared greater than was in fact the case. The octavo edition had no extraneous matter except a short preface, and therefore could not be obnoxious on controversial grounds; and the contents in the quarto edition are generally exegetical, and not polemical. Still, there could be no doubt that they were the work of an adherent of the Reformation, and as such the whole translation fell under the ban of the opponents of the Reformation.

16. Tindale's work did not cease with the production of his NT. Early in 1530 a translation of the Pentateuch was printed for him by Hans Luft, at Marburg in Hesse. The colophon to Genesis is dated Jan. 17, 1530. In England, where the year began on March 25, this would have meant 1531 according to our modern reckoning; but in Germany the year generally began on Jan. 1, or at Christmas. The only perfect copy of this edition is in the British Museum. The different books must have been set up independently of one another, for there is no evidence that they were issued separately. The translation was made (for the first time) from the Hebrew, with which language there is express evidence that Tindale was acquainted. The Pentateuch was provided with a prologue and with marginal notes, the latter being often controversial. In 1531 he published a translation of the Book of Jonah, of which a single copy (now in the British Museum) came to light in 1861. After this he seems to have reverted to the NT, of which he issued a revised edition in 1534. The immediate occasion of this was the appearance of an authorized revision of the translation of 1525, by one George Joye, in which many alterations were made of which Tindale disapproved. Tindale's new edition was printed by Martin Erphemerid, and published in 1529. A facsimile copy of it was printed on vellum, illuminated, and presented to Anne Boleyn, who had shown favour to one of the agents employed in distributing Tindale's earlier work. It bears its name on the fore-edge, and is now in the British Museum. The volume is a small octavo, and embodies a careful revision of his previous work. Since it was intended for liturgical use, the church lectionaries were marked in it, and the Epistles taken out of the Old Testament, which are read in the church after the use of Salisbury upon certain days of the year. These consist of 42 short passages from the Old Testament (being taken from the Apocrypha), and constitute an addition to Tindale's work as a translator of the OT. The text of the NT is accompanied throughout by marginal notes, differing (so far as we are in a position to compare them) from those in the quarto of 1525. The Apocrypha are rarely omitted, and the same are not preceded by prologues, which are for the most part derived from Luther (except that to Heb., in which Tindale expressly combats Luther's rejection of its Apostolic authority).

17. The edition of 1534 did not finally satisfy Tindale, and in the following year he put forth another edition, yet once again corrected. [The volume bears two dates, 1534 and 1535, but the former, which stands on the first-title-page, must be taken to be that of the completion of the work.] It bears the monogram of the publisher, Godfried van der Haghen, and is sometimes referred to as the GH edition. It has no marginal notes. Another edition, which is stated on its title-page to have been finished in 1535, contains practically the same text, but is notable for its spelling, which appears to have been intended for the use of children. This is the first edition, in 1535, that many of the greatest Christian fathers had protested against it, and had preferred the Hebrew Canon, which rejects these books. The Canon of Athanasius places the Apocrypha in a class apart; the Syriac Bible omitted them; Eusebius and Gregory Nazianzen appear to have held similar views; and Jerome refused to translate them for his Latin Bible. Nevertheless the Church at large, both East and West, retained them in their Bibles, and the provincial Council of Osnabruck (A.D. 397), under the influence of Augustine, expressly included them in the Canon. In spite of Jerome, the Vulgate, as it circulated in Western Europe, regularly included the disputed books and parts of them, a translation from the Vulgate, naturally has them too.

On the other hand, Luther, though recognizing these books as profitable and good for reading, placed them in a class apart, as 'Apocrypha,' and in the same way he segregated Heb., Ja., Jude, and Apoc. at the end of the NT, as of lesser value and authority than the rest. This arrangement appears in the table of contents of Tindale's NT in 1534, and was adopted by Coverdale, Matthew, and Taverner. It is to Tindale's example, no doubt, that the action of Coverdale is due. His Bible is divided into six parts—(1) Pentateuch; (2) Jos.—Est.; (3) Job—'Solomon's Baletes' (i.e. Cant.); (4) Prophets; (5) 'Apocrypha, the books and treatises which among the fathers of old are not reckoned to be of like authority with the other books of the Bible, neither are they found in the Canon of the Hebrews'; (6) NT. This represents the view generally taken by the Reformers, both in Germany and in England, and so far as concerns the English Bible, Coverdale's example was decisive. On the other hand, the Roman Church, at the Council of Trent (1546), adopted a majority of the opinion that all the books of the larger Canon should be received as of equal authority, and for the first time made this a dogma of the Church, enforced by an anathema.

and English in parallel columns, revising his English to bring it into conformity with the Latin; but this (whether through three editions with various changes) may be passed over, as it had no influence on the general history of the English Bible.

20. Matthew's Bible (1537). In the same year as the second edition of Coverdale's Bible another English Bible appeared, which likewise bore upon its title-page the statement that it was 'set forth with the Kings most gracious lycence.' It was completed not later than Aug. 1537, on which day Cranmer set, a copy of it to Cromwell, commending the translation, and begging Cromwell to obtain for it the king's licence; in which, as the title-page prominently shows, he was successful. The work of Tindale is slightly obscure, and certainly was not realized by Henry when he sanctioned it. The Pentateuch and NT are taken direct from Tindale with little variation (the latter from the final 'OT' revision of 1535). The books of the OT (except Ezra to Min., which issued in Latin taken from Coverdale, as also is the Apocrypha. But the historical books of the OT (Jos.-2 Chron.) are a new translation, as to the origin of which no statement is made. It is, however, certain, from a comparison of evidences that it was Tindale's (see Westcott², pp. 189-197). The style agrees with that of Tindale's other work; the passages which Tindale published as 'Epistles' from his OT in the NT of 1537 agree in the main with the present version in these books, but not in those taken from Coverdale; and it is expressly stated in Hall's Chronicol (completed and published by Grafton, one of the printers of Matthew's Bible) that Tindale added in addition to the NT, translated also 'the v books of Moses, Josua, Judicium, Ruth, the books of the Kynges and the books of Paralipomenon, Nehemias from Aug. 1537, on which day Cranmer set, a copy of more of ye holy scripture.' If we suppose the version of Ezra-Nehemiah to have been incomplete, or for some reason unavailable, this statement harmonizes with the data of the problem. Tindale may have executed the translation during his imprisonment, at which time we know that he applied for the use of his Hebrew books. The book was printed abroad, at the expense of R. Grafton and E. Whitchurch, two citizens of London, and was re-purchased by Cromwell (traditionally identified with the printer Roger Byddell for Thomas Bartholomew) to prepare at short notice a revision of the existing Bible. In the OT his alterations are few; and this is evident from the Cover year (1538) as the complete Bible, but the success of the official version next to be mentioned speedily extinguished such a personal venture as this. Taverner's Bible is sometimes said to have been the first English Bible ever printed to be the first English Bible ever printed to be the first English Bible ever printed to be the first English Bible ever printed in England; but this honour appears to belong rather to Coverdale's second edition.

22. The Great Bible (1539-1541). The fact that Taverner was invited to follow Matthew's Bible almost immediately after its publication shows that it was not universally regarded as successful; but there were in addition other reasons why those who had promoted the circulation and authorization of Matthew's Bible of Cromwell and Cranmer, in the general mass of the loyal and rejoicing populace. (A special copy on vellum, with illuminations, was prepared for Cromwell himself, and is now in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge.)

23. The first edition of the Great Bible appeared in April 1539, and an injunction was issued by Cromwell that a copy of it should be set up in every parish church. It was consequently the first (and only) English Bible formally authorized for public use; and contemporary evidence proves that it was welcomed and read with avidity. No doubt, as at an earlier day (Ph 29*), some read the gospel 'of envy and strife, and some else of good will'; but in one way or another, for edification or for controversy, the reading of the Bible took a firm hold on the people of England, a hold which has never since been relaxed, and which had need to do as the stable foundation of the Protestant Church in this country. Nor was the translation, though still falling short of the perfection reached three-quarters of a century later, unwholesome in its position. It had many positive merits, and marked a distinct advance upon all its predecessors. Coverdale, though without the force and originality, or even the scholarship, of Tindale, had some of the more valuable gifts of a translator, and was well qualified to make the best use of the labours of his predecessors. He had scholarship enough to choose and follow the best authorities, he had a happy gift of smooth and effective phraseology, and his whole heart was in his work. As the basis of the revision he had Tindale's work and his own previous version; and these he revised with reference to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with special assistance in the OT from the Latin translation by Sebastian Münster published in 1534–35 (a work decidedly superior to the Zurich Bible, which had been his principal guide in 1531), while in the NT he made considerable use of Erasmus. With regard to the use of ecclesiastical terms, he followed his own previous example, against Tindalne, in retaining the familiar Latin phrases; and he introduced a considerable number of words and sentences from the Vulgate, which do not appear in the Hebrew or Greek. The text is divided into five sections—(1) Pent., (2) Joes.-Job, (3) Psalms-Mal., (4) Apocrypha, here entitled Hagiothrapha, 'though quite different from the books to which that term is applied in the Hebrew Bible, (5) NT, in which the traditional order of the books is restored in place of Luther's. Coverdale intended to add a commentary at the end, and with this view inserted various marks in the margins, the purpose of which he explains in the Prologue; but he was unable to obtain the sanction of the Privy Council for these, and after standing in the margin for three editions the sign-post mark was withdrawn.

24. The first edition was exhausted within twelve months, and in April 1540 a second edition appeared, this time with a preface by Cranmer (from which fact the Great Bible is sometimes known as Cranmer's Bible, though he had no part in the translation). Two more editions followed in July and November, the latter (Cromwell having now been overthrown and executed) appearing under the nominal patronage of Bishop Tunstall and Heath. In 1544 three editions were issued. None of these editions was a simple reprint. The Prophets, in particular, were carefully revised with the help of the Master for the second edition. The fourth edition (Nov. 1540) and its successors revert in part to the first. These seven editions spread the knowledge of the Bible in a sound, though not perfect, version broadcast through the land; and on the direction of the Bishop of Winchester the contents of the fifth and later editions were taken from the Latin. The first 1611, a special exception was made of the Psalter, on account of the familiarity which it had achieved, and consequently Coverdale's version has held its place in the Book of Common Prayer to this day, and it is in his work that the Psalms have become a familiar household treasure of the English people.

26. With the appearance of the Great Bible comes the first pause in the rapid sequence of vernacular versions set in train by the Reformation. There was talk in Convocation about a translation to be made by the bishops, which anticipated the plan of the Bible of 1568; and Cranmer prompted Henry to transfer the work to the universities, which anticipated a vital part of the plan of the Bible of 1611; but nothing came of either project. The only practical steps taken were in the direction of the destruction of the earlier versions. In 1543 a proclamation was issued against Tindalne's versions, and requiring the obedience of all notes; in 1546 Coverdale's NT was likewise proscribed. The anti-Protestant reaction, however, was soon terminated by Henry's death (Jan. 1547); and during the reign of Edward vi., though no new translation (except that of the Psalter, which had no more, therefore, at present of further revisions of it. Another circumstance which may have contributed to the same result was the practice of Henry in his latter years against Protestantism. by force, Rogers and Cranmer followed Tindalne to the stake, while Coverdale was imprisoned, but was released, and took refuge at Geneva.

29. The Geneva Bible (1557–1560). Geneva was the place at which the next link in the chain was to be forged. Already famous, through the work of Beza, as a centre of Biblical scholarship, it became the rallying place of the more advanced members of the Protestant party outside, and under the strong rule of Calvin it was identified with Puritanism in its most rigid form. Puritanism, in fact, was here consolidated into a living and active principle, and dealt the deathblow to the old power in the religious and social life of Europe. It was by a relative of Calvin, and under his own patronage, that the work of improving the English translation of the Bible was once more taken in hand. This was W. Whittingham, a Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, and subsequently dean of Durham, who in 1557 published the NT at Geneva in a small octavo volume, the handsomest form in which the English Scriptures had yet been given to the world. In two other respects also this marked an epoch in the history of the English Bible. It was the first version to be printed in Roman type, and the first in which the division of the text into numbered verses (originally made by R. Stephanus for his Graeco-Latin Bible of 1551) was introduced. A preface was contributed by Calvin himself. The translator claims to have made constant use of the original Greek and of translations in other tongues, and he added a full marginal commentary. If the matter had ended there, as the work of a single scholar on one part of the Bible, it would probably have left little mark; but it was at once made the basis of a revised version of the complete Bible by a group of Puritan scholars. The details of the work are not recorded, but the principal workers, apart from Whittingham himself, appear to have been Thomas Sampson, of Clerkenwell, John Basset, who was a member of Christ Church, Cambridge. A version of the Psalter was issued in 1559 (the only two extant copies of it belong to the Earl of Ellesmere and Mr. Alisdair Wightman) and in 1560 the complete Bible was given to the world, with the imprint of Rowland Hall, at Geneva. The Psalter in this was the same as that of 1559; but the NT had been largely revised since 1557. The book was a moderate-sized quarto, and contained a dedication to Elizabeth, an address to the brethren at home, the books of the OT (including Apocrypha) and NT in the same order as in the Great Bible and our modern Bibles, copious marginal notes (those to the OT from Calvin, and to the NT Whittingham, with some additions), and an apparatus of maps and woodcuts. In type and verse-division it followed the example of Whittingham's NT.

27. The Geneva revisers took the Great Bible as their basis in the OT, and Matthew's Bible (i.e. Tindalne) in the NT. For the former they had the assistance of the Latin Bible of Leo Judus (1544), in addition to Paginus (1527), and they were in consultation with the scholars (including Calvin and Beza) who were then engaged at Geneva in a similar work of revision of the French Bible. In the NT their principal guide was Beza, whose reputation stood highest among all the Biblical scholars of the age. The result was a version which completely distanced its predecessors in scholarship, while in style and vocabulary it richly carried on the great tradition established by Tindalne. Its success was not decisive as it was well deserved; and in one respect it met a wrong which none of its predecessors (except perhaps Tindalne's) had attempted to meet. Coverdale's, Matthew's, and the Great Bible were all large folios, suitable for use in church, but unsuitable for private possession and domestic study. The Geneva Bible, on the contrary, was moderate in both respects, and achieved instant and long-enduring popularity as the Bible for personal use. For a full century it continued to be the Bible of the people, and it was upon

This was the NT, the work mainly of Gregory Martin, formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, with the assistance of a small band of scholars from the same university. The OT is stated to have been ready at the same time, but for want of funds it could not be printed until 1569. Of the 158 editions of it are said to have been issued, but the only one which requires separate notice is a revision of the NT by Laurence Tomson in 1576, which carried still further the principle of reverence to Jesus; this revision of NT was successful, and was frequently bound up with the Genevan OT in place of the edition of 1560. [The Geneva Bible is frequently called (in book-sellers' catalogues and elsewhere) the 'Breeches' Bible, on account of this word being used in the translation of Gn 3'.]

28. The Bishops' Bible (1558). Meanwhile there was one quarter in which the Geneva Bible could hardly be expected to find favour, namely, among the leaders of the Church in England. Elizabeth herself was not too well disposed towards the Puritans, and the bishops in general belonged to the less extreme party in the Church. One of the reasons, the superiority of the Genevan to the Great Bible could not be contested. Under these circumstances the old project of a translation to be produced by the bishops was revived. The archbishops of Canterbury, Matthew Parker, was a scholar, and took up the task with interest. The basis of the new version was to be the authorized Great Bible. Portions of the text were assigned to various revisors, and a majority of what were bishops. The archbishop exercised a general supervision over the work, but there does not appear to have been any organized system of collaboration or revision, and the results were naturally unequal. In the OT the alterations of the Bishops' Bible, and also the Great Bible, were of great value, and many, or nearly all, of the revisions were frequently incorporated in the Geneva Bible, and generally excelled it. It appeared in 1568, from the press of R. Jugge, in a large folio volume, slightly exceeding even the dimensions of the Great Bible. Parker applied through Cecil for the royal sanction, but it does not appear that he ever obtained it; but Convocation in 1571 required a copy to be kept in every archbishop's and bishop's house and in every cathedral, and, as far as could conveniently be done, in all churches. The Bishops' Bible, in fact, superseded the Great Bible as the official version, and its presence was the English College at Douai, the foundation of which never attained the popularity and influence of the Geneva Bible. A second edition was issued in 1569, in which a considerable number of alterations were made; it appears, as a result of the criticism of Giles Laurence, professor of Greek at Oxford. In 1572 a third edition appeared, of importance chiefly in the NT, and in some cases reverting to the first edition of 1568. In this form the Bishops' Bible continued in official use until its supersession by the version of 1611, of which it formed the immediate basis.

29. The Rheims and Douai Bible (1582-1609). The English exiles for religious causes were not all of one kind; one of them, who were Roman Catholic refugees on the Continent as well as Puritan, and from the one, as from the other, there proceeded an English version of the Bible. The centre of the English Roman Catholic Church was the English College at Douai, the foundation of which was the work of William Allen, formerly of Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently cardinal; and it was from this college that a new version of the Bible emanated which was intended to serve as a counterpart to the Protestant versions, with which England was now flooded. The first instalment of it appeared in 1582, during a temporary migration of the college to Rheims.

The translation, being prepared with a definite polemical purpose, was naturally equipped with notes of a controversial kind, and with a vast number of references, the object and method of the work were explained. It had, however, as a whole, little success. The OT was reprinted only once in the course of a century, and the NT not much oftener. In England the greater part of its circulation was due to the action of a vehement adversary, W. Fulke, who, in order to expose its errors, printed the Rheims NT in parallel columns with the Bishops' version of 1572, and the Rheims annotations with his own refutations, a task which occupied him for many years. The AV is indeed distinguished by the strength of the English, especially its vocabulary and the construction of the texts used (and used effectively), many of which were derived from the Bible of Rheims and Douai.

30. The Authorized Version (1611). The version which was destined to be the crowning glory of the whole of labour, and, after extinguishing by its excellence all rivals, to print an indelible mark on English religion and English literature, came into being almost by accident. It arose out of the Hampton Court Conference, held by James I. in 1604, with the object of arriving at a settlement between the Puritan and Anglican elements in the Church; but it was not one of the prime or original subjects of the conference, in the course of discussion. Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the leader of the moderate Puritan party, referred to the imperfections and disagreements of the existing translations; and the suggestion of a new version to be prepared by the preparers of all the other versions in the country, was warmly taken up by the king. The conference, as a whole, was a failure; but James did not allow the idea of the revision to drop. He took an active part in the preparation of instructions for the work, and to him appears to be due the credit of two features which went far to secure its success. He suggested that the translation should be committed to the best scholars in the universities (subject to subsequent review by the bishops and the Privy Council, which practically came to nothing), and thereby secured the services of the best scholars in the country, working in co-operation; and (on the suggestion of the bishop of London) he laid down that no marginal notes should be added, which preserved the new version from being the property of any one party in the Church.

31. Ultimately it was arranged that six companies of translators should be formed, two at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge. The companies varied in number from 7 to 10 members, the total (though there is some little doubt with regard to a few names) being 47. The Westminster companies undertook Gn.-2 Kings and the Epistles, the Oxford companies the Prophets and the Gospels, Acts, and Apoc., and the Cambridge companies 1 Chron.-Eccles. and the Apocrypha. A series of rules was drawn up for their guidance. The Bishops' Bible was to be taken as the basis of all the work, but the smaller companies were to have the liberty of consulting other editions for their consideration. Suggestions were to be invited from the clergy generally, and opinions requested on passages of special difficulty from any learned man in the land. 'These suggestions were to be used wherever they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, namely, Tindale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whit's church's (i.e., the Great Bible), Geneva.' The translators claim further to have consulted the various versions and commentaries in other languages, and to have repeatedly revised their own work, without grudging the time which it required. The time occupied by the whole work was stated by themselves as two years and three-quarters. The several companies appear to have begun their labours about the end of 1567, and to have taken two years in completing their several shares. A final revision, occupying nine months, was then made by the combined representatives of the two companies, from each company, after which it was seen through the press by Dr. Miles Smith and Bishop Bilson; and in 1611 the new version, printed by R. Barker, the king's printer, was brought to the world in a volume (the largest of all the series of English Bibles) of black letter type. The details of its issue are obscure. There were at least two issues in 1611, set up independently, known respectively as the 'He' and 'She' Bibles, from their divergence in the translation of the last words of Ruth 3rd; and bibliographers have differed as to their priority, though the general opinion is in favour of the former. Some editions have a wood-engraved frontispiece, others an engraved title-page, with different designs. The title-page was followed by the dedication to King James, which still stands in our ordinary copies of the AV, and by the translation of the Preface (believed to have been written by Dr. Miles Smith), which is habitually omitted. [It is printed in the present King's Printers' Variorum Bible, and is interesting and valuable both as an example of the learning of the age and for its description of the translators' labours.] For the rest, the contents and arrangement of the AV are too well known to every reader to need description.

32. Nor is it necessary to dwell largely on the characteristics of the translation. Not only was it superior to all its predecessors, but its excellence was never thought from the beginning that we should need to make a new translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one. We must, however, not put to make a good one better, or out of many good ones one principal good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our endeavour, that our mark.' The description is very just. The foundations of the AV were laid by Tindalcdn, a great part of his work continued through every revision. Each succeeding version added something to the original stock, Coverdale (in his own and the Great Bible) and the Geneva scholars contributed the largest share; and the crown was set upon the whole by the skilled labour of the Jacobean divines, making free use of the materials accumulated by others, and happily inspired by the gift of style which is most excellent literary accomplishment.

33. The history of the AV after 1611 can be briefly sketched. In spite of the name by which it is commonly known, and in spite of the statement on both title-pages of 1631 that it was 'the original of all existing versions,' there is no evidence that it was ever officially authorized either by the Crown or by Convocation. Its authorization seems to have been tacit and gradual. The Bishops' version, hitherto the official version, was in use, printed, and the AV no doubt gradually replaced it in churches as occasion arose. In domestic use its fortunes were for a time more doubtful, and for two generations it existed consistently with the Geneva Bible; but before the century was out its predominance was assured. The first 4to and 8vo editions were issued in 1612; and thenceforward editions were so numerous that it is useless to refer to any except a few of them. The early editions were not very correctly printed. In 1638 an attempt to secure a correct text was made by a small group of Cambridge scholars. In 1633 the first edition printed in Scotland was published. In 1646 appeared the first edition at Oxford, in which Archbishop Ussher's dates for Scripture chronology were printed in the margin, where they thenceforth remained. In 1717 a fine edition, printed by Baskett at Oxford, earned bibliographical notoriety as 'The Vinegar Bible' from a misprint in the headline over Lk 20. In 1762 a carefully revised edition was published at Cambridge under the editorship of Dr. T. Park, and a similar edition, superintended by Dr. B. Blayney, appeared at Oxford in 1769. These two editions, in which the text was carefully revised, the spelling modernized, the punctuation corrected, and considerable alteration made in the marginal notes, formed the standard for subsequent reprints of the AV, which differ in a number of details, small in importance but fairly numerous in the aggregate, from the original text of 1611. One other detail must be mentioned, not that it was not the work of a single scholar (like Tindale's, Coverdale's, and Matthew's Bibles), or of a small group (like the Geneva and Douai Bibles), or of a larger number of men working independently with little supervision (like the Bishops' Bible), but was produced by the collaboration of a carefully selected band of scholars, working with ample time and with a carefully revised revision. Nevertheless, it was not a new translation. It owed much to its predecessors.

The translators themselves say, in their preface: 'We

British and Foreign Bible Society, which has been one of the principal agents in the circulation of the Scriptures throughout the world, decided never in future to translate or revise, or to publish copies containing the Apocrypha; and this decision has been carried into effect ever since.

34. So far as concerned the translation of the Hebrew and Greek texts which lay before them, the work of the authors of the AV, as has been shown above, was not merely well but excellently. There were, no doubt, occasional errors of interpretation; and in regard to the OT in particular the Hebrew scholarship of the age was not equal to the task. The text which was made up of such errors as were made were not of such magnitude or quantity as to have made any extensive revision necessary or desirable even now, after a lapse of nearly fifteen hundred years. This was, however, not the case with the Greek text which they translated. As has been shown elsewhere (specifically in the NT), criticism of the Greek text of the NT had not yet begun. Scholars were content to take the text as it first came to hand, from the late MSS which were mostly readily accessible to them. The NT text, which first made the Greek text generally available in Western Europe, was based upon a small group of relatively late MSS, which happened to be within his reach at Basel. The edition of Stephanus in 1550, which was practically identical with the "Bible Text" which has held the field till our own day, rested upon a somewhat superficial examination of 15 MSS, mostly at Paris, of which only two were uncial and the rest were merely slightly used. None of the great Western MSS which now stand at the head of our list of authorities was known to the scholars of 1550. None of the ancient versions had been critically edited; and so far as King James and his contemporaries were concerned, the three groups of manuscripts (as we know them) did not differ from each other; and men were concerned only to translate the text which lay before them in the current Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Bibles. Nevertheless it was in this inevitable defectiveness of text that the weakness of the AV which ultimately undermined the authority of the AV.

35. The Revised Version (1851-1895). The textual article above referred to describes the process of accumulation of materials which began with the coming of the Greek MSS to London and the production of the AV, and continued to the present day, and the critical use made of these materials in the 19th century; and the story need not be repeated here. It was not until the progress of criticism had revealed the defective state of the received Greek text of the NT that any movement arose for the revision of the AV. About the year 1555 the question began to be mooted in magazine articles and motions in Convocation, and by way of bringing it to a head a small group of scholars [Dr. Ellicott, afterwards bishop of Gloucester, Dr. Moberly, head master of Winchester and afterwards bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Barron, principal of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, the Rev. H. Allford, afterwards dean of Canterbury, and the Rev. W. G. Humphrey; with the Rev. E. Hawkins, secretary of the S.P.G., and afterwards canon of Westminster, as their secretaries] undertook a revision of the AV of Jen., which was published in 1587. Six of the Epistles followed in 1861 and 1863, by which time the object of the work, in calling attention to the need and the possibility of a revision, had been accomplished. The Great council to the interest in textual criticism has been given by the discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus, and by the work of Tischendorf and Tregelles. In Feb. 1870 a motion for a committee to consider the desirability of a revision was adopted by both Houses of the Convocation of Canterbury; and definite motions in favour of such a revision were passed in the following May. The Convocation of York did not concur, and the Northern House proceeds alone. A committee of both Houses drew up the lists of revisers, and framed the rules for their guidance. The OT company consisted of 23 (afterwards 27) members, the NT of 26. The rules prescribed the introduction of as few alterations as possible, and consistent with faithfulness; the text to be adopted for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating, and when it differs from that from which the AV was made, the alteration to be indicated in the margin (this was found impracticable); alterations to be made on the first revision by simple majorities, but to be retained only if passed by a two-thirds majority on the second revision. Both companies commenced their work in 1870; the NT company on 407 days in the course of eleven years, the NT company on 792 days in fifteen years. Early in the work the co-operation of American scholars was invited, and in consequence two companies of 15 and 16 members respectively were invited, and in the case of the NT, on May 17, 1881, and in the case of the canonical books of the OT almost exactly four years later. The revision of the Apocrypha was combined between two English companies, and was taken up by each company on the completion of its main work. The NT company distributed Sirach, Tob., Jud., Wisd., 1 and 2 Mac. among its revisers, and pointed out a small committee to deal with the remaining books. The work dragged on over many years, involving some inequalities in revision, and ultimately the Apocrypha was published in 1881.

36. In dealing with the OT the Revisers were not greatly concerned with questions of text. The Massoretic Hebrew text available in 1870 was substantially the same as that which King James' translators had before them; and the criticism of the LXX was not sufficiently advanced to enable them safely to make much use of it except in marginal notes. Their work consisted mainly in the correction of mistranslations of the Hebrew scholars who made the MS. and in the work of the AV. Their changes as a rule are slight, but tend very markedly to remove obscurities and to improve the intelligibility of the translation. The gain is greatest in the poetical and prophetic books (poetical passages are throughout printed as such, which in itself is a great improvement), and there cannot be much doubt that if the revision of the OT had stood by itself it would have been generally accepted without much opposition. With the new version of the NT the case was different. The changes were necessarily more numerous than in the OT, and the greater familiarity with the NT possessed by readers in general made the alterations more conspicuous. The NT Revisers had, in effect, to form a new Greek text before they could proceed to translate it. In this part of their work they were largely influenced by the presence of Drs. Westcott and Hort, who, as will be shown elsewhere (Text of the NT), were keen and convinced champions of the class of text of which the best representative is the Codex Vaticanus. To the same time Dr. Southern published an advanced view of the necessity of changes in the Received Text, was also a prominent member of the company, and it is probably true that not many new readings were adopted which had not the support of Tischendorf and Tregelles, and which would not be regarded by nearly all scholars acquainted with textual criticism as preferable to those of the AV. To Westcott and Hort may be assigned a large part of the credit for leading the Revisers definitely along the path of critical science; but the Revisers did not follow their leaders the whole way, and their text (edited by Archdeacon Palmer for the Oxford Press in 1881) represents a more conservative attitude than that of the two great Cambridge scholars. Nevertheless the amount of textual change was considerable, and to this day it added a very large amount of verbal change, sometimes (especially in the Epistles) to secure greater intelligibility, but oftener (and this is more noticeable in the Gospels) to secure uniformity in the translation of Greek words which the AV textually and phonetically differed in different narratives (even in parallel narratives of the same event), and precision in the representation of moods and tenses. It was to the great number of changes of this kind, which by themselves could not be justified, that the criticism bestowed upon the RV was due; but it must be remembered that where the words and phrases of a book are often strained to the uttermost in popular and devotional literature, and where a single NU may be enough to change a phrase from that heard by parents to that of the church, it must be remembered that those words and phrases should be as accurately rendered as possible. On the whole, it is certain that the RV marks a great advance on the AV in respect of accuracy, and the main criticisms on which it is justly attacked are that the principles of classical Greek were applied too rigidly to Greek which is not classical, and that the Revisers, in their careful attention to the Greek, were less happily influenced by the use of the predecessor with the genius of the English language. These defects have no doubt militated against the general acceptance of the RV; but whether they continue to do so or not (and it is to be remembered that we have not yet passed through nearly so long a period as that during which the AV competed with the Geneva Bible or Jerome’s Vulgate with the Old Latin), it is certain that no student of the Bible can afford to neglect the assistance given by the RV to the understanding of the Scriptures. In so using it, it should be remembered that renderings which appear in the margin not infrequently represent the views of more than half the Revisers, though they had failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority. This is perhaps especially the case in the OT, where the RV shows a greater adherence to the AV than in the NT.

37. It only remains to add that, after the lapse of the 14 years during which it was agreed that no separate American edition should be brought out, while the American appendix continued to appear in the English RV, the American revisers issued a fresh recension (NT) in 1901, without the Apocalypse. This was an emboidyng not only the readings which appeared in their appendix to the English RV, but also others on which they had since agreed. It is unfortunate that the action originally taken by the English revisers with a view to securing that the two English-speaking nations should continue to have a common Bible should have brought about the opposite result; and though the alterations introduced by the American revisers eminently deserve consideration on their merits, it may be doubted whether the net result is important enough to justify the existence of a separate version. What influence, if any, it may have upon the English Bible in the future it is for the future to decide.

Literature.—No detailed history of the manuscript English versions is in existence. A good summary of the pre-Wydiffite versions is given in the introduction to A. S. Cook’s ‘Biblical Quotations in Old English Prose Writers’, part 1 (1880), while the principal separate publications have been mentioned above. For the Wydiffite versions the main authority is the complete edition by J. Forshall and F. Madden (4 vols., 1820); the NT in the later version was separately printed by Sleat (1879). A good short-concise subject of the subject is given in the introduction to the official Catalogue of the British Museum (1879). The printed Bible has been much more fully investigated. The best single authority is Bishop Westcott’s ‘History of the English Bible’ (3rd ed., revised by W. Aldis Wright, 1900); see also the art. by J. H. Lupton in Hastings’ DB (Extra Vol., 1904); W. F. Moulton, ‘History of the English Bible 2nd ed., 1884;’ and H. W. F. Swete, ‘The Evolution of the English Bible’ (3rd ed., 1902). The first trans. of the RV was by R. Lovett (R.T.S. Present Day Primers, 1864) is a good general introduction, and the references to be found in G. Milligan’s ‘The English Bible’ (Church of Scotland Covenanters’ Bible, new ed., 1907). For a bibliography of printed Bibles, see the section ‘Bible’ in the British Museum Catalogue (published separately), and the ‘Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scripture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society’, vol. 1., by T. H. Darlow and H. F. Moule (1865). For special and minute studies of certain parts of the subject, the works of E. Fry (The Bibleby Cerver- dale, 1867, Description of the Great Bible, 1865; Bibliographical Description of the Editions of the NT, Tyndale’s Version, 1876) and E. Arber (The First Printed English NT, 1871) are invaluable. Bagster’s English Hezopk (which can often be obtained second-hand) gives in parallel columns, beneath the Greek text, as printed by Schole, the NT according to (1) the second Wydiffite version; (2) Tyndale, from the edition of 1534; (3) the Great Bible of 1589; (4) the Geneva NT of 1567; (5) the Rheims NT of 1582; and (6) the AV of 1611. This gives the student a better idea of the evolution of the English Bible than any description. F. H. A. Scrivener’s ‘Authorised Edition of the English Bible’ (1884) gives a careful and authoritative account of the various editions of the AV. For the history of the RV, see the Revisers’ preface and Bishop Bickersteth’s Revised Version of Holy Scripture (S.P.C.K. 1865). A full bibliography of the Rev. Dr. Lupton’s article in Hastings’ DB. F. C. Kenyon.

EN-HADDAH (Jos 19:4).—A city of Issachar noticed with En-gannim and Remeth; perhaps the present Kfar ‘Adkéh on the edge of the Dothan plain, w. of En-gannim.

EN-HAKKORE (‘spring of the partridge’; cf. 1 S 26:9, Jer 17:18).—The name of a fountain at Lehi (Jos 15:4). The narrator (J (7)) of the story characteristically connects hakkéreh with the word pikér (‘he called’) of v.14, and evidently interprets En-hakkéreh as ‘the spring of him that called.’ The whole narrative is rather obscure, and the tr. in some instances doubtful. The situation of En-hakkéreh is also quite uncertain.

EN-HAZOR (‘spring of Hazor’; Jos 19:20).—A town of Naphtali, perhaps the mod. Hazréch, on the W. slopes of the mountains of Upper Galilee, w. of Kedesh.

EN-MISHAPAT (‘spring of judgment,’ or ‘decision’ (by oracle), Gn 14:26).—A name for Kadesh—probably Kadesh-barnea. See KADESH.

ENNATAN (AV Enunatan), 1 Es 8:8.—See EKNATHAN.

ENOCHE (Heb. ‘Enóko) is the ‘seven son of Adam’ (Jude 9) in the Sethite genealogy of Gn 5 (see v. 19). It is in the Canaan genealogy that he is called enok or enok in Ezr 2:2; Neh 7:2, and therefore the third from Adam. The resemblances between the two lists seem to show that they rest on a common tradition, preserved in different forms by J (ch. 4) and P (ch. 5), though it is not possible to say which version is the more original.—The notice which invents the figure of Enoche with its peculiar significance is found in 24 Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him.’ The idea here suggested—that because of his perfect fellowship with God this patriarch was ‘translated’ to heaven without tasting death (cf. Sir 44:4 49:14, He 11:14)—appears to have exerted a certain influence on the OT doctrine of immortality (see Fs 49:5 73:9).—A much fuller tradition is presupposed by the remarkable development of the Enoch legend in the Apocalyptic literature, where Enoch appears as a preacher of repentance, a prophet of future events, and the recipient of the superscription given in the Bible, an explanation of the secrets of heaven and earth, etc. The origin of this tradition has probably been discovered in a striking Babylonian parallel. The seventh name in the list of ten antediluvian kings of heaven was av-rasuchu (av-rasuchu, ‘or farmuchu’ (it seems certain) is a corruption of Enmeduranki, a king of Sippar who was received into the fellowship of Shamash (the sun-god) and Ramman, was inflatated into the mysteries of heaven and earth, and became the founder of a guild of priestly diviners. When or how this myth became known to the Jews we cannot tell. A trace of an original connexion with the sun-god has been suspected in the 365 years of Enoch's life (the number of days in the solar year).

At all events it is highly probable that the Babylonian legend contains the germ of the later conception of Enoch as embodied in the apocryphal Book of Enoch (c. B.C. 105-64), and the later Book of the Secrets of Enoch, on which see Hastings' D.B. 7156. A citation from the Book of Enoch occurs in Judas 14. (= En 1st 36, 277).

J. SKINNER.

ENOSH (Gen 4th 2, 5th 44, ENOS (Lk 3rd 34).—The name is poetical, denoting 'man'; the son of Seth, and ancestor of Adam. At the time of Enoch was warned by sin and violence, so that of Seth was marked by pieté. In the days of Enosh men began to 'call with the name of J's', i.e. to use His name in invocations. The name J's having been known practically from the beginning of human life, the writer J always employs it in preference to the title 'Elohim.' In E (Ex 3rd 1) and P (Git.) it was not revealed till long afterwards. A. H. M'NEILE.

EN-RIMMON ('spring of [the] pomegranate').—One of the settlements of the Judahites after the return from the Exile (Neh 11th 19). In Jos 15th amongst those assigned to Judah we find 'Ain and Rimmon,' and in 197 (cf. 1 Ch 4th 2) amongst those assigned to Simeon are 'Ain, Rimmon. In all these instances there can be little doubt that we ought to read En-rimmon. En-rimmon is probably to be identified with the modern 'Umm er-Ru'māmīn, about 9 miles N. of Beerseba.

EN-ROGEL ('spring of the fuller').—In the border of the territory of Judah (Jos 16th 17) and Benjamin (18th). It was outside Jerusalem; and David's spies, Jonathan and Ahimaaz, were here stationed in quest of news of the revolt of Absalom (2 Sh 11th 17). Here Adonijah made a feast 'by the stone of Zobeheth,' when he endeavoured to seize the kingdom (1 K 1st 9). The identification of this village with the spring between two of the Virgin's incidents and Job's well, both in the Kidron Valley. The strongest argument for the former site is its proximity to a cliff face called Zohwelekh, in which an attempt has been made to recognize Zohleth. This, however, is uncertain, as Zohwelekh is a cliff, not an isolated stone.

R. A. S. MALIESTER.

ENSAMPLE.—'Ensample' and 'example' (both from Lat., exemplum) are both used in AV. Tindal's has 'example' only, and, true to the Rhemish appeared. That version used 'example' probably as being nearer the Vulg. word exemplum. The AV frequently reveals the influence of the Rhemish version.

EN-SHEMESH ('sun-spring,' Jos 15th 18st).—A spring E. of En-rogel, on the way to Jericho. It is believed to be the spring on the Jericho road E. of Olive't, generally known as the 'Apostles' fountain' ('Ain Hād).

ENSIGN.—See Banner.

ENSUE.—The verb 'ensue' is used intransitively, meaning to follow, in Jth 3rd; and transitively, with the full force of pursue, in 1 P 3st.

EN-TAPPUAH.—A place on the boundary of Manasseh (Jos 17). Generally identified with a spring near Yatsef, in a valley to the S. of Muknha, which drains into Wady Kanah. The place is probably the Tappuah (wh. see) of Jos 16th 17th.

ENVY.—Envy leads to strife, and division, and railing, and hatred, and sometimes to murder. The Bible classifies it with these things (Ro 1st 12th, 1 Co 3rd, 2 Co 12th, Ga 2nd, 1 Ti 3rd, Tit 3rd, Ja 3st). It is the antithesis of Christian love. Envy loves the eot, and love envies not (1 Co 13). Bacon closes his essay on 'Envy' with this sentence: 'Envy is the vilest affection and the most depraved; for which cause it is the proper attribute of the Devil, who is called, The envious man, that soweth among the wheat by night; as it is always coming to pass, that Envy worketh subtly and in the dark, and to the prejudice of good things, such as the wheat.' Chrysostom said: 'A moth gnaws a garment, so that a man may soon be a mere skeleton, to be a lean and pale carcass, quickened with a fiend.' These are Scriptural estimates. Envy is devilish and absolutely inconsistent with the highest life. Examples abound in the Bible; such are suggested by the relations between Cain and Abel, Jacob and Esau, Rachel and Leah, Joseph and his brothers, Saul and David, Haman and Mordecai, the elder brother and the prodigal son, the Roman evangelists of Ph 1st and the Apostle Paul, and many others.

D. A. HAYES.

EPAPNUS.—A beloved friend of St. Paul at Rome, greeted in Ro 16; he was the 'firstfruits of Asia (RV) unto Christ,' i.e. one of the first converts of that province. He was probably a native of Ephesus.

A. J. MACLEAN.

EPAPHRA.— Mentioned by St. Paul in Col 1st 4th, Philem 21; and described by him as his 'fellow-servant,' and also as a 'servant of the Lord, and of Christ, and of the church of God.' He was a native or inhabitant of Colosse (Col 4th), and as St. Paul's representative (17) founded the Church there (17). The fact of his prayerful zeal and his correspondence with Laodicea and Hierapolis suggests his activity. 'Epaphras brought the faith to these cities also (41st). He brought news of the Colossian Church to the Apostle during his first Roman imprisonment, perhaps undertaking the journey to obtain St. Paul's advice as to the measures that were there prevalent. He is spoken of as St. Paul's 'fellow-prisoner' (Philem 21), a title probably meaning that his care of the Apostle entailed the practical sharing of his captivity. The Epistle to the Colossians was a result of this visit, and Epaphras brought it back with him to his flock. Epaphras is a shortened form of Epaphroditus (Ph 2th 25), but, as the name was in common use, it is not probable that the two are to be identified.

CHARLES T. P. GRIESEHEN.

EPAPHRODIUS.— Mentioned by St. Paul in Ph 2th-3th 4th, and described by him as his 'brother, fellow-worker, and fellow-soldier' (28th). He was the messenger by whom the Philippians sent the offerings which fully supplied the necessities of St. Paul during his first Roman imprisonment (28th 4th). In Rome he laboured so zealously for the Church and for the Apostles' life (28th); indeed, he became 'nigh unto death,' but God had mercy on him, and the Apostle was spared this 'sorrow upon sorrow' (28th 27). News of his illness reached Philipp, and the distress thus caused his friends made him long to return (28th 29). St. Paul therefore sent him 'the more diligently,' thus relieving their minds, and at the same time lessening his own sorrows by his knowledge of their joy at receiving him back in health. Apparently the Epistle to the Philippians was sent by him.

CHARLES T. P. GRIESEHEN.

EPHES.—1. A son of Midian, descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25th = 1 Ch 1st), the eponymous ancestor of an Arabian tribe whose identity is uncertain. This tribe appears in Is 60 as engaged in the transport of gold and frankincense from Sheba. 2. A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch 28th). 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 28th).

EPHAI.—See Weights and Measures.

EPHAY.— Described in Jer 40 (Gr 47) as 'the Nethophaite,' whose sons were amongst the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah, and were murdered along with him by Ishmael (Jer 41st).

EPHR.—1. The name of the second of the sons of Midian mentioned in Gen 25th, 1 Ch 1st, and recorded as one of the descendants of Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gen 25th). 2. The name of one of the sons of Ezrah 281.
EPHESUS

(1 Ch 24). 3. The first of a group of five heads of fathers' houses belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Co 3:21).

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO.—This Epistle belongs to the group of Epistles of the Captivity, and was almost certainly, if genuine, written from Rome, and sent by Tychicus at the same time as the Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (see COLossIANS).

1. DESTINATION.—To whom was it addressed? That it was spoken for Tychicus the Epghan priest is improbable, for two reasons—(1) The words 'at Ephesus' in 1 are absent from two of the earliest MSS., and apparently from the Epistle as known to Marcion (a.d. 160-180). Origen also had access to a copy of the Epistle from which they were absent. (2) The Epistle is almost entirely devoid of the personal touches—references to St. Paul's lost son at Ephesus, greetings to the Laodicians. The absence of any reference to the special theological controversies of the 2nd century, and of any obvious motive for the composition of the Epistle at a later time, make this theory difficult to accept. Nor is it easy to see an Epistle purporting to be by St. Paul, that had not been in circulation during his lifetime, could have secured a place in the collection of his Epistles that began to be made very soon after his death (2 P 3:16). There does not, then, seem to be any adequate reason for denying the Pauline authorship of this Epistle.

4. Characteristics.—The following are among the distinctive lines of thought of the Epistle. (1) The Epistle as the Church as the new Temple (Col 2:19). The Church, as the Divine body, is to be regarded as the 'eternal purpose of God—the body of which Christ is the head (12249 342 14), the building of which Christ is the corner-stone (292520), the bride (592525). The cosmic significance (4321 67). (2) Paul's pre-incarnate teaching concerning the Christ, who was present in the Church from the beginning. (3) The Epistle was written to the Colossians, and resembles 1 Corinthians. The relation of Ephesians to Colossians is very close. 'The one is the general and systematic exposition of the same truths which appear in a special bearing in the other' (Lightfoot). Cf. the relation of Romans and Ephesians and the parallelism of Galatians and Ephesians have many thoughts in common. See, e.g., the Christian citizenship (Eph 2:19, Ph 3:20), the exaltation of Christ (Eph 1:20, Ph 2:9), the mutual bearing in Christ (Eph 4:11, Ph 3:21). The relation to Colossians is very close. 'The one is the general and systematic exposition of the same truths which appear in a special bearing in the other' (Hort).

5. Relation to other books.—The Epistle has lines of thought recalling 1 Cor. See, e.g., in 1 Cor. the idea of the riches (19) and the mystery (27-41) of the gospel, the work of the Spirit (26, 11, 26), the building (39-41), the one body (10, 12-5, 14-5), the unity and stability (Eph 2:19, Ph 3:21), unity and stability (Eph 2:20, Ph 3:21). Also Eph 6:10 with Ph 4:8, and Eph 5 with Ph 4:13. In regard to Romans and Ephesians, the 'unity at which the former Epistle seems to arrive by slow and painful steps is assumed in the latter as a starting-point, with a vista of wondrous possibilities beyond' (Hort).

There is a close connexion between this Epistle and 1 Peter, not so much in details as in 'identities of thought and similarity in the structure of the two Epistles as wholes' (Hort). If there is any direct relation, it is probable that the author of 1 Peter used this Epistle, as he certainly used Romans. In some respects this Epistle shows an approximation of Pauline thought to the teaching of the Fourth Gospel. See, e.g., the teaching of both on grace, on the contrast of light and darkness, on the work of the pre-incarnate Logos, and compare Jn 17 with the whole Epistle. EES.

four clefts in the surrounding hills. It is along these valleys that the roads through the central plateau of Asia Minor pass. The chief of these was the route up the Meander as far as the Lycus, its tributary, then along the Lycus towards Apamea. It was the most important avenue of civilization in Asia Minor under the Roman Empire. Miletus had been in earlier times a more important harbour than Ephesus, but the track above the Lycus had ceased to hold the traffic, in fact the Lycus was much shorter than the road to Miletus, and was over a pass only 600 ft. high. Consequently Ephesus replaced Miletus before and during the Roman Empire, especially as the Meander had slitted up so much as to spoil the harbour at the latter place. It became the great emporium for all the trade N. of Mt. Taurus.

Ephesus was on the main route from Rome to the East, and many side roads and sea-routes converged at it (Ac 19: 20). The governors of the provinces in Asia Minor had always to land at Ephesus. It was an obvious centre for the work of St. Paul, as influences from there spread over the whole province (Ac 19:9). Corinth was the next great station on the way to Rome, and communication between the two places was constant. The ship in Ac 18:2 bound from Corinth for the Syrian coast, touched first at Camirus.

Besides Paul, Tychicus (Eph 6:21) and Timothy (according to 1 Ti 1:1, 2 Ti 4:2), John Mark (Col 4:7, 1 P 5:24), and the writer of the Apocalypse (1:1 2) were transplanted there.

The harbour of Ephesus was kept large enough and deep enough only by constant attention. The alluvial deposits were (and are) so great that, when once the harbour had silted up, it took hundreds of years before the harbour became gradually smaller and smaller, so that now Ephesus is far away from the sea. Even in St. Paul's time there appear to have been difficulties about navigation, and ships avoided Ephesus when loading or unloading was necessary (cf.
Ac 20:16). The route by the high lands, from Ephesus to the East, was suitable for foot passengers and light traffic, and was used by St. Paul (Ac 19); probably also 19. The alternative was the main road through Coele Syria and Laodicea, neither of which St. Paul ever visited (Col 2).

In the open plain, about 5 miles from the sea, S. of the river, stands a little hill which has always been a religious centre (Ac 19:18). Coele Syria, slope of the hill was the temple dedicated to Artemis (see DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS.
The Greek city Ephesus was built at a distance of 1-2 miles S.W. of this hill. The history of the town is closely connected with the position of Ephesus as the Greek spirit of progress and the slavish submission of the Oriental population to the goddess. Oenomus the Lydian represented the predominance of the latter over the former, but Ephesus (Ephesus for Ephesus) (Ac 19:5) revived the Greek influence. Ephesus, however, was always proud of the position of 'Warden of the Temple of Artemis' (Ac 19:24). The festivals were thronged by crowds from the whole of the province of Asia; St. Paul, whose residence in Ephesus lasted 2 years and 3 months (Ac 19: 19), or, roughly expressed, 3 years (Ac 20:17), at first incurred no opposition from the devotees of the goddess, because new foreign religions did not lessen the influence of the native goddess; but when his teaching proved prejudicial to the money interests of the people who made a living out of the worship, he was at once bitterly attacked. Prior to this occurrence, his influence had caused many of the famous magicians of the place to burn their books (Ac 19:14-16). The riot of 19 was no mere passing fury of a section of the population. The references to Ephesus in the Epistles show that the opposition to Christianity there was as long continued as it was virulent (1 Co 12:12 16, 2 Co 1 15).

