GIFT, GIVING. —I. In the OT. —1. In the East what is described as a 'gift' is often hardly worthy of the name. 'Gift' may be a courtesy title for much that is of the nature of barter or exchange, tribute or compulsory homage, or even of bribery. It was understood that a gift accepted lays the recipient under the obligation of returning a quid pro quo in some form or other. The queen of Sheba's gifts to Solomon were a sort of royal courtesy. The charming picture of Ephron's generosity to Abraham with regard to the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23) must be interpreted in the light of Oriental custom; it is a mere piece of politeness, not intended to be accepted. An Arab will give anything to an intending buyer, and appeal to witnesses that he does so, but it is understood to be only a form, to help him to raise the price (see Driver, Genesis, ad. loc.). Of the transaction between David and Araunah (28:24ff.). In other cases the return is of a less material character, consisting of the granting of a request or the restoring of favour. Hence Jacob's anxiety as to Esau's acceptance of his gifts (Gn 32:29-30); cf. the present to Joseph (48:13) and I S 26:27-30. The principle is stated in Pr 18:16 'A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men' (cf. 199). It is obvious that a gift in this sense easily becomes a bribe; hence the frequent commands to receive no gift, 'for a gift taketh the eyes of the wise' (Ex 23:18. D 16:12. 27:20. Pr 17:20. Ps 15:10. Is 19:16. Is 59:9 etc.). It should be noticed that in this connexion a special Heb. word (shâkidh) is used, meaning 'a bribe'; AV and RV use 'reward.' In 1 K 16:8, 2 K 16:1, it is used of a bribe from king to king. Even the Roman Felix expects a gift (Ac 24:8).

GIFT, GIVING

2. In a more legitimate sense we find gifts offered to kings, etc., by way of homage (1 S 10:7, Ps 45:14), or tribute (Jg 5:26, 2 S 8:8, 1 K 4:4, Ps 72:10); the presents to Assyria, etc., to the north were not spontaneous, and the receiving of such homage from subject kings is a favourite subject of sculptures and paintings. 1 S 25 illustrates the ground on which such a gift was sometimes claimed; it was a payment for protection. Gifts were expected in consulting a prophet or oracle (Nu 23:1, 1 S 9:5, 2 K 8:8). Whether regulated or unregulated, they formed the chief support of priests and Levites, and were the necessary accompaniment of worship. 'No sacrifice shall be empty' (Ex 23:19). One side of sacrifice is giving to God. The spiritual religion realized that Jehovah's favour did not depend on these things (Is 1, Ps 50); still more that He was not to be bribed. In Dt 18:7 it is said that He is One 'who taketh not reward' [the word for 'bribe'; see above]. But there can be no doubt in that popular view a gift to God was supposed to operate in precisely the same manner, as a gift to a judge or earthly monarch (Mal 1). Its acceptance was the sign of favour and of the granting of the request (Jg 13:15, 2 Ch 7:1); its rejection, of disfavour (Gn 4:11, Mal 11). 1 S 28:22 shows that a gift was accepted as propitiatory, and the making of the vow takes the same point of view. It should be noted that the word minchah, which is continually used of gifts and homage to men, is also specially used of offerings to God, and in P technically of the 'monthly gift' or Orhan in Mk 7:4; etc., see art. SACRIFICE AND OFFERING. Almsgiving became one of the three things by which merit was earned before God, the other two being prayer and fasting (Ps 16:5), according to the meaning of the idiom 'the means of personal display (Lk 21:2); Jos. Ant. xv. 3. 3. Parting from cases where the gift is neither spontaneous nor disinterested, but is only a polite Oriental perquisite for other things, we turn to instances where the word is used in a truer sense. If the king looked for 'gifts' from his subjects, he was also expected to return them in the shape of largess, especially on festive occasions (Est 2:6). This often took the form of an allowance from the royal table (Gn 43:10, 2 S 11:14, Jer 40:9). We read more generally of gifts to the needy in Neh 8:10, Est 9:5, Ec 11:6, Ps 112 (see ALMSGIVING). The gift of a bride, etc., as a gift to the person, was of special significance (1 S 19:23). Interchanges of gifts between equals are mentioned in Est 9:4, Rev 11:19. On the occasion of a wedding, presents are sent by friends to the bridegroom's house. Gifts, as distinct from the 'dower,' were sometimes given by the bridegroom to the bride (Gn 24:22, 34:2); sometimes by the bride's father (Jg 14:1, 1 K 9:4).

II. In the NT. — It is characteristic of the NT that many of its usages of the word 'gift' are connected with God's gifts to men—His Son, life, the Holy Spirit, etc. 'Grace' is the free gift of God. 'Gifts' is specially used of the manifestations of the Spirit (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS). Eph 4:6 illustrates well the change of attitude. St. Paul quotes from Ps 68:30, where the point is the homage which Jehovah receives from vanquished foes, and applies the words to the gifts which the victorious Christ has won for His Church. It is more Divine, more characteristic of God, 'He gives in order to receive.' This is, in fact, the teaching of the NT on the subject. As the Father and His Son freely give all things, so must the Christian. Almsgiving is restored to its proper place; the true gift is not given to win merit from God, or to gain the praise of men, but proceeds from love, hoping for nothing again (Mt 6, Lk 6; see ALMSGIVING). Our Lord Himself accepted gifts, and taught them the highest privileges for giving and His 'little ones' (Lk 5:28, 7:8, 12:27). And giving remains an integral part of Christian worship, as a willing homage to God, the wrong ideas of compulsion or persuaded being cast aside (1 Ch 16:5, 2 Co 9:7, Rev 21:21). The gifts to St. Paul from his converts (Ph 4:18), and from the Gentile Churches to Jerusalem (Ac 11:10, Ro 16:5, 1 Co 16, 2 Co 8, 9), play a very important part in the history of the early Church. GILEAD. — A Levitical musician (Neh 12:39).

GILBOA (1 S 28:11, 5, 2 S 16:1, 21, 1 Ch 10:5). — A range of hills, now called Jebel Fakus, on the E. boundary of the Plain of Esdraelon. They run from Zer'in (Jezreel) due S.E., and from the eastern extremity a prolongation runs S. towards the hills of Samaria. They are mostly imposing from the Vale of Jezreel and Jordan Valley, but nowhere reach a height of more than 1700 feet above sea level. The little village of Jabus on the slopes of Jebel Fakus is thought to retain the old Canaanite name. The slopes of Jebel Fakus are steep, rugged, and bare. At the N. foot lies 'Am Joth, almost certainly the spring of Harod (wh. see). E. W. G. Masterman.

GILEAD. — 1. A person (or personified sept), son of the Manassite Machir (Nu 26:31) and father of Zelophehad (Nu 27:1). See No. 4 below. 2. A Gadite, son of Michael (1 Ch 5:4). 3. A mountain mentioned in Jg 7 in an order of Gideon's to his soldiers. 'Whosoever is fearful...let him return and depart from me' (1 Jg 7:19) 'Mount Gilead.' The passage is very difficult, and probably corrupt. The trans-Jordanic Gilead will not suit the context, and no other is known. Various attempts have been made at emendation, none of which has commanded acceptance.

4. The name of the territory bounded on the north by Bashan, on the west by the Jordan between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, on the east by the desert, and on the south by the territory of Moab. It is a lofty fertile plateau, about 2000 feet above the sea-level; its western edge is the precipitous eastern wall of the Jordan Valley. It is an upland country, divided in places, with productive fields intersected by valleys and streams. It is mentioned first in connexion with Jacob's flight from Laban; it was the goal at which he aimed, the place where the popular tales of Laban and where the 'heap of witness' was raised (Gen 31). Even in the patriarchal period it was famous for its spices, myrrh, and medicinal 'balm,' whatever that may have been (cf. Jer 8:22). The Ishmaelite trading caravan which bought Joseph was carrying these substances from Gilead to Egypt (Gen 37:25). The Amorites were in possession of Gilead under their king Sihon when the Israelites were led to the Land of Promise. When that king was defeated, his territory aroused the desires for pasture of Reuben and Gad. Its fitness for pasture is celebrated in the Song of Songs: the Shunammite's hair is twined, compared to the 'goals that lie along the side of Mount Gilead' (Ca 4:7). On the partition of the land, Gilead was divided into two, the southern half being given to Reuben and Gad, the northern half to the trans-Jordanic half of Manasseh. The Manassite part is distinguished by the name Havvoth-jair, apparently meaning the 'Settlements of Jair.' Jair was a son of Manasses, according to Nu 26:21, but he seems in Jg 10 to be connected with one of the Judges given to Israel (Gilead). Another Judge, Jephthah (Jg 11), was a Gileadite, whose prowess delivered Israel from Ammon. His subsequent sacrifice of his daughter is indicated as the origin of a festival of Israelite women (Jg 11:14). In a parable of the Judges of the Israelites, Gilead did not hear its part, and is upbraided by its remissness by Deborah (Jg 5:7). In Jg 20:8 Gilead is used as a general term for trans-Jordan Israel. Here some of the Hebrews took refuge from the Philistines (1S 13:1); and over Gilead and other parts of the country Ish-bosheth was made king (2S 2:9). Hitherto David fled from before Absalom, and was succeeded, among others, by Barzillai (2S 17:19, 1K 2), whose descendants are referred to in post-exile records (Ezr 2:24, Neh 7:24). To Gilead David’s census agents came (2S 2:4). It was administered by Ben-geber for Solomon (1K 4:12). It was the land of Elah’s origin (1K 1:17). For cruelties to Gileadites, Damascus and Ammon are denounced by Amos (1:15), while on the other hand Hosea (6:12-13) speaks bitterly of the sins of Gilead. Pekah had a following fifty Gileadites when he slew Pekahiah (2K 15:29). The country was smitten by Hazael (1K 19:35), and its inhabitants carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser (155). R. A. S. GILGAL.—A name meaning ‘stone circle’ applied to several places mentioned in the OT. 1. A place on the east border of Jericho (Jos 15:22), where the kingdom first encamped after crossing Jordan, and which remained the headquarters of the congregation till after the rout of the northern kings at Merom (14:19). The stone circle from which it certainly took its name (in spite of the impossible etymology given in Jos 5:26), was no doubt that to which the tradition embodied in Jos 4:19 refers, and the same as the ‘images’ by Gilgal in the story of Ehud (Jud 3:20). The name is still preserved in the modern Jâîṣûth. This is probably the same Gilgal as that included in the annual circuit of Samuel (1S 7:9). This shrine is mentioned by Hosea (4:14 12:10) and by Amos (4:8 5:6). 2. A place of the same name near Dor mentioned in a list of conquered kings (Jos 12:18). It may be Jâîṣîth, about 4 miles N. of Antipatris (Ros e-l-Âin). 3. A place in the Samaritan mountains (2K 4:38), somewhere near Bethel (2S). It may possibly be Jâîṣîth, 8 miles N.W. of Bethel. 4. The Gilgal of Dt 11:9 is unknown. It may be identical with No. 1; but it seems closely connected with Ebol and Gerizim. There is a Jâlotâh 25 miles N.E. of Nablus that may represent this place. 5. A place of uncertain locality, also possibly the same as No. 1, in the border of the tribe of Judah (Jos 15:16). At none of these places have any remains of early art or architecture, as yet observed. A city of 7,000 in ancient times, and with a large church that covered what were said to be the twelve commemoration stones of Joshua: this is reported by Arculf. The church and stones have both disappeared. The only relic of antiquity now to be seen is a large pool, probably of mediaeval workmanship, 100 ft. by 84 ft. A tradition evidently suggested by the Biblical story of the fall of Jericho is recorded by Conder as having been related to him here.

GILOH.—A city in the southern hills of Judah (1S 15:31), the birthplace of Ahithophel the Gilonite, the famous counsellor of David (2S 15:25 23:4). Its site is uncertain.

GILEMIL.—The third letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such inscribed in the 11th Psalm to designate the 3rd part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

GIMZO.—A town on the border of Philistia (2Ch 28:14). It is the modern Jismâ near Aljalon.

GIN.—See SNARES.

GINATH.—Father of Tibni, who unsuccessfully laid claim against Omri to the throne of Israel (1K 16:2, 25).

GINNETHOI.—A priest among the returned exiles (Neh 12:43); called in Neh 12:44 10 Gimmethon.

GIRDING THE LOINS, GIRDLING.—See DRESS, §§ 2, 3.

GIRGASHITES (in Heb. always sing. 'the Girgashite,' and rightly so rendered in RV).—Very little is known of this people, whose name, though occurring several times in OT in the list of Can. tribes (Gn 10:14 15, Dl 11:21 [and 20] in Sam. and LXX), Jos 13:31 24:1, 1Ch 6: 18, Neh 6:9), affords no indication of their position, or to what branch of the Canaanites they belonged, except in two instances, namely, Gn 10:14, where the 'Girgashite' is given as the name of the fifth son of Canaan; and Jos 24:1, where the Girgashites would seem to have inhabited the tract on the west of Jordan, the Israelites having been obliged to cross over that river in order to fight the men of Jericho, among whom were the Girgashites.

GIRZITES.—Acc. to 1S 27:2, David and his men, while living at the court of Achish king of Gath, 'made a raid upon the Geshurites and the Girzites (RV) or Girzites and the Amalekites; for those nations were the inhabitants of the land, which were of old, as those that go to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.' The LXX (B) is probably correct in reading only one name 'Girzites' for 'Geshurites and Girzites,' viz. the Canaanite king, Achish, a term on the S.w. border of Ephraim (Jos 10:10 16, Jg 12:9).

GITTAIM.—A town of Benjamin (?), 2S 4:22, noticed with Hazor and Ramath (Neh 11:22). The site is unknown.

GITTITES.—See GATH.

GITTUTH.—See Psalms (titles).

GIZONITE.—A Gentile name which occurs in 1Ch 11:43, in the colloc. 'Heshen the Gizonite.' In all probability this should be corrected to 'Jashen (cf. the parallel passage 2S 23:22) the Guntite.' See JARSHEN.

GIZRITES.—See GIZONITES.

GLASS, LOOKING-Glass, MIRROR.—This indispensable article of a lady's toilet is first met with in Ex 38:2, where the 'laver of brass' and its base are said to have been made of the 'mirrors' (AV 'looking-glasses') of the serving women which served at the door of the tent of meeting (RV). This passage shows that the mirrors of the Hebrews, like those of the other peoples of antiquity, were made of polished bronze, as is implied in the comparison, Job 37:18, of the sky to a 'molten mirror' (RV and AV 'looking-glass'). A different Hebrew word is rendered 'hand mirrors' by RV in the list of toilet articles, 1S 30:2. The fact that this word denotes a writing 'tablet' in 8 (RV) perhaps indicates that in the former passage we have an oblong mirror in a wooden frame. The usual shape, however, of the Egyptian (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. H. 340 f., with illustr.), as of the Greek, hand-mirrors was round or slightly oval. As a rule they were furnished with a tooth, which fitted into a handle of wood or metal, often delicately carved. Two specimens of circular mirrors of bronze, one 5 inches, the other 4½ inches in diameter, have recently been discovered in Philistine (?) graves at Gezer (PEFS 1885, 321; 1907, 196, with illustr.). In the Aporapha there is a reference, Sir 12:4, to the rust that gathered on these metal mirrors, and in Wis 7:24 the Divine wisdom is described as 'the unsotted mirror of the power of God,' 'the only occurrence in AV of mirror,' which RV substitutes for 'glass' throughout. The NT references, finally, are those by Paul (1Co 13:12, 2Co 3:18) and by James (1:17). For 'the sea of glass' (RV 'glassy sea') of Rev 4:15 see REV. SEA OF GLASS, A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GLORY (in OT).—The first use of this word is to express the exalted honour or praise paid either to things, or to man, or to God. From that it passes to denote the dignity or weight, whether material or spiritual, that calls forth such honour. Thence it has come to mean, in the OT especially, the majesty and splendour that attend the revelation of the power or character of God. The principal Heb. word (k'rog 'glory') is derived from a root denoting heaviness. The root may be seen in Is 1, 'a people heavy with the burden of iniquity.' For its derived use, cf. 'loaded with honours,' 'weight of glory.' A few illustrations of each of these uses may be given.

1. It is only necessary to mention the constantly recurring phrase 'glory to God' (Jos 7Gl, Ps 29 etc.). As applying to man may be quoted, 'the wise shall inherit glory' (Ps 38).

2. Phrases such as 'the glory of Lebanon' (Is 33Gl), i.e. the cedars; 'of his house' (Ps 49Gl), i.e. his material possessions; 'the glory and honour of the nations' (Rev 17Gl), i.e. the glory that can be shared with the wealth of the nation, Is 60Gl, may be quoted here. 'My glory' (Gn 49Gl, Ps 16Gl 30Gl 57Gl etc.) is used as synonymous with 'soul,' and denotes the noblest part of man; cf. also Ps 8. Jehovah is called 'the glory' of Israel as the proudest possession of His people (Jer 21Gl; cf. 1 Gl 28Gl, 2 Gl 28). With reference to God may be named Ps 19Gl, His wisdom and strength; and Ps 63Gl, the worthiness of His moral government.

3. Two uses of the expression 'the glory of Jehovah' are to be noted. (a) The manifestation of His glory in the self-revelation of His character and being, e.g. Is 6Gl. In the latter this glory is God's manifestation in history and in the control of the nations, see Nu 14Gl, Ezek 39Gl; in nature, Ps 29Gl 104Gl.

(b) A physical manifestation of the Divine Presence. This is especially notable in Ezekiel, e.g. 1Gl, where the glory is bright like the rainbow. In the P sections of the Pentateuch such representations are frequent (see Ex 24Gl-10, Lv 9Gl etc.). A passage combining these two conceptions is the story of the theophany to Moses (Ex 33Gl-24Gl). Here the visible glory, the brightness of Jehovah's face, may not be seen. The spiritual glory is revealed in the proclamation of the name of Jehovah, full of compassion and gracious.

WILFRID J. MOULON.

GLODY (in Apoc. and NT).—Except in 1 P 2Gl (where it means renown), 'glory,' as a noun, is always the translation of Gr. doxa. This word, coming from a root meaning 'to seem,' might signify outward appearance only, or, in a secondary sense, opinion. This use is found in the Biblical writings, but the derived classical use—favourable opinion or reputation, and hence exalted honour— or, as applied to things, splendour, is very common (Wis 8Gl, Ro 2Gl-15, Bar 2Gl, Jn 6Gl, Sir 49Gl 50Gl). The special LXX use of 'glory' for the physical or ethical manifestation of the greatness of God is also frequent. In AV of NT doxa is occasionally translated 'honor' (e.g. Jn 6Gl, 2 Co 8Gl etc.); in Apocrypha sometimes 'honour' 1 Es 8Gl etc.), and a few times 'pomp' (1 Mac 10Gl 11Gl etc.), or 'majesty' (Ad. Est 15); otherwise it is uniformly rendered 'glory.' As a verb, 'glory' in the sense of boast (Gr. kauchoamat) is frequently found (Sir 11Gl, 1 Co 19).

A few examples of the use of 'glory' to denote the brightness of goodness may be given. In Bar 5Gl is the striking phrase 'the glory of godliness,' whilst wisdom is called 'a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty' (Wis 7Gl). In Jn 14 the 'glory' of the God-man consists in grace and truth (cf. Jn 2Gl 17Gl-20). In Ro 3Gl the 'glory' of God, of which men have fallen short, is His manifested excellence, revealed at first in man made in God's Image (cf. 1 Co 11Gl—), lost through sin, but meant to be recovered as he is transfigured from 'glory to glory' (2 Co 3Gl). For 'glory' as used to express the visible brightness, cf. To 12Gl, where Rapha'el goes in before the glory of the Holy One (cf. 2 Mac 3Gl, of angels). In NT, cf. Lk 2Gl 'The glory of the Lord shines round about them.' In 2 Co 3Gl the double use of 'glory' is clearly seen; the fading brightness on the face of Moses is contrasted with the abiding spiritual glory of the new covenant. Passages combining both the ethical and the physical meanings are those which speak of the glory of the Son of Man (Mt 16Gl etc.), and the glory, both of brightness and of purity, which gives light to the heavenly city (Rev 21Gl). 'Glory,' as applied to the saints, culminates in a state where both body and spirit are fully changed into the likeness of the glorified Lord (Ph 3Gl, Col 3Gl).

In Wis 15Gl a special use appears, where 'the glories of the fathers' is a phrase for the names of the twelve tribes, written on the precious stones of the high-priestly breastplate. Doubtless this is suggested by the flashing gems. An interesting parallel is given in Murray, Eng. Diet., s.v.: 'They presented to his Electoral Highness ... the Two Stars or Glories, and Two Pieces of Ribbon of the Order [of the Garter];' cf. Kalsch on Ex 28 'The jewels are the emblems of the star, which they rival in splendour.'

GNAT (Mt 23Gl).—Various members of the Culicide, mosquitoes and true gnats, are found in Palestine: of the former, four species are known which are fever-bearers. These and such small insects are very apt to fall into food or liquid, and require to be 'strained out' (RV), especially in connexion with Lv 11Gl. An Arab proverb well illustrates the ideas of Mt 23Gl; 'He eats an elephant and is suffocated by a gnat.' The R.V. of Is 51Gl 'like gnats' is suggested for 'like manner.'

GNOSTICISM.—1. Gnasticism proper.—The term, which comes from the Gr. gnosis, 'knowledge,' is now technically used to describe an eclectic philosophy of the 2nd cent. A.D. which was represented by a number of sects or divisions of people. The philosophy was constructed out of Jewish, Pagan, and Christian elements, and was due mainly to the inevitable contact and conflict between these various modes of thought. It was an attempt to incorporate Christian with Jewish, Eng. Diet., s.v.: 'They presented to his Electoral Highness ... the Two Stars or Glories, and Two Pieces of Ribbon of the Order [of the Garter];' cf. Kalsch on Ex 28 'The jewels are the emblems of the star, which they rival in splendour.'

2. Gnosticism in relation to the NT.—It is obvious that it is only in the slightest and most partial way that we can associate Gnosticism of a fully developed kind with the NT.

There is a constant danger, which has not always been avoided, of looking back into ancient New Testament and NT expressions of the Idea of the 2nd century. While we may see in the NT certain germs which afterwards came to maturity in Gnosticism and even guard lest we read too much into NT phraseology, and thereby draw wrong conclusions. One example of this danger may be given. Simon Magnus occupied the prominent place in the thoughts of man at the end of the 3rd and 3rd cent., wrote, and by some he is regarded as one of the founders of Gnosticism. This may or may not have been true, but at any rate there is absolutely nothing in Ac 8 to suggest even the germ of the idea.

It is necessary to consider carefully the main ideas of gnosis, 'knowledge,' in the NT. (a) It is an essential element of true Christianity, and is associated with the knowledge of God and in ch. (24-41), with the knowledge of Christ Himself (Ph 3:1, 2, 3:10), and with the personal experience of what is involved in the Christian life (Ro 2:20, 1 Co 1:6, Col 2:9). In the term epignosis we have the further idea of 'full knowledge' which marks the ripe, mature Christian. This word is particularly characteristic of later Gnosticism and is found in the Gnostic Gospels (John, Pol. Eph.), and indicates the Apostle's view of the spiritually-advanced believer. But gnosis and epignosis always imply something more and deeper than basic intellectual understanding.

They refer to a personal experience at once intellectual and spiritual, and include intellectual apprehension and moral insight from wisdom, knowledge, or spiritual experience considered in itself, while wisdom is knowledge in its practical application and use. In Colossians they are generally thought to mean that the errors contrasted were associated with certain forms of Gnosticism. Lightfoot, on the one hand, sees in the references in ch. 2 Jewish elements in the observance of a mystique, and of asceticism in the distinction of meats, together with their purely Gnostic elements in the spiritual meaning, speculation, shadowy mysticism, and the interposition of angels between God and man. He thinks the references are to one heresy in which these two separate elements are used, and that St. Paul deals with both aspects at once in Col 2. With Gnostic intellectual exclusiveness he deals in 2:11 and 20, with speculative tendencies in 2:19-23, with practical tendencies to asceticism or licence in 2:24-22, Hort (Judaistic Christianity), on the other hand, sees nothing but Judaistic elements in the Epistle, and will not allow that there are two independent sets of ideas blended. He considers that, apart from the phrase 'philosophy and vain deceit' (21), there is nothing of speculative doctrine in the Epistle. He says that angel-worship was already prevalent quite apart from philosophy, and that the idea need look beyond Judaism for the source of these heresies. This difference between these two great scholars shows the extreme difficulty of attempting to find anything technically called Gnosticism in Colossians.

(b) The Pastoral Epistles are usually next put under review. Here, hidden by Lightfoot, are further developments of what had been rife in Colossae. Hort again differs from this view, and concludes that there is no question of speculative Gnosticizing tendencies, but only of a dangerous fondness for Jewish trifling, both of the legendary and casuistical kind. (c) In the First Epistle of John (4:5) we are reminded of later Gnostic tendencies as represented by Cerinthus and others, who regarded our Lord as not really man, but only a phantom and a temporary emanation from the Godhead. The prominence given to 'knowledge' as an essential element of true Christian life is very striking in this Epistle, part of whose purpose is that those who possess eternal life in Christ may 'know' it (5:5). The verb 'to know' occurs in the Epistle no less than thirty-five times.

(d) In Revelation (2:11, 17; 3:17) it is thought that further tendencies of a Gnostic kind are observable, as is shown in the latter passage proof texts, the heresy of Colosseans was continuing in that district of Asia Minor. The precariousness of this position is, however, evident, when it is realized that the errors referred to are clearly antagonistic, and may well have arisen apart from any Gnostic speculations.

From the above review, together with the differences between certain scholars, it is evident that the attempt to connect the NT with the later Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. must remain at best but partially successful. All that we can properly say is that in the NT there are signs of certain tendencies which were afterwards seen in the 2nd cent. Gnosticism, but whether there was any real connexion between the 1st cent. germs and the 2nd cent. developments is another question. In the clash of Judaistic, Hellenic, and Christian thought, it would not be surprising if already there were attempts at eclecticism, but the precise links of connexion between the germs of the NT and the developments of the 2nd cent. are yet to seek.

One thing we must keep clearly before us: gnosis in the NT is a truly honourable and important term, and stands for an essential part of the Christian life. Of course there is always the liability to the danger of mere speculation, and this is the case now as it has ever been, emphasizing love as contrasted with mere knowledge (1 Co 8:13), but when gnosis is regarded as both intellectual and moral, we see at once how necessary it is to a true, growing Christian life. The stress laid upon epignosis in the NT Pauline and Petrine, and the marked prominence given to the cognate terms in 1 John, clearly indicate the importance placed on the idea by Apostolic writers as a safeguard of the Christian life. While it is essential the feature of the young Christian to have (forgiveness); and of the growing Christian to be (strong); it is that of the ripe Christian to know (1 Jn 2:4-5). Knowledge is that faith is never contrasted in the Bible with another, possible anthesis. 'Through faith we understand' (He 11:5). Faith and sight, not faith and reason, are antithetical. We know in order to believe, credence leading to confidence, and then to knowledge, not to know more. Knowledge and truth act and react on each other. Truth and truth are correlative, not contradictory. It is only more speculative knowledge which is 'false' (2 Jn 8-10). The spiritual man of the NT (2 Th 3:1), or the perfect man (2 Jn 1), is the man who knows; and this knowledge which is at once intellectual, moral and spiritual, is one of the greatest safeguards against every form of error, and is surely one of the chief results of the enjoyment of the revelation of God in Christ.

GOAD.—See Agriculture, § 1.

GOAT.—An unknown locality near Jerusalem (Jer 31:19).

GOAT.—(1) 2'ar, used generally, both sexes, Gn 30:3, Eze 129, Ezr 6:6 etc. (2) kan (root 'to tap'), 2 Ch 29:29, Ezr 9:4, Dn 9:10, (3) ad'ar (root 'airy'), usually a he-goat, e.g. Dn 8:9 'rough goat'; se'vah, Lv 5:9 'she-goat'; se'brim, tr. 'devils' 2 Ch 13:5, 'satan' is 138:34 (See Satan). (4) 'attâd, only in pl. 'attâdim, 'he-goats' Gn 31:12, AVm and RV 'chief ones' Is 14, but RV 'he-goats.' (5) yafah, 'he-goat,' Fr 30:3 and, Fr 25:19, 'tramp, he-goat.' 10. Goats are among the most valued possessions of the people of Palestine. Nabal had a thousand goats (1 S 25:12; see also Gn 30:36 = 32:24 etc.). They are led to pasture with the sheep, but are from time to time separated from them for milking, herding, and even feeding (Mt 21:13). Goats thrive on extraordinarily bare pastureage, but they do immeasurable destruction to young trees and shrubs, and are responsible for much of the barrenness of the hills. Goats supply most of the milk used in Palestine (Fr 27:2); they are also killed for food, especially the young kids (Gn 27:9, Jg 6:13 etc.). The Syrian goat (Capra mambrica) is black or grey, exceptionally white, and has shaggy hair and remarkably long ears.
Goat's hair is extensively woven into cloaks and material for tents (Ex 26:38), and their skins are tanned entire to make water-bottles. See BRETH.

Wild goat.—(1) yâ'il (cf. proper name Jam), used in pl. yâ'elim, I S 24, Ps 104, and Job 39, (2) ukkî, Dt 15b. Probably both these terms refer to the wild goat or ibex, Capra beden, the beden or 'goats of Moses' of the Arabs. It is common on the inaccessible cliffs round the Dead Sea, some of which are known as jabot or the beden mountains (cf. The goat of God). The ibex is very shy, and difficult to shoot. Though about the size of an ordinary goat, its great curved horns, often 3 feet long, give it a much more imposing appearance.

GOD.—A place mentioned only in 2 S 218 as the scene of an exploit of one of David's warriors. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 20 th God appears as Gezer; many texts read it as Nob. The Gr. and Syr. versions have God. Nothing is known of God as a separate place. The word means 'cistern.' W. F. Conn.

GOD.—The object of this article is to give a brief sketch of the history of belief in God as gathered from the Bible. The existence of God is everywhere assumed in the sacred volume; it will not therefore be necessary here to consider the arguments adduced to show the belief in God's existence is reasonable. It is true that in Ps 14 53 the 'fool' (i.e. the ungodly man) says that there is no God; but the meaning doubtless is, not that the existence of God is denied, but that the 'fool' cannot see that God does not concern Himself with man (see Ps 109).

1. Divine revelation gradual.—God 'spake,' i.e. revealed Himself, 'by divers portions and in divers manners' (Is 61). The word gradually acquired the knowledge of God which we now possess; and it is therefore a gross mistake to look for our ideas and standards of responsibility in the early ages of mankind. The world was educated 'prospect upon prospect, line upon line' (Is 28); and it is noteworthy that even when the gospel age arrived, our Lord did not in a moment reveal all truth, but accommodated His teaching to the capacity of the people (Mt 43); the chosen disciples themselves did not grasp the fulness of that teaching until Pentecost (Jn 16). The fact of the very slow growth of conceptions of God is made much clearer by our increased knowledge with respect to the composition of the OT; now that we have learnt, for example, that the Mosaic code is to be dated, as a whole, centuries later than Moses, and that the patriarchal narratives were written down, as we have them, in the time of the Kings, and that by the ideas of the time, we see that the idea that Israel had much the same conception of God in the age of the Patriarchs as in that of the Prophets is quite untenable, and that the fuller conceptions was a matter of slow growth. The fact of the composite character of the Pentateuch, however, makes it very difficult for us to find out exactly what were the conceptions about God in patriarchal and in Mosaic times; and it is impossible to be dogmatic in speaking of them. We can deal only with probabilities gathered from various indications in the literature, especially from the survival of old customs.

2. Names of God in OT. It will be convenient to gather together the principal OT names of God before considering the conceptions of successive ages. The names will to some extent be a guide to us.

(a) Elohim; the ordinary Hebrew name for God, plural word of dual origin and meaning. It is used, as an ordinary plural, of heathen gods, or of supernatural beings (1 S 28b), or even of earthly judges (Ps 82, cf. Jn 10); but when used of the One God, it takes a singular form. It has been thought by some a relic of pre-historic polytheism, but more probably it is a 'plural of majesty,' such as is common in Hebrew, or else it denotes the fulness of God. The singular Eloah is rare except in Job; it is found in poetry and in late prose.

(b) El, common to Semitic tribes, a name of doubtful meaning; but usually interpreted as 'the Strong One' or as 'the Ruler.' It is probably not connected philosophically with Elohim (Dt 33, Gen 3, p. 404). It is used often in poetry and in proper names; in prose rarely, except as part of a compound title like El Shaddai, or with an epithet or descriptive word attached as 'God of Bethel,' El-Bethel (Ge 31:9); 'a jealous God,' El-ganná (Ex 20).

(c) El Shaddai.—The meaning of Shaddai is uncertain; the name has been derived from a root meaning 'to overthrow,' and would then mean 'the Destroyer'; or from a root meaning 'to pour,' and would then mean 'the Rain-giver'; or it has been interpreted as 'my Mountain' or 'my Lord.' Traditionally it is rendered 'God Almighty,' and there is perhaps a reference to this sense in the name found in an Aramaic translation of Lk 19. According to the Priestly writer (P), the name was characteristic of the patriarchal age (Ex 6, cf. Gn 17:1), 'Shaddai' alone is used often in OT as a poetical name of God (Nu 24, etc.), and is rendered 'the Almighty.'

(d) El Elyon, 'God Most High,' found in Gn 1414. (a) passage derived from a 'special source' of the Pentateuch, i.e. not from J, E, or P, and that of Genesis, p. 165) perhaps to have been originally the name of a Canaanite deity, but applied to the true God. 'Elyon' is also found alone, as in Ps 82 (so tr. into Greek, Lk 13, 2, 28, etc.). It is in close connection with 'El' and with 'Shaddai' in Nu 24, and with 'Jahweh' in Ps 77 18. That 'El Elyon' was a commonly used name is made probable by the fact that it is found in an Aramaic translation in Dn 39 4513, and in a Greek translation in 1 Es 6, etc., Mk 5, Ac 16, and so in He 7, where it is taken directly from Gn 1414 LXX.

(e) Adonai.—'LORD,' the title, common in the prophets, expressing dependence, as of a servant on his master, or of a wife on her husband (Ottley, BLP p. 192 f.).

(f) Jehovah, properly Yahweh (usually written Jehovah), perhaps a proper name. Prof. H. G. Guthe (EBI 11 art. 'Israel,' § 4) thinks that it is a proper name of primitive antiquity and cannot be explained; that it tells us nothing about the nature of the Godhead. This is probably true of the name in pre-Mosaic times; that it was then in existence is certain from the opinion of the Jahwist writer (Ge 44, J), and is proved by its occurrence in proper names, e.g. in 'Jochebed,' the name of Moses' mother (Ex 6, F). What it originally signified is uncertain; the root from which it is derived might mean 'to blow' or 'to breathe,' or 'to fall,' or 'to be.' Further, the name might perhaps have been derived from the causative 'to make to be,' and in that case might signify 'Creator.' But, as Driver remarks (Genesis, p. 400), the important thing is that it is not what the name meant originally, but what it came actually to denote to the Israelites. And there can be no doubt that from Moses' time onwards it was derived from the 'imperfect' tense of the verb 'to be,' and was understood to mean 'He who is wont to be,' or else 'He who will be.' This is the explanation given in Ex 332; when God Himself speaks, He uses the first person, and the name becomes 'I am' or 'I will be.' Driver (ibid.) denies, then, Existence; yet it is undeniably understood active and self-manifesting Existence (Driver, p. 408). It is almost equivalent to 'He who has life in Himself' (cf. Jn 5). It became the common name of God in post-Mosaic times, and was the specially personal designation.

We have to consider whether the name was used by the patriarchs. The Jahwist writer (J) uses it constantly in his narrative of the early ages; and Gn 44 (see above) clearly exhibits more than a mere anachronistic use of a name common in the writer's age. On the other hand, the Priestly writer (P) was of opinion that the patriarchs had not used the name, but had known God as 'El Shaddai,' (Ex 6:6); for it is putting force upon language to suppose that P meant only that the patriarchs did not understand the full meaning of the name 'Shaddai,' although they would have been consistent in not using the name 'Jehovah' until the Exodus. So the author of Job, who lays his scene in the time of Job, and the ancient authors of the dynastic poems, use 'Shaddai,' etc., and only once (129) 'Jehovah' (Driver, p. 185). We have thus contradictory authorities. Driver (p. 182) says that though the name was not absolutely new in Moses' time, it was current only in a limited circle, as is seen from its absence in the composition of patriarchal proper names.

'Jehovah' is a modern and hybrid form, dating only from A.D. 1518. The name 'Jehovah' was so altered that it was no longer a form of the Canaanite 'Shaddai,' hence owing to an over-literal interpretation of the Third Commandment. In reading 'Adonai' was substituted for Elohim, and hence the vowels of that name were in MSS attached to the consonants of 'Jehovah' for a guide to the reader, and the result, when the MSS are read as written (as they were never meant by Jewish scribes to be read), is 'Jehovah.' Thus this modern form has the consonants of one word and the vowels of another. The Hellenistic Jews, in Greek, substituted 'Kurios (Lord) for the sacred name, and it is thus rendered in LXX and NT. This explains why in EV 'Jehovah' is used in the rendering of Jehovah, the former vowelless Hebrew form of the name is given to the Hebrew y and in the Greek capital to the Hebrew y and in (thus, Heb. נְאֹם = Gr. Ἰησοῦς).

(g) Jah is an apocopated form of Jehovah, and appears in poetry (e.g. Ps 88, Ex 139) in the word 'Hallelujah' and proper names. For Jah see Adonai.

(b) Jehovah 'Sabaot' ('Saboah', of Ro 9:5 and Ja 5), in EV 'Lords of hosts,' (wh. see), appears frequently in the prophetic and post-exilic literature (Is 1:27, Ps 84 etc.) and appears to have been originally to have referred to God's presence with the armies of Israel in the times of the monarchy; as fuller conceptions of God became prevalent, the name received an amended meaning. Jehovah, as a name, is used in connection with the names of God, not only of the ancient Canaanites, but of all the hosts of heaven and of the forces of nature (Cheyne, Aids to Devout Study of Criticism, p. 284).

We notice lastly, that 'Jehovah' and 'Elohim' are joined together in Gn 2:24, Ex 34, and elsewhere. Jehovah is identified with the Creator of the Universe (Otway, BL, p. 195). We have the same conjuncture, with 'Sabaot,' added (Lord God of hosts), in Am 5:5. 'Adonai' with 'Sabaot' is not uncommon.

3. Pre-Mosaic conceptions of God.—We are now in a position to consider the growth of the revelation of God in successive ages; and special reference may here be made to原料'elaborate monograph on the 'Religion of Israel' in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. 612-734, for a careful discussion of OT conceptions of God. With regard to those of pre-Mosaic times there is much room for doubt. The descriptions written so many centuries later are necessarily coloured by the ideas of the author's age, and we have to depend largely on the survival of old customs in historical times—customs which had often acquired a new meaning, or of which the original meaning was forgotten. Certainly pre-Mosaic Israel conceived of God as attached to certain places or pillars or trees or springs, as we see in Gn 12:7 13:1 14:35, 37, Jos 24:26 etc. It has been conjectured that the stone circle at Gilead (Jos 4:3-4, 8-9) was a heathen sanctuary converted to the religion of Jehovah. A. B. Davidson (Hastings' DB li. 301) truly remarks on the difficulty in primitive times of realizing deity apart from a local and tribal God, and he remarks that this difficulty was representing Jehovah under any form, for His presence was attached to it (but see below, § 4).—Traces of Totemism,' of belief in the blood relationship of a tribe and a natural object, such as an animal, treated as the property of the tribe, have been found in the worship of Yahweh under the form of a molten bull (1 K 12:24; but this was doubtless derived from the Canaanites), and in the avoidance of unclean animals. Traces of 'Animalism,' or belief in the activity of the spirits of one's dead relations, and its consequence 'Ancestor-worship,' have been found in the mourning customs of Israel, such as cutting the hair, winding the flesh, wearing sackcloth, funeral feasts, reverence for tombs, and the levirate marriage, and in the term elohim (i.e. supernatural beings) given to Samuel's spirit and (probably) other spirits seen by the witch of Endor (1 S 28:3). Kautzsch thinks that these results are not proved, and that the belief in demonical powers explains the mourning customs without its being necessary to suppose that Anism had developed into Ancestor-worship—Polytheism has been traced in the plural 'Elohim' (see above), in the emath, or housed deities (1 S 12:11) and in the phrase 'Shaddai,' which appears in Greek Jewish literature as the equivalent of the Hebrew y and in the Greek capital to the Hebrew y and in. Doubtless Israel in danger of worshipping foreign gods, but there is no trace of a Hebrew polytheism (Kautzsch). It will be seen that the results are almost entirely negative; and we must remain in doubt as to the patriarchal conception of God. It seems clear, however, that conformation of the worshipper with God was considered to be effected by sacrifice.

4. Post-Mosaic conceptions of God.—The age of the Exodus was undoubtedly a great crisis in the religious education of Israel. Moses proclaimed Jehovah as the God of Israel, supreme among gods, alone to be worshipped by the people whom He had made His own, and with whom He had entered into covenant. Though the name of the God of the Canaanites was gravitated towards nature-worship. The great mass of the early post-Mosaic age, then, was to develop the idea of Personality. The defective idea of individuality is seen, for example, in the putting of Achan's household to death (Jos 7:21), and in the wholesale slaughter of the Canaanites. (The defect appears much later, in an Oriental nation, in Gn 6, and is constantly observed by travellers in the East to this day.) Jehovah, therefore, was the God of God; and few of the older writers freely use anthropomorphisms. They speak of God's arm, mouth, lips, eyes; He is said to move (Gn 22:12-13), to wrestle (32:24). Similarly He is said to 'repeat' of an action (Gn 6, Ex 32:4; but see 1 S 15:29), to be grieved, angry, jealous, and gracious, to love and to hate; in these ways the intelligence, activity, and power of God are emphasized. As a personal God He enters into covenant with Israel, protecting, guiding them, giving them victory. The wars and victories of Israel are those of Jehovah (Nu 21:24, Jg 5).
an image of Jahweh (Jgs 6:32), though the word was afterwards used for a gold or silver casing of an image, and so in later times for a sort of ornamental covering. The tendency to exalt God's transcendence, to make Him self-centred and self-absorbed, and to widen the gulf between Him and the world (Sanday, in Hastings' DB ii. 206). This tendency began even earlier than the LXX and accounts for the distortion of the anthropomorphic language. In the Priest's Code (P) this language is avoided as much as possible. And later, when the LXX was translated, the alterations made to avoid anthropomorphisms are very significant. Thus in Ex 15:8 LXX the name 'Man of war' (of Jahweh) disappears; in Ex 19:16 LXX Moses went up not 'to Elohim,' but 'to the mount of God.' In 24:34 the word 'they saw Elohim of Israel' becomes 'they saw the place where the God of Israel stood.' So in the Targums man is described as being created in the image of the angels, and many other anthropomorphisms are removed. The same tendency is seen in the almost constant use of 'Elohim' rather than 'Jahweh' in the later books of OT. The tendency, only faintly marked in the later prophetic books, is much more evident as time went on. Side by side with it is to be noticed the exaltation of the Law, and the increasing conception of God as subject to His own Law. In the Talmud He is represented as great God, studying the Law, and keeping the Sabbath (Gilbert, in Hastings' DB i. 582).

Yet there were preparations for the full teaching of the gospel with regard to distinctions in its exposition. The old narratives of the Theophanies, of the mysterious 'Angel of the Lord' who appeared at one time to be God and at another to be distinct from Him, would prepare men's minds in some degree for the Incarnation, but suggesting a personal unveiling of God (see Liddon, BL i. 8; even the common use of the plural name Elohim, whatever its original significance (see § 2 above), would necessarily prepare them for the doctrine of the distinction in the Godhead, as would the quasi-personification of the 'Word' and 'Wisdom,' as in Proverbs, Job, Wisdom, Sirach, and in the later Jewish writers, who, no longer personified but described God (Scott, in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. p. 308). Above all, the gospels, the doctrine of the 'Spirit of God' in the prophetic books (esp. Is 59:34) and in the Psalms (esp. 51:11), and the expectation of a superhuman King Messiah, would tend in the same direction.

7. Christian development of the doctrine of God. —We may first deal with the development in the conception of God's fatherhood. As contrasted with the OT, the NT emphasizes the universal fatherhood and love of God. The previous ages had scarcely risen above a conception of God as Father of Israel, and in a special sense of Messiah (Ps 22); they had thought of God only as ruling the Gentiles and bringing salvation to His people. The Lord taught, on the other hand, that God is Father of all and loving to all; He is kind even 'towards the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6:35). Thereupon the name 'Father' is more frequently than any other. Yet Jesus Himself bears to the Father a unique relationship; the Voice at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration would otherwise have no meaning (Mt 11:3 and Mt. Lk.). Jesus never speaks to His disciples as 'our Father'; He calls Him 'Father' (seldom in Synoptics, Mt 11:27 25:28 [REV] 25:9 [see §8], Mk 13:2, Lk 10:21, parousia in Jn.). He says of Himself 'I and My Father' (very prominently in all the Gospels, also in Rev 21:3, or else 'My Father and your Father') (Jn 10:17). The use of 'his Father' in Mk 6:2 and Jn. Lk. is similar. This unique relationship is the point of the saying that God sent His only-begotten Son to save the world (John 3:16, Jn 4:14) —a saying which shows also the universal fatherhood of God, for salvation is offered to all men (so Jn 12:29). The passage Mt 11:27 (= Lk 10:21) is important as being among the earliest materials made use of by the Evangelists, and as containing the 'whole of the Christology of the Fourth Gospel' (Plummer, ICC, 'St Luke,' p. 252; for the latest criticism on it see Sanday, Criticism of the Fourth Gosp. p. 226f.). It marks the unique relation in which Jesus stands to the Father. —We have, then, in the NT three senses in which God is Father. (a) He is the Father of Jesus Christ. (b) He is the Father of all His creatures (cf. Ac 17:24, 1 Jn 5:21). (c) He is the Father of all Jews; Mk 14:22 implies that, though the Jews were to be fed first, the Gentiles were also to be fed. He is the Father of all the Jews, as well as of the disciples of Jesus; the words 'one is your Father' (of Jahweh) in the later books also (Mt 23:9). But in a very special sense is He Father of the disciples, who are taught to pray 'Our Father' (Mt 6); in the shorter version of Lk 11:2, 'Father,' and who call on Him as Father (1 P 1:11 REV). For Pauline passages which touch on this triple fatherhood see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, III. I.
The meaning of the doctrine of the universal fatherhood is that God is love (1 Jn 4:8), and that He manifests His love by sending His Son into the world to save it (see above).

II. DISTINCTIONS IN THE GODHEAD.—We should not expect to find the nomenclature of Christian theology in the NT. The writings contained therein are not a manual of theology; and the object of the technical terms invented or used by the Church was to explain the doctrine of the Bible in a form intelligible to the Christian learner. They do not mark a development of doctrine in times subsequent to the Gospel age. The use of the words 'Father,' 'Son,' and 'Spirit' appears as an example of this. They were adopted in order to express the teaching of the NT that there are distinctions in the Godhead; that Jesus is no mere man, but that He came down from heaven to take our nature upon Him; that He and the Father are one thing (Jn 10:37, see below), and yet are distinct (Mk 13:32); that the Spirit is God, and yet distinct from the Father and the Son (Ro 8, see below). At the same time Christian theology takes care that we should not conceive of the Three Persons as of three individuals. The meaning of the word 'Trinity' is, in the language of the Quicumque vult, that 'the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet they are not three Gods, but one God.'

The present writer must profoundly dissent from the view that Jesus' teaching about God showed but little advance on that of the prophets, and that the 'Trinitarian' idea as found in the Fourth Gospel and in Mt 28:19 was a development of a later age, say of the very end of the 1st century. Confessedly a great and marvelous development took place. To whom are we to assign it, if not to our Lord? Had a great teacher, or a school of teachers, arisen, who could of themselves produce such an absolute revolution in thought, how is it that contemporary writers and posterity alike put them completely in the background; and gave to the teaching of this Teacher of the world? This can be accounted for only by the revolution of thought being the work of Jesus Himself. An examination of the literature will lead us to that conclusion.

(a) We begin with St. Paul, as our earliest authority. The 'Apostolic benediction' (2 Co 13:14) which, as Dr. Sanday remarks (Hastings' DB ii. 218), has no dogmatic object and expounds no new doctrine—indeed expounds no doctrine at all—unequivocally groups together Jesus Christ, God [the Father], and the Holy Ghost as the source of blessing, and in that remarkable order. It is inconceivable that St. Paul would have done this had he looked on Jesus Christ as a mere man, or even as a created angel, and on the Holy Ghost only as an influence of the Father. But how did he arrive at this triple grouping, which is strictly consistent with his doctrine elsewhere? We cannot think that he invented it; and it is only natural to suppose that he founded it upon some words of our Lord.

(b) The command to baptize into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost (Mt 28:19), if spoken by our Lord,—whatever the exact meaning of the words, whether as a formula to be used, or as expressing the result of Christian baptism,—would amply account for St. Paul's benediction in 2 Co 13:14. But it has been strenuously denied that these words are authentic, or, if they are authentic, that they are our Lord's own utterance. We must carefully distinguish these two allegations. First, it is decided that they are part of the First Gospel. It has been maintained by Mr. Conybeare that they are an interpolation of the 2nd cent., and that the original text had: 'Make disciples of all the nations in my name, teaching them,' etc. All extant manuscripts and versions have our present text (the Old Syriac is wanting here); but in several passages of Eusebius (c. a.d. 260-340) which refer to the verse, the words about baptism are not mentioned, and in some of them the words 'in my name' are added. The allegation is carefully and impartially examined by Bp. Chase in JThSt vi. 488 ff., and is judged by him to be baseless. As a matter of fact, nothing is more common in ancient writers than to omit, in referring to a Scripture passage, any words which are not relevant to the treatise. Dean Robinson (JThSt vii. 180), who controverts Bp. Chase's interpretation of the baptismal command, is yet entirely satisfied with his defence of its authenticity. Secondly, it is denied that the words in question were spoken by our Lord; it is said that they belong to that later stage of thought to which the Fourth Gospel is ascribed. As a matter of fact, it is urged, the earliest of all the Gospels was written, not by those who knew the words used by our Lord, but in the name of Jesus Christ, or into the name of the Lord Jesus, or into Christ Jesus, or into Christ (Ac 28:38; 10:19, 16, Gal 3:20). Now it is not necessary to maintain that in any of these places a formula of baptism is prescribed or mentioned. The reverse is perhaps more probable (see Chase, l.c.). The phrases in Acts need mean only that converts were united to Jesus or that they became Christians (cf. 1 Co 10:19); the phrase in Mt 28:19 may mean that disciples were to be united to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost by baptism, without any formula being enjoined; or if we take what seems to be the less probable interpretation (that of Dean Robinson), that 'in the name' is used by the authority of, a similar result holds good. We need not even hold that Mt 28:19 represents our Lord's ἐπιτέλεσεν λόγον. But that it faithfully represents our Lord's teaching in this to follow from the use of the term in baptism in 2 Co 13:14 (above), and from the fact that immediately after the Apocalypse the same sort of formal baptism that we read of was that of Mt 28:19, as in Didache 7 (the words quoted exactly, though in § 9 Christians are said to have been baptized into the name of the Lord), in Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 61 (he does not quote the actual words, but paraphrases, and at the end of the same chapter says 'he who is baptized into the name of Jesus Christ'), and in Tertullian, adv. Prax. 20 (paraphrase), de Bapt. 13 (exactly), de Præscr. Har. 20 (paraphrase). Thus the second generation of Christians must have understood the words in this sense.

But the same doctrine is found also in numerous other passages of the NT, and we may now proceed briefly to compare some of them with Mt 28:19, prefacing the investigation with the remark that the supposed words in that verse occur in the most Jewish of the Gospels, where such teaching is improbable unless it comes from our Lord (so Scott in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. p. 513).

(c) That the Fourth Gospel is full of the doctrine of 'Father, Son, and Spirit' is allowed by all (see esp. Jn 14-16). The Son and the Spirit are both Paracletes, sent by the Father; the Spirit is sent by the Father and the Son, the Father and the Son being united in this one thought. We cannot think that the Spirit takes the things of Jesus and declares them unto us. In Jn 10:16 our Lord says: 'I and the Father are one thing' (the numeral is neuter), i.e. one essence; the words cannot fall short of this (Westcott, in loc.). But the same doctrine is found in all parts of the NT. Our Lord is the only-begotten Son (see § 7 above), who was pre-existent, and was David's Lord in heaven before He came to earth (Mt 22:44; this is the force of the argument). He claims to judge the world and to bestow glory (Mt 25:34, Lk 23:47; cf. 2 Co 11:16), to forgive sins and to bestow the power of binding and loosing (Mk 9:15, Mt 28:18 and 16:19; cf. Jn 20:23); He invites sinners to come to Him (Mt 11:28, cf. 10:14, Lk 14:26); He is the teacher of the world (Mt 11:27); He casts out devils as Son of God, and gives authority to His disciples to cast them out (Mk 3:15, 17). The claims of Jesus are as tremendous as those of Paul has all things else (Mk 11:11). The case of Paul the Apostle in Gal 3:14. In them God the Father and Jesus Christ are constantly joined together (Just as GOG.—1. The 'prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' from the land of Magog (Ezk 38, and often in chs. 38, 39), whom Ezek. pictures as leading a great host of nations from the far North against the restored Israel, and as being ignominiously defeated, by JEHU'S intervention, upon the mountains of Canaan. Whence the name 'Gog' was derived we do not certainly know: the name reminds us of that of Gogus (Gr Gogus, Assyr. Gojs, Meshech's people, king of Lydia, of whom E.G. (Ezr 2:24) tells us, and who, Ashurbanipal states (KIB ii. 173-5), when his country was invaded by the Gimirra (Cimmerians), expelled them with Assyrian help (c. B.C. 665); and it has been conjectured (Sayce) that this name might have reached Palestine as that of a distant and successful king, who might be made a typical leader of a horde of invaders from the North. That Gomer (= the Cimmerian), who was really his foe, appears in Ezek. among his allies might be explained either from the vagueness of the knowledge which reached Pal., or because Ezek. had in view, not the historical 'Gog' but merely an ideal figure suggested by the historical 'Gog.' Upon the question of Ezek. 38, Magog, 'Gog,' and 'Magog,' appear often in the later Jewish eschatology as leading the final, but abortive, assault of the powers of the world upon the Kingdom of God. Cf. Rev. 20:7-4; in the Mishna, Eduyoth 2. 10; Sib. Orac. iii. 310-322; and see further ref. in Schürer, § 29. iii. 4; Weber, Atest. Theol. (Index); Volz, Jüd. Eschat. p. 176 (and index).

2. The eponym of a Reubenite family (1 Ch 5). S. R. DRIVER.

GOLIATH is the Heb. word which in EV is variously rendered 'gigolites,' 'nations,' 'heathen' (see Preface to RV of OT). In the obscure expression in Gn 14!, where AV has 'king of nations,' RV retains Goliath (possibly a corruption from Guff a people living to the E. of the little Zabbab, conveniently). The name Goliath offers the alternative rendering 'nations.' The same difference in rendering between AV and RV is found also in Jos 12! 20. Possibly in Gn 14! the reference is to the Ammonite, or 'horde' of northern peoples, who from time to time invaded Assyria (so Sayce).

GOLAN.—One of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan (Dt 4:41, Josh 20, assigned to the sons of Gershom (Jos 214, 1 Ch 6)). In the territory belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh in Bashan. Both the town, Golan, and a district, Gaulanitis, were known to Josephus (Ant. xiii. xv. 3, xvii. 1). The latter is called the ' Arabs of Gaulot,' and the ' Gugites,' or 'hordes' of northern peoples, whom from time to time invaded Assyria (so Sayce).

GOLD.—See MINING AND METALS.

GOLGOTHA (Mt 27, Mk 15, Jn 19), from the Aram. Gulgotha. In Lk 23, the place is called Kiranton (RV 'the skull,' AV 'Calvary'). The place was evidently outside the city (He 139), but near it (Jn 1923); it was a site visible afar off (Mk 15, Lk 23), and was probably near a high road (Mt 27). The name is derived from the fact that it was a place where skulls were to be found, perhaps a place of public execution. This is improbable. (2) That the 'hill' was skull-shaped. This is a popular modern view. Against it may be urged that there is no evidence that Golgotha was a hill at all. See also below. (3) That the name is due to an ancient tradition that the skull of Adam was found there. This tradition is quoted by Origen, Athanasius, Epiphanius, etc., and its survival to-day is marked by the skull shown in the Chapel of Adam under the 'Calvary' in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. (4) That it is a hill of insignificance, theory that the legend of the skull of Adam, and even the name Golgotha, really have their origin in the capitation of Sila, Capitoline, which stood on the site now covered by the Church of the Sepulchre. Of the many proposed sites for Golgotha it may be briefly said that there is no side of the city which has not been suggested by some authority for the place of a skull; but, practically speaking, there are only two worth considering, the traditional site and the 'green hill' or 'Gordon's Calvary.' The traditional site included in the Church of the Sepulchre and in close proximity to the tomb itself has been discontinued tradition attaching to it from the days of Constantine. In favour of this site it may be argued with great plausibility that it is very unlikely that all tradition of a spot so important in the eyes of Christians should have been lost, even allowing all consideration for the vicissitudes that the city passed through between the Crucifixion and the days of Constantine. The topographical difficulties are dealt with in the discussion of the site of the second wall [Jerusalem], but it may safely be said that investigations have certainly tended in recent years to reduce them. With regard to the 'green hill' outside the Damascus gate, which has much support in some quarters, its claims are based upon the four presuppositions that Golgotha was shaped like a skull, that the present skull-shaped hill had much an appearance at that time, that the ancient road and wall ran as they do to-day, and that the Crucifixion was near the Jewish 'place of stoning' (which is said by an unreliable local Jewish tradition to be situated here). All these hypotheses are extremely dubious. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GOLIATH.—A giant, said to have been a descendant... of the early race of Anakim. He was slain, in single combat, by David (or, according to another tradition, by Elhanan) at Ephes-dammim, before an impending battle between the Philistines and the Israelites. That this 'dus' was of a religious character comes out clearly in 1 S 17:42, where we are told that the Philistine cursed David by his gods, while David replies: And I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts. The fact that David brings the giant's sword as an offering into the sanctuary at Nob points in the same direction. Goliath is described as being 'six cubits and a span' in height, i.e. over nine feet, at the likeliest reckoning; his armour and weapons were proportionate to his great height. Human skeletons have been found of equal height, so that there is nothing improbable in the Biblical account of his stature. The flight of the Philistines on the death of their champion could be accounted for by their belief that the Israelite God had shown Himself superior to their god (but see 2 S 23:14, 1 CH 11:18); see, further, David, Elhanan.