The scene in Ac 19:28-31 derives some illustration from an account of the topography and the government of the city. The ruins of the theatre are large, and it has been calculated that it could hold 24,000 people. It was on the western slope of Mt. Pion, and overlooked the harbour. The Asiana (see ASIANA), who were friendly to St. Paul, may have been present in Ephesus at that time on account of a meeting of their body (Ac 19:1). The town-clerk or secretary of the city appears as a person of importance, and this is exactly what is known of municipal affairs in such cities. The Empire brought decay of the influence of popular assemblies, which tended more and more to come into the hands of the officials, though the assembly at Ephesus was really the highest municipal authority (Ac 19:39), and the Roman courts and the procurers (Ac 19:39) were the final judicial authority in processes against individuals. The meeting of the assembly described in Acts was not a legal meeting.
Legal meetings could be summoned only by the officials, who had the power to call together the people when they pleased. The secretary tried to act as intermediary between the people and these officials, and favored those that belonged to the temple of Artemis which was in St. Paul's day of enormous size. Apart from religious purposes, it was used as a treasure-house: as to the precise arrangements for the charge of this treasure we are in ignorance.

There is evidence outside the NT also for the presence of Jews in Ephesus. The twelve who had been baptized with the baptism of John (Ac 19) may have been former Apostles who had emigrated to Ephesus before the mission of Jesus began. When St. Paul turned from the Jews to the population in general, he appeared, as earlier in Athens, as a lecturer in philosophy, and the Jews were at first歌声 by the people of Ephesus.
The earlier part of the day, beginning before dawn, he spent in manual labour. The actual foundation of Christianity in Ephesus may have been due to Priscilla and Aquila (Ac 18:2). 'Ephesian' occurs as a variant reading in the 'Western' text of Ac 20 for the words 'of Asia,' as applied to Tychicus and Trophimus. Trophimus was an inhabitant of Ephesus (Ac 21), capital of Asia; but Tychicus was probably merely an inhabitant of the province Asia; hence they are coupled under the only adjective applicable to both. It is hardly safe to infer from the fact that Tychicus bore the letter to the Christians that he belonged to the province Asia; but it is possible that he did.

EPHAL.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 22).

EPHOD.—1. Father of Hannel (Nu 34: 9). 2. See

EPHRAH.—Mrk 7:4, where Jesus says to a man who was deaf and had an impediment in his speech, 'Ephrahath, that is, 'Be opened.' The word is really Arabic, and if we transliterate it as it stands we obtain epaphath or epaphath. Both these forms are constructed:
the former for epaphath, the latter for epaphath, which are respectively second singular, imperative epapal and epapal of the verb epaphath, 'to open.' Some Gr. MSS present epaphatha, which is certainly epaphath, whereas epaphatha may be epapal. Jerome also reads epaphtha.
It is not certain whom or what Jesus addressed when He said 'Be opened.' It may be the mouth of the man as in Lk 7:4 (so Weiss, Morison, etc.); or the ear, as targ. of Gn 50 (so Bruce, Swete, etc.); or it may be the deaf man himself. One gate of knowledge being closed, the man is conceived of as a bolted room, and 'Jesus said to him, Be thou opened.' J. T. MARSHALL.

EPHRAIM.—A grandson of Jacob, and the brother of Manasseh, the first-born of Rachel by Joseph; daughter of Potipher, priest of On (On 41st. [E], cf. v. 4) [J]. The 'popular etymology' of E connects the name with the verb pārād, 'to be fruitful,' and makes it refer to Joseph's sons. In the Blessing of

EPHRAIM

Jacob (Gen 49:20) there may be a play upon the name when Joseph, who there represents both Ephraim and Manasseh, is called 'a fruitful bough.' The word is probably descriptive, meaning 'fertile region' whether its root be pádrh, or 'epher, 'earth' (Zech 10:1).

Gen 49:22 (J) tells an interesting story of how Jacob and his Egyptian grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, into his own family, and at the same time, against the remonstrances of Joseph, conferred the blessing of the firstborn upon Ephraim—hence Ephraim's predestined superiority in later history.

P's Sinai census gives 40,500 men of war (Nu 13:15), but this is reduced at the Plains of Moab to 32,500 (26:1), which is less than any of the tribes except Simeon, whose body existed exclusively in N. (Isa 17:4, 5, 17 of Heb, p. 77). Contrary to what we should have expected from the Blessing of Jacob, Ephraim, according to P, lost in the meantime 20 per cent, while Manasseh gained 40 per cent.

The appearance of Joseph in the Blessing of Jacob, with no mention of his sons, who according to J had been adopted as Jacob's own, and were therefore entitled on this important occasion to be included with the other sons, would point to a traditional echo of the early days in which Ephraim and Manasseh were still united. In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5) it is the 'family of Machir, the firstborn (Jdg 17:1), the elder (Gen 48:7) son of Manasseh, that is mentioned, not a Manasseh tribe. From 2 S 13:18 (cf. art. BENJAMIN) it is plain that Shimei still regarded himself as of the house of Joseph; and, despite the traditional indications of a late formation of Benjamin (wh. see), the complete political separation of Manasseh from Ephraim appears to have been still later. At all events, Jeroboam the Ephraimite, who afterwards became the first king of Israel (c. n.c. 930), was appointed by Solomon superintendant of the forced labour of the 'house of Joseph,' not of Ephraim alone. Ephraim, Machir, and Benjamin were apparently closely related, and in early times formed a political and administrative unit. 'Joseph,' like 'Benjamin,' are no decisive details determining the time when they became definitely separated. Nor are there any reliable memories of the way in which Ephraim came into possession of the best and central portion of the land.

The traditions in the Book of Joshua are notably uninforming. Canaanites remained in the territory until a late date, as is seen from Jdg 13, and the history of Shechem (ch. 8 f.). Ephraim was the strongest of the tribes and foremost in leadership, but was compelled to yield the hegemony to David. From that time the history of the tribe is that of the capital of Ephraim and the history of the family of Ephraim. Eli, priest of Shiloh and judge of Israel, Samuel, and Jeroboam I, were among its great men. Shechem, Tirzah, and Samaria, the capitals of the North, were within its boundaries, and it was at Shilo in the days of Joshua that Israel is said to have divided the land by lot. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

EPHRAIM.—1. A place near Baal-hazor (2 S 13:19) it may be identical with the Ephraim on which the Omasticon places 20 Roman miles N. of Jerusalem, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Sinjul and el-Lubbân. If Baal-hazor be represented, as seems probable, by Tell 'Eber, the day by relation to which such a prominent feature of the landscape was indicated must have been of some importance. It probably gave its name in later times to the district of Samaria called Apherema (1 Mac 11:30, Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 9). The site is at present unknown.

2. A city 'near the wilderness,' to which Jesus retired after the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11:56). 'The wilderness' is in Arab. el-burtayyeh, i.e., the uncultivated land, much of it covered with thorns, on the uplands to the N.W. of Jerusalem. The Omasticon mentions an 'Efraim' 5 Roman miles E. of Bethel. This may be the modern el-Tulibeh, about 4 miles N.E. of Beitas, with ancient cisterns and rock-hewn tombs which have a place of importance in old times. See also EPHRON.

The Forest of Ephraim (Heb. w'ar Ephraim) was probably not a forest in our sense of the term, but a stretch of rough country such as the Arabs still call war', abounding in rocks and thickets of brushwood. The district is not identified, but it must have been E. of the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Manahaim, which was the scene of Abner's defeat and murder (2 Sam 1, 20). The origin of the name cannot now be discovered. Mount Ephraim, Heb. har Ephraim, is the name given to that part of the central range of Western Palestine occupied by Jupinband, corresponding in part to the modern Jebel Nablus—the district under the governor of Nablus. Having regard to Oriental usage, it seems a mistake to tr. with RV 'the hill country of Ephraim. Jebel el-Quds does not mean 'the hill country of Jerusalem,' but that part of 'the mountain which is subject to the city. We prefer to retain, with AV, 'Mount Ephraim.'

EPRATHITE.—1. A native of Bethlehem (Ru 15).

2. An Ephrathite (Jg 12:1, 1 S 11, 1 K 11:3).

EPHRON.—1. The Hittite from whom Abraham purchased the field or plot of ground in which was the cave of Machpelah (Gen 23). The purchase is described with great particularity, and the transactions between Ephron and Abraham are conducted with an elaboration which indicates a certain oriental proceedings. Ephron received 400 shekels' weight of silver (200): coined money apparently did not exist at that time. If we compare the sale of the city with other instances (Gen 34:15, 1 K 15:13), Ephron seems to have made a good bargain. 2. A mountain district, containing cities, on the border of Judah, between Neprhou and Kirjath-jearim (Jos 15:5). The ridge W. of Bethlehem is regarded as Ephron's 'mountain' which the city is subject to. See EPHRAIM (city), No. 2.

EPICUREANS.—St. Paul's visit to Athens (Ac 17:14-16) led to an encounter with 'certain of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, representatives of the two leading schools of philosophy of that time.

Epicureanism took its name from its founder Epicurus, who was born in the island of Samos in the year B.C. 341. In B.C. 307 he settled at Athens, where he died in B.C. 270. A man of blameless life and of a most amiable character, Epicurus gathered around him, in the garden which he had purchased at Athens, a brotherhood of attached followers, who came to be known as Epicureans or 'the philosophers of the Garden.' His aim was a practical one. He regarded pleasure as the absolute good. Epicurians, however, did not restrict pleasure, as the earlier Cyrenaic school had done, to immediate bodily pleasures. Whatever may have been the practical outcome of the system, Epicurus and his more worthy followers must be acquitted of the charge of sensuality. What Epicurus advocated and aimed at was the happiness of a tranquil and free from pain, possible, undisturbed by social conventions or political excitement or superstitious fears.

To deliver men from 'the fear of the gods' was the chief end of Epicureanism, according to his famous follower the Roman poet Lucretius, the crowning service of Epicurus. Thus it may be said that, at one point at least, the paths of the Christian Apostle and the Epicurean Philosopher touched each other. Epicurus endeavoured to give life and bliss to his followers by showing that in the physical organization of the world there is no room for the interference of such beings as the gods of the popular theology. There is nothing...

which is not material, and the primal condition of matter is that of atoms which, falling in empty space with an inherent tendency to swerve slightly from the perpendicular, come into contact with each other, and form the world as it appears to the senses. All is material and mechanical. The gods—and Epicurus does not deny the existence of gods—have no part or lot in the affairs of men. They are relegated to a realm of their own in the spaces between the worlds. Further, since the test of life is feeling, death, in which there is no feeling, cannot mean anything at all, and is not a thing to be feared either in prospect or in fact.

The total effect of Epicureanism is negative. Its wide-spread and powerful influence must be accounted for by the personal charm of its founder, and by the conditions of the age in which it appeared and flourished. It takes its place as one of the negative but widening influences, leading up to 'the fulness of time' which saw the birth of Christianity. W. M. MacGREGOR.

ER.—1. The eldest son of Judah by his Canaanitish wife, the daughter of Shua. For wickedness, the nature of which is not described, 'J's slew him' (Gen 38:7, Nu 26:9). 2. A son of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Ch 4:8).

ERECH. Name of Jesus (Lk 3:32).

ERASTUS.—The name occurs thrice in NT among the Pauline company. An Erastus sends greetings in Ro (16:23, 1 Cor 16:15). In Roman history where 'A' (A' tambaris, 'the city') (Corinth). The Erastus who was sent by St. Paul from Ephesus to Macedonia (Ac 19:24, and who later continued in Corinth (2 Ti 4:20), is perhaps the same.

ERAS.—Named second in the list of Nimrod's cities (Gen 10:10). The very ancient Babylonian city of Arku, or Uruk, regarded as exceptionally sacred and beautiful. Its ruins at Warka lie half-way between Hillah and Korna, on the left bank of the Euphrates, and W. of the Nile Canal. The people of Erech are called Archevites in Ex 2:4.

ESAIAS.—The familiar AV spelling of Isaiah in Apoc. and NT; it is retained by RV only in 2 Es 21.

ESAIRHADDON, son and successor of Sennacherib (2 K 19:5, Is 37:21), reigned over Assyria b.c. 682–669. He practically re-founded Babylon, which Sennacherib had destroyed, and was a great restorer of temples. He was also a great conqueror, making three expeditions to Egypt, and finally conquered the whole North, garrisoning the chief cities and appointing vassal kings. He subdued all Syria, and received tribute from Manasseh, and Ex 4 mentions his colonization of Samaria. He ruled over Babylonia as well as Assyria, which explains the statement of 2 Ch 31 that Manasseh was carried captive to Babylon.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ESAU.—1. The name is best explained as meaning 'tawny' or 'shaggy' (Gen 25:25); Edom or 'ruddy' was sometimes substituted for it (v. 26), and Esau is represented as the progenitor of the Edomites (36:41, Jer 49:7, Ob). He displaced the Horites from the hilly land of Seir, and settled there with his followers (Gen 32:36, Dt 2), his career is sketched briefly but finely by weaving incidents collected from two sources (J and D); in the early part, chiefly the former, whilst the Priestly writer is supposed to have contributed a few particulars (Gen 24, 28, 36). The standing feature of Esau's history is rivalry with Jacob, which is represented as even preceding the birth of the twins (Gen 25, Hos 12). The facts may be collected into four groups: 1. The sale of the birthright (Gen 25:28) carried with it the loss of precedence after the father's death (28), and probably loss of the domestic priesthood (Nu 35:12), and of the double portion of the patrimony (Dt 21:17). For his act the NT calls Esau 'profane' (He 12), thus revealing the secret of his character; the word (Gr. βεβηλος) suggests the quality of a man to whom nothing is sacred, whose heart and thought range over only what is material and sensibly present. To justify the title, Esau sold his birthright to Jacob, and, in return, Jacob deceived his father in order to gain the blessing of the first-born (18). Esau and Jacob were fratricidal, as is clear from Gen 27. Esau hunted game in the mountains, Jacob tended sheep, one of the first things that Jacob did was to change Esau's name (v. 25) (cf. Lu 22:27–28).

Epilepsy is that department of theology which is concerned with the 'last things,' that is, with the state of individuals after death, and with the course of events in the present order of things. It has been brought to a close. It includes such matters as the consummation of the age, the day of judgment, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, the millennium, and the final judgment.

1. Eschatology of the OT. In the OT the future life is not greatly emphasized. In fact, so silent is the Hebrew literature on the subject, that some have held that personal immortality was a late addition of Christian origin. For example, in the book of Enoch, 1 Esarhaddon is said to have been the last king of Assyria to have received the prophet Enoch as a delegate from heaven. He ruled over Babylonia as well as Assyria, which explains the statement of 2 Ch 31 that Manasseh was carried captive to Babylon. The universe was so constructed that the earth lay between heaven above, where Jehovah was, and the great pit or cavern beneath, where the dead departed. The Hebrew Scriptures do not give us any considerable material for elaborating a theory as to life in Sheol, but from the warnings against necromancers, as well as from the story of Saul and the witch of Endor, we may infer that the Jews had a definite belief in the existence of a world of spirits. The chief of these was Jehovah as a judge who exacted vengeance on the persecutors of his people.
ESCHATOLOGY

In the Hebrew p...the...national immortality, which...suffering and...national resurrection. This carried within it the germ of many of the eschatological expectations of later days. In fact, without the prophetic insistence upon the distinction between the period of national suffering and that of national glory, it is hard to see how the later doctrine of resurrection, mentioned below, could have gained its importance.

2. Eschatology of Judaism.—A new period is to be seen in the OT Apocrypha and the pseudoepigraphic apocalypses of Judaism. Doubtless much of this new phase in the development of the thought was due to the influence of the Captivity. The Jews came under the influence of the great Babylonian myth-cycles, in which the struggle between right and wrong was expressed as one between God and various supernatural enemies such as dragons and giants. To this period must be attributed also the development of the idea of Sheol, until it included places for the punishment of evil spirits and evil men.

This development was accelerated by the rise of the new type of literature, the apocalypse, the beginnings of which are already to be seen in Isaiah and Zechariah. The various influences which helped to develop this type of literature, with its emphasis upon dead bodies, were very hard to locate. The influence of the Babylonian myth-cycles was great, but there is also to be seen the influence of the Greek impulse to pictorial expression. No nation ever came into close contact with Greek thought and life without sharing in their incentive to eschatological speculation. In the case of the Hebrews this was limited by...in outline right...the new and higher conception of the worth of the individual and his relation to the universe, paved the way to a clearer estimate of his immortality.

In the Hebrew period, however, there were elements which were subsequently to be utilized in the development of the eschatology of the Pharisees and of Christianity. Chief among these was the Day of Jehovah. At the first this was conceived of as the day in which Jehovah should punish the enemies of His nation Israel. In the course of time, however, and with the enlarged moral horizon of prophecy, the import of this day with its punishments was extended to the Hebrews as well. At its coming the Hebrew nation was to be given all sorts of political and social blessings by Jehovah, but certain of its members were to share in the punishment reserved for the enemies of Jehovah. Such an expectation as this was the natural outcome of the monarchical concept of religion. Jehovah as a great king had given his laws to his chosen people, and was entitled to a great estate on which all men, including the Hebrews, would be judged. Except in the Hagiography, however, the punishments and rewards of this great judgment are not elaborated, and even in Daniel the treatment is but rudimentary.

A second element of importance was the belief in the rehabilitation of the Hebrew nation, i.e. in a national resurrection. This carried within it the germ of many of the eschatological expectations of later days. In fact, without the prophetic insistence upon the distinction between the period of national suffering and that of national glory, it is hard to see how the later doctrine of resurrection, mentioned below, could have gained its importance.

3. Eschatology of the NT.—This is the development of the eschatology of Judaism, modified by the fact of Jesus' resurrection.

(a) In the teaching of Jesus we find eschatology prominently represented. The Kingdom of God, as He conceived of it, is formally eschatological. Its members were being gathered by Jesus, but it was to come suddenly with the return of the Christ, and would be ushered in by a general judgment. Jesus, however, does not elaborate the idea of the Kingdom in itself, but rather makes it a point of contact with the Jews for His exposition of eternal life—that is to say, the life that characterizes the coming age and may be begun in the present evil age. The supreme good in Jesus' teaching is this...
ESCHATOLOGY

eternal life which characterizes membership in the Kingdom. Nothing but a highly subjective criticism can eliminate from His teaching this eschatological element, which appears as strongly in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptic writings, and furnishes material for the appeal of His Apostles. It should be added, however, that the eschatology of Jesus, once it is viewed from the His own point of view, carries with it no crude theory of rewards and punishments, but rather serves as a vehicle for controlling the law. His fundamental moral and religious concepts. To all intents and purposes it is in form and vocabulary like that of current Judaism. It includes the two ages, the non-physical resurrection of the dead, the Judgment with its sentences, and the establishment of eternal states.

(b) In the teaching of primitive Christian eschatology is a ruling concept, and is thoroughly embedded in the Messianic evangel. Our lack of literary sources, however, forbids us even to mention it here in the outline. Their expectation beyond a reference to the central position given to the coming day of the Christ's Judgment.

(c) Eschatology was also a controlling element in the teaching of St. Paul. Under its influence the Apostle held himself aloof from social reform and revolution. In his opinion Christians were living in the 'last days' of the world. The battle was soon to come, to establish His Judgment, and to usher in the new period when the wicked were to suffer and the righteous were to share in the joys of the resurrection and the Kingdom. Eschatology alone forms the proper point of approach to the Pauline doctrines of justification and salvation, as well as his teachings as to the resurrection. But here again eschatology, though a controlling factor in the Apostle's thought, was, as in the case of Jesus, a medium for the exposition of a genuine spiritual life, which did not rise and fall with any particular forecast as to the future. The elements of the Pauline eschatology are those of Judaism, but corrected and to a considerable extent given distinctiveness by his knowledge of the resurrection of Jesus. He gives no apocalyptic description of the coming age beyond his teaching as to the body of the resurrection, which is too elaborate and clear to be contradicted by the resurrection of Jesus. His description of the Judgment is couched in the conventional language of Pharisaic eschatology: but, basing his teaching upon 'the word of the Lord' (1 Th 4:13-14), he develops the doctrine that the Judgment extends both over the living, who are to be caught up into the air, and also over the dead. His teaching is lacking in the specific elements of the apocalypses, and there is no reference to the establishment of a millennium. Opinions differ as to whether St. Paul held that the believer received the resurrection body at death or at the Parousia of Christ. On the whole the former view seems possibly more in accord with his position as to the work of the Spirit in the believer. The appearance (Parousia) of the Christ to inaugurate the new era St. Paul believed to be at hand (1 Th 4:14-15), but that it would be preceded by the appearance of an Antichrist (2 Th 2:4). The doctrine of the Antichrist, however, does not play any large role in Paulinism. While St. Paul's point of view is eschatological, his fundamental thought is really the new life of the Christian, through the Spirit, which is made possible by the acceptance of Jesus as the Christ. With St. Paul, as with Jesus, this new life with its God-like love and its certainty of still larger self-realization through the resurrection is the supreme good.

(d) The tendencies of later canonical thought are obviously eschatological. The Johannine Apocalypse discloses a complete eschatological programme. In the latter work we see all the elements of Jewish apocalyptic eschatology utilized in the interest of Christian faith. The two ages, the Judgment and the Resurrection, and the final conquest of God are distinctly described, and the programme of the future is elaborated by the addition of the promise of a first resurrection of the saints; by a millennium (probably derived from Judaism; cf. Slav. Enoch 82, 83) in which Satan is bound; by a great period of conflict in which Satan and his hosts are finally cast into the lake of fire; and by a general resurrection including the wicked for the purpose of judgment. It is not clear that in this general resurrection there is intended anything more than the summoning of the faithful to enter into the Kingdom. The doctrine of the 'sleep of the dead' finds no justification in the Apocalypse or the NT as a whole.

ESDRAELON

—The Greek name for Merj Ibn 'Amr, the great plain north of the range of Carmel. It is triangular in shape, the angles being defined by Tell e-Kasat in the N.W., Jentia in the S.E., and Tabor in the N.E. The dimensions of the area are about 30 miles N.W. to S.E., 14 miles N.E. to S.W. It affords a passage into the mountains interior of Palestine, from the coast-seat at the harbours of the Bay of Acca.
ESSDRAS

It is drained by the Kishon, and is, over nearly all its area, remarkably fertile. It was allotted to the tribe of Issachar.

Esdraelon has been the great battlefield of Palestine. Here Deborah and Barak routed the hosts of Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4), and here Gideon defeated the Midianites. Saul here fought his last battle with the Philistines (1 S 28-31). Josiah here attacked Pharaoh-necho on his way to Mesopotamia and was slain (2 K 23).

It is the scene of the encampment of Holofernes (Jh 7), in connection with which appears the name by which the valley is generally known: it is a Greek corruption of Jearfal. Here Saladin encamped in 1186; and, finally, here Napoleon encountered and defeated an army of Arabs in 1799. It is chosen by the Apocalypse as the site of the sitting scene for the final battle between the good and evil forces of the world.

ESHBA.—An Edomite chief (Gn 36, 1 Ch 1st).

ESCHOL.—1. The brother of Mamre and Aner, the Amorite confederates of Abraham, who assisted the patriarch in his pursuit and defeat of Chedorlaomer's forces (Gen 14). He lived in the neighbourhood of Hebron (Gn 13); and possibly gave his name to the valley of Eschol, which lay a little to the N. of Hebron (Nu 13). 2. A wady, with vineyards and pomegranates, apartment near Jericho (Nu 13). It is usually rendered "bunch of grapes." The name has not been recovered.

ESHER.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8th).

ESHTAO.—A lowland city of Judah (Jos 15th.), on the borders of Dan (19th), near which Samson began to feel the "spirit of the Lord" (19th), and was buried (19th); the home of some of the Danites who attacked Laish (18th). It is supposed to be the same as "Bahur", a town the Phœnician kings (1st and 2nd S. 308). The name as Eserm's survives about 8 miles S. of Hebron; extensive remains of antiquity are here to be seen.

ESTHON.—A Judahite (1 Ch 41st. 11).

ESLI.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3rd).

ESSENE.—To the student of NT times the Essenes present a problem of extreme difficulty. The very existence of a monastic order within the pale of Judaism is an extraordinary phenomenon. In India such things would have been a matter of course. But the deep racial consciousness and the tenacious national will of the Jews make it hard to account for. When, approaching the subject in this mood, the student straightforwardly finds as features of the order the habit of worshipping the sun and the refusal to share in the public services of the Temple, he is tempted to explain Esseneism by foreign influences. Yet the Essenes were Jews in good standing. They were, indeed, not outside, the pale of strictest Judaism. Hence they give the student a problem of interest as well as difficulty.

The small part of the difficulty is due to the character of our witnesses. Esseneism was the first form of organized monasticism in the Mediterranean world. The Greeks who followed Alexander to India marveled at the details of Gynocoeite or Gymnosophists. But not one of the evidence. But not one of the evidence at which the Essenes is on the Mediterranean see monasticism at close quarters. Wonderment and the children of wonderment—fancy and legend—soon set the work on the facts, colouring and distorting them. One of our sources, Flury (Nat. Hist. v. 17), in part the product of the imagination. Another, Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, 12ft., and in Euseb. Epist. viii. w. 1, writes in the most of the preacher to whom facts have no value except as texts for sermons. And even Josephus (Ant. x. 2. 5, xv. 1. 1. 2. 5, Vito, c. 2. B.J. v. vii. 2-18), our best source, is at times under suspicion. But a rough outline of the main facts is discernible.

The foundations of Esseneism were laid in the half-century preceding the Maccabean War. The high priesthood was disintegrating. In part this was due to the fact that the loose-jointed Persian Empire had been succeeded by the more coherent kingdom of the Seleucids. With this closer political order, which made Jewish autonomy more difficult of attainment, went appealing and compelling forces of Hellenism, both as a mode of life and as a reasoned view of the world. The combined pressure of the political, the social, and the intellectual elements of the Greek overlordship went far towards disorganizing and demoralizing the ruling class in Jerusalem.

But a deeper cause was at work, the genius of Judaism itself (see PHARISEES). When the Hebrew monarchy fell, the political principle lost control. To popular monotheism, to build up the OT Canon, organize and hold together the widely separated parts of the Jewish race—this work called for a new form of social order mixed with the ecclesiastical order of man whom the times required in order to carry this work through was not the priest, but the Bible scholar. And he was necessarily an intense separatist. Taking Ezra's words, 'Separate yourselves from the people of the land' (Ezr 101) as the keynote of life, his aim was to free God's people from all taint of heathenism. In the critical period of fifty years preceding the War this class of men was coming more and more into prominence. They stood on the Torah as their platform; the Law of Moses was both their patrimony and their obligation. In them the genius of Judaism was beginning to mould the spirit both of the government and of Hellenism, against its Illuminating culture as well as against the corroding Graeco-Syrian morality. The priestly aristocracy of Palestine being in close touch with Hellenism, it naturally resulted that the high priesthood, and the Temple which was inseparable from the high priesthood, suffered a fall in sacramental value.

Into this situation came the life-and-death struggle against the attempt of Antiochus to Hellenize Judaism. In the life of a modern nation a great war has large results. Far greater were the effects of the Maccabean War upon a small nation. It was a supreme point of precipitation wherein the genius of Judaism reached clear self-knowledge and definition. The Essenes appear as a party shortly after the war. It is not necessary to suppose that at the outset they were a monastic order. It is more likely that they at first took form as small groups or brotherhoods of men intent on holiness, according to the Jewish model. This meant a kind of holiness that put an immense emphasis on Levitical precision. To keep the Torah in its smallest details was part and parcel of the very essence of morality. The groups of men who devoted themselves to the realization of that ideal started with a bias against the Temple as a place made unclean by the heathenism of the priests. This bias was strengthened through the assumption of the high priesthood by the Hasmonaean house, an event which still further discounted the sacramental value of the Temple services. So these men, knit into closely connected groups mainly in Judea, found the satisfactions of life in deepening fellowship, and an ever more intense devotion to the ideal of Levitical perfection. In course of time, as the logic of life carried them forward into positions of which they had not at first dreamed, the groups became more and more closely knit, and at the same time more fundamentally separative regarding the common life of the Jews. So we find, impossible in the talmudic pietists, the group main body of Essenes colonizing near the Dead Sea, and constituting a true monastic order.

The stricter Essenes abjured private property and marriage in order to secure entire attention to the Torah. The Levitical laws of holiness were observed with great zeal. An Essene of the higher class became unclean if a fellow-Essene of lower degree so much as touched his garment. They held the name of Moses may be seen in the hands of God. And their Sabbatarianism went to such lengths that the bowels must not perform their wonted functions on the Seventh Day. At the same time, there are reasons for thinking that foreign influences had a hand in their constitution. They worshipped towards the sun, not towards the Temple. This may have been due to the influence of Parseism. Their doctrine of immortality was Hellenic, not Pharisac. Foreign influences in this period are quite possible, for it was not until the wars with Rome imposed on Judaism a hard-and-fast form that the doors were locked and bolted. Yet, when all is said, the foreign influence gave nothing more than small change to Essenisim. Its innermost nature and its deepest motive were thoroughly Jewish.

ESTATE.—"State" and "estate" occur in AV almost an equal number of times, and with the same meaning. Ob. 21:15, "All my estate shall I give you," with the next verse, "that he might know your estate." In Ac 22:1 "all the estate of the elders." "The presbytery" means all the members of the Sanhedrin. The pl. occurs in the Pref. to AV, and in Ezk 36:1 "I will set you after your old estates," i.e. according to your former position in life. The heading of Ps 37 is "David persuadeth to patience and confidence in God, by the different estate of the godly and the wicked."

ESTHER ("star").—The Jewish name, of which this is the Persian (or Babylonian) form, is Hadassah (cf. Est 2:7), which means "myrtle." She was the daughter of Abihail, of the tribe of Benjamin, and was brought up in the house of her cousin Mordecai, in Shushan. Owing to her beauty she became an inmate of the king's palace, and on Vashti the queen being disgraced, Esther was chosen by Xerxes, the Persian king, to succeed her. The connection with Persia and courage of Esther became the means of doing a great service to the very large number of Jews living under Persian rule; for, owing to the craft and hatred of Haman, the chief court favourite, the Jews were in danger of being massacred on one day; but Esther, her suit impregnatated by Mordecai, revealed her Jewish nationality to the king, who realized thereby that she was in danger of losing her life, owing to the royal decree, obtained by Haman, to the effect that all those of Jewish nationality in the king's dominions were to be put to death. Esther's action brought about an entire reversal of the decree. Haman was put to death, and Mordecai was honoured by the king, while Esther's position was still further strengthened both by the Jews being permitted to take revenge on those who had sought their destruction. Mordecai and Esther put forth two decrees: first, that the 14th and 15th days of the month Adar were to be kept annually as "days of joy and gladness, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor" (Est 9:20); and, second, that a day of mourning and fasting should be observed in memory of the sorrow which the first decree had occasioned to the Jewish people (Est 9:22, cf. 4:14).

The attempt to identify Esther with Amestris, who, according to Herodotus, was one of the wives of Xerxes, has been made more than once in the past; but it is now universally recognized that this identification will not bear examination. All that is known of Amestris—her heathen practices, and the fact that her father, a Persian general, is specifically mentioned by Herodotus—proves that she cannot have been a Jewess; besides which, the two names are fundamentally distinct. As to whether Esther was really a historical personage, see the next article.

ESTHER, BOOK OF.—1. Place in the Canon.—The Book of Esther belongs to the second group of the third division of the Hebrew Canon—the Kethubim, or "writings"—a group comprises part of the Old Testament. "Rolls," of which there are five,—Song of Songs, Ruth, Lam., Eccles., Esther. It was not without much discussion that Esther was admitted into the Canon, for it is right to be there disputed both by the Jews and authorities and by the early Christian Church. As late as the 2nd cent. A.D. the greatest Jewish teacher of his day, Rabbi Jehudah, said, "The Book of Esther did not fetch the hand of God, and therefore 'to defile the hands' is the technical Jewish way of saying that a book is canonical; it means that the holiness of the sacred object referred to produces by contact with it a state of Levitical impurity."

In some of the earlier lists of the Biblical books in the Christian Church that of Esther is omitted; Athanasius (d. 373) regarded it as uncannonic, so too Gregory Nazianzen (d. 391); and St. John of Damascus (c. 700) reckons it among the apocryphal books. It is clear that Esther was not universally accepted as a book of the Bible until a late date.

2. Date and authorship.—The language of Esther points unmistakably to a late period; it shows signs, along other things, of an attempt to assimilate itself to classical Hebrew; the artificiality herein betrayed stamps the writer as one who was more familiar with Aramaic than with Hebrew. Further, the Persian empire is spoken of as belonging to a period of history long since past (cf. 'in those days,' 11); the words, "There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of thy kingdom" (3:8), show that the 'Dispersion' had already for long been an accomplished fact. Moreover, the spirit of the book points to the time when great bitterness and hatred had been engendered between Jew and Gentile. The probability, therefore, is, that Esther belongs to the earlier half of the 2nd cent. a.c. Of its authorship we know nothing further than that the writer was a Jew who must have been in some way connected with Persia; the book shows him to have been one whose racial prejudice was much stronger than his religious fervour; it is extraordinary that a book of the Bible should never once mention the sacred name of God; the secular spirit which is so characteristic of the book must have been a reversion, in the main, of the distinction to incorporate it into the Scriptures, which has been already referred to.

3. Contents.—The book purports to give the history of how the Jewish feast of Purim ('Lots') first originated. Xerxes, king of the Medes and Persians, gives a great feast to the nobles and princes of the 127 provinces over which he rules; the description of the decorations in the palace garden on this occasion recalls the language of the Arabian Nights. Vashti, the queen, also gives a feast to women. On the seventh day of the month of Adar, which closes the royal feast, Vashti appears before the princes in order that they may see her beauty. Upon her refusing to obey, the king is advised to divorce her. In her place, Esther, one of Vashti's maidsens, becomes queen. Esther is the adopted daughter of a Jew named Mordecai, who had been the means of saving the king from the hands of assassins. But Mordecai falls out with the court favourite, Haman, on account of his refusal to bow down and do reverence to the latter. Haman resolves to avenge himself for this insult; he has lot cast in order to find out which is the most suitable day for presenting a petition to the king; the day being appointed, the petition is presented and granted, the promised payment of ten thousand talents of silver into the royal treasury (Est 3') no doubt contributing towards this. The petition was that a royal decree be put forth to be put into effect that all Jews were to be killed, and their belongings treated as spoil. On this becoming known, there is great grief among the Jews. Esther, instructed by Mordecai, undertakes to interpose for them before the king, and to persuade him to let the king and Haman to a banquet, and repeats the invitation for the next day. Haman, believing himself to be in favour with the royal couple, determines to gratify his hatred of Mordecai in a special way, and prepare a gallows on which to hang him (5'). In the night after the first banquet, Ahasuerus, being unable to sleep, commands that the book of records of the chronicles be brought; in these he finds the account of Mordecai's former service, which has never been rewarded. Haman is sent for, and the king asks him what should be done to the man whom the king delights to honour; Haman thinking that he is himself who is uppermost in the king's mind, describes such a man as should be honoured. The king thereupon directs that all that Haman has said is to be done to Mordecai. Haman returns in grief to his house. While taking counsel there with his friends, the king's chamberlains come to escort him to the queen's second banquet (6'). During this Esther makes her petition to the king on behalf of her people, as well as for her own life, which is threatened, for the royal edict is directed against Jews and Jewesses within his domains; she also discloses Haman's plot against Mordecai. The king, as the result of this, orders Haman to be hanged on the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai, the latter receiving the honours which had before belonged to Haman (ch. 7). Esther then has letters sent in all directions in order to avert the threatened destruction of her people; but the attempt is yet made by the enemies of the Jews to carry out Haman's intentions. The Jews defend themselves with success, and a great feast is held on the 14th of Adar, on which the Jews 'rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.' Moreover, two days of feasting are appointed to be observed for all time; they are called Purim, because of the lot (pdr) which Haman cast for the destruction of the Jews (ch. 8, 9). The book concludes with further reference to the power of Ahasuerus and the greatness of his favourite, Mordecai (ch. 10).

4. Historiography of the book.—There are very few modern scholars who are able to regard this book as containing history, i.e. that a few historical data have been utilized for constructing the tale. The main reasons for this conclusion are, that the book is full of improbable facts, that it is so transparently written for specific purposes, namely, the glorification of the Jewish nation, and as a means of expressing Jewish hatred of and contempt for Gentiles (see also § 5); that a strictly historical interpretation of the narrative is beset with difficulties; and that there is no substantiation from such books as Chron., Ezra., Neh., Dan., Sirach, or Philo (cf. Hastings' DB s.v.). Besides this, there is the artificial way in which the book is put together: the method of presenting the various scenes in the drama is in the style of the writer of fiction, not in that of the historian.

5. Purim.—The main purpose for which the book was written was ostensibly to explain the origin of, as well as to give the authority for, the continued observance of the Feast of Purim; though it must be confessed that the book does not really throw any light on the origin of this feast. Some scholars are in favour of a Persian origin, others, with perhaps greater justification, a Babylonian. The names of the chief characters in the book seem certainly to be corrupt forms of Babylonian and Elamite deities, namely, Haman = Hamman, Mordecai = Marduk, Esther = Istar: while Vashti is the name of an Elamite god or goddess (so Jensen). Thus we should have the Babylonian Marduk and Istar on the one hand, the Elamite Haman and Vashti on the other. Purim, in this case, have, as Jensen suggests, a feast commemorating the victory of Babylonian over Elamite gods which was taken over and adapted by the Jews. In this case the origin of the name Purim would be sought in the Babylonian word puru, which means a 'small round stone,' i.e. a lot. But the connexion between the feast and its name is not clear; indeed, it must be confessed that the mystery attaching to the name Purim has not yet been unravelled.

ETHICS.—1 Es 1"—Jehiel (2 Ch 35').

ETAM.—An altogether obscure place name, applied to a rock in a cleft of which Samson took refuge (Jg 15'), whence he was dislodged by the Philistines (19'), and therefore presumably in Judahite territory (cf. 1 Ch 4'). Also applied to a village in the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 49'), and a town fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11'). Whether these are one or two or three places, and where or if they were, are unanswered questions.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ETHAN.—Ex 13', Nu 33'; the next station to Succoth in the Exodus. The name is not known in Egyptian. It lay 'in the edge of the wilderness,' evidently at the E. end of the Wady Tumilat, and probably northward of the 'Red Sea,' whether that means the Bitter Lakes or the Gulf of Suez. F. L. GIFFITH.

ETHANIAS.—1. 'The Ezrahite' of 1 K 4' and Ps 89 (title). In the first of these passages the Ezrahite is mentioned along with other contemporaries (?) of Solomon, who were all surpassed in wisdom by the Jewish monarch. In 1 Ch 29' he is said to have been a Judaeus of the family of Zerah, which is prob. another form of Zerah (hence the etymological Ezrahite). Instead of the Ezrahite it has been proposed to render 'er Shm'i of 1 K 4' the 'native,' i.e. the Ezrahite, in opposition to some of the other wise men named, who were foreigners.

2. An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6'). In v. 3 he is called Joah. 3. The eponymous ancestor of a guild of Temple-singers (1 Ch 6' 15', etc.).

ETHANUS.—One of the 'swift scribes' who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (1 Mace 4').

ETHRAAL ('with Baal,' i.e. enjoying his favour and protection).—King of the Sidonians, and father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab king of Israel (1 K 16').

ETHER (Jos 15' 19').—A town of Judah noticed with Libnah, apparently near the plain of Philistia, which was given to Simeon, and near Rimmon. The site is unknown.

ETHICS.—The present article will be confined to Biblical Ethics. As there is no systematic presentation of the subject, all that can be done is to gather from the Jewish and Christian writings the moral conceptions that were formed by historians, prophets, poets, apostles. The old history culminates in the story of the perfect One, the Lord Jesus Christ, from whom there issued a life of higher order and ampler range.

I. OT Ethics.—As the dates of many of the books are uncertain, special difficulty attends any endeavour to trace the precision of the stages of moral development amongst the Hebrews. The existence of a moral order of the world is assumed; human beings are credited with the freedom, the Intelligence, etc., which make morality possible. The term 'conscience' does not appear till the Greeks, and perhaps it was then borrowed from the Stoics; but the thing itself is conspicuous enough in the records of God's ancient people. In Gn 3 we have the two categories 'good' and 'evil'; the former seems to signify in 1st sense answered to design' and in 2nd 'conducive to well-being.' These terms—applied sometimes to ends, sometimes to means—probably denote ultimate of consciousness, and so, like pain and pleasure, are not to be defined. Moral phenomena present themselves, of course, in the story of the patriarchs: men are described as mean or chivalrous, truthful or false, meritorious or hamworthly, law-abiding or law-defying—Mosaic or other—like us.

1. In Hebrew literature the religious aspects of life are of vital moment, and therefore morals and worship are inextricably entangled. God is seen: there is a desire to please Him; there is a shudder from authority that would arouse His anger (Gn 20:39). Hence the immoral is sinful. Allurement is due—not to an impersonal law, but to a Holy Person, and duty to man is duty also to God. Morality is under Divine protection: are not the tables of the Law in the Ark that occupies the most sacred place in Jehovah's shrine (Ex 20, Dt 10, I K 8, He 9)? The commandments, instead of being alien, are the outflowings of the character of God. He who honours mercy calls men to possess attributes which He Himself prizes as His own peculiar glory (Ex 33:16. 18 34:7). Hosea represents the Divine love as longing for the erring, by emphasizing: mercy for the repulsive, the highest form of excellence is willingness to perish if only Israel may be saved (Ex 32:22, 2 Jg 5:11-12). Frequently the laws are such as only a judge may administer: thus the claim of 'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth' (Dt 19), being a maxim of fairness to be observed by a magistrate who has to decide between contending parties, is too harsh for guidance outside a court of law (Mt 22:39). When Israel sinned, it was punished; when it obeyed it prospered. It was not till Hebrew national life was destroyed that individual experiences excited questions as to the equity of Providence (Job, Ps 37, 75) and in regard to perdition hereafter. In the new covenant, even when the soul of each man is deemed to be of immense interest (Ezk 18), national ideals have the ascendency in thought. It is the nation that is to have a resurrection (Is 25, Ezk 34, 37). The Lord Jesus Christ, from whom there issued a life of higher order and ampler range, by which conduct is to be judged. Deference to the Covenant is deference to God (Hos 6:8, Am 3:4). As God is always faithful, His people prosper so long as they observe the conditions to which their fathers gave solemn assent (Ex 24:7). The Decalogue, which is an outline of the demands made by the Covenant on Israel, requires in its early clauses faith, reverence, and service; then (Ex 20, Commandments 5 to 9) the duty of man to man is as part of the moral duty to Jehovah, for Moses and all the prophets declare that God is pleased or displeased by our behaviour to one another. The Tenth Commandment, penetrating as it does to the lowest degree, should be taken as a reminder that all commandments are to be read in the spirit and not in the letter alone (Lv 10:17, 18, Dt 6:4, Ps 139, Ro 7:8). Human obligations—details of which are sometimes massed together as in Ex 20-23, Ps 18 and Amos, and set forth as both legislative and ethical—together, Nothing is more common in the prophecies than complaints of a disposition to neglect the former (Is 1:12, Jer 6:28, Hos 6, Am 5:9). The requirements embrace a great moral field. For particulars, and every department of experience is recognized. Stress is laid upon kindness to the physically vulnerable (Lv 19), and to the poor and to strangers (Dt 10:17-19, 22:8-13, Job 31:8, Ps 109, Is 1:10-18, Jer 22:3) and to strangers. Parents and aged persons are to be revered (Ex 20:2, Dt 5:14, Lv 19:3). The education of children is enjoined (Ex 12:45. 16, Dt 4:9, 20:14. 16 11:11, 18 32, 18; Prov 22:6-9). In Prov 30, the emphasis is laid upon intelligence, or knowledge, on the one hand, and charity, trustworthiness, and justice on the other (Ex 19:1, 10:14, 14:13, Pr 12:10, 18, 26:11). Occasionally there are charming pictures of particular characters (the housewife, Pr 31; the king, 2 S 24:4; the priest, Mal 2:5, 9). God's rule over man is parallel with His rule over the universe, and men should feel that God embraces all of His interests in His throne. Man can attend equally to the stars and to human sorrows (Ps 19. 33. 147). 4. The sanctions of conduct are chiefly temporal (harvests, droughts, visits and ceremonial events, etc.), yet, as they are national, self-regard is not obtrusive. Moreover, it would be a mistake to suppose that no Hebrew minds felt the intrinsic value of morality. The legal spirit was not universal. For particulars, the prophets were glad to think that God was not limiting Himself to the letter of the Covenant, the very existence of which implied that Jehovah, in the greatness of His love, had chosen Israel to be His people. By His own justice Divine action was guided. God was the compassionate Redeemer (Dt 7, Hos 11:14). Even the people's disregard of the Law did not extinguish His compassion. Deserving, love, and mercy had never been so much held in esteem (Ps 22:23, Is 63:9-10, 133:2, Mic 7:18). In response to this manifested generosity, an unmercenary spirit was begotten in Israel, so that God was loved for His own sake, and His smile was regarded as wealth and light when poverty and darkness had to be endured. 'Whom have I in heaven but thee? 'Oh, how I love thy law!' are expressions the like of which abound in the devotional literature of Israel, and they evince a disinterested devotion to God Himself and a genuine delight in His service. To the same purport is the remarkable appreciation of the beauty and splendour of wisdom recorded in Pr 8.

II. NT Ethics.—While admitting many novel elements (Mt 5:11 13, Ro 12, Mk 12:28-32, Eph 29, Ho 10:6, Rev 22 31 32, 4), Christianity reaffirmed the best portions of OT teaching (Mt 5:37, Ro 3). Whosoever things were valuable, Christ conserved, unified, and developed (Ex 24 14). This Decalogue, which was no nobler, sweeter song (Jn 1:17). But the glad and noble life which Jesus came to produce could come only from close attention to man's actual condition.

1. Accordingly, Christian Ethics takes full account of

The guilty state of human nature, together with the presence of temptations from within, without, and between, presents a problem far different from that which can be seen when it is assumed that men are good or only mortal. Is our need met by lessons in the art of advancing from good to better? Is the human will dependent upon God and rebellion? The moral ravages in the individual and in society call for Divine redemptive activities and for human penitence and faith. Though the sense of sin has been most conspicuous since Christ died and rose again, the Hebrew consciousness had its moral anguish. The vocabulary of the ancient revelation calls attention to many of the aspects of moral disorder. Sin is a ravenous beast, crouching ready to spring (Gn 4:2); a cancer, with its devouring cancerous growth (Gn 33:14-15, 28-29); is universal (Gn 6:5-8, 1 K 8:9, Ps 130:4, 134:13-15); is folly (Prov. passim); a missing of the mark, violence, transgression, rebellion, pollution (Ps 51). It is a venomous serpent, a wild beast, ready to pounce (Ps 10:8, 51:8). It is the serpent of the Devil's garden, the man who is marked required (Ps 10:8), and the serpent that was cast out of Paradise (Ps 148:3). Jesus in the Gospels laboured to produce contrition. It is one of the functions of the Holy Spirit to convict the world of sin (Jn 16:8). It is not supposed that a good life can be lived unless moral evil is repressed by a penitent heart. The fountains of conduct are considered to have need of cleansing. It is always assumed that great difficulties beset the soul in its upward movements, but past corrupt state and its exposure to fierce and subtle temptations.

2. In harmony with the doctrine of depravity is the distinctness with which individuality is recognized. Sin is possible only to a personal agent. Ability to sin implies moral freedom and a high rank in nature denoted by 'personality.' Christianity has respect to a man's separateness. It sees a nature ringed round with barriers that other beings cannot pass, capacities for safety, suffering, and the world, and a life with the flock. The Physician, who (it is conceivable) could have healed crowds by some general word, says His beneficent power is upon each sufferer (Lk 4:46). He move from the Gospels and the Acts the stories of private ministrations, and what gaps are made (Jn 14-18, 3-4, Ac 8:8-14, 16, etc.). Taking the individual as the unit, and assuming that from his view centre, the NT ethic declines to consider his deeds alone (Mt 6, Ro 12-20). Actions are looked at on their inner side (Mt 5:21, 27, 31, 37, 6:1, 18, 20, 22, 28, 35, Mk 7:24, Lk 16:18-20, Jn 4:6). This is a prolongation of ideas present to the best minds prior to the Advent (1 S 166, Ps 7:24-31, 51:7, 138:2, 10, Jer 716, 319).

3. The social aspects of experience are not overlooked. Everyone is to bear his own burden (Ro 14:5, Gal 6), and must answer for himself to the Judge of all men (2 Co 5:18); but he is not isolated. Regard for others is imperative; for an unforgiving temper cannot find forgiveness (Mt 6:15, 18). Worship without brotherliness is rejected (Mt 231, 8), and Christian love is regenerative (1 Jn 3). The mere absence of malevolent deeds cannot shield one from condemnation (Mt 25:42, Lk 16:19-31, Eph 2:2-3). This helpfulness is the new ritualism (He 13:1, Ja 19). The family with its parents, children, and servants (Eph 5:1-6, Col 3:18-4); the Church with its various orders of character and gifts (Ro 12:3, 1 Co 12, 15, Gal 6:3-5, 1 Co 12, 14, 15); the State with its monarch and magistrates (Mt 22:16, 17, Ro 13:1-2, Ti 2:1-2), provide the sphere wherein the servant of Christ is to manifest his devotion to the Most High. 'Obedience, pure and undefiled, is the precious of those who are despised (Job 1:18-19), the chief need of striking features which the Christian ideal of practice suggests' (Sidgwick), and they involve the conception that Christian Ethics is based on the recognition of sin, of individuality, of social demands, and of the need of heavenly sanction.

4. The Christian standard is the character of the Lord Jesus Christ, who lived perfectly for God and man. He overcame evil (Mt 1:20, Jn 16), completed His life's task (Jn 17), and

He 4:4, 1 P 2:2, 1 Jn 3). His is the pattern life, inasmuch as it is completely (1) filial, and (2) fraternal. As to (1), we mark the upward look, His readiness to bear the heat of His love burst into the flame of prayer, His dutifulness and submissiveness: He lived 'in the bosom of the Father,' and wished to do only that which God desired. As to (2), His pity for one of the flock (Mt 18:10, pl. 4), the kindness which neither man (Ac 10:35-37) nor angel (Rev 22:3) can receive He deems it proper to accept. His love (Mt 25:31-46) to call oneself the bond-servant of Jesus Christ (Ro 1:1, Jn 18, 2 P 1 9) was an act at once the strongest affection for the wise and gracious One, and the utmost loyalty to God's holy will as embodied in His Son. The will of God becomes not only his own task but the task of the society. The kindness of God, fully illustrated in the gift and sacrifice of His Son, is a great incentive to holiness. Men come into the sunshine of Divine favour. Heavenly sympathy is thrust upon them in His struggles. The virtues to be acquired (Mt 5:2-11, Gal 5:22, Col 3:12, 1 P 1:1, 6, Tit 2:1) and the vices to be shunned (Mk 7:2, Gal 5:19, Col 3:5) are viewed in connexion with the assurance of efficient performance present (Col 3:17), upon which the aspirant may depend (Jn 3:16, Ro 5:3, 2 Co 5:7). The hearty acceptance of that love is faith, rank as a virtue and as the parent of virtues (2 P 3:1, Ro 3:5, 1 Co 13, 1 He 13). Faith, hope, love, transfigure and supplement the ancient virtues;—temperance, courage, wisdom, justice,—while around them grow many gentle excellences not recognized before Christ gave them their true rank; and yet it is not by its wealth of moral teaching so much as by its assurance of ability to resist temptation and to ensure spiritual manhood that Christianity has gained pre-eminence. Christ's miracles are illustrations of His gospel of pardon, regeneration, and added faculties (Mt 9). The life set before man was lived by Jesus, who regenerates men by His Spirit, and takes them into union with Himself (Jn 3:5, 8, 16, 15, 19, 1 Co 14, 2 Co 5, Gal 3:26, Ph 2, 1 Jn 13, 1 Jn 1:2, 1 P 2:2, 1 Jn 2). The connexion between the Lord and the disciple is permanent (Mt 28, Jn 14-17, 17, 17, He 13:1, 1 Jn 3-5), and hence the aspiration to become 'goodly, pure, lovely, vigilant, and above measure' (He 12:14), and God, Tit 2:11-14) receives ample support. Sanctity is not only within the reach of persons at one time despised as moral incapables (Mt 28:17, Lk 7:45, 19, 23:26, 424
The objectors which have been made to Biblical Ethics consist, though the subject can be more touchingly handled. In this article, some passages in the OT have been cited as immoral; some in the NT are said to contain impermissible precepts, and certain important spheres of duty are declared to receive very inadequate treatment.

As to the NT, it is to be observed that we need not feel guilty of disrespect to inspiration when our moral sense is offended; for the Lord Jesus authorizes the belief that the Mosaic legislation was imperfect (Mt 5:27, Mt 10:16); and both Jeremiah and Ezekiel comment adversely on doctrines which had been accepted on what seemed to be Divine authority. Moreover, it is possible that the Egyptian pantheon after Cush grew into a separate kingdom, with Napat as its capital. Its rulers were probably of Egyptian descent; they are represented as being entirely subservient to Ammon, and were acknowledged by the Egyptian pharaohs as vassals and ready to abdicate or even to commit suicide at his command.

The first king of Ethiopia is named in the NT, but Cush was the name most correctly given to the country of Ethiopia in the Christian era. But Cush grew into a separate kingdom, with Napat as its capital. The latter was the name most correctly given to the country of Ethiopia in the Christian era. The northern part of Ethiopia was called Cush, and the southern part was called Napat. Cush was considered the more powerful of the two, and its kings were acknowledged by the Egyptian pharaohs as vassals. Cush was also the name given to the country of Ethiopia in the Christian era. But Cush grew into a separate kingdom, with Napat as its capital. The latter was the name most correctly given to the country of Ethiopia in the Christian era.

THE ETHIOPIAN WOMAN

of Cornelius by St. Peter, the case of the Ethiopian eunuch marked an important stage in the question of the admission of the Gentiles to the Christian Church.

THE ETHIOPIAN WOMAN.—According to Nu 12 (JE), when the children of Israel were at Hazeroth, Miriam and Aaron 'spake against' Moses on account of his marriage with an Ethiopian (RV 'Cushite') woman. As the Ethiopian woman is mentioned nowhere else, and the death of Moses' wife Zipporah is not recorded, some of the early interpreters thought the two must be identical; and this view is favoured by the Jewish expositors. But it is more likely that a black slave-girt girl is meant, and that the fault found by Miriam and Aaron was with the indignity of such a union. It may perhaps be inferred from the context that the marriage was of recent occurrence.

ETH- KAZIN.—A town on the E. frontier of Zebulon, whose site has not been identified (Jos 19:15).

ETHNAN.—A Judeite (1 Ch 4:7).

ETHNAEUS is a Greek word translated by 'governor' in 2 Co 11:8. It is used also of Simon the high priest (1 Mc 14:2, 35:5). Its exact meaning is uncertain, but it appears to indicate the ruler of a nation or tribe which is itself living with separate laws, etc., amidst an alien race.

ETNII.—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6:4), called in v. 5 Je- shayahu.

EBULUS.—A leading member of the Christian community at Rome, who sends greeting to Timothy through St. Paul at the time of the second imprisonment (2 T 4:19). His name is Greek, but nothing further is known of him.

EUCARISTH—This is the earliest title for the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. It is found in Ignatius and the Didache, and is based upon the eucharistia or giving of thanks with which our Lord set apart the bread and wine at the Last Supper as memorials of Himself (Mt 26:69, Lk 22:17, 1 Co 11:23). The name Lord's Supper, though legitimately derived from 1 Co 11:24, is not there applied to the sacrament itself, but to the Love-feast or Agape, a meal commemorating the Last Supper, and not yet separated from the Eucharist when St. Paul wrote. The irregularities rebuked by the Apostle (11:17-26) are such as could only have accompanied the outer celebration, and doubtless contributed to the speedy separation of the essential rite from the unnecessary accessories. The title Communion comes from 1 Co 10:16, where, however, the word is a predicate of food used technically. The breaking of the bread, Mt 26:26, Lk 22:19, probability refers to the Eucharist (cf. 20:7, Lk 22:20), but until modern times does not seem to have been adopted as a title.

1. The institution is recorded by each of the Synoptics (Gospels, but not by St. John. A fourth account appears in 1 Corinthians.

As they were eating, he took the bread, and when he had blessed, he brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take ye; this is my body. And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave to them, and said, Take ye; this is my blood.

Mt 26:19-20.

As they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessing, brake it, and gave to them, saying, This is my body.

Lk 22:19-20.

2. When the hour was come, he, being in the house of the disciple Simon with him, and he said unto them, With desire have I desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer:

Mt 26:22.

But I will not eat it, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And he received a cup, and when he had given thanks, he said, Take ye this, and divide among yourselves: for I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come.

Lk 22:15-16.

And he took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Lk 22:19.

And the cup in like manner after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

Lk 22:20.

A comparison shows variations of minor importance between Mark and Matthew. But the most remarkable differences are those of Luke, which mentions what is apparently a second account. It seems scarcely credible that at a supreme moment, like that in which a sacred rite was being established, our Lord should have been subject to the possibility of confusion by solemnly delivering two of the Paschal cups, dividing between them the words which, according to the other Synoptics, belong, as it would seem appropriately, to one. Nor, if he were about to bald a succeeding cup of the Eucharistic, is it likely that he would have spoken of the fulfilment of the Paschal wine in relation to another (v. 20). In spite, therefore, of the fact that the majority of MSS and Versions favour its inclusion, Westcott and Hort are probably right in regarding the passage inclosed in brackets above as an interpolation. With this omitted, the narrative is assimilated to the other Synoptics.

Eucharist.

The inversion of bread and cup, which now becomes apparent and which probably belongs not to Luke but to his source, is perhaps due to the fact that the writer, dwelling on the Lord's intention that the Passover should be fulfilled in a Messianic rite, records at the opening of his narrative a declaration similar to that which Matthew and Mark assign to a later stage, the delivery of the cup (Mt 26:25, Mk 14:25). These words, though referring more exactly to the Eucharistic bread, yet, as extending to the whole meal ('this passover'), require no mention of the action that would accompany them; whereas the companion statement in Mark relates the fruit of the vine to the second of the mention of the cup (v. 17). The first half of v. 17 (the consecration of the bread), which, if the account were symmetrical, would appear (as arranged in Rushbrooke's Synopticon) before v. 16, is then added to complete the Institution. A copyist, assuming a part of the narrative to be wanting, would then introduce, probably from a contemporary liturgical formula, the second half of v. 17 and v. 25, which bear a striking resemblance to the Pauline account, of which Luke is otherwise independent. A similar inversion is found in the sub-Apostolic Teaching of the Apostles.

2. From the Synoptic record the following inferences may be drawn: (1) The words of institution cannot themselves determine the meaning of the rite. Luke (unless v. 20 be genuine) omits 'This is my blood of the covenant.' [Note also that the other traditional form uses the phrase—'the new covenant in my blood' (1 Co 11:25)]. This may be due to the fact that Luke introduces the cup primarily in relation to our Lord's utterance concerning the fruit of the vine. But the sentence may be an interpretation of Christ's action, based on its correspondence with the hollowed out bread. Matthew further amplifies by adding the words, 'unto remission of sins' (Mt 26:28). It is clear that, although formulas were probably already in use, the language was not yet stereotyped. We cannot, therefore, be certain of the precise form of words that our Lord depicted. The whole Twelve, but none other, are present with Jesus (Mk 14:14ff.). And Judas had not yet gone out (Lk 22:3). The significant relation of the Apostles to the congregation of the spiritual people, prominent in Mark from the first (31v), is not only emphasized by their seclusion with Jesus in this supreme hour, but explicitly depicted by Luke (22:24-38). Though, therefore, there is nothing beyond the form of the record itself to indicate the particular and monumental character of the rite, Jesus; the first the rite assumed as the bond of Christian fellowship, and for which Christians like Igraius in the sub-Apostolic age claimed the authority of the Apostles, acquies and with interprets the Synoptic narrative.
EUCHARIST

To go beyond the Apostolic Epistle is not possible for historic Christianity than to separate the actual Christ from the Apostolic writings.

(8) The Eucharist is Paschal in origin and idea. —It is unprofitable to determine whether the Last Supper was in fact the Passover, according to the impression of the Synoptists, or, as St. John seems to imply, anticipated by twelve hours the Jewish Feast. (See Sunday, in Rev. Expl. Art. 'Jesus Christ' n. II.). No mention is made of the lamb, and the significant identification of the elements accessory to the feast, whether typically or effectually, with the sacrifice of Christ, suggests that its observance was absent or that this would absorb the rite in the Paschal rite. In fact, there is no record of the Paschal feast in the New Testament. The bread and wine, as eaten in fellowship by Christ and His disciples on the night of the betrayal, and distributed, as often as the rite is renewed, to those who believe on Jesus through the Apostles, is the Christian Passover celebrated beneath the Cross, where the Paschal Lamb is offered for the life of the world. Its interpretation must, therefore, begin from the great Hebrew festival, in which it finds its origin, and which was regarded as a corporate commemoration of the Covenant People beneath the shelter of the sprinkled blood, an extension of that first sacred meal eaten when the destroying angel was passing over and working restoration among Israel (see Schultz, OT Theol., Eng. tr.

3. St. Paul's account of the institution (see above) was written not later than a.p. 58, and is therefore older than the Synoptics. He claims to have received it as part of the inviolable deposit of the gospel (1 Co 11:23), which he must hand on unimpaired to those to whom he ministers the word. The phrase 'from the Lord' can hardly imply, as some have maintained, that a direct revelation was given to him, extending to the form of words; but only that the record is part of that original message of which the Apostles were the guardians rather than the interpreters (1 Co 15, Gal 1:11-13). The form of tradition here reproduced brings out explicitly the fact that the Eucharist was regarded in the Apostolic Church as an ordinance to be observed in Christian congregations till the Lord's coming (as oft as ye drink, with comment v.30). It is St. Paul only that introduces the command,"This do in remembrance of me" (v.3), an expression fruitful in controversy. It has been urged that the word rendered 'do' means 'offer,' and that the Eucharist is, therefore, a sacrifice. Not only is this an uncommon use of the Greek, unsuspected by the Greek commentators themselves, but the word
'this' (Gr. neuter) which follows can only be 'this bread,' not 'this bread,' which would require the mascul-line form of the Gr. pronoun. Clearly, however, the phrase refers to the whole Eucharistic action, not to the particular act of eating and drinking, the latter of which is differentiated from it in v. 30. It is further argued that the word used for 'remembrance' (anamnesis, v.26) implies a ritual memorial before God. The word, however, almost invariably used in the LXX with this differentiated form (anamnesis, Lk 22:14; 1 Co 11:18; Nu 15:46; Ecclus. 27:32), implies simply a recollection of a past truth or event. And, though the form of words in which, according to the traditional ritual, the house-father recalled the redemption from Egypt is probably present to the Apostles' mind, it is uncertain whether this ritual of Divine deliverance was directed towards God. As now used it would seem to be intended to carry out the injunction of the Law given in Ex 12:14 (see Haggadah for Passover). The same unanswerable passages to which St. Paul's explanatory statement--'ye proclaim the Lord's death until he come again' metaforai figaro the natural interpretation of the Greek is in favour of the idea suggested by the RV, viz. announcement to men rather than commemoration before God (cf. 1 Co 11:26). The phrase is sacrificial, not as the commemoration of the death of Christ, but as the means of participation in the Paschal Lamb slain for us (1 Co 57), in the offering of the body of Christ once made on the Cross (He 10:14; cf. Jn 19,10). The feast of Christ's body results in the institution of that instrument of union, the sacramental body, in respect of which the unworthly partaker is guilty (1 Co 11, but see below), and with which the faithful have fellowship with Christ in His mystical body (1046, 17). The transition from one application of the word 'body' to the others—one bread, one body—is very subtle, and they are no doubt so vitally connected in the mind of St.
Paul as hardly to be capable of exact distinction.
But it is unlikely that in a passage where the argument would have been satisfied by the use of one word—'body'—on the analogy of the common pagan identification of the god with the sacrifice, he should have used the longer phrase—'communion of the body'—if he had not felt that the single word would have failed to give the exact meaning of the bond which the whole passage depends upon the reality of the gift conveyed through the feast in which it is symbolically presented. St. Paul holds that there is a real communion in the sacrificial feasts of the heathen, though in this case the word used is 'remembrance' (v.26), whose presence is incompatible with that of Christ (v.3). The 5. The crucial words of the second passage (11:27-28) are 're discerner not the body.' 'Lord's' is an interpretation of the TR, which the RV properly rejects (v.27). The RV also brings out the fact that the verb tr. 'discern' (v.29) is again used in v.31—'if we discerned oursevies’—thus showing that the word does not mean ‘perceive’ but ‘discernitate.’ ‘Body’ is left undefined, including, as it apparently does, the mystical body which the unworthy doge in the Church of God, the sacramental elements which they disown by profane use, and the sacrifice of Christ with which they reject communion, thereby becoming guilty in respect of each other.

6. Both passages express what is implicit in the division of the sacrament into two kinds. It is the body and blood as separated in death through which communion is attained. In 1 Co 10:16, by placing the cup first, as in St. Luke’s account, it has been said of Christ. St. Paul emphasizes the sacrificial death of Christ as a necessary element in the Eucharistic feast. The Epistle to the Hebrews shows that access to the Holy Place is gained through the offered body and sprinkled blood (He 9:1-5; St. John, that union with Christ is found in that Living Bread which implies death because it is flesh and blood (Jn 6:6). Commenting on the unique phrase ‘drink to one’s own blood’ is equivalent to ‘personality;’ and that therefore the ‘whole Christ’ is sacramentally present in the Eucharistic elements. But it does imply vital union with Him who became dead and is alive for evermore (Rev 1:18), a Lamb ‘as though it had been slain’ (5), a Priest upon His throne (Ze 6; cf. He 8), who through the one offering of Himself has perfected for ever (10) those that come to God through Him.

7. In conclusion, however, it must be frankly admitted that, while one view of the sacrament may seem on the whole to express more fully than others the general tenor of NT teaching on the subject, none of the expositions has divided, since the 16th cent., not even the theory of transubstantiation when precisely defined, can be regarded as wholly inconsistent with the language of Scripture.

EUNUCH.—In the proper sense of the word a eunuch is an emasculated human being (Dt 23:5), but it is not absolutely certain that the Heb. sdris always has this significance, and the uncertainty is reflected in our Eng. tr., where ‘officer’ and ‘chamberlain’ are frequently found. It is interesting to note that the group of scholars who rendered Jeremiah for the AV adhered to ‘eunuch’ throughout; whereas the Revisers have spoiled the symmetry by conforming Jer 52:9 to 2 K 25:19. The following reasons, none of which is decisive, have been advanced in favour of some such rendering of sdris or ‘officer’ or ‘chamberlain.’ 1. That Potiphar (Gn 39:3) was married. But actual eunuchs were not precluded from this (see Ter. Enu. 4, 3, 24: Juv. vi. 366; Sir 20:36, 302 et al.). And the words in Gn 39:1 which identify Joseph’s first master with the husband of his mistress are an interpolation. 2. That in 2 K 25:19 the ‘eunuchs’ hold military commands, whereas they are generally unwarlike (imbelles, Juv. i. c.). But there have been competent commanders amongst them.

3. That the strict meaning cannot be insisted on at Gn 40:7. Yet even here it is admissible.

EURAQUILO

The kings of Israel and Judah imitated their powerful neighbours in employing eunuchs (1) as guardians of the harem (2 K 9:3, Jer 41:19); Est 1:8-4 are instances of Persian usage; (2) in military and other ranks. St. Paul emphasizes the sacrificial death of Christ as a necessary element in the Eucharistic feast. The Epistle to the Hebrews shows that access to the Holy Place is gained through the offered body and sprinkled blood (He 9:1-5; St. John, that union with Christ is found in that Living Bread which implies death because it is flesh and blood (Jn 6:6). EUODIA.—This is clearly the correct form of the name, not Eudias as AV (Ph 4:1), for a woman is intended. St. Paul beseeches her and Syntyche to be reconciled; perhaps they were deaconesses at Philippi.

EUPATOR.—See Antiochus V.

EUPHRATES, one of the rivers of Eden (Gn 2:11), derives its name from the Assyrian Furat or Ararat, which is itself derived from the Chaldean Furat, and is generally known as ‘the river of the Assyrians.’ It rises in the Armenian mountains from two sources, the northern branch being called the Frat or Kara-su, and the southern and larger branch the Murad-su (the Aras or Ararat of ancient geography). The present length of the river is 1700 miles, but in ancient times it fell into two or three many miles to the north of its existing outlet, and through a separate mouth from that of the Tigris. The salt marshes through which it passed before entering the sea were called Marrau (Mersaram in Jer 50:9), where the Armenians called it the Kalda or Chaldians lived. The alluvial plain between the Euphrates and the Tigris constituted Babylonia, the water of the annual inundation which took place in May, and was caused by the melting of the snows in Armenia being regulated by means of canals and barrages. The Hittite city of Carchemish stood at the point where the Euphrates touched Northern Syria, and commanded one of the chief fords over the river; south of it came the Belich and Khabur, the last alluvium of the Euphrates. The promise made to the Israelites that their territory should extend to ‘the great river’ (Gn 15:18 et al.) was fulfilled through the conquests of David (2 Sh 7:11-12, 1 K 4:1).

EURAQUILO (Ac 27:24 RV).—There is some doubt as to the reading. The Greek MSS which are esteemed to be the best read Eurachyioi; so do the Bohairic Version, which was made in Egypt in the 5th or 7th cent. from a MS very like these, and the Sahidic Version made in the 3rd cent.; the Vulgate Latin revision, made towards the close of the 4th cent., reads Eurachylo, which points to a Greek original reading Eourachylo, but later authorities along with the Pesh. and Syr. read Eouraclyo (so AV). No doubt Eur(o) aklyon is the correct name, and the other is an attempt to get a form capable of derivation. The word is then a sailor’s word, and expresses a S. E. wind, by compounding two words, a Greek word (euro) meaning E. wind, and a Latin word (aquilo) meaning N. E. wind. This is exactly the kind of wind which frequently arises on Cretan waters at the present day, from the mountains in strong gusts and squalls. The EUTYCHUS.—A young man who fell down from a third storey while sleeping during St. Paul's sermon at Troas, and was 'taken up dead' (Ac 20:9). St. Paul fell on him and, embracing him, declared life to be in him. It appears that he was not actually dead but that he was in a state of unconsciousness or sleep, for he is said to have been reviving but that seems at least to have been the general belief. The incident is described in parallel terms with the raising of Dorcas and of Jairus' daughter. A. J. Maclean.

EVANGELIST ('one who proclaims good tidings' ['evangel,' 'gospel']).—The word occurs 5 times in NT (Ac 21:1, Eph 2:3, 2 Ti 4:5), and in each case with reference to the proclamation of the Christian gospel. Ac 21:1 gives what appears to be the primary Christian use of the word. Philip, one of the Seven (cf. Ac 6:4), is described as an evangelist, while he had obtained this title is suggested when we find that immediately after Stephen's martyrdom he went forth from Jerusalem and preached the gospel (literally evangelized) in Samaria, in the desert, and in all the cities of the coast land between Azotus and Cesarea (Ac 8:4. 11. 26. 40), In the first place, then, the evangelist was a travelling Christian missionary, one who preached the good news of God. We never hear of him before.

In Eph 4:11, Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers are all named as gifts bestowed on the Church by the ascended Christ. It is impossible to distinguish these 5 terms as referring to so many fixed ecclesiastical offices. There is no ground, e.g., for thinking that there was an order of pastors and another of teachers in the early Church. St. Paul, again, while making these exceptional functions of the Apostles, was himself the prince of evangelists and the greatest of Christian teachers. We conclude, therefore, that the evangelist as such was not an official, but one who, without having the higher powers of Apostleship or prophecy, or any special appointment for teaching or pastoral work, had a gift for proclaiming the gospel as a message of saving love—a gift which was chiefly exercised, no doubt, by moving as Phile had done from place to place.

The special use of 'evangelist' in the sense of an author of a written 'Gospel' or narrative of Christ's life, and specifically the author of one of the four canonical Gospels, is much later than the NT, no instance being found till the 3rd century. J. C. LAMBERT.

EVE (Heb. Chavvaith; the name probably denotes 'life': other proposed explanations arc 'life-giving,' 'living,' 'knishpa'), and some would connect it with an Arab. word for 'serpent').—1. Eve is little more, in Genesis, than a personification of human life which is perpetuated by woman. See ADAM. 2. In the NT Eve is mentioned in 2 Co 11:1, 1 Ti 2:13-15. The former is a reference to her deception by the serpent. The latter teaches that since 'Adam was first formed, then Eve,' women must live in quiet subordination to their husbands. Is a second reason seems to be added, i.e. that 'Adam was not deceived,' in the fundamental manner that Eve was, for 'the woman being completely deceived has come into [state of] transgression.' Here St. Paul distinctly takes Eve to be a personification of the woman. The periphrasis continues in v. 9, which is obscure, and must be studied in the commentators. A. H. M'NEILE.

EVENING.—See TIME.

EVI.—One of the five kings of Midian slain (Nu 31:4, Jos 13:12). EVIDENTLY.—Ac 10:9. 'He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day. . .' Gal 1:18, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth. The meaning is clearly, or openly as in RV. Cf. Rob. Trasoe (Grod. Trans. ed. p. 250), 'He saw evidently what Stock of Corn and Rice I had laid up.'

EVI is an older form of the word 'ill'; used, both as a substantive and adjective, in a vavh of the sense and ranging in meaning from physical unfitness to moral wickedness. The former is archaic, but occurs in Gn 28:1 (AVm), Ex 21:12 (AVm), Jer 24:1 (AV), and is not without an ethical tinge. But the word almost invariably connotes what is either morally corrupt (see Sin) or injurious to life and happiness. In 2. the two meanings are at first scarcely differentiated. Whatever comes to man from without is, to begin with, attributed simply to God (Am 3:1, 2. 33, Is 14:1, 45:17). Destruction is wrought by His angels (Ex 12:29, 2 S 24:16), but moral temptations come from Him (2 S 24:1, 1 K 22:22), though there is a tendency to embody them in beings which, though belonging to the host of heaven, are spoken of as evil or lying spirits (1 S 10:14, Jg 9:4, 1 K 22:22). The serpent of the Fall is an angel, and cannot be pressed to more moral or temporal, than the attempt to tempt, though the form which the temptation takes suggests hostility to the will of God external to the spirit of the woman (2 Co 11:3, cf. Gn 3:7). Then later we have the figure of the Adversary or Satan, who, though still dependent on the will of God, is nevertheless so identified with evil that he is represented as taking the initiative in seduction (Zec 3. 1 Ch 21:8), cf. 2 S 24:1). The motive of course, and not of Satan, that of God's holiness (Dt 32:3 etc.), the purity which cannot behold evil (Hab 1:13); and correspondingly sharpens the problem. Heathen gods are now identified with demons opposed to the God of Israel (Is 37:22, Ps 106:17; cf. 1 Co 10:13). This tendency, increased perhaps by Persian influence, becomes dominant in apocryphal literature (2 P 2:2 and Jude 4 are based on the Book of Enoch), where the fallen angels are a kingdom at war with the Kingdom of God.

2. In the NT moral evil is never ascribed to God (Ja 1:13), being essentially hostile to his mind and will (11:1-12. 13:1-4, 1 Jn 2:7-8). The Evangelist, One (Mt 6:13, 1 Jn 5:11), an active and personal being identical with the Devil (Mt 13:19, Jn 8:44) or Satan (Mt 4:3, Mk 4:1, Lk 22:38, Jn 13:7), who with angels (Mt 25:40) is cast down from heaven (Rev 12:7, cf. Lk 10:18), goes to and fro in the earth as the universal adversary (1 P 5:8, Eph 4:27, 6:1, Jn 47), and will be finally imprisoned with his ministering spirits (Rev 20:1, cf. Mt 25:41). Pain and suffering are ascribed sometimes to God (Rev 3:17, Th 3:18, Hes 13:18), inasmuch as all things work together for good to those that love Him (Ro 8:28); sometimes to Satan (Lk 13:14, 2 Co 12:5) and the demons (Mt 8:22 etc.), who are suffered to hurt the earth for a season.

The speculative question of the origin of evil is not resolved in Holy Scripture, being one of those things of which we are not competent judges (see Butler's Anology, I. 7, cf. 1 Co 10:13). Pain is justified by the benefit which it produces (Ro 8:26-28, 1 P 4:1), punishment by the peaceful fruits of righteousness (Ro 12:2), and the permission of moral evil by the victory of the Cross (1 Co 15:25-28). Accept the facts and look to the end is the teaching of the Bible as a guide to practical religion (Ja 5:14). Beyond this we enter the region of philosophy. Some prehistoric thinkers like Anaxim or Calvin have not shrunk EVIL SPEAKING. — In the Bible covers sins of untruthfulness as well as of malice. It includes abuse, thoughtless telebearing, imputing of bad motives, spite, and the like. While often general and difficult, it is frequent; it is forbidden in the legislation of the OT (Ninth Commandment; Dt 19:14) and of the NT (Mt 5:21; 18:18). Christians must expect this in the world and the church and must be on guard against the temptation to enter into this evil spirit.

The treachery of the men of Shechem is so explained (Jg 9:6), though in this case the spirit may not be personal but merely a temper or purpose of ill-will.

The nearest approach to this is perhaps in Ex 129:3, Where Jehovah and the destroyer are apparently identified, though the language admits equally of the view that the destroyer is the agent of Jehovah's will (cf. 2 K 19:16). But the theory is well known to have been the current demonology of the day (see Devil), as well as with the natural suggestion of the phrases. These spirits are not represented as constituting the personal energy of God, but as under His control, which was direct and active according to some of the writers, but only permissive according to others. The fact of God's control is acknowledged by all, and is even a postulate of Scripture; and in using or permitting the activity of these spirits God is assumed or asserted to be punishing people for their sins. In this sense he has 'a band of angels of evil' (Ps 78:41), who may yet be called 'angels of the Lord' (2 K 19:16, Is 37:9), as carrying out His purposes. Michael evidently considered Zedekiah as used by God in order to entice Ahab to his merited doom. Ezekiel propounds a similar view (8:14), that a prophet may be deceived by God, and so made the means of his own destruction and of that of his dupes, much as David was moved to number Israel through the anger of the Lord against the people (2 S 24). As the conception of God developed and was purged, the permitted action of some evil spirit is substituted for the Divine activity, whether direct or through the agency of messengers, considered as themselves ethically good but capable of employment on any kind of service. Accordingly the term represents Satan as the instigator of David (1 Ch 21), Jeremiah denies the inspiration of lying prophets, and makes them entirely responsible for their own words and influence (23:19, 24:4); they are not used by God, and will be called to account. They speak out of their own heart, and are so far from executing God's justice or anger upon the wicked that He interposes to check them, and to protect men from being misled.

An evil spirit, then, is a destroyer in a personal sense in the earlier historical books of the OT, must be thought of simply as an angel or messenger of God, sent for the punishment of evil (cf. 1 S 19:21). His coming to a man was a sign that God's patience with him was approaching exhaustion, and a prelude of doom. Gradually the phrase was diverted from this use to denote a personal spirit, the 'demon' of the NT, essentially evil and working against God, though powerless to withdraw entirely from His rule.

EXCELLENCE, EXCELLENT. — These English words are used for a great variety of Heb. and Gr. expressions, a complete list of which will be found in Driver’s Daniel (Camb. Bible). The words (from Lat. excellent) 'to rise up out of,' 'surpass') formerly had the meaning of pre-eminence and pre-eminent, and were thus good equivalents for the Heb. and Gr. expressions. But since 111 they have become greatly weakened in force, and the meaning is to be regretted that they have been retained in RV in passages in which the real meaning is something so very different. The force of 'excellency' may be clearly seen by the margin of AV at Gn 4, where 'have the excellency' is suggested for 'be accepted' in the text; or the margin at Ec. 2, where instead of 'wisdom excelleth folly' is suggested 'there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly.' In Dn 1 36 it is said that 'in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king inquired of them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm; and this is summed up in the heading of the chapter in the words, 'their excellency in wisdom. The force of 'excellent,' again, may be seen from the table in Hamilton’s Catechism, Of the pre-eminent and excellent dignity of the Priesthood; or from Sir John Mandeville, Travels, p. 1, 'the Holy Land . . . passing all other lands, is the most worthy land, most excellent, and lady and sovereign of all other lands.'

EXCHANGE. — See MONEY-EXCHANGE.

EXCOMMUNICATION. — In the OT the sentence against those who refused to part with their 'strange' goods, which were not permitted to enter the land, was that they shall be cast out of the land and be himself separated — 'is the earliest instance of ecclesiastical excommunication. This was a milder form of the ancient Heb. chârêm, curse or ban, which in the case of man involved death (Lev. 20:9), destruction in the case of property. The horror of this curse or chârêm hangs over the OT (Mal 4, Zec 14). Anathema, the LXX equivalent of chârêm (e.g. in Dt 7, Jos 9, Nu 21), appears in 1 Co 12. 'If any love not the Lord, let him be anathema' (which refers, as does also Gal 1, to a permanent exclusion from the Church and doubtless from heaven), and in 1 Co 12. 'No one speaking in the Spirit of God says, Jesus is anathema,' i.e. a chârêm or cursed thing under the ban of God. Here there may be a reference to a Jewish brocad which afterwards gave rise to the Jewish tradition that Jesus is excommunicated by the Church. The forms said to be in vogue in His day were: (1) midâlâ, a short sentence of thirty days; (2) chârêm, which involved loss of all religious privileges for a considerable time; (3) shâmmâna, complete expulsion or excommunication into interdict. This last form, however, lacks attestation.

References in the NT to some form of Jewish procedure are: Jn 9:19 129 16, Lk 6:38. Mt 12:13-17 may be a reference to some Jewish procedure that was taken over by the Church. It mentions admonition: (1) private, (2) in the presence of two or three witnesses, (3) in the presence of the Church. The sentence "let him be to thee as he the heathen and the publican" involved loss of social and spiritual privileges (cf. Ti 3:9). 1 Co 5 shows a formal assembly met "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" to deliver one guilty of incest against Satan, for the destruction of the sinner. The purpose of the punishment was that the spirit man who is saved in the day of the Lord (v. 3) is remedial, and shows that the sentence is not a life one, as anathema seems to be (cf. 1 Ti 5:12, where Hymenaeus and Alexander are delivered to Satan, that they may be taught not to blaspheme). For the word "condemned," some versions used in 1 Co 5 give, suggests aro, which means both 'condemned' and 'prayer.' In this case, at all events, the curse was intended to lead to repentance and prayer. 2 Co 2:7 seems to refer to a different case. Here the curse or punishment was given by the 'majesty' without Paul's intervention, as in 1 Co 5; the purpose of his writing here is "that your (v.i. 'our') care for us (v.i. 'you') might be made manifest in the sight of God"; but there he writes for the man's sake; here the sinner is discussed with leniency, there the case is stated with due severity. If the case be a new one, it shows a great leniency on the Christian community, and also that the Corinthians had received a salutary lesson. The phrase 'lest an advantage should be gained over us by Satan' (2 Co 2:11) refers to the term of execution which St. Paul wished to end, that the punishment should defeat its end and lead to ruin instead of recovery, and so Satan should hold what it is only, metaphorically speaking, lent to him to hurt. In 2 Th 2:2, the Apostle ordains an informal and less severe excommunication of those who obey not his word. Its purpose, too, is remedial: 'that he may be ashamed.' St. John (2 Jn 13) orders a similar form, and 3 Jn 13 describes the manner in which Diotrephes withholds his grace from the brother, does not permit others to receive them, and casts them out of the Church—the first instance of one party in the Christian Church excommunicating another for difference of doctrine, and a different social or spiritual inter-course was intended to lead, in such cases, to recantation of opinions, as in others to repentance for sin.

EXILE.—See ISRAEL, I. 23.

EXODUS.—The book relates the history of Israel from the death of Joseph to the erection of the Tabernacle in the second year of the Exodus. In its present form, however, it is a harmony of three separate accounts.

1. The narrative of P. which can be most surely distinguished, is given first.

Beginning with a list of the sons of Israel (1:1-9), it briefly relates the oppression (17-18, 259-31), and describes the call of Moses, which takes place in Egypt, the revelation of the name Jehovah, and the appointment of Aaron (8-22). The plagues (7:11, 20a, 20b. 25-32. 53-48) are wrought by Aaron, forms of strength with Pharaoh's magicians. The last plague introduces directions for the Passover, the feast of unleavened bread, the sanctification of the firstborn, and the annual Passover (12-10). 22, 40-41).

The flight of Moses, the departure from the blood-sprinkling, but on the eating, which was the perpetual mark.

The route to the Red Sea (which gives occasion to a statement about the length of the exodus; 12600) is represented as deliberately chosen in order that Israel and Egypt may see each other pass over Pharaoh (14:21). When Moses stretches out his hand, the waters are miraculously divided and restored (144. 14a, 1510. 15b, 22. 21. 23).

Between the Red Sea and Sinai the names of some halting places are given (16:5-17 10 19b). Ch. 16 is also largely devoted to the Ten Commandments. The Tabernacle in v. 4 proves the story to belong to a later date than the stay at Sinai, since the Tabernacle was not in use there. Egypt. Probably no place has been brought into its present position by the editor.

On the arrival at Sinai, Jehovah's glory appears in a fiery cloud on the mountain. As no priests have been consecrated, and the people must not draw near, Moses ascends alone to receive the tables of the testimony (24:3-18). The story of Moses, Aaron, and the other Levites (16:1-20) is then told. Moses is called by the Lord to go down and stay with Israel (19:20). The Lord's answer to the promises of the people concerning theAaron (19:35) is then given (19:34-40). The covenant is made in the tabernacle (29-40). The covenant is then renewed in 31:1-13, and as executed, and the condition of the text in the XXX prove that these sections underwent alterations before reaching their present form.

This account was evidently written for men who were otherwise acquainted with the leading facts of the history. It is dominated by two leading interests: (1) to insist in its own way that everything which makes Israel a nation is due to Jehovah, so that the religion and the history are interwoven; (2) to give a history of the origins, especially of the ecclesiastical institutions, of Israel.

2. The narrative of JE.—The rest of the book is substantially from JE, but it is extremely difficult to distinguish J from E. For (1) with the revelation of the name of Jehovah, one of our criteria, the avoidance of this name by E disappears; (2) E appears to have been taken to weld the accounts of the law-giving together, and it is often difficult to decide how much is the work of the editor. We give the broad lines of the separation, but remark that in certain passages this must remain tentative.

A. Israel in Egypt.

According to J, the people are cattle-owners, living apart in Geecehese so rapidly as to be "a great nation" (Ex 1:11) to Joseph, the new Pharaoh (1:12). Moses, after receiving his revelation and commission in Midian (20:2), is called by Jehovah, and to defeat Pharaoh's (1:22-23a) demands attempts to bring "seven days' journey to sacrifice" (5:1-3). On Pharaoh's refusal, the plagues, which are natural calamities brought by Jehovah, and which are limited to Egypt, follow Moses' repeated announcement (7:10, 17, 12a. 18, 21a-4). In Pharaoh's heeds, demands that Israel be freed (5:14) in order to worship their God on this mountain—a greater distance than three days' journey (5:20). The plagues has survived merely in fragments, but from these it would appear that Moses speaks only once to Pharaoh, and the plagues follow the demand for his miraculous element is heightened (7:10, 17b, 20a. 21b-23). On Jahweh's Egyptian, the Israelites, however, have immunity except from the darkness. The Exodus is deliberate, since the people have time to borrow from their neighbors (11:2-12:49).

B. The Exodus.

According to J, an unarmed host is guided by the pillar of fire and cloud (13:18). Pharaoh pursues his slaves (14:6), and when the people are dismayed, Moses encourages them (14:14-15, 10b., 13b.). An east wind drives back the water, so that the Israelites are able to cross during the night (14:19, 15:20. 22b. 22a) 5:20-24). But the waters return to overwhelm the Egyptians. Israel offers thanks in a hymn of praise (15:19), but soon in the wilderness emorts Jehovah by murmuring for water (vv. 21-24). Then

According to E, an armed body march out in so leisurely a fashion that they are able to bring Joseph (13:18) with them. When Moses stretches out his hand, the waters are miraculously divided and restored (14:7. 14a, 15b. 15b, 22. 23). The Israelites, however, have immunity except from the darkness. The Exodus is deliberate, since the people have time to borrow from their neighbors (11:2-12:49).

account, make it likely that JE had very little or this stage, the account of which was amplified with material from the wilderness journey after Sinai. The accounts are exceptionally difficult to disentangle, and the results correspondingly tentative.

According to J, Jehovah descends on Sinai in the (19:16) and on Mount Marph, while the consecrated priests approach (v.19-22). Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and 70 elders are presented in a covenant feast (v.9-11). Moses then goes up alone to receive the Ten Words on tablets which he himself has hewn, and remaining 40 days and 40 nights receives also the Book of the Covenant (ch. 34) of Jehovah as to the 40 days has been omitted in favour of E's, but its presence in his account demands references in 34:10. Ch. 34 is also inserted at this point, because its present position is eminently unsuitable after the peremptory command to the people to remain (33:2-4). (Sinai). Jehovah is still in the ark which must already have been prepared.

J's law (ch. 34) is the outcome of the earliest effort to embody the essential observances of the JE law. All relevant feasts are agricultural festivals without the historical significance given them in Deuteronomy, and the observances are of a ceremonial character, for, according to J, it is the priests who are summoned to them. Certain parts have been frequently made (e.g. the Goethe suggested it) to prove that this is J's decalogue—a ceremonial decalogue. Any division into 10 laws, however, has always an artificial character.

According to E, Jehovah descends in a cloud before the whole people (19:11b), whom Moses therefore sanctifies (v.14-17). They hear Jehovah utter the Decalogue (4:5-10), and are afraid (4:11-12), the first revelation with its covenant is delivered to Moses alone (23:6-20b in part). The people, however, asent to its terms, and Moses ascend the mountain with Jehovah, receive the stone tables, on which Jehovah has inscribed the Decalogue (24:12-18a), and remains 40 days (v.18b) to receive further commands. He returns with the tablets (31:18), to discover and deal with the outbreak of idolatry (32:4-14). On his interception he receives a promise of angelic guidance (v.33-34). From verses in ch. 33 (4:4-4:11) which belong to E and from Dt 10:4-5 (based on E), this account related the making of an ark and Tent of Meeting, the latter adorned with the people's discarded ornaments. When JE was combined with P, this narrative, being superfluous alongside 25 ff., was omitted.

E's account thus consists of three of the four collections of laws found in Exodus, for 21–23 consists of two codes, a civil (21:1–22:33) and ceremonial (22:13–23:19) roughly). E's account of the ceremonial section was originally his counterpart to ch. 34 in J, while the civil section may have stood in connexion with ch. 18. As it now stands, E is the prophetic version of the law-giving. The basis of the Jehovah religion is the Decalogue with its clearly marked moral and spiritual character. (cf. art. Deuteronomy.) This is delivered not to the priests (like ch. 34 in J), but to the whole people. When, however, the people shrink back, Moses, the prophet intermediary, receives the further law from Jehovah. Yet the ceremonial and civil codes have a secondary place, and are parallel. The Decalogue, a common possession of the whole nation, with its appeal to the people's moral and religious sense, is fundamental in the national institutions, whether civil or ceremonial, are based. Civil and ceremonial laws have equal authority and equal value. As yet, however, the principles with which the Decalogue was originally connected are not brought into conscious connection with the codes which control and guide the national life. The Book of Deuteronomy proves how at a later date the effort was made to permeate the whole legislation with the spirit of the Decalogue, and to make this a means by which the national life was guided by the national faith.

The following view of the history of the codes is deserving of notice. E before its union with J contained three of these codes: the Decalogue as the basis of the Covenant; the Book of the Covenant, leading up to the renewal of the Covenant; and the Book of Judgments, which formed part of Moses' paring address on the plains of Moab. The editor who combined J and E, wishing to retain J's version of the Covenant, used (19:4, 10-12), 34:13-26, of Jehovah and E's Book of the Covenant, and united E's Book of the Covenant, and thus displaced, with the Decalogue as the basis of the first Exod. He then combined John's Book of Judgments with the Book of the Covenant.

The view represented in the article, however, explains the phenomena adequately, is much simpler, and requires fewer hypotheses. A. C. Wilck.

EXORCISM.—The word may be defined as denoting the action of expelling an evil spirit by the performance of certain rites, including almost always the invocation of a reputedly holy name. An anticipation of the later methods occurs in David's attempt to expel Saul's melancholia by means of music (1 S 16:17); and in the perception of the benediction of music may possibly radiate around the origin of the incantations that became a marked feature of the process. A more complicated method is prescribed by the angel Raphael (To 6:14, 89). In NT times the art had developed; professional exorcists had become numerous in some places, and others were adepts, and practiced as occasion demanded (Mt 12:27, Lk 11:19). An old division of the Babylonian religious literature (cf. Cuneif. Texts from Borsippa in Brit. Mus., pls. 70-72) contains many specimens of incantations; and the connexion of the Jews with that country, especially during the Exile, is an obvious explanation of the great extension both of the conception of the influence of evil spirits, and of the means adopted for their treatment. Exorcism was a recognized occupation and need in the Jewish life of the first century, as it became afterwards in certain sections of the Christian Church.

In the procedure and formulæ of exorcism, differences are traceable in the practice of the Jews, of Christ, and of His disciples. An illustration of the Jewish method may be found in Josephus (Ant. xxvi. ii. 5), who claims Solomon for its author, and describes a case that he had himself witnessed. Other instances occur in the papyri (e.g. Dieterich, Abroazae, 138ff), and in the Talmud (e.g. Berakhoth, Gia; Pesochim, 112b). The vital part of the procedure was the formation of a name or a series of names, of a deity or an angel, at the mention of which the evil spirit was supposed to recognize the presence of a superior power and to decline a attack. As both had been profaned by Satan, on the other hand, uses no spell, but in virtue of His own authority bids the evil spirits retire, and they render His slightest word unquestioning obedience. Sometimes He describes Himself as acting 'in the finger of God' (Lk 11:20) or 'by the Spirit of God' (Mt 12:28), and sometimes His will is indicated even without speech (Lk 12:15, 19); but the general method is a stern or peremptory command (Mt 9:8, Mk 1:28, Lk 8:42). He does not require any previous preparation on the part of the sufferer, though occasionally (Mk 17:12) He uses the incident to excite faith on the part of the relatives. His own personality, His mere presence on the scene, are enough to alarm the evil spirits and to put an end to their mischief. In the case of His disciples, the power to exorcise was given both before and after the Exorption (Mt 10:1-4, Mk 3:13-19, Lk 9:1), and was successfully exercised by them (Mk 6:5, Lk 10:17, Ac 10:1-22); but the authority was derived, and on that ground, if not by explicit command (cf. 'in my name,' Mk 16:17), the invocation of the name of Jesus was probably substituted for its direct command. This was clearly the course adopted by St. Paul (Ac 10:1–22), as by St. Peter and the Apostles generally in other miracles (Ac 3:14, 9, Ja 5:13). The name of Jesus was not recited as a spell, but appealed to as the source of all spiritual (="Jahweh strengthens"). I. The Man.
EZEKIEL

—Ezekiel was the son of Buzi, a priest of the family of Zadok, and was carried into exile with Jehoiachin (2 K 24:18). Josephus (Ant. x. 63) states that he was a boy at the time; but this is doubtful, as in the fifth year from then he was old enough to be called to the prophetic office (1:3). Ezekiel was of his youth as long past (44); in the ninth year his wife died (24:18); his acquaintance with the Temple is best explained by supposing that he had officiated there, and that in the predictions for the first time he remembered the inroad of n.c. 626. He and his fellow exiles formed an organized community, presided over by elders, at Tel-Abib, on the banks of the canal Chebar (31b).

Ezekiel lived in a house of his own (39), and, for at least 22 years (12 251), endeavoured to serve his people. His call was prefaced by an impressive vision of the Divine glory, and the expression, "the hand of J. was upon me" (1:4 202), implies that the revelations which he received came to him in a state of trance or ecstasy; cf. also 34 28 with 24th. His message met at first with contemptuous rejection (33), but the standing title, "a rebellious house," shows that he never achieved the result which he desired, and that there was something in his speech which pleased the ears of the captives, and brought them to his house for counsel (9 14 20 33-39); I do not doubt his character also commanded attention. His moral courage was impressive (34); he ever acted as 'a man under authority,' accepting an unpleasant commission and adhering to it in spite of speedy (34) and constant suffering (33 332); even officers of the bidding (217), and when his beloved wife dies he restrains his tears and resumes his teaching (2414). Part of his message was given in writing, but the spoken word is in evidence elsewhere (5). It is as though he remembered that he has said that he was 'pastor rather than prophet,' and this would not be far from the truth if it ran, 'pastor as well as prophet,' for he both watched over individual souls and shared the ills of the people. Again, he has been called 'a priest in prophet's garb,' for the sentiments and principles of the priesthood controlled his conduct (44), came out amidst the vigorous ethical teaching of chapters 33, 34, and gives its distinctive colouring to the programme unfolded at the close of the book. We know nothing of his later life. Clem. Alex. refers to the legend that he met Pythagoras and gave him instructions. Philo speaks 'on the floor' of the temple. Shaving the eyebrows was part of the purification of the leper (Lv 14:). 'Eye' is used in many figurative phrases: as the avenue of temptation (Gn 3, Job 31), of spiritual knowledge and blindness, as indicating feelings—pride (2 K 19:19), favour [especially God's Providence (Ps 32)], hostility (Ps 10). An evil eye implies envy (Mic 7:2; cf. 1 S 18:1, the only use of the verb in this sense in English) or niggardliness (Dt 15:19, 105, and probably Mt 6:23), where the single eye may mean 'liberality'; cf. Pr 29:4. In Gb 29:9, 209, covering of the eyes means 'forgetfulness of what has happened.' In Rev 311 eye-salve or collyrium is a Phrygian phial mentioned by Galen, for which the medical school at Laodicea seems to have been famous. (See Ramsay, Seven Churches.) The reference is to the restoring of spiritual vision.

EZEKIAH.

—1. (AV Eschias) 1 Es 9:4, called Hilkiak in Neh 8:1.