GOMER.—1. One of the sons of Japheth and the father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gn 10:2, 1 CH 1:14), who along with Togarmah is included by Ezekiel in the army of Gog (Ezk 38). Gomer represents the people termed Gedarim by the Assyrians and Cimmerians by the Greeks. Their original home appears to have been north of the Euxine, but by the 7th cent. B.C. they had completely conquered Cappadocia and settled there.

2. Daughter of Diblaim, wife of the prophet Hosea (wh. see). W. E. OSBORNE.

GOMORRAH.—See PLAIN (CITIES OF THE).

GOODMAN.—The only occurrence of this Eng. word in the OT is Pr 7:2 'the goodman is not at home.' The Heb. is simply 'the man'; but as the reference is to the woman's husband, 'goodman,' still used in Scotland for 'husband,' was in 1611 an accurate rendering. In the NT the word occurs 12 times (always in the Synop. Gospels) as the trans. of oikodespotes, 'master of the house.' The same Gr. word is translated 'householder' in Mt 13:28; 20:21, and 'master of the house' in Mt 10:19, Mk 13:13.

GOPER WOOD (Gn 6:14), of which the ark was constructed by tradition cypress wood, and this, or else the cedar, may be infected as probable. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GOIOS.—A general of Antiochus Epiphanies, who is described as 'a mighty man of the king's friends' (1 Mac 3:45), and a captain who 'had experience in military service.' (2 Mac 8:33). When Antiochus set out on his Parthian campaign (c. 166 or 165), his chancellor, Lyons, was charged with the suppression of the revolt in Par, despatched a large army to Judea, under the command of Ptolemy, Nicoran, and Giosios. The fortunes of the war are described in 1 Mac 3:42

In classical Greek the word means the reward given to a bearer of good tidings (so 2 S 4:9 LXX 'plausa in pl.), but afterwards it came to mean the message itself, and so in 2 S 15:26, 21 (LXX) a derived word is used in this sense. In NT the word means 'good tidings' about the salvation of the world by the coming of Jesus Christ. It is not there used of the written record. A genitive case of or as a possessive pronoun, if it be not (a) the person or the thing preached (the gospel of Christ, or of peace, or of salvation, or of the grace of God, or of the Kingdom, Mt 4:17 9:23 24:14, Mk 1:14, Lk 10:9, Ro 15:19; Eph 1:14, etc.); or somebody who preaches (Mk 1:7, Ro 2:16 10:1, 2 Co 4:2, etc.); or rarely (c) the persons preached to (Gal 3:23). The gospel is often used in NT absolutely, as in Mk 1:14 9:1 14, RV, Lk 14:15, Ro 11:16, 2 Co 5:18 (where the idea is not that of a sermon given by a preacher). The noun is not found in Lk., or the Catholic Epistles, and only once in the Johannine writings (Rev 14, 'an eternal gospel—an angelic message'). In Ro 10:14 'the gospel' is used absolutely of the meanest of OT prophets. The written record was not called 'the Gospel' till a later age. By the earliest generation of Christians the oral teaching was the main thing regarded; men told what they had heard and seen, or what they had received from eye-witnesses. As these died out and the written record alone remained, the perspective altered. The earliest certain use of the word in this sense is in Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150), the Apostles in the New Testament written by themselves, which are called Gospels, Apol. I. 66; cf. 'the Memoirs which were drawn up by His Apostles and those who followed them' (Did. 103). But the Jn. gospels, among the earliest known titles of the Evangelic records (which, however, we cannot assert to be contemporary with the records themselves) are simply 'According to Matthew,' etc.

A. J. MACLEAN.

GOSPELS.—Under this heading we may consider the four Gospels as a whole, and their relations to one another, leaving detailed questions of date and authorship to the separate articles.

1. The aims of the Evangelists.—On this point we have contemporary evidence in the Lukan preface (1:1-4), which shows that no Evangelist felt himself bound from taking all possible pains in securing accuracy, that many had already written Gospel records, and that their object was to give a contemporary account of our Lord's life on earth. As yet, when St. Luke wrote, these records had not been written by eye-witnesses. But they depended for their authority on eye-witnesses (P), and this is the important point, the names of the authors being comparatively immaterial. The records have a religious aim (Jn 20:31). Unlike the modern biography, which seeks to relate all the principal events of the life described, the Gospel aims at producing faith by describing a few significant incidents taken out of a much larger whole. Hence the Evangelists are all the geographer, an Egyptian name on the East border of the Delta of the Nile, and this seems to be the locality most probably contemplated by the narrator. It runs towards the modern Z嫉妒 (a name applied to the Bitter Lakes). There seems to be no Egyptian origin for the name, unless it represented Reem, the Egyptian equivalent of Pharaoh (the chief town of the nome of Egypt called the Delta). It may be of Semitic origin, as is suggested by the occurrence of the name, as noticed above, outside Egyptian territory.

silent about many things which we should certainly expect to read about if the Gospels were biographies. This consideration takes away all point from the suggestion that silence about an event means that the writer was ignorant of it (see Sanday, Criticism of Fourth Gospel, p. 71). Again, although, before St. Luke wrote, there were numerous Gospels, only one of these survived till Ireneus' time (c. 175-203). But where the rest entirely vanished? It may perhaps be conjectured that some fragments which seem not to belong to our canonical Gospels (such as Lk 22:46, Jn 7:5-8, Mk 16:9-20) are survivals of these documents. But this is a mere guess.

2. The Synoptic Problem. The first three Gospels in many respects accord closely with one another, and differ from the Fourth. Their topics are the same; they deal chiefly with the Galilean ministry, not explicitly mentioning visits to Jerusalem after Jesus' baptism and the last one; while the Fourth Gospel deals largely with those visits. In a word, the first three Gospels give the same general survey, the same 'synopsis,' and are therefore called the 'Synoptic Gospels,' and their rivals the 'Synoptists.' But further, they agree very closely in words, arrangement of sentences, and in many other details. They have a large number of passages in common, and in many cases all three relate the same incidents in nearly the same words; in others, two out of the three have common matter. The likeness goes far beyond what might be expected from three writers independently relating the same series of facts. In that case we should look for likeness in details of the narratives, but not in the actual words. A striking example is in Mt 9:30-Mk 2:14-Lk 5:17. The parenthesis ('Then saith he to the sick of the palsy') is common to all three—a possible coincidence if all were independent. Or, again, in Mt. and Mk. the Baptist's imprisonment is related parenthetically, out of its place (Mt 14:1-7, Mk 6:14-16), though in Lk. it comes in its true chronological order. The Synoptic Problem is, then, that the three Gospels differ in some dependence. On the other hand, there are striking variations, even in words, in the common passages. Thus the Synoptists must have dealt very freely with their sources; they did not treat them 'imutably'. What then, is the nature of the undoubted literary connexion between them?

(a) The Oral Theory. — It is clear from NT (e.g. Lk 11) and early ecclesiastical writers (e.g. Papias, who told that he laid special stress on 'the utterances of a living and abiding voice,' see Eusebius, HE iii. 39), that the narrative teaching of the Apostles was handed on by word of mouth in a very systematic manner. Eastern memory systems, and this fact favoured the development of a mode of tradition. We know that the Jews kept up their traditions orally (Mt 15:29 etc.). It is thought, then, that both the resemblances and the differences between the Synoptists may be accounted for by each of them having written down the oral tradition to which he was accustomed.

This is the 'Oral Theory,' which met with a great degree of support, especially in England, a generation or so ago. It was first systematically propounded in Germany by Giese's, in 1818, and was maintained by Alford and Westcott, and called by A. Westcott. It is suggested that this theory would account for unusual words or expressions being found in all the Synoptics, as these would retain their hold on the memory. It is thought that the catechetical instruction was carried out very systematically, and that there were different schools of catechists; and that this would account for all the phenomena. The main objection to the theory lies in the objections raised to its rival, the Documentary Theory (see below), especially that on the latter view the freedom with which the later Evangelists used the earlier, or the common sources, contradicts any idea of inspiration, or even of authority attaching to the documents as originally written. It is even said (Wright) that a man copying from a document could not produce such multitudinous variations in wording. The great objection to the Oral Theory is that it could not produce the extraordinarily close resemblances in language, such as the parentheses mentioned above, unless indeed the oral teaching were so firmly stereotyped and so exactly learned by heart that it had become practically the same thing as a written Gospel. Hence the Oral Theory has fallen into disuse. Yet we may retain this element of truth in it, that oral teaching went on for some time side by side with written Gospels, and provided independent traditions (e.g. in a cave, as Justin Martyr says), and indeed influenced the later Evangelists in their treatment of the earlier Gospels. It was only towards the end of the lives of the Apostles that our Gospels were written.

(b) The Documentary Theory, in one form, now obsolete, supposed that the latest of the Synoptists knew and borrowed from the other two, and the middle Synoptist from the earliest.

This theory, if true, would be a sufficient cause for the resemblance; but in spite of Zahn's argument to the contrary (Einleitung, ii. 400), it is extremely unlikely that Matthew knew Luke's Gospel or vice versa. To mention only one case, the Birth-accounts clearly argue the independences of both, especially in the matter of the genealogies. Augustine's theory that Mark followed, and was the synthesizer of, Matthew seems to be impossible, both because of the graphic and autopic nature of Mk., which precludes the idea of an abbreviator, and because parallel passages in Mt and Mk. were not thought to be imitable, but those of the Synoptists who wrote in the Greek language, and the Synoptist is thought to have been written in Greek by a second hand, as Dr. Westcott argued. There is no doubt that Dr. Westcott was right in the main, though his later arguments for the parallelism of the Synoptists were not so well founded. The objection transfers modern ideas with regard to literary borrowing to the 1st century. As a matter of fact, we know that old writers did the very thing objected to; e.g. Genesis freely embodies older documents; the Didache (c. a.d. 120) probably incorporates other Synoptists independently used; but if this is not the case, at least our Mk. represents that document most closely. This theory would at once account for the close resemblances.

Here it may be as well to give at once a sufficient answer to the chief objection to all the documentary theories (see above). The objection transfers modern ideas with regard to literary borrowing to the 1st century. As a matter of fact, we know that old writers did the very thing objected to; e.g. Genesis freely embodies older documents; the Didache (c. a.d. 120) probably incorporates other Synoptists independently used; but if this is not the case, at least our Mk. represents that document most closely. This theory would at once account for the close resemblances.

It is obvious that, as a matter of fact, written documents were in existence to which we are enticed to look, and to use them for the purpose of comparing. If we do so, we shall find that a great many cases of parallelism are due to the common use of a single document by both. It then becomes necessary to account for the differences between the Synoptists. These, it is suggested, arise from the Synoptic Problem. Thus we have the following hypothesis.

(i) The Synoptists each used a common document; they used it freely, and with such an overabundance of material that they could not hope to reproduce it with any great accuracy.

(ii) If two of them were working simultaneously, they would be more likely to adopt the same simplification of the document. This is the fundamental idea of the Theory. The Synoptists could not have used one and the same document, however, since there are so many divergencies. Hence we are forced to suppose that they each used a common document, and then worked on it independently.

(iii) The Synoptists might have used their own Gospels as documents, if they so desired.

(iv) The Synoptists might have used the other Synoptists, if they so desired.

(v) The Synoptists might have used the Old Testament, or other documents, if they so desired.

(vi) The Synoptists might have used the traditions of the Church, if they so desired.

(vii) The Synoptists might have used the traditions of the Church, if they so desired.

(viii) The Synoptists might have used the traditions of the Church, if they so desired.

This is the 'Documentary Theory.' It is thought, perhaps, that this is the right theory, but it is not possible to say so, since we have no knowledge of other documents than the written Gospels, and there is no evidence that the Synoptists used any other document than those we now have. Hence the theory is still in doubt.

Another form of the Documentary Theory may be briefly mentioned, namely, that the common source was an Aramaic document, differently translated by the three Evangelists. This, it is thought, might account... for the differences, and much ingenuity has been expended on showing how an Aramaic word might, by different pointing (for points take the place of vowels in Aramaic), or by a slight error, produce the differences in Greek which we find. But it is easy to say that this theory could not possibly account for the close verbal resemblances or even for most of the differences. A common source must be the common source.

(c) The non-Markan sources of Mt. and Lk. — We have now to consider those parts of Mt. and Lk. which are common to both, but are not found in Mk., and also those parts which are found only in Mt. or only in Lk. In the former the same phenomena of verbal resemblances and differences occur; but, on the other hand, the common matter is, to a great extent, treated in quite a different order by Mt. and Lk. This peculiarity in close of Papias (see art. Matthew [GOSPELS ACC. TO]), the common source of the three, was a document. But the same objections as before apply here (e.g. cf. Mt. 6: 5; Lk. 10: 14; Mt. 23: 8, 14, which are almost word for word the same). We must postulate a written Greek common source; and the differences of order are most easily accounted for by observing the characteristics of the Evangelists. St. Matthew has rather a narrative according to subject, grouping incidents and teachings together for this reason, while St. Luke rather preserved chronological order (cf. the treatment of the Evangelism, as above). Thus in Mt. we find groups of sayings (e.g. the Sermon on the Mount) and parables, not necessarily spoken at one time, but closely connected by subject. We may infer that St. Luke treated this document common to him and St. Matthew in a stricter chronological order, because he treats Mk. in that way. He introduces a large part of Mk. in one place, keeping almost always to its order; then he interpolates a long section from some other authority (Lk. 24: 36-21, with the above). But in Mt. time is marked by the mention of several Jewish feasts, notably the Passover, and we gather from Lk. that the ministry lasted either 24 or 34 years, according as read in S. 'a feast (within S. Passover) or 'the feast' (which perhaps was the Passover). These differences are what we should expect when we consider that the Synoptic story is chiefly a Galilean one, and is not concerned with visits to Jerusalem and Judea until the last one just before the Crucifixion. Yet from incidental notices in the Synoptics themselves we should have guessed that Jesus did pay visits to Jerusalem. Every religious Jew would do so, if possible, at least to the Feast of the Dedication, if not to Jerusalem. We have no evidence that Jesus conformed to this custom, but had paid the first visit of His ministry just before the Crucifixion, we could not account for the sudden eminence of the Jerusalem Jews to Him at that time, or for the existence of disciples in Judas (cf. also Mt. 23: 17 "how often").

(b) Proclamation of Jesus' Messiahship. — In the Synoptics, especially in Mk., this is a very gradual process. The evil spirits who announce it inopportunely are silenced (Mk. 1: 24). Even after Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi the end of the Galilean ministry, the disciples are charged to tell no man (Mk. 8: 38). But in Jn., the Baptist begins by calling Jesus 'the Lamb of God' and 'the Son of God' (1: 29; 14: 6), and Andrew, Philip and Nathanael at once recognize him as Messiah (1: 41, 46). Can both accounts be true? Now, as we have seen, a Judean ministry must have been carried on simultaneously and separately by the hostile district of Samaria which lay between them (Jn. 4). Probably two methods were used for two quite different peoples. The rural population of Galilee had to be taught by very slow degrees; but Jerusalem was the home of religious controversy, and its inhabitants were acute reasoners. With them the question who Jesus was could not be postponed; this is shown by the way in which the Pharisees questioned the Baptist. To them, therefore, the Messiahship was proclaimed earlier. It is true that there would be a difficulty if the Twelve first learned about the Messiahship of Jesus at Cæsarea Philippi. But this does not appear from the Synoptics. The Apostles had no doubt of the questions asked in Judea, and did know our Lord’s claim to be Christ; but they did not fully realize all that it meant till the incident of Peter’s confession.

(c) The clausula of our Lord are said to be greater in Mt. than in the Synoptics (e.g. Jn. 10:46), and it is suggested that they are an exaggeration due to a later age. Certainly Jn. is a ‘theological’ Gospel. But in reality the claims of our Lord are as great in the Synoptics, though they may not be so fully or directly expressed; the claim of Jesus to be Lord of the Sabbath (Mt. 23:5), to re-state the Law (Mt 21:21-RV, etc.), to be able to come in glory (Mt 28:18), to be the Judge of the world (Mt 25:31, etc.), the invitation ‘Come unto me’ (Mt 11:28), the assertion of the atoning efficacy of His death (Mt 26:28)—cannot be surpassed (see also Mark [Gospel Acc. To], § 5). The self-assertion of the great Example of humility is equally great in all the Gospels, and is the great stumbling-block of all the thoughtful upholders of a purely humanitarian Christ.

(d) Other differences, which can here be only alluded to, are the emphasis in Jn. on the work of the Spirit; the Comforter; the absence in Jn. of set parables, allegories taking their place; the character of the miracles, there being no casting out of devils in Jn., and, on the other hand, the miracle at Cana being unlike any in the Synoptics. The only miracle common to the four Gospels is the feeding of the five thousand, which in Jn. is mentioned only to introduce the discourse at Capharnaum, of which it forms the text (Jn. 6). All these phenomena may be accounted for on Clement’s hypothesis. The Fourth Evangelist had the Synoptics before him, and supplemented them from his own knowledge. And it may be remarked that, had Jn. been a later work, they may not have been so much at variance. The author would have not ventured to introduce so many differences from Gospels already long in circulation; whereas one who had been an eye-witness, writing at the end of his time, might well be in such a position of authority (perhaps the last survivor of the Apostolic company, whoever he was) that he could supplement from his own knowledge the accounts already in use.

The military character of the Fourth Gospel is seen also from its omission of matters to which the writer nevertheless alludes, assuming that his readers know them; e.g., Jesus’ baptism (without the knowledge of which Jn 1:19 would be unintelligible), the Transfiguration (cf. 14), the Birth of our Lord (it is assumed that the answer to the objection that Christ could not come from Nazareth is well known, Jn. 4:48), the Ascension (cf. 6:20, etc.). So also it is often recorded in Jn. that Jesus left questions unanswered, and the Evangelist gives no explanation, assuming that the answer is well known (3:12 u 20:24 7:48).

There are some well-known apparent differences in detail between Jn. and the Synoptics. They seem to differ as to whether the death of our Lord or the Last Supper synchronised with the sacrificing of the Paschal lamb, and as to the hour of the Crucifixion (cf. Mk 15:14 with Jn 19:14). Various solutions of these discrepancies have been suggested; but there is one solution which is impossible—namely, that Jn. is a 2nd cent. “pseudepigraph.” But the Synoptics and also the Gospels were written in the 1st cent., and if there were any such apparent discrepancies, every Apostolic writing would be quoted in its extant remains. And, further, the fashion of quotation changed as the 2nd cent. went on. Towards the end of the century, we find direct quotations by name. But earlier this was not so. In Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin, and other early 2nd cent. writers, we find much quotation and references, but without names given; so that doubt is sometimes raised whether they are indebted to our canonical Gospels or to some other source of oral or written words. It is clear that our canonical Gospels were not the only sources of information that these writers had; oral tradition had not yet died out, and they may have used

4. Are the Gospels contemporary records?

We have hitherto considered them from internal evidence. We may, in conclusion, briefly combine the latter with the external, attestation in order to fix the date, referring, however, for details to the separate headings. It is generally agreed that the Fourth Gospel is the latest. Internal evidence shows that its author was an eye-witness, a Palestinian Jew of the 1st cent., whose interests were entirely of that time, and who concerned with the controversies and interests of that which followed it. If so, we cannot place it later than A.D. 100, and therefore the Synoptics must be earlier. Trenam (e. a. D. 180) had already formulated the necessary of there being four, and only four, canonical Gospels; and he knew of no doubt existing on the subject. It is incredible that he could have spoken thus if Jn. had been written in the middle of the 2nd century, though some hold that he did not put it on a level with the Synoptics. Again, it is hard to deny that Jn. and the Fourth Gospel were written by the same author, and the Second Gospel was the earliest (c. 140 or earlier), from Eusebius (HE III. 39), and by Polycarp ([Phld. 7], written c. a.d. 111). If so, they must have known the Fourth Gospel. Other allusions in early 2nd cent. to the Fourth Gospel are at least highly probable. Then the external evidence, like the internal, would lead us to date the Fourth Gospel not later than A.D. 100. This Gospel seems to give the results of long reflection on, and experience of the effect of, the teaching of our Lord, written down in an age when one who had seen what he narrates. The Synoptics, to which Jn. is supplementary, must then be of earlier date; and this is the conclusion to which they themselves point. The Third Gospel, being admitted by a travelling companion of St. Paul (see art. Luke [Gospel Acc. To]), can hardly have been written after A.D. 80; and the Second, whether it be exactly the Gospel which St. Luke used, or the same edited as the Second. St. Mark the Evangelist, who is seen also from its omission of matters to which the writer nevertheless alludes, assuming that his readers know them; e.g., Jesus’ baptism (without the knowledge of which Jn 1:19 would be unintelligible), the Transfiguration (cf. 14), the Birth of our Lord (it is assumed that the answer to the objection that Christ could not come from Nazareth is well known, Jn. 4:48), the Ascension (cf. 6:20, etc.). So also it is often recorded in Jn. that Jesus left questions unanswered, and the Evangelist gives no explanation, assuming that the answer is well known (3:12 u 20:24 7:48).

There are some well-known apparent differences in detail between Jn. and the Synoptics. They seem to differ as to whether the death of our Lord or the Last Supper synchronised with the sacrificing of the Paschal lamb, and as to the hour of the Crucifixion (cf. Mk 15:14 with Jn 19:14). Various solutions of these discrepancies have been suggested; but there is one solution which is impossible—namely, that Jn. is a 2nd cent. “pseudepigraph.” But the Synoptics and also the Gospels were written in the 1st cent., and if there were any such apparent discrepancies, every Apostolic writing would be quoted in its extant remains. And, further, the fashion of quotation changed as the 2nd cent. went on. Towards the end of the century, we find direct quotations by name. But earlier this was not so. In Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin, and other early 2nd cent. writers, we find much quotation and references, but without names given; so that doubt is sometimes raised whether they are indebted to our canonical Gospels or to some other source of oral or written words. It is clear that our canonical Gospels were not the only sources of information that these writers had; oral tradition had not yet died out, and they may have used other written records. To take an example, it is obvious that Justin knew the Sermon on the Mount; but when we examine his quotations from it we cannot be certain if he is using Mt. or Lk. or both, or (possibly) an early Harmony of the two. It may be pointed out that if, as is quite possible, the quotations are taken from the earliest of the Har.-Tat.'s, that last in reality puts back the external evidence still earlier. Many, or most, of the differences of opinion, however, may probably be accounted for by the difficulty of citing memoriter. When to quote accurately meant to undo a roll without steps or paragraphs, early writers may be pardoned for trusting too much to their memories. And it is noteworthy that as a rule the longer the quotation in these early writers, the more they conform to the canonical Gospels, the longer passages in the Gospels not trust their memories. The same peculiarity is observed in their quotations from the LXX.

Bearing these things in mind, we may, without going beyond Tatian, conclude with the highest degree of probability from evidence which has undergone the closest scrutiny: (a) that our Mt. was known to, or was incorporated in a Harmony known to, Justin and the writer of the Didache (c. A.D. 120) and 'Barnabas'; and similarly (b) that our Mk. was known to Papias, Justin, Polycarp, and (perhaps) pseudo-Clement ('2 Clem. ed Cor.'); Hermas, and the author of the Gospel of pseudo-Peter and the Clementine Homilies, and Heracleon and Valentinus; (clem) that our Lk. was known to Justin (very obviously), the Didache writer, Marcion (who based his Gospel on it), Celsum, Heracleon, and the author of the Clementine Homilies; and (d) that our Jn. was known to Justin, Papias, and Polycarp.

A. J. MACLEAN.

GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL.—According to Lk. 1:1-4, there were a number of accounts of the life and teachings of Jesus in circulation among the Christians of the 1st century. These were not only the source of our canonical Gospels, but also a number of other writings purporting to come from various companions of Jesus and to record his life and words. In process of time these were lost or but partially preserved. The Gospels were supplemented by others, until there resulted a literature that stands related to the NT Canon much as the OT Apocrypha stand related to the OT Canon. As a whole, however, it never attained the importance of the OT Apocrypha. Individual Gospels seem to have been used as authoritative, but none of them was ever accepted generally.

I. THE ORIGIN OF THE APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.—So voluminous is this literature, so local was the circulation of most of it, and so obscure are the circumstances attending its appearance, that it is impossible to make any assessment as to its origin. Few apocryphal Gospels reach us entire, and many are known to us only as names in the Church Fathers. It would seem, however, as if the literature as we know it might have come under two classes: (a) From the common Evangelica tradition preserved in its best form in our Synoptic Gospels (e.g. Gospel according to the Hebrews, Gospel of the Egyptians). (b) From the homiletic tendency which has always given rise to stories like the Haggadah of Judaism. The Gospels of this sort undertake to complete the account of Jesus' life by supplying fictitious incidents, often by way of accounting for sayings in the canonical Gospels. At this point the legend-making processes were given free scope (e.g. Gospel of Nicodemus, Protoevangelium of James, Gospel according to Thomas, Arabic Gospel of Infancy, Arabic Gospel of Joseph, Passing of Mary). (c) From the need of Gospel narratives to fit the current Gospel, particularly a version of the Infancy and Jn, belonging to that class which, like the Shepherd of Hermas and the Didache, were accepted in some portions of the Empire and rejected in others. Jerome obtained from the Syrian Christians a copy of this Gospel, which he called the Aramaic, and used among the sects of the Nazarenes and Ebionites, by which two classes he probably meant the Palestinian Christians of the non-Pauline churches. Jerome either translated this book from Heb. or Aram. into both Greek and Latin, or revised and translated a current Greek version.

(2) The authorship of the Gospel according to the Hebrews is in complete obscurity. It appears that in the 4th cent. some held it to be the work of the Apostle Matthew. Jerome, however, evidently knew that this was not the case, for it was not circulating in the West, and he found it necessary to translate it into Greek. Eusebius, Jerome, and other doctors, in particular Jerome, describes it as beginning with an account of John the Baptist, and commencing without any genealogy or sections dealing with the infancy of Christ. This would make it like our Gospel according to Mark, with which, however, it cannot be identified; it is to be judged by such extracts as have come down to us.

(3) The time of composition of the Gospel according to the Hebrews is evidently very early. It may even have been one form of the original Gospel of Jesus, co-ordinate with the Logia of Matthew and the earliest section of the Book of Luke. Caution, however, is needed in taking this position, as the quotations which have been preserved from it differ markedly from those of any of the sources of our canonical Gospels which can be gained by criticism. At all events, the Gospel is to be distinguished from the Hebrew original of the canonical Gospel of Matthew mentioned by Papias (Euseb. HE iii. 39, 16, vi. 23, 4; Irenaeus, 1, 1). On the whole, the safest conclusion is probably that the Gospel was well known in the eastern part of the Roman Empire in the latter half of the 2nd cent., and that in general it was composed of material similar to that of the canonical Gospels, but contained also sayings of Jesus which our canonical Gospels have not preserved for us.

The most important quotations from the Gospel are as follows:

"If thy brother sin in word and give thee satisfaction, remember him seven times in the day. Simon, His disciple, said to Him: "Seven times in the day?" The Lord answered and said to him, "Yea, I say unto thee, until seventy times seven with the prophets also, after they were anointed with the Holy Spirit, there was found sinful speech." (Jerome, *adv. Pelag. iii. 2).

"The Apostle according to the Hebrews... is the following story: "Behold, the Lord's mother and His brethren were saying to Him, John the Baptist baptizes unto the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said unto them, What sin have I done, that I should go and be baptized by him unless perchance this very thing which I have said is an ignorance?" (Jerome, *adv. Pelag. iii. 2).

In the Gospel according to the Hebrews is the following saying: "And if any one comes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour Himself said: "Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor"" (Origen, *In Isa. vol. ii. 6)

"It is written in a certain Gospel, the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, if any one likes to take it up as having any authority, but to shed light on the matter in hand: "The other," it says, "of the rich men said unto the Master, Master, by doing what good thing shall I have life? He said to him, Man, do the law and the prophets. He answered unto him, I have. He said to him, Go, sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, and come, follow Me." (Jerome, In Ps. 51).

For those words have the same meaning with those other: "He that seeketh shall not stop until he find, and when he hath found he shall wonder, and when he hath wondered he shall reign, and when he hath reigned he shall reign no more." (Chrys. of Alex. *Sermon. 9, 45)

"And if any one goes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour Himself said: "Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor." (Origen, *In Isa. vol. ii. 6).

The Gospel which has come down to us in Hebrew characters gave the thing made not against (his talent), but against him who lived riotously; for (theparable) told of three servants, one who destroyed his lord's goods; the second, in the beginning with harlots, and in profit many fold, and one who hid his talent; and how in the issue one was accepted, one merely blamed, and one shut up in prison." (Euseb. HE iii. 15, 20).

2. The Gospel of the Egyptians.—This Gospel is mentioned in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. by Clement of Alexandria, by whom it was regarded as apparently of some historical worth, but not of the same grade as our four Gospels. Origen in his Commentary on Luke mentions it among those to which the Evangelist referred, but does not regard it as inspired. Hippolythus says that it was used by an otherwise unknown Gnostic known as Naassene. It was also apparently known to the writer of 2 Clement (ch. xii).

The origin of the Gospel is altogether a matter of conjecture. Its name would seem to indicate that it circulated in Egypt, possibly among the Egyptians as distinguished from the Hebrew Christians. The probability that it represents the original Evangelic tradition is not as strong as in the case of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. At least by the end of the 2nd cent. it was regarded as possessed of heretical tendencies, particularly those of the Encratites, who were opposed to marriage. It is not impossible, however, that the Gospel of the Egyptians contained the original tradition, but in form sufficiently different to admit of manipulation by groups of heretics.

The most important sayings of Jesus which have come down from this Gospel are from the conversation of Jesus with Salome, given by Clement of Alexandria.

"When Salome asked how long death should have power, the Lord (not meaning that life is evil and the creation bad) said," (Origen, *In Matt. 3. 45).

"And those who opposed the creation of God through shameful abstinence allege also those words spoken to Salome wherein we made mention above. And they are contained, I think, in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. For they said that the Saviour Himself said, 'I came to destroy the works of the flesh, not of the spirit; and I came to bring forth life and death.' (Strain. ii. 9, 63).

And why do they who walk any way rather than by the Gospel rule of truth adduce the rest also of what was spoken to Salome? For when she said, 'Therefore have I done well in that I have not brought forth,' as if it were not fitting to accept motherhood, the Lord replies, saying, 'Eat every herb, but that which hath bitterness eat not.' (Strain. 18).

And therefore Cassian says: "When Salome inquired when those things should be concerning which she asked, the Lord said, When ye trample on the garment of shame, and when two shall be one, and the female be to the male," (Strain. 18, 93).

3. The Gospel according to Peter.—This Gospel is mentioned by Eusebius (HE vi. 12) as having been rejected by Sabion, bishop of Antioch, in the last decade of the 2nd century. He found it in circulation among the Syrian Christians, and at first did not oppose it, but after having studied it further, condemned it as Docetic. Origin in his Commentary on Matthew (Book x. 17, and occasionally elsewhere) mentions it, or at least shows an acquaintance with it. Eusebius (HE iii. 3, 25) rejects it as heretical, as does Jerome (Lev. ii. 13, 92).

In 1886 a fragment of this Gospel was discovered by M. Boursaint, and published with a transl. in 1892. It relates in some detail the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus, and its particular interest as indicating how canonical material was to be elaborated and changed in the interests of the Docetic heresy. Thus the words of Jesus on the cross are, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me." At the time of the resurrection the soldiers are said to have struck him on the head with their hands, and some two of them supported one, and the cross followed them; and of the two the head reached unto the heavens; and they heard a voice from the heavens saying,
GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL

"Thou hast preached unto them that sleep." And a response was heard from the cross, "Yes.

The Gospel of Nicodemus.—This Gospel embodies the so-called Acts of Pilate, an alleged official report of the procurator to Tiberius concerning Jesus. Tertullian (Apol. v. 2) was apparently acquainted with such a report, and sixteen chapters absurd in form, are found in Eusebius (HE II. 2) and to Epiphanius (Har. i. 1); but the Acts of Pilate known to Eusebius was probably still another and heathen writing. Tischendorf held that the Acts of Pilate was known to Justin; but that is doubtful.

Our present Gospel of Nicodemus, embodying this alleged report of Pilate, was not itself written until the 5th cent., and therefore is of small historical importance except as it may be regarded as embodying older (but untrustworthy) material. As it now stands it gives an elaborate account of the trial of Jesus, His descent to Hades, resurrection, and ascension. Altogether it contains seven chapters, each of which is marked by the general tendency to elaborate the Gospel accounts for homiletic purposes. Beyond its exposition of Jesus' descent into Hades it contains little of doctrinal importance. It is not improbable, however, that the 17th, 18th, and 19th chapters, which narrate this alleged event, are later than chs. 1–16. The Gospel may not be as fair as the represented belief in this visit of Jesus to Hades, which is marked by the early acknowledged Church. It is also in harmony with the ante-Austinian doctrine of the Atone, in accordance with which Jesus gave himself a ransom to Satan.

The first chapter and in anecdotals concerning Jesus and His trial, in which the question of the legitimacy of Jesus' birth is established by twelve witnesses of the marriage of Mary and Joseph. It relates also that at the trial of Jesus a number of persons, including Nicodemus and Veronica, appeared to testify in His behalf. The accounts of the crucifixion are clearly based upon Lk 23. The story of the burial is further elaborated by the introduction of a number of Biblical characters, who undertook to prove the genuineness of the resurrection.

Although the Gospel of Nicodemus was of a nature to acquire great popularity, and has had a profound influence upon the various poetical and homiletic presentations of the events supposed to have taken place between the death and resurrection of Jesus, and although the Acts of Pilate has been treated more seriously than the evidence in its favour warrants, the Gospel of Nicodemus is probably the class of Jewish Haggadah or legend. It is thus one form of the literature dealing with martyrs, and apparently never was used as possessing serious historical or doctrinal authority until the 18th century.

5. The Protevangelium of James.—This book in its present form was used by Epiphanius in the latter part of the 4th cent., if not by others of the Church Fathers. It is not improbable that it was referred to by Origen under the name of the Book of James. As Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr both referred to incidents connected with the birth of Jesus which are related in the Protevangelium, it is not impossible that the writing circulated in the middle of the 2nd century.

The Protevangelium purports to be an account of the birth of Mary and of her early life in the Temple, when she was brought by her parents when she was three years of age, and where at twelve years of age she was married to Joseph, then an old man with children. It includes also an account of the Annunciation and the visit of Mary to Elizabeth, of the trial by ordeal of Joseph and Mary on the charge of having been secretly married, of the birth of Jesus in a cave, and accompanying miracles of the most extravagant sort. This was coupled with an account of the martyrdom of Zacharias and the death of Herod.

It is probable that the chapters dealing with the birth of Jesus are of independent origin from the others, although it is not improbable that even the remainder of the Protevangelium is a composite work, probably of the Jewish Christians, which has been edited in the interests of Gnosticism. The original cannot well be later than the middle of the 2nd cent., while the Gnostic revision was probably a century later.

From the critical view the Protevangelium is important as testifying to influence in the middle of the 2nd cent. upon the miraculous birth of Jesus. It is also of interest as lying behind the two Latin Gospels of pseudo-Matthew and the Nativity of Jesus; although it may be fairly questioned whether these two later Gospels are derived directly from the Protevangelium or from its source.

6. The Gospel according to Thomas.—Hippolytus quotes from a Gospel according to Thomas which was being used by the Naasenes. The Gospel was also known to Origen and to Eusebius, who classifies it with the heretical writings. It was subsequently held in high esteem by the majority of the Gnostics, that is, by the so-called Gnostics of the 2nd cent., and was still in use by the 3rd cent., as shown by the numerous quotations from it. The Gospel of Thomas is an account of the childhood of Jesus, and consists largely of stories of His miraculous power and knowledge, the most interesting of the latter being the account of Jesus' visit to school, and of the parable of the lost sheep which He taught. The present form is later than the 6th cent.

7. The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood of Jesus.—The Arabic Gospel is a translation of a Syrian compilation of stories concerning the childhood of Jesus. It's earlier sections are apparently derived from the Protevangelium, and its later from the Gospel of Thomas.

This Gospel supplies still further stories concerning the infancy of Jesus, and begins by declaring that Jesus, as He was lying in His cradle, said to Mary, 'I am Jesus, the Son of God, the Logos, whom thou hast brought forth.' The miracles which it narrates are probably the most fantastic of all in the Gospels of the infancy of Jesus. From the fact that it uses other apocryphal material, it has probably been written prior to the 7th or 8th century.

8. The Gospel of Philip.—The only clear allusion to the existence of such a book is a reference in Plios Sophis, from which it might be inferred that such a Gospel circulated among the Gnostics in Egypt. It is of even less historical value than the Protevangelium.

9. The Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter.—This Gospel undertakes to explain the non-appearance of Joseph in the account of the canonical Gospels. It describes in detail Joseph's death and burial, as well as the lamentation and eulogy spoken over him by Jesus. It is at some points parallel with the Protevangelium, but carries the miraculous element of the birth a step farther, in that it makes Jesus say of Mary, 'This her son, who was brought forth with the concurrence of my Father and the counsel of the Holy Ghost. Such a formulary points to the 4th cent. as the time of composition, but it could hardly have been written later than the 5th cent., as Jesus is said to have promised Mary that she would be brought of death in other mortals suffer. The work is probably a re-working of Jewish-Christian material, and is not strongly marked by Gnostic qualities.

10. The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.—This Gospel is identified by Jerome with the Gospel according to the Hebrews. This, however, is probably a mistake on his part. The Gospel comes down to us only in quotations in Epiphanius (Harr. xxx. 13–16, 22). To judge from these quotations, it was a re-writing of the canonical Gospels in the interest of some sect of Christians opposed to the Church. It is an interesting fact as saying, 'I come to put an end to sacrificial offerings, and unless ye cease from sacrificing, anger will not cease from you.' The same motive appears in its re-writing of Lk 22:4, where the saying of Jesus is turned into a question requiring a new answer. If these fragments given by Epiphanius are from a Gospel also mentioned by Origen, it is probable that it dates from the early part of the 3rd century.

11. The Passover of Mary.—This Gospel has come to us in Greek, Latin, Syriac, Sahidic, and Ethiopic versions. It contains a highly imaginative account of the death of Mary, to whose death the Holy Spirit miraculously brings various Apostles from different parts of the world, as well as some of them from their tombs. The account abounds in miracles of the most irrational sort, and it finally culminates in the removal of Mary's 'spotless and precious body' to Paradise.

The work is evidently based on various apocryphal writings, including the Protevangelium, and could not well have come into existence before the rise of the worship of the Virgin in the latter part of the 4th century. It has had a large influence on Roman Catholic thought and art.

12. In addition to these Gospels there is a considerable number known to us practically only by name:—

(a) The Gospel according to Matthaeus (or pseudo-Mattheus).—A re-writing of some apocryphal writing, and possibly quoted by Clement of Alexandria, who speaks of the 'traditions of Matthaeus.' If these are the same as the 'Gospel according to Matthaeus,' we could conclude that it was known in the latter part of the 2nd cent., and was, on the whole, of a Gnostic cast.

(b) The Gospel according to Basileides.—Basileides was a Gnostic who lived about the middle of the 2nd cent., and is said by Origen to have had the audacity to write a Gospel. The Gospel is mentioned by Ambrose and Jerome, probably on the authority of Origen. Little is known of the writing, and it is possible that Origen mistook the commentary of Basileides for the 'Gospel.'

(c) The Gospel of Barnabas.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree. A medieval or Renaissance work of some title has lately been published (see Exp. Tr., x., 1668, p. 263 ff.), and of Bartholomew, mentioned in the Gelasian Decree and in Jerome, but otherwise unknown.

(d) The Gospel of Cerenthius.—Mentioned by Epiphanius.

(b) The Gospel of the Poor.—Also mentioned by Epiphanius, as being among the Orphic sect of the Gnostics.

(i) The Gospel of Jesus the Subject, used by a sect of the Gnostics, the Cactines.

(j) The Gospel of Thaddaeus.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree, but otherwise unknown.

(k) The Gospel of Valentine.—Used among the followers of that arch-heretic, and mentioned by Tertullian.

(l) The Syriac Gospel Fragment.—It contains the words of Christ in the Last Supper, but in a different form from that of the canonical Gospels.

(m) The Logia, found by Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus, a few sayings, similar in form and substance to the canonical Gospels. Possibly derived from the Gospel of the Egyptians.

(n) The Ascension of Mary.—Quoted by Epiphanius, and of the nature of a Gnostic anti-Jewish romance.

(o) The Gospel of Zacharias.—Subsequently incorporated into the constitutions of some Christian sects, and, for some reason, attributed to Gnostics as a support for their peculiar views. The oldest and most interesting of these was—

(p) The so-called Gospel of Marcion, which, although lost, we know as a probable re-working of Luke by the first Marcion. In the transmission of the infancy section and other material that in any way, favoured the Jewish-Christian conceptions which Marcion opposed. This Gospel can be largely reconstructed from quotations given by Tertullian and others. The importance of the Gospel of Marcion as thus re-constructed is considerable for the criticism of our Third Gospel.
champion or deliverer, points to the fact that their chief function was judicial. The position was not hereditary, thus differing from that of king (2 K 9ff. Gideon and Abimelech), though Samuel was able to delegate his authority to his sons (1 S 8ff.). Their status was gained by personal exploits, implying Divine sanction, which was sometimes expressed in other ways; e.g., gift of prophecy (Deborah, Samuel). Their power rested on the support of the local community but sometimes extending over several tribes, was probably never national. During this period the nomadic tribe gave way to the local; ties of place are more important than ties of birth. A town held together by neighbourly ("daughters") as able to give them protection (Nu 21. 23, Jos 17. 21). The elders become the "elders of the city"; Jgs 6. 11, 14 mentions officials to judge the people, and the Deuteronomic law, responsible for its government. In II Kings the elders of Gilead have power in an emergency to appoint a leader from outside.

The king, when he came into being mainly under the pressure of Philistine invasion. The king was a centre of unity, the leader of the nation in war, and a judge (1 S 8ff.). His power rested largely on a personal bond, as long as he was successful and strong. The retained the allegiance of his immediate followers, his will was absolute (David, Ahab, Jehu; cf. Jer 36. 37). At the same time there were elements which prevented the development of a monarchical despotism of an Oriental despotism. At least at first the people had a voice in his election (David, Rehoboam). In Judah the hereditary principle prevailed (there were no rival tribes to cause jealousy), and David's line was the centre of the national hopes, but the people still had influence (2 K 14. 21ff.).

In the Northern Kingdom the position of the reigning house was always insecure, and the ultimate penalty of misgovernment was the rise of a new dynasty. From early times and later times, the command of the forces was essential to the king's power; cf. insurrection of Jehu "the captain" (2 K 9) and Jehoiada's care to get control of the army (14). Side by side with the popular authority which the rise to power gave the king, the court exercised its harem and luxurious entourage, its palace and its throne. These were visible symbols of the royal power, impressing the popular mind. The lists of officers (2 K 10. 1ff.) are significant; they indicate the growth of the king's authority, and the development of relations with other States. The real power of government has passed into the hands of the king's chariots. His servants handle arms, pleases, and, provided they retain his favour, there is little to limit their power. They may at times show independence of spirit (1 S 26ff., Jer 35ff.), but are usually his ready tools (2 S 11ff.; cf. the old and the young councillors of Rehoboam, 1 K 12ff.).

The prophetic pictures of the court and its administration are not favourable (Am 3. 46, Is 5ff.). The methods of raising revenue were undeclared, and being undefined were oppressive. We hear of gifts and tribute (1 K 10ff., 2 S 8ff., 1 K 4. 2ff. 106ff.). The kings were often compared to Tyrians (Is 23ff.), sometimes called "forced labour" (Ez 21), and of the "king's mowing" (Am 7ff.), confiscation (1 K 21), and, in an emergency, of stripping the Temple (2 K 19). In time of peace the main function of the king is the administration of justice (2 S 15ff., 2 K 15); his subjects have the right of direct access (2 K 8ff.). This must have lessened the power of the local, the elders, who no doubt had also to yield to the central court officials. The elders of the city appear during this period as a local authority, sometimes respected and consulted (2 S 17ff., 1 K 20ff., 2 K 23ff), sometimes the obedient agents of the king's will (1 K 21ff., 2 K 10ff.). 2 Ch 19ff. describes a judicial system organized by Jehoshaphat, and which agrees in its essential features with the court system as described by Dt 16ff. 17ff.; there are local courts, with a central tribunal. In Dt. the elders appear mainly as judicial authorities, but have the power of executing their decisions (21ff., 22ff); see also Judges 17ff., 21ff.

The influence of the priesthood in this connexion should be noticed. The administration of justice always included a Divine element (Ex 18ff., 21ff. 22ff; cf. word 'Torah'), and the pronouncements of the high priest (the representation of the Levites) Deut 17ff., and even after the Exile Joshua is only the title of Zerubbabel. The appointment of Levites as judges, ascribed to David in 1 Ch 23ff. 28ff., is no doubt an anachronism. Cf. also 1 and 2 Kings (II 1ff.).

4. Post-exilic period.—Under the Persians Judah was a subdistrict of the great province west of the Euphrates and subject to its governor (Ezr 5). It had also its "high priest" (Neh 11ff.), with a measure of independence (Ezr 10ff.); we read, too, of a special official 'at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people' (Neh 11ff.). The elders are prominent during this period both in exile (Ezr 8. 2ff. 20ff.) and in Judah (Ezr 8. 2ff. 10ff., Neh 2ff.). The chief feature of the subsequent period was the development of the priestly power, and the rise to importance of the office of the high priest. Under Greek rule (after B.C. 330) the high priests were a great court, and, in time, high priests. The high priest became the head of the State, and its official representative, his political power receiving a great development under the Hasmonaean. Owing to the growing importance of the office, the Seleucids always claimed the power of appointment. In B.C. 142, Simon is declared to be 'high priest, captain, and governor for ever' (1 Mac 14ff.-). The title 'ethnarch' (see above) was given to the high priest, and when other titles were used, the high priest was distinguished by the title of 'king.' Aristobulus becomes king (B.C. 105), and Alexander Janneus uses the title on coins (B.C. 104-78). Under Roman rule (B.C. 63) the situation became complicated. The Herodian dynasty (cf. 1 Macc 10ff) passed through the varying forms of government known to the Roman Imperial constitution. Herod the Great was its titular king, with considerable independence subject to good behaviour ("bona securitas"). Archelaus forfeited his position (A.D. 6). Thereafter Judas was under the direct rule of a procurator (see next article), except from A.D. 41 to 44, when Agrippa I was king. Antipas was 'etharch' of Galilee and Perea; Mark's title of 'king' (8ff.) is corrected by Matthew and Luke. The position was less honourable and less independent than that of king. The high priest (now appointed by the Romans) and the Sanhedrin regained the power which they had lost, but under the procurator; the government became once more an aristocracy (Jos. Ant. xx. x.).

Except for the power of life and death the Sanhedrin held the supreme judicial authority; there were also courts connected with the Temple (Neh 3ff.); the moral authority extended to Jews outside Palestine. In the Diaspora, the Jews, tenacious of their national peculiarities, were in many cases allowed a large measure of self-government, particularly in judicial matters. In Alexandria, in particular, they had special privileges.
and an ‘ekharach’ of their own (Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 2).

GOVERNOR.—This word represents various Heb. and Gr. words, technical and non-technical. In Gr. (Joseph, cf. 41:14) it is probably the Te-Te, the second after the king in the court of the palace; cf. 1 K 18:18, 21 2K 7:23 for similar offices. It frequently represents an Assyri.

world, pechah, used of Persian scribes in general (Est 2:6, 8), and of Persian governors (2 K 18:14, 1 K 20:4). It is applied particularly to Tattenian, the governor of the large Persian province of which Judaea was a sub-district (Ezr 5:8, 6:8, cf. Neh 2:17). It is also, like tesarathe, a subordinate governor of Judaea (Ezr 5:4 [Sheshbazzar] 6:1 [Nehemiah], Hag 1:14 [Zerubbabel]). The first passage shows that the subordinate pechah was directly appointed by the king.

In the NT the word usually represents Gr. ἵγμαν, and is found on Pontius Pilate (Lk 3:1, etc.), Felix (Ac 23:28), and of Festus (20:1). The proper title of these governors was ‘procurator’ (Tac. Ann. xxv. 44), of which originally equated it to the Gr. equivalent or the Persian equivalent. However, uses ἵγμαν, as well as these words, for the governor of Judaea, so that there is no inaccuracy in its employment by NT writers. But, being a general word, it does not help us to decide the nature of the ‘governorship’ of Quirinius (Lk 2:2). The procurator, originally a financial official, was appointed directly by the Emperor to govern provinces, such as Thrace, Cappadocia, and Judaea, which were in a transitional state, being no longer ruled by subject kings, but not yet fully Romanized, and requiring special treatment. The procurator was in a sense subordinate to the legate of the neighbouring ‘province,’ e.g. Cappadocia to Galatia, Judaea to Syria; but even in emergencies he bad full authority, military, judicial, and financial. In Lk 2:2 the word is specially appropriate to any provincial governor, as ‘sent’ by the Emperor. In 2 Co 1 it is used of a tutor controlling the ward’s person, the steward his property (Lightfoot, ad loc.). In Ja 3:19 RV has ‘steersman.’ The ‘governor of the feast’ (Ja 2:8, RV ‘ruler’) was probably a guest, not a superior to control and arrange for the feast. It is doubtful whether he is to be identified with the ‘friend of the bridegroom’ or best man.

GOZAN. —One of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria (2 K 17:6, 1 Ch 5:25; mentioned also in 2 K 19:14, Is 37:25). Gozan was the district termed Guszun by the Assyrians and Guszunitis by Ptolemy, and it was situated on the Khābir. L. W. KING.

GRACE (from Lat. praedit: ‘favour’—either received from or shown to another), through the Fr. grace.—Of the three meanings assigned to this word in the Eng. Dict.—(1) ‘pleasingness,’ (2) ‘favour,’ (3) ‘thanks’ (the sense of favour received)—(1) and (2) belong to the Eng. Bible; (3) attaches to the equivalent Gr. charis, whose root is rendered ‘thank(s) or thankfulness’ (He 12:26 RV). The specific Biblical use of ‘grace’ comes under the second of the above significations; it is prominent in the NT. The OT usage requires no separate treatment. (2) is the primary meaning of the Hebrew original, rendered ‘favour’ almost as often as ‘grace’; but (1) of the Greek charis, which at its root signifies the gladdening, joy-bringing. Hence the correspondence between the common Greek salutation charite (‘Joy to you!’) and the Christian charis (‘Grace to you!’) is more than a verbal coincidence.

1. Of the sense charm, winsomeness (of person, bearing, speech, etc.)—a usage conspicuous in common Greek, and personified in the Charites, the three Graces of mythology—the prominent instances in the OT are Ps 45:7 (‘Grace is poured on thy lips’) and probably Zec 4:17; add to these Pr 1:34 33:1 (‘favour’). The same noun occurs in the Heb. of Pr 5:18 11:1, and Ec 10:19, Pr 17:13, under the adjectival renderings ‘pleasing,’ ‘gracious,’ ‘precious,’ and in Nah 3:4 (‘well-favoured’). For the NT, ‘grace’ is charm in Lk 4:25, Col 2:7; in Eph 4:25 there may be a play on the double sense of the word. Charm of speech is designated by charis in Sir 20:2 21:3 37:26, in the Apocrypha. In Ja 1:5 grace of the fashion’ renders a single Greek word signifying ‘fair-seeming’, etc. By grace we mean the original, develop forms, amongst which ‘faith’ is prominent.

2. The OT passages coming under (2) above, employ ‘grace’ chiefly in the idiom ‘to find grace (or favour),’ which is used indifferently of favour in the eyes of J (Gn 6:8) or one of his fellow-men (30:3), and whether the finder bring good (39:9) or ill (19:9) desert to the quest. With this broad application, ‘grace’ means good-will, favourable inclination towards another—of the superior (king, benefactor, etc.) or one esteemed as such by the inferior (servant, • servant, to the Eng. NT, ‘favour’ is reserved for this wide sense of charis; see Lk 1:25, 2 Ac 7:40 25:22 37:25; ‘grace’ has the same meaning in Lk 11:44 Ac 4:16 16:21. The one exception in which ‘grace’ is the OT equivalent of its prevalent NT import; but the Heb. adj. for, gracious, and the equivalent vb., are together used of H, in his attitude towards the sinful, more than twenty times, most associated often with ‘mercy’ etc., see, e.g. Ps 34, Ps 77:103, Jl 2:4, Jon 4:5. The character in God which the OT prefers to express by mercy, signifying his pitiful disposition to wards man as weak and wretched, over NT in effect translates the usage of this forgiving disposition towards man as guilty and lost.

3. Christianity first made grace a leading term in the vocabulary of religion. The prominence and emphasis of its use are due to St. Paul; it is close exp. in the word figures twice as often as in all the NT besides. ‘Grace’ is the first word of greeting and the last of farewell in St. Paul’s letters; for him it includes the sum of all blessing that comes from God through Christ: ‘grace’ the source, ‘peace’ the stream. In the Gospels, the Johannine Prologue (v.14-17) contrasted with ‘law,’ and co-extensive with ‘truth’ supplies the only example of ‘grace’ used with the Pauline fulness of meaning. This passage, and the Lukan examples in Acts (6:11 13:1 14:1 15:20 23: 2), with the kindred uses in Hebrews, 1 and 2 Pet., Jude, 2 Jn., Rev., may be set down to the influence of Paulinism on Apostolic speech. The idea in earlier phraseology to explain the supremacy in the NT of this specific term; a new experience demanded a new name. ‘Grace’ designates the principle in God of man’s salvation through Jesus Christ. It is God’s unmerited, unconditioned love towards sinners, revealed and operative in Christ. Tit 2:1-14, interpreted by Ro 5:6, is the text which approaches nearest to a definition; this passage shows how St. Paul derived from God’s grace not only the soul’s reconciliation and new hopes in Christ (Ro 5:2), but the whole moral uplifting and rehabilitation of human life through Christi.

This is St. Paul’s experience in conversion gave him this watchword; the Divine goodness revealed itself to the ‘chief of sinners’ under the aspect of ‘grace’ (1 Co 15:56, 1 Ti 1:14-15). The spontaneity and generosity of God’s love felt in the act of his salvation, the complete change of character therein of everything legal and conventional (with, possibly, the added connotation of charm of which charis is redolent), marked out this word as describing what St. Paul had proved of Christ’s redemption; under this name he could commend it to the Gentile, as marking the gospel of the grace of God (Ac 20:9). Essentially, grace stands opposed to sin; it is God’s way of meeting man’s sin (Ro 5:12 6:11): He thus effects ‘the impossible task of the Law' (Ro 7-8). The legal discipline had taught St. Paul to understand, by contrast, the value and the operation of the principle of grace; he was able to handle it with effect in the legalistic controversy. Grace supplies, in a way theology, the one and sufficient means of deliverance from sin, holding objectively the place which faith holds subjectively in man's salvation (Eph 2, Tit 2). Formally, and in point of method, grace stands opposed to 'the Law' (Rom 10:4; Gal 5:3-5); it supersedes the futile works by which the Jew had hoped, in fulfilling the Law, to merit salvation (Ro 4:11, Gal 2:21, Eph 2:9). Grace excludes, therefore, all notion of 'debt'—owing from God to men, all thought of earning the Messianic blessings (Ro 4) by establishing 'a righteousness of one's own' (Ro 10); through it men are justified gratis (Ro 3:28) and receive the gift of righteousness ('5:17'). In twenty-two instances St. Paul writes of 'the grace of God' (or 'his grace'); in fifteen, of 'the grace of Christ' ('the Lord Jesus Christ,' etc.). Ten of the latter examples belong to salvation-formule (so in Rev 22:20), the fullest of these being 2 Co 13:4, where 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ' is referred to the 'love of God' as its fountain-head; In the remaining five detached instances the context dictates the combination 'the grace of God' and 'the grace of Christ' (Rom 7:16; etc.). In the rest 2 Co 3:108, Gal 1:1, 1 Ti 1:1 (also in 2 P 3:3). In other NT writings the complement is predominantly of God'; 1 P 5:10 inverts the expression—'the God of all grace.' Once—in 2 Th 2:17—'grace is referred conjointly to God and Christ. Christ is the expression and vehicle of the grace of the Father, and is completely identified with it (see Jn 1:14), so that God's grace can essentially be called Christ's; but the reference to the latter is strictly personal in such a passage as 2 Co 8. A real distinction is implied in the remarkable language of Ro 5:8, where, after postling 'the grace of God' as the fundamental ground of redemption, St. Paul adds to this 'the gift in grace, viz. the grace of the one man Jesus Christ,' who is the counterpart of the sinful and baleful Adam: the generous bounty of the Man towards men, shown by Jesus Christ, served an essential part in human redemption.
GRASS

Cognate to charis, and charged in various ways with its meaning, is the vb. rendered (RV) to grant in Ac 27:7, Gal 3:14, Ph 2:5, Philem 4, give in Ph 2:8, freely give in Rom 15:8, 1 Co 9:13, 1 Th 3:6. All of these, and others, are used for object, expressed or implied) forgive in Lk 7:4, 12 Co 8:2, 12, 15, 12:32, 4, Col 2:33.

There are two occasions additional uses of 'grace,' depending, as the above, in the γαρ της ευγενείας. It may denote (a) a gracious endowment or bestowment, God's grace to men taking shape in some concrete ministrv (so Eph 4:31, in view of the following context, and probably cannon also in Rom 15:7; cf. Ac 6:3); (b) grace (charis) is so stated, in 1 Co 12:10, etc.; and (b) a state of grace, God's grace realized by the recipient (Ro 5:2, 2 Ti 2).

G. G. FINDLAY.

GRACIOUS.—This Eng. adj. is now used only in an active sense—'bestowing grace,' 'showing favour.' And this is its most frequent use in AV, as Ex 33:14. And [1] will be gracious to whom I will be gracious.' But it was formerly used passively also as 'favoured,' 'accepted,' as 1 Es 8:9, 'Ye, when we were in bondage, we were not forsaken of our Lord, but he made us gracious before the kings of Persia, so that they gave us food.' And from this it came to signify 'attractive,' as Fr 1114: 'a gracious woman retained honour,' lit. 'a woman of grace,' that is, of attractive appearance and manner; Lk 4:22 'the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth,' lit., as RV, 'words of grace,' that is, says Plummer, 'winning words'; he adds, 'the very first mention of charity is clumsiness, winniness.'

GRAFFING.—In olive-culture grafting is universal. When the sapling is about seven years old it is cut down to the stem, and a shoot from a good tree is grafted upon it. Three years later it begins to bear fruit, its produce gradually increasing until about the fourteenth year. No tree under cultivation is allowed to grow ungrafted; the fruit in such case being inferior. Grafting is alluded to only once in Scripture (Rom 11:17). St. Paul compares the coming in of the Gentiles to the grafting of a wild olive branch upon a good olive tree: a process contrary to nature. (Lk 23:34). Arch. Bot. 5:1. Columella's statement that olive trees are rejuvenated and strengthened in this way (see Comm. on Romans, by Principal Brown and Godet, ad loc.), is not confirmed. (Ibid. p. 228): 'Grafts must necessarily be branches from a cultivated olive inserted into a wild stock, the reverse process being one which would be valueless, and is never performed.' The ungrafted tree, they say, to become the natural character of the wild olive. (Lk 23:33). Dr. W. M. Thomson, whose accuracy Ramsay commends, citing him in favour of his own view (ib. 154, is really a witness on the other side, quite holding the view that the wild olive is the true olive, and the above distinction is due to the size, shape, and colour of leaves and character of fruit.