II. The Book.

1. Division and Contents.—Two halves are sharply differentiated: one in which other matter is in order and tone. The change synchronized with the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (244). Chs. 1—24 contain denunciations of sin and predictions of judgment; 25—48 are occupied with the hopes of the future. In the first division we distinguish: 1. The Introduction (1—39). 2. The first series of prophecies in act and word (35—7). 3. The details of the temple, (1—39). 4. Sins, reasons, stern threats (12—19). 5. The same subject, and the beginning of the end (30—4). In the second division: 1. The removal of hostile neighbours (20—39). 2. The moral requirements now to be met; the destruction of the last enemy (33—39). 3. A sketch of the community of the future (40—48). In both parts there is a scrupulous exactness of dating, exemplified in any earlier prophet. (1 2 245 26 29 17 30 31 32 31 33 40). Ezekiel's verdict on the national history is of unmixed severity. From their starting-point in Egypt the people had behaved ill (cf. 20:9-12 with Jer 2). Jerusalem—to him almost synonymous with the nation—was pagan in origin and character (10). The root of their wickedness was an invertebrate love of idolatry (passim). Even Jewish contemporaries could be held guilty. Their God could hold them back only by extreme violence (20:4-11). The exiles were somewhat less guilty than their brethren in Jerusalem (12:14). But, on the whole, princes, priests, and people were an abandoned race. They loved the worship of the high places, which, according to Ezekiel, had always been idolatrous and illegitimate. They ate flesh with the blood in it, disregarded the Sabbath, polluted the Temple with cereemonial and moral defilements, committed adultery and other sexual abominations, were guilty of murder, oppression, the exaction of usury, harshness to debtors.
EZEKIEL

The list can be paralleled from other Prophetic writings, but the stress is here laid on offenses against God.
And this is in accordance with the strong light in which Ezekiel always sees the Divine claims. The vision with which the whole opens points to His transcendent majesty, a repetition of the 'son of man,' the figure which is addressed 116 times, marks the gulf between the creature and his Maker. The most regrettable result of Israel's calamities is that they seem to suggest important loss of imaginative power in Jahweh's part to protect His own. The motive which has induced Him to spare them hitherto, and will, hereafter, ensure their restoration, is the desire to vindicate His own glory. In the ideal future the Temple shall be built at a proper distance from Jahweh's, and not even the prince shall ever pass through the gate which has been hallowed by the returning glory of the Lord. Hence it is natural that in his reconstruction of Israel are Ezekiel's work.
He will sprinkle clean water on them, give them a new heart, produce in them humility and self-loathing.
He will destroy their foes and bless their land with supernatural fertility. It was He who had sought amongst them in vain for one who might be their Saviour.
It was He who in His wrath had caused them to imololate their children in sacrifice. God is all in all. Yet the people have their part to play. Ezekiel protests against the traditional notion that the present generation were suffering for their ancestors' fault: to acquire in that is to deoden the sense of responsibility and destroy the springs of action. Here he joins hands with the prophet of the 21st., but I desire particularly to quarrel with the individual conscience. He pushes almost too far the truth that a change of conduct brings a change of fortune (32:14). But there is immense power in his saying that he would to this appropriate his appeal to the individual, and the tenderness of the appeal (18:23 = 33:9). Nowhere is Jahweh's longing for the deliverance of His people more pathetically expressed, and no sin which stands in the way of their being done, the bond of union is so close that He resents as a personal wrong the spitefulness of their neighbours (25-32. 35). The heathen, as such, have no future, although individual heathen settlers will share the common privileges (47:21).

The concluding chapters, 40-48, 'the weightiest in the book,' are a carefully elaborated sketch of the prophetic plan for the restoration of Israel—perhaps not as an ecclesiastical organization. In the foreground is the Temple and its services. Its position, surroundings, size, arrangements, are minutely detailed; even the place and number of the tables on which the victims must be slain are settled. The ordinances respecting the priesthood are precise; none but the Zadokites may officiate; priests who had ministered outside Jerusalem are reduced to the menial duties of the sanctuary (cf. Dt 18). Adequate provision is made for the maintenance of the legitimate priests.
Rules are laid down to ensure their ceremonial purity.

EZEL.—The spot where Jonathan arranged to meet David before the latter’s final departure from the court of Saul (1 S 20:4). The place is not mentioned elsewhere, and it is now generally admitted that the Heb. text of this passage is corrupt. The true reading seems to have been preserved by the LXX, according to which we should read in v.4, ‘yonder carm,’ and in v.5, ‘from beside the carm.’

EZEM (1 Ch 4 46).—See AZMON.

EZION-GEber, later called Berenice (Jos. Ant. viii. 6 4).—A port on the Red Sea (on the Gulf of Akabah) used by Solomon for his commerce (1 K 9:26). Here also the Israelites encamped (Nu 33:8, Dt 29).

EZNITE.—See ADMO.

EZORA.—The sons of Ezora, in 1 Es 9:4, take the place of the strange name Machnadebai (or Machnadeba, A V m) in Ezr 10:4 where there is no indication of a fresh family.

EZRA (perhaps an abbreviation of Azorath = ‘Jahweh helps’). 1. A Jewish exile in Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes r. Longimanus (b.c. 464-424), who, played, as is well known, a prominent part in Jerusalem during the first reform associated with the governorship of Nehemiah. Our sources of information regarding him are (1) the autobiographical narratives embodied in Ezr 7-10, and Neh 8:10-12; and (2) later tradition as embodied in the narrative of the compiler of Ezr.-Neh., and the accounts in the apocryphal books.

According to Ezr 7:1-6, Ezra was of priestly descent, and in fact a member of the high-priestly family (a ‘Zadokite’). But the Biblical tradition is silent as to his fathers, as this Semiah had been executed by Nebuchadnezzar in b.c. 556 (133 years before Ezra’s appearance. The genealogy may only intend to assert that Ezra belonged to the high-priestly family (cf. also 1 Es 9:4). But his priestly descent has been called in question. His work and achievements rather suggest the character of the ‘scribe’ (σπήτηρ) par excellence.* In the apocalyptic work known as 2 (4) Ezra as he is represented as a ‘prophet’ (2 Es 11).

In order to form a just estimate of Ezra’s work and aims, we must picture him as a diligent student of the Law. He doubtless stood at the head—or, at any rate, was a leading figure—of a new order which had grown up in the Exile among the Jews of the ‘Golah’ or captivity in Babylonia. Among these exiles great literary activity apparently prevailed during the later years of the Exile and onwards. The so-called ‘Priestly Code’—which must be regarded as the work of a whole school of writers—was formed, or at least the principal part of it, probably between the closing years of the Exile and the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem (c. 556-548), and was doubtless the ‘law of God’ which Ezra brought with him to Jerusalem. The centre of Jewish culture, wealth, and leisure was at this time—and for some time continued to be—the Persian capital, where external circumstances had become (since the Persian supremacy) comparatively favourable for the Jews. In this respect the position of the Jerusalem community, during these years, afforded a painful contrast. The tiny community in Judah had to wage as a whole a long and sordid struggle against poverty and adverse surroundings. Its religious condition was much inferior to that of the ‘Golah.’ Moved by religious zeal, also, it would be difficult to state its-like view of making Jerusalem once more the real spiritual metropolis of Judaism, Ezra conceived the idea of infusing new life and new ideals into the Jewish community, by building a fresh hand of gold. The true reading seems to have been preserved by the LXX, according to which we should read in v.4, ‘yonder carm,’ and in v.5, ‘from beside the carm.’
of Chronicles. The entire work—Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah—is a compilation made by the Chronicler. See, further, NEHEMIAH [Book 9], § 1.

1. Analysis of the book.—The Book of Ezra falls into two main divisions: (a) chs. 1-6; i.e. chs. 7-10.

(a) Chs. 1-6 give an account of the Return and the re-building of the Temple. Ch. 1 tells how Cyrus, after the capture of Babylon by n.c. 538, issued an edict permitting the people to return; of the latter, however, neither Haggai nor Zechariah mentions. Ch. 2 is a history of the formation of the Persian administration and the laying of the foundation-stone of the Temple (May 536), and the work of re-building begun. Ch. 3 tells that, owing to the unfriendly action of neighboring populations, the building of the Temple was suspended during the rest of the reign of Cyrus and Cambyses. It contains the correspondence between Rehum, Shinarith, and their companions, and king Artaxerxes I. In 529-528 we are informed that, as a consequence of the earnest exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the building of the Temple was re-commenced in the second year of Artaxerxes II. (n.c. 520). In 520-516 we have the correspondence between the satrap Tattenai and Darius. We read in 520-516 of how the Temple was successfully completed on the 3rd March 516 n.c. I (An interval of silence, lasting nearly sixty years, ensued, of which there seems to be little or no record elsewhere.)

(b) Chs. 7-10 deal with Ezra's personal work. In ch. 7 the story of nearly sixty years broken in the year n.c. 458, when Ezra, the teacher of the Law, at the head of a fresh band of exiles, leaves Babylonia bearing a commission from Artaxerxes I. to bring about a settlement of the religious condition of the Jewish community: Ch. 8 gives a list of the heads of families who journeyed with him, and tells of their arrival in Jerusalem. Ch. 9 describes the proceedings against the foreign wives, and contains Ezra's penitential prayer. In ch. 10 we read that an assembly of the whole people, in December 458, appointed a commission to deal with the mixed marriages. The narrative abruptly breaks off with an enumeration of the men who had married strange women.

2. Sources of the book.—In its present form the Book of Ezra-Nehemiah is, as has been pointed out, the work of the Chronicler. The compilation, however, embraces older material. The most important parts of this latter are undoubtedly the autobiographical sections, which have been taken partly from Ezra's, partly from Nehemiah's, personal memora.

(a) Extracts from Ezra's memoirs embodied in the Book of Ezra.—The long passage Ezr 7:26-9:50 (except 8:9, 10) is generally admitted to be an authentic extract from Ezra's memoirs. The abrupt break which takes place at v. 50 must be due to a compiler. The events of the next thirteen years were clearly of too dismal a character to make it desirable to perpetuate the memory of them' (Cornill). It is probable that an even larger excerpt from these memoirs is to be seen in Neh 9:2-19 (4).

It seems probable that these memoirs were not used by the Chronicler in their original form, but in a form adapted and arranged by a later hand, to which Ezr 10 is due. This latter narrative is of first-rate importance and rests upon extremely good information. It was probably written by the same hand that composed the main part of Neh 8-10 (see NEHEMIAH [Book 9], § 2).

The Imperial firmament—an Aramaic document (7-29)—the essential authenticity of which has now been made certain—is an extract from the memoirs preserved in the same compiler's work, from which Ezr 2 (Neh 7-10) was also derived. The introductory verses (7-14) are apparently the work of the Chronicler.

(b) Other sources of the book.—The other most important source used by the Chronicler was an Aramaic one, written, perhaps, about n.c. 450, which contained a history of the building of the Temple, the city walls, etc., and cited original documents. From this authority come Ezr 4:22-6:18 (cited verbally). The Chronicler, however, partly misunderstood his Aramaic source. He has misconceived 4, and assigned a false position to the document embodied in 4:3.

(c) Passages written by the Chronicler.—The following passages bear clear marks of being the actual composition of the Chronicler: Ezr 1. 3-4. 4:21-22. 4:22-24. 4:21-24. 4:21-24. 4:21-24.

3. Separation of Ezra from Chronicles.—It would appear that after the great work of the Chronicler had been completed (1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah), the part which contained narratives of otherwise unrecorded events was first received into the Canon. Hence, in the Jewish Canon, Ezra-Nehemiah precedes the Books of Chronicles. In the process of separation certain verses are repeated (Ezr 1:7-9 = 2 Ch 36:1-3). v. 3 seems to have been added in 2 Ch 36 to avoid a disjunct ending (v. 33).

For the historical value of the book cf. what is said under NEHEMIAH [Book 9], § 3. G. H. BOX.

Ezrah.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4:7).

Ezrachite.—A name given to Heman in the title of Ps 89, and to Ethan (wh. see) in Ps 89. It is used of Ethan also in 1 K 4:5.

Ezri.—David's superintendent of agriculture (1 Ch 27:9).

Ezrill.—1 Es 9:4 = Azarel, 4 (Ezr 10:9).

FABLE.—For the definition of a fable, as distinct from parable, allegory, etc., see Trench, Parables, p. 2 ff. Its main feature is the introduction of beasts or plants as speaking and reasoning, and its object is moral instruction. As it moves on grounds common to man and lower creatures, its teaching can never rise to a high spiritual level. Worldly prudence in some form is its usual note, or it attacks human folly and frailty, sometimes in a spirit of bitter irony. Hence it has only a small place in the Bible. See PARABLE.

1. In OT.—There are two fables in the OT, though the word is not used; it is perhaps significant that neither is in any sense a message from God. (1) Jonah and the fable of the trees choosing their king illustrates the folly of the men of Shechem (Jg 9:4). (2) Jehoshaphat's fable of the thistle and the cedar (2 K 14:9) is his rebuke of Amaziah's presumption—a rebuke in itself full of haughty contempt, however well grounded. Ezek 17:11-14 is not a fable but an allegory. In Bar 38 the 'authors of fables' occurs in the list of wise men of the earth who have not yet found Wisdom. Sir 13:17 would seem to be a reference to Esop's fables; so Mt 13:17. This type of literature was freely used by later Jewish teachers, and Esop's and other fables are frequently found in the Talmud.

2. In NT.—'Fable' occurs in a different sense. It is used to translate the Gr. 'myth,' which has lost its better sense as an allegorical vehicle for truth, whether growing naturally or deliberately invented, as in Plato's Republic, and has come to mean a deluding fiction of a more or less extravagant character. The 'cunningly devised fables' of 2 Pet 1:14 are apparently attempts to allegorize the Gospel story, and the belief in the Second Advent. The word occurs four times in the Pastoral Epistles, with a more definite reference to a type of teaching current, and in many places at Ephesus and in Crete. These fables are connected with 'endless genealogies which minister questionings' (1 Ti 1:4); they are described as 'profane and old wives' fables' (4:4), and contrasted with 'alleged sacred' ones (2 Ti 4:4). They are 'Jewish,' 'the commandments of men' (Tit 1:14), and the 'genealogies' are connected with 'fightings about law' (3:8). The exact nature of the teaching referred to is disputed, but the following points are fairly established.

(a) The references do not point to 2nd century Gnosticism, which was strongly anti-Jewish, but to an earlier and less developed form, such as is necessarily implied in the more elaborate systems. The heresies combated are not indication of the late date of these Epistles.
(b) The heresy may be called Gnostic by anticipation, and apparently arose from a mixture of Oriental and Jewish elements (perhaps Essenes). Its views on the sinfulness of matter led on the one hand to an extreme asceticism (1 Ti 4:4), on the other to unbridled licence (Tit 1:13-14).
(c) There is much evidence connecting this type of teaching with Asa Minor—Gal. Rev., Ignatian Epistles, and the career of Cerinthus. Ramous points out that Phrygia was a favourable soil, the Jews there being particularly lax. (d) The fables may be specially the speculations about events among the creation of angels, and intermediaries, which are characteristic of all forms of Gnosticism; the passages are so applied by 2nd cent. Fathers. But we are also reminded of the narratives of the OT, which were so popular with the Jewish Rabbis. Semi-Christian teachers may have borrowed their methods, and the word 'myth' would be specially applicable to the product.

FAITH

is used freely of animals, as well as of men; also of the surface of the wilderness (Ex 10:10), of the earth, of the waters or deep, of the sky. It is used of the faith of a house (Ezk 41:14), of a throne (Job 26:14), of a throne (Job 26:14). Covering the face in 2 S 19:12 is a sign of mourning (cf. covering the head); it is also a mark of reverence (Ex 34:1, 1 K 19:4, Is 6:1). In Gn 24:26 it means literally 'to bow down.' Otherwise it is used of blindfolding, literal (Mt 14:25), or metaphorical (Job 9:25). To fall on the face is the customary Eastern obeisance, whether to man or to God. Spitting in the face is the climax of contempt (Nu 12:14, Dt 25:3, Mt 26:31). The Oriental will say, 'I spit in your face,' while he actually spits on the ground. The face naturally expresses various emotions,—grief, sorrow, shame, or joy. The 'fallen face' (Gn 4:4) is used of displeasure; 'hardening the face' of obstinate sin (Pr 21:22, Jer 5:15). The face was 'disfigured' in fasting (Mt 9:4). It may be the expression of favour, particularly of God to man (Nu 6:25, Ps 90:2), or Conversely of man turning his face to God (Jer 29:23); or of disfavour, as in the phrase 'to set the face against' (Ps 34:6, Jer 21:13, and often in Ezk.), or 'to hide the face.' [V. B. In Ps 51:12 the phrase is used differently, meaning to forget or ignore, cf. Ps 90:4]. Closely related are the usages connected with the phrase 'to set the face against' (Ps 34:6, Jer 21:13, Ezk 22:8), and often in apocalyptic literature). So to look upon the face is to accept (Ps 84:6), 'to turn away the face' is to reject (Ps 132:9, 1 K 2:28 RVm). To 'behold the face of' God may be used either literally of appearing before His presence in the sanctuary or elsewhere (Gn 3:8 [Peniel is 'the face of God'], Ex 33:1, Ps 42; the 'shewbread' is 'the bread of the face or presence'), or with a more spiritual reference to the inward reality of communion which lies behind (Ps 17:18); so 'seeking the face' of God (Ps 27:4). On the other hand, in 2 K 14:18, 'see face to face' is used in a minister sense of meeting in battle.

The Heb, word for 'face' is used very freely, both adjectivally and in many passages, as an idiomatic periphrasis, e.g. 'honour the face of the old man' (Lv 19:2), 'grind the face of the poor' (Is 3:4), or the common phrase 'before my face' (Dt 8:6, Mk 1:2); so in the phrase 'respect persons' (Dt 17:17).

hand, 'face' is wrongly given for 'eye' in AV of 1 K 20:4, 44, where 'ashes on face' should be 'headband over eye,' in 2 K 9:2, Jer 4:5, the reference is to painting of a noble pedigree; coming from the Latin fides, through Norman-French, it connotes the sense of personal honour and of the mutual loyalty attaching to the pledged word.

1. In OT—This word, the normal NT expression for the religious bond, is found but twice in the OT (EV)—in Dt 29:6, signifying steadfastness, fidelity; and in Hab 2:14, where a slightly different noun from the same Heb. stem (contained in amen and denotes the what is firm, reliable), may carry a meaning identical with the above—the just shall live by his faithfulness' (RVm).

The original term has no other sense than 'faithfulness' or 'truth' elsewhere—so in Ps 37:8 (Rev), 96:1, Dt 29:4 'nostri.'

A. J. MACLEAN

Noun for believe, having in early Eng. ousted 'belief' (wh. see) from its ethical uses. By this sevence of noun and vb. (so in Lat. fides—credere, French foi—croire) Eng. suffers in comparison with German (Glaube—glauben) and Greek (πίστις—πιστεύειν). Its development was from a noble pedigree; coming from the Latin fides, through Norman-French, it connotes the sense of personal honour and of the mutual loyalty attaching to the pledged word.

In the NT—This word, the normal NT expression for the religious bond, is found but twice in the OT (EV)—in Dt 29:6, signifying steadfastness, fidelity; and in Hab 2:14, where a slightly different noun from the same Heb. stem (contained in amen and denotes the what is firm, reliable), may carry a meaning identical with the above—the just shall live by his faithfulness' (RVm).

The original term has no other sense than 'faithfulness' or 'truth' elsewhere—so in Ps 37:8 (Rev), 96:1, Dt 29:4 'nostri.'

The corresponding vb. (from the root amen; in active and passive, to rely on, and to have reliance or be reliable) occurs above 20 times with God, His character, word, or messengers, for object. More than half these examples (in Ex., Dt., Ps.) refer to faith or unbelief in the mission of Moses and Jehovah's redemptive acts at the foundation of the national Covenant. The same vb. supplies two of Isahai's watchwords, in 7? and 29:14. The former sentence is an untranslatable epigram—'If you will not hold fast, you shall have no holdfast!', 'No fealty, no safety!'; the latter leads us into the heart of OT faith, the collective trust of Israel in Jehovah as her Rock of foundations, salvation, which, as Isaiah declared (in 8:15-16), must serve also for a stone of stumbling and rock of offence' to the unfaithful. This combination of passages is twice made in the NT (Ro 10:17 and 1 P 2:4-6), since the new house of God built of Christian believers rests on the foundation laid in Zion, viz. the character and promise of the Immutable, to whom now as then faith securely binds his people. In Hab 2:14 (cited Ac 13:18) Israel's unbelief in threatened judgment, in Is 53 (Jn 12:18, Ro 10:14) her unbelief in the promised salvation, coming through Jehovah’s humiliated Servant, are charged upon her as a fatal blindness. Thus the cardinal import of faith is marked at salient points of Israelite history, which NT interpreters seized with a sure instinct. As the head of the OT, sayings stand on Gal 15", the text on which St. Paul founded his doctrine of justification by faith (see Ro 4 5, 27; Gal 3:26; also Ja 2:21); and Abraham believed Jehovah, and he counted it ‘the righteousness of Divine things’ (Heb 11:6)—a crucial parenthesis in Jewish controversy. St. Paul recognized in Abraham the exemplar of personal religion, antedating the legal system—the faith of the man who stands in direct heart relationship to God: 'The faith of Abraham was his children (Gal 3:6). Only here, however, and in Hab 2, along with two or three passages in the Psalms (27:1 110)—quoted 2 Co 4:9, and possibly 119, does faith (πίστις or (believe)) assume the personal value which is of its essence in the NT. The difference is expressed between the OT and NT in this respect discloses a deep-lying difference of religious experience. The national redemption of Israel (from Egypt) lay entirely on the plane of history, and was therefore to be observed; whereas the salvation of our Lord, while equally historical, belong to the spiritual and eternal, and are to be ‘believed.’ Under the Old Covenant the people formed the religious unit; the relation to the individual was that of Jehovah to Israelite: mediated through the sacred institutions, and the Law demanded outward obedience rather than inner faith—hearing the voice of Jehovah, ‘keeping his statutes,’ ‘watching in his way’; so (in the language of Gal 3:6) the age of faith was not yet. Besides this, the Israelite revelation was consciously defective and preparatory, the ‘law made nothing perfect’; when St. Paul would express how 'in the old covenant they were in a word what was most precious to himself and them, he speaks not of ‘the faith’ but ‘the hope of Israel’ (Ac 23:5 etc.), and the writer of He 11 defines the faith of his OT heroes as ‘the assurance of things hoped for’; according, Hebrew terms giving to faith the aspect of expectation—trusting, waiting, looking for Jehovah—are much commoner than those containing the word ‘believe.’ Again, the fact that oppression and suffering entered so largely into the life of OT believers has coloured their confessions in psalm and prophecy; instead of believing in Jehovah, they speak of cleaving to Him, taking refuge under His wings, making Him a shield, a song, etc. In all this the liveliness of Eastern sentiment and imagination comes into play; while faith seldom figures under the bare abstract term, it is to be recognized in manifold concrete action and in dress of varied hues. Under the Old Covenant, as under the New, faith ‘wrought by love’ (Dt 6:9, Ps 110 etc., Lv 19:4 etc.), while it inspired hope.

2. In NT. The NT use of pistis, πίστις, is based on that of common Greek, where persuasion is the radical idea of the word. From this spring two principal notions, meeting in the NT conception: (a) the ethical notion of confidence, trust in a person, his word, promise, etc., and then mutual trust, or the expression thereof in trust or pledge—a usage with only a casual religious application in non-Biblical Greek; and (b) the intellectual notion of conviction, belief (in distinction from knowledge), covering all the shades of meaning from practical assurance down to conjecture, but always connoting sincerity, a belief held in good faith. The use of faith’ in Mt 23:27 belongs to OT phraseology (see Dt 32:32, quoted above); also in Ro 9:30, Gal 6:15, and similarly to men’s good faith, fidelity (RV “faithfulness”), as often in classical Greek. In sense (b) pistis came into the language of theology, the gods being referred (e.g. by Platarch as a religious philosopher) to the province of faith, since they are beyond the reach of sense-perception and logical demonstration.

(1) In this way faith came to signify the religious faculty in the broadest sense—a generalization foreign to the OT. Philo Judaeus, the philosopher of Judaism, thus employs the subject phrase of “faith” (πίστις) for the embodiment of faith so understood, viewing it as the crown of human character, ‘the queen of the virtues;’ for faith is, with Philo, a steady intuition, being the preeminent, in fact, the highest knowledge, the consummation of reason. This large Hellenistic meaning is conspicuous in He 11:1, 6 etc., and appears in St. Paul (2 Co 4:13, by faith not by sight) and the New Testament elsewhere as a way of distinctly Christian about faith understood in the bare signification of seeing the invisible—‘the demons believe, and shudder;’ the belief that contains no more is the ‘dead faith,’ which condemns instead of justifying (Ja 2:14-26). As James and St. Paul both saw from different standpoints, Abraham, beyond the ‘belief that God is,’ recognized what God is and yielded Him a loyal trust, which carried the whole man with it and determined character and action; his faith included sense (a) of pistes (which lies in the Heb. vb. ‘believe’) along with (b). In this combination lies the rich and powerful import of NT ‘believing;’ it is a spiritual and personal adherence joined with the spiritual notion of truth in, and the plighting of truth with, the Unseen; in this twofold sense, with the heart (the entire inner self) man believeth unto righteousness’ (Ro 10:10). Those persuaded by the promises of God could not use the word pistis in relation to God without attaching to it, besides the rational idea of supernatural apprehension, the warmer consciousness of moral trust and fidelity native to human nature.

(2) Contact with Jesus Christ gave to the word a greatly increased use and heightened potency. ‘Believing’ meant to Christ’s disciples more than hitherto, for ‘they that believe’ became a standing name for the followers of Christ (Ac 2:47, Ro 10:4, 1 Co 14:2, Mk 16:20). A special endowment of this power given to some in the Church, was to be intended by the ‘faith’ of 1 Co 12 (cf. Mt 17:21, Lk 17:1). Faith was our Lord’s chief and incessant demand from men; He preaches, He works ‘powers,’ to elicit and direct it—‘the miracle-faith’ attracted by ‘signs and wonders’ being a stepping-stone to faith in God, the person and doctrine of God’s Messenger. The bodily cures and spiritual blessings Jesus distributes are conditioned upon this one thing—‘Only believe!’ All things are possible to him that believeth. There was a faith in Jesus, real so far as it went but not sufficient for true discipleship, since it attached itself to His power and failed to recognize His character and spiritual aims (see Jn 2:23; 4:50; 7:14; 8:31, 14; 15:13), which Jesus rejected and affronted; akin to this, in a more active sense, is the faith that ‘calls’ Him ‘Lord’ and ‘removes mountains’ in His name, but does not in love do the Father’s will, which He must disorder (Mt 7:22, 1 Co 13). Following the Baptist, Jesus sets out with the summons, ‘Repent, and believe the good news’ that ‘the kingdom of God is at hand’ (Mk 1:15); like Moses, He expects His followers to recognize His mission as from God, showing ‘signs’ to prove this (see Jn 20:30; 3:4 etc.; cf. Ac 2:2, He 4:1). As His teaching advanced, it appeared that He required an unparalleled faith in Himself along with His message, that the Kingdom of God He speaks of centres in Him; in His Person, in fact He is ‘the word’ of God He brings, He is the light and life whose coming He announces, ‘the bread from heaven’ that He has to give to a famished world (Jn 6:35, 8:11, 14 etc.). For those who received Him, who ‘believed on His name’ in this complete sense, faith acquired a scope undreamed of before; it signified the unique attachment which gathered round the Person.
of Jesus—a human trust, in its purity and intensity such as no other man had ever elicited, which grew up into and identified itself with his predecessor's belief in God, transforming the latter in doing so, and which drew the whole being of the believer into the will and life of his Master. When Thomas hails Jesus as 'My Lord and my God' (Jn 20:28), the 'Aze believed,' this process is complete in the mind of the lowest disciple; the two faiths are now welded inseparably; the Son is known through the Father, and the Father through the Son, and Thomas gives evidence to both in one. As Jesus exalted God in the same degree became nearer to these men, and their faith in God became richer in contents and firmer in grasp. So sure and direct was the communion with the Father opened by Jesus to His brethren, that the word 'faith,' as commonly used, failed to express it: 'Henceforth ye know (the Father), and have seen him,' said Jesus (Jn 14:7); and St. John, using the vb. 'believe' more than any one, employs the noun 'faith' throughout, and the word 'faith' is commonly supported and broken by itself with all materialistic Messianism. As Jesus 'goes to the Father,' they realize that He and the Father 'are one'; their faith rests no longer, in any degree, on a Creator who is the Father and first. They are ready to receive, to work in the power of the Spirit whom He sends to them from 'the Father.' Jesus is henceforth identified with the spiritual and eternal order; to the faith which thus acknowledged Him He gives the promise, 'Believe that are they that have not seen, and yet have believed' (Jn 20:29; cf. 1 P 1:10). To define this specific faith a new grammatical construction appears in NT Greek: one does not simply believe Jesus, or believe on Him, believe into Him, or believe in Him, but one believes into Him, or His Name (which conveys the import of His person and offices)—so in Mt 18:18, and continually in Jn. (21. 22. 315 a. 24 19. 2 3711. 981131. 12911. 141115. 175 et al.; also in Paul)—which signifies so believing in Him as to rest in Him realizing what He is. By a variety of prepositional constructions, the Greek tongue, imperfectly followed in such refinements by our own, strives to represent the variety of attitudes and bearing in which faith stands towards its Object. That the mission of Jesus Christ was an appeal for faith, with His own Person as its chief ground and matter, is strikingly stated in Jn 3:16: 'For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' This is an instance among many of the perfect economy of the NT; the whole is constructed on the basis and condition that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life in his name.' Christian faith is the decisive action of the whole inner man—understanding, believing, willing, it is the trustful and self-surrendering acknowledgment of God in Christ. (3) Further, Jesus called on the world to believe the good news' of His coming for redemption. This task, which was fulfilled and laid on Him (Lk 24:47; Acts 1:1), was continued throughout the OT prophecy, and was laid on Him (Lk 24:7, Acts 1:4). The words of Mt 28:18, which must be vindicated as original, make it clear that Jesus regarded His death as the culmination of His mission; at the Last Supper He is ready to offer His 'blood' to seal 'the new covenant' under which 'forgiveness of sins' is universally guaranteed (cf. Jer 31:31, Hab 2:14). Having concentrated on Himself' the faith of men, giving to faith thereby a new heart and energy, He finally fastens that faith upon His death; He marks this event for the future as the object of the specifically saving faith. By this path, the risen Lord explained, He had 'entered into his glory' and 'received from the Father the promise of the Spirit,' in the strength of which His servants are commissioned (cf. Acts 1:8) to convey all the nations repentance and remission of sins' (Lk 24:47; 18:45, 48:10. Taught by Him, the Apostles understood and proclaimed their Master's death as the hinge of the relations between God and man that fortnight in Christ; believing In Him meant, above all, believing in that, and finding in this the core of the claims of deliverance from sin and the revelation of God's saving purpose toward the race (Ac 3:14; 20:19, 1 Co 11:18, 2 Co 5:21, 1 P 3:18, Rev 19:11). In the resurrection of Jesus was logically antecedent to faith in His sacrificial death; for His rising from the dead set His dying in its true light (Ac 4:10-12), revealing the shameful crucifixion of Israel's Messiah as a glorious expiation for the guilt of mankind (He 2, Ro 1:4, 1 P 3:18). To the belief of one's mouth Jesus as Lord, and believe in one's heart that God raised him from the dead; was therefore to fulfill the essential conditions of the Christian salvation (Ro 10:9), since the 'Faith' of the experimental, including the ascension which completes it, gives assurance of the peace with God won by His accepted sacrifice (He 7). Henceforth the one whose sins were forgiven was given a new life (Lk 5:24-32), 10:5-6); it vindicates His Divine Sonship and verifies His claims to us in that Christ died for us: 1 P 1:18); it guarantees the redemption of the body, and the attainment, both for the individual and for the Church, of the glory of the Messiah's Kingdom, the consummated salvation (1 Co 15:24, Ro 8:17, 18, Eph 1:20, 21, Rev 11); it intimates that Paul was the chief exponent and defender of this 'word of the cross,' which is at the same time the 'word of faith' (Ro 10); its various aspects and issues appear under the terms Jesus, of the kingdom, of grace, Law (in NT), etc. But St. Peter in his 1st Ep., St. John in his 1st Ep. and Rev., and the writer of Hebrews, each in his own fashion, combine with St. Paul to focus the redeeming work of Jesus in the cross. According to the whole NT, faith in the grace and power of God there meets mankind in its sin; and faith is the hand reached out to accept God's gift of mercy offered from the cross of Christ. The faculty of faith, which we understood to be that of the spiritual sense, the consciousness of God, is in no wise narrowed or diverted when it fixes itself on 'Jesus Christ, and him crucified'; for, as St. Paul insists, 'God commended his own love to us in that Christ died for us, God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.' 'The glory of God' shines into men's hearts, its true character becomes for the first time apparent, and calls forth a full and satisfied faith, when beheld 'in the face of Christ' (Ro 5, 2 Co 5:17-21). FAITHLESS.—Wherever this word occurs in AV, it means, not untrustworthy, but unbelieving, just as in the Merovingian's Shylock is called 'a faithless Jew,' simply because he was an unbeliever in Christ.

FAIRY.—RV tr. of 'apayla, Lv 11:14, Dt 14:3 (AV 'kite'), Job 28:9 (AV 'vulture'). See KITE, VULTURE.

FALL.—The story of the Fall in Gn 3 is the immediate sequel to the account of man's creation (1 Co 15:14); the Jahwistic document opens (see CREATOR). It tells how the first man and woman, living in childlike innocence and happiness in the Garden of Eden, were tempted by the subile serpent to doubt the goodness of their Creator, to believe in an absolute evil, to eat the fruit of the tree of which they had been expressly charged not to eat. Their transgression was speedily followed by detection and punishment; on the serpent was laid the curse of perpetual enmity between it and mankind; the woman was doomed to the pains of child-bearing; and the man to unceasing toil in the cultivation of the ground, which was cursed on account of his transgression. In the resurrection of Jesus the man should use his newly-acquired insight to seek the boon of immortality by partaking of the tree of life, he was expelled from the garden, which appears to be conceived as still existing, though barred to human approach by the cherubim and the flaming sword.

It is right to point out that certain incongruities of representation and context that two slightly varying narratives have been combined in the source from which the passage is taken (3). The chief difficulty arises in connection with the two trees on which the destiny of mankind is made to turn. In 25 the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil grow together in the midst of the garden; in 26 the second alone is made the test of man's obedience. But ch. 3 (down to v. 25) knows of only one central tree, and that choice of thoughts (if we may call it such) of the tree of knowledge. The tree of life plays no real part in the story except in 32:3; and its introduction there creates embarrassment; for if this tree also was forbidden, the writer's silence regarding the prohibition is inexplicable, and if it was not forbidden, can we suppose that the Divine prerogative of immortalitypolytheism, and retaining only faint traces of what was its original mythological character, formed the material setting which was adopted by the [Biblical] narrator for the purpose of exhibiting, under a striking and vivid and imaginative form, the deep spiritual truth which he was inspired to discern (Driver). These spiritual truths, in which the real signification of the narrative lies, we must endeavour very briefly to interpret.

(1) The story offers, on the face of it, an explanation of the outstanding ill that flesh is heir to: the hard, toilsome lot of the husbandman, the travail of the woman and her subjection to man, the universal fate of death. These evils, it is taught, are inconsistent with the ideal of human life, and contrary to the intention of a good God. Man, as originally created, was exempt from them; and to the question, Whence came they? the answer is that they are the effect of a Divine curse to which the race is subject; though it is to be noted that no curse is pronounced on the first pair, but only on the serpent as the organ of temptation, and the ground which is cursed for man's sake.

(2) The consequences of the curse are the penalty of a single sin, by which man incurred the just anger of God. The author's conception of sin may be considered from two points of view. Formally, it is the transgression of a Divine commandment, involving distrust of the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty, and breaking the harmony which had subsisted between man and his Maker. The process by which these thoughts are insinuated into the mind of the woman is described with a masterly insight into the psychology of temptation which is unsurpassed in literature. But it is a mistake to suppose that the essence of the sin consists in the merely formal disobedience to a command arbitrarily imposed as a test of fidelity. There was a reason for the Divine injunction, and a reason for man's transgression of it; and the reasons are unambiguously indicated. To eat of the tree would make man like God, knowing good and evil; and God does not wish man to be like Himself. The essence of the sin is therefore presumption—an overstepping of the limits of childhood, and an encroachment on the prerogatives of Deity.

(3) What, then, is meant by the 'knowledge of good and evil,' which was acquired by eating of the tree? Does it mean simply an enlargement of experience such as the transition from childhood to maturity naturally brings with it, and of which the feeling of shame (3?) is the significant index? Or is it, as has generally been held, the experimental knowledge of moral distinctions, the discovery of the moral sense; and the fact that neither of the ways in which the newly acquired faculty manifests itself (the perception of sex, and insight into the mystic virtue of the tree of life, v. 25) is in the narrative itself the least likely to be an expression of a Godlike civilization. The idea may be that succinctly expressed by the writer of Ecclesiastes: 'God made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions' (Ecc 7:29).

(4) One specific feature of the story remains to be considered, namely, the rôle assigned to the serpent, and his character. The Identification of the serpent with the devil appears first in the Apocryphal literature (Wis 2:26), in the narrative itself it is simply the most sublime of the creatures that God has made (31), and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that he is there regarded as the mouthpiece of the evil spirit. At the same time the archfiend is the soul of moral evil than had been attained in the time of the writer, to that identification of the serpent with the Evil One which we find in the NT (Ro 16:14, Rev 12:9, 20). In the same way, and with the same justification, the reflexion of later ages read into the curse on the serpent (v. 14) the promise of ultimate redemption from the power of evil through the coming of Christ. Strictly interpreted, the words imply nothing more than a perpetual antagonism between the human race and the repulsive reptiles which excite its instinctive antipathy. It is only the general scope of the passage that can be thought to warrant the inference that the victory is to be won on the side of humanity; and it is a still higher flight of religious inspiration to conceive of that victory as culminating in the triumph of Him whose mission it was to destroy the works of the devil. FAMILY

RV, 'hart' (see HART). The second is incorrectly tr. In AV 'roebuck,' and correctly in RV 'gazelle' (see GAZELLE). The third is incorrectly tr. In AV 'fellow-deer,' and correctly in RV 'roebuck' (see ROEBUCK).

FAMILIAR.—The expression 'familiar spirit' was taken into the AV from the Geneva Version, as the trans. of Heb. 'ôhên. See Magic, etc. The word is also used as a subst., in Jer 20:14 'All my familiars watched for my halting' (RV 'familiar friends,' Heb. 'men of my place').

FAMILY.—1. Character of the family in OT.—'Family' in the OT has a wider significance than that which we usually associate with the term. The word tr. 'house' (Gn 7:2) approaches most nearly to our word 'family'; but a man's 'house' might consist of his mother, his wives and the wives' children; his concubines and their children; sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, with their offspring; illegitimate sons (Jg 11:5); dependents and aliens; and slaves of both sexes. Polygamy was in part, at least, the result of the large size of the Hebrew household; in part the cause of it may be found in the insecurity of early times, when safety lay in numbers, and consequently not only the married sons and daughters, but the less remote relatives, went to seek protection, with their father, but remote relatives and even foreigners ('the stranger within thy gates') would attach themselves, with a similar object, to a great household. The idea of a family sometimes had an extended meaning, extending to and including the nation, or even the whole race of mankind. Of this a familiar illustration is the figure of Abraham, who was regarded as being in a very real sense the father of the nation. So also the same feeling for the idea of the family is to be found in the careful assigning of a 'father' to every known nation and tribe (Gn 10). From this it is easily perceived that the family played an important part in Hebrew thought and affairs. It formed the base upon which the social structure was built up; its indistinguishable merging into the wider sense of clan or tribe indicates how it affected the political life of the whole nation.

Polygamy and bigamy were recognized features of the family life. From the Oriental point of view there was nothing immoral in the practice of polygamy. The female slaves were in every respect the property of their master, and became his concubines except in certain cases, when they seem to have belonged exclusively to their mistress, and could not be appropriated by the man except by her 'suggestion or consent (Gn 16:3–4). The slave women were obtained by purchases (Jg 5:28), or bought from poverty-stricken parents (Ex 21:7); or, possibly, in the ordinary slave traffic with foreign nations. In addition to his concubines a man might take several wives, and from his familiar expeditions the OT it seems that it was usual for wealthy and important personages to do so; Abraham, Jacob, David, Solomon, occur as instances. Elkanah, the husband of Hannah and Peninnah, is an interesting example of a man of no particular position who nevertheless had more than one wife; this may be an indication that bigamy, at least, if not polygamy, was not confined to the very wealthy and exalted. At all events, polygamy was an established and recognized institution from the earliest times. The gradual evolution in the OT of monogamy as the ideal is therefore of the highest interest. The earliest codes attempt in various ways to regulate the custom of polygamy. The Deut. code in particular actually forbids kings to multiply wives (Dt 17:17); this is the fruit, apparently, of the experience of Solomon's reign. In the prophetic writings the note of protest is more clearly sounded. Not only Adam but also Noah, the second founder of the human race, represents monogamy, and on that account recommends it as God's ordinance. It is in the line of Cain that bigamy is first represented, as though to emphasize the consequences of the Fall. Reasons are given in explanation of the bigamy of Abraham (Gn 16) and of Jacob (29:24). Hosea and other prophets constantly dwell upon the thought of a monogamous marriage as being a symbol of the union between God and His people; and denounce idolatry as unfaithfulness to this spiritual marriage-tie.

2. Position of the wife.—Situated as by the growth of the recognition of monogamy as the ideal form of marriage, polygamy was practised even as late as NT times. The natural accompaniment of such a practice was the insignificance of the wife's position: she was ordinarily regarded as a piece of property, as the wording of the Tenth Commandment testifies. Also her rights and privileges were necessarily shared by others. The relative positions of wives and concubines were determined mainly by the husband's favour. The children of the wife claimed the greater part, of the husband's inheritance; otherwise there does not seem to have been any inferiority in the position of the concubine as compared with that of the wife, nor was any idea of illegitimacy, in our sense of the word, connected with her children.

The husband had supreme authority over the wife. He was permitted by the Deut. code to divorce her with a bill of divorcement (Dt 22:19, 20, 21). Is 50:1, Jer 3, Mal 2(14) referring to and regulating divorce, indicate that it was of frequent occurrence. Yet wives, and even concubines who had been bought in the same place as slaves, might not be sold (Ex 21:7–11, Dt 21:10). Indeed, the Law throughout proves itself sympathetic towards the position of the wife and desires of improving her condition (Ex 21:11, Dt 21:13). This very attitude, however, indicates that there was need of improvement. The wife seems to have had no redress if wronged by the husband; she could not divorce him; and absolute faithfulness, though required of the wife, was not expected of the husband, so long as he did not injure the rights of any other man.

The wife, then, was in theory the mere chattel of her husband. A woman of character, however, could improve her situation and attain to a more or less degree of importance and influence as well as of personal freedom. Thus we read not only of Hagars, who were dealt hardly with, and were obliged to submit themselves under the hands of their masters and rivals, but also of Sarahs and Rebekahs and Abigaills, who could act independently and even against the wishes of their husbands in order to gain their own ends. And the very decision of Proverbs to the advantage of a wife to a man in the possession of a good wife (10:1, 31:10), and to the misery which it is in the power of a selfish woman to inflict (19:13 etc.).

3. Children.—In a household consisting of several families, the mother of each set of children would naturally have more to do with them than the father, and the maternal relationship would usually be more close and affectionate than the bond between the father and his children. Although it was recognized to be disastrous for a household to be divided against itself, yet friction between the various families could hardly have been avoided. 'One whom his mother comforts' (Jb 18:12) must have been a little common enough—a mother consoling her injured son for the taunts and blows of her rivals' children. Thus the mother would have the early care and education of her children under her own control. The father, on the other hand, had complete power over the lives and fortunes of his children, and would represent to them the idea of authority rather than of tenderness. He it was who arranged the marriage of his sons (Gn 24:28, Jg 14:3), and had the right to sell his daughters (Ex 21:7). The father seems even to have had powers of life and death over his children (Jg 11:29): and the Law provided that an unworthy son might be stoned to death upon the accusation of his parents (Dt 21:14-15).
See also art. Child.

4. Family duties.—The claims of the family upon the various members of it were strongly felt. Many laws provide for the vengeance and protection of the injured and defenceless by their next-of-kin. Brothers were the guardians of their sisters (Gn 34). A childless widow could demand, though not enforce, re-marriage with her brother-in-law (Dt 25:5-6). Boaz, as the nearest relation, performed this duty toward Ruth. In spite of the prohibition of the later code (Lv 20:21), levirate marriage seems to have been practised at the time of Christ (Mt 22:25-33). Its purpose was perhaps rather for the preservation of the particular branch of the family than for the advantage of the widow herself; in any case it illustrates the strong sense of duty towards the family as a whole.

Famine or alleviation and respect to their parents. Even a married man would consider himself still under the authority of his father, whether living with him or not; and his wife would be subject to her father-in-law even after her husband's death.

To an Israelite, ‘family’ conveyed the notions of unity, security, order, and discipline. These conceptions were nourished by the religious customs and observances in the most conspicuous instance of which was the keeping of the Passover. Such observances no doubt helped to bind the members of the family in close religious and spiritual sympathies. The common Israelite of the period; but there was the basis of the family affection and unity—from patriarchal times when the head of each family would offer sacrifice upon his own altar, until the hour in which Mary’s Son asked in tender surprise of her and Joseph: ‘Was ye not that I must be in my Father’s house?’ (Lk 2:49).

E. G. ROMANES.

Famine.—In Palestine, famine is usually due to failure of the rainfall (Lv 26:10, Am 4:7). Both crops and pasturage depend on the proper amount of rain. Under the Mosaic law, the ‘early rain’ in Oct.—Nov., the ‘latter rain’ in March—April. Its importance and uncertainty caused it to be regarded as the special gift of God (Dt 11:11-11). Accordingly, famine is always a direct judgment from Him (1 K 17, Ezk 5, and continually in the Prophets; Ja 5:17). Hence we find it amongst the terrors of the eschatological passages of NT (Lk 18, Rev 18). The idea is spiritualized in Am 9:11, ‘a famine of hearing the words of the Lord.’ In Egypt, famine is due to the failure of the annual inundation of the Nile, which is ultimately traceable to lack of rain in the Abyssinian highlands and the interior. Crops may be destroyed by other causes—hail and thunderstorms (Ex 9:25, 1 S 23:27); locusts and similar pests (Ex 10:14, Jl 1, Am 4:7). Further, famine is the usual result of warfare, the most horrid accounts of famines being connected with sieges (2 K 6:25, Jer 21:1, La 4:19).

These passages should be compared with the terrible description of Dt 28:48-49, and with Joseph’s account of the last siege of Jerusalem (BJ v. x. 3). So in Rev 6:8 scarcity, connected with the black horse, follows on bloodshed and conquest; but a maximum price is fixed for wheat, and oil and wine are untouched, so that the full horrors of famine are delayed. A natural result of famine is pestilence, due to improper and insufficient food, lack of water, and insanitary conditions. The two are frequently connected, especially in Ezk. and Jer (1 K 8:13, Jer 21:1, Jer 41:1, La 4:19).

Famines are recorded in connexion with Abraham (Gn 12:10) and Isaac (28). There is the famous seven years’ famine of Gn 41 if., which included Syria as well as Egypt. It apparently affected cereals rather than pasturage, beasts of transport being unharmed (cf. per contra 1 K 18). The device by which Joseph warded off its worst effects is illustrated by Egyptian inscriptions. In one, Bub, who lived about the time of Joseph, says: ‘I collecte o corn, as a friend of the harvest-god, and was watchful at the time of sowing. And when a famine arose, lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of famine’ (see Driver, Genesis, p. 346).

Other famines are said to have been in the time of Pharaoh (2 K 18:7; Jg 21:11). The judgment of the earth was due to the lack of produce (1 K 18:41, Jer 5:25). In the prophetic period the language of a Fast of Esther being observed, on this see Pss.58-60.

Fasting probably meant complete abstinence, though the Talmud allowed lentils to be eaten during the period of mourning. No work was done during a fast (Lv 16:29. 23, Nu 29:7), and sackcloth and ashes were sometimes used (De 9, Jon 3:7). The usual reasons for a fast were either mourning (1 S 31:11) or a wish to depurate the Divine wrath (2 S 12:15).
FEASTS

2. In the NT.—We hear that frequent additional fasts were imposed by tradition, and that strict observers kept two weekly fasts (Lk 18:12) on Thursday and Monday—commemorating, as it seems, the days on which Moses ascended and came down from the Mount. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, a huge system of fasts was instituted, and the present Jewish calendar prescribes 22, besides the Day of Atonement, the fasts of Esther, and the fasts of Zec 8:19.

3. Christianity and fasting.—Jesus refused to lay down any specific injunctions to fast. To preface forms was not His purpose: all outward observance was to be dictated by an inward principle. He Himself probably kept the usual fasts, and individual ones, as during the Temptation. But He laid emphasis in His teaching on the necessity of fasting except as a part of personal godliness, and gave plain warnings of its possible abuse by hypocrisy (Mt 6:16-18; Mk 9:9; Lk 5:33). The early Church used to fast before solemn appointments (Ac 13:14); and St. Paul alludes to his fastings, whether voluntary or compulsory, in 2 Co 6:11-12. In time a greater stress was put on the value of fasting, as is shown by the probable insertion of an allusion to it in Mt 17:9, Mk 9:4, Ac 10:2, 1 Co 7:5.