No one could mistake the olive for the olive; but the case is not clear enough to justify Ramsey's calling the olive tree a wild olive, to the contrary opinion held by others (p. 5). Sir William Ramsay, Expositor, vi. ix. (1905), 154, states grounds on which the olive (Elaegnus angustifolia) may be regarded as the plant intended. The genus is of the type to which cultivated olive (Olea, etc.) is known to have been brought through centuries of neglect, as seen, e.g., in Cyrenaica. (Prof. Fisher does not admit this [Der Olbaum, 69]). When grafted with a shoot of the nobler tree it gives rise to the true olive. But the two are closely distinguished by size, shape, and colour of leaves and character of fruit.

Fisher states that in Palestine it is still customary to re-investigate the wild olive tree with the mission. It is the bearing fruit, by grafting it with a shoot of wild olive, so that the sap of the tree ennobles this wild shoot, and the tree now again begins to bear fruit' (Der Olbaum, 9). The giver no authority for the Sarm. 'wondrously generous' view, without question (Expositor, ut supra, 19), and the value of his subsequent discussion rests upon the assumption of its truth. The assumption is precarious. The present writer can find no evidence that such an operation is ever performed. In response to questions made in the main olive-growing districts of Palestine, he is assured that it is never done; and that, for the purpose intended, it would be perfectly futile, clearly distinguishable in its shape, size, and other marks.

Sanday-Headlam seem rightly to apprehend the Apostle's meaning. It is not their view that St. Paul proves a spiritual process credible 'because it resembles a process impossible in and contrary to natural forms' (Ramsay, 59, 206). He exhorts the Gentiles to humility, because God in His goodness has done for them in the spiritual sphere a thing which they had no reason to expect, since it, according to Sanday-Headlam, never, according to Ramsay, very seldom, is done in the natural. The language of St. Paul is justified in either case: it might be all the more effective if the former were true. Mr. Burling Gould's reference as to the Apostle's ignorance only is, of attractive blindness (Study of St. Paul, p. 275). See also art. Olive.

GREECE represents in English the Latin word Graecia, which is derived from Graeci. This name Graeci properly belonged only to a small tribe of Greeks, who lived in the country of Graeci; but as this tribe was apparently the first to attract the attention of Rome, dwelling, as it did on the other side of the Adriatic from Italy, the name came to be applied by the Romans to the whole race. The term Graeci, when used by Romans, is equivalent to the Greek name Hellanis, which is still used by the Greeks to describe their own country. In ancient times Hellas was frequently used in a wide sense to include not only Greece proper, but every settlement of Greeks outside their own country as well as a portion of the Crimea, much of the west coast of Asia Minor, settlements in Sicily, Gaul, and Spain, and above all the southern half of Italy, were parts of Hellas in this wide sense. Southern Italy was so studded with Greek settlements that it became known as Magna Graecia. After the conquests of Alexander the Great, who died 323 B.C., all the territory annexed by him, such as the greater part of Asia Minor, as well as Syria and Egypt, could be regarded as in a sense Hellas. Alexander was the chief agent in the spread of the Greek civilization, manners, language, and culture over these countries. The dynasties founded by his generals, the Seleucids and Ptolemies for example, continued his work, and when Rome began to interfere in Eastern politics about the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., the Greek language was already firmly established in the East. When, about three centuries after Alexander's death, practically all his former dominions had become Roman provinces, Greece was the one language which could carry the traveller from the Egyptians to Spain. The Empire had two official languages, Latin for Italy and all provinces north, south-west, and west of it; Greek for all east and south-east of Italy. The Romans wisely made no attempt to force Latin on the Eastern peoples, and were content to let Greek remain in undisputed sway there. All their officials understood and spoke it. Thus it came about that Christianity was preached in Greek, that our NT books were written in Greek, and that the language of the Church, according to all the available evidence, remained Greek till about the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D.

As Gallie was thickly planted with Greek towns, there can be little doubt that Jesus knew the language, and spoke it when necessary, though it is probable that He commonly used Aramaic, as He came first to the lost tribes of Israel. With St. Paul the case was different. Most of the Jews of the Dispersion were probably unable to speak Greek, and used the O.T. in the Greek translation. These would naturally be addressed in Greek. It is true that He spoke Aramaic on one occasion (Ac 21:4)

GREEK VERSIONS OF OT—I. The Septuagint (LXX).—I. The Septuagint, or Version of the Seventy, has special characteristics which differentiate it strongly from all other versions of the Scriptures. Not only are its relations to the original Hebrew of the O.T. more difficult and obscure than those of any other version to its original, but, as the Greek O.T. of the Christian community from its earliest days, it has a special historical importance which no other version can claim, and only the Vulgate can approach. Its history, moreover, is very obscure, and its criticism bristles with difficulties, for the scope of this article can aim only at stating the principal questions which arise in relation to it, and the provisional conclusions at which the leading students of the subject have arrived.

2. There is no doubt that the LXX originated in Alexandria, in the time of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt. Greeks had been sporadically present in Egypt even before the conquest of the country by Alexander, and under the Ptolemys they increased and multiplied greatly. Hundreds of documents discovered in Egypt within the last few years testify to the presence of Greeks and the wide-spread knowledge of the Greek language from the days of Ptolemy Soter onwards. Among them, especially in Alexandria, were many Jews, to whom Greek became the language of daily life, while the knowledge of Aramaic and still more of literary Hebrew, decayed among them. It was among such surroundings that the LXX came into existence. The principal authority on the subject of its origin is the Letter of Aristaeus (edited by H. St. J. Thackeray in the Introduction to the Septuagint Greek [1900], and by J. Wondland in the Fontbonne series [1909]). This document, which purports to be written by a Greek official of high rank in the court of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, a.d. 280-284, describes how the king, Demetrius I., resolved to obtain a Greek translation of the laws of the Jews for the library of Alexandria; how, at the instigation of Aristeas, he released the Jewish captives in baskingdom, to the number of some 100,000, paying the (absurdly) small sum of 20 drachmas apiece for them to their masters; how be then sent to Assaz, the high priest at Jerusalem, and begged him to send six elders of them to translate the Law; bow the 72 elders were sent, and magnificently entertained by Ptolemy, and were then set down to their work in the island of Pharos; and bow in 72 days they completed the task assigned to them. The story is repeated by Josephus (Ant. X. ii.) from Aristeas in a condensed form.

In later times it received various accretions, increasing the miraculous character of the work; but these additions had nothing.

3. That the Letter of Aristeas is substantially right in assigning the original translation of the Law to one of the early Ptolemy's there is no reason to doubt; but the story has the air of having been considerably written up, and it is impossible to say precisely where history stops and fiction begins. Demetrius of Phalerum was librarian to Ptolemy I., but was in disgrace under his successors, and died about 283; hence be can hardly have been the prime mover in the affair. But if not, the writer of the Letter cannot have been the person of rank in Ptolemy's court that be represents himself to be, and the credit of the document is not so shaken. It can be depended on for accuracy in details, and it is necessary to turn to the internal evidence for further information.
It will be observed that Aristeas speaks only of 'the Law,' i.e. the Pentateuch; and there is no reason to doubt that this was the first part of the OT to be translated, and that the other books followed at different times and from the hands of different translators. A lower limit for the completion of the work, or of the main part of it, is given in the prologue to Sirach (written probably in n.c. 150), where the writer speaks of 'the law itself and the prophets and the rest of the books' (sc. the Hagiographa) as having been already translated. It may therefore be taken as fact that the LXX as a whole was produced between n.c. 285 and 150.

4. Its character cannot be described in a word. It is written in Greek, which in vocabulary and accidence is substantially that of the dead (Sir.) and Hellenistic Greek, which was in common use throughout the empire of Alexander, and of which our knowledge, in its non-literary form, has been greatly extended by the recent discovery of Greek papyri in Egypt. In its syntax, however, it is strongly tinged with Hebraisms, which give it a distinct character of its own. The general tendency of the LXX translators was to be very literal, and they have followed Hebrew usage (notably in the use of propositions, prepositions, and participial constructions) to an extent which runs entirely counter to the genius of the Greek language. [For examples, and for the grammati of the LXX generally, see the Introduction to Selections from the Septuagint, by F. C. Conybeare and St.
George Stock (1905).] The quality of the translation differs in different books. It is at its best in the Pentatuch, which was probably both the first and the most deliberately prepared portion of the translation. It is at its worst in the Prophets, which presented the greatest difficulties in the way of interpretation. Neither the Greek nor the Hebrew scholarship of the translators was of a high order, and they have not infrequently adorned the results of which are here summarized.] It has been shown that Jer. is probably the work of two translators, who respectively translated chs. 1-28 and 29-51 (in the Greek of the Apocrypha), the latter being an inferior scholar, being responsible also for Baruch. [For evidence shows traces of two translators, one taking chs. 1-27 and 40-48, the other 28-39. The Minor Prophets form a single group, which has considerable affinities with the first translators of both Jer. and Ezekiel. Isaiah stands markedly apart from all these, exhibiting a more classical style, but less fidelity to the Hebrew. 1 Kings (-1 Sam.) similarly stands apart from 2-4 Kings, the latter having features with a

5. Some other features of the LXX must be mentioned which show that each book, or group of books, requires separate study. In Judges the two principal MSS (Codd.
A and B, see below, § 10) differ so extensively as to show that they represent different recensions. In some books (notably the latter chapters of Ex., 3 K 4-11, Pr 24-29, Jer 25-51) the order of the LXX differs completely from that of the Hebrew; testifying to an arrangement of the text quite different from that of the Masoretes.
Elsewhere the differences are not in arrangement but in contents. This is especially the case in the later chapters of Jos., 1 Kings (=1 Sam.) 17-18, where the LXX omits (or the Heb. adds) several verses; 3 K 8 and 12, where the LXX incorporates material from some fresh source; Ps 151, which is added in the LXX; Job, the original LXX text of which was much shorter than that of the Massoretic Hebrew; Esther, where the Greek has large additions, which now appear separately in our Apocrypha, but which are an integral part of the LXX; Jer., where small omissions and additions are frequent;
and Daniel, where the LXX includes the Books of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, and the Song of the Three Children, which have now been relegated (in obedience to Jerome's example) to the Apocrypha.

The mention of the Apocrypha suggests the least and most striking difference between the LXX and the Hebrew OT, namely, in the books included in their respective canons; for the Apocrypha, as it stands to-day in our Bibles, consists (with the exception of Ezra, Neh., and the Prayer of Manasseh) of books which form an integral part of the LXX canon, but were excluded from the Hebrew canon when that was finally determined about the end of the 1st century [see Canov on Apocrypha]. Nor did these books stand apart from the others in the LXX as a separate group. The historical books (1 Esdras, Tob., Judith, and sometimes Mac.) have their place with Chron., Ezr., Neh.; the poetical books (Wisd., Sir.) stand beside Lev., Eccles.; and Sam. and Baruch is attached to Jeremiah. The whole arrangement of the OT books differs, indeed, from the stereotyped order of the Massoretic Hebrew. The latter has its three fixed divisions—(i) the Law, i.e. the Pentateuch;
(ii) the Prophets, consisting of the Former Prophets (Jos., Judg., 1-4 Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets); (iii) the Hagiographa, including the Books of the Chronicles (Pr., Ps., Job, Prov., Ecclus., Sir.), the Apocrypha, Eccles., Ezr., Neh., Baruch, and the Song of the Three Children. The LXX attaches Ruth to Judges, Chron. and Ezr.-Neh. to Kings, Baruch and Lam. to Jer., and Dan. to the three Greater Prophets. Its principle of arrangement is, in fact, different. In place of divisions which substantially rep-and English translators followed Jerome in adopting the Hebrew canon, and relegated the remaining books to the limbo of the Apocrypha. The authority attaching to the LXX and Massoretic canons respectively is a matter of controversy which cannot be settled offhand; but the fact of their divergence is certain and historically important.

7. If the LXX had come down to us in the state in which it was at the time when its canon was complete (say in the 1st cent. B.C.), it would still have presented to the critic problems more than enough, by reason of its differences from the Hebrew in contents and arrangement, and the doubt attaching to its fidelity as a translation: but these difficulties are multiplied tenfold by the modifications which it underwent between this time and the date to which our earliest MSS belong (4th cent. A.D.). It has been shown above that the LXX was the Bible of the Greek-speaking world at the time when Christianity spread over it. It was in that form that the Gentile Christians received the OT; and they were under no temptation to desert it for the Hebrew Bible (which was the property of their enemies, the Jews), even if they had been able to do so. It consequently became the Bible of the early Christian Church, to which the books of the NT were added in course of time. But the more the Christians were attached to the LXX, the less willing were the Jews to admit its authority; and from the time of the activity of the Rabbinical school of Jannia, about the end of the 1st cent., to which period the fixing of the Masoretic canon and text may be assigned with fair certainty, they definitely repudiated it. This repudiation did not completely remove it, however, but it laid the seed which non-Palestinian Jews felt for a Greek OT; and the result was the production, in the course of the 2nd cent., of no less than three new translations. These translations, which are known as the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, are described below (§§ 15–18); hence it is sufficient to say that they were all translated from the Masoretic OT, and represent it with many differences which are of some relevance between this time and the date to which our earliest MSS belong (4th cent. A.D.).

8. Such was the state of things when Origen (A.D. 185–253), the greatest scholar produced by the early Church, entered the field of textual criticism. His labours therein had the most LXX-caching effect on the fortunes of the LXX, and are the cause of a large part of our difficulties in respect of its text to-day. Struck by the discrepancies between the LXX and the Heb., he conceived the idea of a vast work which should set the facts plainly before the student. This was the Hexapla, or sixfold version of the OT, in which six versions were set forth in six parallel columns. The six versions were as follows—(1) the Hebrew text; (2) the same translated in Greek characters; (3) the version of Aquila, which of all the versions was the nearest to the Hebrew; (4) the version of Symmachus; (5) his own edition of the LXX; (6) the version of Theodotion. In the case of the Psalms, no less than three additional Greek versions were included, of which very little is known; they are called simply Quinta, Sexta, and Septima. Elsewhere also there is occasional evidence of an additional version having been included; but these are unimportant. A separate copy of the four main Greek versions was also made, and was known as the Tetrapla. The principal extant fragment of a MS of the Hexapla (a 10th cent. palimpsest at Milan, containing about 11 Psalms) omits the Hebrew column, but makes up the total of six by a column containing various isolated readings. The only other fragment is a 7th cent. leaf discovered at Cairo in a genizah (or repository) containing damaged and disused MSS in various stages of decay and now at Cambridge. It contains Ps 22:18–21; 103–105, and has been edited by Dr. C. Taylor (Catro Gontsh Palimpsests, 1900). Origen's Hebrew text was substantially identical with the Massoretic, and Ar., Symm., and Theod., as has been stated above, were translations from it; but the LXX, in view of its wide and frequent discrepancies, received special treatment. Passages present in the LXX, but wanting in the Heb., were marked with an obelus (— or —); passages wanting in the LXX, but present in the Heb., were supplied from Ar. or Theod., and marked with an asterisk (*); the places of the passage in which the signs applied were marked being indicated by a metobulus (· or ' or ¥). But the number of divergences in arrangement, the order of the Heb. was followed (except in Prov.), and the text of the LXX was considerably corrected so as to bring it into better conformity with the Heb. Text. The allowance of such a conformity was in fact Origen's main object, though his conscience as a scholar and his reverence for the LXX did not allow him altogether to cast out passages which occurred in it, even though they had no sanction in the Hebrew text as he knew it.

9. The great MSS of the Hexapla and Tetrapla were preserved for a long time in the library established by Origen's disciple, Pamphilus at Cæsarea, and references are made to them in the scholia and subscriptions of some of the extant MSS of the LXX (notably N and Q). So long as they were in existence, with their apparatus of critical signs, the names of Origen in confining the Gr. and Heb. Text of the OT could always be given, and the original text of the LXX substantially restored. But MSS so huge could not easily be copied, and the natural tendency was to excerpt the LXX column by column, as representing the Greek text improved by more or less addition to a more authentic form. Such an edition, containing Origen's fifth column, with its apparatus of critical signs, was produced early in the 4 th cent. by Pamphilus, the founder of the library at Cæsarea, and by Tertullian. The production of such an edition has the advantage of the extant MSS of the LXX have descended; but the intricacies of the descent are indescribably great. In the case of Hexaplaric MSS, the inevitable tendency of scribes was to omit, more or less completely, the critical signs which distinguished the true LXX text from the passages imported from Ar. or Theod.; the versions of Ar., Theod., and Symm. have disappeared, and exist now only in fragments, so that we cannot follow all such interpolations with certainty; Hexaplaric, Hexychian, and Lucianic MSS acted and reacted on one another, so that it is very difficult to identify MSS as containing one or other of these editions; and although some MSS can be assigned to one or other of them with fair confidence, the majority contain mixed and undetermined texts. The task of the textual critic who would get behind all this confusion of versions and recensions is consequently very hard, and the problem has as yet by no means been completely solved.

10. The materials for its solution are, as in the NT, threefold—Manuscripts, Versions, Patriotic Quotations; and these must be briefly described. The earliest MSS are fragments on papyrus, some of which go back to the 3rd cent. About 16 in all are at present known, the most important being (i) Oxyrhynchos Pap. 656 (early 3rd cent.), containing parts of On 14–27, where most of the great vellum MSS are defective; (ii) Brit. Mus. Pap. 37 (7th cent.), sometimes known as O, containing the greater part of Ps 1–34, and showing a misunderstanding that Heinrici, followed by Rahlfs, quotes the authority of Wicliffen for assigning this MS to the 4th cent.; (iii) a fragmentary manuscript containing Ps 50–55, the first five being considerably mutilated; (iv) a papyrus at Heidelberg (7th cent.), containing Zec 4–Mal 4. A papyrus at Berlin, containing about two-thirds of Gom., and said to be of the 4th or 5th cent., is not yet published.

The principal vellum uncial MSS, which are of course the main foundation of our textual knowledge, are as follows:

A. Codex Sinaiticus, 4th cent., at Leipzig, contains the whole NT.S. Petersburg, containing fragments of the Gospels and New Testament, 1 Chr 979£1191, 2 Esdr 97£211 Eccles, Esther, Tob., Judith, Jer., Ps. 11£250 Joel, Jer., Joel, Ps. 11£250, and the poetical books. Its text is of a mixed character. It has a strong element in common with B, and yet is independent of it. In 100, it has a quite different text from that of A and B, and is perhaps nearer to the original Heb. Its origin is probably composite, so that it is not possible to assign it to any one school. The most important correctors are C and D, both of the 7th cent., the former of whom states, in a note appended to Ezech., that he collated the MS with a very careful copy, which itself had been corrected by the hand of Pamphilus. A.

B. Codex Alexandrinus, 5th cent., in the British Museum; complete except in Ps 49£74 and smaller lacunae, chiefly in Gen.; 3 and 4 Mac. are included. The Psalter is liturgical, and is preceded by the Epistle of Athenasius on the Psalms, and a list of the names of Eusebius; the epistles are appended to it. The text is written by at least two scribes; the principal corrections are by the original scribes and a reviser not now known. It is almost certainly a copy of Egyptian origin, and has sometimes been supposed to represent the original of Hexychius, but this is by no means certain yet. In Judges it has been corrected from that of B, and in general the two MSS represent different types of text; the quotations from Judges given to support A rather than B.

C. Codex Vaticanus, 4th cent., in the Vatican; complete, except for the loss of Gn 1£24, 2 Kr 1£25, 1 Esdr 1£25, and Ps 105£117, and therefore dependent on more than one MS. The Hexapla, and not B, is quite independent of it. It is of Egyptian origin, and is very frequently in accord with the Bohairic version. Recent Rabhs has argued that in Ps 102£108, 301£318, and Hesychius, but his proof is very incomplete; for since he admits that Hesychius must have made but few alterations in the pre-Origenian Psalter, and since B is quite independent of them, he takes as the standard of Hesychius (namely, the quotations in Cyril of Alexandria), his hypothesis does not seem to cover the phenomena so well as H. The true character of B, however, still requires investigation, and each of the principal groups of books must be examined separately.

D. Codex Ephraemi rescriptus, 5th cent., at Paris; 64 leaves palliimpsest, containing parts of the poetical books. E.

The Codex Genensis, 5th cent., in the British Museum; an illustrated copy of Gen., almost wholly destroyed by fire in 1791, but partially known from collations made previously. F. Codex Erfurtensis, 6th cent., 130 leaves at Leyden, 182 at Paris, and one at St. Petersburg; contains portions of the Pentateuch in a Hexaplar text, with Origen's apparatus (correctorium); contains most of the writings of the Ante-Christian centuries. See also Ps. 11£250, and Gen. 1£250.

L. The Vienna Genensis, 6th cent., in silver letters on purpureum, with illustrations; contains Gen., complete. M. Codex Rossicolenus, 6th cent., in the Vatican; contains portions of the OT, from Lv 9£14, 34. Of importance chiefly as being used (in conjunction with B) for the standard edition of the LXX printed at Rome in 1857.

Q. Codex Marchalianus, 6th cent., in the Vatican; contains the whole NT, complete. Written in Egypt; its text is believed to be Hexychian, and it contains a large number of Hexaplaric signs and readings from the Hexapla in its margins, which are of great importance.

R. Codex Venetus, 6th cent., at Verona; contains the whole NT, complete. Written in Egypt, with gold initials, on purpureum; the Canticles are included.

T. Zirilich Psalter, 7th cent., written in silver letters, with gold initials, on purpureum; the psalms are included. U. Codex Greek, Latin, and Arabic, of the 10th cent., contains the whole NT, complete. Written in Egypt, in black letters on purpureum; the psalms are included.
of Alexandria, though their results are by no means uniform. This field of inquiry is not worked out yet.

13. With these materials the critic has to approach the problem of the restoration of the text of the LXX. Ideally, what is desirable is that it should be possible to point out the three main editions, those of Origen, Lucian, and Hesychius, and thence to go back to the text which lies behind them all, that of the pre-Origenian LXX. Some progress has been made in the direction of this ideal. Some MSS are generally recognized as being predominantly Lucianic; some readings are certainly known to be Hesychian; but we are still far from an agreement on all points. Expectations are high for the case of the edition of Hesychius. Some scholars have identified it (notably in the Prophets) with the text of A, which, however, seems certainly to have been modified by the influence of Origen. More recently the tendency has been to find it in B; but here it is still open to question whether B is not mainly both pre-Hesychian and pre-Origenian. It would be unjustifiable to pretend at present that certainty has been arrived at on these points. And with regard to the great bulk of MSS, it is clear that their texts are of a mixed character. In the Psalms it would appear that the edition of Lucian was, in the main, adopted and so became the common text of the Church; but in regard to the other books, the common text, which appears in the bulk of the later MSS, cannot be identified with any of the three principal editions. The influence of the Hebrew, especially after the example of Origen, was constantly a disturbing factor; and it is certain that criticism has still much to do before it can give us even an approximately sound text of the LXX.

14. And when that is done, the question of the relation of the LXX to the Hebrew still remains. No other version differs so widely from its presumed original as the LXX does from the Massoretic Hebrew; but it is hard to say how far to say how far the Hebrew takes and liberties of the translators, and how far to the fact that the text before them differed from the Massoretic. That the latter was the case to some inconsiderable extent is certain. Readings in which the LXX is supported against the Massoretic by the Samaritan version must almost certainly represent a divergent Hebrew original; but unfortunately the Samaritan exists only for the Pentateuch, in which the variants are least. Elsewhere we have generally to depend on internal evidence; and more the LXX is studied in detail, the less willing, as a rule, is the scholar to maintain its authority against the Hebrew, and the less certain that its variants really represent differences in the original text. The palpable mistakes made by the translators, the inadequacy of their knowledge of Hebrew, the freedom with which some of them treated their original,—all these go far to explain a large margin of divergence; and to these must be added divergences arising, not from a different Hebrew text, but from supplying different vowel points to a text which originally had none. All these factors have to be taken into account before we can safely say that the Hebrew which lay before the LXX translators must have been different from the Massoretic text; and each passage must be judged on its own merits. An instructive lesson may be learnt from the recent discovery of the original Hebrew of Sirach, which has revealed quite an unsuspected amount of blurring, and even willful alteration, on the part of the Greek translators. The testimony of the LXX must therefore be received with extreme caution; and although there is no reason to doubt that it contains much good grain, yet it is also certain that much skill and labour have still to be exercised in order to separate the grain from the chaff. In passing, it may be said that there appears to be no sound basis for the charge, often brought by early Christian writers, that the Jews made large alterations in the LXX text for doctrinal and controversial reasons.

II. Aquila (Aq.).—15. Of the rival Greek versions which, as mentioned in § 7, came into being in the 2nd cent., the first was that of Aquila, a Gentle of Sinope, in Pontus, who was converted first to Christianity and then to Judaism. He is said to have been the disciple of Rabbi Akiba, and to have flourished in the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 117–138). His translation of the OT was made in the interests of Jewish orthodoxy. The text which subsequently bore the name of Aquila had practically been fixed by the Jewish scholars at the end of the 1st cent., and Aquila followed it with slavish fidelity. All thought for the genius and usage of the Greek language was banished from it. It was forced to follow the idiosyncrasies of the Hebrew in defiance of sense and grammar. Aq. would consequently be an excellent witness to the Hebrew text of the 2nd cent. if only it existed at all; but we possess only small fragments of it. These consist for the most part (until recently, wholly) of fragments of Origen's third column preserved in the margins of Hexaplar MSS (such as Q); but they have been supplemented by modern discoveries. The Milan palimpsest, discovered by the Hexaplar containing the text of Aq. for 11 Psalms; but though discovered by Mercati in 1896, only a small specimen of it has yet been published. The Cambridge fragment published by Dr. Taylor gives the text of Aq. and that of Theodotion, by F. C. Burkitt discovered three palimpsest leaves of a MS of Aq. (5th–6th cent.) among a large quantity of tattered MSS brought, like the last-mentioned fragment, from Cairo; and these, which contain 4 K 231–47, were published in 1897. Further fragments, from the same source and of the same date, published by Dr. C. Taylor (1900), contain Ps 60–72 96–97 99 180–186 100, and in 1908 the first version of Ps 114 in the versions of the LXX and Aq. from a papyrus of the 4th cent. In the collection of Lord Amherst. These discoveries confirm our previous knowledge of the character of Aq., and it is highly worthy that in the Cambridge MSS of Aq., the Divine Tetragrammation is written in the old Hebrew characters.

III. Theodotion (Theod.).—16. The origin of this version must be ascribed to a desire (similar to that which actuated Origen) on the part of the Christians to have a Greek version of the OT which should correspond better than the LXX with the current Hebrew text, and yet not be so closely identified with their Jewish opponents and so disregarding of the genius of the Greek language as Aquila. Theodotion, though sometimes described as a Jewish proselyte, appears rather to have been an Ebionite Christian, who lived at Ephesus about the middle of the 2nd cent.; and his version found favour with the Christians, much as Aq. did with the Jews. This version follows in the main the authorized Hebrew, but is much more free than Aq., and agrees more with the LXX. Hence when Origen, in the execution of his plan for bringing the LXX into accord with the Hebrew, had to supply omissions in the LXX, he had recourse to Theod. for the purpose. Further, the LXX version of Dan, being regarded as unsatisfactory, the version of Theod. was taken into use instead, and so effectually that the LXX of this book has survived in but one single MS. It is probable, however, that Theod. was not wholly unguished in this book, for there are strong traces of Theodotionic readings in the NT (Hebrews and Apocalypse), 1 Enoch, 1 Clement, and Justin; whence it seems necessary to conclude that Theod. based his version on one which had been previously in existence side by side with the LXX.

17. Besides this complete book and the extracts from the Hexapla and the Milan palimpsest (the Theodotion column in the Cambridge MS in 1894), there is some reason to believe that still another version of the OT has survived than was formerly supposed. It is well known that the book which appears in our Apocrypha as 1 Esdras, and in the Greek Bible as Echasserit, is simply a different recension of the canonical book of Ezra (with parts of 2 Chron. and Nehemiah), which in the Greek Bible appears (with Neh.) as 'Ερφας Β'. 'Ερφας Β' faithfully represents the Massoretic Hebrew; 'Ερφας Α' is freely paraphrastic, and contains some additional matter (1 Chron. 4:13), who knows the LXX, but not, of course, Theod., plainly follows 'Ερφας Α'; and it has been argued by Whiston (1722) and Sir H. Howorth (Soc. Bibl. Arch., May 1901–Nov. 1902) that 'Ερφας Α' is the original LXX version, and 'Ερφας Β' the version of Theod., which, as in Dan., has ousted its predecessor from general use. The theory is not at all improbable (and there is some evidence that in the Hexapla, where Theod. of course had its own column, the text in the LXX column was 'Ερφας Α'), but it still needs confirmation by a linguistic comparison between 'Ερφας Α' and Theodotion's Dan., which it is hoped will shortly be made. Sir Syria's column, for instance, that the version of which now appears in the LXX is really that of Theod., the original LXX having in this case completely disappeared. Chron. is certainly closely connected with 'Ερφας Α', and the supposition deserves full examination; but in the absence of an alternative version, or of any reference to one, it will be more difficult to establish.

IV. Symmachus (Symm.).—38. Of Symm., there is less to say. Like Theodotion, he has been called an Exponent, a translator, which goes back through Aq., and emissary, but he has been argued to be a proselyte to Judaism; the former statement is probably true. His work was known to Origen by about A.D. 228, and was probably produced quite at the end of the 2nd century. From the literary point of view, it was the best of all the Greek versions of the OT. It was based, like Aq., and Theod., on the Massoretic Hebrew, but it aimed at rendering it into idiomatic Greek. Consequently, it not only had the reputation in which Aq., acquired among the Jews, nor was it so well fitted as Theod. to make good the defects, real or supposed, of the LXX among the Christians; and its historical use is far less than that of its rivals. The extant materials for its study are practically the same as in the case of Aq., namely, the two fragments of MSS of the Hexapla [the Cambridge fragment contains the Symm. column for Ps 225–228]; the precise extent of the Milan MS is not known, and the copious extracts from the Hexapla in the margins of certain MSS and the quotations of the Fathers.

LITERATURE.—By far the best work on the LXX in any language is Dr. H. B. Swete's Introduct. to the OT in Greek (1900), which includes full references to all the literature of the subject before that date. See also Nestle's article in Hastings'DB, and his Septuagintstudien (1889–1907). A popular account with a description of all the MSS is given by T. H. Gaster, The Ancient MSS. (2 vols., 1905; revised ed., 1898). The most important recent works are Rahlfis' Septuagintstudien (1904, on the text of Prophes. II. 1607, Ps. 149, and Proph. I.), and R. K. Pattison's Book of Isaiah according to the Septuagint (2 vols., 1904–5). The remains of the Hexapla are collected in F. Field's Origens Hexaplera quae supersunt (Oxford, 1873). Germain's study of the Codex Marcianianus and Deissmann of the Holscher Papyrus-papyri make important contributions to the classification of the MSS. An English translation of the LXX was printed by C. Thomson at Philadelphia (1808), and has recently been reprinted by S. F. Fels; another by Sir L. Brenton was published in 1844.

Editions.—The LXX was first printed in the Complutensian Polyglot (1514–17, published 1521), but first published by Aldus (1519). The standard edition is that adopted at Rome by Pope Sixtus v. in 1587. This, by excellent fortune, was based mainly on the Codex Vaticanus (B), with the help of the Venice MS (V), and others. Hence the TR of the Greek OT, unlike that of the NT, has always rested on the authority of good MSS, though these were not very critically employed. An edition based on the Codex Alexandrinus (A) was published by Oxford by Brooke (1690). The criticism of the LXX rests upon the great edition of R. Holmes and J. Parsone (Oxford, 1789–1827), who printed in SI the text with an apparatus selected and 277 minuscule MSS, besides versions. Unfortunately several of the collations made by their assistants were not up to modern standards of accuracy. Thechendorf published a revised text, with various readings from a few of the leading uncials (1850; 7th ed., 1887); but the foundation of his recent textual study of the LXX was laid by the Cambridge manual edition in 3 vols. by Swete (1887–97, revised, 1895–99). In this the text is printed from B, when available, otherwise from A or E, and the apparatus gives all the variants in the principal uncial MSS. A larger edition giving the same text, but with the addition of the evidence of all the uncials, a complete list of carefully selected representative minuscules, and the principal versions and patristic quotations, is being prepared by A. E. Brooke and N. Maclean, and Genesis has already appeared (1906).

GREEN, GREENISH.—See COLOURS, § 1.

GREETING.—See SALUTATION.

GREYHOUND.—See Dog.

GRINDER.—The 'grinders' of Ec 12:4 are women grinding at the mill. But in Job 28:19 the 'grinders' are the molar teeth. Holland, Pliny, xi. 37, says, 'The great grinders which stand beyond the eye-teeth, in no creature whatsoever do fall out of themselves.'

GRISLED.—See COLOURS, § 1.

GROUND.—See Earth.

GROVE.—Apart from Gn 21:36, to be presently noticed, 'grove' is everywhere in AV a mistaken tr., or a word from the Vulgate or the name of the Canaanite goddess Asherah. The 'groves,' so often said to have been, or to be deserving to be, 'cut down,' were the wooden poles set up as symbols of Asherah. To further the point.

In Gn 21:8 the grove which AV makes Abraham plant in Beer-sheba was really 'a tamarisk tree' (so RV), a tree which also figures in the story of Saul, 1 S 22:31 (compare with RV).

GRUDGE.—Ps 50:1 'Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.' The word 'grudge' formerly stood for dissatisfaction expressed aloud, i.e. murmuring, grumble; but by 1611 it was becoming confined to the feeling rather than the open expression, so that it occurs in AV less frequently than in the older versions. Besides Ps 50:1 it has the older meaning in Wis 12:2, Sir 10:6, and Je 3:5 'grudge not one against another' (RV 'murmur not one against another').

GUARD, BODY-GUARD.—The former is used in EV almost exclusively for the body-guard of royal and other high-placed personages, such as Nehemiah (Neh 4:27) and Holofernes (Jdt 12:1). 'Body-guard' occurs only 1 Es 3:4 RV of the 'guard' (AV) of Darus. The members of the body-guard of the king of Gn 37:22 and of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25:5 etc.) are, in the original style, 'slaves' (of animals for food), not as RV 'executioners.' Those composing the body-guard of the Hebrew kings, on the other hand, are styled 'runners' (1 S 22:7 RV and marg., 2 K 10:11 11 etc.), one of their duties being to run in front of the royal state-chariot (cf. 2 Sh 18, 1 K 19). In 1 K 14:6 we hear of a guard-chamber. The office of 'the captain of the guard' was at all times one of great dignity and responsibility. David's body-guard consisted of foreign mercenaries, the Cherethites and Pelethites (see p. 122), commanded by Benaiah (2 S 20:3 compared with 2 Sh), and the famous Praetorian guard of the Roman emperors is mentioned in Ph 19:18; also Ac 28:13 AV in a passage absent from the best texts and RV.

GUDGODAR.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites (Dt 10:19), whence they proceeded to Jerobeam. There can be little doubt that Balaam had died in the itinerary of Nu 33:20 indicates the same place.

GUEST, GUEST-CHAMBER.—See HOSPITALITY.

GUILT.—1. Guilt may be defined in terms of relativity. It is rather the abiding result of sin than sin itself (see Pearson's Exposition of the Creed, ed. James Nichols, p. 514 f.). It is not punishment, or even liability to punishment, for this presupposes personal consciousness of wrong-doing and leaves out of account the attitude of God to sin unwittingly committed (Lv 5:17; cf. Lk 12:4, Ro 5:13; see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 144). On the other hand, we may describe it as a condition, a state, or a relation; the resultant of two forces drawing different ways (Ro 7:13). It includes two essential factors, without which it would be unmeaning as an objective reality: on one point stands personal holiness, including whatever is holy in carnal, personal corruption, including whatever is evil in man. Man’s relation to God, as it is affected by sin, is what constitutes guilt in the widest sense of the word. The human attitude after sinning is the sure evidence of man’s consciousness of racial and personal guilt, and an acknowledgment that his position in this respect is not normal.

We are thus enabled to see that when moral obliquity arising from or reinforced by natural causes, adventitious circumstances, or personal environment, issues in persistent, wilful wrong-doing, it becomes or is resolved into guilt, and involves punishment which is guilt’s inseparable accompaniment. In the OT the ideas of sin, guilt, and punishment are so inextricably interwoven that it is impossible to treat of one without in some considerable measure involving the other two, and the same expression for each is used interchangeably for the others (see Schultz, OT Theol. ii. p. 306). An example of this is found in Cain’s despairing complaint, where the word ‘punishment’ (Ge 4:13) includes both the sin committed and the guilt attaching thereto (cf. Lv 26:3).

2. In speaking of the guilt of the race or of the individual, some knowledge of a law governing moral actions must be presupposed (cf. Jn 9:152). It is when the human will enters into conscious antagonism to the Divine will that guilt emerges into objective existence and crystallizes (see Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr. p. 208 ff.)

An educative process is historically connected with the sin of the race that sense of guilt without which progress is impossible (cf. Ro 5:17). As soon as, however, as this consciousness is established, the first step on the road to rebellion against sin is taken, and the sinner’s relation to God commences to become fundamentally altered from what it was. A case in point, illustrative of this inclinative stage, is afforded by Joseph’s brothers in their tardy recognition of a guilt which soon is, and has been latent in a degree, so far as their consciousness was concerned, up to the period of threatened consequences (Ge 42:24; cf. for a similar example of strange moral conduct in the part of David, 2 S 12:26). The subsequent conduct was characterized by clumsy attempts to undo the mischief of which they had been the authors. A like feature is observable in the attitude of the Philistines when restoring the sacred ‘ark of the covenant’ to the offended Jehovah. A ‘guilt-offering’ had to be sent as a restitution for the wrong done (1 S 6:17, cf. 2 K 12:28). This natural instinct was developed and guided in the Levitical institutions by formal ceremony and religious rite, which were calculated to deepen still further the feeling of guilt and fear of Divine wrath. Even when the offence was committed in ignorance, as soon as its character was revealed to the offender, he became thereupon liable to punishment, and had to expiate his guilt by restitution and sacrifice, or by a ‘guilt-offering’ (AV ‘trespass offering’; Lv 5:16, 6:21). To this a fine, amounting to one-fifth of the value of the wrong done, in the case of a heifer the word was added and given to the injured party (6, Nu 5:1).

3. As might be expected, the universality of human guilt is nowhere more insistently dwelt on or more fully realized than in the Psalms (cf. Ps 14:1 and 53, where the expression ‘the sons of men’ reveals the scope of the poet’s thought; see also Ps 36 with its antithesis—the universal long-suffering of God and the universal corruption of men). In whatever way we interpret certain passages (e.g. Ps 68:14, 109:27) in the so-called imprecatory Psalms, one thought at least is clear: no consistent and persistent sin can ever be separated from guiltiness in the sight of God and from consequent punishment. They reveal in the writers a sense ‘of moral earnestness, of righteous indignation, of burning zeal for the cause of God’ (see Kirkpatrick, Psalms ‘In Camden, Rh. Coll., Societies and Congreg. iv.

The same spirit is to be observed in Jeremiah’s repeated prayers for vengeance on those who spent their time in devising means to destroy him and his work (11:18, 18:20, 20:18 etc.). Indeed, the prophetic books of the OT testify generally to the force of this feeling amongst the most powerful religious thinkers of ancient times, and are a permanent witness to the validity of the educative functions which it fell to the lot of these moral teachers to discharge (cf. e.g. Hos 1:10, Jl 1:12, Am 4:14, Mic 3:4, Hag 2:14, Zec 5:7 ete.).

4. The final act in this great formative process is historically connected with the life and death of Christ. The doctrine of the Atonement, however interpreted or systematized, involves belief in, and the realization of, the guilt of the entire human race. The animalistic Leibnizian notion that God could rationalize the guilt committed or inherited by the race as a whole, so as to make it no longer a ‘real’ guilt, is not to be entertained, and has been condemned (e.g. by the Reformers, Calvin, and others). He became involved, so to speak, in a mystic but none the less real sense, in its guilt, while Gethsemane and Calvary are eternal witnesses to the tremendous load willingly borne by Jesus (Jn 19:10) as the price of the world’s guilt, at the hands of a just and holy but a loving and merciful God (Jn 3:4, Ro 5:6, Eph 2:4, 1 Th 1:4, Rev 1:6; cf. Ex 34:6).

By submitting to the awful experience which forced from Him the cry, ‘My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?’ and by the Death which followed, He made the real relation to God His own, while He made the very act of submitting to the penalty of sin, revealing in the highest form—the absolute perfection of His moral life and the steadfastness of His divine union with the Father’ (Dale, The Atonement, p. 425).

It is only in the life of Jesus that we are able to measure the guilt of the human race as it exists in the sight of God, and at the same time to learn somewhat, from the means by which He willed to bring it home to the consciousness of men, of the full meaning of its character as an awful but objective reality, Man’s position in regard to God, looked on as the result of sin, is the extent and the measure of his guilt.

‘Only He, who knew in Himself the measure of the holiness of God, could realize also, in the human nature which He had made His own, the full depth of the alienation of sin from God, the real character of the penal averting of God’s face. Only He, who sounded the depths of human consciousness in regard to sin, could, in the power of His own inherent righteousness, condemn and crash sin in the flesh. The suffering involved in this is not, in Him, punishment or the terror of punishment; but it is the full realizing, in the personal consciousness, of the truth of sin, and the disciplinary pain of the conquest of sin; it is that full self-identification of human nature with sin and sin’s scourge, with holiness as the Divine condemnation of sin, which was at once the necessity, and the impelling—of human penitence and the way forward to how distant!—an approach to it in our experience we recognize, not in the wild sin-terrified cry of the guilty, but rather

HABAKKUK

HAHASHTARI.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4:14).

HABAIAH ('3° hath hidden').—The head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel, but, being unable to trace their genealogy, were not allowed to serve (Ezr 2:36); called in Neh 7:28 Hobaiah, and in 1 Es 5:28 Obda.

HABAKKUK.—The eighth of the Minor Prophets. Except for legends, e.g. in Bel and the Dragon (vv. 13-42), nothing is known of him outside the book that bears his name.

1. The Book of Habakkuk, read as it now stands, must be dated shortly after the appearance of the Chaldeans on the stage of world-history, seeing that their descent on the nations is imminent. It is probably later than the battle of Carchemish, where Nebuchadrezzar defeated the Egyptians in B.C. 605, and earlier than the first Judean captivity in 597. If dated about the year 600, it falls in the reign of Jehoiakim, in the period of reaction that followed the defeat and death of Josiah at Megiddo (608). That event, apparently falsifying the promises of the recently discovered law-book, had led to a general neglect of its ethical claims, and to a recrudescence of the religious abuses of the time of Manasseh (cf. 2 K 23:39, Jer 19:1-5, 25 etc.). The one immovable article of faith held by the Judean nation seems to have been the inviolability of Jerusalem (cf. Jer 7:18 etc.). The book appears to be the work of a prophet living in Jerusalem. It may be divided into six sections, the first four containing two dialogues between Jahweh and the prophet, while the last two contain confident declarations springing from and expanding the Divine reply.

(1) 1:1-4. Habakkuk, compelled to live in the midst of violent wrong-doing, contempt of religion manifesting itself in the oppression of the righteous by the wicked, complains strongly of the silence and indifference of God. (2) 3:1-11. He receives an answer that a new and startling display of the Divine justice is about to be made. The Chaldeans, swift, bitter, and terrible, are to sweep down and overwhelm the whole world. No fortress can resist their onslaughts. The question of this must lie, not in the fact that the Chaldeans are the aggressors, but rather that Jerusalem, spared so long, is now to share the fate of so many other cities.

(3) 1:5-17. Some time may now have elapsed before the next prophecy is spoken. During this period the prophet watches the progress of the Chaldeans, who have now (207) penetrated into Palestine. His observation raises a new and insoluble problem. This reckless, insolent, cruel, intractable conqueror is worse than those he has been appointed to chastise. How can a holy God, so ready to punish the 'wicked' in Israel, permit one who deserves far more the name of 'wicked' to rage unchecked? Are wrong and violence to possess the earth for ever?

(4) 2:4. The prophet, retiring to his watch-tower, whence he looks out over the world, to see it in ruins, is bidden to write down on tablets for all to read. He is told that the purpose of God is hastening to its fulfilment, and is encouraged to wait for it. Then follows the famous sentence, 'Behold, his soul is lifted up, it is not upright in him; but the just shall live in his faithfulness.' The meaning of this is plain. Tyranny is self-destructive, and carries within itself the seeds of doom. But while the evil-doer passes away, the just man, steadfast in the face of all contradiction, shall live, and last out the storm of judgment.

As before, and indeed in the whole course of this message, the prophet utters, triumphantly, a five-fold series of woes against the pride, the greed, the cruel building enterprises, the sensuality, the idolatry, of the heathen power.

Ch. 3. The Chaldaeans. Finally, in a magnificent lyric, which, as its heading and close prove, has been adapted for use in the Temple worship, the prophet sings the glorious redeeming acts of God in the past history of the people, and in the certainty of Ch. Chittim. In the second case, the hopeless ruin on the enemy, declares his unwavering trust.

So read, this short hook is seen to be a human document of unique value. It marks the beginnings of Hebrew reflective thought as the workings of Providence in history, afterwards so powerfully expressed in Job and in the later prophets.

2. Many modern scholars are unable to accept this examination of these chapters. It is argued that the use of the word 'wicked' in different senses in 1 and 11 is unnatural, and awkward. Further, it is urged that the descriptions of the conqueror in chs. 1 and 2 are so grossly at variance with Chaldaean skill at any period, that the reference is almost impossible at so early a stage of their history as the one named. Accordingly, some have treated 1 and 2 as a fragment of an older prophecy, and place the bulk of chs. 1 and 2 towards the close of the Exile, near the end of the Chaldaean period. Others place 11-13 between 2 and 25, considering that the whole section has been misplaced. The rest of the chapters are then referred to the author of the Book of Daniel, either Assyria or Egypt, whom the Chaldaeans are raised up to punish; and ch. 3 is ascribed to another author. Others again would alter the word 'Chaldaean,' and treat it as an error for 'Chittim.' In the second case the reference is to the Greeks, and the destroyer is Alexander the Great. Without attempting to discuss these views, it may be said that none of them supplies any satisfactory explanation of 11, in regard of Habakkuk's complaint to wrongs committed by some heathen power. The mention of 'law' and 'judgment,' 11, seems to point decisively to internal disorders among the prophet's own countrymen. The double use of the word 'wicked' may be a powerful dramatic contrast. The speed with which the enemy moves, said by some to be altogether inapplicable to the Chaldaeans, may be illustrated by the marvellously rapid rise of Nebuchadrezzar himself, from Polotium to Babylon, to take the kingdom on the death of his father, Troops of Scythian cavalry, at the service of the highest bidder after the disbanding of their own army, were probably found with the Chaldaeans. The question cannot be regarded as settled, under a fuller knowledge of Chaldaean history at the opening of the 7th cent. being much to be desired.

Most scholars regard ch. 3 as a separate composition. It is urged that this poem contains no allusions to the circumstances of Habakkuk's age, that the enemy in v.14, rejoicing to devour the poor secretly, cannot be a great all-conquering army, that the disasters to flocks and herds (v.17-18) are quite different from anything in chs. 1 and 2. It is conjectured that the poem, under the name of Habakkuk's, had a place in a song-book, and was afterwards transferred, with the marks of its origin not effaced, to the close of this prophetic book. These considerations are of great weight, though it may be recalled that the poetical part of the Book of Job ends somewhat similarly, with a theophany little related to the bulk of the book. Whether the chapter belongs to Habakkuk or not, its picture of the intervention of God Himself, in His own all-powerful strength bringing to nought the counsels of His enemies, is a fitting close to the book.

HADADZEER

HABBAINIB.—The grandfather of Jeazaniah, who were put to the proof by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 35:17).

HABERGEON (Ex 25:3-39:31 AV.).—An obsolete term replaced in RV by the modern 'coat of mail.' Cf. Job 41:1-16 AV, RV 'pointed shaft,' and see ARMOUR, 2 (c).

HABOR.—A river flowing through the district of Goshen, on the banks of which Israelites were settled when deported from Samaria (2 K 17:5, 1 Ch 5:39). It is a tributary of the Enphrates, the Chaboras of the Greeks, the modern Khābor. L. W. KING.

HACAIAH.—The father of Nehemiah (Neh 11:10).

HACHLILAH (1 S 23:26-65).—A hill in which David hid, and on which, during his pursuit, Saul pitched his camp, near the wilderness of Ziph. Ziph is mod. Tell es-Sul, to the S. of Hebron. Conder suggests that Hachlilah may be the hill Dahr el-Kilid, but this is perhaps rather far to the east.

HACHMONI, HACHEMONITE.—Both represent one word, and the same Hebrew word, and in 1 Ch 27:1 the latter is translated as a prop. name, 'Jehiel the son of Hachmoni,' whereas in 1 Ch 11:11 Jashobeam is called 'a Hachmonite.' We should probably render it in both cases as a gentilic name. In 2 S 23:1, which was written to 1 Ch 11:11, we have 'the Tahchmonites,' which is probably a textual error (see ADNO, JONAS—BASSIERE).

HADAD.—1. The name of a Semitic divinity (also written Adad, and Dadda for Dadda), the equivalent of Rimmon (wh. see) among the Arameans of Damascus and the Assyrians (wh. are apparently worshipped by all the Aramean tribes as well as among both South-Arabian and North-Arabian tribes, and also among the Assyrians, in Assyria and Babylonia, however, his cult, combined with that of Ramman, was apparently not native, but introduced from the Arameans of the west. Hadad, like Rimmon (Ramān), was the god of the air and thunder and lightning. The word seems to be derived from Arabic dadā, 'to shine, crush.' The name of this deity is not found alone in the Bible, but appears in several compounds, Benhadad, Bīldad, and those which follow this article. It is possible, also, that Aδραμεθω (cf. 2 K 13:3) and 32:17 should be read Aδραμελος, 'Adad is king.'

2. The eighth son of Ishmael, 1 Ch 1:10, and also Gn 25:14 according to RV and the best readings. 3. The fourth of the eight sons of the king of Edom, 1 Ch 1:10. 4. The eighth of the kings of Edom in the same list as the last-named, 1 Ch 1:10 (Gn 36:17 miswritten Hadar). 6. The son of a king of Edom in the 10th cent. B.C. (1 K 11:19). He escaped the massacre of Edomites perpetrated by Josiah, David's general, and fled (according to the received reading) to Egypt, whose king befriended him, and gave him his sister-in-law as his wife. After the death of David he returned to Edom, and his efforts seem to have rescued Edom from the yoke of King Solomon. It is probable that in v.12, instead of Mitāram (Egypt) Mitār should be read in the Hebrew as the name of a region west of Edom, which in the old MSS was several times confounded with the word for Egypt. The reference to Pharaoh (v.14?) would then have been a later addition.

HADDEEZER.—The name of a king of Zobah (wh. see) in the time of David, 2 S 8:16, 1 K 11:19. In 1 Ch 18:12, the same king is called less correctly HADADZEER. He was at the head of the combination of the Arameans of Northern Palestine against David, was repeatedly defeated, and finally made tributary. The word means 'Adad is (my) helper' (cf. Heb. Bīlēser, Ebenezer, Azāriāh, etc.). It is found on the Black Obelisk of the Assyrian Shalmaneser III. under the more Aramaic form Adadīrī, the equivalent of Benhadad of Damascus, who led the great combination, in-including Abah of Israel, against the Assyrians in b.c.

584.

HADADRIMMON.—A proper name occurring in Zec 12:3 as 'the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo.' It has usually been supposed to be a place-name. According to a notice by Jerome, it would be equivalent to Magiddo itself. The word, however, is a combination of the two names of a divinity (see Magi); and equally good translation would be 'as the mourning for Hadadrimmon,' and it has been plausibly conjectured that it is the weeping for Tammuz referred to in Ezk 8:4, that is here meant.
In this case the old Semitic deity Hadad-Rimmon would be the 2nd cent. n.c. have become confounded with Tammuz. There is no ground for supposing an allusion to the mourning for king Josiah, which, of course, took place in Jerusalem, not in the valley of Megiddo.

HADAR (Gn 36:6).—See Hadad, 4.

HADAREZER.—See Hadadezer.

HADASHER.—See Hadadezer.

HADASHAH.—A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 19:37); site unknown.

HADASSEH ('myrrh').—The Jewish name of Esther (Est 2:6) only. See Esther.

HADASE.—The Lat. term for the Heb. Sheol, the abode of departed spirits. It was conceived of as a great cavern or pit under the earth, in which the shades lived.
Just as a degree of activity the shades possessed to be a somewhat doubtful. According to the Greeks, they were engaged in the occupations in which they had been employed on earth. The Hebrews, however, seem rather to have thought of their condition as one of inactivity. (See SHEOL and GESHISHA.) RV has 'Hades' for AV 'hell' when the latter '='realm of the dead.'

SRAILEY MATHEWS.

HADD.—Named along with Lob and Ono (Ezr 2:6—Neh 7:7), people by Benjaminites after the Captivity (Neh 11:41), probably to be identified also with Addia of 1 Mac 12:11-12. It is the modern Hadidah in the low hills, about 34 miles N.E. of Lydda.

HADLAI.—An Ephraimite (2 Ch 29:16).

HADORAM.—1. The fifth son of Joktan (Gen 10:31,
1 Ch 1:17). 2. The son of Tou, king of Hamath (1 Ch 18:16). In the parallel passage, 2 S 5:8, Hadoram wrongly appears as Joram. 3. Ch 2:16. The parallel passage, 1 K 12:11, has preserved the more correct form Adoram.

HADRACH.—A place in Syria mentioned in Zec 9:8 as being, at the time of the writing of that passage, congradate with Damascus. Hadrach is undoubtedly identical with Hadarka of the Assyrian inscriptions.
It was the object of three expeditions by Assur-der-Ori, and Tiglat-pileser III. refers to it in the account of his war with 'Azarash the Judean.'

HAFET.—'Haff,' still used locally for 'handle,' occurs in Jg 3:8; the haft also went in after the blade.

HAGAB (Ezr 2:24).—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel. The name is absent from the parallel list in Neh 7; it appears in 1 Es 5:5 as Accaba.

HAGABA (Neh 7:4).—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel. See next article.

HAGABAH.—The slightly different form in which the last-mentioned name appears in Ezr 2:24; in 1 Es 5:5
Arab.

HAGAR (prob. 'emigrant' or 'fugitive') was Sarah's Egyptian maid (Gen 16:1). Her story shows that Sarah denounced the hope of bearing children to Abraham, and gave him Hagar as concubine. Her exultation so irritated Sarah that the maid had to flee from the encampment, and took refuge in the wilderness of Shur (16:20-21), between Philistia and Egypt. Hence she was sent back 'the angel of the Lord'; and soon after her return she gave birth to Ishmael. After the weaning of Isaac, the sight of Ishmael aroused Sarah's jealousy and fear (21:1); and Abraham was reluctantly persuaded to send away Hagar and her son. Again 'the angel of God' cheered her; and she found her way southwards to the wilderness of Paran (21:15), where her son settled.

This story is compacted of traditions gathered from the three great documents: J yields the greater part of Gn 18-19 and 20:1-16, while Traces of Ph have been found in the last. The presence of the story in Josh, where such different interests are represented is in favour of its historicity; and instead of the assumption that Hagar is but the conjectural mother of the personified founder of a tribe, the more obvious explanation is that she was the actual ancestress of the people of Ishmael. Whatever anthropological interest attaches to the passages (see Hagar), their presence may be defended on other grounds, the force of which a Hebrew would be more likely to feel. They serve to show the purity and pride of Jewish descent, other tribes in the neighbourhood being kindred to them, but only offshoots from the main family. In Jewish history is emphasized by the double action of the angel in the unfolding of Hagar's career.

The story is an important part of the biography of Abraham, illustrating both the variety of try by which his faith was perfected and the active concern of God in even the distracted conditions of a chosen household.
Further interest attaches to the narrative as containing the earliest reference to Jehovah (Gn 17:5), and as being the first of a series (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Naaman) in which the regard of God is represented as singing out for blessing persons outside Israel, and thus as a prophecy of the universal mission of Christ. There is but one other important allusion to Hagar in the OT. She is mentioned in Gen 23:11 in a sketch of the family of Ishmael (so in Th 3 the Arabans are said to have his son); and she has been assumed with much improbability to have been the ancestress of the Hagarites or Hargarenes of 1 Ch 5:30 and Ps 83 (see HARGIT). In Gal 4:25-26
Paul applies her story allegorically, with a view to show the superiority of the new covenant. Hence the bondwoman with Sarah, and Ishmael 'born after the flesh' with Isaac 'born through promise'; hence freedom and grace appear as the characteristic qualities of Christianity. There is good MS authority for the omission of 'Hagar' in v.32a, as in RVm; in which case the meaning is that Sinai is a mountain in Arabia, the land of bondmen and the country of Hagar's descend-cents. Even if the rendering of the text be correct, the meaning of the phrase will not be very different. 'This Hagar of the allegory is or represents Sinai, because Sinai is in Arabia, where Hagar and her descendants died.'

HAGARENES.—See HAGRITES.

HAGGADAH.—See TALMUD.

HAGGAL.—A prophet whose writings occupy the tenth place in the collection of the Minor Prophets.
1. The man and his work.—The sphere of his activity was the post-exilic community, his ministry (so far as may be gathered from his writings) being confined to a few months of the second year of Darius Hystaspes
(b.c. 520). His name is perhaps a short form of Haggai (Ch 1:6), as Mattai (Ezr 10:15) of Mattathai (10:6), and may mean 'feast of 1,' thought by some an adjective signifying 'festal' (from hag; cf. Barzillai from barzel). According to late traditions, he was born in Babylon, and went up with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, before he died. In his prophetic work he was associated with Zechariah (Ezr 5:1-6); and the names of the two are prefixed to certain Psalms in one or more of the Versions (to Ps 137 in LXX alone, to Ps 111 (112) in Vulg. alone, to Ps 125, 126 in Pesh., to Ps 145. 147. 148 in LXX and Pesh., to Ps 145 in LXX, Vulg., and Pesh.).

His prophecies were evoked by the delay that attended the reconstruction of the Temple. The Jews, on returning to Palestine in the first year of Cyrus (536), at HAGGEDOLIM

HAIR

HAGGITH ('feastal').—The mother of Adonijah (2 S. 3, 1 K. 1: 29).

HAGIOGRAPHIA.—See CANON OF OT, § 8.

HAGRI.—Father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11: 44). The parallel passage, 2 S. 23: 18, reads 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite,' which is probably the correct text.

HAGRITE.—Jezz (the Hagrite) was 'over the flocks' of King David (1 Ch. 27: 5). See next article.

HAGRITES, HAGARITES, HAGARENES.—A tribe of Arabian or Amaran origin inhabiting territory to the east of Gilead. Twice they were the object of campaigns by the trans-Jordanic Israelite tribes, by whom they were crushed and expelled from their territory (1 Ch. 5: 16, 17). Because the name appears only in very late passages, Bertheau and others have conjectured that it was a late appellation for Bedouin in general. It has been supposed to mean 'Descendants of Hagar'—hence to be synonymous with 'Ishmaelites.' But this is unlikely, since the Hagrites are named along with other tribes which, according to this theory, they included. The Hagrites are mentioned among a group of Aramaean tribes in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser III. W. M. Neusner.

HAHIROTH.—See PI-HAHIROTH.

HAIL.—See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.
metal were worn on the hair (Is 80:9). In modern times coins of silver and gold are commonly worn; often a tiny bell is hung at the end of the trees. It is a grievous insult to cut or pluck the hair of head or cheek (2 S 10:6, Is 7:23, 50:2, Jer 48:7). Letting loose a woman's hair is a great shame (Nu 6:4 RV); or it may indicate self-humiliation (Lk 7:40). As a token of grief was customary to cut the hair of both head and beard (Is 15:2, Jer 16:41, Am 5:8), to leave the beard untrimmed (2 S 19:29), and not to pluck out the hair (Ezr 9:9). Tearing the hair is still a common Oriental expression of sorrow. Arab women cut off their hair in mourning.

The hair of the lifelon Nazirite might never be cut (Jud 13:13). A Nazirite generally specified his hair only when the vow was performed. If, after the period of separation had begun, he contracted defilement, his head was shaved and the period began anew (Nu 6:9). An Arab who is under vow must neither cut, comb, nor cleanse his hair, until the vow is fulfilled and his offering made. Then cutting the hair marks his return from the consecrated to the common condition (Wellhausen, 553, 116). Offerings of hair were common among the Israelites (W. R. Smith, 323ff.; Wellhausen, op. cit. 118 f.). It was believed that some part of a man's life resided in the hair, and that possession of hair from his head marked a certain connection with him, even after his death. Before freeing a prisoner, the Arabs cut a portion of his hair, and retained it, as evidence that he had been in their power (Well. op. cit. 118). Sahl b. al-Walid wore, in his military headgear, hair from the head of Mohammed (ib. 146).

The colour of the hair was observed in the detection of leprosy (Lv 13:19 etc.). Thorough disinfection involved removal of the hair (14:4-5). The shaving of the head of the slave-girl to be married by her captor marked the change in her condition and prospects (Dt 21:14, W. R. Smith, 209). Sweating by the hair is generally confined to unclean peoples. The hoary head is held in honour (Pr 10:30, Wis 2:8 etc.), and white hair is associated with the appearance of Divine majesty (Dt 7:1, Rev 14:1).

HAEUFHA occurs in RVm of 1 Ch 4:37 in an obscure genealogical list. It is probably not a proper name, but means 'the Jewess' (so RV and AVm). AV reads Jodhdiyah.

HAKKATAN ('the smallest'). The head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 8:35); called in 1 Es 8:39 Akatan.

HAKKOZ.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 4:2). The eponym of a priestly family (1 Ch 24:5). Ezr 2:34; Neh 3:34; called in 1 Es 5:9 Akkos. They were unable to prove their pedigree.

HAKUPHA.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2:36; Neh 7:36); called in 1 Es 6:8 Achipha.

HALAH.—One of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria (2 K 17:6, 1 Ch 5:26). It was situated in the region of Gozan (wh. see), but has not yet been satisfactorily identified.

HALAK, or the 'smooth mountain,' Jos 11:18 (only).—This eminence has not been identified, but its approximate locality is indicated by the words 'that goeth up to Scir'; and it formed the southern limit of Joshua's conquests.

HALAKHAH.—See TALMUD.

HALHUL.—A city of Judah (Jos 15:9). It is the modern Halab, a large village 4 miles north of Hebron.

HALI.—A city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Jos 19:27). The site is doubtful. It may be the ruin 'Alta' on the hills N.E. of Achshah, about 18 miles N.E. of Acte.

HALICARNASSUS was one of the six Dorian colonies on the coast of Caria. Though excluded from the Dorian confederacy (Hexapolis) on account of some ancient dispute (Herod. i. 144), it was a very important city in respect of politics, commerce, literature, and art. It was one of the States to which the Roman Senate sent letters to the Jews in n.c. 139 (1 Mac 15:28). It must therefore have been a free and self-governing city at that time. The decree of the city passed in the first cent. B.C., granting to the Jews religious liberty and the right to build their proscholai beside the sea (Jos. Ant. xiv. 23), attests the existence of an early Jewish colony in the city; and this was natural, as Halicarnassus was a considerable centre of trade owing to its favourable position on a bay opposite Cos, on the north-west side of the Ceramic Gulf. The city extended round the bay from promontory to promontory and contained, among other buildings, a famous temple of Aphrodite.

The site of Halicarnassus is now called Bodrum (i.e. 'fortress'), from the Castle of St. Peter which was built by the Knights of St. John (whose headquarters were in Rhodes), under their Grand Master de Nalliac, 1349.

HALL.—See PRAETORIUM.

HALLEL.—The name given in Rabbinical writings to the Ps 113-118—called the 'Egyptian Hallel' in distinction from the 'Great Hallel' (Ps 120-134), and from Ps 144-148, which are also psalms of Hallel character. The Hallel proper (Ps 113-118) was always regarded as forming one whole. The word Hallel means Praise, and the name was given on account of the oft-recurring word Hallelujah ('Praise ye the Lord') in these psalms. The 'Hallel' was sung at the great Jewish festivals—Passover, Tabernacles, Pentecost, and Chanukkah ('Dedication' of the Temple).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HALLELUJAH.—An Hebrew expression, used liturgically in Hebrew worship as a short doxology, meaning 'praise ye Jehovah.' With one exception (Ps 139) it occurs only at the beginning or the end of psalms, or both: at the beginning only in Ps 111, 112; at the beginning and end in Ps 106, 113, 115, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, and 150; at the end only in Ps 104, 105, 116, 117, 118, 119.

In the LXX, however, the Gr. (transliterated) form of the expression occurs only at the beginning of psalms as a heading, and this would seem to be the more natural usage. The double occurrence in the Heb. text may in some cases be explained as due to accidental displacement (the heading of the following psalm being attached to the conclusion of the previous one).

It is a liturgical heading the term served to mark off certain well-defined groups of psalms which were probably intended in the first instance for synagogue use, and may once have existed as an independent collection. With the exception of Ps 156, these groups (in the Heb. text) are three in number, viz. 104–106; 111–113, 116–117; and 146–150. But in the LXX a larger number of psalms is so distinguished, and the consequent grouping is more coherent, viz. 105–107; 111–119 (136–138); 146–150. In the synagogue liturgy the last-mentioned group (146–150), together with 135–136, has a well-defined place in the daily morning service, forming an integral part of the great 'Benediction of Song' (in certain parts of the early Church, at least it was customary to recite the 'Hallelujah' psalms daily).

The 'Hallel' (Ps 118–118), which forms a liturgical unit in the synagogue liturgy, is the most complete example of a 'Hallelujah' psalm in collected form. (In the LXX, notice all the individual psalms of this group are head 'Alleluia'.)

All the psalms referred to exhibit unmistakable marks of late composition, which would accord with their distinctively synagogue character. Like other Jewish liturgical terms (e.g. 'Amen'), 'Hallelujah' passed from the OT to the NT (cf. Rev 19:5), from the Jewish to the Christian Church (cf. esp. the early liturgies), HALLOHESH

An individual or a family mentioned in connection with the repairing of the wall (Neh 3:9) and the sealing of the covenant (10:4).

HALLOW.—To 'hallow' is either 'to make holy' or 'to regard as holy.' Both meanings are very old. Thus Wyclif translates Jn 17:‘Halwe thou hem in treuith,' and Dt 32:17 ‘Ye halwise not me among the sons of Yrew' (LXX ‘gared'). 'Ye are Lord's' (Ps 95:4). In the O.T. the only places where 'hallow' occurs in the LXX, the meaning is 'regard as sacred.' All the Eng. versions have 'hallowed' in these verses except the Rheims (R. S. V.), which has here 'sanctified;' and in the modern version the change has been made to 'hallowed.'

HALT.—This Eng. word is used (1) literally, as a verb 'to be lamed, to limp,' or as an adjective, 'lame.' Cf. Tindal's tr. of Mt 11:‘The blind se, the halt, the lepers are cleas'd.' (2) figuratively 'to stumble, fail,' as Jer 19:9 'All my bowed words watched for my halting.' From this comes the meaning (3) 'to be undecidable, wavering.' 1 K 1:18 ‘How long halt [hit. 'limp,' as unequal legs ye'] between two opinions?' The Revisers have introduced (4) the mod. meaning 'to stop.' Is 1:22 ‘This very day shall he halt at Ab.'

HAM.—The original (7) use of the name as = Egypt appears in Ps 78:1 105:105. 106. It has been derived from an Egyptian word kem, 'black,' in allusion to the dark soil of Egypt as compared with the desert sands (but see HAM-LAND OF). Ham came to be considered the eponymous ancestor of a number of other peoples, supposed to have been connected with Egypt (Gn 10:8-29). His sons (v.9) are the peoples most closely connected ethnically or politically. Great division is caused by the fusion (in J) of two quite distinct traditions in Gn 9. 10. (1.) Noah and his family being the sole survivors of the Flood, the whole earth was populated by his descendants (9:18), and the three sons the whole of the known world—the middle, the southern, and the northern portions respectively (ch. 10). (II.) Canaan, and not Ham, appears to be Noah's son, for it is he who is cursed (9:25). The purpose of the story is to explain the subjugation of the people represented under the name 'Canaan' to the people represented under the names 'Shem' and 'Japheth.' To combine these two traditions a redactor has added the words, 'and Ham is the father of Canaan in v.14, and Ham the father of in v.15. (1.) The peoples connected, geographically, with Ham include Egypt (as the 'lands of Egypt'), the Uapps (Cush), the Japheth (Put), and Canaan (see CANAANITES). The descendants of these four respectively are so described in most cases from their geographical position, but at least one nation, the Caphtorim, from its political connexion with Egypt (see Driver on Gen 10:19). (II.) In the second tradition Shem, Japheth, and Canaan stand—not for large divisions of the world, but—for certain much smaller divisions within the limits of Palestine. 'Shem' evidently stands for the Hebrews, or for some portion of them (see 10:6 in the other tradition), and 'Japheth' for some unknown portion of the population of Palestine who dwelt 'in the tents of Shem' (9:13), i.e. in close conjunction with the Hebrews. 'Canaan' (in the other tradition that inhabited the coast lands on the W., and the Arabah on the S.E. But there is no evidence that the peoples in these districts were ever in complete subjection to the Hebrews. 'Canaan' (in the other tradition that inhabited the coast lands on the W., and the Arabah on the S.E. But there is no evidence that the peoples in these districts were ever in complete subjection to the Hebrews. 'Canaan' (in the other tradition that inhabited the coast lands on the W., and the Arabah on the S.E. But there is no evidence that the peoples in these districts were ever in complete subjection to the Hebrews.)

HAMMEDATHA

Hammedatha, a city near the Dead Sea, which appears in the names of the kings of Judah and Israel. It is also mentioned in Is 15:5 (where it is called Zoab) and in Jer 48:19 (where it is called Zoab). It was a city of importance in the time of David and Solomon, and was probably the capital of the tribe of Judah. It is also mentioned in connection with the campaign of Sennacherib against the Jews (2 Chr 32:9). It was captured by the Babylonians in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kgs 25:20), and was eventually destroyed by the Persians (2 Esdr 1:5). It was rebuilt by Alexander the Great, and was a center of Jewish learning and culture. It is also mentioned in connection with the campaign of Sennacherib against the Jews (2 Chr 32:9). It was captured by the Babylonians in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kgs 25:20), and was eventually destroyed by the Persians (2 Esdr 1:5). It was rebuilt by Alexander the Great, and was a center of Jewish learning and culture.
HAMMELECH

name is probably Persian; possibly the etymology is māh = "moon" = "date" = "given."

HAMMELECH occurs as a proper name in AV and RVm of Jer 36:2, but there is little doubt that the rendering ought to be "the king," as in RV and AVm.

HAMAN—See Acts and Crafts, §§ 1, 2, 3.

HAMPHAHK (AV Miphaak), Neh 3:4.—See Jerusalem, II, 4, and Mephaek.

HAMMOLCHEH ('the queen').—The daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch 7:21).

HAMMON ('hot spring').—1. A town in Naphtali (1 Ch 6:8), probably identical with Hammath (wh. see). 2. A branch of the Ishmaelites (Gen 25:12, 21), perhaps identified with Zambatu and Zambatu (1 Ch 1:20). Its site is uncertain.

HAMMOTH-DOR.—A Levitical city in Naphtali (Jos 21:31), probably identical with Hammath (wh. see).

HAMMUEL.—A Simeonite of the family of Shaul (Ch 49).

HAMMURABI.—See Assyria and Babylonia, II, 1 (b).

HAMONAH ('multitude').—The name of a city to be built in commemoration of the defeat of Gog (Ezk 39:11).

HAMON-GOG ('Gog's multitude').—The name to be given to the valley (outside the Holy Land) where Gog and all his multitude are to be buried (Ezk 39:11-13).

HAMOR ('he-ass').—Some think that the name points to a totem clan, such as there is reason to believe existed among the early Canaanites, and other Semitic peoples. He is the "father of Shechem" (Gen 34:32, 34, 35:24, Jg 9:4); but in the first and last two of these passages, the inhabitants of Shechem are called "the sons of Hamor" and "the men of Hamor." It would seem, therefore, that Hamor is not to be considered an historical individual, but the eponymous ancestor of the Hamorites [cf. "the sons of Heth"—the Hittites, Gen 23:7], who were a branch of the Hivites (Gen 9:20); and "the father of Shechem" means the founder of the place Shechem (cf. 1 Ch 2:25).

Gen 34 contains a composite narrative. According to P (vv. 1, 2, 1-8, 10-23), 21-22, 24 (pssps 7:7-29), Hamor negotiates with Jacob and his sons for the marriage of Shechem and Dinah, with the object of amalgamating the two peoples; circumcision is imposed by the sons of Jacob upon the whole Hamorite tribe, and then they attack the city, slaying all the males and carrying off the whole of the spoil. In the remaining verses of the chapter, the earlier narrative (J) pictures a much smaller number of the tribe, in which Shechem loves, and is ready to marry, Dinah; he only is circumcised, and he and Hamor alone are slain by Simeon and Levi—an incident to which Gn 49:7-11 appears to refer. It is probable that not only Hamor, but also Dinah, Simeon, and Levi, stand for tribes or communities. See, further, under these names.

There is a curious fusion of traditions in Ac 7:9, where Jacob 'and our fathers' are said to have been 'laid in the tomb which Abraham bought for a money price from the sons of Emmim in Shechem.' Abraham bought a tomb in Machpelah, not in Shechem (Gn 23:17-20), and Jacob was buried in it (50:12-13). Of the latter's sons, Joseph alone is related in the O.T. to have been buried in the tomb bought from the sons of Hamor (Jos 24:32).

A. H. M. NEVILLE.

HAMAN (1 Ch 4:14).—An Edomite. In Gn 36:38 the name is more correctly given as Heman.

HAMUL ('spared').—A son of Peres and grandson of Judah (Gn 46:1 = 1 Ch 2:3, Nu 26:1). The gentile Hamutals occurs in Nu 26:1.

HAMUTAL (2 K 23:16 and 24:1, Jer 52:2).—Mother of the kings Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, sons of Josiah.

HAMAN.—Jeremiah, cousin of his uncle Shallum (Jer 32:6, 8, 8, 11, 12).

HANAN.—1. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in reading and explaining the Law to the people ( Neh 8:8; in 1 Es 9:38, Ananias); probably the same as the signatory to the covenant (10:4). 2. The son of Zacur the son of Mattaniah, one of the four treasurers appointed by Neh. over the storehouses in which the tithes were kept (Neh 13:13). 3. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:3). 4. The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:39, 9:8). 5. One of the Davidic princes (1 Ch 11:4). 6. The son of Igdaliah. His sons had a chamber in the Temple (Jer 35:7). 7. The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:8, Neh 7:7); called Anan in 1 Es 9:3. 8. Two of 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:2-3).

HANANEL ('El is gracious').—The name of a tower on the wall of Jerusalem. It is four times mentioned in OT; in Neh 3 in connexion with the repairing, and in 12:1 in conjunction with the dedication, of the walls; in Jer 31:18 and Zec 14:18 as a boundary of the restored and glorified Jerusalem. In both the passages in Neh. it is coupled with the tower of Hananel, and some have supposed it to be identical with the latter.

HANANI.—1. A brother, or more prob. near kinsman, of Neh., who brought tidings to Susa of the distressed condition of the Jews in Pal. (Neh 1:1). Under Neh. he was made one of the governors of Jerusalem (7:7). 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25:9). 3. The father of Jehu the seer (1 K 19:3). Hanani reproved Asa for entering into alliance with Syria, and the angry king cast him into prison (2 Ch 16:7). 4. A priest of the sons of Immer who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:2); called Ananias in 1 Es 9:3. 5. A chief musician mentioned in conjunction with the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 12:3).

HANANIAH ('Jahweh has been gracious').—1. One of the sons of Shashak, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:25). 2. One of the sons of Heman, who could 'prophesy with harps, with psalteries, and with cymbals' (1 Ch 25:19), though their special function seems to have been the use of the horn (v. 4-9). 3. One of king Uzziah's captains (2 Ch 26:17). 4. The 'lying prophet,' son of Azur the prophet, a Gibeonite, who was condemned by Jeremiah, in the reign of Zedekiah, for prophesying falsely. The prophecy of Hananiah was to the effect that king Jeconiah and the captives in Babylon would all return in two years' time, bringing back with them the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had carried away (cf. Dn 1:1-2). He expressed this in symbolic fashion by taking the 'bar' (cf. Jer 27) from Jeremiah's neck and breaking it, with the words, 'Thus saith the Lord: Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon within two full years from off the neck of all the nations' (Jer 28:1).

In reply Jeremiah declares this prophecy to be false, and that because Hananiah has made the people to trust in a lie, he will die within the year. The words of Jeremiah come to pass: Hananiah dies in the seventh month (v. 11). 5. Father of Zedekiah, one of the princes of Judah (Jer 36:15). 6. Grandfather of Irshai, who assisted Jeremiah (52:7). 7. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:1). 8. A priest, head of the house of Jeremiah, who returned with Nehemiah from Babylon (Neh 12:5). 9. Governor of the castle, who, together with Hanani, was appointed by Nehemiah to the charge over Jerusalem (Neh 7:7). 10. The friend of Daniel, who received the name Shadrach from the 'princes of the eunuchs' (Dn 1:7). Several others also bear this name, but there are not of importance (see Ezr 10:9, Neh 10:24, 12:4; these are not necessarily all different people).

HAND—1. The right hand (Heb. yad, 'the open hand,' kaph, 'the closed hand,' and Gr. cheir, 'hand'). Sometimes it is idiomatic, e.g. 'at hand' (Is 19:2, etc., Heb. qāḏāh, Mt 26:13 etc., Gr. engys, lit. 'near'). In determining the directions in the Orient, the face is turned to the east, not to the north as with us. So it comes that qhamid, 'right hand,' and semil, 'left hand,' like the Arab, yasmin and simul, respectively 'south' and 'north.'

In prayer the hands were stretched up (Ex 17:11, 14). To lay the hand to God signified a vow (Gn 14:24). To put the hand under the thigh of one to whom a vow was made, constituted a binding form of oath (Gn 24:47f). Blessing was conveyed by laying hands upon the head (Gn 48:3). But probably grew the practice in ordinance—Laying on of hands. To 'fill the hand' (Ex 28:24 etc.) was to set apart to the priesthood. Sin was supposed to be conveyed to the head of the victim for sacrifice (Ex 29:34, Lev 17:9). The left hand bears the (Ly 16:2 etc.), by laying on of the priest's hands. Washing the hands was a declaration of innocence (Dt 21:1, Ps 26:6, Mt 27:27 etc.). Clean hands were a symbol of a righteous life (Job 29:12, Ps 133:2 etc.). To strike hands halts (Pr 6:19). Folded hands betoken slumber (Pr 24:25). Left-handedness seems to have been common among the Benjamites (Jg 20:14), and once it was of signal service (Jg 3:19).

The hand of the Lord signifies the Divine Inspiration (Ezk 3:17 etc.). 'The good hand of the Lord' and 'my Father's hand' (Jn 10:9, 16), denote the providential, preserving care of God.

It appears that certain marks or cuttings in the hand were a hundred of what deity one served (Is 44:7). The mark of the beast upon their hand (Rev 13:16) is probably an allusion to this custom. See CUTTING IN THE FLESH, AND MARKS.

In court the accuser stands on the right hand (Ps 109:7, 8), while the defendant, with the shield, leaving the right side exposed in battle, the protector, therefore, stands on the right hand (Ps 109:7 etc.). Perhaps on this account honour attaches to the right hand, the place given to the 29th favoured guest. The seat of the Redeemer's glory is at the right hand of God (Ps 110, Lk 22:69, Re 5:6 etc.).

Thrice (1 Sm 15:2, 2 Sm 18:4, Is 9:6) ptf clearly means 'memorial' or 'memorial,' probably a stone block or pillar; a hand may have been carved upon it, but this is uncertain.

W. EWING.

HANDBREADTH.—See Weights and Measures.

HANGERS.—See Armoury Arms, § 1.

HANES is associated with Zaan in a difficult context, Is 30:6. Some would place it in Lower Egypt, with Aneks in Herodotus, and Khamsh in the annals of Ashurbanipal; but there can be little doubt that it is the Egyptian Hnhs (Herculea Magna) on the west side of the Nile, just south of the Fayyum. Hnhs was apparently the home of the family from which the 22nd Dyn. arose, and the scanty documents of succeeding dynasties show it to have been of great importance: in the 26th and 26th Dyns. (c. b.c. 715-660) the standard silver of Egypt was specified specifically that of the treasury of Harshefa, the ram-headed god of Hnhs, and during the long reign of Psammetichus r. (c. 660-610) Hnhs was the centre of government for the whole of Upper Egypt. The LXX does not recognize the name of the city, and shows a wide divergence of reading: 'for there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers.'

HAP.—HAPLY.—The old word 'hap,' which means chance, is found in Ru 2:9; 'her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging to Boaz.' The Heb. is literally 'her chance-chanced' (AVm 'her hap happened'). 'Haply' is by hap. 'Hapily' is the same word under a different spelling, and had formerly the same meaning, though it now means 'by good luck.' In AV HAPLY the home of the 'haply,' but in the first edition it was 'hapily' in 2 Co 9:6 'Last haply if they of Macedonia come with mee, and find you unprepared, wee (that wee say not, you) should bee ashamed in this same confident boasting.'

HAPPHIZZEH.—The head of the 18th course of priests (1 Ch 24:19).

HARA.—Mentioned in 1 Ch 5:23 as one of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria. But in the corresponding accounts (2 K 17:22–23) Hara is not mentioned, and most probably the name 'Hara' in 1 Ch 5:23 is due to a corruption of the text. There is much to be said for the suggestion that the original text read hârê Madai, 'mountains of Media,' corresponding to the cities of Media of the parallel passages (LXX 'the Median mountains'); and that Madai dropped out of the text, and hârê, 'mountains of,' was changed to the proper name Hara.

L. W. KING.

HARADA.—A station in the journeys of the Israelites mentioned only in Nu 33:27. It has not been identified.

HARAN.—1. Son of Terah, younger brother of Abram. He was born of the Lot (Gn 11:32; P), also father of Milcah and Iscah, v.19 (J). 2. A Gereshite Levite (1 Ch 23:12).

HARAN.—A city in the N.W. of Mesopotamia, marked by the modern village of Harran, situated on the Bébîkh, a tributary of the Euphrates and about nine hours' ride S.E. of Edessa (Urfa). Terah and his son Abram and his family dwelt there on their way from Ur of the Chaldees to Caanana (Gn 11:31–32: 4; cf. Ac 7:2), and Terah died there (Gn 11:32; cf. Ac 7:4). Nahor, Abram's brother, settled there; hence it is called 'the city of Nahor' in the story of Isaac and Jacob (cf. Gn 24:1–25:10). Its position on one of the main trade-routes between Babylonia and the Mediterranean coast rendered it commercially of great importance (cf. Ezk 27:29). It was the chief seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god, and the frequent reference to the city in the Assyrian inscriptions have to do mainly with the worship of this deity and the restoration of his temple. It is probably that Haran rebelled along with the city of Ashur in B.C. 763, and a reference to its subsequent capture and subsequent occupation of the revolt may be seen in 2 K 19:35; Sargon later on restored the ancient religious privileges of which the city had been deprived. The worship of the moon-god at Haran appears to have long survived the introduction of Christianity.

L. W. KING.

HARARE.—An epithet of doubtful meaning (possibly 'mountain-dweller,' but more probably 'native of an unknown Harar') applied to two of David's heroes. 1. Shamshah the son of Age (2 S 23:16; 1 Ch 11:25); his counterpart probably Shammash. 2. Ahlam the son of Sharah (2 S 23:27; RV Ararat), 1 Ch 11:25).

HARBONA (Est 1:9) or HARBONAH (7:2).—The third of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. It was on his suggestion that Haman was hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai.

HARD.—Besides other meanings which are still in use, 'hard' sometimes means close: Jg 9:23; 'And Abimelech... went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire; and my soul followeth hard after thee,' Ac 18:28; 'Justus... whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' Cf. Job 17:19; Coverdale, 'I am hard at deathes dore.'

Harp is used in Jt 11:16 for courage; 'the Medes were daunted at her hardiness' (RV 'boldness').

Hardly means either 'harshly,' as Gn 10:9 'Sarai dealt hardly with her,' or 'with difficulty,' as Ex 13:14 'Pharaoh would hardly let us go'; Mt 19:3 'a rich man should hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven'; Lk 9:51 'bruising him, hardly departeth from him;' Ac 27:21 'And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens.' So Adams (II Peter 1) 'He that has done evil once, shall more hardly resist it at the next assault.'

HARDNESS for modern 'hardship' occurs in 2 Ti 2:9 'endure hardness as a good soldier.' Cf. Shakespeare, Cymb. iii. vi. 21—

'Hardeness ever Of hardiness is mother.'

HARDENING.—Both in the OT (1 S 6:9) and in the NT (Ro 9:19) Pharaoh's hardening is regarded as typical. In Exodus, two explanations are given of his stubbornness: (1) 'Pharaoh hardened his heart' (8:15); (2) 'the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh' (9:12). The former statement recognizes man's moral responsibility, and is in accord with the exhortation, 'Harden not your hearts' (Ps 95:5, He 3:5). To the latter statement St. Paul confines his thought when he insists on the sovereignty of God as manifested in the election of those who are to believe (Ro 9:16), but has vindicated the absolute freedom of the Divine action, the Apostle proceeds to show that the Divine choice is neither arbitrary nor unjust. The difficulty involved in combining the two elements is philosophically treated by him. 'The attempt to understand the relation between the human will and the Divine seems to lead of necessity to an antinomy which thought has not as yet succeeded in transcending' (Denney, EGT ii. 666). The same Divine action softens the heart of him who repents and finds mercy, but hardens the heart of him who obstinately refuses to give heed to the Divine call. 'The sweet persuasion of His voice respects thy sanctity of will.' The RV rightly renders Mt 23:26 'being grieved at the hardening of their heart; grief is the permanent attitude of the Saviour towards all in whom there is any sign of this 'process of moral ossification which makes men insensible to spiritual truths' (cf. Jn 12:43).

HARE (Lv 11:14).—Four species of hare are known in Palestine, of which the commonest is the Lepus syriacus. The hare does not really 'chew the cud,' though, like the coney, it appears to do so; it was, however, unclean because it did not 'divide the hoof.' Hares are to-day eaten by the Arabs.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HAREPH.—A Judahite chief (1 Ch 23:23).

HARBAHIAH.—Father of Uzziah, a goldsmith who repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 2:18).

HARHAS.—Ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Ruldah the prophetess (2 K 22:19); called Hasrah in 2 Ch 34:27.

HARHUR.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2:29, Neh 7:52); called in 1 Esd 5:8 Azar.

HARIM.—1. A lay family which appears in the list of the returning exiles (Ezr 2:26; Neh 7:70); of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:19); and of those who signed the covenant (Neh 10:11). 2. A priestly family in the same lists (Ezr 2:26; Neh 7:70 = 1 Esd 5:12 Harim; Ezr 10:9, Neh 10:9). The name is found also among 'the priests and Levites that went up with Zerubbabel' (Neh 12:4, where it is mistranslated Rehum); among the heads of priestly families in the days of Josiah (Neh 12:19); and as the third of the 24 courses (1 Ch 24). To which family Malchijah the son of Harim, one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3:1), belonged cannot be determined.

HARIPH.—A family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:74) and signed the covenant (Ezr 2:28; 8:1; 1 Esd 5:16 Arispurith; one of David's companions in 1 Ch 12:18 is termed a Haruphite (Kethibh), or Harphite (Qeré). The latter reading, if correct, perhaps points to a connexion with Hariph.

HARLOT (Heb. zonath, ἴσακάθανονλυθήθη [lit. 'strange woman'], qedshah, Gr. pornos) in EV denotes unchaste women, particularly those devoted to immoral services in idol sanctuaries, or given to a dissolute life for gain.

We find evidence of their existence in very early times (Gn 38). From the name 'strange woman' in Pr 6th-23rd (cf. K 111), we may perhaps infer that in later times they were chiefly foreigners. By songs (Is 24th) and insinuating arts (Pr 6th etc.) they captivated the unwary. They acted also as decoys to the debts of robbers and,侨 desers (Is 57th etc.). Wealth was lavished upon them (Ezk 15th, 19 23th etc.; cf. Lk 15th). Apart from breaches of the marriage vows, immoral relations between the sexes were deemed venial (Dt 23th). A man might not compel his daughter to sin (Lv 19th), but apparently she was free herself to take that way. Children of harlots were practical outlaws (Dt 23th, Jg 11th, Jn 21st) and, in NT times the harlot lived under social ban (Mt 21st etc.).

The picture takes a darker hue when we remember that in ancient Syria the reproductive forces of nature were defined, and worshipped in grossly immoral rites. Both men and women prostituted themselves in the service of the gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were practically gigantic brothels, legalized by the sanctions of religion. The appeal made to the baser passions of the Israelites was all too successful (Am 2th, Hos 4th etc.), and it is grimly significant that the prophets designate apostasy and declension by 'whoredom.' There were therefore special reasons for the exceptional law regarding the priest's daughter (Lv 21st). Religious prostitution was prohibited in Israel (Dt 22th), and all gain from the unholy calling as Temple revenue was spurned (see Driver, Deut., in loc.). The pure religion of 3rd was delivered from this peril only by the stern discipline of the Ex. The Canaanite picture shows the early type, e.g. in Greece and Asia Minor; hence such passages as Ro 14th, 1 Co 6th, Gal 5th etc., and the decree of the Apostolic Council (Ac 15th, 19).

HAR-MAGEDON.—The name of the place in which, according to Rev 18th (AV Armageddon), the kings of the lower world are to be gathered together by the Dragon, the Beast, and the false prophet, to make war upon God. The most generally accepted location makes this to be the mountains of Megiddo, that is to say, those surrounding the plain of Megiddo, in which so many great battles of the past were fought. The difficulty with this explanation is that one would expect the plain rather than the mountains to be chosen as a battle-field. Another explanation finds in the word a survival of the name of the place in which the gods of Babylonia were believed to have defeated the dragon Tiāmat and the other evil spirits. Such a view, however, compels a series of highly speculative corrections of the text, as well as various critical suppositions regarding the structure of the Book of Revelation. While the reference is apocalyptic, it seems probable on the whole that the word perpetuates Megiddo as the synonym of the battle-field, whether above the earth, or in the underworld—on which the final victory over evil was to be won.

SHAI'EL MATTHEWS.

HARMON.—Am 4th (RV, AV 'the palace'). No place of the name of Harmon is known. The text appears to be hopelessly corrupt.

HARMONIES OF THE GOSPELS.—The beginnings of works of this class go back to very early days. Tatian's Diatessaron (2nd cent.) is of the nature of a Gospel Harmony. The Sections of Ammonius (3rd cent.) arrange the Gospels in four parallel columns. The Sections and Canons of Eusebius (4th cent.) develop still further the plan of Ammonius, enabling the reader to discover at a glance the parallel passages in the Gospels. In the 5th cent. Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria, besides adopting the division into sections, applied the method of numbered lines to the Acts and Epistles.

The following are the principal modern Harmonies:

A. Wright, Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek and English Readings and Critical Notes (Macmillan, 1903); E., Synopsis der drei ersten Evangelien (Tübingen, 1906); Schmied, Synopsis evangelica, etc. E. Evangelisms chronologic, etc. We may perhaps regard as the most probable the former, which was published in Leipzig, 1891; C. C. Banks, Harmony of the Gospels in the words of the RV (Cambridge, 1901).

HARNESS.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7th).

HARROTH, HARM.—See, generally, ARMOUR, which RV substitutes in most places for AV 'harness.' Similarly 'harnessed' (Es 13th) becomes 'armed,' and the 'well-harnessed' camp of 1 Mac 4th becomes 'fortified.' For the 'joints of the harness' of 2 K 22th RVM substitutes the 'lower armour and the breastplate' of the former being probably 'the tasset or jointed appendages of the cuirass, covering the abdomen' (Skinner, Cent. Bible, in loc.). The only passage where 'harness' as a verb has its modern signification is Jer 46th 'harness the horses,' the verb in the original being that used in Gn 46th, Ex 14th etc. for yoking the horses to the chariot.

J. S. BANKS.

HARNEPHER.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7th).

HARNESS.—See, generally, ARMOUR, which RV substitutes in most places for AV 'harness.' Similarly 'harnessed' (Es 13th) becomes 'armed,' and the 'well-harnessed' camp of 1 Mac 4th becomes 'fortified.' For the 'joints of the harness' of 2 K 22th RVM substitutes the 'lower armour and the breastplate,' the former being probably 'the tasset or jointed appendages of the cuirass, covering the abdomen' (Skinner, Cent. Bible, in loc.). The only passage where 'harness' as a verb has its modern signification is Jer 46th 'harness the horses,' the verb in the original being that used in Gn 46th, Ex 14th etc. for yoking the horses to the chariot.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HAROD.—A spring, not a well as in AV, near the mountains of Gilboa (wh. sée), where Gideon tested his men (Jg 7th) and which was probably the site of Saul's camp before his fatal battle with the Philistines (1 S 29th).

It has been very generally identified with the copious 'Ain Jalud in the Vale of Jezreel, E. of Zer'in. The water rises in a natural cavern and spreads itself out into a considerable pool, partially artificial, before descending the valley. It is one of the most beautiful and peaceful fountains in Palestine, and one that must always have been taken into account in military movements in the neighbourhood. The 'fountain in Jezreel' (1 S 29th) may have been the 'Ain el-Majrit just below Zer'in (Jezreel): but this and another neighbouring spring are of insignificant size compared with 'Ain Jalud.

E. W. G. MANBERMAN.

HARODITE.—A designation applied in 2 S 23th to two of David's heroes, Shammah and Elike. The second is wanting in LXX and in the parallel list in 1 Ch 11th. In the latter passage, by a common scribal error 'the Harodite' has been transformed into 'the Harorite.' 'The Harodite' was probably a native of 'Ain-harod (Jalud), Je 7th.

HAROEI ('the seer').—A Judahite (1 Ch 20th). Perhaps the name should be corrected to Reiah (cf. 1 Ch 4th).

HARORITE.—See Harodite.

HAROSHETH.—A place mentioned only in the account of the flight with Sisera (Jg 5th). From it Sisera advanced, and thither he fled. It has been identified with the modern Tell el-Harathiyeh, which is 16 miles N.N.W. from Megiddo. But this is uncertain; nor do we know why the descriptive epithet 'of the Gentiles' is added.

W. F. COMAN.

HARP.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HARROW.—In 2 S 12th—a passage which had become corrupt before the date of 1 Ch 20th—as rendered in EV, David is represented as torturing the Ammonites under harrows of iron. The true text and rendering, however, have reference to ploughs of forced labour (see RVM), and the 'harrows' become 'picks of iron' or some similar instrument.

The Heb. verb tr. 'harrow' in Job 39th is elsewhere correctly rendered 'break the clods' ( Hos 10th, also Is 25th, but Amer. RV has here 'harrow'). In Hastings' DB ii. 306 several reasons were given for rejecting the universal modern rendering of the original by 'harrow.' This conclusion has since been confirmed.
HARSHA

by the discovery of the original Hebrew of Sir 28:2 where 'who settheth his mind to' "harrow' in the furrows' would be an absurd rendering. There is no evidence that the Hebrews at any time made use of an implement corresponding to our harrow. Stiff soil was broken up by the plough or the mattock. Cf. Agriculture, § 1.
A. R. S. KENNEDY.

Neh 7:1); attested in 1 Es 3:9 Chares.

HARSHA.—Eponym of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2:3; Neh 7:1); attested in 1 Es 3:9 Chares.

HATIL.—Eponym of a family of 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Est 2:2; Neh 7:4); attested in 1 Es 5:2
Agia.

HATIL.—Eponym of a family of 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Est 2:2; Neh 7:4); attested in 1 Es 5:2
Agia.

to be distinguished from the priestly party who had come under the influence of Hellenism. The Hasideans were devoted to the Law, and refused to compromise in any way with the Hellenizing policy enforced by Antiochus IV. They furnished the martyrs of the persecution under that monarch. Strictly speaking, they were not a political party, and probably lived in the smaller Jewish towns, as well as in Jerusalem.
They joined with Mattathias in his revolt against the Syrians, but were not interested in the political outcome of the struggle, except as it gave them the right to worship Jehovah according to the Torah. After Judas had cleansed the Temple, they separated themselves from the Hammonon or Maccabean party, and united with them only temporarily, when they found that under Alcimus the Temple worship was again threatened.
Their defection from Judas was largely the cause of his downfall.

Although their precise relation to the Scribal movement cannot be stated, because of lack of data, it is clear that the Hasideans must have included all the orthodox scribes and were devotees to the growing Oral Law. They were thus the forerunners of the Pharisees and probably of the Essenes, which latter party, although differentiating from them in some animal sacrifice, probably preserved their name. Both the Pharisees and the Essenes represented a further development of views and practices which the Hasideans embodied in germ.

SHAILER MATTHEWS.
HATTUSH.—1. A priestly family that went up with Zerubbabel (Neh 12) and signed the covenant (Neh 10).

2. A descendent of David, who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8) (read with 1 Es 9 of the sons of David; Hattush the son of Shecaniah); see also 1 Ch 23 (but if we accept the LXX reading here, a younger Hattush must be meant). In 1 Es. the name is Atus.

3. A builder at the wall of Jerusalem ( Neh 9).

HAUNT.—In older English 'haunt' conveyed no reproach, but meant simply to spend time in or frequent a place. Thus Tindale reads Jn 3:2 'After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the Jewes londe, and ther he haunted with them and baptized.' So 1 S 30, 1 Es 26, and the subst. in 'I S 29' know and see his place where his haunt is.

HAURAN.—A man 'far gone in years and no less in madness,' who endeavoured to suppress a tumult in Jerusalem provoked by the sacrileges of Lysimachus, brother of the apostate high priest Menelaus (2 Mac 4).

HAURAN (hollow land).—The district S.E. from Mt. Hermon; in particular the fertile basin, about 50 miles square and 2000 feet above sea-level, between the Jaudém and Lefld. Only in Ezek 14:13 is the name mentioned, and there given as the ideal border, Canaan on the east. The modern Arabs call essentially the same district d-Hauran. The name occurs also in the ancient inscriptions of Assur. In Greek-Roman times the same general region was known as Assurat, it was bounded on the N. by Trachonitis, and on the N.W. by Gaulanitis and Batanea. All these districts belonged to Herod the Great. Upon his death they fell to Philip (Lk 4). Trogodytes doubtless once occupied the same portion; it is now inhabited by Huzuz. The entire territory is to-day practically treeless.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

HAVALAH.—A son of Cush according to Gn 10, 1 Ch 1, of Joktan according to Gn 10, 1 Ch 1. The river Pison (see EDEN [GARDEN OF]) is said to compass the land of Havalah (Gn 2:11), and it formed one of the limits of the region occupied by the sons of Ishmael (Gn 25) in which also Saul emote the Amalekites (1 S 15). It has been suggested that it formed the N.E. part of the Syrian desert, but it may with greater probability be identified with central and N.E. Arabia.

L. W. KING.

HAVVOTH-JAIR.—The precise meaning of H Havveth is uncertain, but it is taken usually to mean 'tent-villages.' In Nu 32 these villages are assigned to the tribe of Gad in Dt 34 to the tribe of Reuben. The difficulty is caused by the attempt of the editors in the last two passages to harmonize the reference in Numbers with the tradition about the sixty fortresses of 1 K 48. There is no doubt that the name of Judges and the Jair of Judges are identical.

W. F. COBB.

HAWK.—Some eighteen species of hawk are known to exist in Palestine. The common kestrel (Falco tinnunculus) and the sparrow-hawk (Aeceptor nisus) are the commonest. The traveller through the land sees them everywhere. Hawks were 'unclean' birds (Lv 11, Dt 14). The migratory habits of many species of Palestine hawks are referred to in Job 39.

E. W. G. MASTERNER.

HAY.—See GRAIN.

HAZAEL usurped the throne of Syria (c. 844 B.C.) by murdering Ben-hadad 11. (Hazael's successor was probably Ben-hadad 111, the Man of the inscriptions.) The form and fragmentary character of the OT references to Hazael demand caution in drawing conclusions from them. According to 1 K 19:14, Elijah is sent to anoint Hazael king of Syria; he is regarded as Jehovah's instrument who is to punish the Baal-worshippers in Israel. The next mention of him describes how Ben-hadad, Hazael's predecessor, who is ill, sends Hazael to Elisha, to inquire whether he will recover (2 K 8); at the interview which Hazael has with the Israelite prophet, the murder of the Syrian king is arranged, and Elisha designates Hazael as his successor on the throne. Both these passages introduce Hazael somewhat abruptly; in each case the Israelite prophet goes to Damascus; and each passage has for its central point the question of Hazael's succeeding to the throne of Syria; these considerations (not to mention others) suggest that the passages come from different sources, and are dealing with two accounts of the same event.

The next mention of Hazael shows him fighting at Ramoth-gilead against the allied armies of Joram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 8, 11, 14); the narrative here breaks off to deal with other matters, and does not say what the result of the fighting was, but from 2 K 10:27, it is clear not only that Hazael was victorious then, but that he continued to be so for a number of years (see, further, 2 K 12:20, of. Am. 14); indeed, it was not until his death that the Israelites were once more able to assert themselves.

H.ZAHALAH.—A descendant of Judah (Neh 11).

HAZAR-ADDAR.—A place on the southern border of Canaan, west of Kadesh-barnea (Nu 34). It appears to be the same as Hzon of Jos 15, which in the latter passage is connected with but separated from Addar.

HAZAR-ENAZ (once Enaz; perhaps the same place mentioned in Nu 34 as the northern boundary of Israel, and in Ezek 17 as of one of the ideal boundaries. It was perhaps at the sources of the Orontes. See also HAZAR-SAITITON.

HAZAR-GADDAH.—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15).

HAZREMVAETH.—The eponym of a Joktanite clan (Gn 10 = Ch 1), described as a 'son' of Joktan, fifth in order from Shem. Its identity with the modern Hadramaut is certain. It was celebrated for its traffic in frankincense.

HAZAR-SHUAL.—A place in S. Judah (Jos 15:4 = Ch 143) of Simeon (Jos 19), re-peopled by Jews after the Captivity (Neh 11). It may be the ruin Saba on a hill E. of Beersheba.

HAZAR-SUSA (in Ch 4 Chazar-susa).—A city in Simeon (Jos 15:4 = Ch 43). The site is unknown. There is a ruin Susin, W. of Beersheba.

HAZAR-SUM.—See HAZAR-SUSA.

HAZAZON-TAMAR ('pruning of the palm,' Gn 14).—It is identified with Liddi (Ch 20). The name is preserved in Waddy Hasazah, N. of 'Ain Jidy. Gn 14, however, seems to place it to the S.W. of the Dead Sea.

W. EWIN.

HAZEL (Gn 30:29).—See ALMOND.

HAZER-HATTICON ('the middle Hazer').—A place named among the boundaries of (ideal) Israel (Ezk 47). It is described as 'by the border of Hauran.' If the MT be correct, Hazer-hatticon is quite unknown; but there can be no reasonable doubt that we ought to emend to Hazer-enon as in vv. 17-18 and 48.

HAZERIM.—In AV a place-name, but rightly replaced by 'villages' in RV (Dt 29).

J. F. MCURDY.

HAZEROTH.—A camping-ground of Israel, the second station northward in the journey from Sinai (Nu 11:12 33:6, and probably Dt 11). It is usually identified with the beautiful wady of 'Ain el-Khadrah, about 30 miles north-east of Jebel Musa.

J. F. MCURDY.

HAZIEL.—A Gerahomite Levite (1 Ch 23).

HAZO.—The eponym of a Nahorite clan (Gn 22), it is no doubt identical with Haz, which along with Bazi is mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon.

HAZOR.—1. The city of Jabin (Jos 11 etc.), in Naphtali (Jos 19), S. of Kadesh (1 Mac 11).

HAZOR-HADATTAH. —The text (Jos 15:28) is not beyond suspicion. If it is correct, the name may mean 'new Hazor.' The place was in the Negeb of Judah, but the site is unknown.

HAZZZELEPONI.—A female name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4:9).

HEAD.—The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 5th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

THE.—Not the head but the heart was regarded as the seat of intellect; it was, however, the seat of life, and was naturally held in bondage. Hence phrases such as 'keeper of my head' (1 S 28:2; cf. Ps 140:7), 'sweating by the head' (Mt 26:41), and the metaphorical use, common to languages, of 'chief'—i.e. to Dt 28:1, 'find head and tail as a proverbial expression. Christ is the head of the Church (Eph 4:12, Col 1:18, etc.), as man is of the woman (Eph 5:22).

To lift up the head is to grant success (Ps 27:110, Gr. 41:14, where there is an obvious parallelism in v.19). The head or the head was a sign of mourning (2 S 13:5, Jer 22:7); so dust or ashes (2 S 1:1, La 2:9); or covering the head (2 S 14:13, Jer 14). On the other hand, to uncover the head, i.e. to loose the turban and leave the hair in disarray, was also a sign of mourning (see AV and RVm, Lv 19:12, Ezek 24:11). Similarly shaving the head, a common practice in the East (Job 1:19, Is 5:22, Ezek 7:4, Am 6:2); it was forbidden to priests (Lv 21:15), and, in special forms, to all Israelites (19:17, De 14:1). It might also mark the close of a period of mourning (Dt 21:20), or of a Nazirate's vow (Nu 8, Am 14:3), or of a Levite's purification (Nu 8). In Dt 28:29 there is a reference to the long hair of the warrior's, head. Laying hands on the head was (a) part of the symbolism of sacrifice (Lv 16:19), (b) a sign of blessing (On 48:9), (c) a sign of consecration or ordination (Nu 8:19), or (c) to De 13:20 the pupil sitting at the feet of his master. 'Head' is also used, like 'face,' as a synonym for 'self' (Ps 79); and probably Pr 25:2, Ro 12:21.

C. W. EMERIT.

HEADBAND.—In 1 K 20:24, RV this is the correct rendering of the word tr. 'ashes' in AV. Beyond the fact that it covered the wearer's forehead its form is unknown. A different word, tr. 'headbands,' is 36:8 AV, more probably represents 'sashes,' as in RV; it is used again in Jer 22:24 for the sash or girdle (EV 'attire') with which a bride 'girds' herself (Is 49:2, RV, the cognate verb).

A. E. KENNET.

HEADSTONE, more correctly 'head stone,' Zec 4:7 etc. See Corner, Corner-Stone.

HEDTIRE, TIRE.—The former is found in AV, as one word, only 1 Es 5:9, for the kid's, the stiff upright headdress of the Persian kings. In RV headire supplants AV's bonnet (wh. see). 'The tite of thine head' of Ezek 24:14 becomes in RV 'thy headire,' but 'tires' is retained in v.13. For the round tires like the marble of Is 3:14, AV, the crescent of RV, see ORNAMENTS, and for the Hebrew headire generally, see DESSO, § 5.

HEAY.—This form of the English word has been displaced by 'headstrong.' It occurs in 2 Ti 3:3, where the same AV word is used as is translated 'rashly'

(RO 'rashly') in Ac 19:18. RP. Hall (Works, ii. 108) says, 'We may offend as well in our heedleasy acceleration, as in our delay.'

HEALTH.—The word formerly covered (a) healing, (b) spiritual soundness, (c) general well-being. For (a) cf. Pr 12:13, Jer 15:5, where it represents what is usually translated 'healing.' (b) In Ps 42:5-6, 67, and frequently in Ps. Bl. Version, it stands for the word otherwise tr. 'salvation' or 'help.' In these usages it is active. (c) The wider passive use, including general well-being and health, not merely the absence of disease, is illustrated by Ac 27:19, 3 Jn 1. Cf. General Confession, 'There is no health in us.' See Medicine.

C. W. EMERIT.

HEART.—1. Instances are not wanting in the OT of the employment of this word in a physiological sense, though they are not numerous. Jacob, for example, seems to have suffered in his old age from weakness of the heart; a sudden failure of its action occurred on receipt of the unexpected but joyful news of Joseph's great prosperity (On 45:28). A similar failure proved fatal in the case of Eli, also in extreme old age (1 S 4:14; cf. the case of the exhausted king, 28:3). The effect of the rending of the heart is referred to by Hosea as well known (13:16); and although the proverb 'a sound (RVm 'tranquil') heart is the life of the flesh' (Pr 14:33) is primarily intended as a psychological truth, it is evidently borrowed from a universally recognized physiological fact (cf. 48:2). The aphorism attributed to 'the Preacher' (Ec 10:10) may be interpreted in the same way; the 'right hand' is the symbol of strength and firmness, and the left of weakness and indecision (cf. 24:10). The head or the heart, ignorant of the vital functions which the heart is called on to discharge, will be seen by their habit of using the word metaphorically as almost a synonim for the entire life (cf. Ps 22:6, 1 Th 1, where 'head' and 'heart' cover man's whole being).

2. The prepondering use of the word is, however, psychological, and it is in this way made to cover a large variety of thought. Thus it is employed to denote the centre of man's personal activities, the source whence the principles of his action derive their origin (see On 6:8, where men's evil deeds are attributed to corruption of the heart). We are, therefore, able to understand the significance of the Psalmist's penitential prayer, 'Create in me a clean heart' (Ps 51:10), and the meaning of the prophet's declaration, 'a new heart also will I give you' (Ezek 36:26). It was, however, considered to be the seat of the emotions and passions (Dt 19:4, 1 K 8:9, Is 30:22; cf. Ps 104:3, where the heart is said to be moved to gladness by the use of wine). It has a characteristic, too, in Hebrew thought which made this organ the seat of the various activities of the intellect, such as understanding (Job 34:15, 26, 1 K 4:39), purpose or determination (Ex 14:15, Is 7:5, 1 K 8:5, Is 10:2), consciousness (Pr 14:15, where, if EV be an accurate tr. of the original text, the heart is said to be conscious both of sorrow and of joy; cf. 1 S 28), imagination (cf. Lk 1, On 5:3), memory (Ps 31:15, 1 S 21:15, cf. Lk 24:31). The notions of the conscience are said to proceed from the heart (Job 27), and the counterpart of the NT expression 'branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron' (1 Ti 4:2) is found in the OT words 'I will harden his heart' (Ex 4:3; cf. Dt 2:3, Josh 11 etc.). Closely connected with the idea of conscience is that of moral character, and so we find 'a new heart' as the great desideratum of a people needing restoration to full and intimate relationship with God (Ezek 18:3; cf. Dt 9, 11). It is, therefore, in those movements which characterize repentance, placed in antithesis to outward manifestations of sorrow for sin, 'Render your heart and not your garments' (Jl 2:114).
HEARTH

on later thought (e.g. Wis 8:17, Sir 42:8 etc.), we shall be enabled to grasp the religious ideas enshrined in the teaching of the NT. In the recorded utterances of Jesus, so profoundly influenced by the ancient writings of the Jewish Church, the heart occupies a very central place. This poetic vision is reserved for those whose hearts are 'pure' (Mt 5:8; cf. 2 Ti 2:22, 1 P 1:22 RVm). The heart is compared to the soil on which seed is sown; it contains moral potentialities which spring into objective existence. This bodily vision is the outward life of the receiver (Lk 8:15; cf. however, Mk 4:21, where no mention is made of this organ; see also Mt 13:8, in which the heart is referred to, as in Lk 6:6, as the seat of the spiritual understanding). Some of the Hebrew principles and thoughts which will inevitably spring into active life, revealing its purity or its native corruption (Lk 6:4; cf. Mt 12:31, 15:14). It is thus that men's characters reveal themselves in naked reality (1 P 3). It is the infallible index of human character, but can be read only by Him who searches the hearts' (Ro 8:27; cf. 1 S 16:7, Pr 21:2, Lk 16:10). Human judgment can proceed only according to the unerring evidence tendended by the inscrutable of inner forces, for 'by their fruits ye shall know them' (Mt 7:20). The more strictly Jewish of the NT writers show the influence of OT thought in their teaching. Where we should employ the word 'conscience' at the present day, the Jews use the 'heart,' whose judgments in the moral sphere are final (Jn 5:26-7). Nor is St. Paul free from the influence of this nomenclature. He seems, in fact, to regard conscience as a function of the heart rather than as an independent moral and spiritual organ (Ro 2:14, where both words occur; cf. the quotation He 10:19). In spite of the fact that the last-named Apostle frequently employs the terms 'mind,' 'understanding,' 'thoughts,' 'heart,' etc., to express the elements of intellectual activity in man, we find him constantly reverting to the heart as discharging functions closely allied to these (cf. the eyes of the heart; Eph 1:18; see also 2 Co 4:1). In St. Paul, too, the heart is the seat of the determination or will (cf. 1 C 7:19, where 'steadfast in heart' is equivalent to will-power). In all these and similar cases, however, it will be noticed that it is man's moral nature that he has in view; and the moral and spiritual life, having its roots struck deep in his being, is appropriately conceived of as springing ultimately from the basically essential vital organ of his personal life.

HEAVEN.—If the cosmic theory of the ancient world, and of the Hebrews in particular, the earth was flat, lying between a great pit into which, when the earth departed, and the heavens above in which God and the angels dwelt, and to which it came to be thought the righteous went, after having been rescued from the dead to live for ever. It was natural to think of the heavens as concave above the earth, and resting on some foundation, possibly of pillars, set at the extreme horizon (2 S 23:4, Pr 8:28-29).

The Hebrews, like other ancient peoples, believed in a plurality of heavens (Dn 10:13), and the literature of Judaism speaks of seven. In the highest, or Aramoth, was the throne of God. Although the descriptions of these heavens varied, it would seem that it was not unusual to regard the third heaven as Paradise. It was to this that St. Paul said he had been caught up (2 Co 12:3).

This series of superimposed heavens was regarded as filled by different sorts of superhuman beings. The second heaven in later Jewish thought was regarded as the abode of evil spirits and angels awaiting punishment. The NT, however, does not commit itself to these precise speculations, although in Eph 6:12 it speaks of spiritual hosts of wickedness who dwell in heavenly places (cf. Eph 2:2). This conception of heaven as being above a flat earth underlies many religious expressions which are still current. There have been various attempts to locate heaven, as, for example, in Sirius as the central sun of our system. Some of these speculation end up residing in heaven. All such speculations, however, lie outside the region of positive knowledge, and rest ultimately on the cosmogony of pre-scientific times. They may be of value in cultivating religious emotion, but they belong to the region of speculation. The Biblical descriptions of heaven are not scientific, but symbolic. Practically all these are to be found in the Johannine Apocalypse. It was undoubtedly conceived of ecologically by the NT writers, but they maintained a great reserve in all their descriptions of the life of the redeemed. It is, however, possible to state definitely that, while they conceived of the heavenly condition as involving social relations, they did not regard it as one in which the physical organism survived. The sensuous descriptions of heaven to be found in the Jewish apocalypses and in Mohammedism are altogether excluded by the sayings of Jesus relative to marriage in the new age (Mk 12:25), and those of St. Paul relative to the 'spiritual body.' The prevailing idea of the early theologians was that of heaven as a state of the soul rather than a place, belongs likewise to the region of opinion. The degree of its probability will be determined by one's general view as to the nature of immortality.

HEAVE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

HEAVINESS.—The Eng. word 'heaviness' is used in AV in the sense of 'grief,' and in no other sense. Thus Pr 10:1 'A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.' Compare Coverdale's tr. of Ps 30:9 'hevynees maye well endure for a night, but joye commeth in the mornynge,' whence the Prayer Bk. version 'heaviness may endure for a night.'

HEBER.—1. A man of Asher (Gn 46:16, Nu 26:30, 1 Ch 7:4). The gentilic name Heberites occurs in Nu 26:30. 2. The Kenites, according to Jg 4:15, 5:7, husband of Jael. He separated himself (Jg 4:7) from his Bedouin caste of Kenites or nomad smiths, whose wanderings were confined chiefly to the south of Judah, and settled for a time near Redesh on the plain to the west of the Sea of Galilee. 3. A man of Judah (1 Ch 4:9). 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:13).

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO.—Introductory.—At first sight it is not easy to understand why this treatise has been designated as an Epistle. The only direct references by the writer to the character of his work are found in 13:19, where he styles it a 'word of exhortation' (cf. Ac 13:19, 4 Mac 19), and speaks of having written (a letter) unto you in few words (this word is more justly treated in AV than in RV). The general salutation of 13:3 is similar to what is found in most of the NT Epistles (cf. Ro 16:23, 1 Co 16:24, 2 Co 13:13, Ph 4:21, Col 4:18 etc.). At the same time, there are numerous personal references scattered throughout the writing (13:5, 14 10:6 etc.), and in most cases the author places himself on the same level with those to whom he is writing (3:16 11:10 10:6 etc.) In spite of the formalities which mark this writing as a theological essay, it is evident that the early instinct of the Church in regarding it as essentially an Epistle is substantially sound and correct (cf. Deissmann, Bible Studies, etc.). Of course, the title 'The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews' (EV) is without early textual authority. The oldest MSS have merely the superscription 'to Hebrews,' just as they have in the case of other NT epistles ('to Romans,' etc.). The only other early description to which it is necessary to refer in this place is that given to it by Tertullian, who expressly quotes it by the title of 'Barabas to the Hebrews' (de Poed. 20). It seems to have been unanimously accepted from the very earliest period that the objective of the Epiistle was correctly described by this title. Whether, however, this conclusion was based on sound traditional evidence or was merely arrived at from the internal evidence of the writer himself, we cannot say; but we may consider it certain, if the words 'to Hebrews' form any part of the original document.