FAT.—See Food, § 10, SACRIFICE AND OFFERINO.

FAT.—The same word as vail, a large vessel for holding wine, which is often in NT and NT, and used in connexion with the making of wine. See WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2.

PATHER.—See Family, Genealogy, 1.

PATHERHOOD OF GOD.—See God, § 7.

PATOM.—See Weights and Measures.

PAUNCH.—Jth 13: AV; RV 'scimitar.'—The Eng. word denoted originally 'a broad sword more or less curved on the convex side;' but in later use and in poetry it signified a sword of any kind.

FAVOUR.—The Eng. word 'favour' is used in AV in the mod. sense of 'goodwill;' but in 'well-favoured' and 'ill-favoured' we see the older meaning of personal appearance. In Jos 11:21, the word seems to be used in the old sense of 'mercy;' yet he might destroy them, and they might have no favour'—as in Elisay, The Governor, ii. 298: 'And they, which by that law were condemned, were put to death without any favour.' For the theology of the word see GRACE.

FAWN.—See Roe, § 3.

FEAR.—In the OT 'the fear of the Lord' is frequently a definition of piety. The purpose of the giving of the Law is the implanting of this fear in the hearts of men (Dt 4:10); it is the sum of religious duty (8:4) and prompts to obedient and loving service (10:9).

'Fear cannot be appraised without reference to the worth of the objects feared' (Martinean, Types of Biblical Theory, ii. 184); hence it is in the revelation of the Divine nature as 'holy and to be feared' (Ps 119:106) that this fundamental principle of religion rests; those who know His name have learnt that to fear Him is true wisdom (v.19) and true blessedness (Ps 112:1).

In the NT mention is made of a fear which has high moral quality and religious value. The fear of the Lord' was the rule by which all the early Christians walked (Ac 9:33), and when an uncircumcised foreigner became a devout worshipper of the God of Israel he was known as 'one that feared God' (10:2; cf. 2 Co 7:5, Ph 2:12, 1 P 1:25, Rev 14:15, 19). Although the usual Gr. word for 'fear' is not used in He 5:12, the reference to the godly fear of the perfect Son emphasizes the contrast between reverent awe and slavish terror.

The fear which 'bash punishment' (1 Jn 4:19) is the result of (20). The sinner, under condemnation of the Law, is in 'bondage unto fear' (Ro 8:8), and inasmuch as 'the sting of death is sin' (1 Co 15:56), he is also through fear of death... subject to bondage' (He 2:15). Transgression may so completely deceive him that he has 'no terror of God' (Ps 33:1); the climax of human wickedness is the loss of any dread of God's judgments, though the Gr. and Eng. translations of the Heb. word for ' terrify' (pachadh, of which there is no translation, fail to bring out this thought in St. Paul's quotation of this verse (Ro 3:11). To rouse men from this callous indifference to God's threatenings is the purpose of the appeal to fear, which is a primary and self-regarding principle of human nature. This appeal is warranted by our Lord's words (Mt 10:28) as well as by Apostolic example (He 4:16; 1 Ti 5:2, Jude 1). The spirit in which this appeal should be made is that which inspired St. Paul, who is not one of joy, that 'knowing the fear of the Lord,' before whose judgment-seat all must be made manifest, he is constrained by the love of Christ to persuade men to be reconciled to God' (2 Co 5:19). J. G. Tauler.

FEARFULNESS.—The adj. 'fearful' is often used in AV in the sense, not of causing fear, but of feeling it; and 'fearfulness' always denotes the emotion of fear. Thus Mt 8:17 'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?'; Ps 55:1 'Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me in thy sight.' In the RV of the OT the word 'fearfulness' is full of fear, the Revisers. Westcott tells us, having purposely retained this use in order that 'fear,' 'fearful,' and 'fearfulness' might all agree in meaning. They have accordingly changed 'fearful sights' in Lk 21:8 into 'terrors.' The Revisers of the OT, however, had no such thought, and they have left the word unchanged.

FEASTS.—Introductory.—The sacred festivals of the Jews were primarily occasions of rejoicing, treated as a part of religion. To 'rejoice before God' was synonymous with 'to celebrate a festival.' In process of time this characteristic was modified, and a probably late institution, like the Day of Atonement, could be regarded as a feast, though its origin was not one of joy. But the most primitive feasts were marked by religious merriment; they were accompanied with dances (Jg 21:18); and, as it seems, led to serious excesses in many cases (1 S 14, Am 2:7, 2 K 237, Dcr 24:18). Most of the feasts were only local assemblies for acts and purposes of sacred worship; but the three great national festivals were the occasions for general assemblies of the people, at which all males were supposed to appear (Ex 23:14, 17, 34, 35, Dt 16:16).

1. Feasts connected with the Sabbath.—These were calculated on the basis of the sacred number 7, which regulated all the great dates of the Jewish sacred year. Thus the 7th was the sacred month, the feasts of Unleavened Bread and Tabernacles each lasted for 7 days, Pentecost was 49 days after the Feast of Unleavened Bread, Passover and Tabernacles each began on the 14th day of their respective months, and there were 7 days of holy convocation in the year.

1. The Sabbath and the observances akin to it were lunar in character (cf. Am 8, Hos 2, Is 1, 2 K 20). The Sabbath ordinances are treated in Ex 20:11-31 as designed to commemorate the completion of creation, but Dt 5:12 connects them with the redemption from Egypt, and Ex 29:3 acrases them to humanitarian motives. On this day work of all sorts was forbidden, and the daily morning and evening sacrifices were doubled. Sabbath-breaking was punishable with death (Nu 15:30-32, Ex 31:14, 15). No evidence of Sabbath observance is trace in the accounts of the patriarchal age, and very little in pre-exilic records (Is 56:6-7, 58:13), Jer 7:21, Ezk 20:12, 15, 18, 20). But after the Captivity the rules were more strictly enforced (Neh 13:22, 23), and in later times the Rabbinical prohibitions multiplied to inordinate extent. See art. Sabbath.

2. At the New Moon special sacrifices were offered (Nu 28:1-14), and the silver trumpets were blown over them (Nu 10:10). All trade and business were disconcontinued, as well as work in the fields (Am 5:8). It appears also, that this was the occasion of a common sacred meal and family sacrifices (cf. I S 20:4. 18. 9), and it seems to have been a regular day on which to consult prophets (2 K 4:38).

The Feast of Trumpets took place at the New Moon of the 7th month. Tishri (October). See TRUMPETS.

4. The Sabbatical Year.—An extension of the Sabbath principle led to the rule that in every 7th year the land was to be allowed to lie fallow, and fields were to be neither tilled nor roaped. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

5. By a further extension, every 50th year was to be treated as a year of Jubilee, when Hebrew slaves were emancipated and mortgaged property reverted to its original owner. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

II. GREAT NATIONAL FESTIVALS.—These were solar festivals, and mostly connected with different stages of the harvest; the Jews also ascribed to them a ceremonial significance, and traditionally referred their inauguration to various events of their past history. They were:

1. The Passover, followed immediately by the Feast of Unleavened Bread. These two festivals were probably distinct in origin (Lv 23:6–8. Nu 28:17), and Josephus distinguished between them; but in later times they were popularly regarded as one (Mk 14:5, Lk 22:7). The Passover is probably of greater antiquity, but the Feast of Unleavened Bread, being agricultural in character, can scarcely have existed before the Israelites entered Canaan. For the characteristic features of the two festivals, see PASSOVER.

2. Pentecost, on the 50th day after 16th Nisan (April), celebrated the completion of the corn harvest. See PENTECOST.

3. The Feast of Tabernacles, the Jewish harvest-home, took place at the period when the harvests of fruit, oil, and wine had been gathered in. See TABERNACLES.

III. MINOR HISTORICAL FESTIVALS.—1. The Feast of Purim, dating from the Persian period of Jewish history, commemorated the nation's deliverance from the intrigues of Haman. See PURIM.

2. The Feast of the Dedication recalled the purification of the Temple after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes. See DEDICATION.

3. The Feast of the Wood-offering or of the Wood-carriers, on the 15th day of Abib (April), marked the last of the nine occasions on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the Temple (Neh 10:13). Besides these there were certain petty feasts, alluded to in Josephus and the Apocrypha, but they seem never to have been generally observed or to have attained any religious importance. Such are: the Feast of the Reading of the Law (1 Es 9:8, cf. Neh 8:1); the Feast of Nicanor on the 13th day of Adar (March) (1 Mac 7:54); see PURIM; the Feast of the Captured Fortress (1 Mac 13:24); the Feast of Baskets. A. W. F. BLUNT.

FELIX, ANTONIUS.—Procurator of Judea (Ac 23:26); according to Josephus, he had been sent to succeed Cumanus in A.D. 52; but this contradicts Tacitus, who makes Cumanus governor of Galilee and Felix of Samaria simultaneously; and this suits Ac 24:13 ('many years'). Both historians give 52 as the year of Cumanus' disgrace, so that we may probably take that as the date of Felix' accession to office in Judea. Felix was brother of Pallas, Claudius' powerful freemason, whose influence continued him in office under Nero, and who, in his disgrace (due to a riot at Cesarea) procured him his life. He is described by Tacitus as a very bad and cruel governor. He was somewhat touched by St. Paul's preaching (24:10), but kept him in prison, first in hope of a bribe,—one of many details showing that St. Paul was a prisoner of social importance,—and, finally, to please the Jews. He is called 'most excellent' (23:24; cf. 26:24, Lk 15), a title given him as governor, but more properly confined to those of equestrian rank. He married three, each time to a person of royal birth; see DEUCILLA. A. I. MACLENNAN.

FELLOW.—This Eng. word is used in AV with the meaning either of (1) companion, or (2) of person. Thus (1) Pr 4:6 'God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows' (2) Mk 1:30. This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth (RV 'man'; there is no word in the Gr.). Cf. Tindal's trans. of Gn 39:8 'And the Lorp was with Joseph, and he was a lucky fellow.' Although the word when used in AV for person may have a touch of disparagement, nowhere is it used to express strong contempt as now.

FELLOWSHIP.—See Communion.

FENCE.—Ps 22:19 is the only occurrence of the substant., and probably the word there has its modern meaning (Coverdale 'hedge'). But the participle 'fenced' (used of a city) always means 'fortified' (which Amer. RV always substitutes). See FORTIFICATION.

FERRET (andgal).—An unclean animal, Lv 11:5. RV 'gecko.' Rabbinical writers suggest the hedgehog, but this is unlikely. For gecko see LIZARD. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FESTUS, PORCIUS.—Procurator of Judea after Felix. His short term of office was marked by better administration than that of Felix or of Albinus his successor (Jos. AM. XX. viii. 1.). He is addressed with respect by St. Paul (Ac 26:22), whom he would not give up to the Jews until he was sure, however, that St. Paul would not appeal to Caesar, in consequence of which he was sent to Rome. Festus was a friend of King Agrippa II., whose visit to him is described in Ac 25:18, and took his side in a dispute with the Jewish priests. His accession to office is one of the puzzles of NT chronology; Rusehuis gives a.D. 56, but this is probably some three years too early. A. J. MACLENNAN.

FIG. (te'ēnāh).—The common fig, fruit of the Ficus carica, is cultivated from one end of Palestine to the other, especially in the mountainous regions, occupying to-day a place as important as it did in Bible times. The failure of the fig and grape harvest would even now bring untold distress (Jer 5:11. Hab 3:16 etc.). Although the figs are all of one genus, the fellaheen distinguish many varieties according to the quality and colour of the fruit. The summer foliage of the fig is thick, and fruits of other trees for its shade and grateful shade. In the summer the owners of gardens everywhere may be seen sitting in the shadow of their fig trees. It is possible the references in Mic 4:4, Zec 5:3 may be to this, or to the not uncommon custom of having fig trees over-hanging rural dwellings. Although fig trees are of medium height, some individual trees (e.g. near Jenin) reach to over 25 feet high. Sult-so-worn fig tree are usually barren, and are known to the natives as wild or 'male' fig trees. The fruiting of the fig is very interesting and peculiar. Though earlier in the plains, the annual occurrence in the mountain regions, e.g. round Jerusalem is as follows: The trees, which during the winter months have lost all their leaves, about the end of March begin putting forth their tender leaf buds (Mt 4:12, Mk 13:28, Lk 21:23-24), and at the junction of the old wood with these leaves appear at the same time the tiny figs. These little figs develop along with the leaves up to a certain point, to about the size of a small cherry, and then the great majority of them fall to the ground, carried down with every gust of wind. Those immaterial figs are also marked by rain, and are eaten by the fellaheen as they fall; they may indeed sometimes be seen exposed for sale in the market in Jerusalem. They are the pappin ('green figs') of FIRSTBORN.—1. The dedication of the firstborn of men and beasts was probably a primitive nomadic custom, and therefore earlier than the offering of firstfruits, which could not arise until the Israelites had settled into agricultural life in Canaan. The origin of the belief that a particular value attaches to the firstborn cannot be definitely traced; but it would be a natural inference that what was valuable to the parent would be valuable to his God. And thus the word "firstborn" could be used figuratively of Israel as the first-begotten of J" among the nations (Ex 4:23, cf. Jer 31:1), and the seed of David among dynasties (Ps 89:27). The law of the dedication of the firstborn is found in JE (Ex 13:12-21 229b. 40 34i, D (Dt 15:22-23), P (Ex 13:15), Nu 31:1, 40:14-18). It is not impossible that in very primitive times firstborn sons were sometimes actually sacrificed (cf. 2 K 13:4, Mic 6:5), but the practice would soon grow up of 'redeeming' them by money or payments in kind.

2. The firstborn (békóh) enjoyed the birthright (békkôhrâh). He succeeded his father as head of the family, and took the largest share of the property; this was fixed in Dt 21:17 as a "double portion." [In 2 Ch 21:1 the principle of the birthright is extended to the succession to the throne. But this is a late passage, and it is not certain that the firstborn was necessarily the heir apparent]. If a man died without children, the heir was the firstborn of his widow by his brother or next-of kin (Dt 25:6). The right of the firstborn, however, was often disturbed, owing to the jealousies of quarrels arising from the polygamy of the Israelites. The law in Dt 21:14-17 is directed against the abuse. Reuben, although the son of Leah, the less favoured of Jacob's two wives, was considered the firstborn, and so the right only because of the sin (Gen 49:4 of 1 Ch 5). But Ishmael was allowed no share at all in the father's property (Gen 21:8); and the superiority of Jacob over Esau (symbolizing the superiority of Israel over Edom) is described as having been forestalled before their birth (25:29), and as brought about by Esau's voluntary surrender of the birthright (v. 39-41). And other instances occur of the younger being preferred to the elder; e.g. Ephraim (48:1-20), Solomon (1 K 1), and Shimei (1 Ch 26:9).

3. The death of the firstborn was the last of the punishments sent upon Egypt for Pharaoh's refusal to let the Israelites go. Moses gave him due warning in Ex 11:1-4, and on his continued refusal the stroke fell (12:29). The event is referred to in Ps 78:1-10 105 136 136. He 114. It is probably (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT) that the stories of all the other plagues have been founded on historical occurrences, and that the Egyptians suffered from a series of 'natural' catastrophes. If this is true of the first, it is reasonable to assume it for the last, and we may suppose that a pestilence raging which created great havoc, but did not spread to the Israelite quarter. The growth of the tradition into its present form must be explained by the 'etiological' interest of the Hebrew writer—the tendency to create idealized situations in a remote past for the purpose of explaining facts or institutions whose origin was forgotten. Thus the Feast of Booths was accounted for at a late date by the dwelling of the Israelites in booths after the Exodus (Lv 23), the Feast of Unleavened Cakes by the haste in leaving Egypt (Ex 12), the Feast of the Passover by the passing over of the houses marked with blood at the destruction of the firstborn (1220, 20 45). And similarly the slaying out of the firstborn for destruction was itself connected with

Ca 2n, and the oyinhôl ('untimely figs') of Rev 6:13, in the case of some trees, especially the best varieties, a certain proportion of these little green figs continue to develop, and reach ripeness in June. These are then known as the dafar or early figs, mentioned in Is 28:9, Jer 24:9, Hos 9:5, Mic 7:1, as dikkôhrâh, 'the figs first ripe. They are to-day, as of old, specially esteemed figs, and regarded as a delicacy; and the little buds of the next crop begin to appear higher up the branches. These steadily develop and form the second and great crop of figs, which comes about August, in the midst of the leisure season.

In the much-discussed miracle of our Lord (Mt 21:19-21, Mk 11:12-14, Lk 19:46-47) we may discern at once the theory that He came looking for figs from the previous season, as He would certainly not have found any such survivors, and such fruit would not have been eatable.

On the other hand, at the Passover season, about April, when the young leaves are on the fig trees, every tree which is going to bear fruit at all will have some ta'kh on it, and so, though it is a true statement that 'the time of figs,' i.e. of ordinary edible figs, was not yet (Mk 11:14), yet there would be fruit which could be, and is to-day, eaten, and fruit, too, which would be a guarantee of a harvest to come later on. It was the want of promise of future fruitfulness in the Jewish nation for which they were condemned in the act of parable of the barren fig tree. It may be noted, however, that in May many fig trees may be found round Jerusalem which have dropped all their green figs (as ripening to dafar) and have not yet put forth the buds of the late summer crop.

Figs are eaten in Palestine not only fresh but dried, the fruit being often threaded on to long strings for convenience of carriage. They are also pressed into a solid cake which can be cut in slices with a knife. These are the fig-cakes of 1 S 25:2 30:1, 1 Ch 12:4. A lump of such was used as a poltice for Hezekiah's horse in 2 Kings 18:8, and 2 Chr 32:22.

FILE.—Only 1 S 13:9, but the passage is very corrupt; see the later commentaries.

FINE.—The 'verb to fine' (mod. 'refine') is used in Job 28:4 'Surely there is a vein for silver, and a place for gold where they fine it' (RV 'which they refine'). 'Finishing' occurs in Pr 17:27; and 'finer' in Pr 25:2 'a vessel for the finer' (Amer. RV 'refiner'). See REFINER.

FINES.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 8.

FIR (bérsôh, RVm cypresse [wh. see], 2 S 6:9, 1 K 5:14 6:5, 17, 14, 17, 9, 14 etc.).—It was a tree of large growth (2 K 25:11); it was evergreen (Hos 3:11); a chief element in the glory of Lebanon (Is 66:18); associated with cedars (Ps 104:17; Is 14:5, Zec 14:1). The timber of the bérôr ranked with the cedar for house- and ship-building (1 K 5:14 etc.). Cypress is accepted by most modern authorities, but bérôh may have also included several varieties of pine. 'Fir' is also RV tr. of dôên in Is 44:20 ('AV and RVm wrongly 'ash').

E W. G. MASTERTON.

FIRE.—See HOUSE, § 7, and next article.

FIREPAN.—1. A pan of bronze (Ex 27 etc.), silver (Mishna, Yoma, 1 v. 4), or gold (1 K 7:24 etc.), for removing charcoal, and probably ashes also, from the altar of burnt-offering. According to the Mishna (loc. cit.), the firepans or coal-pana were of various sizes, there given, and were each furnished with a long or a short handle. They seem, therefore, to have resembled ladles, or the modern bed-warriers.

When used to hold live charcoal for the burning of incense the coal-pan becomes a censer (Lv 10:16 etc.). Hence in Nu 4:1, 1 K 7:24, 2 Ch 4:4, RV has 'firepans' for AV 'censers' though there is no reason to incense. The same utensil was used for removing the burnt portions of the lamp-wicks of the golden 'candelstick' or lamp-stand, although rendered snuff dusses (which see—Tindale has rightly 'firepans').
FIRST-FRUITS.

The ancient practice of offering to God annually in spring the firstlings of beasts. Moses demanded release in order to offer the sacrifices (10:43), and because Pharaoh refused to allow them to offer their firstlings, Joes" took from the Egyptians their firstborn. This explanation, though not explicitly given, is implied in the close connexion of the dedication of the firstborn with the Passover (13:14, Dt 15:1-19). In a redactional passage (Ex 12:43) a different explanation is offered. The death of the firstborn would be a punishment for refusal to release Israel, which was Joes" firstborn.

4. In the NT the term 'firstborn' (prototokos) is used of Christ (Ro 8:4, Col 1:15, He 1:6, Rev 1:1), and of Christians who have died (He 13:20); see the commentaries.

FISH would appear to have always been a favourite article of diet among the Hebrews (Nu 11:10 and references in the Gospels), as it is to-day. Fish are found in enormous numbers in all the inland waters of Palestine, and especially in the Lake of Galilee, Lake Hulah, and the 'meadow lakes' of Damascus. The extraordinary feature of these fish is the number of species peculiar to the Jordan valley. Out of a total of 43 species found in this region, no fewer than 14 are peculiar to this district. Many of these are quite small. The chief edible fish are members of the Chromidae and of the Cyprinidae (carps). The cat-fish, Clarias macrocantus, not being a scaly fish, cannot be eaten by the Jews (Dt 14:13), though considered a delicacy by the Christians of Damascus. It is thought by some to be the 'bad fish' of Mt 13:48. In NT times fish-curing was extensively carried on at Tarshish on the Lakhish of Tiberias. Some of the native fish is still salted to-day. The 'fish-poole' of Ca 7:11 and the 'pontas for fish' in Is 11:10 are both mistranslations. See also FOOD, § 6.

FITCHES.—1. qettish (ls 288±107). RV 'black cummin,' the seeds of the aromatic herb Nigella sativa, commonly used to-day in Palestine as a condiment, especially on the top of loaves of bread. The contrast between the staff for the 'itches' and the rod for the cummin is the more instructive when the great similarity of the two seeds is noticed. 2. kussemeth, Ez 4:11, in AV and RV 'spelt,' and in Ex 9:18, Is 26:9 AV 'rie' and RV 'spelt.' Triglochin pinnata (Triglochin pinnata) is a kind of wheat, the grains of which are peculiarly adherent to the sheath.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLAG.—1. 'achah (Job 8:11), prop. 'reed-grass' (cf. Gn 41:12). 2. siph (Ex 28:1, Is 19:10), sedgy plants by the Nile and its canals.

FLAGON occurs five times in AV, but in only one of these instances is the tr. retained by RV, namely, Is 22:9, 'vessels of flagons.' Here it is perhaps an earthenware bottle. On the other hand, RV introduces 'flagons' in two instances where it is not found in AV, namely, Ex 25:27±14. This tr. is probably correct, although RV gives 'cups' for the same Heb. word in Nu 4:2. In all these remaining four passages AV has 'cover.' In the remaining four instances where AV gives 'flagons' (2 S 21:1, 1 Ch 16, Hos 3:1, Cant 3:11), the meaning of the Heb. word is a 'pressed cake... composed of meal, oil, and dafa' (W. R. Smith, Otjco 434, n. 7). Hence in 2 S 21:1, 1 Ch 16, RV gives 'cake of raisins,' for AV 'flagon of wine,' in Hos 3:1 'cakes of raisins,' for 'flagons of wine,' and in Ca 2:9 'raisins' (RV 'cakes of raisins') for 'flagons.'

FLAX (gish),—The plant Linum usitatissimum, and the prepared fibres used for making linen. It was early cultivated in Spelt (Linum usitatissimum) is an indurative was one of God's judgments (Hos 2:3). The plant is about two to three feet high, with pretty blue flowers; the flax is said to be 'boiled' (Ex 9:8) when the seed vessels reach maturity and the plant is ready for gather-
FLESH-HOOK

Flesh (Ro 8:3) is intended to deny sinfulness, not a similar body in Christ (see Comm. in loc.).

FLESH-HOOK.—The flesh-hook used by the priest's servant at Shiloh was a three-pronged fork (1 S 29), as were probably those of bronze and gold mentioned in connection with the Tabernacle (Ex 27:38) and Temple (1 Ch 28:9, 2 Ch 4:8) respectively.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FLESHLY, FLESHY.—There is a distinction preserved in the AV between these words. 'Fleshy' is that which belongs to the flesh, carnal, as Col 2:16 'fleshy mind,' as opposed to 'spiritually minded' (cf. Ro 8:5). 'Fleshy' is that which is made of flesh, tender, as 2 Co 6:5 'written . . . not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart.'

FLESH POTS (Ex 16).—See HOUSE, § 9.

FLINT.—See MINING AND METALS.

FLOCK.—See Sheep.

FLOOD.—See DELUGE. And notice that the word is used generally for a stream or a river, as Is 44:4 'I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground' (RV 'streams'). Sometimes a particular river is meant, the Euphrates, the Nile, or the Jordan. (1) The Euphrates is referred to in Job 42:4 ('your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood,' RV 'beyond the River') 24:10, 2 Es 18:1, 1 Mac 7:2 (5). (2) The Nile is Ps 78:66, Am 6:7, Jer 46:10. O. Jordan in Ps 66:6 ('they went through the flood on foot'). The word is also frequently used in AV as now, of a torrent, as Ps 68:9 'I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me' (Heb. shibboleth, which the Englishmen pronounced sibbalath).

FLOOR.—Used in AV (a) in the primary sense of a house-floor, and (b) in the secondary sense of a threshing-floor, the Heb. words for which are quite distinct. Under (a) we have the earthen floor of the Tabernacle, Nu 38, and the wooden floor of the Temple, 1 K 6:8 (see HOUSE, § 4.) By 'from floor to floor,' 77, is meant 'from floor to ceiling,' a sense implied in the better reading 'from the floor to the rafters;' cf. 141, wherefor 'walls read 'rafters' of the ceiling.' In Am 9:8 our EV has obscured the figure 'the floor of the sea.'

(b) Where 'floor' occurs in the sense of 'threshing-floor' (see AGRICULTURE, § 3), the latter has been replaced by RV except in three passages (Ga 50:15, 1 Ch 26:8). The same word (goren) appears as barnfloor (2 K 6:7, RV 'threshing-floor') and cornfloor (Hos 9:4 AV and RV).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FLOUR.—See BREAD, FOOD, § 2, MILL.

FLOWERS.—1. nizzah, only Ca 2:5, 2. miz, Is 28:4 49: Job 14:12, 'blooming' Nu 17:3. nizzah—used of the inconspicuous flowers of vine and olive, Is 18, Job 15:8, 4. perach, Ex 25:7, Is 18, AV 'bud,' RV 'blossom,' Nah 1. Flowers are one of the attractive features of Palestine: they come in the early spring (Ca 29), but fade too soon, the brilliant display being a matter of but a few short weeks. Hence they are an appropriate symbol of the evanescence of human life (Job 14, Ps 103:16). The 'lioves of the field' of Mt 6 may have been a comprehensive term for the brilliant and many-coloured anemones, the irises, the gladioli, etc., which lend such enchantment to the hill-sides in March and April. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLUTE.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

FLUX.—The expression 'a bloody flux' (1611 'bloody-flyx') is used in AV for Gr. dysenteria (RV 'dysentery'). This term is first found in Wycliff, who offers the alternative 'dissenterie, or flyx.' See MEDICINE.

FLY.—1. zebub, Ec 10:1, Is 7:16; also Baal-zebub (wh. see). 2. webh, Ex 28:16, etc. Insects of one of the plagues of Egypt, thought by some to have been cockroaches. Flies of many kinds, mosquitoes, 'sandflies,' etc., swarm in Palestine and Egypt. In summer many sweet preparations left uncovered is at once defiled by flies falling into it (Ec 10:1). Flies carry epithalia and Infect food with the micro-organisms of other diseases, e.g. cholera, enteric fever, etc. They frequently deposit their eggs in uncleansed wounds and flech-scarred eggs develop. Special flies, in Africa at any rate, carry the trypanosoma, which produce fatal disease in cattle and 'sleeping sickness' in man. Mosquitoes, which may have been included in the ' Arab (the 'swarms of flies') in Exeg. ps. are now known to be the carriers of the poison of malaria, the greatest scourge of parts of Palestine.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FODDER (bolii, Job 6:18 and Jg 19:18 RV). See Provender.

FOLK.—This Eng. word is used in the NT indefinitely for 'persons,' there being no word in the Gr. (Mt 26, Jn 3, Ac 5). But in the OT the word has the definite meaning of nation or people, even Ps 103:20 'The conies are but a feeble folk,' having this meaning. In the metrical version of Ps 100, 'flock' should be 'folk,' corresponding to 'people' in the prose version. So the author wrote,

'The Lord ye know is God in deed
With out our side, he did us make:
We are his flock, his fold he fed;
And for his sheep, he would not take.'

FOLLOW.—This Eng. verb means now no more than to come after, but in older Eng. it was often equivalent to pursue. Now it states no more than the relative presence of two persons, formerly it expressed purpose or determination. Tindale translates Ly 28:7 'ye shall see when no man foloweth you,' and Dt 25:7 'they [the diseases named] shall follow ye, intyl thou art diseased.' In AV to follow is 2 Th 3:1 'For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us.'

FOOD.—This article will deal only with food-stuffs, in other words, with the principal articles of food among the Hebrews in Bible times, the preparation and serving of these being reserved for the complementary article MEALS.

1. The food of a typical Hebrew household in historical times was almost exclusively vegetarian. For all but the very rich the use of meat was confined to some special occasion,—a family festival, the visit of an honoured guest, a sacrificial meal at the local sanctuary, and the like. According to the authority of the Priois' Code, indeed, the food of men and beasts alike was exclusively herbaceous in the period before the Deluge (Gen 11:). permission to eat the flesh of animals, under stipulation as to drawing off the blood, having been first accorded to Noah (9). In Isiah's vision of the future, when 'the lion shall eat straw like the ox' (11), a return is contemplating to the idyllic conditions of the first age of all.

The growth of luxury under the monarchy (cf. Am 6:4, and similar passages) is well illustrated by a comparison of 2 S 17:1 with 1 K 4:21. In the former there is brought for the entertainment of David and his followers 'wheat and barley and meal and parched corn and beans and lentils and parched pulse' (7 see p. 266. § 3) and honey and butter and sheep and cheese of kine'; while, according to the latter passage, Solomon's daily provision was thirty measures of fine flour and three-score measures of meal; ten fat oxen and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, besides harts and gazelles and reebucks and fatted fowl.

2. The first place in the list of Hebrew food-stuffs must be given to the various cereals included under the general name of 'corn'—in Amer. RV always 'grain' — the two most important of which were wheat and barley. Millet (Ex 4:9) and spelt (see Ezech. 20:1) are only casually mentioned. The most primitive method of using corn was to pluck the 'fresh ear' (Lv 23:4, Rv 2 K 426), and remove the husk by rubbing in the hands (D2 234, Mt 12:3 etc.). When bruised in a mortar these ears yielded the 'bruised corn of the forehead' (Lv 24:14, Ev) A favourite practice in all periods down to the present day has been to roast the ears on an iron plate or otherwise. The result is the parched corn so frequently mentioned in OT. Parched corn was ground with a light stone and wine furnished the midday meal of Boaz's reapers (Rt 2:14). The chief use, however, to which wheat and barley were put was to supply the household with bread (wh. see). Weatean bread was the frequent meal in early times by means of the primitive rubbing-stones, which the excavations show to have long survived the introduction of the quern or hand-mill (for references to illustrations of both, see Mills). The 'fine flour' of our EV was obtained from the coarser variety by bolting the latter with a fine sieve. Barley bread (Jg 7:12, Jn 6:11) was the usual bread, indeed the principal food, of the poorer classes. (For details of breads andakes see Bresad.). The obscure word rendered 'dough' in Nu 15:23, Neh 10, Ezk 44:5 denotes either coarse meal (so RVm) or a sort of porridge made from wheat and barley meal, like the polenta of the Romans. 2. Bread of barley (see above). The pulse of the pulse family (Leguminosae), although only two leguminous plants (lentils and beans) are mentioned by name (Ezr 9:15, 16). The pulse was eaten as edible herbs generally (so RVm); the 'parched pulse' of 2 S 17:2, on the other hand, is due to a mistaken rendering of the word for 'parched corn,' here repeated by a complete slip, with a light four seed flour furnished (Gn 25:22), probably a stew in which the lentils were flavoured with onions and other ingredients, as is done at present in Syria. 3. Lentils and beans were eaten, especially ground meal (Rv) well tasted. 4. Next to its fish, the Hebrews in the wilderness looked back wistfully on the 'cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic' of Egypt (Nu 11:5), all of them subsequently cultivated by them in Palestine. It is to the agricultural treatises of the Mishra, however, that the student must turn for fuller information regarding the rich supplies available either for a 'dinner of herbs' (Pr 16:2) alone, or for supplementing a meat diet. At least four varieties of bean, for example, are named, also the chickpea (which the Vulgate substitutes for the 'parched pulse' above referred to), various species of chicory and endive—the bitter herbs of the Romans—mustard (Mt 13:13), radish, and many others. 4. Passing now to the 'food-trees' (Lv 19:13), we may follow the example of Jotham in his parable (Jg 9:8), and begin with the olive, although, as it happened, the 'olive berry' (Ja 3:18 AV) is never expressly mentioned in Scripture as an article of diet. Apart, however, from their extensive use in furnishing oil (wh. see), itself an invaluable aid in the preparation of food, olives were not only eaten in the fresh state, but were at all times preserved for later use by being soaked in brine. Such pickled olives were, and still are, used as a relish with bread by rich and poor alike. Next to the olive in rank, Jotham's parable places the fig-tree, whose 'sweetness' and 'good fruit' it extols (Jg 9:8). The great economic importance of the fig need not be emphasized. From Is 28:5, Jer 24:4 it appears that the first ripe fig, i.e. the early fig which appears on last year's wood, was regarded as a special delicacy. The bulk of the year's fruit was dried for use out of the season, as was the case also among the Greeks and Romans, by whom dried figs were the most of all the skillfully used of all fruits. When pressed in a mould they formed 'cakes of figs' (3 S 25:4, 1 Ch 12:4). A fig-cake, it will be remembered, was prescribed by Isaiah as a poultice (EV 'plaster') for Hezekiah's boil (Is 38:20 = 2 K 20:4, Ev). With the fig Hebrew writers constantly associate the grape, the 'fruit of the vine' (Mt 26:29 and parallels). Like the former, grapes were not only enjoyed in their natural state, but were also, by exposure to the sun after being gathered, dried into raisins, the 'dried grapes' of Nu 6. In this form they were better suited for the use of travellers and soldiers (1 S 25:19, 1 Ch 12:16). What precisely is meant by the word rendered 'wine-ashes' by RV (2 S 6:13, Jgs 15:6, Hos 3:4, AV wrongly 'flagon of wine') is still uncertain. By far the greater part of the produce of the vineyards was used for the manufacture of wine (wh. see). For another economic product of grape, see p. 14. 5. Dates are only once mentioned in AV, and that without any justification, as the marginal alternative of 'honey, 2 Ch 14; yet Joel includes 'the palm tree' in his list of fruit-trees (1), and from the Mishra we learn that dates, like the fruits already discussed, were not only eaten as they came from the palm, but were dried in clusters and also pressed into cakes for convenience of transport. For other less important fruits, such as the pomegranate, the much discussed tappach—'the apple' of AV, according to others the quince (see Apple)—the fruit of the sycomore fig-culberry, associated with Ames the prophet, and the hucks (Lk 15:23), or rather pods of the carob tree, reference must be made to the separate articles. To these there fail to be added here almonds and nuts of more than one variety. 6. As compared with the wide range of foods supplied by the cereals, vegetables, and fruits above mentioned, the supply of flesh-food was confined to such animals and birds as were technically described as 'clean.' For this important term in the Law, and the principles underlying the distinction between clean and unclean, see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. The clean animals admitted to the table according to the official lists in Lv 11:14-19 (conveniently arranged in parallel columns for purposes of comparison in Driver's Deut. ad loc.), may be ranged under the two categories. 7. Domestic animals, which alone were admitted as sacrifice to the table of J' (Mal 1:10, 13), and game. The former comprised the two classes of 'the flock,' i.e. sheep and goats, and 'the herd.' The flesh of the goat, and especially of the kid of the goat,' was more relished by the Hebrews than by the present inhabitants of Palestine, by whom the goat is reared chiefly for its milk. A kid, as less valuable than a well-fleeced lamb, was the most frequent and least-cost victim, especially among the poorest of the flock. (Ex 23:19) gives point to the complaint of the Eldor Son in the parable (Lk 15:21). The original significance of the thrice-repeated injunction against seeing a kid in its mother's milk (Ex 20:29 and parallels) is still uncertain. Regarding the sheep as food, it may be noted that in the case of the fat-tailed breed the tail was forbidden as ordinary food by the Priests' Code at least, and had to be offered with certain other portions of the fat (see § 10 p. 267) upon the altar (Ex 29:22, Ls 3, both EV). Of the next cattle, the flesh of females as well as of males was eaten, the Hebrews not having that repugnance to cow's flesh which distinguished the Egyptians of antiquity, as it does the Hindus of to-day. Calves, of course, supplied the daintiest food, and might be taken directly from the herd, as was done by Abraham (Gn 18), cf. 1 K 4:8), or specially fattened for the table. The 'fatted calf' of Lk 15:3 will be at once recognized, also the 'fattings,' and the 'stalled,' i.e. stall-fed, ox (Pr 15:7) of OT. 'One ox and six choice sheep' were Nehemiah's daily portion (Neh 6:18); Solomon's has been marginally given (S. 1). From the females of the herd and of the flock (Dt 32:14), especially from the ewe (Pr 27:7), probably also from the mule-camel (Gn 32), came the supply of milk and its preparations, butter and cheese, for which see MILK. Of the seven species of game mentioned in Dt 14, it is evident from 12:4 that the gazelle and the hart were the typical animals of the chase hunted for the sake of their flesh. They are also named along with the roe-buck in Solomon's list, 1 K 4:2. One or more of these, doubtless supplied the venison from which Esau was wont to make the 'savoury meat' which his father loved (Gn 25:8, 27:4). Among the unclean animals which Esau was permitted to eat were the swine (Lv 11:7, Dt 14:2,'cf. Mt 15:20, and parallels), the camel, the hare, and the ass (but see 2 K 6:3).

6. In the Deuteronomic list above cited, the permitted and forbidden quadrupeds are followed by the provision regarding fish: 'Thou shalt eat of all that are in the waters, whatsoever hath fins and scales shall ye eat: and whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye shall not eat. It is unclean unto you' (Dt 14:4, RV); cf. Lv 11:19-27. No particular species of fish is named in Dt, either as food or otherwise, although no fewer than thirty-six species are said to be found in the Jordan system alone. Yet we may be sure that the fish which the Hebrews enjoyed in Egypt for 'nought' (Nu 11:4) had their successors in Canaan. Indeed, it is usual to find in the words of Dt 33, 'they shall suck the abundance of the seas,' a contemporary reference to the fisheries possessed by the tribes of Zebulun and Issachar.

In the days of Nebuchadnezzar a considerable trade in cured fish was carried on by Tyrian, i.e. Phenician, merchants with Jerusalem (Neh 13), where a market must have been held at or near the Fish-gate (3rd etc.). It was still later times, as is so abundantly testified by the Gospels and Josephus, the Sea of Galilee was the centre of a great fishing industry. In addition to the demand for fresh fish, a thriving trade was done in the salting and curing of fish for sale throughout the country. The fishes of our Lord's two miracles of feeding were almost certainly of this kind, fish cleaned, split open, salted, and finally dried in the sun, having been at times at all events preserved by salting.

7. Regarding the 'clean' birds, all of which were allowed as food (Dt 14:11), no definite criterion is prescribed, but a list of prohibited species is given (Lk 11:13-14, Dt 14:11-19). Most birds of prey, including the eagle, are excluded by the ritual of various sacrifices, however, pigeons and turtle doves, and these only, find a place, and are therefore to be reckoned as 'clean' for ordinary purposes. Haswell shows that the early domestication of these birds is shown by the reference to the offices of the dove-cots in Is 60, while the Mishna has much to say regarding various breeds of domestic pigeons, their 'towers,' feeding, etc. The ordinary domestic fowl is generally reckoned as a bird of peace. It has been introduced into Palestine from the East in the Persian period (2 Es 1:9, Mt 23:7, 26th and parallels). The fatted fowl for Solomon's table (1 K 4:2) are generally supposed to be geese, which with poultry and house-pigeons are frequently named in the Mishna. Roast goose was a favourite food of the Egyptians, and has, indeed, been called their national dish.

Among the edible game birds mention is made of the partridge and the quail (see these articles). Most or all of these were probably included in the 'fowls' (lit. birds) which appeared on Nehemiah's table (5:4). The humble sparrow (Mt 10:19, Lk 12:19) would have been beneath the dignity of a Persian governor. The eagles of all the clean birds were also important articles of food (Dt 22:10, Is 10:6, Lk 11:5, Job 6:6) and doubtless, see RVm). Carrion eagles have recently been found in an early grave at Gezer (PEFS 1907, 191).

8. Under the head of animal food must also be reckoned the various edible insects enumerated, Lk 11:12, apparently four species of the locust family (see Locust). Lombricks were regarded as delicious by the Assyrians, formed part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3:4, Mk 1:11), and are still eaten by the Arabs. By the latter they are prepared in various ways, one of the commonest being to remove the head, legs, and wings, and to fry the body in salt or clarified butter. Locusts may also be preserved by salting. This is the place, further, to refer to the article Honir for information regarding the important article of diet.

9. Nothing has as yet been said on the subject of condiments. Salt, the chief of condiments, will be treated separately (see Salt). Of the others it has been said, 'before pepper was discovered or came into general use, seeds like cummin, the ginger, e.g., naturally played a more important role.' Of these the greyish-white seeds of the coriander are named in Ex 23:9, Nu 11; these are still used in the East as a spice in bread-making and to flavour sweets. Similarly the seeds of the black cummin (Is 28:2) are sprinkled on bread like caraway seeds among ourselves. For the other condiments, mint, anise, cummin, are listed, and with, see the separate articles. To these may be added mustard of which the leaves, not the seed, (Mt 13:31), were cut up and used as flavouring. Pepper is first mentioned in the Mishnah. The caper-berry (Ec 12:4) was eaten before meals as an appetizer, rather than used as a condiment.

10. Reference has already been made to the restrictions laid upon the Hebrews in the matter of animal food, the laws by the all-important distinction between 'clean' and 'unclean,' as applied not only to quadrupeds, but to fish, birds, and winged creatures generally. All creatures technically 'unclean' were taboo, to use the Mishnaic expression, 'clean for sacrifice, but taboo,' as our Lord expressed it, 'to eat' (Mt 15:19). All artificial foods which had therefore to be drained of their blood before any part could be offered to God or man, and so with all animals slaughtered for domestic use only (Dt 12:21), and with all game of beast and bird taken in the chase (Lv 17:13).

Closely associated with the above (cf. Lk 3:3) is the taboo imposed upon certain specified portions of the intestinal fat of the three sacrificial species, the ox, the sheep, and the goat (Lk 3:3, 726', etc.), to which, as we have seen, the fat tail of the sheep was added. There was forbidden, further, the flesh of every animal that died a natural death, the ordinary domestic fowl of the like age, and of the cows, sheep, and goats themselves, as being also subjected to death by a beast of prey (Ex 22:1, Lk 17:14); in short, all flesh was rigidly taboo except that of an animal which had been ritually slaughtered as above prescribed. For another curious taboo, see Gn 25:29. The Jews of the present day eat only such meat as has been certified by their own authorities as kosher, i.e. as having been killed in the manner prescribed by Rabbinic law. And the intimate association in early times between flesh-food and sacrifice explains the abhorrence of the Hebrew for all food prepared by the heathen, as illustrated by Daniel (Dan 1:2), Judas Maccabeus (2 Mac 5), Josephus (Ant 3), and their associates (cf. also Ac 15:29, 1 Co 8-13, 10:19, 20).

11. A word finally as to the sources of the Hebrew food-supply. Under the simpler conditions of early times the exclusive source of supply was the householder's own herd (Gn 18:7) or flock (27), his vineyard and oliveyard or his 'garden of herbs' (1 K 2:17). As the Hebrews became dwellers in cities their food-stuffs naturally became more and more articles of commerce. The bakers, for example, who gave their name to a street in Jerusalem (Jer 37), not only fired the dough prepared in private houses, as at the present day, but, doubtless, baked and sold bread to the public, as did their successors in the first and second centuries (see 267).
Mehina, pasur). An active trade in "victuals" is attested for Nehemiah's day (13 f.), when we hear of the "fish-gate" (Si) and the "sheep gate" (Si), so named, doubtless, from their respective markets. The disciples would ordinarily buy provisions as they went through the land (Jn 4 f.; cf. 139); and Corinth, we may be sure, was not the only city of the time that had a provision-market (1 Co 10.5, EV shambles). In Jerusalem, again, fish was to be bought in the Cheesemakers' Valley (Tyropeon), and oil at the oil-merchants (Mt 25), and so on. In the early morning especially, the streets near the city gates on the north and west, which led to the country, were doubtless then, as now, transformed into market-places, lined with men and women offering for sale the produce of their farms and gardens. Even the outer court of the Temple itself had in our Lord's day become a "house of merchandise" (Jn 2.4).

FOOL.—The Heb. language is rich in words which express various kinds of folly. 1. The keši is glib of tongue, "his mouth is his destruction" (Pr 18:1; cf. 19:14); in Ec 5:1, "the sacrifice of fools" is offered by him who is rash with his mouth. But such an one is "foolish, wrangling, and a stumbling-block to the world." 2. The səḇāh manifests his folly not in speech, but in action; it was after David had numbered the people that he reproached himself for acting "very foolish" (24:10). Consequences prove that many of this class have blundered in their calculations (Gn 31:17, 1 S 18:11, Is 44:12). 3. The eḇēf is stupid, impetuous of reproof, often sullen and quarrelsome. He despises wisdom and instruction (Pr 17, cf. 15:1), is soon angry (Pr 12:17, 27), and may sometimes be described as sinful (Pr 5:20, 24). 4. The folly of the səḇāh is never more intellectual deficiency or stupidity; it is a moral fault, sometimes a crime, always a sin. "To commit folly," is an euphemism for gross uncharitableness (Dt 22, Jez 22), the word is used also of sacrifice (Jos 7:4), of blasphemy (Ps 74:4), as well as of impurity in general (Dt 31, Ps 14). These words are sometimes employed in a more general sense; to determine the shade of meaning applicable in any passage, a study of the context is essential. For further details see Kennedy, Hebrew Synonyms, p. 29 ff.

In the NT the Gr. words for "fool" describe him as "deficient in understanding" (Lk 24:47), "unwise" (Eph 5:1), "senseless" (Lk 12), "untimely" (Ro 1). The Gr. word which corresponds to the "impoor foolish" of the OT is found in Mt 5:28; Raca expresses "contempt for the foot" (Mt 18:9); Našaḥ expresses "contempt for his heart and character"—you scoundrel! (Bruc. EOT, in loc.). If more were a Hebrew expression of condemnation (RVm), it would "express the distinction of being the only pure Hebrew word in the Greek Testament" (Field, Notes on the Translation of NT, p. 3). A "pure Hebrew word" means a word not taken from the LXX and not Aramaic.

FOOT.—Is 33:14. It refers to the ornaments of women's feet. Most of the metaphorical or figurative usages are connected with the idea of the feet as the lowest part of the body, opposed to the head; hence falling at a man's feet, as the extreme of reverence or humility, kissing the feet (Lk 7:45), sitting at the feet, as the attitude of the pupil (Lk 10:24, Ac 22:2). The foot was literally placed on the neck of conquered foes (Jos 10:8), as may be seen in Egyptian monuments. Hence "under foot", in the sense of subjection (Ps 90:1, 1 Co 15). In Ps 136:3 the reference is to some system of irrigation in vogue in Egypt, either to the turning of a water-wheel by the foot, or to a method of distributing water from a canal "by foot". In harmony with the foot the small ridges which regulate its flow (Driver, in loc.). Other usages arise from the feet asastained or defiled in walking. The shinking of dust from the feet (Mt 10, Ac 13) was the sign of complete rejection; the land was as a heathen land, and its dust unclean. So the sandals were removed as a sign of reverence (Ex 3, Jos 34; covering the feet, Is 6). To remove the sandal was also the sign of the renunciation of a right (Dt 25, Ru 4). To walk barefoot was the symbol of mourning (2 S 13; or slavery (Is 20)). Jer 2:14 Withhold thy foot from being unshod, i.e. do not wear the shoes off your feet in running after strange gods.