The Alexandrian belief in the authorship of St. Paul, indirectly at least, dates as far back as the closing years of the 2nd century. Clem. Alex. goes so far as to suggest that St. Paul wrote it originally in Hebrew, suppressing his name being not very soon; but that St. Luke translated it for the use of those who understood only Greek. Origen, who had his own doubts as to the reliability of the local tradition, nevertheless upheld St. Paul as the ultimate author; and his influence undoubtedly had powerful weight in overcoming the Western hesitation. At all events, by the 5th century, it was almost universally held to be the production of Paul, and the literary art with which he had filled the Epistle, which had not been disturbed until the revival of learning in the 16th century, when again a wide divergence of opinion displayed itself.

Erasmus, the first to express the latent feelings of uncertainty, conjectured in a characteristically modest fashion that Clement of Rome was possibly the author. Luther, with his usual boldness and independence, hazarded the unsupported guess that its author was Apelles of Cappadocia. The Early Days of Christianity, ch. xxvii.; and Block, Introd. to NT, pp. 91 ff.). Calvin wavered between St. Luke and Clement, following, no doubt, some of the statements of Origen as to traditions current in his day (see Eusebius, HE v. 20, vi. 20; and Salmon's Introd. to NT, p. 47). The Church of Africa and Alexandria, on the contrary, have their respective positive traditions on this question. The former, as has been noted already, attributed the writing to Barnabas—a theory preserved by Tertullian alone, and destined to fall into complete oblivion until quite recent times (cf. e.g. Zahn, Einleitung, p. 110 f.).

In the midst of such conflicting evidence it is impossible to feel certain on the question of authorship; nor need we experience uneasiness on this head. The authority and inspiration of a book are not dependent upon our knowing who wrote it. In the case of our Epistle, it is the subject-matter which primarily arrests the attention. The writer is holding before the minds of his readers the Son of God, who, as man, has spoken 'at the end of these days' (1 Pet. 1:20). It seems better suited to his theme that he should retire behind the veil of anonymity; for he speaks of One who is the 'effulgence' of the Divine Glory, and the very image of his substance (Heb. 1:3).

We have thus no resource but to appeal to the writing itself in order to arrive at a decision as to the kind of person likely to have penned such a document (cf. art. 'Hebrews' in Hastings' DB, vol. II. 385a). The author seems to have a personal and an intimate knowledge of those cases which we have noted (cf. 6:10 13:18). It is quite possible, of course, that this may have been gained through the medium of others, and that he is speaking of a reputation established on previous occasions. Whenever we consider the numerous instances in which close ties of relationship betray themselves, we are forced to conclude that the writer and his readers were personally known to each other. Although it is confessed that both the author and those addressed belong to the second generation of Christians (2:19), there is, moreover, a constant use of the first person singular or plural, which seems to have been written for a personal, rather than an anonymous, audience. If so, although it is confessed that the words 'to Hebrews' form any part of the original document.

2. Destination, circumstances of readers, date.—When we ask ourselves the question: 'Who were the people addressed in this Epistle, we are again met with a confusing variety of opinion. The chief rival claimants to this honour are three: Palestine, which has the most ancient tradition in its favour, and which is countenanced by the superscription; Alexandria; and Rome, where the Epistle first seems to have been known and recognized. One conclusion may, at any rate, be accepted as certain: the addressed form a definite homogeneous body of Christians. The writer has a local Church in view, founded at a specific period, and suffering persecution at a definite date (note the tense of the verbs, 'ye were enlightened,' 'ye endured,' 10:23). He addresses this Church independently of its recognized 'leaders' (13:25). In his exhortation to patience and endurance he reminds his readers of the speedy return of Jesus, as if they had already begun to despair of the fulfillment of that promise (1:7; cf. 2 P 2:18, Rev. 2:2 Th. 2:5). He had been with them at some period prior to his writing, and he hoped once again to visit them with Timothy as his companion (2:4). Their spiritual growth was arrested just at the point where they had looked for vigour and force (5:12-18.), and this resulted in moral degeneracy (5:19-20) and, in neglect of that ordinariness which promotes such passages as Hebrew and Christian fellowship (10:25). As a Church, too, they were in a position to help their poorer brethren (6:2), and he expected them to continue that help in the future (6:3) — feature of early Christian activity which remains undeveloped in the history of the Church in Judas (cf. Ac 11:24ff., Ro 16:1, 1 Co 16:16ff. etc.). To the present writer this allusion of itself presents a formidable, if not a fatal, objection to the theory that Palestine was the destination of a veritable Epistle. This conclusion is strengthened by the elegant Greek in which the Epistle is written, and by the writer's use of the LXX instead of the Hebrew OT. On the other hand, the only direct internal evidence of a connection with the Epistle is the fact that Rome is found in the salutation, 'They of Italy salute you' (13:1). It is true that this is sufficient to establish a connection; but it would be futile to deny that it is capable of a double explanation, that the Epistle was written either from or to Italy. The former seems at first sight the more natural interpretation of the words (cf. Col 4:17) and we are not surprised to find such scholars as Deissmann and Ehrman expressing a belief that our author here discloses the place from which he writes. Indeed, on the supposition that 'they of Italy' were the writer's companions who were absent with him when at Rome, the words do not seem to be a felicitous method of expressing their regards. It would be natural to mention some at least of their names in sending greetings from them to their brethren, with whom they must have been on terms of the most intimate fellowship (cf. Ro 16:2, 1 Co 16:12). Besides, if he wrote from Rome we have a natural explanation, amounting to a vera causa, of the fact that our Epistle was known there from the very first; for it must not be supposed that a writing like this, in its day, could have obtained without copice having been made beforehand for (a supposed instance of this kind in the case of St. Luke's writings, see Blass, Ev. sec. Lucam, and Acts A postorum, especially the Prolegomena, cf. Westcott, Introd. p. xxxv.), and is contradicted by the historical evidence of the late date at which the Epistle seems to have been known in Alexandria, and by the fact that its authorship was completely hidden from the heads of the Church in that place. We are thus reduced to the balancing of probabilities in selecting an objective for our Epistle, and in so doing we have to ask ourselves the much canvassed question, 'What were the real ends of the readers? Were they Gentile or Jewish converts?' Until a comparatively recent date it was believed universally that the writer had Jewish Christians before his mind. A formidable array, however, of NT critics, especially those in the Church adressed. No shall be completed in the dark as to the probable date of its composition. Looking first for incidental, independently of the locale of the readers, we find several hints pointing to a comparatively late period in the history of the Church. Both writer and readers were separated by at least a generation from the first circle of believers (2:1). The readers, moreover, had been long enough under the influence of the Christian faith to give our author grounds for hope that they could occupy the position of teachers and of 'perfect' ('full grown,' RV) professors of their religion (5:12): note the verb translated 'ye are become,' which expresses the end of a lengthened process of growth. Hope was bitterly disappointed, although he is careful to recall a period when their love was warm and their Christian profession an active force in their lives (6:4). Passing his appeal on this memory, he strives to encourage them to revert to their former earnestness ('diligence,' EV 6:3); and, in order to prevent that dulness to which they had already given way from developing further, he urges them to take on a pattern those Christian teachers who had already spent their lives in the service of the faith (6:12). It is probable that their own rulers of the preceding generation had signaled their fidelity.
HEBREWS, EPISODE TO

to Christ by enduring martyrdom for His sake (cf. Westcott, Ep. to Heb., in loc.). The first breathes of their enthusiasm for the gospel was wearing off, and some at least amongst them were in danger of a complete lapse from Church membership (10:23). The cause of this temptation is not far to seek. In an earlier period of their history they had 'endured a great conflict of sufferings' (10:23), and the writer hints at another and a similar experience, of which the beginnings were making themselves felt (cf. Rev. 3: l). Note it a warning tone in 10:25 exhorted to the cultivation of patience. Persecution on this occasion had not as yet burst with its full fury upon them (12:9). That he sees it fast coming is evident from the writer's continually appealing for an exhibition of patience and constant endurance (10:23, 24, etc.). Indeed, he understands the dangers to which a Church, enjoying a period of freedom from the stress of active opposition (in this case peace for the Church in the 1st cent.), is exposed when brought face to face with a sudden storm of persecution and relentless hatred (10:24). He seems to be in fear of the result of moral relaxation (12:2), and encourages his readers by telling them of the liberation of Timothy from his imprisonment for the faith (13:2). It is not impossible that one of his reasons for writing this letter to the Church, instead of addressing it through 'them that had the rule over them' (12:6), was that he feared a similar fate for the latter, or that, like himself, they were to be correspondingly separated from their brethren (13:6), by the persecuting authorities. Now, if we accept Rome as the destination of our Epistle, and see in it the allusion to the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and in 13:1 the time remembered that we have the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthian Church as its terminus ad quem, we have reduced the limits of the date of its composition to the period between the Neronic and Domitiane persecutions. Rather we should say, following some of the allusions referred to above, it was written at the beginning of the latter crisis; in other words, the date would be within the closing years of the 1st and the opening years of the 9th decade of the 1st cent. (AD 97). The fact that Timothy was alive when our author wrote does not militate against this date, as he seems to have been a young man when converted through the instrumentality of St. Paul (cf. 1 Tim. 1: 14, 2 Tim. 1: 20). Besides the danger to the faith arising from physical sufferings and persecutions, another and a more deadly enemy seems to have been threatening to undermine the foundations of the Church's life and teaching. After the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, Jewish Rabbinism seems to have been endowed with a new and vigorous life. Hellenistic Judaism, with its syncretistic tendencies and its bitter proselytizing spirit, must have appealed very strongly to that class of Christians for whom an eclecticism belief always has a subtle charm (cf. the warning 'Be not carried away by divers and strange teachings' and the reference to the distinctions regarding 'meats' in 13, which forcibly remind us of St. Paul's language in Col 2:1). For an exhaustive survey of the extent and number of prescripts to Judaism, and the eagerness with which this work was pursued, see Schürer, H/ P. ii. 291–327.

3. Purpose and contents.—In order to counteract this deadly influence, the writer sets about proving the final and universalistic character of the Christian revelation. It is with this practical aim that he takes up his pen in hand, and he himself gives its true designation to his literary effort when he styles it 'a word of encouragement' (13:19). At the same time, it is evident that our author moves on a high plane both of thought and of language. No other NT writer seems to have grasped so fully the cosmological significance attaching to the earthly life and experiences of Jesus (5:11, 4:21, or to have set forth so clearly His present activity on behalf of men (5:9, 10, 17), or to have discussed so fully His future work of mediation (5:12, 13), or to have given so succinctly the doctrine of the Son of God (5:1–7). In order to obviate any objection likely to be made against the irregularity of a priesthood outside the Levitical order, he has already pointed to an OT case in point, and here he strengthens his plea by adding the eagerness with which this was recognized as Messianic. Melchizedek was a priest who had no genealogical affinity with the tribe of Levi, and yet he was greater than Aaron (7:28). And his name is His Own Son that He should be a 'priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (5:7). We have said above that the central thought of our Epistles is the discovery by Christianity of a way, hitherto hidden from the eyes of man, of access to God (cf. 4:14, 16, 18, 17). Once this was accomplished, nothing else remained to be done but to enter on that path which leads to the 'Sabbath-rest reserved for the people of God' (4:9). We may now ask the question: What are the author's conceptions with regard... to the Being and Personality of the High Priest upon whose functions he sets such value? In other words, What are the chief features of the Christology of the Epistle? We have not to proceed far in the study of our Epistle before we are brought face to face with a thought which does not receive much discussion in the relative claims of Christ and the OT ministers of revelation and redemption. It is upon His Sonship that the superiority of Jesus is based. Neither the prophets nor the ministering angels, neither Moses nor Aaron, could lay claim to that relationship which is inherent in the Person of Jesus Christ. In consequence of the unique position occupied by the Son of God (44); cf. 1:4; 2:5 7:10 (109), it follows that the dispensation ushered in by Him is altogether that which is better. That too was the dim outline (‘shadow’), not even the full representation (‘the very image’) of the good things which were to be (109). Regarded as a means of revealing God to man, this superiority is self-evident, as the Son is above both prophets and angels. Looked on as a mediatorial scheme of redemption and of reconciliation, it stands immeasurably above that whose representatives were Moses the law-giver and Aaron the priest.

It is evident from what has been said that this feature of the Personality of Jesus is transcendent and unique. It is also evident that sonship in a general sense is unknown to the OT (cf. 2:18). As if to preclude all misunderstanding of his meaning, he at the outset defines his belief when he represents the Son as ‘the heir of all things’ and the agent of God’s creative activity (58; cf. Jn 1:3). The effulgence of His glory and the very image of the Being of this Person, but not only do we see in these words the definition of a faith which confesses Jesus as the great world-sustaining power (15); there is also implied, so far as a non-technical terminology is concerned, belief in the eternity of His Being. It is true that the term ‘first-begotten’ (14) does not necessarily carry the idea of eternity with it, or even the statement that He is the Maker of the ages (15). On the contrary, it must remain the supplemental to the grand Christological confession of v.4, which excludes the notion of the non-existence of the Son at any time in the ages of eternity. The shining of light is coeval with the light itself and the impress of the seal on wax is the exact reproduction of the original engraving. It is true that we have here no systematic declaration of Christological belief. The time had not yet come for the constructive theologian. At the same time, it is difficult to see how the author could have framed a more emphatic expression of his belief that Jesus the Son of God is a Divine Person from eternity to eternity (cf. 7:7). The grand and final scene in the Divine process of self-revelation is painted in words of magnificent solemnity, referred to incidentally, and repeated again and again. As the Son of God, Jesus had a Divine inheritance into which He entered, after His work of redemption was completed on earth, by sitting down on the right hand of the Majesty on High (11; cf. 1:4 2:4 5:6 7:1, Lk 22:46, Mk 16:9).

In his reference to the work of the Son in ‘making purification for sins’ (19) the author implies at once his belief in the humanity of the Son. Although he gives us no direct clue to the extent of his knowledge of the conditions under which the Incarnation was expected, he leaves us in no doubt not only that the manhood of the Son is a reality, but that for the work of redemption it was necessary that it should be so. The fact that his allusions to this doctrine are always indirect point to the conclusion that he expected his readers to be familiar with it as an indisputable article of the Christian faith. Besides, he reinforces his arguments by a running commentary upon those Psalms wherein he has made the typical expression of the Incarnation of Christ (cf. 2:6 4:11 16:15 57). Incorporated with them we have numerous references to the earthly experiences of Jesus. The manner of His death (1:11 2:9-10), His general temptations (2:18-19), and in particular, that of Gethsemane (57, where the author boldly refers to Jesus’ prayer to His Father in the face of an awful calamity, and the cause which occasioned that prayer), His work as preacher and ruler (56), His suffering in the negation by Him of the work of proclamation to those who would not hear Him (12:9), His protracted struggle with implacable religious enemies (129)—all point to our author’s minute acquaintance with the historical facts of Jesus’ life.

No attempt is made by the writer to minimize the extent and character of Jesus’ earthly sufferings and the limitations to which He was subjected. It seems as if, above all things, he is anxious to impress his readers with their stern reality, and as if, in their turn, they were tempted to despise the salvation which was wrought out through such humiliation (29). For him this humiliation is filled with a moral and spiritual significance of the most vital importance. In his constant endurance and His ultimate triumph Jesus has left an abiding example to all who suffer temptation and persecution (12:2, cf. the expression ‘we hold him’, etc., 20). The power of this example is the great theme of the second half of the Epistle, and the solution of the difficulty of the non-technical statement of the relationship of Jesus and His people (cf. 2:19), by which their endurance and witness become the embodiment and extension of His work in this respect (cf. 5:13 12:19).

In the writer’s estimate of the earthly life of Jesus we can see no less real and splendid. ‘It was fitting’ that Jesus should be perfected through sufferings (2:19), not only because He thereby attained to the capabty of salvation, becoming merciful and faithful (20) and mighty to the help of all who come to God through Him (2:18), but also because He is ‘His brother’ (cf. 2:11) springs from the double fact that He is one with them in His experiences, and at the same time victorious over sin (‘apart from sin,’ cf. 7:29) as the heavenly Priest. The author turns to the humiliation and the glory of Jesus thus effected by our author is enhanced as it reaches its climax in the bold assertion that development in character was the necessary element in His earthly life (57; cf. the words perfected for evermore, 79).

In order that his readers may fully appreciate the character of the work accomplished by the life and death of Jesus, the writer proceeds to answer Paul’s question which may be raised against the propriety of His discharging the priestly functions of mediation and atonement. This he does by a twofold process of reasoning. First, referring to the language of the great Messianic Psalm, he demonstrates the superiority in point of order, as in that of the priesthood of Melchizedek to that of Aaron (5:1 7:1 11 etc.). Next he shows how the idea of the sinfully forefathers of the Aaronic priesthood have become fully and finally realized in the priesthood of Jesus (8:3 9:4). There are certain characteristics in the Melchizedekian order which, by an allegorical method of interpretation, are shown to be typical of the sublime sense of the priesthood of Christ. It was (a) royal, (b) righteous, (c) peaceable, (d) personal, (e) eternal (77). A high priest having these ideal attributes realized in himself answers to man’s fallen condition, and they all meet in the Person of the Son ‘perfected for evermore’ (cf. 7:28). No mention is made of the sacrificial aspect of Melchizedek’s work, but this is implied in the subterranean assertion that he has ‘acted upon himself once for all’ (77). Indeed, it may be said that the latter characteristic is inseparable from the above-mentioned five, for the priesthood which realizes itself in the ethical ideal is not outlined in any parochial form by the act of self-sacrifice. The argument is then transferred from the Melchizedekian to the Levitical order, where the last-named function found detailed expression in the Mosaic rites. In the question an answer is given to the question, ‘What has this man to offer?’ The Aaronic priests offered sacrifices continually, and in his description of the functions incidental to their position we seem to hear echoes of contrasts out of the very parallelisms instituted. The Levitical priest is not (a) royal; he 'is appointed' to fulfill certain obligations (8\(^\), cf. 5'); he is not (b) essentially righteous; he has, before he fulfils his mediatorial functions, first to offer for his own sins (8\(^\), cf. 5'); his work does not conduce to (c) peace, for 'conscience of sins' is still, in spite of priestly activity, alive, and 'perfection' is not thereby attained (10\(^\)-'); his priesthood here rests on his having inherited authority made after the law of a carnal commandment (17\(^\)), and the personal equation is shown to be eliminated by the fact that it is the blood of goats and calves that he offers (18\(^\)); finally, it is not (d) eternal; its functions were temporary, 'imposed until a time of reformation' (9\(^\)). In every instance 'the more excellent ministry' (8\(^\)) of Jesus is substantiated, while the repeated assertion which is summed up in an antithesis ('once in the year' 9\(^\), and 'eternal' 9\(^\)) the whole discussion may be regarded as an a fortiori argument on the reality of the Atonement. To imitate the Levitical ceremonialism was at its noblest (9\(^\)-7). Even here the above-mentioned antithesis is observable; the Levitical minister was discharges in a Tabernacle which was 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things' (8\(^\)), while that of Christ fulfils itself in 'the true tabernacle' (8\(^\)), where alone are displayed the eternal realities of priestly sacrifice and mediation. The offering of Himself is not merely the material sacrifice of His body on the cross, 'though that is a necessary phase in His ministerial priesthood (cf. 26\(^\); 18\(^\))' it is the transcendent spiritual act of One who is sinless ('through the eternal Spirit of holiness' 9\(^\)). The sacrifice actually gives the offering its eternal validity ('once for all, 77\(^\) 10\(^\)), and although 'the sacrifice of Himself' was consummated 'at the end of the ages,' its force and value reach back to the foundations of the world (9\(^\), cf. 9\(^\)), and continue for all the time that is to come (75\(^\), 9\(^*\)).

Two other interdependent ideas remain to be briefly considered. It has already been said that our author may be described as a theological evolutionist, and in no sphere of his thought is this more evident than in his ideas of salvation and of faith. Salvation is not so much a current realisation of the redemptive work of Christ's atoning act as a movement commencing here and now towards that realization in all its fulness. It is true that faith is for him the power to bring the unseen realities into touch with the present life. At the same time, the dominant conception of salvation in the writer's mind is the fruition of hopes originated and vitalized by the teaching and experiences of Jesus. Future dominion in a new world ordered and inhabited in perfect moral harmony (see Westcott, Ep. to Heb., on 3; 2) awaits those who neglect not 'so great salvation' (2). The basis upon which this lordship rests is the actualized crowned Kingship of the Man Jesus, which is at once the guarantor of the future, and the guarantee of the vision (29\(^\)). Immediately following this view another conception arises dealing with the realization, in the future, of a dominion based upon conquest. Death and the mediator of death are the enemies which the basis has 'brought to nought'; and not only has He done this, but He delivers those who all their life were in bondage 'through fear.' The perfect humanity of Jesus is not avenged along with the present life, not升华. No other way is possible, and in Him all may find their servitude transmuted into freedom and dominion (cf. 24\(^\)-28\(^\)). Once more, arguing from the imperfect realization by the Israelites, under Joshua, of their hopes, the author points out that what they looked for in vain is a type of a higher thing which is now actually awaiting 'the people of God.' Salvation consists in entering into that eternal Sabbath-rest where Jesus has gone before and where the Lord of the God is (cf. 4\(^\)). The pivotal conception round which these ideas revolve is the unity of Christ and man, the likeness in all things, sin alone excepted, which was effected by the Incarnation.

Our author's habit of looking on faith as an active force in men's lives displays the same tendency to make the future rather than the present the field of his vision. At the same time, it would be a great mistake to imagine that he presents a world of spiritual ideas which has no connexion with the history of the world. Obedience, however, is the word and thought preferred by him when he speaks of the present grounds of salvation (5\(^\), cf. 11\(^\)). Faith is for him a force working in the spiritual life, which enables men of every nation and class to live lives of noble self-denial for righteousness' sake, 'as seeing him who is invisible' (cf. 11\(^\)-12\(^\), 6\(^\), 10\(^\)). Of this faith Jesus is 'the author and perfecter of it' (12\(^\)), and here, too, we get a glimpse of that quickening Divine humanity upon which the writer lays such constant stress, and which is the source of the effort demanded from his readers when he asks them to observe the former rulers in their case and to ignore the matter issuing in a glorious martyrdom. The Beorhones are mentioned at the census taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3\(^\)), and appear again at the later census in the plains of Moab (26\(^\)); cf. also 1 Ch 15\(^\) 23\(^\) 26\(^\), 28\(^*\).

2. A son of Marciash and father of Korah, Tappuh, Rekem, and Shema (1 Ch 2\(^*\)-48).

HEBERRY.—A very ancient city in Palestine, 20 miles S.S.W. from Jerusalem. It is on a basin on one of the three points of the right bank of the Japho or 'Four Rivers,' and it was a stronghold of the Assurians. In the time of Abraham, however (whose history is much bound up with this place), we read of Hittites here. From Ephron the Hittite he purchased the cave of Machpelah for the burial of Sarah his wife (Gen 23). This allusion has given rise to much controversy. At the time of the entry of the Israelites it was held by three chieftains (Nu 33\(^\), 47; cf. Ge 14\(^\); 21\(^\)) under the name of Beor. On the partition of the country it was allotted to the tribe of Judah, or rather to the Calebites (Jos 14\(^\) 15\(^\)), who captured it for the Israelite immigrants. The city itself was allotted to the Kohathite Levites, and it was set apart as a city of refuge (Jos 20\(^\)). Here David reigned seven and a half years over Judah (2 S 5) till his capture of Jerusalem from the Jebusites fixed there the capital of the country. It was here also that the rebellious Absalom established himself as king (2 S 15\(^\), 17\(^\)). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11\(^\)). After the Captivity it was for a time in the hands of the Edomites (though from Neh 12\(^\)) it would appear to have been temporarily colonized by the returned Jews), but was re-captured by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac 5\(^*\)). In the war under Vespasian it was burned. In 1167 it became the see of a Latin bishop; in 1187 it was captured for the Muslim by Saladin.

The modern town contains about 10,000 inhabitants. Its chief manufactures are glassware and leather wares. In the centre is the Haram or mosque, formerly a Crusaders' church, built on the reputed cave of Machpelah. The modern name is Qalbi, eRomim, 'the friend of the Merciful'—the Muslim title of Abraham. 'Abraham's oak' is shown near the city, but this is as apocryphal as the ascription of a cistern called 'Sarah's...
HEDGE

bath.' There is a remarkable stone-built enclosure near by called Râmaî el-Khalîf; it has been attempted to show this to be Samuel's Ramah; probably, however, it is nothing more important than a Muslim khan, built out of earlier materials. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

HEDGE.—(1) medrâsah, a throrn hedge (Is 59). (2) qadir or pedârâb, probably a stone wall (Ps 89:6 etc.). (3) pedârâb or mîdâr, Mt 21:19, Mk 12:14, Lk 14:23—a 'partition' of any kind. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HEGAI or HEGE (Est 2:9, 11).—An eunuch of Ahasuerus, and keeper of the women, to whom the maidens were entrusted before they were brought in to the king.

HEGEMONIDES (2 Mac 13:4).—An officer left in command of the district from Potempolis to the Gerrenians, by Lysias when he was forced to return to Syria to oppose the chancellor Philip (n.c. 162).

HEIFER.—The heifer was used in agriculture (Jg 14:3; Jer 50:1, Hos 10:11), and in religious ritual (Gn 16:5, I S 16, Nu 19:2, etc.). Israel is compared to a heifer in Hos 4:6, and so is Egypt in Jer 46:19, and Chaldea in Jer 50:1. See also Ox, Red Heifer. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HEIR.—See Inheritance.

HELAH.—One of the wives of Ashshur the 'father of Tekoa' (1 Ch 4:7).

HELLAM.—The Arameans from beyond the river, whom Hadadirem summoned to his aid, came to Helam (2 S 10:18) and were there met and defeated by David (1 CH 18:9). So far as the form of the word is concerned, heliam in v.6 might mean 'their army.' There can, however, be little doubt that the LXX, Peenh. and Targ. are right in taking it as a proper name. Upon the ground of the LXX some introduce Helam also in Exk 47:2. In this case it must have lain on the border between Damascus and Hamath.

HELBAH.—A town of Asher (Jg 18:3). Its identity is quite uncertain.

HELBOH.—A place celebrated in old times for the excellence of its wines (Ezk 27:14). It is identified with Habbon, about 12 miles N. of Damascus. Grapes are still grown extensively on the surrounding slopes.

HELDAI.—1. The captain of the military guard appointed for the twelfth month of the temple service (1 Ch 27:19). He is probably to be identified with Helob the son of Baanah the Netophathite, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:39), for in the parallel passage (1 Ch 11:6) the name is more correctly given as Helod. The form Haldai is supported by Zec 6:1, and should probably be restored in the other two passages. 2. According to Zec 6:1, one of a small band who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to those of the exiles who had returned under Zerubbabel. From these gifts Zechariah was told to make a crown for Joshua the high priest, which was to be placed in the temple as a memorial of Healdai and his companions. In v.4 Helem is clearly an error for Heldai.

HELEB (2 S 23:2).—See Heldai, 1.

HELED (1 Ch 11:19).—See Heldai, 1.

HELEK.—Son of Gilead the Manasseite, Nu 26:1, Jos 17:2 (F). Patronymic, Helekitis, Nu 26:9.

HELEM.—1. A man of Asher (1 Ch 7:4).—2. See Heldai, 2.

HELEPH.—A town on the border of Naphtali (Jos 19:32). Although mentioned in the Talmud (Megillah, 1:1, Heleph has not been identified.

HELEZ.—1. One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:3). He is described as 'the Pallite,' i.e. a native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (cf. Jos 15:16, Neh 11:16). But in the two parallel lists (1 Ch 11:27 and 27:21) both the Hebrew text and the LXX read 'the Palonite.'

HELPS

The former reading is further inconsistent with 1 Ch 27:20, where Helez is expressly designated as 'of the children of Ephraim.' He was in command of the military guard appointed for the seventh month of the temple service. See Pelonite. 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 25:6).

HELL.—1. The father of Joseph, in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3:27). 2. An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1:5); omitted in parallel passages, 1 Es 8:8, Ezr 7:1.

HELIODORUS.—The chancellor of Seleucus IV. Philopator. At the instigation of Apollonius he was sent by the king to plunder 1. the private treasures kept in the temple of Jerusalem; but was prevented from carrying out his design by an apparition (2 Mac 3:16). In n. c. 175, Heliodorus murdered Seleucus, and attempted to seize the Syrian crown; but he was driven out by Eumenes of Pergamus and his brother Attalus; and Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, ascended the throne. There is commonly supposed to be a reference to Heliodorus in Dn 11:24, but the interpretation of the passage is doubtful. Further, he is frequently reckoned as one of the ten or the three kings of Dn 7:24.

HELKAI.—A priest (Neh 12:21).

HELKATH.—A Levitical city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Jos 19:21). The site is uncertain. The same name, owing probably to a textual error, appears in 1 Ch 6:6 as Hukok.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM.—The name given to the spot at Gibeon where the fatal combat took place between the twelve champions chosen on either side from the men of Abner and Joab (2 S 2:17). The name means 'the field of sword edges.'

HELKIAS.—1. The high priest Hilkiah in Josiah's reign. He is mentioned in 1 Es 1:1—2 Es 36 as a governor of the temple, subscribing handsomely to Josiah's great Passover (Ezr 3:7) as the great-grandfather of Ezra; and in Bar 1:2 as father of Joakim, who was governor of the temple in the reign of Zedekiah. 2. A distant ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1:2). 3. The father of Susanna (Sus 1:4).

HELL.—See Eschatology, Gehenna, Hades, Sheol.

HELENIUM.—See Education, Greece.

HELMET.—See Armour, § 2 (b).

HELON.—Father of Eliah, the prince of Zebulun at the first census, Nu 1:15; 27:29, 18 10:6 (F).

HELPS.—Ac 27:21 'they used helps, undergirding the ships.' The reference is to 'cables passed round the hull of the ship, and tightly secured on deck, to prevent the timbers from starting, especially amidstships, where in ancient vessels with one large mast the strain was very great. The technical English word is frapping, but the process has only been rarely employed since the early part of the century, owing to improvements in shipbuilding' (Page's Acts of the Apostles; see Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 105).

HELPS.—In 1 Co 12:28 St. Paul, in order to show the diversity in unity found in the Church as the body of Christ, gives a list of services performed by various members of the churchly body. In the course of his enumeration he uses two Gr. nouns (antilempasis and kybernetes) employed nowhere else in the NT, and rendered in RV 'helps' and governments.' Helps may suggest a lowly kind of service, as of one who acts as assistant to a superior. The usage of the Gr. word, however, both in the LXX and in the papyri, points to succour given to the needy by those who are stronger, and this is borne out for the NT when the same word in its verbal form occurs in St. Paul's exhortation to the elders of the Ephesian Church to 'help the weak' (Ac 20:35 RV). 'Helps' in this list of churchly gifts and services thus denotes such attention to the poor and afflicted as were specially assigned at a later time to the office of the deacon; while 'governments' (Rvm HERCULES.—This name is mentioned only in 1 Mac 4:9, 5, where Jason, the head of the Hellenistic party in Jerusalem (B.C. 174), sent 300 silver drachmas (about £12 10s.) to Tyre as an offering in honour of Hercules, the tutelary deity of that city. Hercules was worshiped at Tyre from very early times, and his temple in that place, according to Herod. ii. 44, as old as the city itself, 2600 years before his own time. As a personification of the sun he afforded an example of the nature-worship so common among the Phoen., Egypt., and other nations of antiquity.

HEREDITY, which may be defined as ‘the hereditary transmission of qualities, or even acquisitions’, so far as it is a scientific theory, is not anticipated in Holy Scripture. That men are ‘made of one’ (Ac 17:29) is a fact of experience, which, in common with all literatures, the Bible assumes. The unassisted characters are content to argue from like to like, that is, by analogy. But the modern doctrine of heredity, rooted as it is in the science of biology, involves the recognition of a principle or law according to which characters are transmitted from parent to offspring. Of this there is no trace in the Bible. Theology is therefore not directly interested in the differences between Weismann and the older exponents of Evolution.

1. In the OT, which is the basis of the doctrine of the NT, there is no dogmatic purpose, and therefore no attempt to account for the fact that ‘all flesh’ has ‘corrupted his way upon the earth’ (Gen 6:5), and that ‘there is none that doeth good’ (Ps 14:3). A perfectly consistent point of view is not to be expected. Not a philosophical people, the Hebrews start from the obvious fact of the unity of the race in the possession of common flesh and blood (Job 14:13), the son being begotten after the image of the father (Gen 5:3; cf. He 3:3). This is more especially emphasized in the unity of the race of Abraham, that ‘Israel after the flesh’ (1 Co 10:19), whose type were the fathers and the promises (Ro 11:29). But the Bible never commits itself to the theory of the generation or procreation of the spirit, which is apparently given 'wise counsellors') suggests that rule and guidance which afterwards fell to presbyters or bishops.

We are not to think, however, that there is any reference in this passage to deacons and bishops as Church officials. The fact that 'helps' are named before 'governments,' and especially that abstract terms are used instead of concrete and personal ones as in the earlier part of the list, shows that it is functional, not personal, offices, of which the Apostolic is thinking throughout. The analogy of Ac 20:19, moreover, where it is presbyters (v. 19 RV) or bishops (v. 20 RV) that are exhorted to help the weak, and against the supposition that in an Ep. so early as 1 Cor. 'helps' and 'governments' corresponded to deacons and bishops. 'Helps,' as Hogg says (Crit. Ecclesia, p. 159), are 'anything that could be done for poor or weak or outcast brethren, either by rich or powerful or influential brethren, or by the devotion of those who stood on no such eminence.' 'Governments,' again, refers to 'men who by wise counsellors did for the community what the steersman or pilot does for the ship.'

HELVE.—Dt 19:1: a word nearly obsolete, equivalent to 'handle.'

HEMAM.—A Horite clan of Edom (Gn 36:9). 1 Ch 1:32 has Heman, but the LXX in both places Heman. Many scholars follow the LXX, others identify with Heman of Petra, or Heman near Masor. GEORGE A. BARTON.

HEMADAN.—See Hamadan.

HEMLOCK.—See Gall, Wormwood.

HEV.—See Cock.

HEN.—In Zec 6:14 'Hen the son of Zephaniah' is mentioned amongst those whose memory was to be perpetuated by the crowns laid up in the Temple (so AV, RV). Some would substitute for 'Hen' the name 'Jesus' (Cranst.) found in v.19.

HENA.—A word occurring in conjunction with Ivah (2 K 10:13, 19; Is 37:7). Both are probably place-names. Büsing has identified Hena with the modern Anan on the Euphrates; and Sachau supposes that Ivah is 'imm between Aleppo and Antioch. The Targum, however, takes the words as verb-forms, and reads 'he has driven away and overturned.' Hommel regards them as divine star-names (cf. Arab, al-kam'ut and al-'adun). Greeny emends the text, striking out Hena, and reading Ivah as 'Azzah (=Gaza), W. M. Nesbit.

HENADAD.—A Levite (Ex 3:3, Neh 3:16, 6, 10).

HENNA.—See Campfire.

by God to each individual (Gn 2:7,72, Job 33:9), constitutes the personality ('life' 2 S 11, 'soul' Nu 5:9), and is withdrawn at death (Ec 12:1). This is the source of Herod's emphasis on individual responsibility (189), a criticism of the proverbs concerning sour grapes (v. 9), which was made to rest on an advised principle of the Mosaic covenant, the visitation upon the children of the fathers (Ex 20). This principle involves corporate guilt; which, though sometimes reduced to aardonable weakness inseparable from flesh (Ps 78:30, Job 10), and therefore suggestive of heresy, yet, as involving Divine wrath and punishment, cannot be regarded as a palliation of transgression (Ex 34:7, Ps 77, Ro 1:19).

Sin in the OT is disobedience, a breach of personal relations, needing from God forgiveness (Ex 34:7, 1s 43:2), and cannot therefore be explained on the principle of hereditary transmission. Moreover, the unity of Israel in the OT is as much one of external status as of physical nature, of the inheritance of the firstborn no less than of community in flesh and blood (Ex 4:18, cf. Gn 25:10). Legitimacy is degraded to a lower status by his sin, as cast out of the garden and begetting children in banishment from God's presence.

2. Such are the materials from which NT theology works out its doctrine of original sin, not a transmitted tendency or bias towards evil, but a submission to the power of the devil which may be prejudicled of the whole race. [See Art. SIN.]

HERES.—1. A mountain from which the Danites failed to expel the Amorites (Jg 14:1). It is probably connected with Beth-shemesh (1 K 4:2, 2 Chr 28:8) or Ir-shemesh (Jos 19:15), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. In Jg 19:14 (RV) the 'ascent of Heres' is mentioned as the spot from which Gideon returned after the defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. Both the toponymography and the text of the narrative are doubtful. See also Ir-ha-heres, Timnath-heres, Timnath-sherah.

HERHSH.—A Levite (1 Ch 9:6).

HERHEST.—The word 'heresy' (Gr. hairesis) is never used in the NT in the technical sense in which we find it by the first quarter of the 2nd cent., as a doctrinal departure from the true faith of the Church, implying a separation from its communion. The usual NT meaning of 'hairesis' is simply a party, school, or sect; and soct is the word by which it is most frequently rendered. In Acts this is the invariable use. Thus it is applied to the "Scribes of the Pharisees and Sadducees (51-19:20), precisely as in Jos. (Ant. xiii. v. 9). Similarly it is used of the followers of Christ, though not by themselves (24:1-25:39). In 24th St Paul substitutes the 'Way' for his term 'a sect.' The reason may partly have been that in his own usage hairesis, while still bearing the general sense of 'party,' had come to convey a reproach as applied to Christians.

There was nothing that distressed St. Paul more than the presence of strife and party-feeling among his converts. The unity of the Church as the body of Christ was one of his ruling ideas (1 Co 12:21, Ro 12, Eph 4:13, 5:1-13, Col 2:16, 18); and the existence of factions, as fatal to the sense of unity, was strongly deprecated and condemned (Gal 5:20, 1 Co 11:11; 'heretic,' Tit 3:10). 'Heresy' was division or schism (1 Co 11:18. 15 shows that 'heresy' and 'division' [Gr. schisma] were practically synonymous); and 'schism' or 'heresy' a rending or cleaving of the body of Christ (12:11, 21). It was not doctrinal aberration from the truth, however, but practical breaches of the law of brotherly love that the Apostle condemned under the name of 'heresy' (see esp., as illustrating this, 1 Co 11:7, 10).

Outside of Acts and the Pauline Epistles, hairesis is used in the NT only in 2 P 2:1. In this, probably the latest of the NT writings, we see a marked advance towards the subsequent ecclesiastical meaning of the word. The 'damnable (RV 'destructive') heresies' here spoken of spring not merely from a selfish and factious spirit, but from false teaching. As yet, there seems to be no thought of the individual heretical bodies outside of the general Christian communion. The heresies are false teachings (v.1) leading to licentious doings (v.2), but they are 'brought in,' says the writer, 'among you.' J. C. LAMBERT.

HERETH.—A forest which was one of the hiding-places of David (1 S 22:9). The reference may be to the wooded mountain E. of Adulam, where the village of Kharas now stands.

HERMAS.—A Christian at Rome, saluted in Ro 16:14. His name is a common one, especially among slaves. Origen identifies this Hermas with the celebrated author of The Shepherd, a book considered by many in the 2nd cent. to be on a level with Scripture. For the disputed date of the book, which professes to record visions seen in the episcopate of Clement (c. a.d. 90-100), but which is said in the Muratorian Fragment (c. 180-200?) to have been written in the episcopate of Pius (not before a.d. 139), see Salmon's Introd. to the NT, Lect. xxvi. But Origen's identification of Hermas as very improbable, the dates being scarcely compatible, and the name so common.

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMES.—One of those greeted in Ro 16:14, possibly a slave in Cesar's household. Hermes was a very common slave's name (Lightfoot, Philo, p. 176).

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMOGENES.—A companion of St. Paul, who, with Phelyalus and 'all that are in Asia,' deserted him (2 Ti 4:19). The defection may probably have occurred at a time long past when St. Paul wrote (note RV). The AV refers to a defection at Rome, perhaps of natives of the province Asia in the city; but the aorist is against this.

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMON.—The highest mountain in Syria (9050 ft. high), a spur of the Anti-Lebanon. Its name means 'apart' or 'sanctuary,' and refers to its ancient sanctity (cf. Ps 89:11; and the name 'mount Baal-hermon,' Jg 37). Meagre traces of ruins remain on its summit, probably connected, at least partly, with a former high place. According to Dt 3:11, it was called Siron by the Sidonians and Senir (wh. see) by the Amorites. It may have been the scene of the Transfiguration (Mt 9:2). The summit has three peaks, that on the S.E. being the highest. Snow lies on the top throughout the year, except in the autumn of some years; but usually there is a certain amount in the ravines. The top is bare above the snow-line; below it is richly wooded and covered with vineyards. The Syrian bear can sometimes be seen here; seldom, if ever, anywhere else. The modern name is Jebel esh-Sheikh, 'the Mountain of the Chief.'

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

HERMONTES.—A mistaken tr. in Ps 42:2, AV, corrected in RV to Hermas, and referring to the three peaks of the summit of Hermon (wh. see).

HEROD.—The main interest attaching to the Herods is not concerned with their character as individual rulers. They acquire dignity when they are viewed as parts of a supremely dramatic situation in universal history. The fundamental elements in the situation are two. First, the course of world-power in antiquity, and the relation between it and the political principle in the constitution of the Chosen People. Second, the religious genius of Judaism, and its relation to the political elements in the experience of the Jews.

A glance at the map shows that Palestine is an organic part of the Mediterranean world. When, under the successors of Alexander, the centre of political gravity shifted from Persia to the shores of the Great Sea, the door was finally closed against the possibility of political autonomy in the Holy Land. The kingdom of the Seleucids had a much larger stake in the Internal affairs of the country than the Persian Empire thought of claiming. For one thing, the political genius of the Greeks demanded a more closely knit State than the Persian. For another, the fact that Palestine was on the border towards Egypt made its political assimilation to Northern Syria a military necessity. The Macabean War gave rise to the second Jewish State. But it was short-lived. Only Rome, during the diatropic career of Seleucus could it breathe freely. The moment Rome stretched out her hands to Syria its knell was rung.

The Hasmonean house was obliged to face a hopeless foreign situation. World-politics made a career impossible. In addition, it had to face an irreconcilable element in the constitution of Judaism. The rise of the Pharisees and the development of the Essenes plainly marked the historical moment when Palestine was to be brought to bear the sword, to be a nation capable of standing in the political field. In truth, Judaism was vexed by an insurmountable contradiction. The soul of this people longed for universal dominion. But efficient political machinery was demanded by their religion. The Hasmonean house was caught between the upper and the nether millstone.

The foundations of the Herodian house were laid by Antipater, an Idumean (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1 3). Apparently the Idumeans, converted by the sword, were never Jewish to the core. More than once the Pharisees flung the reproach ‘half-Jew’ in the teeth of Herod. Antipater was a man of undistinguished family. He fought his way up by strength and cunning. The decay of the Hasmonean house favoured his career. Palestine needed the strong hand. The power of Syria and the power of Egypt were gone. Rome was passing through the decay of the Senatorial régime. The Empire had not appeared to gather up the loose ends of provincial government. Pompey’s capture of Jerusalem had shattered what little was left of Hasmonean prestige. Yet Ptolemaic was not ready to assume direct control of Palestine.

1. Herod the Great.—Antipater’s son, Herod, had shown himself before his father’s death both masterful and merciless. His courage was high, his understanding capable of large conceptions, and his will able to adhere persistently to a distant end of action. His temperament was one of headlong passion; and when, in the later period of his life, the power and suspiciousness of the tyrant had sapped the real magnanimity of his nature, it converted him into a butcher, exercising his trade upon his own household as well as upon his opponents. His marriage with Mariamne, the heiress of the Hasmonean house, and his league with Rome, indicate the story of his life. His marriage was one both of love and of policy. His league was a matter of clear insight into the crisis of the situation. He was once driven out of Palestine by an alliance between the Hasmonean house and the Parthians (Jos. Ant. xiv. xii. 9, 10). But, backed by Rome, he returned with irresistible force. Mutual interest made the alliance close. Herod served the Empire well. And Augustus and his successors showed their appreciation. They stood by Herod and his descendants even when the task was not wholly pleasing. Josephus calls Herod ‘a man of extraordinary fortune. He was rather a man of extraordinary force and political discernment. He owed his good fortune largely to himself, manifesting powers which might have made him, in a less difficult field, fully deserving of his title ‘the Greater’. He enjoyed the lifelong favour of Augustus and his minister Agrippa. He made life and property in Palestine safe from every foe but his own tyranny. And though he showed himself a brutal murderer of Mariamne and his own children, not to speak of the massacre of the Innocents (Mt. 2), it must be remembered that Jerusalem was a hot-bed of intrigue. This does not justify him, but it explains his apparently inexcusable blood-lust.

His sympathy with Hellenism was a matter of honest conviction. The Empire was slowly closing in on Palestine. An independent Jewish power was impossible. The man who ruled the country was bound to work in the interest of Rome. Hellenism in the Holy Land was the political order of the day. So Herod built cities and gave them imperial names. He built amphitheatre, patronized the Greek games and, so far as his temperament permitted, Greek literature. At the same time, while he was but ‘half-jew,’ he sincerely desired to do large things for Judaism. He was a stout defender of the rights of the Jews in the Diaspora. He rebuilt the Temple. But his supreme gift to the Jews, a gift which they were not capable of appreciating, was a native Palestinian power, which, whatever its methods, was by profession Jewish. When he died, after a long reign (Jos. Ant. xvii. 2), they showed their incompetence to read the signs of the times. Roman rule was a very different thing from Persian rule. When it came, the iron entered into the soul of Judaism.

2. Archelaus.—After some delay Herod’s will was carried out. His sons were set up in power.—Archelaus over Judea, Idumea over Idumea, and Perea, Philip over Bataneea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. To Archelaus had fallen the greatest prize, and at the same time the hardest task. Having maintained the name of his house, he had to bring in institutions of the nature, and weaknesses, co-operating with the impossible elements in Judaism, caused his downfall and exile. The Jews now had their own wish. Judea came under direct Roman rule. A tax was levied. A Roman garrison rose in rebellion. He was easily put down. But the significance of his little rebellion was immense. For now was born what Josephus calls ‘the fourth philosophical sect’ amongst the Essenes (Ant. xx. 10 7). Zadok’s dragged into the light the self-contradiction of Judaism. The Jews could not build a State themselves. Their principles made it impossible for them to keep the peace with their heathen over-lord. Conflict was inevitable.

3. Herod Antipas, called ‘the tetrarch’ (Mt. 14, Lk. 3:19-19, Ac. 13), had better fortune. Our Lord described him as a ‘fox’ (Lk. 13). The name gives the clue to his nature. He was a man of craft rather than strength. But cunning served him well, and he kept his seat until the year 39. The corroding immorality of his race shows itself in his marriage with Herodias, his brother’s wife, and his treatment of his children. The marriage with Mariamne was given to Jewish sensibilities. (See John the Baptist.) His lust proved his undoing. Herodias, an ambitious woman, spurred him out of his caution. In rivalry with Herod Agrippa, he asked of Caligula the royal title. This exciting suspicion, his doings were looked into and he was banished.

4. Philip (Lk. 3) seems to have been the best among the sons of Herod. And it was his good fortune to rule over an outlying country where the questions always rife in Jerusalem were not pressed. His character and his good fortune together gave him a long and peaceful rule (d. A.P. 34).

5. Another Philip (son of Herod the Great and Mariamne) is mentioned in Mt. 14, Lk. 6 as the first husband of Herodias.

6. In Herod Agrippa I., the Herodian house seemed at one time to have reached the high-water-mark of power. He had served a long apprenticeship in the Imperial Court, where immorality, adaptability, and flattery were the price of position. That he was not altogether unmanned is proved by his dissolving Calig-ula from his insane proposal to set up a statue of himself in the Temple; for, in setting himself against the tyrant’s whim, he staked life and fortune (Jos. Ant. xvii. 8). In high favour with Caligula’s successor, he came to Jerusalem in the year 39, and was welcomed.

by the Jews with open arms. He continued to hold the Imperial favour, and his territory was expanded until his rule had a wider range than that of his grandsfather. His reign was the Indian summer of Jewish.
Even the Parthians thought well of him. When he was at Rome he lived as one who knew Rome well.
But in Jerusalem he wore his Judaism as a garment, unobtrusively. He was quite willing to gratify the Jews by putting leading Christians to death (Ac 12).
In high favour both at Jerusalem and at Rome, he seemed to be beyond attack. But the veto put on his proposal to rebuild the walls of his capital showed clearly that he was on very thin ice. And the pagan sect he was sure, sooner or later, to come to light. The story of his death, wherein the Book of Acts (12:23-25) and Josephus (Ant. xix. viii. 2) substantially agree, brings this out. At Cesarea he pardoned himself before a servile multitude as if he were a little Cesar, a god on earth. Smiten by a terrible disease, he died in great agony (a.d. 42). Jews and Christians alone looked on his end as a fitting punishment for his heathenism. The house of Herod was 'half-Jew' to the last.

[The genealogical table will bear out the opinion that Herod and his family brought into history a very considerable amount of vigour and ability.]

HERODIANS.—The name of a political party among the Jews, which derived its name from the support it gave to the dynasty of Herod. Perhaps they hoped for the restoration of the national kingdom under one of the sons of Herod. The Herodians appear in the Gospels on two occasions (Mt 3:16; Mt 22:9; Mk 10:32) as making common cause with the Parthians against Jesus.

HERODIANS.—See Herod, No. 3, and John the Baptist.

HERODION.—A Christian mentioned in Ro 16:1, apparently a Jew, and perhaps a freedman of the Herods.

HERON.—The Heb. word 'amplah designates an unclean bird (Lv 9:14; Dt 14:18), not otherwise mentioned in the Bible, but sufficiently well known to be taken as a type of a class. The occurrence of this name immediately after stork, and followed by the expression 'after her kind,' makes it probable that the EV rendering is correct. The heron belongs to the same group as the stork, and no fewer than six species of the genus Ardea alone are found in Palestine.

HESBON is the modern Hebhid, finely situated close to the edge of the great plateau of Eastern Palestine.
The extensive ruins, mainly of Roman times, lie on two hills connected by a saddle. The site commands views, E. and S., of rolling country; N., of hills, including e.g. that on which el-At (Elealeh) lies; and W., in the distance, of the hills of Judah, and nearer, through a gap in the near hills, of the Jordan valley, which lies some 4000 feet below, the river itself being barely 20 miles distant. Allotted to Reuben (Jso 13:27), Heshbon appears in the OT most frequently as being, or having been, the capital of Sihon (wh. see), king of the Amorites (Dt 28 and often), or, like many other towns in this neighbourhood, in the actual possession of the Moabites (1Sm 14:16, Jer 48:11, 14), to whom, according to Nu 21:21, the latter belonged before Sihon captured it. Jer 49:5, which appears to make Heshbon an Amorite city, is probably corrupt (cf. Driver, Book of the Prophet Jere-imah). According to Josephus (Ant. xix. xx. 4), it was the residence of the Jews in that of the time of Jannaeus (b.c. 104-78). The pools in Heshbon, menioned in Ca 7a, were perhaps pools near the spring which rises 600 feet below the city, and in the neighbourhood of which are traces of ancient conquests.

HERMON.—An unknown town in the extreme area of Judah (Jos 15:5).

The wives of Esau were called in Gn 27:4 ('daughters of Heth'), and in Gn 29:35 'Heth's' (all P) 'children of Heth,' i.e. Hittites, are located at Maan. See, further, Hittites.

HETHLON.—A place mentioned by Ezekiel (47:18)
as situated on the ideal northern boundary of Israel.
Furrer identifies it with the present Helela, N.E. of Tropolia and von Kautzsch named 'Adlan, north of the mouth of the Kasimiyeh.

W. M. NERDRT.

HETXEIM.—The first five books of the OT were known in Jewish circles as the 'five-fifths of the Law.'
Christian scholars as early as Tertullian and Origen adopted the name Pentateuch, corresponding to their Jewish title, as a convenient designation of these books.

The Law was regarded as a unique and authoritative exposition of all individual and social conduct within Israel: a wide gulf seemed to divide it from the Book of Joshua, which inaugurated the series of historical books known as the 'Later Prophets.' As a matter of fact, this division is wholly artificial. The first five books are primarily intended to present the reader not with a codification of the legal system, but with some account of the antiquities and origins of Israel, as regards their religious worship, their political position, and their social arrangements. From this standpoint, nothing could be more arbitrary than to treat the Book of Joshua as the beginning of an entirely new series: its contents, and, still more, its literary structure, show that it is intimately connected with the Pentateuch, and describes the final stage in the history of the Origines of the Hebrew nation (Driver, LOT 105). Critics have accordingly invented the name Herodians to emphasize this unity; and the name has now become universally accepted as an appropriate description of the first six volumes of the OT. In this article we propose to consider (I.) the composition, (II.) the criticism, and (III.) the characteristics of the Hexateuch.

I. COMPOSITION OF THE HEXATEUCH.—I. The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch was for long regarded as an unquestioned fact. The basis of this belief was the Jewish tradition of their origin which the Church took over with the books themselves. But this widespread and long-prevailing tradition cannot be sustained after an impartial investigation of all the facts. Indeed, the Pentateuch itself never claims such an authorship.

The account of the death of Moses and Joshua must, of course, have been added by a later writer. The description of Moses' character in Nu 12:3 cannot be the work of the legislator himself; while the appreciation of his character which closes Deuteronomy (34:25) suggests that a long line of prophets had intervened between the writer's own time and Moses' death. Similarly, Gn 12:22 is a reminder to the readers that the Canaanites were the original inhabitants of Palestine—a fact which it would have been obviously needless for Moses to record, but which subsequent generations might have forgotten. Again, in Gn 30:6 a reference is made to the time 'before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' which is exible only as the comment of an author who lived under the monarchy. The words certainly no hint of any predictive suggestion such as might be held to dispute the legitimacy of the same inference being drawn from the law of the kingdom (Dt 17:18), though even then it would be difficult to deny that the giving provided for the contingency of a monarchical constitution, the form in which his advice is recorded is largely coloured by reminiscences of the history of the days of Solomon.

Certain passages do, indeed, lay claim to Mosaic authorship—e.g. the defeat of the Amalekites (Ex 17:18) and the Book of the Covenant (Ex 24), the central part of the Deuteronomic legislation, i.e. chs. 12-26 (Dt 31).
HEXATEUCH

The Book of the Covenant (= C), Ex 20–23. In the way to have a glimpse of primitive Israel. They are directed to the simple needs of an agricultural community. In religious matters, three feasts are mentioned when the sanctuary must be visited; and one must be done to Jehovah, in any place, upon rough altars of earth or unhewn stone.

(iii.) The Levitical legislation, or Priestly Code (= P), presupposes rather than anticipates a completely altered situation. The consciousness of sin, and the need of forgiveness, had taken the place of the earlier spirit of joyous festivity which came at stated times to see Jehovah (an expression judiciously altered by orthodox scribes in later times into 'to be seen by, or to appear before Jehovah'). Accordingly P describes with the utmost fulness the ritual of the Day of Atonement; this culminating institution of the Levitical system 'is apparently unknown to all previous legislation. P, moreover, is in open conflict with D on the subject of the priesthood. In pre-exilic days the Levites were priests, even if one family, that of Aaron, may have enjoyed a special pre-eminent; but P takes the utmost pains to distinguish the priests, the sons of Aaron, from the Levites, the subordinate ministers of the sanctuary—a fact which practically proves the composition of the Priestly Code to have been subsequent to the reforms indicated by Ezekiel. Further innovations may be observed in the means adopted for the provision of the priesthood. Thus, while in D the worshipper himself consumes the firstlings, though of course the priest receives his due, in P the worshipper has no part or lot therein, as they are unreservedly appropriated for the support of the officiating minister. Other differences have also been detected.

Now these divergences might conceivably be susceptible of being explained away by harmonistic ingenuity, were not the conclusions they suggest borne out by corroborative testimony drawn from two independent quarters. Historically it can be shown that these different codes correspond to different stages of Israel's development. It can be shown that D was unknown before Josiah, and P before the Exile. A minute and patient investigation of such contemporary evidence as we possess in the historical books has proved conclusively that many of the laws of the Pentateuch as a whole were unknown to the country Desire. It can be shown that D was unknown to the religious leaders or social reformers of the country. It has also been shown that on two occasions far-reaching changes were taken in hand on the lines, and on the basis, of those two later codes, embodied in Deuteronomy and Leviticus.

Linguistically it has become no less evident that each code has its own peculiar terminology, its own stylistic idiosyncrasies, its own characteristic mode of presentation. The continual recurrence of remarkable word-phrases, and even sentences, in each of the three codes, coupled with the fact that this distinctive phraseology and vocabulary is strictly confined to that particular code, and does not appear in either of the two others, may be taken as an even approximately contemporaneous promulgation.

Language shows that they are not the work of the same author; history is equally decisive against their being the product of a single author. It may therefore be held to be beyond reasonable dispute that the legal portions of the Hexateuch are not compatible with the unity of authorship with an even approximately contemporaneous promulgation.

soil; Joshua is associated with Caleb both in the vain task of pacification and in the ensuing promise. We may take for granted that the rebellion of Korah (16:10, 1) was just an instance of three narratives which had been combined. In one, Dathan and Abiram, of the tribe of Reuben, rebelled against the civil domination of Moses, and are swallowed up alive by the earth; in the second, Korah and two hundred and fifty princes of the congregation protest against the limitation of priestly rites to the tribe of Levi, and are consumed by fire; in the third, Korah is the spokesman of an ecclesiastical agitation fostered by the Levites against the exclusive privileges enjoyed by Aaron and the Aaronic priesthood.

These differences of representation are invariably accompanied by a change of language and of characteristic expression—so that out of inextricable work of J there are gradually seen to emerge three literary entities corresponding to the three great legal strata.

1. Deuteronomy (\(-D\)) stands almost alone; but the work of the law corresponds to the Book of the Covenant, which is contained in its pages. Laborious investigations have established the fact that this is not a homogeneous document, but a composite work. Thence have been distinguished; and from the fact that one uses 'Jahveh,' the other 'Elohim' as the ordinary title for God, they have been called respectively the Jahwist and the Elohist, contracted into J and E, while the combination of those histories which seems to have been effected at a comparatively early date is known as JE.

2. The framework of the entire history is due to the author of the Priestly Code, and this document, which supply the schematic basis for the arrangement of the whole work, is accordingly known as P.

In conclusion, we should mention H, which stands for the Law of Holiness (Lv 17-26), a collection of moral and ceremonial laws, which is in many respects the expository of the work to the work of P in which it is embodied. There is also the redactor or editor (\(-R\)), who fused the different narratives together into one smooth and connected whole.

Even the composition does not exhaust the capacity of critics to distinguish yet other sources used in the composition of the Hexateuch. The excessive slant and arbitrary methods by which some writers have succeeded in detecting the existence, and defining the precise limits, of multiple authors, editors, and revisers, often resting their hypotheses on no surer foundation than the extremely precarious basis of subjective preferences, must be pronounced rather a caricature than a legitimate development of critical ingenuity.

II. CRITICISM OF THE HEXATEUCH.—It is the task of criticism to discover the respective dates, and to determine the mutual relations of the component parts of the Hexateuch.

1. Spasmodic attempts have been made throughout the 17th cent. towards a critical study of the Hexateuch; but to Jean Astruc, physician to Louis xiv., belongs the honour of being the first to deal with the subject in a scientific and systematic form (1753). He it was who first noted in Genesis the alternation of Divine names, and attributed this phenomenon to the two main sources from which the compilations of Genesis was compiled. This discovery was developed by Eichhorn, and became known as the Document Hypothesis. Eichhorn observed that the variation of Divine names was regularly accompanied by other characteristic differences both in a linguistic and an historical standpoint. Further investigation revealed the presence of two sources, both employing the title 'Elohim.' This theory of a Second Elohist, from which at first many erroneous inferences were drawn, has established itself in the doctrine of Hexateuch criticism as a no less unassailable conclusion than the original discovery of Astruc himself.

2. These unexpected discoveries in the text of Genesis naturally suggested the critical analysis of the remaining books of the Hexateuch. But the absence of any such distinctive criterion as the use of the two Divine names made progress difficult. Geddes, however, in Scotland (1800) and Vater in Germany (1802) essayed the task. The latter, in particular, developed a consistent theory, known as the Fragment Hypothesis. He held that the perpetual repetitions and varying phraseology characteristic of the different sections were susceptible of rational arrangement only as an agglomeration of fragments, subsequently collected and not inharmoniously patched together by an industrious historian of Israel's early literature and antiquities. He believed that Deuteronomy originated from a less identifiable corpus, and that it formed the kernel round which the rest of the Pentateuch was gradually added.

3. The chief weakness of this second theory (itself a natural exaggeration of the first) lay in the fact that it entirely ignored those indications of a unifying principle and of a deliberate plan which are revealed by an examination of the Hexateuch as a whole. It was the great merit of de Wette to make this abundantly clear. But he also inaugurated an era of historical as opposed to, or rather as complementary to, literary criticism. He led the way in instituting a careful comparison between the contemporary narratives and the exegetical legislation. As a result of this examination, he became convinced that Deuteronomy presented a picture of Israel's life and worship unknown in Israel before the time of Josiah's reformation. Only a short time elapsed after this discovery, a date of which Hupfeld's (1853) pointed out that it ascribed to the Jahwist mutually incompatible narratives, and a supplementary position quite foreign to his real character.

4. We thus come to the Later Document Theory. Hupfeld's labours bore fruit in three permanent results.

1. There are two distinct Elohist documents underlying Genesis—those chapters which have undergone a Jahwistic redaction (e.g. 20:1-15) being assigned to a different author from the writer of Gn 1. (2) The Jahwist must be regarded as an independent source no less than the Elohist. (3) The repetitions and interferences of the Jahwist entirely disprove the Supplement Theory, and show that he is probably not even acquainted with the Elohist, but furnishes a self-contained, complete, and independent account. Hupfeld found a valuable ally in Noldeke, who, while introducing some minor modifications, showed how the Elohist framework could be traced throughout the entire Hexateuch, and how it might easily be recognized by observing the recurrence of its linguistic peculiarities and the fixedness of its religious ideas.

5. The Graf-Wellhausen Theory.—It will be observed that although criticism had begun to disentangle the component parts of the Hexateuch, no effort was made to inaugurate an inquiry into the mutual relations of the different documents. Still less does it seem to have occurred to any one to regard these three literary stratafication as embodiments, as it were, of various historical processes through which the nation passed at widely different periods. In the middle of the 19th cent. this criticism was finally reached as to the use and extent of the different sources. Graf (1866) instituted a comparison between these sources themselves; and, assuming the identity of D with Josiah's law-book as a fixed point from which to commence investigations, concluded, after an exhaustive inquiry, that while D presupposes the Jahwistic laws in Ex 20-23. 34, the bulk of the Levitical legislation (i.e. F or the Elohistic Grundschreif) must have been written before the Exile. Testifying to this result by external evidence, he concluded that P could not have been produced before the Exile, and that in all probability it was compiled by Ezra.

Some details of Graf's theory rendered it especially vulnerable; but it was adopted by Wellhausen, whose Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1883) may be regarded as the culminating point of Biblical criticism.
In his analysis of the Hexateuch, he lied on the main question indisputable—a comparison of the laws with the evidence supplied by the prophetic and historical books shows that 'the three great strata of laws embodied in the so-called books of Moses are not all of one age, but correspond to three stages in the development of Israel's institutions.' Moreover, he justly pointed out that there were no valid grounds to distinguish between the legal and the historical sections JE, which is mainly narrative, yet embodies the Sinaitic legislation; Deuteronomy gives a full historical presentation; the Priestly Code supplies the framework of the whole. The chronological order of these codes may now be estimated beyond dispute—Jahwistic; Deuteronomy, Priestly Code. 'When the codes are set in their right places the main source of confusion is removed, the central problem of criticism is solved, and the controversy between modern criticism and conservative tradition is really decided' (W. R. Smith, OTJC 388).

111. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HEXATEUCH.—It now remains to note the characteristics of the different documents, distinguishing not merely their literary differences but also their religious standpoint. Perhaps it will be simplest to begin with Deuteronomy, which, being, in large and in general, all the more considerably the clearest evidence of independent thought and language, and whose approximate age, moreover, can be determined with a precision little short of absolute accuracy.

(1) D.—From 2 K 22. 23 we learn that a book of the Law discovered in the temple created an immense sensation, and provided the basis for the national reforamation undertaken by king Josiah in the year B.C. 621 at the instance of the prophetic party. The old theory was that this 'Book of the Covenant' was really the Pentateuch, composed ages before, long fallen into corruption, at length accidentally rediscovered and finally adopted as the rule of national righteousness.
But this view is wholly untenable.

(i) It is incredible that the whole Pentateuch should have disappeared so utterly, or been so wholly forgotten.
The book discovered in the temple made so great an impression because to every one concerned it brought an entirely new message.

(ii) History has shown clearly that a very large part of the Pentateuch—the Levitical legislation—did not come into being, or at any rate into force, till very many years later; and that, therefore, these laws could not by any possibility have been included in this newly discovered work.

(iii) We may add that the account mentions that 'all the words of the book' were read out loudly twice on two different occasions. The manifest impossibility of such a feat with reference to the entire Pentateuch has driven conservative critics to suggest a theory of appropriate selections; but this may be supposed is less than better than a dishonest evasion.

(iv) Finally, the 'Book of the Covenant' is a title never given to the entire Pentateuch, but only to certain of its constituent elements.

If negative evidence proves that the law-book thus discovered was only a part of the Pentateuch, positive reasons leave practically no room for doubt that this part of the Law was identical with Deuteronomy.

(i) The name 'Book of the Covenant' can refer only to Ex 24-34 or to Deuteronomy. The other title 'Book of the Law' is repeatedly used in D itself as its own appropriate and familiar designation.

(ii) But we can best judge of the contents and character of Josiah's law-book by observing its effect. The discovery of the book led to two important consequences. (a) An entire reform of the whole system of the law took place; the emplacement of local sanctuaries, and the centralization of all sacrificial worship in the Temple at Jerusalem. (b) The celebration of a great Passover, which was a type of all the sacrifications prescribed in the new book, by the entire people.

Stylistically and linguistically, the distinguishing characteristics of D are very marked. 'In vocabulary, indeed, it presents comparatively few exceptional words;
but particular words and phrases, consisting of entire clauses, recur with extraordinary frequency, giving a distinctive colouring to every part of the work' (Driver, op. cit. 99). So much so, indeed, that it is possible to recognize immediately, with the aid of D Driver's authorship, or written under Deuteronomic influence.

(For a convenient prospectus of such words and phrases the reader is referred to the careful synopsis, ib. 99-102.)
The style is free and flowing; long and stately periods abound; but there is no affectation or monotonity in the persuasive eloquence with which the writer urges the claims of Jahweh upon Israel.

Theologically, the distinctive feature of D is the Jehovistic, that is to say, the priestly—Jahwistic; Deuteronomy, Priestly Code. 'When the codes are set in their right places the main source of confusion is removed, the central problem of criticism is solved, and the controversy between modern criticism and conservative tradition is really decided' (W. R. Smith, OTJC 388).

(2) F.—If D represents the prophetic formulation of Mosaic legislation, viewed in the light of the subsequent history and religious experiences of four centuries, so that they show by their very survival how much they mean to the people, F shows us how, in the case of each people's own history, the natural or supernatural theocracy found practical embodiment in the realization of priestly ideals, the early history of Israel was interpreted in accordance with the requirements of a later age.
Just as the law of the ancient sanctuary in Deut.
is the practical application of Issiah's doctrine concerning the sanctity and inviolability of Zion, so the separation of the Levites from the priests, which is perpetually emphasized throughout Leviticus, is really the outcome of Ezekiel's suggestion as to the best solution of the difficulty which arose when, in consequence of Josiah's reformation, the high places were suppressed, and the priests who served there were consequently dispossessed of all means of subsistence. It was Ezekiel's idea that the Levites, though previously enjoying full priestly rights, should forfeit their privileges in consequence of their participation in the idolatrous practices which had characterized the worship at the high places, and should be degraded to the performance of menial duties connected with the cultus established at Jerusalem. A comparison of the theology and of the historical circumstances presupposed by F practically demonstrates its origin to be later than Ezekiel. Of course this refers only to its literary production, not to all its contents, some of which (e.g. the 'Law of Holiness') are plainly derived from a much more ancient source. It is, however, a mistake to view F as simply a code dealing with ritual regulations, or as the religious law-book of the restored community.
The author, writing from a priestly standpoint, aims at giving a complete and systematic account of the 'theories,' both political and religious, of his nation.
Accordingly chronologically lists, enumeration of names, and other similar statistics constitute a prominent feature of his narrative; and by those signs throughout the entire Hexateuch it becomes easy to distinguish the writer. As a rule, he is content to give a mere outline of the history, unless it becomes necessary to explain the origin of some ceremonial institution. In representing God's converse with men, he shrinks from using the forceful, familiar language which earlier writers employed without scruple. Anthropomorphisms are rare, angels and dreams are not mentioned. On the other hand, P nowhere deals with those deeper spiritual problems—the origins of evil, the purpose of election, the idea of a universal mission, the Messianic hope—which were so marked a feature in Israel's religious consciousness, and which both claimed and received sympathetic, if not sym pathetic, treatment from the other authors of the Hexateuch.

The style of P is scarcely less distinctive than that of D. It is 'stereotyped, measured, and prosaic.' There is a marked absence of the poetical element; and any less marked repetition of stated formule. Even the historical sections are marked by a quasi-legal phraseology, while the methodical completeness with which details are described, and directions given, tends at times to degenerate into monotonous prolixity.

There can be no doubt that P with its systematic chronology furnishes the historical and literary framework of the Hexateuch; but the obvious deduction that it is therefore the earliest document to which the others were in process of time attached, has been proved erroneous by a comparison and combination of historical, literary, and theological considerations. We must, however, bear in mind that 'although there are a number of views and reasons which cannot seriously be controverted—for supposing that the Priests' Code assumed finally the shape in which we have it, in the age subsequent to Ezra. It rests ultimately upon an ancient tradition, on a basis. ... The laws of P, even when they included later elements, were still referred to Moses—no doubt because in its basic and origin Hebrew legislation was actually derived from him, and was only modified gradually' (Driver, op. cit. 154).

(3) JE.—We now come to the remaining portions of the Hexateuch—which for convenience sake are known as JE. It is a necessity, indeed, needless multiplication of writers or documents; but the critical analysis of JE forces us to the conclusion that it is really a composite work, embodying two distinct traditions, combined with an able skill by a subsequent editor. From a literary no less than from a linguistic standpoint, diversities and even divergences appear which convert doubt into certainty. Yet the compilation has a character of its own, and principles of its own, which may be termed prophetic in distinction from those which find expression in the Priestly Code. Both the documents from which JE was compiled traverse pretty much the same ground, and present at about the same time. This would largely account for their frequent similarities; and of course it would have been the editor's aim to remove any glaring discrepancies. We thus find the whole narrative characterized by a kind of superficial homogeneity, and also by the same general religious beliefs and hopes. But notwithstanding these considerations, the original independence of the two documents is so manifest in the greater part of the narrative that it has become an almost unanimously accepted conclusion of Hexateuchal criticism. The two sources are distinguished in three ways. They often tell a different tale; they employ different language; they proclaim a different message.

It is in the history of the patriarchs that we first become aware of different accounts of the same transaction (neither of which can be referred to P) standing side by side, although the independence is so marked that it passes into irreconcilable divergences. Similar phenomena abound throughout the Hexateuch. When once the possibility of two documents was suspected, stylistic distinctions, themselves hitherto unsuspected, began to confirm this conclusion. The use of 'Jahweh' by the one writer, of 'Elohim' by the other, furnished a simple criterion, which was not, however, uniformly available, especially after Genesis. But other differences, not sufficient in themselves to prove diversity of authorship, were yet collected in sufficient numbers to lend strong support to the hypothesis which had been arrived at on quite different grounds. But the distinctions are by no means merely literary artifices. While E arose in Northern Israel, and D in the neighboring Judah, the author manifests in the Northern sanctuaries, J appears to have originated in the kingdom of Judah (cf. the prominent part that distinctively Southern stories occupy in the course of the patriarchal history); the eminence of Judah, rather than Reuben, among the sons of Jacob. J is a patriot, and takes a loving pride in Israel's early history; but he is not content with the mere national past, he seeks to arrive at a high ideal of humanity. The whole patriarchal story is 'instinct with the consciousness of a great future' (Driver), which takes the form of a mission in, if not to, the world. The style of J is free and flowing, vivid and picturesque. His delineation of character, his introduction of dialogue, his powerful description of scenes from common life, if somewhat idealistic, are yet so natural and graceful as to give the impression of unsurpassable nature. The book of Genesis, indeed, is marked by the absence of theological scruples, and uses anthropomorphic and even anthropopathic expressions with frequency and without reserve.—the Elohist or Ephraimitic source—more restrained in his language, more didactic in his history, more theological in his religious beliefs. The prophetic element is strongly brought out. Abraham is expressly called a prophet, Moses a prophet. The function of Moses is prophetic in all but in name; the seventy elders receive prophetic inspiration; Joseph receives the spirit of Elohim; and Balaam's prophetic office is recognized. E, on the other hand, has a deep-seated conviction of the importance of a high ethical standard. God speaks through angels and human agents, reveals himself in dreams. By this means the bold but forceful language of J is toned down to a conformity with the demands or fears of a more timorous orthodoxy. It is a curious fact that E ignores Israel's mission to the world; indeed, the author takes little or no interest in the affairs of other nations, or in the universal significance of Israel's history or Israel's hope. It is the theocracy in Israel that engages all his attention, and his work may be considered as drawing from the early history of the national annals a lesson for the age in which he wrote—a lesson of the importance of high ethical standards, and of the reverence and worship due to the exalted Being who was Israel's God.

Which of those two histories was the first to be committed to writing is a subject upon which critics are not agreed; but there is a general consensus of opinion that both authors wrote after the establishment of the monarchy. The usual date fixed is the century before B.C. 750. It must not, however, for a moment be imagined that the date of an event being recorded in a regular historical work is contemporaneous with its actual occurrence, and there is no valid reason for throwing discredit upon the narratives or representations of JE because it was not till many years later that oral tradition concerning them became crystallized in a written record.

It may legitimately be asked to what extent the criticism of the Hexateuch affects our belief in the inspiration of the sacred books. Our answer is that we have gained immeasurably. (1) Assuming the whole Hexateuch have been composed by Moses, the divergences and alternations throughout the entire legislation are so numerous and manifold as to lay the work of the great lawgiver open to the charge of endless inconsistency and "artificial experimenting." (2) The history of the chosen nation was, on the traditional view, perfectly unintelligible. For many centuries the majority of the laws given as hypothesi at Nineveh were not only impracticable but even unknown. Now we see how at each stage of the nation's religious development God raised up men inspired by His Spirit to interpret the past in the light of present needs, and to prepare the way by the aid of past experience; men who were commissioned to develop past legislation into a living message, to show how the Mosaic legislation contained within itself corrective and suggestive elements of an inscrutable life, ever renewing itself in such laws or forms as were required to secure the preservation of the nation and the religious ideals for which it stood. It is true that the Hexateuch has been the core of the Deuteronomic covenant, and that Sennacherib's invasion came in his fourteenth year are inconsistent (2 K 19:13, 14). The latter has probability on its side, and we know that Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701 the calculation is easily made.

Politically Hezekiah had a difficult task. His father had submitted to Assyria, but the vassalage was felt to be severe. The petty kingdoms of Palestine were revolting under the yoke, and they were encouraged by the Assyrians to make an effort for independence. There was always an Egyptian party at the court of Jerusalem, though at this time Egypt was suffering from internal dissensions. In the East the kingdom of Babylonia was also in trouble for the Assyrians. Hezekiah seems to have remained faithful to the suzerain for some years after his accession, but when, about the time of Sennacherib's accession (704), a coalition was formed against the oppressor he joined it. We may venture to suppose that about this time he received the embassy from Merodach-baladan (2 K 20:24, Is 39:3), which was intended to secure the co-operation of the Western States with Babylon in the effort then being made. Isaiah, as we know from his own discourses, was opposed to the Egyptian alliance, and apparently to the whole movement. The Philistines were for revolt; only Padi, king of Ekron, hold out for his master the king of Assyria. For this reason Hezekiah invaded his territory and took him prisoner. If, as the Biblical account seems to intimate (2 K 19:7), he incorporated the conquered land in his own kingdom, the gain was not for a long time. In 701 Sennacherib appeared on the scene, and there was no possibility of serious resistance. The inscriptions tell us that the invaders captured forty-six walled towns, and carried 200,000 Judahites into slavery. The Egyptian (some suppose it to be an Arabian) army made a show of coming to the help of its allies, but was met on the border and defeated. Hezekiah was compelled to release the captive Padi, who returned to his throne in triumph. Sennacherib was detained at Lachish by the stubborn resistance of that fortress, and could send only a detachment of his troops to Jerusalem. With it went an embassy, the account of which may be read in 2 K 18:19 and Is 36:7. The laconic sentence: 'Hezekiah sent to the king of Assyria, saying: I have offended; that which thou puttest on me will I bear' (2 K 18:19) shows that submission was made. The price of peace was a heavy one—three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold. To pay it, all the gold and silver that could be found was gathered together, even the Temple doors (v.18) being stripped of their precious metal.

In our accounts we read of a great destruction which came upon the Assyrian army (2 K 19:35, Is 37:37). Whether Sennacherib was not satisfied with the submission of Hezekiah, or whether the second campaign was made which the historian has confused with this one, is not yet certainly known. There was a second expedition of Sennacherib's to the west some years later than the one we have been considering. At that time, it may be, the pestilence broke out and made the army too weak for further operations. It is clear that the people of Jerusalem felt that they had had a remarkable deliverance. Hezekiah's sickness is dated by the Biblical writer in the time of this invasion, which can hardly be correct if the king lived fifteen years after that experience.

The account of Hezekiah's religious reforms is more sweeping than seems probable for that date. There seems no reason to doubt, however, that he destroyed the brazen serpent, which had been an object of worship in the Temple (2 K 18:4). The cleansing of the country sanctuaries from the idolatry, which had been accomplished at the same time. The expansions of the Chronicler (2 Ch 32:29) must be received with reserve.

An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1), possibly to be identified with the king of the same name.

HEZRON.—Father of Tabitha-ech, grandfather of Benhadad, the Syrian king (1 K 15:32). It has been plausibly suggested that Hezron is identical with Rezon of 1 K 11:19, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus, and an adversary to Solomon.

HEZIR.—1. The 17th of the priests courses (1 Ch 24:1). 2. A lay family, which signed the covenant (Neh 10:18).

HEZRO or HEZRAI.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:30, 1 Ch 11:32).

HEZRON.—1. The eponymous head of a Reubenite family (Gn 46:10, Ex 6:4, Nu 26:1—Ch 5:7). 2. The eponymous head of a Judahite family (Gn 46:12, Nu 26:3—Ru 4:18, 19, 1 Ch 2:9, 10, 12, 22, 25, 26, 31). This Hezron appears also in the NT in the genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1:4, Lk 3:32). The gentile name Hezronites occurs in 1 Ch 26:21 referring to the descendants of Mebuzah in v.3 referring to those of No. above. 3. A town in the south of Judah (Jos 15:25) Hazar-adar of Nu 34:13.

HIDDAL.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:30). He is called Hural in the parallel list 1 Ch 11:4.

HIDDEKEL.—The river Tigris, mentioned as the third river of Paradise (Gn 2:14), and as the great river of the Euphrates, and as the great river by the side of which Daniel had his vision (Dan 10). The Heb. Hiddbyss was taken from the Bab. name for the Tigris, Idigat or Diglat, which was in turn derived from its Sumerian name, Idigna. L. W. King.

HIEL.—The name of a certain Bethelite who in the days of Ahab fortified Jericho, and possibly sacrificed his two sons to appease the gods of the disturbed earth (1 K 16:31). Some obscure event is here applied as a comment on the curse on Jericho's influence of Jezreel by Joshua.

HIERAPOLIS ('holy city') is mentioned in the Bible only in Col 4:1, in association with the neighbouring towns Laodicea and Colossae. All three were situated in the valley of the Lycus, a tributary of the Maeander, in Phrygia, Hierapolis on the north side being about 6 miles from the former and 12 miles from the latter. (The best map of this district is p. 472 of Ramsay's Church in the Roman Empire.) It probably belonged originally to the tribe Hydrelite, and derived its title from the medicinal hot springs there, which revealed plainly to the ancient mind the presence of a divinity.
Hierell

The water is strongly impregnated with alum, and the calcareous deposit which it forms explains the modern name Pambuk-Kalesi (Cotton Castle). Another sacred attribute of the city was a hole, without the circumference of a man’s body, from which noxious vapours issued: Strabo (in the time of Augustus) had seen sparrows stilled by them. The city owed all its importance in NT times to its religious character. It had not been visited by St. Paul, but derived from his influence (cf. Ac 1930 and Col.). Legend declares that the Apostles Philip and John preached there, and this appears trustworthy. The flight between native superstition are the enmities. In this by Christianity must have been very bitter. The city remained important throughout the Empire, and was the birthplace of Epictetus, the Stoic. A. Bouter.

Hieress is the Hebrew Ezr 10:3. Hieremoth—1. 1 Es 9:6—Ezr 10:4 Jeremoth. 2 1 Es 9:6—Ezr 10:4 Jeremoth (RVm 'Ramoth').

Hieronymus.—A Syrian officer in command of a district of Pal. under Antiochus e. Eupator, who harassed the Jews after the withdrawal of Lydias in B.C. 165 (2 Mac 12).

High Place, Sanctuary.—The term 'sanctuary' is used by modern scribes of the Judges and of the scribes, a wider and a narrower. On the one hand, it may denote, as the etymology suggests, any 'holy place,' the sacredness of which is derived from its association with the presence of a deity. In the narrower sense 'sanctuary' is used of every consecrated part of the temple, provided with an altar and other apparatus of the cult, the special designation of which in OT is bāmāh, RV 'holy place.' In this latter sense 'sanctuary' and 'holy place' are used synonymously, as in Am 7:14 the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste.

1. In the wider sense of 'sanctuary,' as above defined, any arbitrarily chosen spot may become a holy place, if tradition associates it with a theophany, or visible manifestation of a Divine being. Such, indeed, was the origin of the most famous of the world's sanctuaries (see 2 S 24-53). On the other hand, certain objects of nature—springs and rivers, trees and rocks, and, in particular, mountains—have been regarded with special reverence by many primitive peoples as 'the homes or haunts of the gods.' Thus the belief in the peculiar sacredness of springs and wells of 'living water' is one that has survived to our own day, even among advanced races. It is to this belief that the ancient sanctuary at Bethshemesh (which see) owed its origin. A similar belief in sacred trees as the abode of superhuman spirits or numina has been scarcely less tenacious. The holy places which figure so conspicuously in the stories of the patriarchs are in many cases tree-sanctuaries of immemorial antiquity, such as 'the terebinth of Moreh,' at Shechem, under which Abram is said to have built his first altar in Canaan (Gen 12:4.5; cf. 19:3).

More sympathetic to the modern mind is the choice of mountains and hills as holy places. On mountain-tops, men, from remote ages, have felt themselves nearer to the Divine beings with whom they sought to hold converse (cf. Ps 121). From OT the names of Horeb (or Sinai), the 'mountain of God' (Ex 3:2), of Ebal and Gerizim, of Carmel and Tabor (Hos 9:5), at once suggest themselves as sanctuaries where the Hebrews worshipped their God.

2. From these natural sanctuaries, which are by no means peculiar to the Hebrews or even to the Semitic family, we may now pass to a fuller discussion of the local sanctuaries or 'holy places,' which were the recognized places of worship in Israel until near the close of the seventh century B.C. Whatever may be the precise etymological significance of the term bāmāh (plur. bāmōth), there can be no doubt that 'holy places' is a sufficiently accurate rendering. Repeatedly in OT the worshippers are said to 'go up' to, and to 'come down' from, the high places. The normal situation of a high place relative to the city whose sanctuary it was is very clearly brought out in the tale of the meeting of Samuel and Saul at Ramah (1 S 9:25-34). It is important, however, to note that a local sanctuary, even when it bore the name bāmāh, might be, and presumably often was, within the city, and was not necessarily situated on a height. Thus Jeremiah speaks of 'holy places' (bāmāh) in the valley of Topheth at Jerusalem (7th 19:4 RV; cf. Ezk 6), and the high place, as we must call it, of the city of Gezer, presently to be described, lay in the depression between the two hills on which the city was built.

With few exceptions the high places of OT are much older, as places of worship, than the Hebrew conquest. Of this the Hebrews in later times were well aware, as is shown by the endeavour on the part of the popular tradition to claim their own patriarchs as the founders of the more famous sanctuaries. Prominent among these was the 'king's sanctuary' (1 S 7:17-18) at Bethel, with its companion sanctuary at Dan; scarcely less important were those of Gilgal and Beersheba, and the 'great high place' at Gibeon (1 K 3:4). In the days of Hezekiah the most famous sanctuary in Judah was that consecrated by the presence of the ark at Shiloh (1 Jg 21:19, I S 1:1 etc.), which was succeeded by the sanctuary at Nob (1 S 21:1). But while these and others attracted worshippers from near and far at the time of the great festivals, it may safely be assumed that every village throughout the land had, like Ramah, its local bāmāh.

3. In taking over from the Canaanites the high places at which they worshipped Baal and Astarte, the Hebrews made little or no change in their appearance and appointments. Our knowledge of the latter gleaned from OT is not of late years been considerably extended by excavations and discoveries in Palestine. By these, indeed, the history of some of the 'holy places' of Canaan has been carried back to the later Stone Age. Thus the excavations at Gezer, Taanach, and elsewhere have laid bare a series of rock sanctuaries fitted with cup-marks, which surely can have been intended only for the reception of sacrificial blood. The sanctuary of the Gezer cave-dwellers measures 90 by 80 feet, and the holy place here was constructed in the chief sanctuary in Ephraim was that consecrated by the presence of the ark at Shiloh. By one part of the primitive altar—a similar arrangement was found at Taanach—a shoot or channel had been arranged in order to convey the blood to a cave beneath the rock, in which was found a large quantity of the bones of pigs (PEFSI, 1903, 317 ff; 1904, 112 f.; Vincent, Canaan d’après l’exploration récente, 1907, 63 ff.). This cave was evidently regarded as the abode of chthonic or earth deities.

The excavations at Gezer have also furnished us with by far the most complete example of a high place of the Semitic invaders who took possession of the country about the middle of the third millennium B.C., and whose descendants, variously named Canaanites and Amorites, were in turn partly displaced by, partly incorporated with, the Hebrews. The high place of Gezer consists of a level platform about 32 yards in length, lying north and south across the middle of the tumulus. Its most characteristic feature is a row of standing stones, the pillars or mazzoth of OT, of which eight are still in situ. They range in height from 5 to 7 ft. 6 in., and are all 'unhewn blocks, simply set on end, supported at the base by smaller stones.' The second and smallest of the series is regarded by Mr. Macalister as the oldest and most sacred, inasmuch as HIGH PLACE, SANCTUARY

It's top has become smooth and polished by repeated anointings with blood or oil, perhaps by the king himself, (cf. 1 K 18:3, Hos 13:19).

It is impossible within present limits to describe fully this important discovery, or to discuss the many problems which it raises (see, for details, EBFS, 1906, 33 ff.; Macalister, Bible Society's Excavations at Gezer, 54 ff.; Vincent, op. cit. 109 ff., all with plans and illustrations).

It must, however, be added that 'all round the feet of the columns and over the whole area of the high place, the earth was dug out to be a regular cemetery, in which the skeletons of young infants, never more than a week old, were deposited in jars'—evidence of the sacrificial first born (Macalister, op. cit. 73 f.).

Still another type of Semitic sanctuary with temple, presenting many features of interest, is minutely described and illustrated by Flinders Petrie in his Researches in Sinai, 1896, chs. vi. vii. x.

4. K. To all given high places' (the sanctuary of Bethel, with its casemate walls and its idol of the calf (cf. 1 K 12:30, cf. 15:1; 2 K 23:12; 2 Chr 36:15, as shown by the material furnished by these recent discoveries with the OT data, we find that the first essential of a Hebrew high place was the altar. This might consist merely of a heap of earth or unhewn stone, commanded by Ex 20:24; or, as shown by surviving examples (see ALTAR, § 2), it might be hewn out of the solid rock and approached by steps. Against this more elaborate type the legislation of Ex 20:24 withstood as a protest the desire to provide the proper equipment of a high place (cf. Dt 12:2, Hos 10:1 RV etc.) were the stone pillars or mazzebabha, the symbols of the deity (see PILLAR), and the wooden two-storied palaces known as a smaller scale, have been found at Tell es-Safi (perhaps the ancient Gath), and in the north of Palestine, by the Austrian and German explorers, of whose discoveries an excellent summary is given by Father Vincent in his recently published work above cited.

Several examples of another type of high place have been discovered on a rocky summit overlooking Petra; the most complete is that described in Hastings' DB iv. 306. Still another type of Semitic sanctuary with temple, presenting many features of interest, is minutely described and illustrated by Flinders Petrie in his Researches in Sinai, 1896, chs. vi. vii. x. But it will suffice for our present purposes to consider only the high places of the Israelite kingdom, which have yielded the most complete material for study.

5. At these local sanctuaries, and at these alone, the early Hebrews worshipped J as their God. The new sanctuary established by David at the threshing-floor of Araunah, where afterwards the Temple of Solomon was erected, was at first but another addition to the list of Hebrew high places. At these, from Dan to Beer-sheba, sacrifices were offered by individuals, by the family (1 S 1 23), and by the clan (209); men ate and drank 'before the Lord' at the joyful sacrificial meal. The latter were brought the tithes and other thank offerings for the good gifts of God; if the men returned to consult the priestly oracle, to inquire of the Lord in cases of difficulty, there was no sanctity attached to the name of J. At the local sanctuary, when a campaign was impending, the soldiers were consecrated for 'the wars of J' (see War). There, too, the messenger and the scribe found the right asylum. But there was a darker side to the picture. The sacrifices were not seldom accompanied by excess (Am 2:1, Is 28:9; cf. 1 S 11); prostitution even was practised with religious sanction (1 K 21:1, 1 K 14:9).

6. 'The history of the high places is the history of the old religion of Israel' (Moore). As the Hebrews gradually became masters of Canaan, the high places at which the local Baalim and Ashtartes had been worshipped became, as we have seen, the legitimate subjects of J, in harmony with the universal experience of history as to the permanence of sacred sites through all the changes of race and religion. At these the most zealous apostates of the religion of J were content to worship. It was inevitable, however, that in the circumstances heathen elements should mingle with the purer ritual of Yahweh worship. It is this contamination and corruption of the cultus at the local sanctuaries that the eighth-century prophets attack with such vehemence, not the high places themselves. In Hosea's day the higher aspects of the religion of J were so completely lost sight of by the Israelites that he could describe the religion of his contemporaries as unadulterated heathenism, and their worship as idolatry.

While this was the state of matters in the Northern Kingdom, the unique position which the sanctuary at Jerusalem had acquired in the south, and the comparative purity of the cultus as there practised, gradually led, under the Divine guidance, to the great thought that, as J 'Himself was one, the place of His worship should also be one, and the high places of that place of Deuteronomy is the deposit of this epoch-making teaching (see esp. 12:17). Whatever may have been the extent of Hezekiah's efforts in this direction, it was not until the eleventh year of the reign of Josiah (622-621 B.C.) that effective measures were taken, under the immediate impulse of Deuteronomy, for the destruction of the high places and the suppression of the worship of Baal. These efforts of Josiah were continued at the local shrines (2 K 23:14). But the break with the ideas and customs of the past was too violent. With the early death of Josiah the local cults revived, and it needed the使劲 efforts of the two Kings to secure the victory of Deuteronomist teaching for the centralization of the cultus.

7. To men inspired by the ideals of Dt. we owe the compilation of Psalms, known as the Psalter, which was edited, according to the strict sense of the term, by the High Priest, to bring the worship at the local sanctuaries became illegal from the date of the erection of Solomon's Temple—'only the people sacrificed in the high places, because there was no house built for the name of the Lord from those days' (1 K 8:4). From this standpoint the editors of Kings pass judgment on the successive sovereigns, by whom 'the high places were not taken away' (1 K 15:25 RV and oft.). This adverse judgment is now seen to be unhistorical and party political.

HILKIAH.—See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

HILEL (1 Ch 6:49).—See HOLON, No. 1.

HILKIAH ('Jah is my portion,' or 'portion of Jah'). A favourite priestly name. 1. Father of Elisha, Hezekiah's chief of the household (2 K 18:18 etc. = Is 36:18 etc., Is 22:18-28). 2. A priest of Anathoth, probably of the line of Eli (see 1 K 22:25), father of Jeremiah (Jer 1); he is not to be identified with the next. 3. The high priest in B.C. 621, who 'found' during the repairs of the Temple and brought to Josiah's notice, through Shaphan, 'the book of the law' (2 K 22:11-27; Ch 34:14-33). Hilkiah headed the deputation sent to consult Huldah on this discovery (2 K 22:1-37 = 2 Ch 34:9-28); and presided over the subsequent purification of the Temple (2 K 23:17). He was a chief actor in the whole movement. There is no reason to doubt that his find was the genuine discovery of a lost law-book; this book was unmistakably the code of Deuteronomy (wh. see). 4. Father of the Gemariah of Jer 29:5. 5. Levi of the clan of Merari (1 Ch 6:42-51). 7. A 'chief of the priests' returning from the Exile in B.C. 536 (Neh 12:7). 8. A companion of Ezra at the public reading of the Law (Neh 8); he appears as Ezekias in 1 Es 9:1. G. G. FINDLAY.
HILL, HILL-COUNTRY.—These terms in RV represent Heb. (gāḇāh, har) and Greek names for either an isolated eminence, or a table-land, or a mountain-range, or a mountaneous district. Gāḇāh denotes properly 'the large rounded hill', and usually bare or nearly so, so conspicuous as to be easily seen in parts of Palestine, especially in Judah.' Cf. 'Gibeah of Saul,' 'of Phinehas,' 'of the foreskins,' 'of Moreh,' 'of Hachilah,' 'of Ammah,' 'of Gareb,' and 'of Elohim.' Har is to gāḇāh as close to the walks of the species, and includes not merely a single mound, but also a range or a district. It is usually applied to Zion. It is especially the description of the central mountaneous tract of Palestine reaching from the plains of Judah to the Negeb or desert country in the S.; the Shephelah or lowlands of the S.W.; the mūḏah or moorland, and the 'arabah or steppes of the S.E. The best-known har- or hill-country in Palestine is the 'hill-country of Judah,' and the Negeb or desert country in the S.; the hill of Samaria, the triple-peaked Hermon, Tabor, and Carmel.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF (called also 'valley of the son [Jer. 7: 32] or children [2 K 23: 10] of Hinnom,' 'valley' [2 Ch 26: 19, Neh 3: 23] and perhaps Jer 7: 30 as close to the walks of the species 'by the entry of the gate Harsith' [1 Jer 19: 2], possibly the Dung-gate. Evidently the Valley-gate opened into it (Neh 2: 20). It formed part of the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15: 18). The place name, the evil repulse on account of the idolatrous practices carried on there (2 K 23: 2, 2 Ch 28: 33), and on this account Jeremiah (7: 29) announced that it was to receive the name 'valley of Slaughter.' Here perpetual fires are said to have been kept burning to consume the rubbish of the city. Such associations with the Valley led afterwards to Ge-hinnom (NT Gehenna) becoming the type of hell.

The situation of the Valley of Hinnom has been much disputed. Of the three valleys of Jerusalem—the Kidron on the E., the Tyropoeon in the centre, and the Wady er-Rabāthi on the W.—each has in turn been identified as the Hinnom. In favour of the Kidron is the fact that the theological Gehinnom or Arab. Jahannam of Jewish, Christian, and early Moslem writers is located here; but this was probably a transference of name after the old geographer Eliezer was lost. For there are strong reasons (see below) against it. As the Tyropoeon was incorporated within the city walls before the days of Manasseh, it is practically impossible that it could have been the scene of the sacrifices of children, which must have been outside the city bounds (2 K 23: 36). The chief data are found in Jos 15: 18, where the boundary of Judah and Benjamin is described. If Bir Eyyub is E-nogor, as is generally most probable, then the Wady er-Rabāthi, known traditionally as Hinnom, is correctly so designated. Then this Valley of Hinnom is a gate or gorge, but the Valley of Kidron is always described as a 'small valley.' It is, of course, possible that the Valley of Hinnom may have included part of the open land formed by the junction of the three valleys below Siloam; and Topheh may have lain there, as is suggested by some authorities, but there is no necessity to extend the name beyond the limits of the actual gorge. Wady er-Rabāthi commences as a shallow open valley due W. of the Jaffa gate; near this gate it turns due South for about 3 of a mile, and then gradually curves to the left. It is this lower part, with its bare rocks, scarp, that presents the characters of a gate or gorge. Near where the valley joins the wide Kidron is the traditional site of Akeldama. E. W. G. HIPPOPOTAMUS.—See Beemoth.

HIRAH.—The Adullamite with whom Judah, according to the story of Gn 38 (J), appears to have entered into some kind of partnership in the matter of flocks. After Tamar had successfully carried out her stratagem, it was by the hand of his 'friend' Hira that Judah sent the promised kid to the supposed ge'deshāh (Gn 38: 20).

HIRAM.—1. King of Tyre, son and successor of Abshai. When David was firmly established on his throne, Hiram, we are told, sent messengers to him, and, in order to show his goodwill, gave David materials for building his palace, sending at the same time workmen, stone, cedar, and fir timber to be used in the building of the house of the Lord, while Solomon, in return, sent corn and oil to Hiram. Another sign of friendship was their joint enterprise in sending ships to Ophir to procure gold (1 K 9: 28; 2 Ch 9: 16, 18; 25: 19). A curious episode is recounted in 1 K 9: 14, according to which Solomon gave Hiram 'twenty cities in the land of Galilee.' The incident is not specified, but he gave Solomon 'skilled men in all crafts.' In the parallel account (2 Ch 1: 17) it is Hiram who gives cities (the number is not specified) to Solomon.

There is altogether considerable confusion in the Biblical references to Hiram, and it is a study of the passages in question shows. When these are compared with extra-Biblical information which we possess in the writings of early historians, discrepancies are emphasized. While, therefore, the friendly intercourse between Hiram and Solomon (as well as with David) is unquestionably historical, it is not always possible to say the same of the details.

2. The name of an artificer from Tyre 'filled with wisdom and understanding and cunning, to work all works in brass' (see 1 K 7: 14); he is also spoken of as 'skillful to work in gold, and in silver, in brass, in stone, and in timber, in fine gold, and in fine linen, and in crimson . . . . ' (2 Ch 2: 7). There is a discrepancy regarding his parentage: in 1 K 7: 14 he is said to have been the son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father Hiram of Tyre according to 2 Ch 2: 14 his mother belonged to the tribe of Dan, though here, too, his father was a Tyrian.

The form of the name is usually Hiram in the Books of Samuel and Kings, but the Chronicler renders it Hiram. Thus the form Huram, while we find also Hiram in 1 K 5: 17, 19.

HIRE, HIRING.—The former is used in AV alongside of its synonym 'wages,' by which it has been supplantated in mod. English in Gn 31: 18 (cf. 31: 24, with 31: 30 etc.); a hireling is a person 'hired' to work for a stipulated wage, such as a fieldlabourer (Mal 3: 5), shepherd (Jn 10: 11), or mercenary soldier (2 M 1: 14, cf. Jer 49: 3). No implication of unfaithfulness or dishonesty is necessarily conveyed by the term, although these ideas have now become associated with it owing to our Lord's application of the word to an unfaithful shepherd in Jn 15: 19.

HITTITES.—A people said in the J document (Ex 3: 17) to have been one of the pre-Israelite occupants of Palestine. The E document says they lived in the mountains (Nu 13: 29). They are often included by D and his followers among the early inhabitants of the land, while P tells us (Gn 23) that Abraham bought from a Hittite the cave of Machpelah at Hebron. They are probably the people known in Egyptian inscriptions as Khato, in Assyrian annals as Kahi, and in Homer (Od. xi. 319) as "Hihiti." It is supposed that the carved figures found in many parts of Asia Minor, having a peculiar type of high hat and shoes which turn up at the toe, and containing bilingual inscriptions of a distinctly type which are as yet undeciphered, are Hittite monuments. Assuming that this is correct, the principal habitat of the Hittites was Asia Minor, for these monuments are found from Karabel, a pass near Smyrna, to Erzerum, and from the so-called Niobe (originally a Hittite goddess), near Magnesia, to Jerabis, the ancient Carchemish, on the Euphrates. They have also been found at Zenjirli and Haranath in northern Syria (cf. Messerschmidt's Corp. Inscrip. Hetz. in Mitteilungen der Vorderas. Gesellschaft, xxviii. p. 91). It appears from these monuments that at Boghazkoi east of the Halys, at Marash, and at various points in ancient Galatia, Ly西亚ea, Isauria, and Cilia, the Hittites were especially strong. It is probable that their civilization was developed in Asia Minor, and that they afterwards pushed southward into northern Syria, invading a region far eastward as the Euphrates.

This is confirmed by what we know of them from the inscriptions of other nations. Our earliest mention of them occurs in the annals of Thothmes iii. of Egypt (about 1500 B.C.), to whom they paid tribute (cf. Breasteds' Ancient Records of Egypt, ii. 213).

In the reign of Amenophis iii. (about B.C. 1400) they attempted unsuccessfully to invade the land of Mittanion (about 1440), and succeeded in planting themselves on the Orontes valley in Syria (cf. KI 16. 23, and 255, 257). In the reign of Amenophis iv. they made much greater advances, as the el-Amarna letters show. In the next dynasty Seti i. fought a battle with the Hittites on the Euphrates, not far from the region of the Lebanon (Breasted, op. cit. ii. 71). In the reign of Rameses ii. Kadesh on the Orontes was in their hands. Rameses fought a great battle with them there, and afterwards made a treaty of peace with them (Breasted, op. cit. ii. 135 ff., Sayce, PSBA vol. xviii. p. 95). Meroe-Pthah and Rameses iii. had skirmishes with them, the latter as late as B.C. 1200. From the similarity of his name to the names of Hittite kings, Moore has conjectured (JAS xix. 139, 140) that Sieras (Jg 27) was a Hittite. If so, in the time of Deborah (about B.C. 1150) a Hittite dynasty invaded northern Palestine.

About B.C. 1100 Tiglath-pileser i. of Assyria fought with Hittites (KIBI 12). In David's reign individual Hittites such as Ahimelech and Uriah were in Israel (1 S. 26, 2 S. 11 etc.). The kings of the Hittites are said to have been contemporary with Solomon (1 K 10c 11), and to have been driven out of Palestine by the Assyrians (2 K 23). In the 9th cent. the Assyrian kings Ashurnasir-pal (KIB I. 105) and Shalmaneser (ib. p. 139) fought with Hittites, as did Tiglath-pileser i. (ib. ii. 20), in the next century, while Sargon ii. in 717 (1 K 20) destroyed the kingdom of Carchemish, the last of the Hittite kingdoms of which we have definite record. The researches of recent years, especially those of Jensen and Breasted, make it probable that the Carchemish were a Hittite people, and that Sennacherib, king of Assyria, mentioned in Xenophon's Anabasis as a vassal king of Persia about B.C. 400, was a Hittite. Possibly the people of Ly西亚ea, whose language Paul and Barnabas did not understand (Ac 14c 14), spoke a dialect of Hittite.

The Hittites accordingly played an important part in history from B.C. 1500 to B.C. 700, and lingered on in many parts of Asia Minor. It is probable that a Hittite kingdom in Sardis preceded the Lydian kingdom there (cf. Herod. l. 7). The Lydian Cybele and Artemis of Ephesus were probably originally Hittite divinities.

Jensen, who has made a little progress in deciphering the Hittite inscriptions, believes them to be an Aryan people, the ancestors of the Armenians (cf. his Hittiler und Armentor), but this is very doubtful.

Politically the Hittites were not, so far as we know, united. They seem to have formed small city-states.

The religion of the Hittites seems to have had some features in common with Semitic religion (cf. Barton, Semitic Origins, pp. 311-316). George A. Barton.

HITTITES.—One of the tribes of Palestine which the Israelites displaced (Ex 3 25-7 [II]). Our oldest source (j) says that they were the people who, fearing to meet the Israelites in battle, by a ruse made a covenant with them (Jos 9). A Deuteronomic editor states that the kings of the Hittites had given in marriage their daughters to Solomon (1 K 14c 11), and that Solomon had "taken of their daughters to wife." The monument at Alarsha (Gibon) appears to be Hittite, and was six miles N.W. of Jerusalem, and Beeroth ten miles N. of it. Probably, therefore, they inhabited a region north of Jerusalem. Gn 24c (P) makes the Shechemites Hivites, but this is of doubtful authority. The main part of the chapter is silent on this point. In Jos 11v and Jg 3v they seem to be located near Hermon in the Lebanon, but Hivite is probably here a corruption of "Hittle" (cf. Moore, Judges, p. 78). Deuteronomy introduces Hivites in their list of Canaanite peoples, usually placing them before Jebusites. Perhaps this indicates that they lived near Jerusalem. 28 24v, though vague, is not inconsistent with this. Some have supposed Hivite to mean 'villager,' but the etymology is most uncertain. Really nothing is known of their racial affinities.

HIZKI.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8v). HIZKIAH (AV Hezekiah).—A son of Neariah, a descendant of David (1 Ch 23v).

HOBAB.—In E (Ex 3 25-7 [II]) the father-in-law of Moses is uniformly named Jethro. But Nu 10c 9 (J) speaks of 'Holab the son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law.' It is uncertain how this should be punctuated, and it is possible that the writer of this book has misunderstood Nu 10v, the latter in Ex 24v. The RV in Jg 14v 4 attempts to harmonize the two by rendering kibben 'brother-in-law.' But this harmonization is doubtful, for it is true that in Aram, and Arab, the cognate word can be used rather loosely to describe a wife's relations, as there is no evidence that it is ever so used in Heb., and it would be strange to find the father and the brother of the same man's wife described by the same term; (2) Ex 24v appears to imply that the priest of Midian had no sons. It is possible that the name Reuel was adopted in v.14 by one who knew, or to whom it was explained, that his name was that of the father-in-law of Moses' father-in-law. The former view is found in Jg 4v (cf. 11v), the latter in Ex 24v. The RV in Jg 14v 4 attempts to harmonize the two by rendering kibben 'brother-in-law.'

HOBAB.—The place to which, acc. to Gn 14v, Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer. It is described as 'on the left hand (i.e. 'to the north') of the city of Damascus.' It is identified, with considerable probability, with the modern Hoba, 20 hours N. of Damascus.

HOBABAH.—See HABAAH.

HOD ("majesty").—An Asherite (1 Ch 7v).

HODAVIAH.—1. A Manassite clan (1 Ch 7v). 2. The name of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 9v). 3. A Levitical family name (Ezr 2v); called in Neh 7v.

HODESHEH ("new moon").—One of the wives of Shalaah, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8v).
HODEVAH

HODEVAH.—See Hodaviah, No. 3.

HOGHAL ('partridge').—Daughter of Zophdeah, Nu 26:27, 30, 34, Jos 17:1 (P).

HOGHAI, king of Hebron, formed an alliance with other kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon, and put to death along with all his allies at Makkedah (Jos 10:29).

HOLLINESS.—1. IN OT.—

The Heb. words connected with the Semitic root qdsh (holiness) are: qdsh, qdshah, qsdkh, qsds, qsoh, qodsh. qdsh is etymologically connected with the root ksd, ksdh 'holy', qdsh 'holy', qdshah, qsdkh 'sanctuary', qsdkh qsdkh 'holy', 'holy', occur in about 830 passages in OT, about 350 of which are in the Pentateuch. The Aram. qsdkh 'holy' is met with 13 times in the Book of Daniel, qsdkh and qsdkh are exclusively heathen terms, qdsh is used in a few passages of the gods, but otherwise the Biblical words from this root refer exclusively to Jehovah, and personage connected with Him. The primary meaning seems to present indissoluble, some making it to be that of separation, often connected with something else, 'new', and the Assy. qdshah 'pure', 'bright', but neither implies conclusively. The seventh syllable is always a religious term, being, when applied to deity, almost equivalent to divine, and meaning, when used of person or things, 'set apart from common used for divine use.

HOLINESS—2. IN THE NT.—

The Heb. words connected with the Semitic root qdsh (holiness) have no necessary connection with character. The ethical element was largely or altogether absent. So a holy man, a man specially intimate with a god, need not be a moral man, as in Palestine at the present day, where holy men are any thing but saints in the Western sense of the term (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion Today, p. 149 f.). In ancient Israel the holiness of Jehovah may have been ceremonial rather than ethical but this cannot be proved. In the so-called Law of Holiness (22), contained chiefly in Lv 17-26—a document which, though composed about the time of Ezekiel, probably contains with ethical elements—the ceremonial and the ethical are inextricably blended. The holiness which Jehovah requires, and which is evidently to be thought of as to some extent of the same nature as His own: Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy’ (Lv 19:2). Inconclusively blundered out only honesty (191. 18), truthfulness (v. 11), respect for parents (v. 20), fair dealing with servants (194), kindness to strangers (v. 33), the weak and helpless (v. 8), and the poor (v. 35), social purity (20:11, 19), and love of neighbours (192), and abstaining from blood as an article of food (17:14, 19), from mixtures of animals, seeds, and stuffs (19:11), and from the fruit of newly planted trees for the first four years (v. 11); and, for priests, compliance with special rules about mourning and marriage (21:15). In other words, this holiness was partly ceremonial, partly moral, without any apparent demand to the two elements: the ceremonial aspect of holiness is characteristic of P (in which II was incorporated) as a whole, stress being naturally laid by the priestly compiler or compilers on externals. In the prophets, on the other hand, the ethical element greatly predominates. The vision of the Holy Jehovah in Isaiah, which wrung from the seer the cry ‘Woe is me, for I am a man of unclean lips’ (Is 6:5), leaves the ceremonial aspect almost completely out of sight. The holiness of Jehovah there is absolute separation from moral evil, his perfect moral purity. But there is another element clearly brought out in this vision—the majesty of the Divine holiness: ‘Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory’ (v. 3). This aspect also comes out very distinctly in the great scene of the Divine holiness, perhaps from the early Greek period, where the holy Jehovah is declared to show himself as ‘a great and terrible name’ (Ps 89:4). HOLOFERNES.—According to the Book of Judith, Holofernes was the general entrusted by Nebuchadnezzar, 'king of Nineveh,' with the task of wreaking vengeance on 'all the earth' (20:1). Before his vast army nation after nation submitted and acknowledged Nebuchadnezzar as a god. The Jews alone would not yield; and Holofernes accordingly blockaded their city of Bethulia. For the subsequent story and the death of Holofernes at the hands of Judith, see art. JUDITH.

Holofernes has been variously identified with Ashurbanipal, Cambyses, Orophernes of Cappadoce (a friend of Demetrius Soter, the enemy of the Jews), Nicaror (the Syrian general conquered by Judas Maccabaeus), Scarpus (Pompilus' Lieutenant in Syria), and Severus (Hadrian's general).

HOLON.—1. A city of Judah in the Hebron hills, given to the Levites (Jos 15:19 21:3). In the parallel passage 1 Ch 6:9 it is called Ieilen. The ruin Bel A siro, in the lower hills west of Hebron, would be a suitable site. 2. A city of Moab near Heshbon (Jer 48:31). Its site has not been recovered.

HOLY OF HOLIES, HOLY PLACE.—See TABERNACLE, and TEMPLE.

HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL.—A title of God used with especial frequency by Isaiah to express His transcendence and majesty. The idea of God's holiness is, of course, much older than Isaiah, but to him, as to no one before, it was the central and most essential attribute of God, far more so than His power or majesty. We can trace this idea from the very moment of His call in the Temple. As He felt Himself on that day standing in God's presence, His first thought was of His own uncleanness, and this wrung from Him a cry of anguish (Is 6:1; cf. St. Peter's cry in Lk 5:25). When this passed away, He heard the angelic choir chanting the refrain, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts.' From henceforth He thought of God must often as a pure, spiritual Being removed from all the imperfections of earth—an idea found also in some of the Psalms (e.g. 71:2 78:8 89:12). It was in a special sense against the Assyrian invaders that God vindicated this claim to His holiness (2 K 19:9), by showing that the might of man was powerless against His own people when protected by Him. In this sense the holiness and the omnipotence of God are nearly allied, though never synonymous.

HOLY SEPHULCHE.—See JERUSALEM, § 7.

HOLY SPIRIT.—The Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit arises out of the experience of the Church, as it interprets, and is itself interpreted by, the promise of the Comforter given by Jesus to His disciples (Jn 14-16). This appeal to experience follows the method adopted by St. Peter in his Pentecostal sermon (Ac 2). The teaching may briefly be stated as follows: The Holy Spirit is God; a Person within the Godhead; the Third Person, the knowledge of whom depends on the revelation of the Father and the Son, from both of whom He proceeds. He was in the world, and spoke by the prophets before the Word became flesh, and was Himself the agent in that creative work. Through Him theatonement was consummated. He is the life-giving presence within the universal Church, the Divine agent in its sacramental and authoritative acts; communicating Himself as a presence and power to the individual Christian; mediating to him forgiveness and new birth; endowing, increasing, and purifying his whole personality; knitting him into the fellowship of saints; and finally, through the resurrection of the body, bringing him to the fullness of eternal life. The purpose of this article is to justify this teaching from Scripture.

1. The promise of Christ.—It is unnecessary to discuss the historical character of the Last Discourses as presented in John, because the fact of the promise of the Spirit is sufficiently attested by St. Luke (Lk 24:49, Ac 1:5, 2:19, and its significance corroborated by the whole tenor of the NT. The promise of the Paraclete (Jn 14:16, 17, 15:26-27) must be read in view of the wider promise of the Almighty Father (Exod 34:6, Lev 26:12), and the fact that the true Israel of God is the Church. The promise takes first, the form of a disclosure. If Jesus is not only to embody God but be to the channel through which the faithful have communion with Him, He must himself depart to prepare abiding-places in the Father's (Jn 14:14), that He may lift men to the sphere of His own eternal life, and that where He is they too may be (v.2, cf. 12:32). It is necessary, therefore, not only that the disciple should have the same experience as the Apostles did with their eyes (1 Jn 1, Jn 15:26) and as later believers do through the Apostolic word (17:21, Lk 19), but that he should abide in Him (Jn 14:16). So the promise is not just a matter of theory, it is a practical promise of the federal Church. The method by which Jesus is to consummate this reconciling work is declared in the promise of the Paraclete. (For the question whether the promise is to be translated 'Comforter,' or 'Advocate,' see art. ADVOCATE.) Having promised another 'Comforter,' the Lord proceeds to identify Him with the Spirit (Jn 16:13), which enables Him to give to the person of whom He speaks, the name of 'the Holy Spirit' (v.22, the Greek having the definite article both before 'Spirit' and 'Holy'). Only once in His previous teaching is He reported to have employed this title (Mk 1:10). Mk 12:28 and 13:11 appear to supply other instances, but comparison should be made with the parallel passages in either case (Mt 22:40, Mt 10:21, Lk 21:20). And there is nothing abnormal in the warning in the parable of the unmerciful servant (Mt 18:24-35), the forgiving master, the forgiveness of sins, being one of the hard sayings fully interpreted only in the light of subsequent events) cf. Mk 8:5, Jn 6:40. But 'Spirit' and 'Holy Spirit' occur used by Christ in the Synoptics (Mk 16:9, Lk 11:11, Gr. no definite article) and in John (3). Too much cannot be made of this argument, as we are at best dealing with a Greek tr. of the words actually used by our Lord. But it remains true that in these cases; a new and unexpected development is given to old ideas, as when Nicodemus fails to understand the spiritual birth (Jn 3:5), or disciples are scandalized by the spiritual food (gnosia), yet both the terms used and the thoughts represented are familiar, and make us think of a previous history of doctrine, the results of which 'a master in Israel' ought at least to have apprehended. The passage read by Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4:14, 16 11:2) forms a link between the Gospel and the OT. in respect to the Spirit.

2. The Spirit in OT.—(1) General. The OT never uses the phrase 'the Holy Spirit.' In two passages the epithet 'holy' is applied to the Spirit, but in each it is still further qualified by a possessive pronoun (Ps 51:12 'thy,' Is 63:9 'his'). But the conception of the 'Spirit of God' is characteristic, being closely related to the Word (Schulten, OT THEIL. II. 184). The distinction between them is that between the breath and the voice, the latter being the articulate expression of thought, the former the force by which the word is made living. The Spirit is the life of God, and, as such, is life-giving. The account of creation in Genesis puts us in possession of the root idea (12. 4). 'It was no blind force inherent in nature which produced this beautiful world, but a divine Thinker' (Cheyne, OP, p. 322). The Spirit is the negative medium of the gift, and in the image of God and reproducing the Divine life (Gen 17).