Washing the feet was one of the regular duties of hospitality (Gn 18, Ex 30:18, 2 S 11, Ca 5, Lk 7). The use of ointment for this purpose was the sign of the penitent's lavish love (Lk 7, Jn 12). The washing of the feet at the Last Supper is the idea of Christ's love for his men (Jn 13). Christ 'the Lord and Master' assumes the garb and does the work of a slave (18). The lesson is not merely one of humility (cf. the dispute in Lk 22), but of ready and self-sacrificing service. An interesting Rabbinic parallel is quoted on Exx 16: "Among men the slave washes his master; but with God it is not so." Edersheim further sees in the act a substitute for the washing of hands which was part of the Paschal ceremonial; and there may be a reference to the proverb, connected with the Greek mysteries, that a great undertaking must not be entered upon "with unwashed feet." The service of the Kingdom of heaven (especially in the crisis of that night) is not to be approached in the spirit of unthinking pride shown in the dispute about precedence (see D. Smith, The Days of His Flesh, p. 440). Besides the lesson of humility, there is also the symbolism of purification. St. Peter, at first protesting, afterwards characteristically accepts this as literal. Christ's reply takes up the figure of one who has walked from the bath to his host's house, and needs only to have the dust of his journey removed. But simply, they are clean by their consecration to Him, but they need continual cleansing from the defilements of daily life. 'It seems impossible not to see in the word 'bathed' a foretelling of the cleansing of sins by the blood of Christ and the mercy of his intercession (cf. acq. loc.). The same or other commentaries should be consulted for later imitations of the ceremony (cf. 1 T 5:1)."}

C. W. EMMENT.

FOOTMAN.—This word is used in two different senses: 1. A foot-soldier, always in plur. foot-soldiers, infantry. Footmen, probably composed the whole of the Isr. forces (1 S 4:15) before the time of David. 2. A runner on foot; 1 S 22:5 (AVm 'or servant, Heb. runners'; RV 'foot,) and Lk 17:17 ("runners"). 'Runners' would be the literal, and at the same time the most appropriate, rendering. The king had a body of runners about him, not so much to guard his person as to run his errands and do his bidding. They formed a recognized part of the royal state (1 S 8, 2 S 15); they served as executioners (1 S 226, 2 K 10); and, accompanying the king or his general into battle, they brought back official tidings of his progress or event (2 S 18). In Jer 12 both the Hebr. and the Eng. (footmen) seem to be used in the more general sense of racers on foot.

FOOTSTOOL.—See HOUSE, § 5.

FORBEARANCE.—See LONGSUFFERING.

FORD.—Of the numerous 'fords' or passages of the Jordan, two in ancient times were of chief importance: that opposite Jericho near Gilgal (Jos 2, Jez 34), and that at Bethabara (mod. 'Abarah), at the junction of the Jaulud (which drains the Jerseel valley) and the Jordan. Bridges are mentioned for the Jordan in 2 S 13. In 2 S 15:2-17 the AV has 'plain for fords,' and in Jez 12:4 'passages.' Other fords were those of the Jabbeek (On 329) and the Arnon (Is 16).

FOREHEAD.—In Jer 3:17. the Hebr. 'forehead' is a type of shamelessness; in Ezk 3:2 the forehead stands for obstinacy. In 9 the righteous receive a mark, probably the letter Two, on their forehead. Hence the symbolism in Rev 7, etc., where the mark is the Divine signet. It is doubtful what is the mark of the beast (Rev 13:1); see Swete, ad loc. 17a is a probable allusion to a custom of Roman harlots. Shaving the forehead in ancient mourning is forbidden (Dt 22:12). For Exk 16(2), see RV. See also Marks. C. W. EMMET.

FOREIGNER.—See NATIONS, STRANGER.

FOREKNOWLEDGE.—See PREDestination.

FORERUNNER.—The English word gives the exact sense of the Greek prooromos, which, in its classical usage, signifies 'one who goes before'; it may be as a scout to reconnoitre, or as a herald to anoint the coming of the king and to make ready the way for the royal journey.

1. The Baptist was our Lord’s ‘forerunner.’ The word is never applied to him in the NT, but he was the ‘messenger’ sent ‘before the faces of the Lord’ to prepare his way (Mt 11:10, Mk 1:2, Lk 7:17; cf. Mal 3:1), and to exhort others to ‘make his paths straight’ (Mk P; cf. Is 40:3f.).

2. Only in He 1:6 is the word ‘forerunner’ found in the EV (Wyclif ‘the bifoar goer’, Rheims ‘the precursor’). Instead of the AV ‘whither the forerunner has for us entered, even Jesus’, the RV rightly renders: ‘whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us.’ The change is important.

To the readers of this Epistle it was to be a startling announcement that Jesus had entered the Holy of Holies as a forerunner. Thither the Jewish high priest, one day in the year, went alone (He 9). He was the people’s representative, but he was not their forerunner, for none might dare to follow him. The key-note of the Epistle is that all believers have access with boldness to the presence of the Most Holy God ‘in the blood of Jesus; they have this boldness because their High Priest has inaugurated for them a fresh and living way (He 10).

Already within the veil hope enters with assurance, for Jesus has ‘gone that we may follow in the footsteps of the Forerunner of His redeemed who inaugurated their entrance. He makes intercession for them, and He is preparing for them a place (Jn 14).

Commenting on the significance of this ‘one word,’ L. H. E. CHALLIS says that it ‘expresses the whole essential difference between the Christian and the Levitical religion—between the religion that brings men nigh to God, and the religion that kept or left men standing afar off’ (Expositor, viii. [1898], p. 167 f.).

J. G. TARKER.

FOREST.—1. gath (root meaning a ‘rugged’ place), Dt 19, 2 K 2, Jer 45, Mic 3 etc. 2. horesh, 2 Ch 27 etc. tr. ‘wood’, Is 13, 23 (perhaps a proper name). 3. parash; Neh 9, 11, 14; Jer 9, 22, etc. “paras.” also tr. ‘orchards’, Ca 6, Ec 2, RV ‘parke.’ From the many references it is clear that Palestine had more extensive forests in ancient times than to-day, —indeed, within living memory there has been a vast destruction of trees for fuel. Considerable patches of woodland still exist, e.g. on Tabor and Carmel, in parts of N. Galilee, around Banias, and especially in Gilead between e-Salt and the Jabbok. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FORGETFULNESS.—Ps 89:2 “Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?” The meaning is general, as Coverdale ‘the londe where all things are forgotten,’ but probably more passive than active, that the person is forgotten rather than that he forgets. So Wis 17:4, but in Wis 15:4 16, Sir 11:24 the word expresses the tendency to forget.

FORGIVENESS.—Like many other words employed to convey ideas connected with the relations of God and man, this covers a variety of thoughts. In both OT and NT we have evidences of a more elastic vocabulary than the EV would lead us to suppose. 1. The OT has at least three different words all tr. ‘forgiveness’ or ‘pardon,’ referring either to God’s actions with regard to men (cf. Ex 33, Ps 86, Neh 9) or to forgiveness extended to men by each other (cf. Gn 50:21, 1 S 25).

At a very early period of human, or at least of Jewish, history, some sense of the need of forgiveness by God seems to have been felt. This will be especially evident if the words of despairing complaint put into the mouth of Caln be treated literally (see Driver, The Book of Genesis, p. 43, cf. RVm). The power to forgive came to be looked on as inherent in God, who not only possessed the authority, but loved thus to exhibit His mercy (Dt 9:1, Neh 9:17, Jer 33:8). In order, however, to obtain this gift, a corresponding condition of humiliation and repentance on man’s part had to be fulfilled (2 Ch 7:14, Ps 89), and without a conscious determination of the transgressor to amend and turn from his misdeeds, no hope of pardon was held out (Jos 24:2, 2 K 24, Jer 6:17).

On the other hand, as soon as men acknowledged their errors, and asked God to forgive, no limit was set to His love in this respect (1 K 8:38, Ps 103; cf. Dt 30:4). Nor could this condition be regarded as unreasonable, for holiness, the essential characteristic of the Divine nature, demanded an answering correspondence on the part of man. Indeed, the proclivity of the human heart was such that the grace of forgiveness was rendered impossible, and that, so to speak, automatically (cf. Lv 19, Jos 24:14; see Nu 14:2, Job 10:4). It has been argued, indeed, that in the OT the word was applied to God only in cases of personal intercession, whereas in the NT it has a wider meaning than any word in the Greek text, and is applied to God in cases of public intercession.

According to the legalistic code, when wrong was done between man and man, the first requisite in order to Divine pardon was restitution, which had to be followed up by a service of atonement (Lv 6:7). Even in the case of sins of omission or repentance and its outward expression in sacrifice had to precede forgiveness (Lv 4, Nu 15, etc.). Here the educative influence of the Law must have been powerful, inculcating as it did at once the transcendent holiness of God and the need of a similar holiness on the part of His people (Lv 11:4). Thus the Pauline saying, ‘The law hath been our tutor to bring us to Christ’ (Gal 3), is profoundly true, and the great priestly services of the Temple, with the solemn acts of burnt sacrifice, were, in a sense, preludes to the mystical forgiveness which the new dispensation would bring with it. Indeed, Paul describes the One sacrifice for sins for ever as ‘the sacrifice that doth make perfect for ever’ (He 9:11). The idea of forgiveness, or of the atonement for sin, was not only a sign of God’s grace but also a means of the renewal of the applicant’s life. The new creature is born of water and of the Spirit, and the water signifies the baptism of forgiveness (1 Jn 3:3, 5:12; cf. Gal 3:24).

3. We are thus not surprised to learn that belief in the forgiveness of sins was a cardinal article of the Jewish faith in the time of Jesus (Mk 2 = Lk 5, cf. Is 53). Nor was the teaching of Jesus in any instance out of line with the national belief, for, according to His words, the source of all pardon was His Father (Mk 11:24, Mt 6:14; cf. His appeal on the cross, ‘Father, forgive them,’ Lk 23). It is true that ‘the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins’ (Mt 9:2, Mk 2:5 = Lk 5), but the form of the expression shows that Jesus was laying claim to a delegated authority (cf. Lk 7, where, in the case of the palsied man, the words are declarative rather than absolute; see Plummer, I Cor., ed loc.). This is more clearly seen by a reference to NT epistolar literature, where again and again forgiveness and restoration are spoken of as mediated ‘in’ or ‘through’ Christ (Eph 1:7, Col 1:14, 2 Th 4:1, 1 Jn 2:1). Here, as in OT, only more insistently dwelt on, the consciousness of guilt and of the need of personal holiness is the first step on the road to God’s forgiveness (1 Jn 1, cf. Ps 32:5; etc.); and the open acknowledgment of these feelings is looked on as the natural outcome of their existence (Ac 10:14; cf. Ro 10:4, 1 Jn 1:19). The hopelessness which at times seemed to have settled down on Jesus, when confronted by Pharisaic opposition, and the result of the moral and spiritual blindness of the religious teachers to their real position (Jn 9:41). 3. Again, following along the line we have traced in the NT writers affirm the necessity for a moral likeness between God and man (cf. Mt 5:48). It is in this region, perhaps, that the most striking development is to be seen. Without exhibiting, in their relations to the Law, the spirit of forgiveness, men need never hope to experience God's pardon for themselves. This, we are inclined to think, is the most striking feature in the ethical creations of Jesus' teaching. By almost every reference to the Law made, only more definitely and specifically emphasized by the NT writers, it is plain that some definite border-line is referred to as the line of demarcation between those who may hope for this evidence of God's love and those who are outside its scope (Mt 12:29). See art. Sin, n. 1.

4. We have lastly to consider the words, recorded only by St. John, of the risen Jesus to His assembled disciples (Ap 1:17), it is remarkable that this is the only place (Mt 6:1= Mk 11, Mk 11:26, Lk 17) and elaborate parable (Mt 18:28). He sought to attune the minds of His hearers to the divine nature of the Church, to bear it in mind that the Church is God's temple, and that the Christian spirit (cf. Col 2:8, 1 Jn 4:1)" once more, Jesus definitely asserts the limitation to which the pardon and mercy of God are limited. Whatever may be the purpose of the tax due and the words "an eternal place" (Mt 22:3), the common view of the place to which the word "glory" (Ap 1:7) is referred, is the line of demarcation between those who may hope for this evidence of God's love and those who are outside its scope (Mt 12:29). See art. Sin, n. 1.

5. The fruit of the promised forgiveness is seen in the fulness of the Christian life (Ac 2:47, 10:2, 19:18). 6. On more than one occasion St. Paul speaks of the forgiveness of sins as constituting the redemption of the human race (cf. Rom 3:24, Eph 1:7, Col 1:14), and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes this aspect of the atoning work of Jesus by showing its harmony with all that had previously been said (the modern text has margin: 'from sheddings of blood there is no remission') (9:22). The same writer, moreover, asserts that this object has been accomplished, nothing further remains to be done, except that these "sins" (10:14) than that which the "blood of Jesus" (10:19) has accomplished. The triumphant cry of the Crucified, 'It is finished' (Jn 19:30), is for this writer the guarantee not only that 'the work of Christ is the objective ground on which the sins of men are remitted' (Dale, The Atonement, p. 450 f.;) it is also the assurance that forgiveness of sin is the goal of the life and death of Christ whose first words from the cross brought a prayer for the forgiveness of His tormentors. See art. Forgiveness, n. 2.

FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT. At the date of the Hebrew invasion of Canaan its inhabitants were forced to be in possession of 'cities great and fenced up to heaven' (Dt 9:1; cf. Nu 13:16, Jos 14:31), most of them, as is now known, with a history of many centuries behind them. The inhabited places, themselves of two classes, walled and unwalled (Dt 9), the latter comprising the country villages, the former the very numerous 'cities,' which though small in area, were 'fenced' (the modern term for everywhere adopted by Amer. RV), 'with high walls, gates, and bars.' In this article it is proposed to indicate the nature of the walls by which these cities were fenced and the purpose they served, in the light of the, often mentioned in Hebrew history, and nearly a thousand years before the time of Christ (700 B.C.), these walls were constructed in Canaan about the middle of the third millennium, and were able with their heavy bronze to carry the art of fortification far beyond this primitive stage. Their cities were planted for the most part on an outlying spur of a mountain range, or on a more or less isolated eminence or tell. In either case the steep rock-faces of nature's building may be said to have been the city's first line of defence. The walls, of crude brick or stone, with which art imitated nature, followed the contours of the ridge, the rock itself being frequently cut away to form artificial scarps, on the top of which the city wall was built. Consequently the walls were not required to be of uniform height throughout the enclosure, and the rock scarps were steepest, and highest on that side of the city from which approach was easiest and attack must be feared. In the latter case, as at Jerusalem, which was accessible only from the north, it was usual to strengthen the defences by a wide and deep trench. Where, on the other hand, the city was perched upon an elevated tell, as at Gezer, Lachish, and in the Shephelah generally, a trench was not required. The recent excavations in Palestine have shown that the fortifications of Canaanite and Hebrew cities were built, like their houses, of sun-dried bricks, or of stone, or of both combined. When brick was the chief material it was usual to begin with one or more foundation courses of stone as a protection against damp. After the introduction of the battering-ram (§ 6) it was necessary to increase the resistance of brick walls by a revetment of facing of stone, or less frequently of kiln-burnt bricks, more especially in the lower part of the wall. At Tell el-Hesi or Lachish the lower face of the north wall 'had been preserved by a strengthening wall on the outside, consisting of large rough stones in a partly horizontal and partly vertical layers, of three feet away, with the intervening space filled in with pebbles' (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 29). At Tell es-Safi, again—perhaps the ancient Gath—the lower part of the city wall 'shows external and internal facades of rubble with a plastering of coarse and small field stones,' while the upper part had been built of large mud bricks (Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, 30—to be cited in the sequel as BM. Exc. 1893) on a glacis of 3 ft. (OT iv. 12), or 'the glacis of 8 ft. 6 in.' (OT iv. 13), corresponding to the acropolis of Tell er-Rumeida (Tell el-Hesi, an older city), behind which an ancient city was seen, to the west, with its walls being 16 ft. high. At Phaestos, the thickness of the walls varied from city to city, and even in the same city, being to a certain extent dependent on the required height at any given point. The outer wall of Gezer, of date c. B.C. 1500, was 14 ft. thick, and at Lachish was 'at least 17 feet thick,' while a thickness of 28 ft. is reached by a wall which is regarded as the oldest fortification of Megiddo. The foot of this wall, according to the well-known detailed descriptions, was protected by a glacis of beaten earth. To increase the strength of a wall, the earliest builders were content to add to its thickness by means of buttresses, which, by increasing the projection, gradually pass into towers. The latter were indispensable at the corners of walls (cf. 2 Ch 20:1, Zeph 1:11, both RVm; see the plans of the walls and towers of Tell Zakariya etc. in BM. Exc.) besides strengthening the wall, the projecting towers were of the first importance as enabling the defenders to command the portion of the walls, technically the 'curtain,' between them.

Col. Billerbeck, a recognised authority on ancient fortifications, demonstrated that the length of the curtain between the towers was determined by the effective range of the bows and slings of the period, which he estimates at 30 metres, or 100 feet (Der Fortschritt beim Altertumswinkcl, etc.). This estimate receives a striking confirmation from the earlier of the two walls of Gezer, of date c. B.C. 2500. This wall is provided with 'long narrow towers, of small projection, at intervals of 90 feet,' which is precisely the distance between the towers of Sargon's city at Khorsabad. The most famous towers in later history are the three 'royal towers' of Herod's Jerusalem—Hippicus, Phasaeus, and Mariamme.

3. The height of the fortifications, as we have seen, varied with the nature of the site. The minimum height, according to Billerbeck (op. cit. 6), was about 30 feet, this being the maximum length of the ancient scaling-ladders. No Canaanite city wall, however, has yet been found intact, and we can only calculate roughly from the breadth what the height may have been in any particular case. The former, according to the authority just quoted, had for reasons of stability to be from one-third to two-thirds of the height. From the numerous representations of city walls on the Assyrian sculptures, and from other sources, we know that the walls were furnished with a breastwork or battlements, generally crenellated—probably the pinacles of L 542 (OT iv. 14)—or with projecting battlements supported on corbels springing from the wall. When the site was strongly protected by nature, a single wall sufficed; otherwise it was necessary to have a double wall, which would have an outer wall six feet thick, and an inner one three feet thick. This is the chil frequently mentioned in OT, generally rendered rampart (1 K 219; or bulwark) is 29). At Tell Sandalannah—probably the ancient Marashah—were found two walls of the same period, the outer being in some places 15 feet in advance of the inner (BM. Exc. 54). It was on a similar outer wall (chil) that the 'wise woman of Abel of Beth-macaah' held her stand with Jeob (2 S 29), for the reading see Cant. Bible, in loc.). Jerusalem, as is well known, was, latterly 'fenced' on the N. and N.W. by three independent walls (see JERUSALEM).

In addition to these citadels there is frequent mention in OT of fortresses in the modern sense of the word,—that is, strong places specially designed to protect the frontier, and to command the road and pass by which the country might be invaded. Such were most of the places built, i.e. fortified, by Solomon (1 K 9:17; i.e. the 'strong holds' fortified and provisioned by Rechobom (2 Ch. 11:11), the 'castle' of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25:2), and many more. A smaller isolated fort was named the 'tower of the watchmen' (2 K 17:18). Among the more famous fortresses of later times may be named as types: the Idumean fortress of Bethera, conspicuous in the Maccabean struggle; Jotapata, the fortress in Galilee associated with the name of the historian Josephus; Machera, said by Pliny to have been the strongest place in Palestine, next to Jerusalem; and Masada, the scene of the Jews' last stand against the Romans.

While there is Egyptian evidence for the existence of fortesse in Southern Palestine or the neighbourhood as early as c. 3500, and while a statue of Gudes (c. n.c. 3000), with the tracing of an elaborate fortress, shows that the early Babylonians were expert fortress builders, the oldest actual remains of a Canaanite fortress are those discovered by Schumacher on the site of Megiddo and dated by him between c. n.c. 2500 and 2000. Its most interesting feature is a fosse 8 ft. wide and from 6 to 10 ft. deep, with a counter-scarp lined with stone. At the neighbouring Taanach Dr. Sellin laid bare several forts, among them a now famous 'castle of Jehu-Washshur,' in which was found 'the first Palestinian library yet discovered,' in the shape of a series of cuneiform tablets containing this prince's correspondence with neighbouring chiefs.

It is impossible within the limits of this article to give details of these interesting buildings. The student is referred to Sellin's Tell Tautanek in vol. 60 (1904), and his Nachlaes in vol. 52 (1905), of the Denkschriften des Vienna Academy.
FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT

An excellent résumé, with plans and photographs, both of the Taanach and the Meedidé fortresses, is given by Father Vincent in his Censure d'après l'exploration récente, pp. 47-50. More easily accessible to the ordinary student is the detailed account, with measurements and plans, of the citadel of Tell Zakkad, the ancient Abel-Meholah fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11, cf. Jer 34) —given by Blies and Macalister in their Excavations, etc., pp. 14-23, and plates 2-5. The most effective arrangement was to make the gateway a passage through a single gate-tower, which projected beyond both the outer and inner faces of the wall. In such cases two gates were provided, an outer and an inner, at either end of the passage, as was the case at Mahanaim, where David is found sitting 'between the two gates' (2 S 18). Here we further learn that it was usual to have a stair leading up to an upper storey in the gate-tower (v. 21), the roof of which was apparently on a level with the top of the city wall (v. 23). In a place of straightforward passage-way through the tower, a passage bent at a right angle behind the base L increased the possibilities of defence. In most cases the base of the L would be on the inside, towards the city, but in one of the Taanach forts above referred to the outer gate is on the side of an outer tower, and the inner gate at the corner. The Assyrians, in their siege-ramming line with the 'mount' (as restored plan in Vincent, op. cit. 59). The average width of the numerous gateways laid bare by recent excavation is about nine feet. Each, called the 'door of the gate' in Neh 6, consisted ordinarily of two parts or leaves (Is 45). Of wood. For greater security against fire these were often overlaid with bronze, the 'gates of brass' of Ezk 4, 17. The hinged parts which turned in sockets in the sill and lintel, and were fastened by bolts let into the former. A strong bar or bar of wood, bronze (1 K 4), or iron (Job 40) was furnished for the purpose. The wooden posts, as we learn from Samson's exploit at Gaza (Jg 16). To have the charge of the gate (2 K 7) was a military post of honour, as this passage shows. In war time, at least, a sentinel was posted on the roof of the gate-house or tower (2 S 18, cf. 2 K 9). It remains to deal briefly with the siegecraft of the Hebrews and their contemporaries. A 'fenced' or 'fortified' place might be secured in three ways: (a) by assault or storm (b) by a blockade, or (c) by a regular siege. (a) The first method was most likely to succeed in the case of places of moderate strength, or where treachery was at work (cf. Jg 15). The assault was directed against the weakest part of the enceinte, particularly the gates (cf. Is 28). Before the Hebrews learned the use of the battering-ram, entrance to an enemy's city or fortress was obtained by setting fire to the gates (Jg 9, 5), and by scaling the walls by means of scaling-ladders, under cover of a deadly shower of arrows and sling-stones. According to 1 Ch 11, Joab was the first to scale the walls of the Jebusite fortress of Zion, when David took it by assault. Although scaling-ladders are explicitly mentioned only in 1 Mac 5—a prior reference may be found in Pr 21—these are familiar objects in the Egyptian representations of sieges from an early date, as well as in the later Assyrian representations, and may be assumed to have been used by the Hebrews from the first. In early times, as is plain from the accounts of the capture of Ai (Joe 8) and Jericho (Jg 5), a favourite strategem was to entice the defenders from the city by a pretended flight, and then a force placed in ambush would make a dash for the gate. (b) The second method was to completely surround the city, and, by preventing ingress and egress, to starve it into surrender. This was evidently the method adopted by Joab at the blockade of Rabbath-ammon, which was forced to capitulate after the capture of the 'water fort' (for this rendering see Cent. Bible on 2 S 12), by which the defenders' main water-supply was cut off. (c) In conducting a regular siege, which of course included both blockade and assault, the first step was to cast up a 'bank' (AV Ezekiel 4:17—RV has 'bank,' 19/2, Rv 'mount' throughout). This was a mound of earth which was gradually advanced till it reached the walls, and was almost equal to them in height, and from which the besiegers could meet the besieged on more equal terms. The 'mount' is first met with in the account of Joab's siege of Abel of Beth-maccah (2 S 20). In EV Joab is represented as, at the same time, 'battering,' or, in RVm, 'undermining' the wall, but the text is here in some disorder. Battering-rams are first mentioned in Ezekiel, and are scarcely to be expected so early as the time of David. The Egyptians used a long pole, with a metal point shaped like a spear-head, which was not swung but worked by hand, and could only be effective, therefore, against walls of crude brick (see illustr. in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., i. 242). The battering-rams were used by both the Assyrians and the Babylonians. The Assyrians carried with them their large spear-head, as with the Egyptians, or in a flat head shod with metal, and was worked under the shelter of large wooden towers mounted on four or six wheels, of which there are many representations in the Assyrian wall-sculptures (see illustr. in Toy's Ezekiel, 'SBOT, 102). These were sometimes of several storeys, in which the archers were stationed, and were moved forward against the walls on the advance of the troops. When Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, his troops are said to have 'built forts against it round about' (2 K 13, cf. Ezk 44), but the original term is obscure, and is rather, probably, to be understood in the sense of a siege-wall or circumvallation—the 'bank' of Lk 19—RV for the purpose of making the blockade effective. On the other hand, the bulwarks of Dt 20, also Ez 9, which had to be made of wood other than 'trees for meat,' properly denote wooden forts or other siege works (Is 29) built for the protection of the besiegers in their efforts to storm or undermine the walls.

7. The Assyrian siegeworks give life to the various operations of ancient siegeworks. Here we see the massive battering-rams detaching the stones or bricks from an angle of the wall, while the defenders, by means of a grappling-chain, are attempting to drag the ram from its covering tower. There the archers are pouring a heavy fire on the men upon the wall, from behind large rectangular shields or screens of wood or wickerwork, standing on the ground, with a small projecting cover. These are Intended by the shield of 2 K 19, the 'buckler' of Ezk 26, and the 'mantelet' of Nah 2, all named in connexion with siege works. In another place the miners are busy undermining the wall with picks, protected by a curved screen of wicker-work supported by a pole (illustr. of both screens in Toy, op. cit. 149; cf. Wilkinson, op. cit. i. 243). The monuments also show that the Assyrians had machines for casting stones on the towers, or siege-artillery, are said to have been invented in Sicily in B.C. 339. By the 'artillery' of 1 S 20 AV is, of course, meant the ordinary bow and arrows; but Ezziah is credited by the Chronicler with having 'made engines invented by cunning men to be on the towers' and upon the battlements to shoot arrows and great stones withal' (2 Ch 29). The Books of the Maccabees show that by the second century, at least, the Jews were not behind their neighbours in the use of the artillery (1 Mac 6:11, AV) of the period, 'engines of war and Instruments for casting fire and stones, and pieces to cast darts and slings. (A detailed description, with illustrations, of these catapultae and ballistae, as the Romans termed them, will be found in the art. Tormentum in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq..) At the siege of Gezer (such is the best reading, 1 Mac 13:6) Simon is even said to have used effectively a piece of the most formidable siege-engine then known, the trapezitēs—city-taker, RV "enginery" also employed in the siege of Jerusalem (for description see Helepolis in Smith, op. cit.). In this siege the Jews had 300 pieces for discharging arrows or rather bolts (catapultae), and 40 pieces for casting stones (ballistae), according to Josephus, who gives a graphic account of the working of these formidable 'engines of war' in his story of the siege of Jotapata (BJ iv. 27, 24).

3. The aim of the besieged was either by artifice in their power to counteract the efforts of the besiegers to scale or to make a breach in the walls (Am 4:1), and in particular to destroy their siege works and artillery. The battering-rams were rendered ineffective by letting down bags of chaff and other fenders from the battlements, or were thrown out of action by grappling-chains, or by having the head broken off by huge stones hurled from above. The mounds supporting the besiegers' towers were undermined, and the towers themselves and the other engines set on fire (1 Mac 6:24; cf. the 'dery darts' or arrows of Eph 6:17).

4. At the end of the efforts of the bowmen, slingers, and javelin-throwers, who manned the walls, boiling oil was poured on those attempting to place the scaling-ladders, or to pass the boarding-bridges from the towers to the battlements. Of all these and many other expedients FORTUNATUS distinguishes the braccia and ladders, and artifices (187) for the destruction of the towers of Josephus, which is a list of the instruments cast and castles, and of the darts, and the *ladders, and the artifices of these instruments. The story of the siege of Jerusalem is introduced, which is a detailed account of the work of the foundation (Ps 89:17). The city that had the foundations is the type of the real and eternal (He 11:11). The Apostles themselves are the foundation of the New Jerusalem, formed of all manner of precious stones (Rev 21:11-14). 'The Apostle Church is conditioned through the ages by the preaching and work of the Apostolate' (Swete, ad loc.: cf. Is 28:15, Mt 16:18, Eph 2:20). In 1 Cor 3:18 the metaphor is slightly different, the preaching of Jesus Christ being the one foundation (1 Cor 3:11), where the word is used of the chief men of the State. In the frequent phrase 'from the foundation of the world,' the word is active, meaning 'founder.' 'Foundations' occurs only in a passive and formal sense, the earth being formed or less literally conceived of as a huge building resting on pillars etc. (Ps 18:15, 24:4, Is 24:20). In Ps 11:7, 52, Ezek 30, the idea is applied metaphorically to the 'fundamental' principles of law and justice on which the moral order rests. In 2 Ch 35, Is 6:16, Jer 50:4, RV should be followed. In 2 Ch 23 the 'gate of the foundation' is obscure; possibly we should read 'the horse-gate.' See also House § 3. C. W. Emmett.

FOUNTAIN.—A word applied to living springs of water as contrasted with the artifical (Lk 17:17, specifically of Beer-lahai-roi (Gen 16:17), Elim (Nu 33:36, RV here 'springs'), Neptun (Jos 15:8), and Jezreel (1 S 29:2). The porous chalky limestone of Palestine abounds in such springs of water, which, owing to the nature of soil in a country rainless half the year, were eagerly coveted (Jg 14). In many springs the flow of water has been directed and increased by enlarging to tunnels the fissures through which the water trickled; many of these tunnels are of considerable length. Specimens exist at 'Urtas, Bittir, and other places near Jerusalem.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

FOWL.—The word 'fowl' is used in AV for any kind of bird. The two words 'bird' and 'fowl' are employed simply for the sake of variety or perhaps to distinguish two different Heb. or Gr. words occurring near one another. Thus Gn 18:11 'the birds (Heb. seppēr) divided be not.' 15:11 'when the fowls (Heb. ayráh) came down upon the carcases'; Jer 12:3 'the birds round about' (same Heb. as 'fowls' in Gn 15:9), Ps 84:9 'the fowl of the air' (same Heb. as 'birds' in Gn 18:10). See Bibl.

FOWLER.—See SNARE.

FOX.—(1) shā-āl, see JACKAL. (2) alpēs (Gr.), Mt 10:16, Lk 10:12. In the NT there is no doubt that the common fox and not the jackal is intended. It is noted in Rabbinical literature and in Palestinian folklore for its cunning and trickery. It is a scavenger of the ground (Lk 9:17). The small Egyptian fox (Vulpes nilotica) is common in S. Palestine, while the Tawny fox (V. domestica), a larger animal of lighter colour, occurs farther north. E. W. G. Masterman.

FRANKENCENSE (dobēnāh; Gr. libanos) Mt 2:8. Rev 18:12. Frankincense is in six passages (Is 43:24, 60:6, 66, Jer 6:28, 17:11) mistranslated in AV 'incense,' but correctly in RV. It is a sweet-smelling gum, obtained as a milky exudation from various species of Boswellia, the frankincense tree, an ally of the terebinth. The gum was imported from S. Arabia (Is 60:8), Jer 6:28), and was a constituent of incense (Ex 30:23); it is often associated with myrrh (Ps 45:8, Mt 23:1); it was offered with the shewbread (Lv 24:2). E. W. G. Masterman.

FRAY.—This obsolete Eng. verb is found in Zec 1:1 and 1 Mac 14:8 ('every man sat under his vine and his fig tree, and there was none to make them away'); and 'fray away' occurs in Dt 17:7, Jer 7:18, Sir 22:9 ('whoso casteth a stone at the birds frayeth them away'). It is a shortened form of 'afra,' of which the ptcp. 'afraid' is still in use.

FREE.—In the use of this adj. in the Eng. Bible notice 1 P 2:20 'as free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God, that is, free from the Law, yet servants (slaves) to the higher law of love to God.' Ps 84:17 'free among the dead,' a difficult passage: the probable meaning of the Heb. is 'separateth from companionship' or perhaps from Divine protection. Ac 22:27 'I was free born,' that is, as a Roman citizen. 2 Th 3:5 'Pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course,' (Gr. literally 'May run,' as AVm and RV); 'free means unhindered' as in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 738. 'For mine own part, I breathe free breath.' Ps 51:11 'uphold me with thy free spirit' (RVm and Amer. RV 'willing'); the word means generous, noble, and the reference is to the man's own spirit (RV 'with a free spirit').

FREELY.—The use to observe is when 'freely' means 'gratuitously,' as Nu 11:4 'We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely. Thou brakest not the commandments of the Lord': Mt 11:28 'freely ye received, freely give' (Gr. dōmain, Rhem. 'gratia').

FREEWILL.—See PREDESTINATION.

FRINGES.—In Nu 15:28 the Hebrews are commanded to 'make them fringes (Heb. tsasteth) in the borders [but RVm 'tassels in the corners'] of their garments throughout their generations.' The same ordnance, somewhat differently expressed, is found in the earlier legislation of Dt: 'Thou shalt make thee fringes (lit., as RVm, 'twisted threads') upon the four quarters (RV borders) of thy vesture wherewith thou coverest thyself' (Dt 22:12). The 'vesture' here referred to is the plaid-up upper garment of the Hebrews, as is evident from Ex 22:19, where 'vesture' (RV 'covering') is defined as the simlah, the upper 'garment' (RV) in question, as described under Doublet, § 4 (a).

The 'fringes' to be made for this garment, however, are not a continuous fringe round the four sides, like the fringes which are a characteristic feature of Assyrian dress, but, as RVm, tassels of twisted or plaited threads, and to be fastened to the four corners of this upper garment. It was further required 'that they put upon the fringe of each border a cord of blue' (Nu 15:8 RV), the precise meaning of which is uncertain. It is usually taken to mean that each tassel was to be attached by this cord of blue, or rather of blue-purple, to a corner of the simlah.

That this ordinance was faithfully observed by the Jews of NT times is seen from the references to the tsasteth or tassel of our Lord's upper garment, disguised in EV under the 'hem' (AV) of Mt 9:14, av. 'border' of Mk 6:5,

The same are still worn by the Jews, attached to the tallith or prayer-shawl, and to the smaller tallit, in the shape of a chest-protector, now worn as an undergarment, but without the addition of the blue thread. (For the somewhat complicated method by which the tassels are made, the mode of attachment, and the mystical significance assigned to the threads, see Hastings' DB ii, 69*; for illustration see L, 627*.) In the passage in Nu. it is expressly said that the object of this ordinance was to furnish the Hebrews with a visible reminder of the obligation resting upon them, as J's chosen people, to walk in His law and to keep all His commandments. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the practice of wearing such tassels was unknown before the date of the Deuteronomic legislation. On the contrary, the representations of Asiaties on the walls of tombs and other Egyptian monuments show that tasseled garments are of early date in Western Asia (see plate ii b of Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt., vol. i., where note that the tassels are of blue threads). Hence it is altogether probable that the object of the Hebrew legislation is 'to make a deeply rooted custom serve a fitting religious purpose' (G. B. Gray, 'Numbers,' [ICC], 183 f.).

FROCK—In the Greek text of Sir 40:6 the poor man's dress is said to be of unbleached linen, paraphrased in AV as 'a linen' and in RV as 'a hempen frock.' The Hebrew original has, 'he that wraps himself in a mantle of hair' (Smend), for which see Doublet, § 4 (c).

FROG.—Ps 78:108—'one of the plagues of Egypt.' 2. BATRACHOS (Gr.), Rev 16:14, a type of uncleanness. The edible frog and the little green tree-frog are both common all over the Holy Land.

Gaal, son of Ebed (Jg gna.), organized the rising against Abimelech by the discontented in Shechem. Zebul, Abimelech's officer there, warned his master, who came with a strong force, and defeated the rebels under Gaal outside the city. Gaal and his brethren were driven out of Shechem, and terrible vengeance was taken upon the disaffected city. See Abimelech, 2.

Gaalash.—A mountain in Ephraim (Jos 24:20, Jg 20). The terraced valleys of Gaash are mentioned in 2 S 23:1—1 Ch 11:35.
GABEEL

1. A distant ancestor of Tobit (To 1). 2. A friend and kinsman of Tobit, residing at Rages in Media. To him Tobit, when purveyor to the king of Assyria, once entrusted, as a deposit, 10 talents of silver (To 14). When blindness and poverty came on Tobit in Nineveh, he recollected, after prayer, the long-forgotten treasure (To 4), and wished his son Tobias to fetch it (v. 8). Tobias found a guide, Raphael, in disguise, who said he had lodged with Gabeel (To 9). When Tobias married Sarah in Ecbatana, he sent Raphael for the deposit (9).

GABATHA.—One of two eunuchs whose plot against Ariaxzerxes (the Ahameris, i.e. Xerxes, of canonical Est.) was discovered and frustrated by Mardocheus (Mordecai). Ad. Est 12. In Est 2 he is called Bighana and in 6 Bighanna.

GABBAI.—A Benjaminite (Neh 11, but text doubtful).

GABRIAS.—The brother of the Gabel to whom Tobit entrusted 10 talents of silver (To 1; in 2 AV and RV wrongly tr. 'Gabel the son of Gabrias').

GABRIEL ('man of God').—In the first rank of the immemorial hosts of the heavenly hierarchy (Dn 7) there are seven who occupy the first place—the seven archangels; of these Gabriel is one. In Dn 8th Gabriel is sent to explain to Daniel the meaning of the vision of the ram and the he-goat; in Gospels he is the Daniel of the seventy weeks which are 'decree' upon the people and the holy city. This is the only mention of Gabriel in the OT. In post-Biblical literature the name occurs more frequently. He appears as the semi-divine, semi-human, semi-divine messenger. He is sent to announce to Zacharias that Elisabeth will bear a son; he also tells the name that the child is to bear (Lk 1:13). In Lk 1:26 he appears to the Virgin Mary and announces the birth of a son to her; here again he says what the name of the child is to be: 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus.' In the Babylonian and Persian angelologies there are analogies to the seven archangels of the Jews, and the possibility of Jewish belief having been influenced by these must not be lost sight of. W. O. E. Osterley.

GAD ('fortunate').—On 30th. (J). 32nd (P): the first son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, by Jacob, and full brother of Ascher ('Happy'). This like other of the tribal names, e.g. Dan, Asher, is very probably, despite this popular etymology, the name of a deity (cf. Is 65th, where AV renders 'troop' but RV 'Fortune'). Another semi-etymology or, better, paranomasia (Gn 49th) connects the name of the tribe with its wadis of experiences and characteristics, taking note only of this feature of the tribal life:

gezhd gežshd gežshdhemnu weg'd yeqhd 'geqhd:
As for Gad, plunderers shall plunder him. And he shall plunder in the rear' (i.e. effect reprisals and plunder in return).

In the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33th) Gad is compared to a lioness that teareth the arm and the crown of the head, and later (1 Ch 12th) the Gadites who joined David are described as leonine in appearance and incomparable in combat: 'Their faces are as the faces of lions, the smallest is equal to a hundred and the greatest to a thousand.'

Upon the genealogical lists of Gad and Asher the genealogy throws no light, for the fact that Gad and Asher, as it appears, were names of related divinities of Good Fortune would be sufficient ground for uniting them; but why they should have been brought together under the name of Zilpah is not at all connected with any certainty. Leah, unlike Rachel, who was barren until after her maid had brought forth to Jacob, had already borne four sons before Zilpah was called in to help her infertility.

It appears that Gad, notwithstanding the genealogy, was a late tribe. In the Song of Deborah it is not even mentioned. Gilead there takes its place, but Moabite names, (9th cent.) knows the inhabitants of Gilead as the 'men of Gad.'

The families of Gad are given by P in Gn 46th and Nu 26th. 1 Ch 5th repeats them with variations. In the Sinaitic P gives 40,650 men of war. By the time they had reached the Wilderness they had decreased to 40,500. Their position on the march through the desert is variously given in Numbers as 3rd, 6th, 11th. Nu 32th-33th (P) gives east and west of the territory of Gad. The most southerly, which, as it is thought, lay upon the Arnon; the most northerly, Jochbehah, not far from the Jabbok. Ataroth, another of these towns, is mentioned on the Moabite stone (I, 10), and the 'men of Gad' are there said to have dwelt within it (from old). Within this region, and clustering about Heshbon, P gives six cities to the Reubenites, but in Jos 13th Reuben has all to the south of Heshbon, and Gad all to the north of it. Owing to the divergent statements in the Hexateuch and the historical books, it is quite impossible to say what the northern boundary was. In any case it was not a stable one.

The reason assigned by the traditions for the settlement of Gad and Reuben in Gilead is that they were pastoral tribes, with large herds and flocks, and that they found the land pre-eminently adapted to their needs. They, therefore, obtained from Moses permission to settle on the east side of Jordan after they had first crossed the river and helped the other tribes in the work of conquest (see Nu 32 and Dt 32-33th); after the conquest, in the time of Joshua, the people of Gilead were overrun by the Ammonites until Jephthah finally wrought their deliverance. In David's conflicts with Saul, the Gadites and other eastern tribes clave to his assistance. As the Moabite stone shows, they probably at that time absorbed the Reubenites, who had been more exposed previously to Moabite attacks, which at this time fell more directly upon Gad. When the northern tribes revolted, Jeroboam must have found the Gadites among his staunchest supporters, for it was to Penuel in Gadite territory that he moved the capital from Shechem in Ephraim (1 K 12th).

In 724 the Gadites with their kinsmen of the East Jordan, Galilee and Naphtali, were carried captive by Tiglath-pileser III, when Ahaz in his perplexity ventured upon the bold alternative of appealing to him for assistance against the powerful confederation of Syrians, Israelites, and Edomites who had league together to dethrone him (1 K 15th, 2 Ch 28th). It was clearly a case of Scylla and Charybdis for Ahaz. It was fatal for Gad. See also Tribes of Israel.

JAMES A. CHANG.

GAD.—A god whose name appears in Gn 30th ('by the help of Gad'; so in v. 2' by the help of Asherah'); in the place-names Baal-gad, and Migdal-gad (Jos 11th 12th 13th 15th); and in the personal name Azagad.
GAD

(Ezr 2:1, Neh 7:10-11). In Is 65:1 Gad (RV 'Furton') and Meni are named as two demons with whom the Israelites held communion (see MENI). Gad was probably an appellate before it became a personal name for a divinity, and is of Aramaean, Arabian, and Syrian provenance, but not Babylonian. He was the god who gave good fortune (Gr. Tyche), and presided over a person, house, or mountain. W. F. Cosk.

GAD is entitled the 'seer' (1 Ch 29:29), 'David's' or the 'king's' (1 Ch 21:1, 2 S 24:1), or the 'prophet' (1 S 2:2, 2 S 24:1). He is represented as having announced the Divine condemnation on the royal census, and as having advised the erection of an altar on Aramah's threshing-floor (2 S 24:18-19; 1 Ch 21:18). The Chronicler again (1 Ch 29:29) names him as having written an account of some part of his master's reign. A late conception associated him with the prophet Nathan (2 Ch 29:29) in the task of planning some of the king's regulations with reference to the musical part of the service, while (1 S 2:2) he is also stated to have acted as David's counsellor in peril during the period when the two dwelt together in the hold.

GAD (Valley of).— Mentioned only in 2 S 2:24, and there the text should read 'in the midst of the valley towards Gad,' the valley (wady) here being the Arnon (W. Smith). E. W. G. Masters.

GADARÉA. — A town whose ruins (extensive, but in recent years much destroyed by the natives) bear the name of Umm Kets, about six miles S.E. of the Sea of Galilee. It was a town of the Decapolis, probably Greek in origin, and was the chief city of Perea. The date of its foundation is unknown, its capture by Antinuchos (n. 218) being the first event recorded of it. It was famous for its hot baths, the springs of which still exist. The narrative of the healing of the demoniac, according to Mt 8:27, and located, in the 'country of the Gadarenes,' a reading repeated in some MSS of the corresponding passage of Lk. (9:28), where other MSS read Gerowersens. The probability is that neither of these is correct, and that we ought to adopt a third reading, Gerasenes, which is corroborated by Mk 5:1. This would refer the miracle not to Gadara, which, as noted above, was some distance from the Sea of Galilee, but to a more obscure place represented by the modern Kerio, on its Eastern shore. R. A. S. Macalister.

GADARENES.— See Gadara.

GADDI.— See Gadali.

GADDI.— The Manassite spy, Nu 33:10 (P).

GADDIEL. — The Zebulunite spy, Nu 33:10 (P).

GADDIS. (1 Mac 2:). — The surname of Johan or John, the eldest brother of Judas Macabeus, the name perhaps represents the Hebr. Gaddi (Nu 13:10), meaning 'my fortune.'

GADI. — Father of Menahem king of Israel (2 K 15:9-11).

GADITES. — See Gad (tribe).

GAHAM. — A son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen 22:28).

GAHAR. — A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2:47, Neh 7:47), called in 1 Es 5:9 Geddur.

GALE. — Given as a proper name in RV of 1 S 17:2 'until thou comest to Gai,' where AV has 'until thou comest to the valley.' The LXX, as is noted in RV, has Gath, and this would suit the context.

GAITUS. — This name is mentioned in five places of NT. One Gaius was St. Paul's host at Corinth, converted and baptized by him (Ro 16:23, 1 Co 1:4). He was perhaps the same as 'Galas of Derbe' who accompanied the Apostle from Greece to Asia (Ac 20:7); if so, he would be a native of Derbe, but a dweller at Corinth. The Gaius of Macedonia, St. Paul's 'companion in travel' who was seized in the riot at Ephesus (Ac 19:9), and the Gaius addressed by St. John (3 Ju 1), were probably different men. A. J. Maclean.

GALAL.— The name of two Levites (1 Ch 9:18, 11:17).

GALATIA is a Greek word, derived from Galata, the Gr. name for the Gauls who invaded Asia Minor in the year B.C. 278-7 (Lat. Gallorum = 'Greek Gauls'), and to distinguish them from their kindred who lived in France and Northern Italy. These Gauls had been ravaging the south-eastern parts of Europe, Greece, Macedonia, and Thrace, and crossed into Asia Minor at the invitation of Nicomedes (see地图), and part of the same southward tendency appears in their movements in Italy and their conflicts with the Romans in the early centuries of the Republic. Those who entered Asia Minor came as a nation with wives and families, not as mercenary soldiers. After some fifty years' raiding and warring, they found a permanent settlement in north-eastern Phrygia, where the population was unwarlike. Their history down to the time of the Roman Empire is best studied in Ramsay's Hator, Comit. on Galatians, p. 45 ff. They continued throughout these two centuries to be the ruling caste of the district, greatly outnumbered by the native Phrygian population, but, though in many respects an inferior people, they had a powerful influence on the religion, customs, and habits of the Gauls, as subject races often have over their conquerors. The earlier sense of the term Galata is, therefore, the country occupied by the Gaulish immigrants, the former north-eastern part of Phrygia, and the term Galata is used after the occupation to include the subject Phrygians as well as the Galate strictly so called (C. 1 Mac 3).

About n.c. 160 the Gauls acquired a portion of Lycaonia on their southern frontier, taking in Iconium and Lystra. About the same time also they had taken in Pessinus in the N.W. These and other expansions they ultimately owed to the support of Rome. From B.C. 64 Galasia was a client state of Rome. At the beginning of that period it was under three rulers; from B.C. 44 it was under one only. Delotaurus, the greatest of the Galatian chiefs, received Armenia Minor from Pompey in B.C. 64. Mark Antony conferred the eastern part of Paphlagonia on Castor as sole Galatian king in B.C. 40, and at the same time gave Amyntas a kingdom comprising Pisidic Phrygia and Pisidia generally. In n.c. 30, Castor's Galatian dominions and Pamphylia were added to Amyntas' kingdom. He was also given Iconium and the old Lycaeonic tetrarchy, which Antony had formerly given to Poltinus. After the battle of Actium (B.C. 31), Octavian conferred on Amyntas the additional country of Cilicia Trachea. He had thus to keep order for Rome on the south side of the plateau and on the Taurus mountains. He governed by Roman methods, and, when he died in n.c. 25, he left his kingdom in such a state that Augustus resolved to take the greater part of it into the Empire in the stricter sense of that term, and made it into a province which he called Galatia. This is the second sense in which the term Galatia is used in ancient documents, namely, the sphere of duty which included the ethnic districts, Paphlagonia, Pontus Galatians, Galatia (in the original narrower sense), Phrygia Galatia, and Lycaonia Galatia (with the 'Added Land,' part of the original Lycaeonic tetrarchy). Galatia, as a province, means all these territories together, under one Roman governor, and the inhabitants of such a province, whatever their race, were, in conformity with invariable Roman custom, denominated by a name etymologically connected with the name of the province. Thus Galate ('Galatians') has a second sense, in conformity with the second sense of the term Galatia: it is used to include all the inhabitants of the province (see the first map in the above-mentioned work of Ramsay).

The word 'Galatia' occurs three times in the NT.
GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

(1 Co 16; Gal 1; and 1 P 1)). A possible fourth case: (2 Ti 4) must be left out of account, as the reading there is doubtful. There is an alternative 'Galatia,' which, even if it be not the original, suggests that the word 'Galatia' there should be taken in the sense of 'Gal' that is, France. It is beyond doubt that in the passage of 1 Peter the word must be taken in the sense of the province. The bearer of the letter evidently landed at some point on the Black Sea, perhaps Sinope, and his home in the province in which they appear in the address of the letter—'Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, taking ship again at the Black Sea for Rome.' The Taurus range of mountains was always crossed, if necessary, by dividing Asia Minor into two parts, and St. Peter here appears as supervising or advising the whole body of Christians north of the Taurus range. (The effect of taking 'Galatia' in the other sense would be to leave out certain Pauline churches, Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Phisidian Antioch, and perhaps those alone, in all that vast region: which is absurd.) With regard to the two passages in St. Paul, the case is settled by his own usage. It has been noted that he, as a Roman citizen and a statesman, invariably uses geographical terms in the Roman sense, and that he even does violence to the Greek language by forming the Latin names for 'Phrygia' (14) and 'Illyricum' (Ro 15) into Greek, and passes by the proper Greek term in each case. We are bound, therefore, to believe that he uses 'Galatia' in the Roman sense, namely in the meaning of the Roman province as above defined (Paul the province had, as we have seen, 'Galatia,' in the narrower and earlier sense as one of its parts.) It follows, therefore, that he uses 'Galatians' (Gal 3) also in the wider sense of all (Christian) inhabitants of the province irrespective of their race, as far as they were known to him.