Thus the Spirit is the source of the higher qualities which manhood develops—administrative (Gen 41), military genius in Joshua (Nu 27), judicial powers in the seventy elders (Nu 11), the craftsman's art in Bezalel and Oholiah (Ex 31. 2). So far as there is nothing directly moral in its influence. But above all it is the Spirit that reproduces in man to the earlier aspect as seen in the spirit of Jan (Is. 29), Neb 90, though this aspect is by no means so clearly presented as might have been expected. Wickedness grieves His Spirit (Is 63), which strives with the rebellious (Neh 9). The omnipresent divine force affecting alike intellect, affection, and will, arises out of the central conception, stated in the Book of Wisdom, that God made man 'an image of his own proper being' (Wis).

(2) The Chosen Race. The epithet 'holy' as applied in the OT to the Spirit, though it may include positive righteousness and purity, arises in the first instance out of the nearly meaningless principle of holiness in Scripture; namely, separation to Him whose being is not compassed by human infirmity and mortal limitations. The Spirit, therefore, in its more general bearing, is the invisible influences which consecrate all living and to the fulfilment of the universal purpose. But Israel believed that God had a particular purpose, which would be accomplished through His presence in the Chosen Nation. A special consecration rested upon Jacob, in view of which the Gentiles might be regarded as aliens, sinners, who were outside the purpose (Gal 2, Eph 2).

Thus the presence of God's good or holy Spirit is the peculiar endowment of the Hebrew people (Neh 9, Is 63), which becomes the organ of the Divine self-manifestation, the prophetic nation (Is 10, cf. Is 44 etc.). The term 'prophet' is also applied to those who were representative leaders to Abraham (Gen 20), Moses (Dt 18), Miriam (Ex 15), Deborah (Jg 4), and Samuel. The Spirit 'came upon' David not only as the psalmist (2 S 23) but as the ideal king (1 S 16).

The instruments of God's preferential action in Israel, and those who guided its destiny—became the channel of revelation, the 'mouth' (Ex 4) through which the message was delivered. More directly still, God 'spake to' the mouth of his holy prophets' (Lk 11, cf. Is 61, Jer 1), who bear the word at His mouth (Ezk 31, I 3).

(3) Prophecy. This brings us to the yet more definite sphere of the Spirit's action in the OT. 'It appears to be the main work of God as mainly as that of the Holy Spirit' (Schultz). Among the later Jews also the Holy Spirit was equivalent to the spirit of prophecy (Cheyne). From Samuel onwards prophecy takes its place along-side the monarchy as an organized function of the national life. From the visions of seers (1 S 9, 2 S 24), 2 Ch 9) and the ecstatic utterance of the earlier nebh'v'm (1 S 10, 19, 2 K 9; cf. Nu 11) to the finished literature of Isaiah and Jeremiah, revelation is essentially a direct and living communication of the Spirit to the individual prophet (Dt 34, Am 3, Mic 3). Though the Spirit is still an influence rather than a personality, yet as we rise to the higher plane of prophecy, where the essential thought is that of God working, speaking, manifesting Himself personally, we approach the NT revelation. 'The Lord God hath sent me, and his spirit' (Is 48, cf. Mt 10).

(4) The Spirit and Messiah. The point of contact between the OT and NT is the expectation of a special outpouring of the Spirit in connexion with the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom (Zech 4, Jl 2, Zc 12; cf. Is 55, Jer 31). This was to distribute itself over the whole nation, with the word 'gloriously' (Is 11, 2-3). It was to distribute itself over the whole nation, with the word 'gloriously' (Is 11, 2-3).

Thus the Spirit is the source of the higher qualities which manhood develops—administrative (Gen 41), military genius in Joshua (Nu 27), judicial powers in the seventy elders (Nu 11), the craftsman's art in Bezalel and Oholiah (Ex 31. 2). So far as there is nothing directly moral in its influence. But above all it is the Spirit that reproduces in man to the earlier aspect as seen in the spirit of Jan (Is. 29), Neb 90, though this aspect is by no means so clearly presented as might have been expected. From the visions of seers (1 S 9, 2 S 24), 2 Ch 9) and the ecstatic utterance of the earlier nebh'v'm (1 S 10, 19, 2 K 9; cf. Nu 11) to the finished literature of Isaiah and Jeremiah, revelation is essentially a direct and living communication of the Spirit to the individual prophet (Dt 34, Am 3, Mic 3). Though the Spirit is still an influence rather than a personality, yet as we rise to the higher plane of prophecy, where the essential thought is that of God working, speaking, manifesting Himself personally, we approach the NT revelation. 'The Lord God hath sent me, and his spirit' (Is 48, cf. Mt 10).

(4) The Spirit and Messiah. The point of contact between the OT and NT is the expectation of a special outpouring of the Spirit in connexion with the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom (Zech 4, Jl 2, Zc 12; cf. Is 55, Jer 31). This was to distribute itself over the whole nation, with the word 'gloriously' (Is 11, 2-3). It was to distribute itself over the whole nation, with the word 'gloriously' (Is 11, 2-3).
God raised up Jesus and will quicken men’s mortal bodies (Ro 8:11). In the Spirit the disciple is justified (1 Co 6:11) and enabled to realize his redeemed sonship and address God as Father (Ro 8:14, Eph 2:18). His relationship to God is further associated in many places (e.g. 1 Co 2:1-12, 2 Co 1:21, Eph 4:30).

(2) This is, however, not inconsistent with, but rather results in, a dependence upon the Son (Jn 15:16, cf. 15:17) which enables the Spirit to become the means whereby is applied to mankind the redemptive efficacy of the Incarnate Life (14:17. 18. 26. 27. 10:13, 14). Jesus speaks of the Spirit as His own gift (15:4). As Christ came in the Father’s name, so will the Spirit come in Christ’s name (14:16, 54). His office is to be the witness and interpreter of Christ (15:26, 26). The testimony of the disciples is to reflect this witness (15:27). The dependence of the Spirit on the Son, both in His eternal being and in His incarnate life, is fully borne out by the language of the NT generally. He is the Spirit of God’s Son (Gal 4:6), of the Lord Jesus (2 Co 3:18), of Jesus (Ac 12:17 RV), of Jesus Christ (Ph 1:9), of Christ (Ro 8:9, 1 Co 1:11). It is to disciples only that the promise is made (Jn 14:17. 18. 26. 27), and the experience of Pentecost corresponds with it (Ac 2:4). The extension of the gift being offered to those only who by baptism are incorporated into the kingdom (Ac 2:39), is to all who believe (1 Co 12:1-11).

(3) The operations of the Spirit thus bestowed are all personal in character. He teaches (Jn 14:26), witnesses (15:26), guides and foretells (16:13), and glorifies the Son (v. 27). He is the Advocate (16:13), the Counselor, and the Helper (v. 13). To Him the name of Ananias is told (5). And the testimony of the Epistles coincides (1 Co 2:8-16 RV, Ro 8:29b, etc.). The fellowship of the Holy Spirit is the presence of Christ and the presence of God in 2 Co 3:18. To the world His presence is not power, but condemnation. He is to convict the world (Jn 16:8) by carrying on in the life and work of the Church the work of Jesus (v. 7), of the Acts of His forerunners (16:13), and of His followers (v. 21). To those who receive the gift (Jn 16:13), in whom the prince of this world is judged (Jn 12:49). The witness, the power, and the victory of Christ are transferred to the society of His disciples through the Spirit.

4. Work of the Spirit in the Church. — (1) While anticipated by His work in the world (Ps 139:1, Wis 17) and foreshadowed by His special relations with Israel, the presence of the Spirit is yet so far a new experience for Christians that St. John, speaking of the age before Pentecost, can say that the Spirit was not yet given’ (Jn 7:38 RV). As from the point of view of the chosen race, those without were ‘outside’ (Gal 3:28), ‘without God in the world’ (2 Th 3) so the world outside Christ is a stranger to the Spirit. This is made clear by the facts of Pentecost. The experience of the descent, attested, to those who were the subjects of Divine favour, by the wind and firey tongues (Ac 2:3), was granted only to the Apostles and their companions in the upper chamber (2:4, cf. 14:11). The phenomena which followed (2:2) were interpreted by those outside, who had heard without understanding the rushing sound, either as a mysterious gift of power (v. 3) or as the effect of wine (v. 13).

Whether the tongues were foreign languages, as the narrative of Ac (taken by itself would suggest v. 5), must, in the light of 1 Co 14:12, where the gift is some form of ecstatic speech needing the correlative gift of interpretation, be regarded as at least doubtful; see also Ac 16:18. But that it enabled those who were not Palestinian Jews (vr. 13—19) to realize ‘the mighty works of God’ (v. 13) is certain. The importance attached to it in the Apostolic Church is due, perhaps, to the peculiar novelty of the sign as understood to have been foretold by Christ Himself ( Mk 16:17), and to the fact that it was a manifestation characteristic of the Christian community. See, further, TONGUES, GIFT OF.

Though, by the time that St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, prophecy was already attaining higher importance as a more useful and therefore greater gift (1 Co 12:12-14), the memory of the Impression created at Pentecost, as of the arrival in the world of a new and unparalleled power, united to the spiritual exaltation felt by the possessor of the gift, was still living in the Church. Nor can the Pentecostal power of Peter, with its offer of the Holy Spirit to those that repented and were baptized (Ac 2:38), be regarded otherwise than as evidence, alike in the Apostles and in those who were ‘added’ to them (v. 47), of the new experience of the Spirit which dwelt in Christ from His baptism (Mt 16:17), carrying with it the fullness of the Incarnate Life (Jn 20, Eph 3:16—19), was attested by the miracles wrought in His name (Ac 2:1-43 etc.), the works which He had done and which His disciples were also to do (Jn 14, 15), bearing witness to a unity of power.

(2) The Incarnation. That the presence of the Holy Spirit was not only a new experience for themselves, but also, as dwelling in the Incarnate Son, a new factor in the world’s history, was recognized by the primitive Christians in proportion as they apprehended the Apostolic conception of the Person of Christ. One of the earliest facts in Christian history that demands explanation is the separation from the Apostolic body of the Jewish party in the Church, which, after the fall of Jerusalem, hardened into the Ebionites (Ac 11:21). The difference lies in the perception of the former that new element in the humanity of Jesus which is prominent in the Christology of the Pauline Epistles (Ro 4:25-28, 14; Gal 1:18, 2 Co 1:11, Col 1:15).

It is all but certain that this language depends upon the acceptance of the Virgin Birth, which the sects above mentioned, because they had no use for it, tended to deny. The Apostles were enabled through a knowledge of this mystery to recognize Jesus as the second Adam, the quickening spirit, the beginning of the new creation of God (Rev 3:4, 11:3, 21:4). If the narrative of the Annunciation in Luke 1:26-35 be compared with the Prologue of John (1:1-18) and with the narratives of Creation in Gen 1-2, Christology becomes apparent. The Spirit overshadowed Mary as He brooded upon the face of the waters. The manifestation of the Messiah was, therefore, no more outpouring of the Spirit of prophecy even in measure hitherto unequalled, but God visiting and redeeming His people through the incarnation of His Image (He 1:4, Col 1:15).

St. Paul’s protest, therefore, against Judaic Christianity, which, in spite of temporary misgivings on the part of St. Peter and St. James (Gal 2:1-14), received the assent of the Apostolic witnesses, resulted from a true interpretation of his experience of that Holy Spirit into which he had been baptized (Ac 9:16, 18). The Gentiles, apart from the circumcision (Gal 5, cf. 1 Co 15), were capable of the Holy Spirit as well as the Jews, by the enlargement of human nature through union with God in Christ, and by that alone (Gal 4:6, 2 Co 3:14, cf. Ro 8:9, 1 Co 15:4). Thus, though the Apostolic preaching was the witness to Jesus and the Resurrection, beginning from the baptism of John (Ac 1:22), the Apostolic record is necessarily carried back to the narratives of the Infancy. The ministry of reconciliation, though fulfilled in the power of the baptismal Spirit (Lk 4:14), depended for its range on the capacity of the vessel already fashioned by the same Spirit (v. 14) for His habitation—God was in Christ (2 Co 1:19).

(3) Union with Christ. What, therefore, the Apostolic community claimed to possess was not merely the aptitude for inspiration, as when the Spirit spoke in old times by the mouth of the prophets, but union with Christ and the life and personality of His master (Jn 17:21), through the fellowship of a Spirit (2 Co 13:4, Ph 2:1) which was His (Ph 1:9). The Acts is the record of the Spirit’s expanding activity in the organic and outward life of the Christian Church. ‘Things concerning the kingdom’ (14), of which Christ spoke before His Ascension, are summed up in the witness to be given ‘unto the uttermost part of the earth’ (v. 38) and in the promise of power (v. 5). The events that subsequently recorded are a series of discourses as to the HOLY SPIRIT

The Epistles set before us, not systematically, but as occasion serves, the principles of the Spirit's action in this progressive experience, corporate and individual.

(5) Inspiration. It is in this connection that inspiration as applied to the Bible must be brought into relation with the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. No theory, as applying to the whole Canon, is in the nature of the case to be expected in the NT itself. But prophecy is one of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Co 12:10-11). And it is clear that the prophets were recognized as a distinct order in the Apostolic Church (Ac 11:17 13:21; cf. 1 Ti 1:1-4), though there was nothing professional in this ministry (1 Co 12:11). The type was undoubtedly that of the OT prophets (see above), and a distinct link with the ancient line is found in St. Peter's reference to the words of Joel as fulfilled at Pentecost (Ac 2:16-17). An apostolate by the Spirit (118). He adopted the method of signs (211) and the phrase 'Thus saith the Holy Spirit' (cf. OT 'Thus saith the Lord').

HONEY

The laying on of hands in the ministration of the Spirit seems to have been adopted by a spontaneous impulse in the primitive community, and to have become immediately an established ordinance. The place accorded to the practice in He 6, as belonging to the alphabet of gospel knowledge, attests the importance attached to it. Likewise in Phil 4:18 the point of supreme importance to the Christian is to have the inward response of the Spirit to the Lordship of Christ (1 Co 12:13). This life is universally manifested in love (ch. 13), to strive after which is ever the 'more excellent way' (12:31). But, though bestowed on all Christians alike, it is distributed to each 'according to the measure of the gift of Christ' (Eph 4:7). The principle of proportion is observed by Him who has 'tempered the body together' (1 Co 12:23). The same gifts or manifestations of the Spirit are not, therefore, to be expected in all believers or in all ages. They are given that the whole body may profit (12:25-26). They are correlative to the capacity given to each to fulfill in the organic structure of the whole (12:28, Eph 4:11). The desire for them, though not discouraged (1 Co 12:14), must be regulated by a sense of the needs of the Church (14:4) and the opportunities of service (Ro 12:1-2, 1 F 5). 'Each gifted' individual becomes himself a gift' (Gore).

Nowhere do we find any attempt to make a complete enumeration of the spiritual gifts. In Eph 4:11, where the completion of the structure of Christ's body is the main thought (v.12), four classes of ministerial function are named. In 5:19-23, there is a list of the individual's capacities for service prominent, the list is promiscuous, exceptional gifts like prophecy, ministerial functions like teaching, and ordinary graces like hospitality, being mentioned indiscriminately. Local circumstances confine the lists of 1 Co 12:4-11 to the 'greater gifts' (v.4), those granted for more conspicuous service, most of which are spoken of God's extraordinary activity. The object of the Apostle in this catalogue is to show that tongues are by no means first in importance. 'Faith' in v.13 is not to be confused with the primary virtue of 13:13, but is interpreted by 13:17.

(6) The laying on of hands. The laying on of hands has not yet been reduced to a technical rite in a crystallized ecclesiastical system. At any rate, there is evidence that the laying on of hands in the NT does not imply an absolution of sins. According to 2 Ti 1:1, it was used by St. Paul in conveying spiritual authority to his representative at Ephesus; or, if the reference be the same as in 1 Co 16:2, in the ordination of Timothy to a ministerial function. The symbolism is natural and expressive, and its employment by the Christian Church was immediately justified by its efficacy. Paul's object in giving a list of such 'gifts', whether of healing, of the ministry of teaching, or the guidance of the Church, was to indicate the importance of these gifts and to emphasize the idea of the guidance of the Church. See also LAYING ON HANDS.

HOMICIDE.—See CRIMES, § 7. REFUGE [CITRIS opf.]

HONEST, HONESTY.—In 2 Es 16:4' honest' is the meaning of 'chaste.' Elsewhere it means either 'honourable' or 'becoming.' For the meaning 'honourable' compare Ru 10:2, 'There was a kinsman also, whose name was Booz, whose effect was an honest man'; and, for 'becoming,' Is 53:15, 'Put on thine honest raiment, O Jerusalem, thou citie of the holy one.

'Honesty' in 1 Ti 2:2, its only occurrence, means 'seemliness' (RV 'gravity').

The appreciation of honey by the Hebrews from the earliest times, and its abundance in Canaan, are evident from the oft-recurring description of that country as a 'land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3:8 onwards). In the absence of any mention of bee-keeping in OT, it is almost certain that this proverbial expression has reference to the honey of the wild bee (see BEE). The latter had its nest in the of coffins, hence the 'honey out of rock' of Dt 32:14, in hollow tree-trunks (1 S 14:28), but the Heb. text is here in disorder), and even, on occasion, in the shell of an animal (Jg 14:6). In later times it was evident from the Mishnah bee-keeping was widely practised by the Jews. The hives were of straw or wicker-work. Before removing the combs the bee-keepers stumped the bees with the furnes of charcoal and cow-dung, burnt in front of the hives.

In Bible times honey was not only relished by itself (cf. Sir 11:1 'the bee is little, but her fruit is the chief of sweet things'), and as an accomplishment to other food (Mt 3:4, Mk 1:6 locusts and wild honey'), Lk 24:43, AV with fish), but was also largely used in the making of 'bakemeats' and all sorts of sweet cakes (Ex 16:16), sugar being then, of course, unknown. Although it formed part of the first-fruits presented at the sanctuary, honey was excluded from the altar, owing to its liability to fermentation.

Honey for domestic use was kept in earthen jars (1 K 14:7 Ev 'cruse' in which, doubtless, it was also put for transport (Gen 43:9) and export (Ezk 27:7). Many scholars, however, would identify the 'honey' of the two passages last cited with the grape syrup (thereas reduced, equivalent, of the Heb. damasch), a product of modern Syria which is produced by the repeated boiling of grape juice (for details see art. 'Honey' in EBt col. 2105). Indisputable evidence of the manufacture of cakes in early times is, however, still lacking.

In addition to the proverbial expression of fertility above quoted, honey, in virtue of its sweetness, is frequently employed in simile and metaphor in Heb. literature (e.g. Ps 19:10; 118:164). Pr 15:24, Cs 4:18, Sir 24:49 etc.

HOODS.—Only Is 31:2 AV, for which RV has rightly 'turbans.' See Dress, § 5.

HOOK.—1. way, a hook or ring with a spike driven into wood (Ex 26:26 etc.). 2. Is 19:9, Job 41:4, Am 4:1, Mt 17:24. The hook used in fishing was of course attached to a line, but whether the latter was simply held in the hand or was attached to a rod cannot be decided.

HOOPER (1 L 111, Dt 14:16 RV; AV 'lapwing').—The hoopoe (Upupa epops) is a common spring visitor in Palestine, where its striking plumage, its tall crest and odd movements, make it conspicuous. Various folk-tale tales exist in the Talmud and among the fellahin regarding it. It was an 'unclean' bird (Lv 11:19), possibly because of its habit of haunting dunghills, but it is eaten to-day by the following.

HOPE.—1. Hope and faith (the soul's forward and upward look towards God) are imperfectly differentiated in the OT, as with men who 'greet the promises from afar' (He 11:11); hope has there the greater vogue.

Amongst the several Heb. words thus rendered, (1) signifying 'restful hope (leaning on 3, &c.), often appears as 'trust' and sometimes as 'confidence'—'hope' in Job 6:9, Ps 16:9, Pr 14:25, Ec 9:17, Jer 17:1. (2) A subjective synonym (radically, the loving) is variously translated 'hope,' 'confidence,' and 'fear' (cf. AV and RV in Job 8:31; also Job 4:7, Ps 49:7 85:4, Pr 3:22 Ec 5:7). (3) RV corrects the 'hope' (AV of Jer 17:7, Is 38, into 'refuge.' (4) A synonym hardly distinguishable from (3) and (6), and rendered 'hope' or 'wait upon' occurs 8 times (Ps 104:27 140 etc.). The two most distinct OT words for hope are frequently used 'wait for' or 'upon.' Of these (1) seems a relatively passive significance (e.g. in Job 6:9 14:7, Ps 33:23 42, Ps 34:19). (6) The term often signifies recurring, denoting practical, even arkaneus, anticipations (rendered 'expectation' in Ps 89:12), has a root-meaning not far removed from that of the Heb. verb for 'believe,' Gn 49:6, Ru 1:4, Ps 3:5, 37:21, 2 Esdr 2:5). Hope is as it is to the OT rather than the NT that one must look for definite representations of the earthy hopes belonging to God's Kingdom, the social regeneration and national well being that comes in its train (see, e.g. Is 9:5, 11:9, 55:60, Ps 72. 95-98, etc.); broadly interpreted, these promises are of permanent validity (see Mt 6:18, 13:11, 1 Ti 4:4 etc.). Hope plays an increasing part in the OT books; it advances in distinctness, grandeur, and spirituality with the course of revelation. The Holy One of Israel made Himself 'the God of hope' for mankind (Ro 15:11; cf. Jer 14:15 and 17:11 with Is 42:8, 51:6, 60). When the national hopes founders, OT faith anchored itself to two objects: (a) the Messiah Kingdom (see Kingdom of God); and (b) the hope, in later times, of the resurrection of the dead (Is 25:5, 26:19, 12:15); probably Job 19:25, Ps 16:10-11 52)—the latter conceived as necessary to the former, since otherwise those who had suffered most for God's Kingdom in this world did not miss it (cf. He 11:1, 1 Th 4:13-14). The OT heritage is developed in extravagant forms by Jewish Apocalyptic literature, which was the product of a powerful ferment in the Judaism of Gr. of Jews in the Diaspora, who represents philosophic Judaism at the farthest remove from popular Messianic enthusiasm, nevertheless makes hope (followed by repentance and righteousness) the leader of the earth (cf. 1 Co 13:13), while faith leads the second and highest triad.

2. To both factors of 'the hope of Israel,' separately or together, St. Paul applied the word 'hope' (Eph 1:18, 6:19). It is rendered by RV 'steadfastness' (Ac 13:23, 26:26, 36). It was a 'lamp shining in a dark place' (2 P 1:19); hope at the Christian era is flickering low in the Gentile world (see Eph 2:18, Rom 4:18, 1 Co 15:19, 24-28, 2 Th 3:5, 11-12, esp. in the latest forms of OT). The OT phrase 'the resurrection of the dead' (Is 25:5, 26:19, 12:15); probably Job 19:25, Ps 16:10-11 52)—the latter conceived as necessary to the former, since otherwise those who had suffered most for God's Kingdom in this world did not miss it (cf. He 11:1, 1 Th 4:13-14). The OT heritage is developed in extravagant forms by Jewish Apocalyptic literature, which was the product of a powerful ferment in the Judaism of Gr. Jews in the Diaspora, who represents philosophic Judaism at the farthest remove from popular Messianic enthusiasm, nevertheless makes hope (followed by repentance and righteousness) the leader of the earth (cf. 1 Co 13:13), while faith leads the second and highest triad.
HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS

whether in the way of personal attainment or of social betterment, are steps in the progress towards the final deliverance from the bondage and corruption and for revealing the sons of God'—the great day of the Lord. Its ground lies in the 'promise(s) of God' (Tit 1:1, Heb 6:14-12, 2 Pet 3:2, 1 Jn 2:25), esp. the definite promise of the triumphal return of Jesus as the consummation of the Messianic Kingdom (Mt 24:27, Ac 1:3-4, 1 Co 15:23-28, Rev 11:18-19 etc.) and its guarantee is twofold, being given objectively in the resurrection and ascension of our Lord (Ac 17:2, Ro 1:4, Eph 1:10-12, Col 1:13, He 6:12, 1 Pet 1:3 etc.), and subjectively in 'the earnest of the Spirit within' Christian hearts' (2 Co 1:22, Ro 8:9, Eph 1:13ff.). Its subjects are the 'men of faith' (Ro 1:1-2, 15f etc.): it is 'the hope of the consummation of the dispensation of the Father' (Eph 6:18, Col 1:27). The hope of the gospel' (Col 1:5)—that which the gospel conveys, and 'the hope of righteousness' (Gal 5:5)—that which the righteousness of faith entrusts, it belongs only to the Christianly pure, and is purifying in effect (1 Jn 3:13cf.; cf. Ps 24:4, Mt 5:4, Rev 22:14ff.).

Finally, it is a collective hope, the heritage of 'the body of Christ,' dear to Christian brethren because of their affection for each other (2 Th 2:1, Eph 5:21, Rev 10:18ff. etc.) and is cherished esp. by ministers of Christ for those in their charge (2 Co 1:13, 1 Th 2:11ff., Col 1:26, Ph 2:24 etc.), as it animated the Church (Jn 15:13, 1 Th 3:12ff., Heb 13:17 etc.). In Colossians Jesus' hope is bound up as intimately with love as with faith; these are the triad of essential graces (1 Co 13:4, 1 Th 1:1, 2 Th 1:1, Eph 4:15, He 10:18 etc.). The whole future of the Christian life, for man and society, is lodged with 'Christ Jesus our hope' (1 Th 1:1, Col 1:7), NT expectation focussed itself on His Parousia—the 'blessed hope' (Tit 2:13).

Maranatha 'our Lord cometh!' was a watchword of the Pauline Churches (1 Co 16:22cf. 1 Th 4:17). 'The hope laid up for 'them' in the heavens' formed the treasure of the first believers (Col 1:3-4 etc.); to 'wait for' the risen Jesus, coming as God's son 'from heaven' (1 Th 1:10), was half their religion: 'by this hope were we saved, being enclosed in its strength to bear joyfully the ills of life and the universal contempt and persecution of the world around them, which stimulated instead of quenching their courage (Ro 12:12, Col 1:24, Ph 1:29, 2 Co 1:10-12, 1 Th 3:12ff.). According to the fine figure of 'which is the hope of glory, was the anchor of the soul,' grappled to the throne of the living, glorified Jesus 'within the veil.'

G. G. FINDLAY.

HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS.—The two sons of Eli; they were priests in the sanctuary at Shiloh, where, instead of doing their fathers' work, they caroused on their evil practices. In consequence of their deeds a curse is twice pronounced upon the house of Eli, first by a 'man of God' (1 S 2:30) who is not named, and again by the mouth of Samuel (ch. 3). The curse was accomplished when Hophni and Phinehas were slain at the battle of Aphek, and the ark of God was lost—an incident which was the cause of the death of Eli (ch. 4). The malpractices of these two consisted in their claiming and appropriating more than their due of the offerings (2 S 17-17), and in their immoral actions in the Tabernacle (v. 22, cf. Am 2:7).

HOPRHA.—Jer 44:18: the Egyptian Wahebrê, Apros of Herodotus, fourth king of the 20th Dyn. (c. B.C. 588-559 and grandson of Necho. He, or possibly his predecessor Psammentchus II, is also referred to as Pharaoh in Jer 22:11, Ezek 20:2 etc. Little is certainly known of his reign. Hophra must have been defeated by Nebuchadnezzar in Syria in attempting to resist the progress of the Babylonian army, and he received the fugitives from Palestine after the destruction of Jerusalem in B.C. 586. There is no evidence that Nebuchadnezzar plundered Egypt, as was anticipated by Ezekiel, though he seems to have attacked Hophra's successor Amasis in B.C. 568 with some success, and may have overrun some part of Lower Egypt. The Syrian and other mercenaries soldiers stationed at Elephantine revolted in the reign of Hophra, but were brought again to submission. Another mutiny of the Egyptian soldiers, recorded by Herodotus, resulted in Amasis being put upon the throne as the puppet of the natives. He relied on the Greek mercenaries, and maintained himself, perhaps in a forced co-regency, in Lower Egypt until the third year of Amasis, when he was defeated and slain.

HOR.—1. A mountain 'in the edge of the land of Edom' (Nu 33:19), where Aaron died. Constant tradition, at least since Josephus, sees Mount Hor in Jebel Harûn, 'the Mountain of Aaron,' above Petra. This is regarded as the place where Aaron entered the Levitical priesthood, and his tomb is shown there, with a small dome on its summit. Some modern writers, especially H. C. Trumbull, have doubted the tradition and endeavoured to fix other sites, such as Jebel Madârât, N.W. of 'Ain Kadis. Jebel Harûn rises 4780 ft. above the sea-level. Its western side is an unscaled precipice; it is ascended from the pass leading into Petra. A very wide view over the Arabah, down to the Red Sea and up to the Ghôr, is commanded from the summit. 2. A mountain mentioned in Nu 34:5, as in the northern boundary of the Promised Land. In all probability this is meant for Hermon.

HOREB.—See SINAI.

HOREM.—A city of Nephshi in the mountains (Jos 19:7); prob. the modern Harâk west of Kadesh-nahalal.

HORESH.—The word Horesh means 'wooded height' in Is 17:9, Ezek 31:3, 2 Ch 27:6, and this is probably its meaning in 1 S 23:10 (cf. v. 11, 18), although some would make Horeh a proper name, as in R.Vm.

HOR-HAGGIDDAH.—A mountain sacred to the great high priest, and his tomb is shown and revered under a small dome on its summit. Some modern writers, especially H. C. Trumbull, have doubted the tradition and endeavoured to fix other sites, such as Jebel Madârât, N.W. of 'Ain Kadis. Jebel Harûn rises 4780 ft. above the sea-level. Its western side is an unscaled precipice; it is ascended from the pass leading into Petra. A very wide view over the Arabah, down to the Red Sea and up to the Ghôr, is commanded from the summit. HORMAH—(Devoted' or 'accursed') was a city, apparently not far from Kadesh, where the Israelites were overtaken, when, after the death of the ten spies, they insisted on going forward (Nu 14:10, Dt 11). At a later time it was taken and destroyed by Israel (Nu 21:6, Jos 12:4), this feat being attributed in Jg 11 to Judah and Simeon. There we learn that the former name was Zephath. Possibly the memory of the previous disaster here led to its being called 'Accursed.' It was one of

HORN

The horn is a familiar symbol in many cultures and religious traditions. In the Bible, the horn is often associated with strength and protection, as seen in the reference to Zipporah's horn, which saved the Israelites in the Hebrew text.

HORSE

Horses have been a significant part of human history, symbolizing power, freedom, and military might. In ancient times, they were used in warfare, hunting, and in religious ceremonies.

HORSE-GATE

In biblical times, horse gates were used to control and limit the movement of horses. They were often placed near temples and palaces, symbolizing the dominance and authority of the rulers.

HOSANNA

The word Hosanna means “Save!” or “Hail!” It is a cry of triumph and praise, often associated with the celebration of the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles.

HORSE-SNAKE

Horses and snakes have been depicted and referenced in various cultures and scriptures. The relationship between the two is complex and symbolic, often representing duality or polarity.

HORSE-LEECH

Horse-leeches are a type of leech, specifically Hirudo medicinalis, which has been used for centuries for medicinal purposes. The practice of using horse-leeches was described in the Bible.

of Palm Sunday between Tabernacles and Passover. Such processions were not peculiar to Cabarenesians. They might be extemporized for other occasions of a joyous character (cf. 1 Mac 13:4, 2 Mac 10:9), and this was the case in the scene described in the Gospels.

In its transliterated form the word 'Hosanna' passed over to early liturgical (esp. doxological) use (cf. e.g. Délache 106 'Hosanna to the God of David'), as an interjection of praise and joy, and was developed on these lines. The early misinterpretation of its real meaning was perpetuated. But the history of this development lies outside the range of purely Biblical archaeology.

Hosea—The name of the prophet Hosea, though distinguished by the English translators with that of the last king of Israel and with the original name of Joshua; in these cases it appears in the EV as Hosea. Hose, the son of Beeri, is the only prophet, among those whose writings have survived, who was himself a native of the Northern Kingdom. The main subject of the prophecy of Amos is the Northern Kingdom, but Amos himself was a native of the South; so also were Isaiah and Micah, and these two were following, or rather the realization of its real meaning was perpetuated. But the history of this development lies outside the range of purely Biblical archaeology.

Hosea's prophetic career extended from shortly before the fall of Jeroboam II, (c. B.C. 746) to shortly before the outbreak of the Syro-Ephraimitish war in B.C. 735—a period of rapidly advancing decay following on the success and prosperity of the reign of Jeroboam II. He began his ministry within some 15 years of the prophetic activity of Amos at Bethel, and continued to do so till some years after Isaiah had made his voice heard and his influence felt in the Northland. Influenced himself probably by Amos, he seems to have exercised some influence over Isaiah; but these conclusions must rest on a comparison of the writings of the three prophets. Our direct knowledge of Hosea is derived entirely from the book which bears his name; he is mentioned nowhere else in the OT.

If the account given in the 1st and 3rd chapters of Hosea were allegory, as many ancient and some modern interpreters have held, our knowledge of Hosea would be slight indeed. But since these chapters are clearly not allegorical, there are few prophets whose spiritual experience is better known to us. In favour of an allegorical interpretation the clearly symbolic character of the names of Hosea's children has been urged; but the names of Isaiah's children—Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz—are also symbolic (cf. Is 8:1). Moreover, if the narrative were allegorical, there would be just as much reason for the names of Hosea's wife and her father as for the names of the children being symbolic; on the other hand, in real life it was within the power of the prophet to give symbolic names to the children, but not to his wife or her father. The names of Hosea's wife, Gomer, and her father, Diblaim, are not symbolic. Further, the reference to the meaning of Lo-ruhamah in 14 is purposeless in allegory, but natural enough in real life, since it serves to fix the interval between the birth of the two children.

The command in 2:11 has seemed to some, and may well prove, to provide a story in which the events are forgotten, impossible except in allegory. It is as well, therefore, to approach the important narrative of Hosea with a recollection of such a method of describing events as was illustrated by Zeb 18:34. This describes a perfectly familiar scene. The incident, translated into prophetic language, is as follows. On an impulse Jeremiah one day went down to watch, that he must often have watched before, a potter at his work; but on this particular day the potter taught him his new lesson. Then he recognized (1) that the impulse that had led him that day was from Jahweh, and (2) that the new suggestion of the potter's wheel was a word from Jahweh. So again, Jer 32:9-13 describes what was to be a presentiment of the destruction of Jerusalem. It was recognized to have been a word from Jahweh (Jer 32:9). Interpreted in the light of these illustrations of prophetic methods of speech, the narrative of Hosea 1 gives us an account of the development of a personal speech to Hosea, as follows. Driven by true love in which, probably enough, Hosea at the time felt the approval, not to say the direct impulse of Jahweh, Hosea married Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim. After marriage she proved unfaithful, and Hosea heard that the woman whom he had been led by Jahweh to marry had had within her all along the tendency to unfaithfulness. She was not at the time Lo-ruhamah ('Not pitied'), but, had Hosea only fully understood, he would have known when he married her, as these years afterwards he has come to know, that when Jahweh said, 'Go, marry Gomer,' He was really saying 'Go, marry a woman who will bestow her love on others.' His new, and knowledge does not make him feel less but more that his marriage had been ordered of God. Not only through the love of youth, but even more through the treachery and the ill-return which his love has received, Jahweh is speaking. Had Hosea spoken just like Jeremiah, he might have continued: Then I discovered that my wife had played the harlot; and I knew that this was the word of Jahweh, and I said unto me: Even as the bride of youth has played the harlot, so has My bride, Israel, played the harlot; even as thy children of harlotry, even so are the children of Israel children of harlotry, sons of the Baals whom they worship.'

Apparently Hosea reached the conclusion that none of the children were hers, and she called them without exception 'children of harlotry' (15). But the name Jezebel (19) certainly does not suggest that at the birth of his first-born he was already aware of his wife's unfaithfulness, for the name of the second child, Lo-ammi ('Not my kinsman,' 1), may merely carry further the judgment on the nation expressed unquestionably in the first and probably in the second. In any case we may somewhat safely infer that Hosea became a prophet before he had learned his wife's unfaithfulness, and that in his earnest preaching he, like Amos, denounced inhumanity as offensive to God; for this is the purpose of the name Jezebel, the house of Jehu, established by means of bloodshed and inhumanity (11), is about to be punished. 'Kindness not sacrifice' (41) must have been the ideal of religion which from the first Hosea held up before his people.

It has generally been inferred that Hosea's wife subsequently left him (or that he put her away), but that at last in his love for her, which could not be quenched, he rescued her from the life of shame into which she had sunk (ch 3). And this perhaps remains most probable, though Marti has lately argued with much ability (1) that ch. 3 does not refer to Gomer, (2) that, unlike ch. 1, ch. 3 is allegorical, and (3) that ch. 3 formed no part of the original book of Hosea. Be this as it may, it is clear that although the circumstances of Hosea's married life were not the cause of his becoming a prophet, they do explain certain peculiar characteristics of his message and personality: his insistence on the love of God for Israel, and on Israel's sin as consisting in the want of love and of loyalty towards God; and the greater emotional passion that marks him as compared with Amos. At the same time, it is important not to exaggerate the difference between Amos and Hosea, of to lose sight of the fact that Hosea not less than Amos of Isaiah or Micah insisted on the worthlessness of days of ludes instead of days of Tabernacles. Which was not ethical (Jezebel, 11; 26). In considering the greater sympathy of Hosea with the people whom he has to condemn, it must be remembered that he was of them, whereas Amos, a native of the South, was not.

HOSEA, BOOK OF.—The Book of Hosea formed the first section of a collection of prophetic writings which was formed after the Exile, probably towards the close of the 3rd century B.C., and entitled 'The Twelve Prophets' (see Micah [Book of]). The greater part of the Book of Hosea clearly consists of the writings of Hosea, the son of Beeri, who prophesied in the 8th century
B.C. (see preced. art.), but it also contains the annotations or additions of editors who lived between the 8th and the 3rd centuries. It is not always possible to determine with certainty these editorial portions of the book.

Though we have no positive evidence to this effect, there is no reason to doubt that Hosea himself committed writing the prophetic poems by which he gave expression to his message and of which the greater part of the Book of Hosea consists (chs. 2. 4–14), and that he prefixed to these the prose narrative of his life (chs. 1. 3, see Hosea) with which the book now opens. It is possible, of course, that Hosea first circulated in writing single poems or a collection of two or three; but the complete collection, though scarcely made later than 735, since the prophecies make no allusion to the Syro-Phoenician wars which broke out in that year, cannot be much earlier than 735, since the prophecies make allusions to the circumstances of the period that followed the death, in about B.C. 746, of Jeroboam II. (anarchy, 711–716 B.C., ending the Exile), and which favours appeal to Asyria respectively, 5th 7th 8th 12th, and probably in particular to the payment of tribute by Menahem to Tiglath-Pileser [= Pulse, 2 K 15.19], which took place in the years 734–732. (after 725, at the opening narrative of the book, though it describes Hosea's life and teaching before the death of Jeroboam II. (1), see Hosea), was not written until some years later, for it also records the birth of Lois (1), which was separated by hardly less and possibly more than 8 years from the date of Hosea's marriage.

In its earliest form, then, the Book of Hosea was published by the prophet about the year 736 in the Northern Kingdom. Now, in common with all literature of the Northern Kingdom, Hosea owes its preservation to the care of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. It is tolerably certain that the Jews who preserved the book and added the annotations, in other words, that the heptad of Hosea as we have it is a Jewish edition of the writings of an Israelite prophet. The hand of a Jewish editor (and in this case a somewhat later one) is perhaps clearest in the title (11), for Hosea, a citizen of the Northern Kingdom and addressing himself to the North, would scarcely date his prophecy by kings of the Southern Kingdom of Judah, nor would a contemporary be likely to equate the days of Uzziah and his successors with the days of Jeroboam, since Uzziah himself outlived Jeroboam. With more or less reason, additions to or modifications of Hosea's work by Jewish editors have been suspected in 1 16–22 8 8 8 (i.e. David their king) 4th 5th (last clause) 6th 7th 11th 12th. In several other cases (5 6th 8th 11th 12th) it is possible that the editor has pointed the original prophecies at his own people of the South by substituting 'Judah' where Hoseas had written 'Israel', although at present Jacob and Israel seem to be synonymous for the people of the Northern Kingdom, were certainly in the mind of the writer of 12. 5; for in 12. 6 he puts on these names: 'In the womb be Jacobed his brother, and in his manhood Israel with God.'

Another whole group of passages has been suspected of consisting of additions to Hosea's prophecies. These are the passages of promise (11. 10 11. 12 12. 1–5) regarded as an allegory of restoration (6th 11th 12th 14). There is little doubt that such passages were added to ancient prophesies, but it is not yet by any means generally admitted that the early prophets made no promises of a brighter future beyond judgment.

Apart from the intentional modifications of the original words of Hosea by later editors, the text has suffered very seriously from accidents of transmission. In some places the Greek version allows us to see an earlier Hebrew text than that perpetuated by the Jews from which the EV is made. The English reader will find the translation from a critically emended text by Dr. G. A. Smith (Book of the Twelve Prophets, vol. I) of great assistance. The best English commentary is that by W. R. Harper in the International Critical Commentary.

HOSHEA.—The earliest, or at least it is regarded by

1. See Hoshea. 2. An EphraimitE (1 Ch 27. 8).
3. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10. 19).
4. The last king of Israel. The chronological data of our text are not entirely accordant (2 K 16. 25), but we know that he came to the throne E. 734 B.C. and ended E. 724 B.C. (the date which is confirmed by the Assyrian annals). It is certain that there were two parties in Samaria, one advocating submission to Assyria, the other hoping for independence. Pekah was placed on the throne by the latter; Hoshea was the candidate of the Assyrians, and was perhaps actively supported by them in his revolt against Pekah, whom he supplanted. This was when Tiglath-Pileser punished Pekah and Rezin for interfering in the affairs of Judah (see AHAD). At the death of Tiglath-Pileser, however, Hoshea was enticed by the Egyptian king or sub-king, and went over to the party which was ready for revolt. It is probable that he had convinced himself that the land could not longer pay the heavy tribute paid upon it. The new king of Assyria (Shalmaneser IV.)
moved promptly, captured and imprisoned the king, and laid siege to the capital. It speaks well for the strength of Samaria and for the courage of its people that they held out for more than two years; but the result can hardly have been doubtful from the first.
The surrender was followed by the deportations which were a considerable part of the people, and the planting of foreign colonies in the country (2 K 17. 25). Sargon, who came to the throne just before the surrender, had a desire to experiment with more vassals, and set an Assyrian governor over the wasted province.

Thus ended the kingdom of Israel.

HOSPITALITY.—In the life of the East there are no more attractive features than those that centre in the practice of hospitality. The virtue of hospitality ranked high in the ancient Orient, and the laws regulating its observance held undisputed sway in the desert still. The pleasing picture of the magnanimous shiek, bidding strangers welcome to his tent and to the best he owns (Gn 18), is often repeated to this hour in the Arabian wilderness. It was to Lot's credit and advantage that he had preserved this virtue amid the corruptions of Sodom (Gn 19. 19). To Shishak an opportunity for its exercise was shunned (1 K 9. 9). A man's worth was illustrated by his princely hospitality (Joh 31. 3). The Samaritans' churlish denial of hospitality to Jesus excited the wrath of his disciples (Lk 9. 46).
The host had a right to expect certain attentions (Lk 7:13f.). The practice of hospitality distinguished those on the right from those on the left hand (Mt 25:26; cf. 10:41, Jn 13:10). It is commended by precept (Ro 12:13, 1 Ti 6:1, etc.), and is a duty by example (He 13:16).

Hospitality was highly esteemed amongst other ancient peoples. In Egypt its practice was thought to favour the soul in the future life. By kindness to strangers the Greeks secured the renewal of Zetes Xencos, their protector. For the Romans hospitality was a sacred obligation.

In its simplest aspect, hospitality is the reception of the wayfarer as an honoured guest, providing shelter and food.
In the ancient, as indeed for the most part in the modern, Oriental, man journeyed only under necessity. Travel for purposes of pleasure and education is practically unknown. Save in cities, therefore, and in trading centres along the great highways, there was little call dores to them if they entertain. The village probably was always contained what is called the mediâ—properly madayyaf—lady chamber reserved for guests, whose entertainment is a charge upon the whole community. From personal experience the present writer knows how solitcious the humblest villagers are for the comfort and well-being of their guests. If the chief man in a village be well off, he greatly adds to his prestige by a little display of hospitality.

In the desert, every tent, however poor its owner, offers welcome to the traveller. In the master’s absence the women receive the guests, and according to their mood they are paid the honours of the ‘house of hair.’ In the master’s pride to be known as a generous man; any lack of civility or of kindness to a guest meets severe reproval. In the guest’s presence he calls neither his tent, nor anything it contains, his own. During his sojourn the visitor is owner. The women bake bread;
the master slaughters ‘a sacrifice,’ usually a lamb, kid, or sheep, which is forthwith dressed, cooked, and served to the guest. This is the pride his own tent himself walls up his guest, seeking to gratify with slaughter his every wish. If his visitors are of superior rank he stands by them (On 189), and in any case sits down, only if they entertain. The safety and comfort of the guests are the first consideration; many place them before even the honour of wife and daughter (On 19, Jg 19; cf. Lecm, Mod, Egyt, 297). If a guest turns up and is not fed he cannot sit down; the host might then be unable to prepare a meal creditable to himself. If food is offered, it is of the host’s goodwill (Lk 1:43). The guest, careful of the host’s goodwill, will indicate that his demands have been provided by leaving a portion in the dish.

The open hand, as the token of a liberal heart, wins the respect and esteem of the Arabs. Leadership do not come from father to son. Right to the position must be vindicated by wisdom, courage, dignity, and not least by generous hospitality. For the nieghbour this regard there is nothing but contempt.
It is a covert distinction to be known as a ‘coffee shelik,’ one who without stint supplies his visitors with the fragrant beverage.

The Arabs are sometimes charged with want of good hospitality, as it seems from our point of view.
But what seems ingratitude to us may be due simply to the influence of immemorial custom, in a land where the necessities of life are never sold, but held as common good, of which the traveller may of right claim a share.
The ‘right of a guest’ may be taken, if not freely offered.
The man who refuses covers himself with perpetual shame. The guest enjoys only his right; therefore no thanks mingle with his farewell.

The right, however, is limited. "Whoever," says the Prophet, "believes in God and the day of resurrection must respect his guest; and the time of being kind to him is one day and one night; and the period of entertaining him is three days; and if after that he does it longer, he benefits him more: but it is not good for the guest to stay in the house of his host so long as to inconnoode him' (Lane, Arabion Society in the Middle Ages, 143). After three days, or, some say, three days and four hours, the host may ask if he proposes to honour him by a longer stay. The guest may wish to reach some point under protection of the tribe. If so, he is welcome to stay; only, the host now give him work to do. To refuse his services to do this is highly dishonourable. But the guest may go to another tent at the expiry of every third day, thus renewing his ‘right,’ and sojourn with the tribe as long as is necessary.

Hospitality involves protection as well as maintenance.
'It is a principle alike in old and new Arabia that the guest is inviolable' (W. R. Smith, Kinship, 48). That this provision applies to enemies as well as to friends shows the magnanimity of the desert law. Every stranger met in the open is assumed to be an enemy: he will owe his safety either to his own prowess or to fear that his tribe will exact vengeance if he is injured. But the stranger who enters the tent is dalj Ullah, the guest whom God has sent, to be well entertained for His sake. In an enemy’s country one’s perils are over when he reaches a tent, and touches even a tent peg. A father’s murderer may not set foot on the tent in which his son has sat. When he has eaten of the host’s bread, the two are at once bound as brother for mutual help and protection.
It is said that ‘there is salt between them.’ Not that This is a term of hire, but a sign of friendship and indeed food of any kind. A draught of water taken by stealth, or even against his will, from a man’s dish, serves the purpose. When protection is secured from one, the whole tribe is bound by it (W. R. Smith, RS 76).

Understand this we must remember (1) that in Arabia all recognition of mutual rights and duties rests upon kinship.
Those outside the kin may be dealt with according to each man’s inclination and ability. (2) Kinship is not exclusively a matter of birth. It may be acquired. When men eat and drink together, they renew their blood from the one source, and to that extent are partners in the same blood.
The stranger eating with a clansman becomes ‘kinsman’ to all the members of the clan, as regards ‘the fundamental rights and duties that turn on the sanctity of kindred blood (Wellhausen, Rote Arab, He Rd, 116f.; W. R. Smith, RS 273 n.).
This sanctity may be traced to the ancient belief that the clan god shared its life, and when an animal was caught for food took part in the proceedings. As the man’s friends were therefore the god’s friends, whom to injure was to outrage the deity. That this is the reason why the religion of the Arabs is a religious act involving the whole kin is borne out (a) by the fact that when an animal is slain all have an undisputed share of it brought to the feast, and that none but he who receives it, still applied to it. The present writer was once entertained in the camp of a rather wild and unkept tribe.
The chief was an old man without personal friends. The as attendants supped with the crowd. Fearing this might not be agreeable to a European, the chief, who was preacher in his father’s absence, with innate Arab courtesy, asked him to sup with him in the sheik’s tent. Bringing in a portion of the flesh, the youth repeatedly remarked, as if for the stranger’s re-assurance, esh-dakhhah wa wihid, the slaughterer—save himself; i.e. the tribesman and he ate from the same victim.

The bond thus formed was temporary, holding good for 36 hours after parting. By frequent renewal, however, it might become permanent. ‘There was a sworn alliance between the Lihyanides and the Nestalics: they were wont to eat and drink together’ (RS 270 f.).
A man may declare himself the dakhil—from dakhala,
‘to enter,’ i.e. to claim protection—of a powerful man, and this puts under shelter of his name even before his tent is reached. Whoever should in any case have would have to reckon with the man whose name he had invoked. The rights of sanctuary associated with temples, and until recently with certain churches, originated in an appeal to the protection of the local deity. The refugee’s safety depended on the respect paid to the god. Joab would have been safe had he not outranked himself in this regard (1 K 20:21). Jael’s

HOST OF HEAVEN

The phrase 'host (or army) of heaven' occurs in OT in two apparently different senses—referring (1) to stars, (2) to angels.

1. In the OT the term 'host of heaven' is mentioned as the object of idolatrous worship; it is frequently coupled with 'sun and moon,' the stars being obviously meant; where 'sun and moon' are not specifically mentioned, the phrase may be used as including them as well. Dt 4:19 speaks of this worship as a special temptation to Israel; it has been appointed or allotted to all the peoples, i.e., the host, and is absolutely inconsistent with the worship of the Lord. The idea of the heavenly hosts is even more pronounced in the temple service. The references to it suggest that it became prominent in Israel in the 7th cent. B.C., when Manasseh introduced it into the Temple (2 K 21:19); its abolition was part of Josiah's reform (338-312). The mention, in the last verse, of the altar which was on the roof of the upper chamber of Ahaz' suggests that the worship was, in fact, older than the reign of Manasseh, and had been practised by Ahaz; it was carried on upon the roofs of houses (2 K 16:19), and the 2 K 23:20 may well refer to it. Is 17:2 mentions 'sun-pillars' as characteristic of the idolatry of the reign of Ahaz (unless the words are a later addition), and there are possible traces of nature-worship in earlier periods in Am 5:28, and in the names Ahaz, Jericho, which suggest sun- and moon-worship. 2 K 18:17, which speaks of the worship of the host of heaven as prevalent in the Northern Kingdom, is a Deuteronomistic passage, which can hardly be pressed historically. There then, are early traces of nature-worship, the systematised idolatry of 'the host of heaven' belongs to the period of special Assyrian and Babylonian influence; astrology and kindred beliefs were characteristic of the religions of these countries.

The phrase is used in other contexts of the stars as the arms of J', innuemerable, ordered, and obedient (Gen 2:2, Ps 33:5, Is 34:14, 45:5, Jer 33:20). Is 44:6 ('bringeth out their host, number them by name') comes very near to a personification. In Dn 8:10 we read of the assault of the 'little horn' on the 'host of heaven' and their 'prince.' This may be only a hyperbolical expression for blasphemy; but it strongly suggests the influence of the Babylonian 'dragon myth,' in which heaven itself was stormed; cf. Rev 12:13, where the Beast blasphemes God, His tabernacles, and them that dwell in heaven; i.e., the angelic host (so Bouyer), at least in the idea underlying the conception. Thus in Dn 8:10 we are probably right in seeing a reference to the stars regarded as animate warriors of J', their 'captain'; cf. the poetical passages Js 6:1 (the stars in their courses fighting against Eisa) and Job 38:31 (the morning stars, coupled with the 'sons of God,' singing for joy); in these passages it remains a question how far the personification is merely a poetic figure. It is at least possible that a more literal meaning was intended here, as in Dn 7:9, where the idea of God's rule is supposed to be carried on by angels, and the phrase must refer to sumerumane force of J', whether stars or angels; again, a reference to the dragon myth is very possible.

3. Passages such as these lead to the consideration of others where 'host of heaven' = angels. The chief is 1 K 2:21 (Micaiah's vision); cf. Ps 105:4, Lk 2:1. Though this actual phrase is not often used, the attendant passages on J' are often labelled as the organized Army (Gen 32:1, Jos 5:4, 2 K 8:7, Job 29:1). Cf. in the connection the title 'Lord of hosts (Sabaioth),' which, though it may have been used originally of J' as the leader of the armies of Israel, admitted to be used of Him as ruler of the celestial host (see next art.).

on the full force of their language as affording a key to the reconstruction of the popular beliefs which seem to lie behind it. It should be noted that Wis 13:1 protests against any idea that the heavenly bodies are animate, and it has been suggested that Ezekiel's avoidance of the phrase 'Lord of hosts' may be due to a fear of seeming to lend any countenance to star-worship.

HOTHIR.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25:9).

HOUGH.—The hough (modern spelling 'hock') of a quadruped is the joint between the knee and the fustock in the hind leg; in man the back of the knee joint, called the ham. To 'hough' is 'to cut the tendon of the hough, to hamstring. The subst. occurs in 2 Es 15:8 'the camel's hough' (AVm 'pastern or tatter'). The verb is found in Jos 11:1, 2 S 14:1, 1 Ch 13:18 always of houghing horses. Tindale translates Gn 49:14 'in their self-will they houghed an ox', which is retained in AVm, and inserted into the text of RV in place of 'they digged down a wall.'

HOUSE.—The history of human habitation in Palestine goes back to the undated spaces of the palaeolithic or early stone age (see especially the important chapter on 'Prehistoric Archaeology' in Vincent, Canaan d'après les Anciens, 1967, pp. 354-370). The excavations and discoveries, of the last few years in particular, have introduced us to the pre-historic inhabitants whom the Semitic invaders, loosely termed Canaanites or Amorites, found in occupation of the country some time before our era (circa 2500). The men of this early race were still in the neolithic stage of civilization, their only implements being of polished flint, bone, and wood. They lived for the most part in the natural limestone caves in which Palestine abounds. In the historical period such underground caves (for descriptions and diagrams of some of the more celebrated, see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 155-164; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, 204-270) were used by the Hebrews as places of refuge in times of national danger (Jos 6:5, 1 S 13:20 and religious persecution (2 Mac 6:14, He 11:38). But it is not with these, or with the tents in which the patriarchs and their descendants lived before the conquest of Canaan, that this article has to deal, but with the houses of clay and stone which were built and occupied after that epoch.

1. —The most primitive of all the houses for which man has been indebted to his own inventiveness is that formed of a few leafy boughs from the primeval forest, represented in Hebrew history to this day by the booths of OT (see Buzim). Of more permanent habitations, the earliest of which traces have been discovered are probably the mud huts, whose foundations were found by Mr. Macalister in the lowest stratum at Gezer, and which are regarded by him as the work of the cave-dwellers of the later stone age (PEFQ, 1904, 110). Clay in the form of bricks, either sun-dried or, less frequently, baked in a kiln (see Brick), and stone (Lx 14:11, 1 S 24:10 etc.), have been in all ages the building materials of the successive inhabitants of Palestine. Even in districts where stone was available the more tractable material was often preferred. Houses built of crude brick are the 'houses of clay,' the unsubstantial one of which is emphasized in Ezek 12:2, and whose walls a thief or another could easily dig through (Ezk 12:2, Mt 6:12).

The excavations have shown that there is no uniformity, nor indeed a single type, in the houses which have occupied the land. At Gezer a common size is a square brick 15 inches in the side and 7 inches thick (PEFQ, 1902, 319). In the Mishna the standard size is a square brick 9 inches each way (Brobin, 1:3).

The stone used for house building varied from common field stones and larger, roughly shaped, quarry stones to the carefully dressed wrougeth stone (dashed, 1 K 5:5), or 'hewn-stone, according to measure, sawed with saws' (?), such as was used by Solomon in building operations. Similarly rubble, wound stone, and brick are named in the Mishna as the building materials of the present time (Baba bathra, 1). For mortars the possibility of change is reduced to a minimum. In a Syrian village of to-day the typical abode of the fellah consists of a walled enclosure, within which is a small court closed at the further end by a house of a single room. This is frequently divided into two parts, one level with the entrance, assigned at night to the domestic animals, cows, ass, etc.; the other, about 18 ft. higher, occupied by the peasant and his family. A somewhat better class of house consists of two or three rooms, of which the largest is the family living and sleeping room, a second is assigned to the cattle, while a third serves as general store-room (AV close, a).

The Canaanites, which the Hebrews inherited (Dt 6:9) and copied, are now known to have been arranged on similar lines (see the diagram of a typical Canaanite house in Fig. 2.). The recent excavations at Gezer and elsewhere have shown that the simplest type of house in Palestine has scarcely altered in any respect for four thousand years. Indeed, its construction, which was probably a possibility of change is reduced to a minimum. In a Syrian village of to-day the typical abode of the fellah consists of a walled enclosure, within which is a small court closed at the further end by a house of a single room. This is frequently divided into two parts, one level with the entrance, assigned at night to the domestic animals, cows, ass, etc.; the other, about 18 ft. higher, occupied by the peasant and his family. A somewhat better class of house consists of two or three rooms, of which the largest is the family living and sleeping room, a second is assigned to the cattle, while a third serves as general store-room (AV close, a).