In order to discover what communities in this vast province are especially addressed by the Apostle in his Epistles, it is necessary to make a critical examination of the only two passages in Acts which afford us a clue (16; 18). It is important to note that St. Luke never uses the term 'Galatia' or the term 'Galatians,' but only the adjective 'Galatian' (Acts 18). In the rules of the Greek language require us to translate—'the Phrygo-Galatian region' or 'the region which is both Phrygian and Galatian'; that is, 'the region which is settled by a non-Roman language.' It is private, and according to another is Galatian.' This can be none other than that section of the province Galatia which was known as Phrygia Galatia, and which contained Phisidian Antioch and Iconium, the place where we should expect St. Paul and his companions to go to after Derbe and Lystra. In 18 St. the Greek may be translated either 'the Galatian-Phrygian region' or 'the Galatian region and Phrygia,' preferably the latter, as it is difficult otherwise to account for the order in the Greek. The Galatian region, then, will cover Derbe and Lystra: 'Phrygia' will include Iconium and Phisidian Antioch. We conclude then that, whether any other churches are comprised in the address of the Epistle to the Galatians or not,—and a negative answer is probably correct,—the churches of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Phisidian Antioch are included. There is not a single instance of Paul having visited any other cities in that great province.

A. BUTLER.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Occasion of the Epistle.—From internal evidence we gather that St. Paul had, when he wrote, paid two visits to the Galatians. On the first visit, which was due to an illness (4), he was welcomed in the most friendly way; on the second he warned them against Judaizers (1 5's still among the Galatians, and, under the influence of a single individual (the 'who' of 3's is singular, cf. 5's) persuaded them that they must be circumcised, that Paul had changed his mind and was inconsistent, that he had refrained from preaching circumcision to them only from a desire to be 'all things to all men,' but that he had preached the word of God according to the Galatians, probably the Galatians. Therefore, therefore, these passages (see § 4). Further, the Judaizers disparaged St. Paul's authority as compared with that of the Twelve. On hearing this the Apostle hastily wrote the Epistle to check the evil, and (probably) soon followed up the Epistle with a visit. The readers of

2. To whom written. The North Galatian and South Galatian theories.—It is disputed whether the inhabitants of N. Galatia are addressed (Lightfoot, Salmon, the older commentators, Schmiedel in Servetus, Birk, and the inhabitants of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which lay in the s. part of the Roman province Galatia (Ramsay, Sanday, Zahn, Renan, Pfleiderer, and the Galatian-Phrygian region (Ac 16; 18) as indicating that St. Paul visited Galatia proper, making a long detour. They press the argument that he would not have called men of the four cities by the same name, 'Galatian' these lay in the same province, and that 'Galatians' must mean men who are Gauls by blood and descent; also that 'by writers speaking familiarly of the scenes in which they had themselves taken part popular usage rather than official is probably known to us. It is therefore to call the Christian communities in the four cities 'the churches of Galatia' would be as unnatural as to speak of Peitho or (before the Italo-Austro-Austrian war) Venice as the Austrian cities (Lightfoot, p. 1). Further, the Galatian theory in point, for no educated person would call it 'Austrian'; but the Venetian illustration is apt. These are the only weighty arguments. On the other hand, the Galatian theory creates Churches of considerable extent, which the Galatian theory is not satisfied with. It is difficult on this hypothesis to understand the silence of Acts, which narrates all the critical points of St. Paul's work. But Acts does tell us very fully of the foundation of the Churches in S. Galatia, the city called 'the City of the Gentiles,' and indeed not at all the Galatian theory can explain by taking account St. Paul's relation to the Roman Empire (see art. Acts of the Apostles, § 7.)

With regard to the nomenclature, we notice that St. Luke sometimes uses popular names for Phrygia or 'Phrygia and Phrygia' (Acts 16; 18); but St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, uses place-names in their Roman sense throughout, e.g. 'Achaia' (which in Greek popular usage had a much narrower meaning than the Roman province, and did not include Athens, while St. Paul contrasts it with Macedonia, the only other Roman province in Greece, and therefore clearly uses it in its Roman sense, Ro 15; 2 Co 8; 11); 1 Th 1; cf. 1 Co 16); 'Macedonia,' 'Illyricum' (Ro 15; only the Greeks did not use this name popularly as a substantive, and none but a Roman could so denote the province; in 2 Ti 4; St. Paul himself leaves 'Dalmatia' (name usage was changing from the one to the other), 'Syria and Cilicia' (one Roman province), and 'Asia' (the Roman province of that name, the W. part of Asia Minor, including Lydia). We may compare St. Peter's nomenclature in 1 P 1; where he is so much influenced by Pauline ideas as to designate all Asia Minor north of the Taurus as enumerating the Roman provinces. St. Paul, then, calls all citizens of the province of Galatia by the honourable name 'Galatians,' and calls the inhabitants of the four cities by the popular names 'Phrygians' or 'Lycians' would be as discourteous as to call them 'slaves' or 'barbarians.' The Roman colonies like Pisidian Antioch were most jealous of their Roman privileges.
GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

3. St. Paul’s autobiography.—In chs. 1, 2 the Apostle vindicates his authority by saying that he received it direct from God, and not through the older Apostles, with whom the Judaeans compared him unfavourably. For this purpose he tells of his conversion, of his relations with the Twelve, and of his visits to Jerusalem; and shows that he did not receive his commission from men. Prof. Ramsay urges with much force that it was essential to Paul’s argument that he should mention all visits paid by him to Jerusalem between his conversion and the time of the Epistle, exemplifying the Galatians. In the Epistle we read of two visits (1st 24), the former 3 years after his conversion (or after his return to Damascus), to visit Cephas, when of the Apostles he saw only James the Lord’s brother besides, and the latter 14 years after his conversion (or after his first visit), when he went ‘by revelation’ with Barnabas and Titus and privately laid before the Twelve (this probably is the meaning of 1 Cor. 15:7), when James and Cephas entered into the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles. We have, then, to ask, To which, if any, of the visits recorded in Acts do these correspond? Most scholars agree that Gal 1:1 = Ac 9:28, and that the word ‘Apostles’ in the latter place means Peter and James only. But there is much diversity of opinion concerning Gal 2:1. Lightfoot and Sadin identify this visit with that of Ac 15 (the Jerusalem Council), saying that at the intermediate visit of Ac 11 there was an agreement between St. Paul and Barnabas of the Church of Galatia for the persecution having broken over the Church (only the ‘elders’ are mentioned), and the Apostles having retired, so, as usual, St. Paul’s object was to give his relations to the Twelve (after this visit, during which he did not see them). Ramsay identifies the visit with that of Ac 11, since otherwise St. Paul would be suppressing a point which would tell in favour of his opponents, it being essential to his argument to mention all his visits (see above); moreover, the hypothesis of the flight of the Apostles and of ‘every Christian of rank’ is scarcely creditable to them. They would hardly have left the Church to take charge of it for themselves; or have the elders bear the brunt of the storm; while the mention of elders only in 11 would be due to the fact that they, not the Apostles, would administer the alms (cf. Ac 6). Other arguments on either side may perhaps balance each other, and are not crucial. Thus Prof. Ramsay adduces the discrepancies between Gal 2 and Ac 15, in the former the Apostles were present; in the latter two were present, and the discussion was by the brethren, and the diversity of the Mosaic Law to the Gentiles. Further, Prof. Ramsay argues that it is impossible to reconcile the two accounts of the Council in Ac 15, whereas they are reconcilable in Gal 2, rather than Ac 11. This argument does not appear to the present writer to be of much value, for the question of the Gentiles and the Mosaic Law is not really the subject of the controversy. Moreover, the Council in Ac 15 never came to public discussion and formal decision; we cannot suppose that the controversy sprang up suddenly with a mushroom growth. On the whole, in spite of the great weight of the names of Bp. Lightfoot and Dr. Sunday, the balance of the argument appears to lie on the side of Prof. Ramsay.

St. Peter at Antioch.—This incident in the autobiography (Gal 2:11) is placed by Lightfoot immediately after Ac 15. Ramsay thinks that it was not necessarily later in time than that which preceded, though on his view of the second visit it is in its proper chronological order. He puts it about the time of Ac 15. The situation would then be as follows. At first many Jewish Christians began to associate with Gentiles, but when the logical position of the Law was put to them that God had opened another door to salvation outside the Law of Moses, and so had practically nullified the Law, this was a blow to Peter’s views. Peter began to draw back (this is the force of the tense in Gal 2:12), and even Barnabas was somewhat carried away. But Paul’s arguments were convincing, and Peter and Barnabas became champions of the Gentiles at the Council. It is difficult to understand Peter’s action if it happened after the Council.

4. Date and place of writing.—Upholders of the N. Galatian theory, understanding Ac 16:18 to represent the two visits to the Galatians implied in Gal 4, usually fix on Ephesus as the place of writing, and suppose that the Epistle dates from the long stay there recorded in Ac 19:1, probably early in the stay (cf. Gal 1:1 ye are so quickly removing’): but Lightfoot postpones the date for some two years, and thinks that the Epistle was written from Macedonia (Ac 17:10). In the Epistle, rather than Romans and after 2 Corinthians. He gives a comparison of these Epistles, showing the very close connexion between Romans and Galatians; the same argument for the inclusion of the Gentiles, the same ideas and same arguments, founded on the same texts; in the doctrinal part of Galatians we can find a parallel for almost every thought and argument in Romans. It is generally agreed that the latter, a systematic work, is later than the former, a personal and fragmentary Epistle. The likeness is much less marked between Galatians and 1 and 2 Corinthians; but in 2 Corinthians the Apostle vindicates his authority much as in Galatians. The opposition to him evidently died away with the controversy about circumcision. Thus it is clear that these four Epistles hang together and are to be separated chronologically from the rest.

On the 8. Galatian theory, the Epistle was written from Antioch. Ramsay puts it at the end of the Second Missionary Journey (Ac 19:26-41), and rejoined Paul at Syrian Antioch, bringing news of the Galatian defection. Paul wrote off hastily, despatched Timothy back with the letter, and as soon as possible followed himself (Ac 18:14). On this supposition the two visits to the Galatians implied by the Epistle would be those of Ac 13 f. and 16. The intended visit of Paul would be announced by Timothy, though it was not mentioned in the letter, vision of any case was clearly written in great haste. It is certainly strange, on the Ephesian or Macedonian hypothesis, that Paul neither took any steps to visit the erring Galatians, nor, if he could not go to them, explained the reason of his inability. Ramsay’s view, however, has the disadvantage that it separates Galatians and Romans by some years. Yet if St. Paul kept a copy of his letters, he might well have elaborated his hastily despatched argument in Galatians into the treatise in Romans, at some little interval of time. Ramsay gives a.d. 53 for Galatians, the other three Epistles following in 56 and 57.

It is a suspicion that the reference of Wmba, who also holds that Syrian Antioch was the place of writing, but dates the Epistle before the Council (see Ac 14:26). He agrees with Ramsay as to the two visits to Jerusalem; but he thinks that the ‘Samaritans’ attack points to the Council before the Apostolic decree. Gal 6:16 (‘complc’) suggests that they insisted on circumcision as necessary for salvation (§ 1). If so, their action could hardly have taken place after the Council. A strong argument on this side is that St. Paul makes no allusion to the decision of the Council. The chronological difficulty of the 14 years (2) is met by placing the conversion of St. Paul in a.d. 32. Weber thinks that 5 could not have been written after the St. Paul; but this is doubtful. The two visits to the Galatians, on this view, would be those of Ac 13, on the outward and the homeward journey respectively. The strongest argument again Weber’s data is that it necessitates such a long interval between Galatians and Romans.

5. Abstract of the Epistle.—Ch. 1. 2. Answer to the Judaizers’ disparagement of Paul’s office and message. Narrative of his life from his conversion onwards, showing that he did not receive his Apostleship and his gospel through the medium of other Apostles, but direct from God.

VI.-VII. Doctrinal exposition of the freedom of the gospel, as against the legalism of the Judaizers. Abraham was justified by faith, not by the Law, and so are the children of Abraham. The Law was an inferior dispensation, though good for the time, and useful as educating the world for freedom; the Galatians were bent on returning to a state of tutelage, and their present attitude was retrogressive. 5:6-8. Hortatory. ‘Hold fast by freedom, but do not mistaket it for licentce. Be forbearing and liberal.’

6:1-16. Conclusion. Summing up the whole in Paul’s own hand, written in large characters (6:1) to show the importance of the subject of the autograph.

2. The Epistles of Galatians, Romans, and 1 and 2 Corinthians were universally acknowledged to be by St. Paul, and the Tbinghigen school made their genuineness the basis of their attack on the other Epistles. Lately Prof. van Manen (Encyc. B. & C. s.e. ‘Paul’) and others have denied the genuineness of these four also, chiefly on the ground that they are said to quote late Jewish apocalypses, to assume the existence of written Gospels, and to quote Philo and Seneca, and because authorship is attested as late as a.d. 150. These arguments are very unconvincing, the facts being improbable. And why should there not have been written Gospels in St. Paul’s time? (cf. Lk. 11). As for the testimony of Clement of Rome explicitly mentions and quotes 1 Corinthians, and his date cannot be brought down later than a.d. 100. Our Epistle is probably alluded to or cited by Barnabas, Hermas, and Papias by Polycarp (4 times), the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin Martyr, Melito, Athenagoras, and the Acts of Paul and Thecla. It is found in the Old Latin and Syrian versions, and in the Muratorian Fragment (c. a.d. 150-200), used by 2nd cent. heretics, alluded to by adversaries like Celsus and the writer of the Clementine Homilies, and quoted by name and distinctly (as their fashion was) by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, at the end of the 2nd cent. But, apart from this external testimony, the spontaneous nature of the Epistle is decisive in favour of its genuineness. There is no possible motive for forgery. An anti-Jewish Gnostic would not have used expressions of deference to the Apostles of the Circumcision; an Ebionite would not have used the arguments of the Epistle against the Mosaic Law (thus the Clementine Homilies, an Ebionite work, clearly hits at the Epistle in several passages); an orthodox forger would avoid all appearance of conflict between Peter and Paul. After a.d. 70 there never was the least danger of the Gentile Christians being made to submit to the Law. There is therefore no reason for supposing that the Epistle was written before a.d. 70.

3. History.—In the tribal partition of the country GALLANL.

GALILEE.

GALBALAMUM.—One of the ingredients of the sacred incense (Ex 30:34). It is a brownish-yellow, pleasantly scented resin from various species of Persea; it is imported from Persia.

GALLEAN (‘cairn of witness’).—The name which, according to Gn 31:1, was given by Jacob to the cairn erected on the occasion of the compact between him and Laban. There is evidently a characteristic attempt also to account in this way for the name Gilead. The respective proceedings of Jacob and of Laban are uncertain, for the narrative is not only of composite origin, but has suffered through the introduction of glosses into the text. It is pretty certain that we should read ‘Laban’ instead of ‘Jacob’ in v. 4. The LXX seeks unsuccessfully to reduce the narrative to order by means of transpositions.

GALILEE.—1. Position.—Galilee was the province of Palestine north of Samaria. It was bounded southward by the Carmel range and the southern border of the plain of Esdraelon, whence it stretched eastward by Bethshean (Scythopolis, Bethsan) to the Jordan. Eastward it was limited by the Jordan and the western bank of its expansions (the Sea of Galilee and Waters of Merom). Northward and to the north-west it was bounded by Syria and Phcenicia; it reached the sea only in the region round the bay of Aces, and immediately north of it. Its maximum extent therefore was somewhere about 60 miles north to south, and 30 east to west.

2. Name.—The name Galilee is of Hebrew origin, and signifies a ‘ring’ or ‘circuit.’ The name is a contraction of a fuller expression, preserved by Is 9, namely, ‘Galilee of the foreign nations.’ This was originally the name of the district at the northern boundary of Israel. It was a frontier country between the foreigners on three sides. Thence it spread southward, till already by Isaiah’s time it included the region of the sea, i.e. the Sea of Galilee. Its further extension southward, to include the plain of Edath, took place before the Maccabean period. The attribution of ‘the nations’ was probably dropped about this time—partly for brevity, partly because it was brought into the Jewish State by its conquest by John Hyrcanus, about the end of the 2nd cent. b.C.

3. History.—In the tribal partition of the country the territory of Galilee was divided among the septs of Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, and part of Issachar. In the OT history the tribal designations are generally used, while modern subdivisions of the country are denoted; this is the only reason why the name 'Galilee,' which is not a tribal name, occurs so rarely in the Hebrew Scriptures—though in the passage in Isaiah already quoted it is used as well as references to Kedesh and the cities 'in Galilee' (Jos 20 21), 1 K 9 20, 2 K 15 22, 1 Ch 6 50), show that the name was familiar and employed upon occasion. But though some of the most important of these have disappeared, as the early Hebrew historical place within the borders of Galilee, it cannot be said to have had a history of its own till later times. After the return of the Jews from the Exile, the population was concentrated for the greater part in Judaea, and the northern parts of Palestine were left to the descendants of the settlers established by Assyria. It was not till its conquest, probably by John Hyrcanus, that it was once more included in Jewish territory and occupied by Jewish settlers. Under the pressure of Egyptian and Roman invaders the national patriotism developed rapidly, and it became as intensely a Jewish state as Judaea. The annexation of the land to the Roman Empire, with the declaration of the region as a Roman province, however, probably not until the time of Herod, was the final blow to the Galilean nation. Indeed, the political and religious institutions of the Jews who inhabited this region continued to be governed by the traditions of the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and the Galilean culture was to a great extent determined by the religious and political needs of the Jewish state. However, the history of Galilee is closely connected with the history of the Jews, and the events that took place in Galilee are often referred to in the Jewish Scriptures, as well as in the New Testament.

4. Physical Characteristics.—Owing to moisture derived from the Lebanon mountains, Galilee is the best-watered district of Palestine, and abounds in streams and springs, though the actual rainfall is little greater than that of Judaea. The result of this enhanced water supply is seen in the fertility of the soil, which is far greater than anywhere in Southern Palestine. It was famous for oil, wheat, barley, and fruit, as well as cattle. The Sea of Galilee handicapped the region, as well as being the site of the purposeful settlements, which were usually connected with the trans-Jordanic tribes (Dt 3 13, 13), and in enumerating the kings conquered by Joshua (Jos 12). The Lake is referred to also by the name Gennesaret in Josephus (always, Lk 8 2), which seems to have been the normal name. The modern name is BaHr Tawriya, which is often rendered in English as 'Lake of Tiberias,' by which name the Sea is now frequently described (compare Baedecker's Syria and Palestine).

3. Importance in NT Times.—The Sea in the time of Christ was surrounded by a number of important cities, each of them the centre of a cultivated population. Such were Tiberias, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Chorazin, Magdala, and others. The fishing industry was extensive, and where now but a few small boats are to be seen, there evidently were formerly large fleets of fishing vessels. The fishing trade of Galilee was of great importance, and was renowned throughout the ancient world. Owing to the great height of the mountains surrounding the lake, the differences of temperature are produced which give rise to sudden and violent storms. Two such storms are mentioned in the Gospels—one in Mt 8 24, Mk 4 35, Lk 8 24, the other in Mt 14 18, Mk 6 48, Jn 6 19. The repetition of the event within the narrow historical limits of the Gospels indicates that such tempests, then as now, were matters of frequent occurrence.

GALL.—(1) rōsh, some very bitter plant, Dt 29 23, La 3 19; 'water of gall,' Jer 8 10; tr. 'hemlock,' Hos 10 4; poison,' Job 20 14. Hemlock (Conium maculatum), colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), and the poppy (Papaver somniferum) have all been suggested. The last is perhaps most probable. (2) mērēb (Job 10 2) and mērēbō (20 14) refer to the bile. The poison of serpents was supposed to lie in their bile (20 14). The gall (Gr. cholē of Mt 26 22) evidently refers to the LXX version of Ps 69 32, where cholē is used of rēsh.

E. W. G. Mastersman.

GALLERY.—1. AV in Ca 7 (1 Thessalonians 1:3) reads 'The king is held in the galleries.' The Heb. is barehāthām, which, there is no reasonable doubt, means 'in the tresses' (so RV). The king is captivated, that is to say, by the tresses of this 'prince's daughter.' 2. AV and RV tr. of add, a word whose etymology and meaning are both obscure. It is found only in the description of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk. 41:13-14).

GALLEY.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

GALILEM (harpas).—A place near Jerusalem (1 S 25:4). It is personified, along with Anathoth and other towns, in Is 10:9. It is generally placed to the N. of Jerusalem, but the exact site is unknown.

GALLIO.—The elder brother of Seneca. According to Acts (18:12-17), he was proconsul of Achaea derunder the Emperor Claudius A.D. 58, when St. Paul was in Corinth.
Seneca mentions that his brother contracted fever in Acte, and thus corroborates Acts. The Jews of Corinth brought St. Paul before Gallio, charging him with persuading men 'to worship God contrary to the law' (v.9). When, however, Gallio found that there was no charge of 'villany,' but only of questions which the Jews as a self-administering community were competent to decide for themselves, he drove them from the judgment-seat (v.11). Soshennes, the judge of the synagogue, was then dragged before him and beaten; but such 'Lynch law' had no effect upon the proconsul (v.12).

Pliny tells us that Gallio after his consularship travelled frequently in consequence of an attack of hemorrhage from the lungs. Eusebius quotes Jerome as saying that he committed suicide A.D. 65; it is also said that he as well as Seneca was put to death by Nero; but these reports are unsubstantiated. Seneca speaks of him as a man of extreme amiability of character.

CHARLES T. P. GRIEMSON.

GALLY.—This word occurs eight times in Ev in the Book of Esther only (5:4 etc.) as the rendering of the ordinary Heb. word for 'tree' (see marginc). It is very doubtful if death by strangulation is intended—'tree' in all probability having here its frequent sense of 'pole,' on which, as was customary in Persia, the criminal was impaled (see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10).

A. R. S. KENNE}.

GAMALIEL.—1 Es 8:8—Daniel, No. 3 (Exr 8).

GAMALIEL.—1. The son of Pedahzur, and 'prince of the children of Manasseh' (Nu 11:23 etc.). 2. Gamaliel
I., the grandson of Hillel, was a Pharisee, and regarded as one of the most distinguished doctors of the Law of his age. He was a member of the Sanhedrin during the year of our Lord's ministry. His views were tolerant and large-hearted; he emphasized the humaner side of the Law, relaxing somewhat the rigour of Sabbath observance, regulating the customs of divine worship, and the more to protect helpless woman, and inculcating kindness on the part of Jews towards surrounding heathen. The advice given by him to the chief priests (Ac 5:4-11) in reference to their dealing with the apostles shows an extraordinary tolerance and wisdom.
At his feet St. Paul was brought up (Ac 22:4).
The Clementine Recognitions absurdly state that by the advice of the Apostles he remained among the Jews as a sect-believer in Christ. The Mishna deprecates that 'with the death of Gamaliel I. the reverence for Divine Law ceased, and the observance of purity and piety became extinct.' CHARLES T. P. GRIEMSON.

GAMES.—I. AMONG THE ISRAELITES.—The Jews were essentially a serious people. What in other nations developed into play and games of various kinds, had with them a seriously practical and often a religious character. Their dances were a common form of religious exercise, which might indeed degenerate into disorderly or unseemly behaviour, but were only exceptionally a source of healthy social amusement (Ps 150, Ex 22:17, 2 S 19:6, Jer 31:4, Ec 2:11). Music, again, was especially associated with sacred song. Its secular use was condemned by Isaiah as a sign of extravagant luxury (Is 5:12). Lutes and the like were used as a means of ascertaining the Divine will, not only in connexion with the oracle, but in connexion with the shrine of the Messiah; they were used in connexion with the religious service or in connexion with the temple of Zeus at Doloph. The Nemean were celebrated at Nemea, a valley of Argolis, to commemorate the Nemean Zeus. These four games were great Pan-Hellenic festivals, to which crowds came from all parts, not only from Greek cities, but also from foreigners, although the latter, except the Romans in later times, were not allowed to compete. The most

I have completed the race... henceforth is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, etc. This stands in contrast to ch. 3:18-19. Not that I have obtained, or am already made perfect: but I press on...

...forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before. I press on toward the goal until the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Here again it is the intense eagerness of the athlete that is specially in St. Paul's mind. We have many other allusions by St. Paul to the foot-race, as in Ro 9:18, Gal 3:1, Phi 2:16, Ac 20:30. These generally refer to the 'course' of life and conduct.

...passage, it should be remembered, is addressed to the elders at Ephesus. The full significance of Ro 9:18 is that giving place means giving vantage-ground to the spiritual foe. In connection with Ephesus we may notice also the allusion in Ac 19:18 to the Asiarchs—the head of the council—where the most important of these, the students of the Christian church... the allusion to Ephesus... probably a metaphorical allusion to such contests as were common afterwards in the Colosseum at Rome, and, according to Schmitz (see 'Isthmia' in Smith's 'Dict. of Gr.-Rom. Ant.'), probably introduced into the Isthmian games about this time.

Outside St. Paul's writings there is an important reference to athletic contests in I Ch 29:24. Here the two points emphasized are: (1) the 'cloud of witnesses' (Gr. martires), whose past achievements are to encourage the Christian combatants for the faith; (2) the self-sacrifice, according to Colossians, of Christ himself in running the race. The Christian athlete must lay aside every 'weight'—every hindrance to his work, just as the runner divested himself of his garments, having previously been stripped to the skin and look only to Christ. Again, in Rev 7 we have in the palms of the hands of the great company of martyrs a very probable reference to the palms given to the successful competitors in the games. Here, again, it should be borne in mind that it was to Ephesus and the surrounding towns, the district of the great Olympic games, that St. John was writing. F. H. Woosons.

GAMMADI—A term of very doubtful meaning, occurring in Ezek 22:7 'The high places of thy terrors.' No place of the name of Gammad is known, but a proper name is what the context seems to demand. RV 'valorous men' has not commended itself to the majority of scholars.

GAMUL ('weaned')—A chief of the Levites, and head of the 22nd course of priests (1 Ch 24:10).

GARDEN (Heb. gan, Lit. 'enclosure'), gannah, which, like the Persian [mod. Armenian] parde, Neh 2:8 etc., and the Arab jamnâh and bastân, may mean a garden of herbs [2 K 11:14, 1 K 2:21 etc.], a fruit orchard [Jer 29:5, Am 4:11 etc.], or a park-like pleasure-ground [2 K 25, Est 1:18 etc.].—Flowers were cultivated (Ca 6:1), and doubtless, as in modern times, crops of grain or vegetables were grown in the spaces between the trees. In the long dry summer of Palestine the fruitfulness of the garden depends upon abundant water supply (Nu 24:6). Perennial fountains fleck the landscape with the luxuriant green and delicious shade of gardens, as e.g. at Jericho (Ca 4:11). Great cisterns and reservoirs collect the water during the rains, and from these, by numerous conduits, it is led at evening to refresh all parts of the garden. Failure of water is soon evident in withered leaves and withered plants (Is 5:6, cf. 1 Th). The orange and lemon groves of Jaffa and Sidon are famous; and the orchards around Damascus form one of the main attractions of that 'earthly paradise.'
GAZELLE

The soil shade of the trees, the music of the stream, and the delightful variety of fruits in their season, make the gardens a favourite place of resort (Est 7:1, Ca 4:18 etc.), especially towards evening; and in the summer months we spend the night there. In the hot air, under the sheltering boughs, in the gardens of Olivet, Jesus no doubt passed many of the dark hours (Mk 11:13 RV, Lk 21:12). From His agony in a garden (Jn 18:28) He was led to His doom.

The gardens, with their luxuriant foliage and soft obscurities, were greatly resorted to for purposes of idolatry (Is 56:9, Bar 6:14). There the Mosaic may be seen to-day, spreading his cloth or garment under orange, fig, or mulberry, and performing his devotions. The garden furnishes the charms of his heaven (et-jannah, or Firday); see art. Paradise, Eden [Garden of].

Tombs were often cut in the rock between the trees (2 K 21:15 etc.); in such a tomb the body of Jesus was laid (Jn 19:41).

GARDEN HOUSE in 2 K 8:7 should prob. be Beth-happan (leaving Heb. untransliterated), the name of an unknown place 8 of Zeezreel.

GAREB.—1. One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23:4, 1 Ch 11:42) a hill near Jerusalem (Jer 25:12). Its situation is uncertain, being located by some to the S.W., while others place it to the N., of the capital. At the present day there is a Wady Gourab to the W. of Jerusalem.

GARLAND.—The 'garlands' (Gr. stremmata) of Ac 14:13 were probably intended to be put on the heads of the sacrificial victims. For the use of a garland (Gr. stephanos) as a prize to the victor in the games, see art. Crowns, § 2, and cf. Games.

GARLIC (Nn 11).—The familiar Allium sativum, still a very great favourite in Palestine, especially with the Jews. Originally a product of Central Asia, and once a delicacy of kings, it is only in the East that it retains its place in the affections of all classes.

GARMENT.—See Dress.

GARMITÉ.—A gentile name applied in a totally obscure sense to Kelah in 1 Ch 4:19.

GARNER.—'Garnier,' which is now archaic if not obsolete, and 'granary,' the form now in use, both come from Lat. granarium, a storehouse for grain. RV retains the subst. in all its occurrences in AV, and introduces the verb in Lk 6:32 'They that have garnered (AV 'gathered') it shall eat it.'

GAS (1 Es 5:4).—His sons were among the 'temple servants' (Av, and Neh. omit.)

GASHMU (Neh 6).—A form of the name Geshem (wh. see), probably representing the pronunciation of an Arabian dialect.

GATAM.—The son of Eliphaz (On 30:1 = 1 Ch 3:1), and 'duke' of an Edomite clan (On 30:8) which has not been identified.

GATE.—See City, Fortification and Siegecraft. § 5, Jerusalem, Temple.

GATH.—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is mentioned in Jos 11:18 as a place where the Anakim took refuge, but Joshua is significantly silent about the apportioning of the land to any of the tribes. The ark was brought here from Ashdod (1 S 5), and thence to Ekron (511). It was the home of Goliah (1 S 17, 2 S 21:19), and after the rout of the Philistines at Ephes-dammim it was the limit of their pursuit (1 S 17:22 [LXX]). David during his outlawry took refuge with its king, Achish (1 S 21:17). A bodyguard of Gittites was attached to David's person under the leadership of a certain Ittai; these remained faithful to the king after the revolt of Abshalom (2 S 15:11). Shimei's servants ran to Gath, and were pursued thither by him contrary to the tabu laid upon him (1 K 2:5). Gath was captured by Hasael of Syria (2 K 12:13). An unsuccessful Ephraimitic cattle-lifting expedition against Gath is recorded (1 Ch 7:19). The city was captured by David, according to the Chronicle (18), and fortified by Rebohoam (2 Ch 11:12). It was again captured by Uzziah (26). Amos refers to it in terms which imply that some great calamity has befallen it (6); the later prophets, though they mention other cities of the Pentapolis, are silent respecting Gath, which seems therefore to have dropped out of existence. The exact circumstances of its fate are unknown. The topographical indications, both of the Scripture references and of the Onomasticon, point to the great mound Tell es-Safi as the most probable site for the identification of Gath. It stands at the mouth of the Valley of Elah, and clearly represents a large and important town. It was partially excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1899, but, unfortunately, the whole mound being much cumbered with a modern village and its gravesyards and sacred shrines, only a limited area was found available for excavation, and the results were not so definite as they might have been.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GATH-HEPHER (Jos 15:9) [AV wrongly Gith-hepher, which is simply the form of the name with Be localed, 2 K 14:14, 'wine press of the pit or well').—The home of the prophet Jonah. It lay on the border of Zebulun, and is mentioned with Japhia and Rimmon—the modern Yaffa and Rammatzah, Jericho, in the preface to his Com. on Jonah, speaks of Gath quea est in Ophra (cf. Vulg. 2 K 14:13), and places it 2 Roman miles from Sephora (Seffiriah), on the road to Tiberias. This is a site on el-Meshhed, a village on a slight ridge N. of the Tiberias road, ½ mile W. of Kefr Kenna, where one of Jonah's many reputed tombs is still pointed out.

W. EWING.

GATH-RIMMON.—1. A city in Dan, near Jehud and Bene-herak (Jos 19), assigned to the Kohathites (21), and reckoned (1 Ch 6:9) to Ephraim. It is unidentified. 2. A city of Manasseh, assigned to the Kohathites (Jos 21:13). LXX has Isbaah (B), or Bethhe (A), while 1 Ch 8:9 has Bileam—i.e.棠eam (wh. see). The position of the town is not indicated, so in this confusion no identification is possible.

W. EWING.

GAULANTIS.—See Golan.

GAULS.—See Galatia.

GAZA.—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is referred to in Genesis (15) as a border city of the Canaanites, and in Jos 15th as a limit of the South country conquered by Joshua; a refuge of the Anakim (Jos 11:19), theoretically assigned to Judah (15:10). This was the place of which reference is made to Adam in his escape by carrying away the gates (Jg 16:3); he was, however, brought back here in captivity after being betrayed by Dilliah, and here he destroyed himself and the Philistines by pulling down the temple (15:19). Gaza was never for long in Israelite hands. It witnessed Alexander for five months (n.c. 332). In n.c. 96 it was razed to the ground, and in n.c. 57 rebuilt on a new site, the previous site being distinguished as Gid' or 'Desert' Gaza (cf. Ac 5:58). It was successively in Greek, Byzantine Christian (A.D. 402), Muslim (635), and Crusader hands; it was finally lost by the Franks in 1244. A Crusaders' church remains in the town, now a mosque. G. is now a city of about 14,000 inhabitants, and bears the name Ghusheh.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GAZARA.—An important stronghold often mentioned during the Maccabean struggle (1 Mac 4:6, 76; 5:13, 14; 6:19, 20, 2 Mac 10). In Ant. xii. vii. 4, xiv. v. 4, R. f. 1, vili. 5, it is called Gadiara. There seems to be no doubt that it is the OT Gezer (wh. see).

GAZELLE (zebîr, tr. 2 S 2:1, 1 Ch 12:9 etc. in AV 'roe'; in Dt 14:3 etc. 'roe-buck,' but in RV 'gazelle').—The gazelle (Arab. qasat, also sab) is one of the commonest of the larger animals of Palestine; it is one of GEHAZI

GEHAZI. — Of the antecedents of Gehazi, and of his call to be the attendant of Elisha, the sacred historian gives us no information. He appears to stand in the same intimate relation to his master that the prophet had done to Elijah, and was probably regarded as the successor of the former. Through lack of moral fibre he fell, and his heritage in the prophetic order passed into other hands. Gehazi is first introduced to us in connexion with the episode of the Shunammite woman. The prophet consults familiarly with him, in regard to some substantial way of showing their appreciation of the kindness of their hostess. Gehazi bears Elisha's message to her: 'Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?' On her refusal to be a candidate for such honours, Gehazi reminds his master that the woman is childless. Taking up his attendant's suggestion, Elisha promises a son to her benefactress (2 K 4:14). According to prediction, the child is born; but after he has grown to be a lad, he suffers from surmise and death ensues. The mother immediately betakes herself to the prophet, who sends Gehazi with his own staff to work a miracle. To the servant's prayer there is another voice, and Gehazi, reminding his master where he falls, the prophet succeeds (2 K 4:19). Gehazi, like his master, had access to the court, for we read of him narrating to the king the story of the prophet's dealings with the Shunammite (2 K 8:4). In contrast with the spirit of GEZERA

GAZERA

GAZERA (1 Es 7:10).—His sons were among the "Temple servants." In Ezr 2:20 Gazzam. GAZEZ.—1. A son of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (1 Ch 2:9). 2. In same verse second Gazez is mentioned as a son of Haram, who was another of Ephah's sons.

GABEZ (Heb. gubez), 'a hill.'—A city of Benjamin, on the N.E. frontier (Jos 15:18), assigned to the Levites (Jos 21:17, 1 Ch 6:6). It stands for the N. limit of the kingdom of Judah (2 K 23:3, 'from Geba to Hebron'). In 2 S 8:10 we should probably read 'Gib'eaon' as in 1 Ch 14:15. The position of Geba is fixed in 1 S 14:8. of the great Wady Suefert, over against Michmash, the modern Ghymanz. This was the scene of Jonathan's famous exploit against the Philistines. Everything points to its identity with jebel, a village 6 miles N. of Jerusalem. It occupied an important position commanding the passage of the valley from the north.

GEBAL (Heb. gabul).—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub (Ezr 2:20, Neh 7:49), called in 1 Es 5:9 Gebazer.

GEBEZ (Heb. gabuz).—1. A place apparently S. of the Dead Sea, whose inhabitants made a league with Edomites, Moabites, and the Bedouin of the Arabah against Israel, on some unknown occasion (Ps 83:1), possibly the Gentile attack described in 1 Mac 5. It is the modern Jeepel. 2. A town in Phoenicia, now Jebele. It was theoretically (never actually) within the borders of the Promised Land (Jos 19). It provided builders for Solomon (1 K 5:10). RV Gebalites, AV 'stone-squarers' and ships' caulker from Tyre (Ezk 27:12). R. A. S. Macalister.

GEBER (1 K 4:27).—One of Solomon's twelve commissioners. The first district lay to the E. of Jordan. At the end of v. 19 comes a sentence referred by AV and RV to this Geber, and rendered 'and he was the only officer which was in the land.' But it is possible that the text should be emended so as to read 'and one other over all the officers who were in the land,' the reference being, not to Geber, but to Azariah, son of Nathan, mentioned in v. 8 as 'over the officers.'

GE bin.—A place N. of Jerusalem (Is 10:2 only). In Eusebius a Geba 5 Roman miles from Gophna, on the way to Neapolis (Shechem), is noticed. This is the modern Jebka, which, being near the great northern road, is a possible site for Gemin.

GEKO.—See Ferret, Lizard.

GEDI.—1. Son of Ahiash, who had protected Jeremiah from the anti-Chaldean party (Jer 26:5), and probably grandson of Shaphan, the plough scribe (2 K 22). Gedaliah naturally shared the views of Jeremiah. This committed him to Nebuchadrezzar, who made him governor over 'the land of the people that were left in the land.' His two months' rule and treacherous murder are detailed in Jer 40, 41 (2 K 25:20-24). The anniversary of Gedaliah's murder—the third day of the seventh month, Tishri (Zec 7:18)—has ever since been observed as one of the four Jewish fasts. 2. Eldest 'son' of Jeduthun (1 Ch 25:1). 3. A priest of the sons of Jeshua, who had married a 'strange' woman (Ezr 10:22), called in 1 Es Son of Pahah. 4. Son of Zedekiah, the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 39:1). 5. Grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1).

GEDDUR. (1 Es 5:9.).—In Ezr 2:49 and Neh 7:50 Garah.

GEDER.—An unidentified Cansanitish town, whose king was amongst those conquered by Joshua (Jos 12:3 only). It is very probably identical with Beth-gader of 1 Ch 27:1. In 1 Ch 27:2 Haal-hanan, who had charge of David's olives and sycamores, is called the Gederite, which may be a gentile name derived from Geder, although some prefer to derive it from Gederah (wh. see).

GEDERAH.—AV of 1 Ch 6:34 reads, 'Those that dwell among plants (RVv 'plantations') and hedges,' but RV gives 'the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah,' and this is probably the correct rendering. In that case the Gederah referred to would probably be the city of that name located by Jos 15:28 in the Shephelah, the modern Jedrech and the Gedour of Eusebius. The gentile name Gederathite occurs in 1 Ch 12:1.

GEDEROTH. — A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15:31, 2 Ch 28:15). It appears to be the modern Kereith near Yeba. Possibly it is also the Kidron of 1 Mac 15:24, 165.

GEDEROTHAIM occurs in Jos 15:30 as one of the fourteen cities of Judah that lay in the Shephelah. There are, however, fourteen cities with that name, and it is probable that the name has arisen by dittography from the preceding Gederah. The subterfuge of the RVv 'Gederah or Gederothaim' is not permissible.

GEDOR.—A town of Judah (Jos 15:30; cf. 1 Ch 4:13 18). It is generally identified with the modern Jeddarn North of Beit-sur. 2. The district from which the Simeonites are said to have expelled the Hamite settlers (1 Ch 4:15). The LXX, however, reads Gerar, and this suit admirably as to direction. 3. A Benjamite, an ancestor of king Saul (1 Ch 8:14). 4. E. The eponym of two Judahite families (1 Ch 4:18).

GE-HARASHIM ("valley of craftsmen," 1 Ch 4:4, Neh 11:18).—In the latter passage it occurs with Lod and Ono. The location of this "valley" is quite uncertain.

GEHNAZ. — Of the antecedents of Gehazi, and of his call to be the attendant of Elisha, the sacred historian gives us no information. He appears to stand in the same intimate relation to his master that the prophet had done to Elijah, and was probably regarded as the successor of the former. Through lack of moral fibre he fell, and his heritage in the prophetic order passed into other hands. Gehazi is first introduced to us in connexion with the episode of the Shunammite woman. The prophet consults familiarly with him, in regard to some substantial way of showing their appreciation of the kindness of their hostess. Gehazi bears Elisha's message to her: 'Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?' On her refusal to be a candidate for such honours, Gehazi reminds his master that the woman is childless. Taking up his attendant's suggestion, Elisha promises a son to her benefactress (2 K 4:14). According to prediction, the child is born; but after he has grown to be a lad, he suffers from surmise and death ensues. The mother immediately betakes herself to the prophet, who sends Gehazi with his own staff to work a miracle. To the servant's prayer there is another voice, and Gehazi, reminding his master where he falls, the prophet succeeds (2 K 4:19). Gehazi, like his master, had access to the court, for we read of him narrating to the king the story of the prophet's dealings with the Shunammite (2 K 8:4). In contrast with the spirit of the other characters, his covetousness and lying stand out in black hideousness in the story of Naaman (Wh. see). The prophet's refusal to receive any payment from the Syrian general for the cure which had been effected, does not meet with the approval of Gehazi. He follows the cavalcade of Naaman, and, fabricating a message from his master, begs a talent of silver and two changes of raiment for two young men of the sons of the prophets, who are supposed to be on a visit to Elisha. Having received and hidden his ill-gotten possessions, he stands before his master to do his bidding as if nothing had occurred, quite unaware that Elisha with prophetic eye has watched him on his foul mission of deception. Dumbfounded he must have been to hear his punishment from the lips of the prophet: 'The leprosy, therefore, of Naaman shall cleave unto thee and unto thy seed for ever' (2 K 5:27). With this dread sentence, Gehazi is ushered off the stage of sacred history, never to reappear. J. A. Kelso.

GEHENNA.—A word derived from Ge-Hinnom, the valley on the west of Jerusalem. In this valley it is possible that Molech was worshipped (2 K 23:10, 2 Ch 23:3, 28:12, Jer 7:23, 32:35). The recollection of this terrible worship gave to the valley a sinister character, and led to its being defiled by Jehosh (2 K 23:10, 28:12), so offensive were those rites. Thereafter it became the place for the burning of the refuse of the city, along with dead animals and the bodies of criminals. It was natural, therefore, that the name should become a synonym of hell (Mt 5:23). In eschatological force Gehenna was the place of punishment. It generally was conceived of as being under the earth, but it was very much vaster in extent than the earth. It was believed to be filled with fire intended for the punishment of sinners, who apparently went there immediately after death. Late Rabbinic thought would seem to imply that men who were neither great saints nor great sinners might be purified by the fire of Gehenna. Only those who had committed adultery or shame or slandered their neighbours were believed to be hopelessly condemned to its fires, while the Jews were not to be permanently injured by them. According to the later belief, Gehenna was to be destroyed at the final consummation of the age. There is no clear evidence that Gehenna was regarded as a place for the annihilation of the wicked, although there are some passages which give a certain support to this opinion. No systematic eschatological statement has, however, been preserved for us from Jewish times, much less one which may be said to represent a consistent system of opinion. The NT writers used the word in its general force as a synonym for the idea of endless punishment for sinners, as over against 'heaven' — the synonym of endless bliss for those who have enjoyed the surmounting. They attempt, however, no description of suffering within its limits further than that implied in the figures of fire and worms.

SHAIEL MATHEWS.

GELILOTH ('stone circles,' Jos 18:7).—Identical with the Gilgal of Jos 15:7 and possibly with the Beth-gilgal of Neh 13:15. It was a place on the border of Benjamin and Judah near the Ascent of Adummin. This last was probably in the neighbourhood of Tel 'al-ed-dum, a hill near the so-called ' Inn of the Good Samaritan' on the carriage road to Jericho. The word geliloth occurs also in the Heb. in Jos 13:22f., ii and iii 3, and is tr. in AV either 'borders' or 'coasts,' RV 'regions.' E. W. G. Masterman.

GEN.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

GENALI.—Father of the Danite spy, Nu 13:7 (P).

GENARA.—See TALMUD.

GENARH.—1. A son of Shaphan the scribe. He vainly attempted to determine Jehoiakim from burning the roll (Jer 36:6; 11, 12, 23). 2. A son of Hilkiah who carried a letter from Jeremiah to the captives at Babylon (Jer 26:8).

GENEALOGY.

GEHENNA.—The genealogies of the OT fall into two classes, national and individual, though the two are sometimes combined, the genealogy of the individual passing into that of the nation.

1. National genealogies.—These belong to a well-recognized type, by which the relationship of nations, tribes, and families is explained as due to descent from a common ancestor, who is often an 'eponymous hero,' invented to account for the name of the nation. The principle was prevalent in Greece (see Grote's Hist. vol. i. ch. iv. etc. and p. 416); e.g. Odysseus is the 'father' of Dorus, Æolus, and Xuthus, who is in turn the 'father' of Ion and Achaeus, the existence of the various branches of the Greek races explained by tracing them from (Studies in Ancient History, 2nd series, i.) gives further examples from Rome (genealogies traced to Numa, Scæulon, India, Arabia, and Africa; the Berbers (Barbarians) of N. Africa.

In the so-called 'borders' or 'coasts' are the names of places (e.g. Ophel, Urban, Ophir) or of nations (the Jebusite, Amorite, etc.). An 'Eber' appears as the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews. Sometimes the names might in form represent either individual or nations (Asshur, Noah, Edom), but there can in most cases be little doubt that the ancestor has been invented to account for the nation.

In later chapters the same method is followed with regard to tribes more or less closely related to Israel; the connexion is explained by tracing them from an ancestor related to Abraham. In Gn 22:21 the twelve Aramean tribes are derived from Nahor his brother; in 25:22 the twelve N. Arabian tribes, nearer skin, are traced to Ishmael and Hagar; six others, a step further removed, to Keturah, his second wife, or concubine (25:22). The Edomites, most nearly related, are derived from Esau (36). The frequent recurrence of the number 12 in these lists is a sign of artificiality. The origin of the name Edom is applied to Israel itself. The existence of all the twelve sons of Jacob as individuals is on various grounds improbable; they represent tribes, and in many cases their 'descendants' are simply individuals named to account for cities, clans, and subdivisions of the tribes (Gn 46:26, Nu 20). A good illustration is found in the case of Gilead. In Dt 3:11 we are told that Moses gave Gilead to Machir, son of Manasseh. In Nu 26:7 etc. Gilead has become the 'son' of Manasseh, and in Jg 11:11 'begets' Jephthah. So among the 'sons' of Caleb we find cities of Judah (Hebron, Tappuah, Ziph, Gibea, etc., i Ch 2:7). and Kirath-jearim and Bethlehem are descendants of Hur (25:9). It is indeed obvious that, whether consciously or not, the terms of relationship are used in an artificial sense. 'Father' often means founder of a city; in Gn 49:8 it stands for the originator of occupations and professions; members of a guild or clan are its 'sons.' The towns of a district are its 'daughters' (Jg 13:17 RVm).

With regard to the historical value of these genealogies, two remarks may be made. (a) The records, though in most cases worthless if regarded as referring to individuals, are of the highest importance as evidence of the movements and history of peoples and clans, and of the beliefs entertained about them. Gn 10 gives geographical and ethnographical information of great value. A good example is found in what we learn of Caleb and the Calebites. In the earliest tradition (Nu 32:3, Jos 14:9) he is descended from Kenaz, a tribe of Edom, and 'grandson' of Oua (Gen 36:14); in 1 Ch 2:26 the Calebite territory is still distinct from Judah. But in 1 Ch 2:6 Caleb has become a descendant of Judah. We gather that the Calebites ('dog-tribpe') were a related but alien clan, who entered into friendly relations with Judah at the time of the conquest of Canaan, and perhaps took the lead in the invasion. Ultimately they coalesced with Judah, and were regarded as pure Israelites. So generally, though no uniform interpretation of the genealogies is possible, a marriage will often point to the incorporation of new elements into the tribe, a birth to a fresh subdivision or migration, or an unfruitful marriage to the disappearance of a house; hence the necessity for the genealogies. It is possible that at that time records were kept which showed the construction of such tables a possibility. St. Paul was conscious of his pedigree (Ph 3), and in several cases in the NT the name of a person's tribe is preserved. The traces that remain in Genealogy of Jesus Christ.

2. Genealogies of individuals.—Whatever view be taken of the genealogies of our Lord (see next article), their incorporation in the Gospels proves the importance attached to descent in the NT period, those who show the existence of such records and the value attached to them. On Talmud speak genealogists, and in the present day many Jews, especially among the priests, treasure long and detailed family trees, showing their pure descent (cf., for an earlier period, 1 Macc 15:2, 2 Esd 1:10). There can be no doubt that this careful recording of genealogies received its main impetus in the time of Ezra. It was then that the line between the Jews and other nations became sharply drawn, and stress was laid on purity of descent, whether real or fictitious. After the return from Babylon, it was more important to be able to trace descent from the exiles than to be a native of Judah (Ezr 9). Certain families were excluded from the priesthood for lack of the requisite genealogical records (26, Neh 7). And in fact practically all the detailed genealogies of individuals as preserved in P, Chronicles, and kindred writings, date from this or a later period. No doubt the Injunctions of Dt 23 and the arrangements for a census (2 S 24) imply that there was some sort of registration of families before this, and the stage of civilization reached under the monarchy makes it probable that records were kept of royal and important houses. But the genealogical notes which really date from the earlier period rarely go further back than two or three generations, and the later genealogies bear many traces of their artificiality. The names are in many cases late and post-exilic, and there is no evidence outside the genealogies that they were in use at an earlier period. Of the twenty-four courses of the sons of Aaron in 1 Ch 24, sixteen names are post-exilic. Names of places and clans appear as individuals (21:18, 72:14). Gaps are filled up by the repetition of the same name in several generations (e.g. 6:11). At a later time it was usual for a father to be named after his own father, and sometimes after himself, but there are probably no cases where this is recorded for the pre-exilic period, except in the Chronicler's lists (see Gray, H.P.N.). There are numerous discrepancies in the various lists, and there is a strongly marked tendency to ascribe a Levitical descent to the service of the sanctuary, e.g. the guilds of singers and porters. So Samuel is made a Levite by the Chronicler (2 Sam 22), almost certainly wrongly, as his story shows. In the same way the position of clans, such as Caleb and Jerahmeel, which in the early history appear as alien, is legitimized by artificial genealogies (1 Ch 2). In 26 the names of the sons of Haman seem to be simply fragments of a hymn or psalm. In 6 there are, including Aaron, 23 priests from the Exodus to the Captivity—an evidently artificial reconstruction; forty years is a generation, and 40x13=480 years to the building of the Temple (Neh 12:43), also att. Abrahah, and Tria. We should note that the distinctive feature of the Greek genealogies, which traced national descent from the gods, is absent from the Biblical genealogies, except in the case of Caleb (Gen 4:18). The assertions of Genealogists in the NT are not examined here. They were partly historical. No doubt in certain cases the genealogist had family records to work upon, but the form in which our material has reached us makes it almost impossible to disentangle those of any degree of authenticity. The name of R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, p. 6) gives an interesting parallel to this development of genealogizing activity at a particular period. The Arabian genealogies all date from the reign of Caliph Omar, when circumstances made public records of great importance.

C. W. Emmer
some names here also have been omitted, for in Mt. ten generations are spread over nearly 500 years, while Lk. gives nineteen generations for the same period. The Mt. genealogy ends with Matthew, Jacob, Joseph.

(b) The Lukan list, which inverts the order, beginning at Jesus and ending at Adam, takes the line from Adam to Abraham, from Gn 5. 10s. (10 Pegel), 1 Chron 1. 1, but seems to contain a mistaken identity between Arphaxad and Shelah, as does the LXX in Gn. and 1 Chr.; it practically agrees with Mt. (see above) from Abraham to David, but then gives the line to Shealtiel through David's son Nathan, making Shealtiel the son of Neri, not of king Jehoniah (see 2 below). The names between Nathan and Shealtiel are not derived from the OT, and those between Zerubbabel and Joseph are otherwise unknown to us, unless, as Plummer supposes (ICC, 'St. Luke,' p. 104.) Joanan (Lk 3rd RV) = Hananiah son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 31)—the name Rhesa being really a title ('Zerubbabel Rhesa' = 'Z. the prince'), misunderstood by some copies before Lk. and Jeda (Lk 3rd RV) = Abihud (Mt 11) = Hodayiah (1 Ch 3rd RV, a descendant of Zerubbabel, son of son of Hananiah). Some think that Matthew (Lk 3rd) = Matthew (Mt 16).

2. Reasons of the differences.—It is not enough merely to say that theories which endeavour to harmonize the four Gospels are failures, and that, as is shown in art. Gospels, 2 (b), Mt. and Lk. wrote each without knowing the work of the other. We have to consider why two independent writers, both professing to give our Lord's genealogy, produced such different lists. Jewish genealogies were frequently artificial; that of Mt. is obviously so; for example, its omissions were sometimes made only so as to produce an equality between the three divisions. Burkitt (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii. 260f.) and Allen (ICC, 'St. Matthew,' p. 2ff.) think that Mt. compiled his genealogy for the purpose of preserving the details about Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba, not to be expected in a genealogy, but suitable for that purpose (see below), and the artificial divisions, seem to point to this view. The details of the genealogy in a Jewish palimpsest, as shown by Orelli (Cod Sinaiticum, 27), shows that Mt. 1. 2 are by the same hand as the rest of the Gospel (see also Hawkins, Horn Syncopata, p. 4ff.). This view may, however, perhaps be modified a little by the hypothesis that the Mt. list is due to a Christian preservation by one of the first Evangelists, perhaps the author of one of his sources; this modification would allow for the corruption of Jebokakim and Jebokach (above, 1).

In any case, in spite of the argument to the contrary by Bacon in Hastings' DB ii. 139, we must probably agree with Westcott (NT in Greek, ii. 141), Barnard (Hastings' DCG i. 638), Allen, and Burkitt, that the word 'begat' in this list expresses legal heirship and not physical descent. The same is true in some cases in 1 Chronicles. Mt. clearly believed in the Virgin Birth, and puts the genealogy immediately before the assertion of it; if physical descent is intended, the genealogy through Joseph is meaningless. He wishes to prove that Jesus is legally descended from David, and therefore gives the 'throne succession,' the list of legal heirs. On the other hand, it may be supposed that Lk. states Jesus' heirship by giving Joseph's actual physical descent according to Jewish theology preserved in the family. According to this view, Joseph was really the son of Heli (Lk 3rd) but the legal heir of Jacob (Mt 16). It is not difficult to understand why Shealtiel and Zerubbabel appear in both lists. Shealtiel was childless, or at least his heirs died out (Jer 22:4, 25), and Shealtiel, though called his son in 1 Ch 31, was probably only his legal heir, being son of Neri (Lk 3rd). This theory is elaborated by Lord A. Hervey, Bishop of Bath and Wells (The Genealogies of our Lord, 1853, and in Smith's DB).

The reason of the insertion of the names of the four women in the Mt. list is not quite clear. It has been supposed that the object was to show that God accepts penitents and stranagers. Burkitt, with more probability, supposes that the mention of the heires beqed is only intended to prepare us for the still greater irregularity at the last stage, for the Virgin Birth of Jesus (Lk. p. 260) We cannot however be too careful in using Lk. This text is not said to have been the wife of Salmon as in Mt. 1.

3. Other solutions.—(a) Africanus, perhaps the earliest writer to discuss Biblical questions in a critical manner (c. A.D. 220), treats of these genealogies in his Letter to Aristides (Euseb. HE i. 7, vi. 31). He harmonizes them (expressly, however, not as a matter of tradition) on the theory of levirate marriages, supposing that Joseph was married to his brother's widow while the brother was still alive, and that the issue of the second marriage was therefore legally accounted to the elder, but physically to the younger brother. It is a difficulty that two, or even three, such marriages must be supposed in the list; and this theory is almost universally rejected by moderns. Africanus had no doubt that both genealogies were Joseph's.

Africanus says that Herod the Great destroyed all the Jewish genealogies kept in the archives, so as to make his own ignoble descent, but that not a few had private records of their own (Euseb. HS i. 7). Here clearly Africanus exaggerates. Josephus enumerates Joseph's genealogy in the public records, and that the priests' pedigrees, even among Jews of the Dispersion, exist directly (Life, i. e. Ap. i. 7). There is no reason why Lk. should not have found a genealogy in Joseph's family. Africanus also asserts that our Lord's relation to Mary was 'quite a matter of history with either Jewish ideas or Gentile ideas.' The important thing was to state Jesus' birthright, and the only possible way to do this would be through Joseph. It must, however, be added that Joseph and Mary were probably near relations. We cannot, indeed, say with Eusebius (HE i. 7) that they must have been of the same tribe, because 'intermarriage between different tribes was not permitted.' He is evidently referring to Nu 30, but this relates only to heires, who, if they married out of their tribe, would forfeit their rights, and Elisabeth were kinwomen, though the latter was descended from Aaron (Lk 1. 3). But it was undoubtedly the belief of the early Christians that Jesus was descended from the flesh, from David, and was of the tribe of Judah (Ac 13. 21-22, Ro 1. 2 Ti 2. 2; He 7. 4; Rev 5. 2); cf. Mt 1. 1-17. At the same time it is noteworthy that our Lord did not base His claims on His Davidic descent. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, an apocryphal work written in its present form c. A.D. 120, we find (Synap. 7, Gad. 8) the idea that the Lord should 'raise (one) from Levi as priest and from Judah as king, God and man,' an inference, as Sandy-Headlam remark (ICC, 'Romans,' p. 7), from Lk 1.

The Matthew text.—In Mt 1 the reading of almost all Greek MSS, attested by Tertullian, is that of EV, 'Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus,' etc. The lately discovered Sinaitic-Syriac palimpsest has 'Jacob begat Joseph, of whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus.' This reading is carefully discussed by Prof. Burkitt (Lc. p. 263f.), who thinks that it is not original, but derived from a variant of the ordinary text: 'Jacob begat Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin Mary bare [lit. begat, as often] Jesus' [this is questioned by Allen, Lc. p. 8]. On the other hand, it has been suggested that the Sinaitic palimpsest has the original reading of a source of our Mt. which did not believe in the Virgin Birth. If so, it is strange that the First Evangelist should place it in such close juxtaposition to his assertion of that belief. In view, however, of what has been said above, that the 'word' here in Mt. implies only legal heirship, the question has no real doctrinal significance. On purely literary grounds, Prof. Burkitt seems to the present writer to have established his point.

GENERAL.—This adj. means in AV 'universal,' as Lat. *universalis, 182,' The promises of God our Saviour are general; they pertain to all mankind. So in He 12,4, 'the general assembly' means the gathering of all without exception.

GENERATION—In like manner means 'universally.' 2 S 174,' 'I counsel that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee.' The subst., 'general' is once (1 Ch 27) used for Heb. sar, of which the more usual rendering is 'captain.' (wh. see: cf. ANY. § 2).

GENERATION.—'Generation' is used in AV to st. 1. Heb. dor, which is used (a) generally for a period, especially in the phrases dor vohakh, etc., of limited duration; past, Is 51; future, Ps 109; past and future, Ps 102; (b) of all men living at any given time (Gn 6); (c) of a class of men with some special characteristic, Pr 8,16, of four generations of bad men; (d) in Is 38 and Ps 49 dor is sometimes taken as 'dwelling-place.' 2. Heb. toledoth (from yelad), 'begot' or 'bear children,' which is used in the sense of (a) genealogies Gn 5, feebly the account of the creation, Gn 2; also (b) divisions of a tribe, as based on genealogy; toledoth occurs only in the Priestly Code, in Ro 4,15, and in 1 Ch. 3. Gr. genes in same sense as (a) Col 15; as (1) Mt 24, 4. genesis =2 (a), Mt 1, an imitation of LXX use of genesis for toledoth. 5. Genetna, 'offspring' =1 (c); so Mt 23,' (generation, i.e. offspring.

GENESIS.—1. Name, Contents, and Plan. —The name 'Genesis,' as applied to the first book of the Bible, is derived from the LXX, in one or two MSS of which the book is entitled Genetna karmou, "origin of the world." A more appropriate designation, represented by the heading of one Greek MS, is 'The Book of Origins'; for Genesis is pre-eminently the Book of Hebrew Origins. It is a collection of the various traditions of the Israelite regarding the beginnings of things, and particularly of their national history; these traditions being woven into a continuous narrative, commencing with the creation of the world and ending with the death of Joseph. This history is continued in the book of Exodus, and indeed forms the introduction to a historical work which may be said to terminate either with the conquest of Palestine (Hexateuch) or with the Babylonian captivity (2 Kings). The narrative comprises the conquest of Egypt, the sojourn in Canaan, and the wanderings in the wilderness, divided into two main divisions—(1) The history of primordial mankind (chs. 1—11), including the creation of the world, the origin of evil, the beginnings of civilization, the Flood, and the dispersion of peoples. (ii.) The history of the patriarchs (ch. 12—50), which is again divided into three sections, corresponding to the lives of Abraham (12—25), Isaac (25—36), and Jacob (37—50); although in the last two periods the story is really occupied with the fortunes of Jacob and Joseph respectively. The transition from one period to another is marked by a series of genealogies, some of which (e.g. Genesis 5 and 11) are a chronological sequence, and also a chronological bridge over intervals of time with regard to which tradition was alien, while others (chs. 10, 36, etc.) exhibit the nearer or remoter relation to Israel of the various races and peoples of mankind. These genealogies constitute a framework for the history, and at the same time reveal the plan on which the book is constructed. As the different branches of the human family are successively enumerated and dismissed, and the story converges more and more on the chosen line, we are meant to trace the unfolding of the Divine purpose by which Israel was separated from all the nations of the earth to be the people of the true God.

2. Literary sources.—The unity of plan which characterizes the Book of Genesis does not necessarily exclude the supposition that it is composed of separate documents; and a careful study of the structure of the book proves beyond all doubt that this is actually the case. The clue to the analysis was the chronicler, who in 1753 attention was directed to the significant alternation of two names for God, Jahweh and Elohim. This at once suggested a compilation from two preserving sources; although it is obvious that a preference for one or other Divine name might be common to many independent writers, and does not by itself establish the unity of all the passages in which it appears.

It was speedily discovered, however, that this characteristic does not occur alone, but is associated with two main features of other sources, linguistic, literary, and religious, which were found to correspond in general with the division based on the use of the Divine names. Hence the conviction gradually inculcated in us that there is no such infinite number of disconnected fragments, but with a few homogenous compositions, each with a literary character of its own. The attempt to determine the two main components to one another proved more or less abortive, until it was finally established in 1853 that the use of Elohim is a peculiarity common to two quite dissimilar groups of passages; and that one of these groups has closer affinities with the sections where Jahweh is used than with the other Elohist sections.

Since then, criticism has rapidly advanced to the positions now held by the great majority of OT scholars, which may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. Practically the whole of Genesis is resolved into three originally separate documents, each containing a complete and consecutive narrative; (a) characterized by the use of 'Jahweh,' commencing with the creation (Gen 1) and continued to the end of the book; (b) the Elohist (E), using Elohim, beginning at ch. 20; (c) the Priestly Code (P), also using Elohim, which opens with the first account of the Creation (1—28). (2) In the compilation from these sources of our present Book of Genesis, these main stages are recognized: first, the fusion of J and E into a single work (JE); and second, the amalgamation of the combined work JE with P (an intermediate stage); the combination of JE with the Book of Deuteronomy, is here passed over because it has no appreciable influence on the composition of Genesis.

3. The oldest documents are J and E, which represent slightly varying recensions of a common body of patriarchal tradition, to which has been added fixed traditions from the early history of mankind. Both belong to the best age of Hebrew writing, and must have been composed before the end of 2 Kings. The composite work JE in the basis of the Genesis narrative; to which all the graphic, picturesque, and racy stories which give life and charm to the book. Difficult point between the two components are clearly marked; but both bear the stamp of popular literature, full of local colour and human interest, yet deeply pervaded by the religious spirit. Their view of God and His converse with men is primitive and childlike; but the bold anthropomorphic representations which as we are strikingly absent from E, where the element of theological reflection is somewhat more pronounced than in J. (d) The third source, F, reproduces the traditional scheme of history; is found in JE; but the writer's unequal treatment of the material at his disposal reveals a prevailing interest in the history of the sacred institutions which were to be the basis of the national legislation. As a rule he enlarges only on those epochs of the history at which some religious phenomenon was introduced, viz., the Creation, when the Sabbath was instituted; the Flood, followed by the prohibition of eating the swine; and the Abrahamic Covenant was the perpetual seal. For the rest, the narrative is mostly a mere and colourless epitome, based on JE.

The carefully intelligible and continuous narratives which are found in the J and the E Documentary is evidence of F used other sources than JE, it is significant that, with the exception of ch. 32, there is no single episode which a parallel is not found in the narrative. To P, however, we owe the chronological schema, and the series of genealogies already referred to as constituting the framework of the book as a whole. The Code belongs GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE

GENNESARET, LAKE OF.—See Galilee [Sea of]

GENNESARET, LAND OF.— Mentioned only in the parallel passages Mt 14:14, Mk 6:49; as the place whither the disciples sailed after the stilling of the second storm on the Lake. It was somewhat on the W. bank of the Lake of Galilee, as the feeding of the five thousand had taken place, just before the crossing, on the E. side; it was also near habitations of sick people brought for healing to Christ on His landing. It is usually, and with reason, identified with the low land at the N.W. corner of the Lake.

GENTILES.—See NATIONS. For 'Court of the Gentiles,' see Temple.

GENTLENESS.—The word 'gentle' occurs five times in NT (AV). In 1 Th 2:7 and 2 Ti 2:24 it corresponds to Gr. ἑγκάτωσι; it is the character proper to a nurse among trying children, or a teacher with refractory pupils. In Tit 2:3, 1 P 2:4 'gentle' is the AV tr. of επικράτειτο, which is uniformly so rendered in RV. The general idea of the Gr. word is that which is suggested by equity as opposed to strict legal justice; it expresses the quality of considerateness, of readiness to look impartially and reasonably at the facts, and hence the character of a person who is naturally pleasing, who is good, and who is usually getting less than justice in the proposed equivalents.

In 2 S 22:18 Ps 18:4 ('Thy gentleness hath made me great') RV keeps 'gentleness' in the text, but gives the sense as 'He is most helpful' (AV). The key to the meaning is found in comparing such passages as Ps 119:71, Is 57:4, Zec 9:1, Mt 11:27.

GENUBATH.—Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, by the sister of queen Taphenes (1 K 11:17).

GEOMETRY OF PALESTINE.—See Palestine.

GENEVES.—The father of Apollos, a Syrian commander of a district in Palestine (2 Mac 12:12).

GENEVA BIBLE.

3. Nature of the material.—That the contents of Genesis are not historical in the technical sense, is implied in the fact that even the oldest of its written documents are far from being contemporary with the events related. The point is made for the most part of traditions which for an indefinite period had circulated orally among the Israelites, and which (as divergences in the written records testify) had undergone modification in the course of time. No one denies that oral tradition may embody authentic recollection of actual occurrences; but the extent to which this is the case is uncertain, and will naturally vary in different parts of the narrative, the mutual relations, and even the drawn between the primitive traditions of chs. 1–11 on the one hand, and those relating to the patriarchs on the other. The accounts of the Creation, the Fall, the Flood, and the Dispersion, all exhibit more or less clearly the influence of Babylonian mythology; and with regard to these the question is one not of trustworthy historical memory, but of the avenue through which certain mythical representations came to the known centres of Israel. For the patriarchal period the conditions are different: here the tradition is ostensibly national; the presumed interval of oral transmission is perhaps not beyond the compass of the retentive Greek memory; and it will appear surprising to an Israeli that of its own antecedents had not persisted in the national recollection of Israel. These considerations may be held to justify the belief that a substratum of prehistoric fact underlies the patriarchal narratives of Genesis; but it must be added that to distinguish that substratum from legendary accretions is hardly possible in the present state of our knowledge. The process by which the two elements came to be blended, however, partly be explained. The patriarchs, for instance, are conceived as ancestors of tribes and nations; and it is certain that in some narratives the characteristics, the mutual relations, and even the history, of tribes are reflected in what is told as the personal biography of the ancestors. Again, the patriarchs are founders of sanctuaries; and it is natural to suppose that legends explanatory of customs observed at these sanctuaries are attached to the names of their reputed founders and go to enrich the traditional narrative. Once more, they are types of character; and in the inevitable simplification which accompanies popular tradition the features of the type tend to be emphasized, and the figures of the patriarchs were gradually idealized as patterns of Hebrew piety and virtue. No greater mistake could be made than to think that these non-historical, legendary or imaginative, parts of the tradition are valueless for the ends of revelation. They are inseparably woven into that ideal background of history which bounded the horizon of ancient Israel, and was perhaps more influential in the moulding of national character than a knowledge of the naked reality would have been. The inspiration of the Biblical narrator is seen in the fashioning of the floating mass of legend and folklore and historical reminiscences into an expression of their Divinely given apprehension of religious truth, and so transforming what would otherwise have been a constant source of religious error and moral confusion as to make it a vehicle of instruction in the knowledge and fear of God. Once the principle is admitted that every genuine and worthy mode of literary expression is a suitable medium of God's word to men, it is impossible to suppose that the mythic faculty, which plays so important a part in the thinking of all early peoples, was alone ignored in the Divine education of Israel.

fertile loam. The Western Table-land has streams rising in copious springs of water stored in the limestone and these streams on the eastern side have a very rapid fall, owing to the great depth of the Ghôr. The hills are generally bare, but the valleys, where the soil has accumulated, are very fertile not only in the surface of the Ghôr but in its greater part alluvial. The Eastern Table-land is composed of granite and other igneous rocks, overlaid toward the North by sandstones which are themselves covered by calcareous strata. To the South, however, it is entirely covered by basaltic lava sheets, through which the cones of extinct volcanoes rise. The Sinai Peninsula is characterized by its barrenness, vegetation being found only in the valleys.

The geological formations of the region are as follows. (1) Archean (granitic gneiss, hornblende, diorite, etc.); the oldest rocks in this region, found only in the Mokattam, Umm R. Gadara and north of Bisgar. (2) Lower Carboniferous (sandstone, blue limestone): found in the Wady Nash, and Lebruj, E. of the Dead Sea; sandstones below, and limestones containing shells and corals of carboniferous limestone species. (3) Cretaceous. Lower beds of Nubian sandstone, which is found all along the escarpment and along the western edge of the Arabian plateau. It was probably a lake-deposit. It is overlaid by a great thickness of cretaceous limestone, amounting to nearly 1000 feet. This is the most important constituent of the modern desert. Good building stones are taken from it in the quarries of Jerusalem. (4) Upper Eocene: a formation of calcareous sandstone on the surface between Beersheba and Jaffa. Its true position is uncertain. Prof. Hull assigns it to the Upper Eocene, but Dr. Blanckenhorn to the rocks of Palestine. It is probably of alluvial origin. No rocks are assignable to this period, but it is important as being in which the country rose from the bed of the sea and assumed its present form. This was the time when the great strain in the Jordan valley took place. (5) Miocene Period. The evidence remains in a number of raised beaches, especially in the valley of Sheriah, east of Gaza. A similar phenomenon has been found at Moqattam, above Cairo. (6) Pliocene Period. The terraces in the Jordan valley are made of gravel, which have been extensively glaciated in Lebanon, which have left traces in a number of moraines. At that time the temperature was colder, and the rainfall higher; hence the valleys, now dry, were channels of running water. Alluvial terraces in the Jordan valley-plateau that the Dead Sea was formerly hundreds of feet higher than at its present level. With the passing of the Pleistocene period the lakes and streams were reduced to their present limits.

GEPHYRUN

A city captured by Judas Maccabaeus (2 Mac 12: 4; AV ‘he went also about to make a bridge to a certain city,’ RV ‘he also fell upon a certain city Gephyrun’). It is possible that the Greek text is corrupt (see RVm).

GER.—See Stranger.

GERA.—One of Benjamin’s sons (Gen 46: 25, omitted in Nu 26: 14). Acc. to 1 Ch 8: 25, 7 he was a son of Bela and a grandson of Benjamin. Gera was evidently a well-known Benjamite clan, to which belonged Ehud (Jud 3: 12) and Shimel (2 S 6: 19; 18: 1, K 2). Gera, the twentieth part of the shekel (Ex 30: 11, Lev 27: 28 etc.). See Money; 3, Weights and Measures, iii.

GERAR.—A place mentioned in Gn 10: 19, in the boundary of the Canaanite territory near Gaza, where Abraham sojourned and came in contact with a certain ‘Abimelech king of Gerar’ (20). A similar experience is recorded of Isaac (26), but the stories are evidently not independently of each other. The surface of the Ghôr is for the greater part alluvial. The Eastern Table-land is composed of granite and other igneous rocks, overlaid toward the North by sandstones which are themselves covered by calcareous strata. To the South, however, it is entirely covered by basaltic lava sheets, through which the cones of extinct volcanoes rise. GERIZIM

A mountain which with Ebal encloses the valley in which is built the town of Nablus (Shechem). It is the glacial epoch of the Samaritan set. It is the holy mountain where Jerusalem and Mount Zion are to the Jew. According to Samaritan tradition, the sacrifice of Isaac took place here. From Gerizim were pronounced the blessings on the modern name Jered: they lie among the mountains of Gilead, about 20 miles from the Jordan. These are very extensive, and testify to the importance and magnificence of the city, but they are unfortunately being rapidly destroyed by a colony of Circassians who have been established here. The chief remains are those of the town walls, the street of columns, several temples, a triumphal arch, a hippodrome, a theatre, etc. Gerizim is not mentioned in the Bible, unless the identification with Ramoth-gilead hold. The Gerizims referred to in Mk 5: 2 (RV) cannot belong to this place, which is too far away from the Sea of Galilee to cut the story. This name probably refers to a place named Kersa, on the shore of the Lake, which fulfills the requirements. See Gadara. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

The acoustic properties of the valley are said to be remarkable, and experiment has shown that from certain parts of the mountain it is possible with very little effort to make the voice carry over a very considerable area. A ledge of rock half-way up the hill is still often called ‘Jotham’s pulpit.’ On this mountain was erected, about 432 B.C., a Samaritan temple, which was destroyed about 300 years afterwards by Hyrcanus. Its site is pointed out in a small level plateau, under the hill-top. The Passover is especially celebrated here. Other evidences of interest are to be seen on the mountain-top, such as the remains of a castle and a Byzantine church. The summit of the mountain commands a view embracing nearly the whole of Palestine. Contrary to the statement of Josephus, it is not the highest of the mountains of Samaria, Ebal and Tell 'Azur being rather higher.

GERON should possibly appear as a proper name in 2 Mac 6 (AV and RV 'an old man of Athens'); RVm 'Geron an Athenian') GEREMIANS (2 Mac 138).—The true reading and the people intended are both uncertain. The analogy of 15' (2), which suggests some place near the border of Egypt; but 'Gersha', between Pelusium and Rhinocotura, was in Egyptian territory. It has been suggested that the reference is to Geras, an ancient Phil. city S.E. of Gaza. On the other hand, Syr. reads Gazer, i.e. Gezer or Gazar, not far from Lydda (cf. 1 Mac 15' a).

GERSHOM.—1. The elder of the two sons born to Moses by Zipporah (Ex 2 2. 184); the explanation of the name given in these two passages is folk-etymology). According to Ex 14' a., the origin of circumcision among the Israelites was connected with that of Gershon; the rite was performed by his mother; this was contrary to later usage, according to which this was always done by a man. The son of Gershon, Jonathan, and his descendants were priests to the tribe of the Danites; but the fact that these latter set up a graven image, and that therefore the descendants of Gershon were connected with worship of this kind, was regarded as a grave evil by later generations, for which reason the word 'Moses' is here read 'Manasseh' by the insertion of an 'a above the text: it was thought derogatory to the memory of Moses that descendants of his should have been guilty of the worship of graven images. In Jg 17 there is a possible reference to Gershon, for the words 'and he journeyed there' can also be read 'and he was Gershon' (W. H. Bennett). In 1 Ch 23' 262 the sons of Gershon are mentioned, Sheubel and Shuahal being their chief. 2. A son of Levi (1 Ch 6' 14 in Heb.); see GERSHOM. 3. A descendant of Phinehas, one of the 'heads of houses' who went up with Ezra from Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes (Est 8').

GERSHOMITE, GERSHONITES.—The name Gershonite is given to the eldest son of Levi, to whom a division of the Levites traced their descent (Gn 46' 6' 9, Ex 6' 1, Nu 3' 35, 1 Ch 6' 14 [Gershon] 23'). The title 'Gershonite' is found in Nu 3' 30, 31, 33, 26', Jos 21' 8, 13' 29; 2 Ch 9' 12; and of individual, 1 Ch 23' 29'; the 'sons of Gershon' (Ex 6' 1, Nu 3' 35, 14' 22', 26', 77' 10', Jos 21' 27', or 'of Gershon' (1 Ch 27' 2), are 'sons of Gershon' (W. H. Bennett). They were subdivided into two groups, the Libnites and the Shimeites (Nu 3' 26'), each being traced to a 'son' of Gershon (1 Ch 23' 14, Nu 3' 35, 1 Ch 6' 17' 26' [9 Shebuel is omitted from the genealogy]). "Ladan" stands for Libn in 1 Ch 23' 26'. From these families fragments of genealogies remain (see 1 Ch 23' 11). Comparatively little is related of the Gershonites after the Exile. Certain of them are mentioned in 1 Ch 9' 35 and Neh 11' 7, 22 as dwelling in Jerusalem immediately after the Return. Of the 'sons of Asaph' (Gershonites), 128 (2 Cor 2' 11 or 145 (Neh 7' 11) returned with Ezra to the city in a.D. 454. Asaphites led the music at the foundation of the Temple (Est 3' 9); and certain of them blew trumpets in the procession at the dedication of the city walls (Neh 12').

And the Chronicler introduces the family into the earlier history. (1) During the desert wanderings the Gershonites were on the west side of the Tent (Nu 3' 29); their duty was to carry all the hangings which composed the Tent proper and the outer curtains, its ceiling, and court, with their cords (28' 4-504' 10'), for which they were given two wagons and four oxen (7'); and they were succeeded by the youngest son of Shubael (1 Ch 26' 5). (2) After the settlement in Palestine, thirteen cities were assigned to them (Jos 21' 10-14); 1 Ch 6' 34). (3) In David's reign the Chronicler relates that the Temple

GERONTHIANS.—A descendant of Caleb, 1 Ch 2' 43. Mod. editions of AV have Geshem, although the correct form of the name appears in ed. of 1611.

GESHEM (Neh 2' 6'; in 3' the form Gesham occurs).—An Arabian who is named, along with Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite, as an opponent of Nehemiah during the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2' 8'); he may have belonged to an Arab community which, as we learn from the monuments, was settled by Sargon in Samaria c. 715—this would explain his close connexion with the Samaritans; or he may have been the chief of an Arab tribe dwelling in the S. of Judah, in which case his presence would point to a coalition of all the neighbouring peoples against Jerusalem.

GESHUR, GESHURITES.—A small Hamitic tribe, whose territory, together with that of Maacah (wh. see), formed the W. border of Bashan (Dt 3' 4, Jos 12' 34). The Geshurites were not expelled by the half-tribe of Manasseh, to whom their land had been allotted (Jos 13'), and were still ruled by an independent king in the reign of David, who married the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 S 3'). After the murder of his half-brother Amnon, Absalom took refuge with his maternal grandfather in 'Geshur of Aram' (2 S 13' 15). Geshur (and Maacah were probably situated in the modern Jaulan, if they are not to be identified with it. In 1 Ch 22' 2 Geshur and Aram are said to have taken the 'village of Jair from the Israelites. On the strength of Jos 13' and 1 S 27', it has been maintained that there was another tribe of this name in the neighbourhood of the Philistines; but the evidence in support of this view is very precarious.

GESTURES.—The Oriental is a natural expert in appropriate and expressive gesture. To his imitative and emotional temperamental attitude and action form a more apt vehicle for thought and feeling than even speech. Movement of feature, shrug of shoulder, turn of hand, suggest mute shades of meaning which cannot be put into words. Conversation is accompanied by a sort of running commentary of gestures. Easterns conduct argument and altercation at the pitch of their voices; emphasis is supplied almost wholly by gestures. These are often so violent that an unskilled witness might naturally expect to see bloodshed follow.

The word does not occur in Scripture, but the thing, in various forms, is constantly appearing. Bowing the head or body marks reverence, homage, or worship (Gn 18, Ex 20, 1 Ch 21', Ps 99, Is 40'). The name is true of kneeling (1 K 19', 2 K 19, Ps 99, Mk 14'). This sign of homage the temptor sought from Jesus (Mt 4'). Kneeling was a common attitude in prayer (1 K 4' 6, Ezr 9', Dn 6', Lk 22', Eph 5' etc.). The glance of the eye may mean appeal, as the upward look of Orayor (Job 29', Mt 21' 28, Mk 11' etc). A sign of reverence before God's commission (Ex 4' 2-6). A shake of the head may express scorn or derision (2 K 19', Ps 106', Mk 15' etc). A sign of contempt (Ps 22'). Shaking dust off the feet, an observed acknowledgment, remarks, indicates complete severance (Mt 10' etc). denial of responsibility (Ac 18:9), and often now, total ignorance of any matter referred to. Rendering the garments betokens consternation, real (Gn 37:29, Jos 7:4, Ac 14:14 etc.) or assumed (2 Ch 20:1, Mt 20:36), and grief (Jg 11:31, 2 S 11 ff. etc.). Joy was expressed by dancing (Ex 15:10, 1 S 30:4, Jer 31:1 etc.) and clapping the hands (Ps 47:1, Is 56:4 etc.). Spitting upon, or in the face, indicates deep despite (Nu 12:4, Is 50:2, Mt 26:67, etc.). See HAND, MOURNING CUSTOMS, SALUTATION. Some gestures in common use are probably ancient. One who narrowly escapes danger, describing his experience, will crack his thumb nail off the edge of his front teeth, suggesting Job's 'with the skin of my teeth' (19:13). One charged with a fault will put his elbows to his sides, turn his palms outward, and shrug his shoulders, with a slight side inclination of the head, repudiating responsibility for an act which, in his judgment, was plainly inevitable. W. EWING.

GETHER. — Named in Gn 10:8, along with Zv, Hul, and Meah, as one of the 'sons of Aram' (In 1 Ch 1:17 simply 'sons of Sheim'). The clan of which he is the eponymous founder has not been identified.

GETHEMANE. — A place to which Christ retired with His disciples (Mt 26:3, Mk 14:79), and where Judas betrayed Him. It was probably a favourite resort of our Lord, as Judas knew where He was likely to be found. There are two traditions of sites, side by side, one under the Greek, the other under the Latin. It may be admitted that they are somewhere near the proper site, on the W. slope of the Mount of Olives above the Kidron; but there is no justification for the exact localization of the site. A. S. MACALISTER.

GEZER. — A very ancient city of the Shephelah, on the borders of the Philistine Plain; inhabited c. B.C. 3000 by a race probably kin to the Horites, who were succeeded by the Semitic Canaanites about B.C. 2500. These were not driven out by the invading Israelites (Gk 19). In David's time the city was in Philistine hands (1 Ch 20:9). The king of Egypt captured it, and gave it as a dowry to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 K 4:24). Simon Maccabaeus besieged and captured it, and built for himself a dwelling-place (1 Mac 13:38-47 GAZARA RV). The city has been partly excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund, and Simon's dwelling-place discovered, as well as a great Canaanite high place, comparable other remains of early Palestinian civilization. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GHOST. — A ghost = Germ. Geist (the h has crept into the word from what Earle calls an Italian affection of spelling) is a spirit. The word is also used in Old English, the soul or spirit of a living person, and even a dead body. In AV it occurs only in the phrase 'give up or yield up the ghost' and in the name 'the Holy Ghost.' Wherever in AV haqgin 'holy' occurs with pneuma 'spirit,' the tr. is 'Holy Ghost,' but when pneuma occurs alone, it is always rendered 'Spirit' or 'spirit,' according as it is supposed to refer to God or to man. See Holy Spirit and Spirit. GIAH. — Named in the account of Job's pursuit of Aber (S 29:3). Its situation is quite unknown; it is even doubtful whether the mention of Giah is not due to textual corruption.

GIANT. — I.-IN THE O.T. — I. As tr. of Heb. repha'im. In Gn 6:4 the Nephilim appear as a race of demi-gods, distinguished by their power and renown, but without any mention of gigantic stature. The context itself suggests that they were the antediluvians, or among the antediluvians, destroyed by the Flood. The story of their origin is, however, common in more or less degree to many ancient races; and it is thought by some to have no original connexion with the Flood story. As any rate the name appears again in Nu 13:31, where they appear to be identified with the Anakim. It seems probable, therefore, that the story in Gen. is an ancient myth which arose to account for the origin of this race, and perhaps of other ancient races of 'giants.' The story includes the aborigines of Philistia and the southern districts of Judah (Dt 2:2); the EmeA, the aborigines of the Moabite country (Dt 2); the Zamzummim, the aborigines of the Ammonite country (Dt 20), who are perhaps to be identified with the ZuZim of Gn 14; and the old inhabitants of Bashan (Dt 3). The statement that Og, whose gigantic bedstead (or perhaps sarcophagus; see Driver, loco) was still to be seen at Rabbah, was one of the Rephaim (though the last surviving member of the race in that district) is confirmed by Gn 14, where the Rephaim are the first of the peoples smitten by the four kings on their journey south. These were followed by the ZuZim and EmeA. We thus have evidence of a widely-spread people or peoples called Rephaim from ancient times. In addition to the Rephaim of Bashan, the ZuZim, or Zamzummim, and the EmeA, on the east of Jordan, the Anakim in the north-west and south—for Arba, the traditional founder of Hebron, is described as the progenitor of the Anakim (Jos 14:9)—we find traces of Rephaim in the well-known valley of that name near Jerusalem. The race is apparently also in the territory of Ephraim (Jos 17:18). Taken together, this evidence seems to suggest that the name Rephaim was applied to the pre-Canaanite races of Palestine. There is a well-known tendency among ancient peoples to regard their aborigines either as giants or as dwarfs, according as they were a taller or a shorter race than themselves. Thus the Anakim were so tall that the Israelite spies were in comparison as grasshoppers (Nu 13:33). The bedstead of Og cannot possibly have been less than 11 ft. in length [the more probable estimate of the cubit would give 13 ft. 6 in.]; but this is not very surprising if a sarcophagus is really meant, as it was a common custom to be dead and give was a large tomb (Dt 33:17). The Zamzummim are described as a people 'great and tall like the Anakim' (Dt 29). Again, Goliath was a man of fabulous height.

The Rephaim were, no doubt, very largely annihilated by their conquerors, but partly also absorbed. We naturally find the most evident traces of them in those districts of Palestine and its borders more recently occupied by past invaders, as in the East of Jordan and Philistia. In the latter country especially that most recently occupied before the Israelite settlement, we seem to find traces of them in the encounter with the Gathites, as in the King: WhereaS Og was the last of the Rephaim of Bashan at the time of the Conquest, these seem to have continued to the time of David.

II. As tr. of the sing. word repha'im or rephā. This is evidently akin to the plur. repha'im. In 2 S 21:1-27, part of which recurs in 1 Ch 20:1-8, four mighty Philistines—Issh-belzep, Saph (Chron. 'Sippai'), Goliath the Gittite (Chrom. 'Lahmi, the brother of Goliath, etc.'), and a monster with 6 fingers on each hand and 6 toes on each foot—are called 'sons of the giant.' As, however, the four are said in v. 26 to have fallen by the hand of David and his servants, and not one of them is described as slain by David, the passage is evidently incomplete, and the original probably contained the story of some encounter by David, with which the story of Goliath came to be confused. This, which is probably an extract from an old account of David and his faithful companions while he was an outlaw, from which also we get the greater part of 2 S 23. Though Goliath in the well-known story is not the 'young giant,' he was certainly the typical giant of the OT. His height, 6 cubits and a span (1 S 17), not necessarily more than 7 ft. 4 in., but more probably 9 ft. 10 in., may well be regarded, with the enormous size and weight of his armour, as the natural exaggeration to be expected in a popular story. Even if the story is not historical in its present form, it arose out of the conflicts which David and his men were frequently having with the Philistines. There is no mention of the Rephaim or of a single giant after David’s time.

4. As tr. of Heb. gibbôr = ‘a mighty man,’ as in Job 18:16; cf. Ps 135:3 (P.-Eck. version). This is hardly a correct tr. of the word.

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—We find here some interesting allusions: (1) to the supposed destruction of the Neophytes by the Jews (Ezr 2:17; Jer 14:21), and also the Hebraists (1 S 16:14); (2) to the slaughter of the ‘giant’ by David (1 S 17:51).

F. H. Woods.

GIBBAR.—A family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2:5). The name is probably an error for Gibea of Neb. 7:22.

GIBBETHON (‘mound,’ ‘height’).—A town belonging to the tribe of Dan, and a Levitical city (Jos 19:4, 21:19), Nadab, king of Israel, was besieging it when he was slain by Basan; and Omri was similarly engaged with no better result than the former. (1 K 19:27). It is probably the modern Kirbiyaah, to the N.E. of Lydda.

GIBEA.—A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 2:24). The list of the descendants of Judah through Caleb given in 1 Ch 2:24 is geographical rather than genealogical, and comprises the towns lying in the Negeb of Judah to the S. of Hebron. Gibe is probably only a variation in spelling of the more common Gibea. See GIBEA, 1.

GIBEAH (Heb. gîb’ôw, ‘a hill’).—The name, similar in form and meaning to Geba, attached to a place not far from the city. The two have sometimes been confused. It is necessary to note carefully where the word means ‘hill’ and where it is the name of a city. At least two places were so called. 1. A city in the mountains of Judah (Jos 19:53, perhaps also 2 Ch 2:20), near Carmel and Ziph, to the S.E. of Hebron, and therefore not to be identified with the modern Jeba’, 9 miles W. of Bethlehem (Onomast.); site unknown. 2. Gibeah of Benjamin (Jos 18:23 etc.), the scene of the awful outrage upon the Levite’s concubine, and of the conflict in which the assembled tribes executed such terrible vengeance upon Benjamin. It was the home of Israel’s first king (1 S 10), and was known as ‘watchtower’ (1 S 11:1, 13:2); probably identical with ‘Gibeah of God’ (1 S 10:8 RVm.). From the narrative regarding the Levite we learn that Gibeah lay near the N. road from Bethel, between Jerusalem and Ramah. It was near the point where the road from Geba joined the highway towards Bethel (Jg 21:21). Jg 20:9 affords no guidance: Maareh-geba (RV) is only a transposition of the words as they stand in MT. A slight emendation of the text makes it read ‘from the west of Gibeah,’ which is probably correct (Moore, Judges, in loc.). Josephus, who calls it ‘Gaaboathaul’ (BJ vi. ii. 1), places it 30 stadia N. of Jerusalem. The site most closely agreeing with these conditions is Taleel el-Fell, an artificial mound, E. of the road to the N., about 4 miles from Jerusalem. The road to Jeba’ leads off the main road immediately to the north of the site. Certain remains of ancient buildings there are, but nothing of importance has yet been discovered. As a place of strategic importance, Gibeah formed the base of Saul’s operations against the Philistines (1 S 13:14). There was enacted the tragedy in which seven of Saul’s sons perished, giving occasion for the patriotic vigil of Rizpah. It appears in the description of Benjamin’s advance from the north (Is 10:29). GIBEATH (Heb. Gib’ôth, st. constr. of gib’ôth, ‘a hill of,’ enters into the composition of place names, and is occasionally retained untranslated by R.Vm. Such instances are: (a) Gibeah ha’-arditheth, ‘hill of the foreskins,’ where the Israelites were circumcised (Jos 9:5); (b) Gibeah-Phinehas, in Mount Ephraim, where Eleazar was buried (Jos 24:29); site unknown. (c) Gibeah ham-môrêth (Jg 7:2 etc.; see Moreh, 2). (d) Gibeah Hä-etholm (1 S 15:10=Gibe, 2. (e) Gibeah ha-Hach’tilah (1 S 21:14). (f) Gibeah Ammah (2 S 24:6). See Ammah. (g) Gibeah Gareb (Jer 31:2). See GAREB, 2. W. Ewino.

Gideon.—A town in Palestine north of Jerusalem. Its inhabitants seem to have been Hivites (Jos 6), though spoken of in 2 S 21:21 by the name ‘Gibeonites.’ It was a city of considerable size. Its inhabitants, by means of a trick, succeeded in making a truce with Joshua, but were reduced to servitude (Jos 9); they were rescued by the prophet Samson. It was destroyed by him (ch. 10). It became a Levitical city (21:17) in the tribe of Benjamin (18:21). The circumstances of the destruction of part of the Gibeonites by Saul (2 S 21:17) are unknown. Here the champions of David fought those of the rival king Ish-bosheth (2 S 21:22), and defeated them; and here Joab murdered Amasa (20:7). The ‘great stone’ in Gibeon was probably some part of the important high place which we know from 1 K 3:9 was situated here. The story of the parallel passage, 2 Ch 18, that the ark was placed here at the time, is probably due merely to the desire of the Chronicler to explain Solomon’s sacrificing there in the light of the Deuteronomical legislation. Here Solomon was vouchsafed a theophany at the beginning of his reign. In Jer 41:10 we again hear of Gibeon, in connexion with Johanan’s expedition against Jahmael to avenge the murder of Gedaliah.

The city has constantly been identified with el-Jeb, and there can be little or no doubt that the identification is correct. This is a small village standing on an isolated hill about 5 miles in S.W. of Jerusalem. The natural form and regularly terraced. It is remarkable chiefly for its copious springs—a reputation it evidently had in antiquity (2 S 21, Jer 41:10). Ninety-five Gibeonites returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (st. 79:3), and Gibeonites were employed in repairing part of the wall of Jerusalem (31). At Gibeon, Castilus Gallus encamped in his march from Antipatris to Jerusalem.

GIDDALTI (‘1 magnify [God]’).—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25:16).

GIDDEL (‘very great’).—1. The eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2:27= Neh 7:14); called in 1 Es 25:23 Gishana. 2. The eponym of a family of ‘Solomon’s servants’ (Ezr 2:27= Neh 7:14; called in 1 Es 25:23 Idael.

GIDEON. —The son of Joash, a Manassite, was born in Ophrah, a place hitherto unidentified, which belonged to the clan of the Abiezrites. Gideon has also the names of Jerubbaal (Jg 6:32) and Jerubbebeseth (2 S 11:16). After the victory of the Israelites, under the guidance of Deborah, over the Canaanites, the land had rest for forty years (an indefinite period). Apostasy from Jehovah again resulted in their being oppressed, this time by the neighbouring Bedouin tribes, the Midianites and Amalekites. The underlying idea is that, since the Israelites did not exclusively worship their national God, He withdrew His protection, with the result that another nation, aided by its national god, was enabled to overcome the unprotected Israelites. A return to obedience, and recognition of Jehovah the national God, ensures His renewed protection; relief from the oppressor is brought about by some chosen instrument, of whom it is always said that Jehovah ‘with him’; this is also the case with Gideon (Jg 6:32).

The sources of the story of Gideon, preserved in Jg 6–8, offer some difficult problems, upon which Biblical critics differ considerably. All that can be said with certainty is that the narrative is composite, that the hand of the redactor is visible in certain verses (e.g. 293
GIDEON

6:17 8:2. 10:1-2. and that the sources have not always been skillfully combined; this comes out most clearly in 7:4-8, which breaks the continuity of the narrative. Disregarding details, the general outline of the history of Gideon is as follows:

Introduction, 6:1-18. For seven years the Israelites suffered vitorously at the Midianites who gave an account of the time is not certain (cf. 7:2, 8:1). It is the Gideon 1024 hawk,') tells Abraham K Egyptian K is cf well used, 294 place leaders.' 'Angel,' he hearing part he is being with him, was suffered Gideon 7^-8', of the Midianite host under two of their chiefs, Oreb and Zeeb, whom the Ephraimites slew. When the victorious band with Gideon joins hands with the Ephraimites, the latter complain to Gideon because he did not call them to attack the main body of the enemy; Gideon quiets them by means of shrewd flattery. This section is evidently a fragment of the original source, which presumably went on to detail what further action the Ephraimites took during the Midianite campaign; for that the Midianite oppression was brought to an end by this one battle it is impossible to believe.*

GIDEON. —Father of Abidan, prince of Benjamin (Nu 1:12. 27. 26. 16. 10:16 (5)).

GIDOM. —The limit of the pursuit of Benjamin by the other tribes (Jg 409). Possibly the word is not a proper name, but may be read as an infinitive, 'till he brought the place of the name of Gidom is mentioned elsewhere.

GIER EAGLE ("gier" is the same as the German Geier, 'vulture,' 'hawk,') is tr. in AV of râdham in L 11:4 and Dt 14:11, in both of which passages RV has 'vulture.' RV gives 'gier eagle' also as tr. of pere in Dt 14:11, where AV has 'ossifrage' (He. 'bone-breaker'), (pere is the bearded vulture or Lâmmergeier, 'the largest and most magnificent of the vulture tribe.' The adult râdham has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon-yellow. The plumage is of a dirty white, except the quill feathers, which are of a grayish black. Its appearance when soaring is very striking and beautiful. It is the universal scavenger of Egyptian cities. It is found in great abundance also in Palestine and Syria.