The stone used for house building varied from common field stones and larger, roughly shaped, quarry stones to the carefully dressed dressed stone (dashed, 1 K 5:5), or 'hewn-stone, according to measure, sawed with saws' (?), such as was used by Solomon in building operations. Similarly rubble, wound stone, and brick are named in the Mishna as the building materials of the present time (Baba bathra, 1). For mortars the possibility of change is reduced to a minimum. In a Syrian village of to-day the typical abode of the fellah consists of a walled enclosure, within which is a small court closed at the further end by a house of a single room. This is frequently divided into two parts, one level with the entrance, assigned at night to the domestic animals, cows, ass, etc.; the other, about 18 ft. higher, occupied by the peasant and his family. At Canaanite in lamp 'dark-brown Vincent, broke mention among five (Ps straw'; straw'; part, to is and of a burials. Gradually, it would seem, lamps and bowls came to be buried alone, as substitutes and symbols of the human victim, most frequently a lamp within a bowl, with another bowl as covering. Full details of this curious rite cannot be given here, but no other theory so plausible has yet been suggested to explain these 'lamp and bowl deposits' (see Macalister's reports in PEFSt, from 1903—esp. p. 306 ff. with illustrations—onwards, also his Bible Side-Lights, 165 ff.; Vincent, Canaan, 50 ff., 192, 198 ff.). The only reference to foundation sacrifice in OT is the case of Hiel the Bethelite, who sacrificed his two sons—for that such is the true interpretation can now scarcely be doubted—his first-born at the re-founding of Jericho, and his youngest at the completion and dedication of the walls and gates (1 K 16th RV). Hence by anticipation may be taken the rite of the formal dedication of a private house, which is attested by Dt 20, although the references in Hebrew literature to the actual ceremony are confined to sacred and propitiatory purposes (Lv 4th, 1 K 8th, 192, Ex 31, 18, Neh 31265, 1 Mac 4th). It is not improbable that some of the human victims above alluded to may have been offered in connexion with the dedication or restoration of important buildings (cf. 1 K 16th above).

In conclusion, that, judging from the ideas and practice of the Bedouin when a new tent or 'house of hair' is set up, we ought to seek the explanation of the rite of foundation sacrifice—a practice which obtains among many races widely separated in space and time—in the desire to propitiate the spirit whose abode is supposed to be disturbed by the new foundation (cf. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 46 ff.), rather than in the wish to secure the spirit of the victim as the tutelary genius of the new building. This ancient custom still survives in the sacrifice of a sheep or other animal, which is indispensable to the safe occupation of a new house in Moslem lands, and even to the successful inauguration of a public work, such as a railway, or—as the other day in Damascus—of an electric lighting installation. In the words of an Arab saying, a house must have its death—man, woman, child, or animal (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day).

4. Details of construction, walls and floor.—The walls of Canaanite and Hebrew houses were for the most part, as we have seen, of crude brick or stone. At Tell el-Hesay (Lachish), for example, we find at one period house walls of 'dark-brown clay with little straw'; at another, walls of 'reddish-yellow clay, full of straw' (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 44). At Gezer Mr. Macalister found a wall that was 'remarkable for being built in alternate courses of red and white bricks, the red course being four inches in height, the white five inches' (PEFSt, 1903, 216). As a rule, however, the Gezer house walls consisted of common field stones, among which dressed stones—even at corners and door posts—are of the rarest possible occurrence. The joints were rather irregular, and filled with mud packed in the widest places with smaller stones' (ibid. 215). The explanation of this simple architecture is that in early times each man built his own house, expert builders (Ps 118th) or masons (see Aram and Chaldean, § 3) being employed only on royal residences, city walls, and other buildings of importance. Hence squared and dressed stones are mentioned in OT only in connexion with such works (1 K 5th-7th, 10, 12, 12, and the houses of the wealthy, e.g., 1 K 5th, 19). In Gezer the houses that are left of the post-exilic period, however, the stones are well dressed and squared, often as well shaped as a modern brick.

Between these two extremes are found walls of rubble and quarried stones of various sizes, roughly trimmed with a hammer. Mud was 'universally used as mortar.' In ordinary cases the thickness of the outside walls varied from 18 to 24 inches. The thickness of partition walls, on the other hand, did not exceed 9 to 12 inches (ibid. 118, 121). In NT times the thickness varied somewhat with the materials employed (see Baba bathra, l. 1). It is doubtless if the common view is correct, which finds in certain passages, especially Ps 118, and its NT citations, a reference to a corner stone on the topmost course of masonry (see Corner). In most cases the reference is to the foundation stone at the corner of two walls, as explained above.

The inside walls of stone houses received a 'plaster' (EV) of clay (Lv 14th, AV 'dust,' RV 'mortar'), or, in the better houses, of lime or gypsum (Dn 5th). The 'untempered mortar' of Ezek 33 220 was some sort of whitewash applied to the outside walls, as is attested for NT times (Mt 23th, Ac 23th 'thou whitewalled'). In the houses of the wealthy, as in the Temple, it was customary to line the walls with cypress (2 Ch 38, EV 'fir'), cedar, and other valuable woods (1 K 6th, 17). The 'ceiled houses' of EV (Jer 22th, Hag 1th etc.) are houses panelled with wood in this way (Cieles). The name of elegance was represented by cedar panels inlaid with ivory, such as carved for Ahaziah (2 Ch 22th, where the name of 'the ivory house' (1 K 22th) and inquired the decoration of Amos (Am 3th). We also hear of the panelled 'ceilings' of the successive Temples (1 K 6th, 2 Mac 11th RV).

The floors of the houses were in all periods made of hard beaten clay, the permanence of which to this day has proved to the excavators a precious indication of the successive occupations of the site. Public buildings have been found paved with slabs of stone. The better sort of private houses were no doubt, like the Temple (1 K 6th), floored withexpress and other woods.

The presence of vaults or cellars, in the larger houses, at least, is shown by Lk 11th RV. The excavations also show that when a wholly or partly ruined town was rebuilt, the houses or other stratum were frequently retained as underground store-rooms of the new houses on the higher level. The reference in 1 Ch 27th, 22 to wine and oil 'cellars' (EV) is to 'stores' of these commodities, rather than to the places where the latter were kept.

5. The roof.—The ancient houses of Canaan, like their modern representatives, had flat roofs, supported by stout wooden beams laid from wall to wall. Across these were laid smaller rafters (Ca 11th), then brushwood, reeds, and the like, above which was a layer of earth several inches thick, while on the top of all came a thick plaster of clay or of clay and lime. It was such a roofing (AV tiling, RV tiles, Lk 6th) that the friends of the paralytic 'broke up in order to lower him into the room below (Mk 2th). The wood for the roof-beams was furnished mostly by the common sycamore, cypress (Ca 11th) and cedar (1 K 6th) being reserved for the houses of the wealthy. Hence the point of Isaiah's contrast between the humble houses of crude brick, roofed with sycamore, and the stately edifices of hewn stone roofed with cedar (Is 9th).

It was, and is, difficult to keep such a roof watertight in the rainy season, as Pr 27th shows. In several houses at Gezer a primitive drain of jars was found for carrying the water from the upper roof (Ec 3rd, RV) through the floor to the foundations beneath (PEFSt, 1904, 14, with illusr.). In the Mishna there is mention of at least two kinds of spout or gutter (2 S 5th AV, but the sense here is doubtful) for conveying the rain water from the roof to the earth. Evidence in recent years showing that even in the smallest houses it was usual to have the beams of the roof supported by a row of wooden posts, generally three in number, resting on stone bases, ‘from 1 foot 6 inches to 2 feet in diameter‘ (PFBS, 1904, 115, with photo). The same method was adopted for the roofs of large public buildings, as at the 'casement' of the 'house of any Cities' (Jos 21:16, cf. with plan), and Mr. Macalister has ingeniously explained Samson’s feat at the temple of Dagon, by supposing that he did two of the massive wooden pillars (Jg 16:19) supported the roof of the temple, and that he split the west end or portion from the stone, thus causing its collapse (Bible Sidetalks, 136 ff. with illust.).

The roof was required by law to be surrounded by a battlement, or rather a parapet, as a protection against assault (IK 29:9). Access to the roof was apparently obtained, as at the present day, by an outside stair leading from the court. Our E.V finds 'winding stairs' in the Temple (1 K 6:19), and some sort of inner stair or ladder is required by the reference to the secret trap-door in 2 Mac 12. The roof or house-top was put to many uses, domestic (Jos 2:20) and other. It was used, in particular, for recreation (2 S 115) and for sleeping (1 S 9:11), also for prayer and meditation (Ac 10), lamentation (1 Jo 5, Jer 45:15), and even for idolatrous worship (Jer 19:10, Zeph 1). For these and other purposes a tent (2 S 16:22) or a booth (Neh 8:4) might be provided, or a permanent roof-chamber might be erected. We are the 'chamber with windows' (Jg 6:3, RVm) erected for Elisha, the 'summer parlour' (Jg 3:16, lit. as RV 'upper chamber of cooling') of Egdon, and the 'loft' (RV 'chamber') of 1 K 17:19.

On the other hand, the houses of Palestine were, as a rule, of one story. Exceptions were confined to the houses of the great, and to crowded cities like Jerusalem and Samaria. Azariah’s upper chamber in the latter city (2 K 23:11) may well have been a room in the second story of the royal palace, where was evidently the window from which Zechariah was thrown (9:1). The same may be said of the 'upper room' in which the Last Supper was held (Mk 14:11-12), which was a Great Chamber (Ex 25:20) or second storey. It was a Great Chamber, however, in which Eutychus fell from a window in the ‘third story’ (Ac 20:9 RV).

6. The door and its parts.—The door consisted of four distinct parts: the door proper, the threshold, the lintel (Ex 12:24 RV), and the two doorposts. The first of these was of wood, and was hung upon projecting pivots of wood, the hinges of 7r šmîd, which turned in corresponding sockets in the threshold and lintel respectively. Like the Egyptians and Babylonians, the Hebrews probably fixed the pivots and sockets of heavy doors with bronze; those of the Temple doors were sheathed in gold (1 K 7:49). In the Hauran, doors of a single piece of stone or stone pivots are still found in situ. Folding doors are mentioned only in connexion with the Temple (1 K 6:16).

The threshold (Jg 19:17, 1 K 14:17 etc.) sill must have been invariably of stone. Among the Hebrews, as among so many other peoples of antiquity, a special sanctity attached to the threshold (see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant, passim). The doorposts or jambs were square posts of wood (1 K 7, Ezk 4:12) or of stone. The command of Dt 6:17 gave rise to the practice, still observed in all Jewish houses, of enclosing a piece of parchment containing the words of Dt 6:13-11 11:13-11 in a small case of metal or wood, which is nailed to the door-post, hence its modern name messasch (‘door-post’).

Doors were locked (Jg 3:14 etc.) by an arrangement similar to that still in use in Syria (see the illust. in Hastings’ DB ii. 836). This consists of a short upright piece of wood, fastened on the inside of the door, through which a square wooden bolt (Ca še, Neh 3:7 RV, for AV lock) passes at right angles into a socket in the jamb of the door. When the bolt is shot by the hand, three to six small iron pins drop from the upright into holes in the bolt, which is hollow at this part. The latter cannot now be drawn back without the proper key. This is a flat piece of wood—straight or bent as the case may be—into the upper surface of which pins have been fixed corresponding exactly in number and position to the holes in the bolt. The person wishing to enter the house 'puts in his hand by the hole of the door' (Ca še), and inserts the key into the hollow part of the bolt in such a way that the pins of the key will displace those in the bolt, and the lock will be easily withdrawn from the socket and the door is open.

In the larger houses it was customary to have a man (Mk 12:19) or a woman (2 S 4:5 RVm, Jn 18:10) to act as doorkeeper or porter. The gate to the palace of royalty this was a military duty (1 K 14:17) and an office of distinction (Est 2:6).

7. Lighting and heating.—The ancient Hebrew houses were very far from being supplied with light. Indeed, it is almost certain that, in the poorer houses at least, the only light available was admitted through the doorway (cf. Sir 42:1 [Heb. text]). 'Let there be no casement where thy daughter dwells'. In any case, such windows as did exist were placed high up in the walls, at least six feet from the ground, according to the Mishna. We have no certain monumental evidence as to the size and construction of the windows of Hebrew houses (but see for a probable stone window-frame, 20 inches high, Bliss and Macalister, Excav. in Palæst, 143 and pl. 73). They may, however, safely be assumed to have been much smaller than those to which we are accustomed, but through the common wicket, the doors of which were large enough to allow a man to pass out (Jos 2:4, 1 S 19:10) or in (Jl 2:9). Another variety (‘arubah) was evidently smaller, since it is used also to designate the holes of a dovecot (Is 60:15 RV ’arubah'). These ‘windows’ of Hebrew houses were, as we have seen, rendered in our versions by ‘window,’ lattice, and casement (Pr 7:4 AV and RV ’latticée’). None of these, of course, was filled with glass. Like the windows of Egyptian houses, they were doubtless closed with wood or lattice-work, which could be opened when necessary (2 K 13:25). An obscure expression in 1 K 6:15 is rendered by RV, ‘windows of fixed lattice-work’. During the night they were bolted up. It was a great trial and labour which was kept continually burning (see Lamp).

Most of the houses excavated show a depression of varying dimensions in the floor, either in the centre or in a corner, which, from the obvious traces of fire, was clearly the family hearth (Is 30:14). Wood was the chief fuel (see Coal), supplemented by withered vegetation of all sorts (Mk 6:6), and, probably, as at the present day, by dried cow and camel dung (Lkr 5:4). The pungent smoke, which was trying to the eyes (Pr 10:16), escaped by the door or by the window, for the chimney of Hes 13 is properly ‘window’ or ‘casement’ (‘arubah, see above). In the cold weather, the upper classes warmed their rooms by means of a brader (Jer 31:31 RV), or fire-pan (Zec 12:9 RV).

8. Furniture of the house.—This in early times was of the simplest description. Even at the present day the felahin sit and sleep mostly on mats and mattresses spread upon the floor. So the Hebrew will once have slept, wrapped in his simlah or cloak as his ‘only covering’ (Ex 22:12), while his household gear will have consisted mainly of the necessary utensils for the preparation of food, to which the following section is devoted. Under the monarchy, however, when a certain ‘great woman’ of Shunem proposed to furnish ‘a little chamber over the wall’ for Elisha, she named ‘a bed and a table and a stool and a candlestick’ (2 K 4:32), and we know otherwise that while the poor man slept on a simple mat of straw or rushes in the single room that served as living and sleeping room, the well-to-do had not only beds but bedchambers (2 S 4:4, 2 K 11, Jlh 16B etc.). The former consisted of a framework of wood, on which were laid cushions (Am 2:4 RV, ‘carpets’ and ‘striped couches’ (1 Th 4:11 RV). We hear also of the ‘bed’s head’ (Gn 47:8) or curved end, as figured by William Smith, Encyc. Bib., Append. 1. 416, fig. 191 (where note the steps for ‘going up’ to the bed; cf. 1 K 11). Bolsters have rightly disappeared from RV, which renders otherwise (see 1 S 19:14 RV etc.); the pillow also from Gn 28:12 and Mk 4:37.
HOUSE

(RV here, 'cushion'), and where it is retained, as 1 S 10:13, the sense is doubtful. Reference may be made to the richly appointed bed of Holophernes, with its gorgeous mosquito curtain (Jth 10:13 139).

The bed often served as a couch by day (Ezk 23:4, Am 3:6 RV—see also MEALS, § 3), and it is sometimes uncertain which is the more suitable rendering. In Ezekiel's time, RV rightly substitutes 'couch' for 'beds' in the description of the magnificent divans of gold and silver in the palace of Abaserus (cf. 7:9). The wealthy and luxurious contemporaries of Amos had their beds and couches inlaid with ivory (Am 8:5), and furnished, according to RV, with 'silk cushions' (3:9 RV).

As regards the stool above referred to, and the seats of the Hebrews generally, it must suffice to state that the seats of the contemporary Egyptians (for illustration see W. F. Albright, Biblical Archaelogy, 2nd ed., 1934, pp. 83-86) were two main varieties, namely, stools and chairs. The former were constructed either with a square frame or after the shape of our camp-stools; the latter with a straight or rounded back, and a cushion resting upon it (Jth 10:13). The Hebrew word for Elisha's stool is always applied elsewhere to the seats of persons of distinction and the thrones of kings; it must therefore have been a chair rather than a stool, although the latter is its usual meaning in the Mishna (Krengel, Das Hausgerät der Mishnah, 10 t.—a mine of information regarding furniture, native and foreign, to be found in Jewish times). Possessions of this kind were also in use (2 Ch 9:14 and oft., especially in metaphors).

The tables were chiefly of wood, and, like those of the Egyptians (Wilkinson, op. cit. I. 417 t. with illustration), were 'round, square, or oblong,' as the Mishna attests. They were relatively much smaller and lower than ours (see, further, MEAS, § 4).

The fourth article in Elisha's room was a candlestick, really a lampstand, for which see LAMP. It would seem that, according to RV, King Josiphon's court in Samaria was furnished with an extensive selection from the many other articles of furniture, apart from those reserved for the closing section, which are named in Biblical and post-Biblical literature. These were relatively much smaller and lower than ours (see, further, MEAS, § 4).

9. Utensils connected with food.—Conspicuous among the 'earthen vessels' (2 S 17:5) of every household was the water jar or pitcher (kal). From the dawn of Hebrew civilization the vessel of 1 K 18:38, 39 Am. RV jar—in which water was fetched from the village well (Gn 24:4, Mk 14:13, and oft.)—the larger smaller jar, carried on head or shoulder, the water was emptied into the larger waterpots of Jn 2:2. Large jars were also required for the household provisions of wheat and barley—one variety in NT times was large enough to hold a man. Others held the store of olives and other fruits.

These vessels were smaller jars used one or two handles, used for carrying water on a journey (1 S 26:12, 1 K 19), also for holding oil (1 K 17:18). (See, further, ART, POTTERY, and the elaborate studies, with illustrations, of the thousands of 'potter's vessels' which the excavations have brought to light, in the great work of Bliss and Macalister entitled Excavations in Palestine, 1888-1900, pp. 71-141, with plates 20-55; also Vincent's Catalogue d'apres l'exploration récente, 1907-19, pp. 290-300, with the illustrations there and throughout the book).

The bucket of Nu 24:7, 4097 was a water-skin, probably adapted, as at the present day, for drawing water by having two pieces of wood inserted crosswise at the mouth. The main use of skins among the Hebrews, however, was to hold the wine and other fermented liquors. The misleading rendering bottles is retained in RV except where the context requires the true rendering 'skins' or 'wine-skins' (Jos 9:14, Mt 9:17). For another use of skins see Mil. 'After the water-skins,' says Doughty, 'a pair of millstones is the most necessary household in an Arabah household,' and so it was among the Hebrews, as may be seen in the article MILL. The house was completed without a surprise to the eyes of various sizes and shapes for the bread (Ex 23:19) and the fruit (Dt 28), and even in early times for the serving of meat (Jg 10:14). Among the 'vessels of wood' of Lv 16:10 was the indispensable wooden bowl, which served as a kneading-trough (Ex 12:19), and various other bowls, such as the 'lordly dish' of the nomad Saul (Jg 14:4) and the bowl of Gideon (6:18), although the bowls were mostly of earthenware (see Bowl).

As regards the actual preparation of food, apart from the oven (for which see BREAD), our attention is drawn chiefly to the various members of the pot family, so to say. Four of these are named together in 1 S 2:14, the kyîyôr, the ñād, the yôllaqô, and the pârûr, rendered respectively the pan, the kettle, the caldron, and the pot. Elsewhere these terms are rendered with small attempt at consistency. While the first is evidently a large and made of bronze (Ex 2:16), while the pârûr was small and of earthenware, hence ben-Sira's question: 'What fellowship hath the [earthen] pot with the [bronze] caldron?' (Sir 13:5, Heb. text). The kyîyôr, again, was wide and shallow, rather than narrow and deep. Numerous illustrations of cooking-pots from OT times may be seen in the recent works above referred to. The only cooking utensil known to be of iron are the baking-pan (Lv 2:17), probably a shallow iron iron-pan (Lv 2:17). A knife, originally of flint (Jos 2:2) and later of bronze, was required for cutting up the meat to be cooked (Gn 25:15, Jg 16:28), and a fork for lifting it from the pot (1 S 1:22, EV fleshpot, see, however, 1 S 1:19). In the collection of pottery figured in Bliss and Macalister's work one must seek the counterparts of the various dishes, mostly wide, deep bowls, in which we read of food being served, such as the 'dish' in which the sluggard is too lazy to withdraw his hand (Pr 19:17, RV), and the chargers of Nu 7:9, though here they are of silver (see, further, MEAS, § 6). In the same way a student will near an almost innumerable of cups, some for drawing the 'cup of cold water' from the large water-jars, others for wine—flagons, jugs, and juglets. The material of all these will have ascended from the coarsest earthenware to bronze (Lv 19:10), and from bronze to silver (Nu 7:9, Jth 12) and gold (1 K 10:23, Est 1:10), according to the rank and wealth of their owners and the purposes for which they were designed.

HOZAI is given as a prop. name in RV of 2 Ch 33:17, where AV and RV give 'the servant.' AVVm has Hosai. If we retain the MT, the tr. of RV seems the only defensible one, but perhaps the original reading was 'his seer.'

HUKOK.—A place near Tabor on the west of Naphtali (Jos 19:30). It may be the present village Yâkûn near the edge of the plateau to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee.

HUKOK.—See Heikath.

HUL.—The eponym of an Aramean tribe (Gn 10:18) whose location is quite uncertain.

HULDAH ('weasel'; an old totem clan-name—so W. R. Smith).—The prophetess, wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, living in a part of Jerusalem called the Mishneh ('second quarter'), whose advice...
Josiah sought, by a deputation of his chief ministers, on the alarming discovery of 'the book of the law' in the Temple, in 621 B.C. (2 K 22:4-43; 2 Ch 34:4-45). Her response was threatening for the nation, in the strain of 'Hezekiah', while promising exemption to the pious king. Huldah ranks with Deborah and Hannah among the rare women-prophets of the OT.

HUMILITY.—Trench defines 'humility' as the esteeming of ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so; the thinking truly, and hence truly, therefore lowly, of ourselves. Alford, Ellicott, Salmond, Vincent, and many others defend the word, as an inadequate and faulty definition. A man may be small and may realize his smallness, and yet be far from being humble. His spirit must be full of envy instead of humility. He may be depressed in spirit because it never knows its meanness and general worthlessness, and yet he be so as rebellious against his lot or his constitutional proclivities as he is clearly cognizant of them. Low-mindedness is not lowly-mindedness. The exhortation of Ph 2 is not meant to mean that every man ought to think that everybody else is better than himself in moral character, or in outward conduct, or in natural or inherited powers. That would be impossible in some cases and untrue in many others if it were not an exhortation to either an impossibility or an untruthfulness. A better definition of the Christian grace of humility is found in the union of highest self-respect with uttermost abandon of self-love in service. A man who knows his own superior worth and yet is willing to serve his inferiors in Christian love is a humble man. The classic example in the NT is Jn 13:1-17. The Lord, knowing that the Father had given all things into His hands, and that He came from God and would go again unto God, knowing His incomparable superiority to every one in that company, was yet so meek and lowly in heart, so humble in spirit as to serve, that He emptied Himself of his glory and, by a self-humbled spirit, became a servant to all. He became lowly of himself and of His dignity. Genuine humility is the strongest element in its own integrity; it is consistent with the highest dignity of character and life. Hence we may rightly call the Incarnation the Humiliation of Christ. He stood at the head of the heavenly hierarchies. He was the highest. God had given all things into His hands. Yet He humbled Himself to become a man. He made Himself of no reputation. He was not ministered unto, but ministered to. He was the servant of all. There was no humility in the universe like unto His. Yet He never forgot His dignity. When Pilate asked Him If He were a king, He answered that He was. He stood in kingly majesty before the mob, in kingly serenity before His magistrates; He hung as King upon the cross. Yet He never forgot His humility. Being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. St. Paul exclaims, 'Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus' (Ph 2:5-11). God giveth grace to all who are thus humble (Ja 4:10).

When Augustine was asked, 'What is the first article in the Christian religion?' he answered, 'Humility.' And they said, 'What is the second?' and he said, 'Humility.' And they said, 'What is the third?' and he said the third time, 'Humility.' Pascal said: 'Vanity has taken so firm a hold on the heart of man, that a porter, a hodman, a turn-spit, can talk greatly of himself, and is for having his admiration. Philosophers who, of the contempt of the glory do yet desire the glory of writing well, and those who read their compositions would not lose the glory of having read them. God, in the Acts of the Apostles, would have it known to all the world; and even to those who are not to come into the word till we have left it. And at the same time we are so little and vain as that the esteem of five or six persons about us is enough to content and amuse us.'

Hunting.—A city of Judah (Jos 15:9). The site is doubtful.

Hunting is not conspicuous in the literature of the Philosophers that remains to us. We may probably infer that it did not bulk largely in their life. As an amusement, it seems to belong to a more advanced stage of civilization than they had reached. The typical hunter was found outside their borders (Gn 10:9), and even skilful in the chase, is depicted as somewhat uncouth and simple (Gn 25:19 etc.). Not till the time of Herod do we hear of a king achieving excellence in this form of sport (Jos. BJ r. xxi. 13). Wild animals and birds were likewise, appreciated as food (Lv 17:10, 1 S 26:5 etc.); and in a country like Palestine, abounding in beasts and birds of prey, some proficiency in the hunter's art was necessary in order to secure the safety of the community, and the protection of the flocks. Among these 'evil beasts' lions and bears were the most dangerous (Gn 37:9, 1 K 13:4, 2 K 24, Pr 28:19 etc.). Deeds of prowess in the slaughter of such animals—by Samson in self-defence (Ja 14:8), David the shepherd to rescue his charges (1 S 17:40, and Benaiah (2 S 23:24)—gained for these men abiding fame. H. P. Smith (Sarmud, in loc.) would read of Benaiah: 'He used to go alone and smite the lion and bear in the prey, when he could track them easily. The difficulty is that snowly days would be rather few to permit of his making a reputation in this way.

Among the animals hunted for food were the gazelle, the hare, the roebuck, and the wild goat (Dt 12:15, 20 14 etc.). The first three are mentioned specially as furnishing the table of Solomon (1 K 4:25). The partridge was perhaps the bird chiefly hunted in ancient times, as it is at the present day (1 S 26:9). Neither beast nor bird might be eaten unless the blood had been 'poured out' (Lv 17:14, Dt 12:14 etc.)—a law still observed by the Moslems.

Little information is given in Scripture as to the methods followed by the hunters. The hunting dog is not mentioned; but it is familiar to Josephus (Ant. vi. 8). The following implements were in use, viz.:—the bow and arrow (Gn 27:2 etc.), the club (Job 4:19), nets (Job 19:19, Ps 94, Is 51:19 etc.), pits, in which there might be a net, dug and concealed to entrap the larger animals (Ps 94, Ezek 19 etc.), the sling (1 S 17:40), the weapon of the fowler (Ps 64:11, Is 11:14). The bird, the hare, and the partridge in a cage was used as a decoy (Sir 11:10). The modern Syrian is not greatly addicted to hunting. Occasional raids are made upon the bears on Mt. Hermon. To the scandal of Jew and Moslem, Christians sometimes hunt the wild boar in the Huleh marshes, and in the thickets beyond Jordan. See also NETS, SNARES, etc.

Hupham.—See HupPM.

HupPAM.—A priest of the 13th course (1 Ch 24:9).

Huppim.—The head of a Benjamite family (Gn 46:26 F, 1 Ch 7:12 A, Nu 29 F [Hupham]).

Hur.—The name is possibly of Egyptian origin.

1. With Aaron he held up Moses' hands, in order that by the continual uplifting of the sacred staff Israel might prevail over Amalek (Ex 17:9, 11). With Aaron he was left in charge of the people when Moses ascended the mountain (24:4 E). 2. A Judahite, the grandfather of Bezalel (Ex 31:2 35:2 36:23 F). According to the Chronicle, he was descended from Perez, through Hezron and Caleb (1 Ch 2:23-26 4:4, 2 Ch 1:19); and in Jos. Ant. xxi. 4, 5, 1, he is the husband of Miriam, and identical with 1. 3. One of the Kings of Midian slain after the sin at Peor (Nu 31:6) described as 'chiefs' of Midian, and 'princes' of Sihon (Jos 13:18). 4. The father of one of the twelve officers who supplied Solomon and his court with food (1 K 4:7 RV 'Ben-hur').
HURAI

5. The father of Rephaiah, who was a ruler of half of Jerusalem, and who helped to repair the walls (Neh 3:10).

HURAM.—See HIRAM.

HURAM.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:9). 2. 3. See HIRAM, 1 and 2.

HURL.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5:5). HUSBAND.—See FAMILY.

HUSBANDMAN, HUSBANDRY.—In EV the former is, in most cases, synonymous with 'a tiller of the ground,' which RV has substituted for it in Zec 13:9 in modern English, a farmer. The first farmer mentioned in OT, therefore, is not Noah the 'husbandman' (Gen 9:20), but Cain the 'tiller of the ground' (4:1). In Jn 1:51, however, the former has the more limited sense of 'vinedresser;' 'I am the true vine and my Father is the vine dresser' (AV and RV 'husbandman'). So, too, in the parable of the Vineyard (Mt 21:33).

Husbandry, in the same way, is tillage, farming. Thus of king Uzziah it is said that 'he loved husbandry' (latter part of 'the land' in the modern sense, 2 Ch 26:10), that is, as the context shows, he loved and fostered agriculture, including viticulture. In 1 Co 3 'husbandry' is used by metonymy of the land tilled (cf. RVtn); 'ye are God's field' (Weymouth, The NT in Modern Speech).

A. H. M. NEELE.

HYDASPE.—A river mentioned in Jtb 1:7 as on the Medo-Babylonian frontier. The name is probably the result of a confusion with the well-known Hydaspe in India (now the Jatun). In view of the mythical character of the Book of Judith, speculation as to the identity of this river is likely to remain fruitless. However, there may be a suggestion in the fact that the Syr. version reads Ulai (wh. see). W. M. NEESEY.

HYMENAUS.—A heretical Christian associated with Alexander in 1 Ti 1:20, and with Hieronymus in 1 Ti 1:22. Though some have considered that two different persons are meant, these false teachers 'made shipwreck concerning the faith'; their heresy consisted in denying the bodily resurrection, saying that the resurrection was a dream or a story invented by an early founder and apostle, and that, starting with the idea of matter being evil, made the body an unessential part of our nature, to be discarded as soon as possible. In the former passage St. Paul says that he 'delivered' the offenders 'unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme'; he uses a similar phrase of the incestuous Corinthian (1 Co 5:2), there expressing the purpose of the punishment,—the salvation of the man's spirit. The phrase may mean simple communication with renunciation of all fellowship, or may include a miraculous infliction of disease, or even death. Ramsey suggests that it is a Christian adaptation of a pagan idea, when a person wronged by another, unable to retaliate, consigned the offender to the gods and left punishment to be inflicted by Divine power.

HYMN (in NT; for OT, see MUSIC, POETRY, PSEUDOS).—The Greek word signifies specifically a poem in praise of a god or hero, but it is used, less exactly, also for a religious poem, even one of petition. The use of hymns in the early Christian Church was to be anticipated from the very nature of worship, and from the fact that the Christian religion was almost exclusively a new religion born of the New Testament between the worship of the disciples and that of the Jews of that and earlier centuries. It is proved by the numerous incidental references in the NT (cf. Ac 16:25, 1 Co 14:2, Eph 5:19, Ja 5:13, and the passages cited below), and by the famous letter of Pliny to Trajan describing the customs of the Christians. We lack, however, any collection of hymns comparable to the Psalms of the OT. Doubtless the Psalms were largely used, as at the Passover fest when the Lord's Supper was instituted (Mt 26:26); but in addition new songs would be written to express the intense emotions of the disciples, and even their spontaneous utterances in the gatherings of early Christians would almost inevitably take hymn form, modelled more or less closely upon the Psalms. In some localities, perhaps, Greek hymns served as the models. St. Paul insists (1 Co 14:2, Col 3:16) that the singing be with the spirit and the understanding, an intelligent expression of real religious feeling. These passages specify 'psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs.' While at first it seems as if three classes of composition are here distinguished, either as to subject matter, or as to form, it is probably not the case, especially as in Mt 26:26, Mk 14:24 the verb 'to hymn' is used of singing a psalm. Luke's Gospel contains several hymns, but does not mention their use by the disciples. They are the Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55), the Benedictus (Lk 1:76-79), and the Gloria in Excelsis (Lk 2:14). These hymns are comprehended by Jews in their liturgy in the early Church. The psalms and liturgical character of some other NT passages is asserted with more or less reason by different scholars (e.g. Eph 5:1, 1 Ti 3:16, 2 Ti 5:2). See Hastings' DCB, art. 'Hymn.'

Owen H. Gates.

HYPOCRITE.—This word occurs in the NT only in the Synoptic Gospels; but 'hypocrisy' is used in the Epistles (Gal 3:1, 1 Ti 3:6, 2 Ti 3:16), and the verb 'to play the hypocrisy' in Lk 20:47 (tr. 'feigned'). The hypocrisy of the Gospels is 'the appearing before men what one ought to be, but is not, before God.' At times it is a deliberately played part (e.g. Mt 6:1-18; 22:16-21), at others it is a deception of which the actor himself is unconscious (e.g. Mk 7:25, Lk 6:12, etc.). Thus, according to Christ, all who play the part of religion, whether consciously or unconsciously, without being religious, are hypocrites; and so fall under His sternest denunciation (Mt 23). This meaning of the word has led some to give it the wider interpretation of 'godlessness' in some passages (e.g. Mt 24:5; cf. Lk 12:10); but as there may always be seen in the word the idea of a religious cloak over the godlessness, the ordinary sense should be adhered to.

In the AV of O.T. (e.g. Job 8:9, Is 9:1) 'hypocrisy' is a mistranslation of the Heb. word chāneh. It passed into the NT from the Latin, which followed the Greek Versions. In RV it is rendered 'godless,' 'profane.'

Charles T. F. Grieson.

HYROANUS.—1. The son of Tobias, who had money deposited at Jerus., in the Temple treasury, at the time of the visit of Hellenorus (2 Mac 3:4). The name seems to be a local appellation. Its use among the Jews is perhaps to be explained from the fact that Artaxerxes Ochus transported a number of Jews to Hyrcania. 2. See MacCarter, § 5.

HYSSOP is mentioned several times in the Bible. It was used for sprinkling blood (Ex 12:8), and in the ritual of the cleansing of lepers (Lv 14:44, Nu 19:8); it was an insignificant plant, perhaps the most probable species is Marjoram, e.g. Origanum maru, or the common caper-plant (Capparis spinosa), which may be seen growing out of crevices in walls all over Palestine. See Caper-Berry.

E. W. G. Masterman.

IADINUS (1 Es 9:24) = Jamin of Neh 8.

IBHAR.—One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (2 S 5:11, 1 Ch 3:14).

IBLEAM.—A town belonging to West Manasseh (Jos 17:19, Jg 15:7). It is mentioned also in 2 K 9:22 in connexion with the death of king Ahabiah, who fled by the way of Beth-haggan and the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam. The Biblical data seem to be well satisfied by the modern ruin Be'lame, some 13 miles E. of N. of Samaria, more than half-way to Jezreel.

In 2 K 15:8 (AV and RV) 'before the people' should certainly be emended to 'in Ibleam.' Gath-rimmon of Jos 21:19 should be corrected for Ibleam. It is the same place that is called Bileam in 1 Ch 6:7.

IBNElah.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 9:9).

IBNIJAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 9:9).

IBRI.—A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 23:24).

IBSAM.—A descendant of Issachar (1 Ch 7:77).

IBZAN.—One of the minor judges, following Jephthah (Jg 12:12-13). He came from Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem in Zebulun (Jos 19:15), 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. He had 30 sons and 30 daughters—an evidence of his social importance—and arranged their marriages. He judged Israel 7 years, and was buried at Bethlehem. According to Jewish tradition, Ibenz was the same as Boaz.

ICHABOD.—Son of Phebeah and grandson of Eli. The name means 'in glorious,' but probably should be 'Jahweh is glory,' from an original Jochebed. 'If this guess be well founded, then the turn given to the story in 1 S 4:24 is due to a desire to mould it on the story of the birth of Benjamin in Gn 35:19.' W. C. Crose.

ICONIUM, now called Konia, is an ancient city of continuous importance from early times to the present day. Situated at the western edge of the vast central plain of Asia Minor, and well watered, it has always been a busy place. It is surrounded by beautiful orchards, which cover the meanness of its modern buildings. About the beginning of the Christian era it was on the border of the two ethnic districts, Lycaonia and Phrygia. It was in reality the easternmost city of Phrygia, and the inhabitants considered themselves Phrygians, but ancient writers commonly speak of it as a city of Lycaonia (wh. see), the fate of which it generally shared. In the 3rd cent. B.C. it was ruled by the Seleucids, and about B.C. 164, probably, it passed under the power of the Galatei (Asiatic Celts). It was the property of the Pontic kings from about 150, was set free during the Parthian Wars, and in A.D. 30 it was given by Mark Antony to Ptolemy, king of Cilicia Trachaea. In B.C. 36 Antony gave it to Amyntas, who was at that time made king of Galatia (wh. see). On his death in A.D. 25 the whole of his kingdom became the Roman province of Galatia. Iconium could thus be spoken of as Lycaonian, Phrygian, or Galatic, according to the speaker's point of view. In the time of the Emperor Claudius, it, along with Derbe, received the honorary prefix Claudianus, becoming Claudiicum (compare our Royal Burghs), but it was not till Hadrian’s time (A.D. 117–138) that it became a Roman colony (wh. see). Its after history may be omitted. It was eighteen miles distant from Lystra, and a direct route passed between them.

The gospel was brought to Iconium by Paul and Barnabas, who visited it twice on the first missionary journey (Ac 13:13–14). The presence of Jews there is confirmed by the evidence of inscriptions. According to the view now generally accepted by English-speaking scholars, it is comprehended in the ‘Phrygo-Galatic’ region of Ac 16 and the ‘Galatic region and Phrygia’ of Ac 18. It was thus visited four times in all by St. Paul, who addressed it among other cities in his Epistle to the Galatians. During the absence of Paul it had been visited by Judaizers, who pretended that Paul was a mere messenger of the earlier Apostles, and contended that the Jewish ceremonial law was binding on the Christian converts. Paul’s Epistle appears to have been successful, and the Galatians afterwards contributed to the collection for the poor Christians of Jerusalem. The alternative view is that Iconium is not really included in the Acts narrative after 16:22, as the words quoted above from Ac 16:10 and 18:2 refer to a different district to the far north of Iconium, and that the Epistle to the Galatians, being addressed to that northern district, has no connexion with Iconium. In any case, Iconium is one of the places included in the (province) Galatia which is addressed in First Peter (about A.D. 80 probably), and the large number of Christian inscriptions which have been reared in the city reveal the existence of a vigorous Christian life in the third and following centuries. A. BOUTER.

IDALAH.—A town of Zebulun (Jos 19:14).

IDBASH.—One of the sons of the father of Etam (1 Ch 4:9).

IDDO.—1. Ezr 8:17 (1 Es 8:6t. Loddeus) the chief at Casiphia, who provided Ezra with Levites and Nethinim. 2. 1 Ch 27:2, son of Zachariah, captain of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, pers. = No. 4. 3. Ezr 10:1 (1 Es 8:2 Edos) one of those who had taken 'strange' wives 4. 1 K 4:4 father of Abinadab, who was Solomon's commissariat officer in Mahanaim in Gilead (see No. 2). 5. 1 Ch 6:2 a Gershonite Levite called Adaisah in v. 6. and the prophet as an authority for the reigns of Solomon (2 Ch 9:3), Rehoboam (2 Ch 12:8), Abijah (2 Ch 13:2). 7. Zec 11:7, Ezr 5:64 (1 Es 6: Ado) grandfather of father acc. to Ezra) of the prophet Zachariah; possibly of the same family as No. 2. 8. Neh 12:34 one of the priestly clans that established with Jeruzabel.

IDOLATRY.—Hebrew religion is represented as beginning with Abraham, who forsook the idolatry, as well as the heathen, of his race; with the departure (of 19. Jeroboam, 1 K 13:31) but it was specially through the influence of Moses that Jehovah was recognized as Israel's God. The whole subsequent history up to the Exile is marked by frequent lapses into idolatry. We should therefore consider (1) the causes of Hebrew idolatry, (2) its nature, (3) the opposition it evoked, and (4) the teaching of NT. The subject is not free from difficulty, but in the light of modern Biblical study, the main outlines are clear.

1. Causes of Hebrew idolatry.—(1) When, after the Exodus, the Israelites settled in Canaan among idolatrous peoples, they were far from having a pure monothistism (cf. Jr 11:18). Their faith was crude. (a) Thus the idea that their neighbours had real gods, with rights of proprietorship in the invaded land, would expose them to risk of contamination. This would be the more likely because as yet they were not a united people. The tribes had at first to act independently, and in some cases were unable to dislodge the Canaanites (Jg 1). (b) Their environment was thus perilous, and the danger was intensified by intercourse with idolaters. Particularly after the monarchy was established this did become a source of danger. Solomon and Ahab by their marriage alliances introduced and promoted idol cults. It is significant that post-exilic legislation had this danger in view, and secured that exclusiveness so characteristic of mature Judaism (Ezr 10:11). (c) The political relations with the great world-powers, Egypt, Assyria, would also tend to influence religious thought. This might account for the great heathen reaction under Manasseh, with rights of proprietorship in the invaded land, would expose them to risk of contamination. This would be the more likely because as yet they were not a united people. The tribes had at first to act independently, and in some cases were unable to dislodge the Canaanites (Jg 1). (b) Their environment was thus perilous, and the danger was intensified by intercourse with idolaters. Particularly after the monarchy was established this did become a source of danger. Solomon and Ahab by their marriage alliances introduced and promoted idol cults. It is significant that post-exilic legislation had this danger in view, and secured that exclusiveness so characteristic of mature Judaism (Ezr 10:11). (c) The political relations with the great world-powers, Egypt, Assyria, would also tend to influence religious thought. This might account for the great heathen reaction under Manasseh, (2) But, specially, certain ideas characteristic of Semitic religion generally had a strong influence. (a) Thus, on Israel's settling in Canaan, the existing shrines, with their attendant cult props, texts, and rituals, and to have its own tutelary god of lord) or artificial (altars, stone pillars, wooden poles), might be quite commonly used for the worship of J. (b) Idols, too, were used in domestic worship (Jg 17:5; cf. Gn 31:19, 1 S 18:19). (c) A darker feature, inimical to Jehovah, was the sanction of sexual impurity, cruelty and lust for blood (see below, § 2 (1)).

Here then was all the apparatus for either the inappropriate worship of the true God, or the appropriate worship of false gods. That was why, later on in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., when the earlier Jehovahism was changing into typical Judaism, all such practices were rejected, and were not tolerated, with increasing violence by prophets and reformers, as their conception of God became more clear and spiritual.

2. Its nature.—(1) Common to all Canaanite religions, apparently, was the worship of Baal as representing the male principle in nature. Each nation, however, had its own provincial Baal with a special name or title.—Chenosh of Moab, Molech of Ammon, Dagon of Philistia, Hadad-Rimmon in Edom. The name Jehovah is Baalism was the worship of Ashoreth (Astarte), representing the female principle in nature. Two features of these religions were prostitution of both sexes (cf. Ez 23:46, Dt 23:17, 1 K 14:24), human sacrifice (cf. 2 K 17:17, Jer 7, and art. Torture). Baalism was the chief Israelite idolatry, and sometimes, (e.g. under Jezabel, it quite displaced Jehovahism as the established religion.

The underlying principle of all such religion was nature-worship. This helps to explain the calf-worship, represented as first introduced by Aaron, and in a later period established by Jeroboam (1 K 12:28).—which also exercised a sinister influence on the Hebrews—religion was largely of this type; but living animals, and not merely images of them, were there interpreted. Connected with this idolatry is totemism, which was closely traced even to-day. Some find a survival of early Semitic totemism in Ezek 46.

(2) Another form of Hebrew nature-worship, associated with Baalism, was apparently of foreign extraction, and not earlier than the seventh cent. B.C. There was a striking allusion to this idolatry in Job 31:23-24. There were sun-images (2 Ch 34), horses and chariots dedicated to the sun (2 K 23:14); an eastern position was adopted in sun-worship (Ezk 8:13). The worship of the 'queen of heaven' in Jer 7:15; 44:19 is obscure; but it probably points to this class of idolatry. In the heathen reaction under Manasseh the worship of the 'host of heaven', is prominent (2 K 17:17). Among the Persians (Is 65:9) were possibly star-gods. Related to such nature-worship perhaps was the mourning for Tammuz [Amonites] (Ezk 4:14, Is 17:19 R.Vm). Nature-worship of all kinds is implied by implication throughout the period. Dignity in Q 1, where the word Gop as Creator is written 'in big letters over the face of creation.' Stars and animals and all things, it is insisted, are created things, not creators, and not self-existent. In Egypt (3) There are no clear traces of ancestor-worship in OT, but some find them in the teraphim (household gods) and in the reverence for tombs (e.g. Machpelah); in Is 66:1 the context suggests idolatry.

(4) A curious mixture of idolatry and Jehovahism existed in Samaria after the destruction of the Northern Kingdom. The foreign colonists brought with them the worship of various deities, and added that of J (2 K 17:4). These gods cannot be identified with certainty. By this mixed race and religion the Jews of the Return were seriously hindered, and there resulted the Samaritan schism which, in an attenuated form, still exists.

3. Opposition to idolatry.—While fully allowing for the facts alluded to in § 1, it is impossible to account— not for mere temporary lapses, but—for the marked persistence of Idolatry among the Hebrews, unless we recognize the growth which characterizes their laws and polity from the simple beginning up to the finished product. Laws do but express the highest sense of the community—how deeply that sense may be quickened by Divine revelation—whether those laws are viewed 375 from the ethical or from the utilitarian standpoint. If the legislation embodied in the Pentateuch had all along been an acknowledged, even though a neglected, code, such a complete neglect of it during long periods, taken with the total silence about its distinctive features in the sayings and writings of the most enlightened and devoted men, would present phenomena quite incredible. It is needful, therefore, to observe that the true development from original Mosaicism, though perhaps never quite neglected by the leaders of the nation, does not appear distinctly in any legislation until the closing decades of the 7th cent. B.C. This development continued through and beyond the Exile. Until the Deuteronomic epoch began, the enactments of Mosaicism in regard to idolatry were clearly of the slumbering housekeeper type. It is good practice for the student of Biblical theology to remember that the Second of the Ten Commandments is not in its earliest form; and it is probable that Ex 34:10-12 (from the document J, i.e. c. n.c. 850) contains an earlier suggestive germ of a code, otherwise human, which Hezekiah removed as idolatrous (2 K 18:4). Elijah, the stern foe of Baalism, does not denounce the calf-worship and the serpent worship by Hezekiah. Even Isaiah can acknowledge the erection in Egypt of a pillar (Is 19:1-2) like those which Josiah in the next century destroyed (2 K 23:13). As with reforming prophets, so with reforming kings. Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah, who went astray, is only said to tolerate 'high places' (1 K 23:30; cf. Jehoshaphat's attitude, 1 K 22:29). It was the work of the 8th cent. prophets that prepared the way for the remarkable reform under Josiah (2 K 22:23). Josiah's reign was epoch-making in everything connected with Hebrew religion and thought and practice. To this period must be assigned that Deuteronomic legislation which completed the earlier attempts at reformation. This legislation aimed at the complete destruction of every vestige of idolatry. A code, otherwise human, is on this point extremely severe: idolatry was punishable by death (Dt 17:7; cf. 24:13-16). Such a view of idolatry exhibits in its correct perspective the teaching of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the elder prophets. The Exile marks practically the end of Hebrew idolatry. The lesson has been learned by heart.

A striking proof of the great change is given by the Maccabean war, caused by the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to force idolatry on the very nation which in an earlier period had been too prone to accept it. Relations with Rome in the 1st and 2nd centuries A.D. illustrate the same temper. Had not Caligula's death so soon followed his insane proposal to erect his statue in the Temple, the Jews would assuredly have offered the most determined resistance; a century later they did actively resist Rome when Hadrian desecrated the site of the ruined Temple.

4. Teaching of the NT.—As idolatry was thus non-existent in Judaism in the time of Christ, it is not surprising that He does not allude to it. St. Paul, however, came into direct conflict with it. The word itself (idololatria) occurs first in his writings; we have his illuminating teaching on the subject in Ro 11:33-34, Ac 17:22, 1 Co 8 etc. But idolatry in Christian doctrine has a wider significance than the service of material idols. Anything that interferes between the soul and its God is idolatrous, and is to be shunned (cf. Eph 5:5, Ph 3:19, 1 Jn 5:4; and the context of Gal 5th etc.). See also art. IMAGES.

IDUEL (1 Es 8:4) — Ezr 8:4 Artel. The form is due to confusion of Heb. d and r.

IDUMEA.—The Greek equivalent (in RV only in Mk 3) of the name Edom, originally the territory east of the Jordan-Abah valley and south of the land of Moab. This country was inhabited, when we first hear of it, a glimpse of it, by a primitive race known as Horiotes, of whom little but the name is known. The apparent meaning of the name (‘cave-dwellers’) and comparison with the remains of what seems to have been an analogous race discovered in the excavations at Gezer, show that this race was at a low stage of civilization. They were partly destroyed, partly absorbed, by the Bedouin tribes who claimed descent through Beor from Abraham, and who were acknowledged by the Israelites as late as the date of the Deuteronomic codes as brethren (Dt 23:8). They were governed by sheiks (EV ‘dukes,’ a lit. tr. of the Lat. dux), and by a non-hereditary monarchy whose records belong anterior to a period of time of Saul (Gn 36:1-38, 1 Ch 1:44). See Edom.

After the fall of Babylon the pressure of the desert Arabs forced the Edomites across the Jordan-Abah valley, and the people were extended and remade. In 1 Mac 4:6 we find Hebron included in Idumaea. Josephus, with whom Jerome agrees, makes Idumaea extend from Beth Jibrin to Petra; Jerome assigns the great caves at the former place to the tragodyte Hosea. The Herod family was by origin Idumean in this extended sense. In the 2nd cent. A.D. the geographer Ptolemy restricts Idumaea to the epta-Jordanian area, and includes the original trans-Jordanic Edom in Arabia.

IDDIAS (1 Es 9:8).—One of those who agreed to put away their ‘strange’ wives, called Izshah in Ezr 10:8.

IEZER, IBZHERITES (Nu 26:20).—Contracted from Abiazer, Abibzerites. See Abiazer.

1:1. I. The spy representing the tribe of Issachar (Nu 13:8). 2. One of David’s heroes, the son of Nathan of Zobah (2 S 23:38). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11:19) the name is given as ‘Joel, the brother of Nathan.’ 3. Son of Shemaijah of the royal house of David (1 Ch 36:22).

IGDAH.—A ‘man of God,’ father of Hanan, whose name is mentioned in connection with Jeremiah’s interview with the Rechabites (Jer 35:1).

IGNORANCE.—It appears to be in accordance with natural justice that ignorance should be regarded as modifying moral responsibility, and this is fully recognized in the Scriptures. In the OT, indeed, the knowledge of God is often spoken of as equivalent to true religion (see KNOWLEDGE), and therefore ignorance is regarded as its opposite (1 S 2:5, Hos 4:6). But the Levitical law recognizes sins of ignorance as needing some expiation, but with a minor degree of guilt (Lev 4, Nu 15:29). So ‘ignorance’ are spoken of in 1 Es 8:7 (RV ‘errors’). To 3:6, 39:23, as partly involuntary (cf. He 6:9). The whole of the OT, however, is the history of a process of gradual moral and spiritual enlightenment, so that actions which are regarded as pardonable, or even praiseworthy, at one period, become inexcusable in a more advanced stage of knowledge. In the NT the difference between the ‘times of ignorance’ and the light of Christianity is recognized in Ac 17:23 (cf. 1 T1 1:1, 1 P 19), and ignorance is spoken of as modifying responsibility in Ac 3:7, 1 Co 2:8, Lk 23:4. The last passage, especially, suggests that sin is pardonable because it contains an element of ignorance, while Mk 3:28 appears to contemplate the possibility of an absolutely wilful choice of evil with full knowledge of its consequences (cf. 1 Jn 5:18). Immoral and guilty ignorance is also spoken of in Ro 1:18, Eph 4:18. For the question whether Christ in IM.—A city of Judah (Jos 15:29); site unknown. See JYIM, 2.

ION.—A town in the north part of the mountains of Naftali in 1 K 19:11 (2 Ch 16:1) as taken by Benhadad. It was also captured and depopulated by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15:29). The name survives in Mehr Ay'un, a plateau N. W. of Dan. The most important site in this plateau is Tell Dhibban, which may be the site of Ijon.

IKKESHE.—The father of Ira, one of David's heroes (2 S 3:36, 1 Ch 11:27).

ILAI.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:19). In the parallel list (2 S 23:36) the name appears as Salmon, which is probably the more correct text.

ILIADUN (1 Ex 14:4).—Perhaps to be identified with Henadad of Ezek 3:19.

ILLYRICUM.—The only Scripture mention is Ro 15:19, where St. Paul points to the fact that he had fully reached the good news of the Messiah from Jerusalem and from Illyricum. Neither geographical term is included in the sense of the Greek, which is that he had done so from the outer edge of Jerusalem, so to speak, round about (through various countries) as far as the border of Illyricum. These provinces in order are Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Asia, and Macedonia, and a journey through them in succession describes a segment of a rough circle. The provinces Macedonia and Illyricum are contumacious, and the nearest city in Macedonia in which we know St. Paul to have preached is Berœa (Ac 17:12). Illyricum is a Latin word, and denotes the Roman province which extended along the Adriatic from Italy and Pannonia on the north to the province Macedonia on the south. A province Illyria had been formed in b.c. 167, and during the succeeding two centuries all accessions of territory in that quarter were incorporated in that province. In a.n. 10 Augustus separated Pannonia from Illyricum, and gave the latter a settled constitution. The government of this important province was difficult, and was entrusted to an ex-consul with the style legatus Augusti pro praetore. The northern half was called Liburnia and the southern Dalmatia (v. see). The latter term gradually came to indicate the whole province of Illyricum. A. Bouter.

IMAGE.—In theological usage the term 'image' occurs in two usages: (1) as defining the nature of the material creature in his own image; Gn 1:27; (2) as describing the relation of Christ as Son to the Father ('who is the image of the invisible God,' Col 1:15). These senses, again, are not without connection; for, as man is re-created in the image of God—lost, or at least defaced, through sin (Col 3:10; cf. Eph 4:28)—so, as renewed, he bears the image of Christ (2 Co 3:18). These Scriptural senses of the term 'image' claim further elucidation.

1. As regards man, the fundamental text is that already quoted, Gn 1:27. Here, in the story of Creation, man is represented as called into being, not, like the other creatures, by a simple act, but as the result of a solemn and deliberate act of counsel of the Creator: 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. ... And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.' Distinctions, referred to below, have been sought, since Patristic times, between 'image' and 'likeness,' but it is now generally conceded that no difference of meaning is intended. The two words 'image' (tekton) and 'likeness' (demos) combine, without distinctition of sense, to emphasize the idea of resemblance to God. This is shown by the fact that in v. 27 the word 'image' alone is employed to express the total idea, and in 3:5 the word 'likeness.' Man was made like God, and so bears His image. The expression recurs in Gn 9:1, and again repeated in the NT (1 Co 11:17, Col 3:10; cf. Jas 3:2 'likeness'). The usage in Genesis is indeed peculiar to the so-called 'Priestly' writer; but the idea underlies the view of man in the Jethovistic sections as well, for only as made in God's image is man capable of knowledge of God, fellowship with Him, covenant relation to Him, and character conformable to God's own. To 'be as God' was the serpent's alluring temptation (Gen 3:5). Ps 8 echoes the story of man's creation in Gn 1:26.

In what did this Divine Image, or likeness to God, consist? Not in bodily form, for God is Spirit; nor yet simply, as the Socinians would have it, in dominion over the creatures; but in those features of rational and moral constitution in which the peculiar dignity of man, as distinguished from the animal world below him, is recognized. Man, as a spiritual nature, is self-conscious, personal, rational, free, capable of rising to the apprehension of general truths and laws, of setting ends of conduct before him, of apprehending right and wrong, good and evil, of framing ideas of God, infinity, eternity, immortality, and of shaping his life in the light of such conceptions. In this he is himself akin to God; is able to know, love, serve, and obey God. The germ of sonship lies in the idea of the image. To this must be added, in the light of such passages as Eph 3:16 and Col 1:16, the idea of an ideal conformity of actual knowledge, righteousness, and holiness—as pertaining to the perfection of the image. This has not destroyed the essential elements of God's image in man, but it has added the fruit of a moral respect; and grace, as the above passages teach, renews it in Christ.

If this explanation in correct, the older attempts at a distinction between 'image' and 'likeness,' e.g. that 'image' referred to the body, 'likeness' to the intellectual nature; or 'image' to the intellectual, 'likeness' to the moral, faculties; or, as in Roman Catholic theology, 'image' to the natural attributes of intelligence and freedom, 'likeness' to a superadded endowment of supernatural righteousness—must, as already hinted, be pronounced untenable.

2. The idea of Christ, the Son, as 'the image (ēkthn) of the invisible God' (Col 1:15; cf. 2 Co 4:4) connects itself with the doctrine of the Trinity, and finds expression in various forms in the NT, notably in He 1:1—'who being the effulgence of his glory and the very image of his substance.' Jesus Himself could declare that he who had seen Him had seen the Father (Jn 14:9). But the passages quoted refer to a supra-temporal and essential relation between the Son and the Father. God, in His eternal being, reflects Himself, and beholds His own infinite perfection and glory mirrored in the Son (cf. Jn 1:17). It is this eternal Word, or perfect self-revelation of God, that has become incarnate in Jesus Christ (Jn 1:14). The consequence is obvious. Bearing Christ's image, we bear God's. Being renewed in God's image, we are conformed to the image of His Son (Ro 8:29).

IMAGES.—1. The making of an image implies a definite conception and the application of art to religion. The earliest Semitic religion (like that of Greece, Rome, etc.) was accordingly imageless. The first images were the stone pillar and the wooden pole or asherah (a tree fetish possibly of phallic significance). Then came real idols, at first for domestic use (as probably the teraphim, portable household gods), and subsequently those of greater size for public worship.

2. About 15 words in OT are used specifically for images. The earliest point to the process of manufacture—graven, malevolent, impious, etc. as well, for any word properly meaning image, i.e. 'likeness,' is not earlier than the end of 7th cent. B.C. From that time onwards metaphor is frequent: images are 'vain,' 'lies,' and objects inspiring disgust or horror [cf. the name
IMMANUEL

Bedezebul, some interpret as 'lord of dung'. Sometimes such terms would replace those used without offence in earlier days; thus, in a proper name composed with 'bed' (lord), the objectionable word would be replaced by bosheth ('shame'), in obedience to Ex 23:10 etc.

3. Images represented animals (e.g. the golden calves and the igimensions, and human forms (cf. Ezek 16:15, Is 44:14. Is 11:5-9. Wis 14:3 ws. 30). The ephod appears to have been some sort of image, but was perhaps originally the robe worn by the image.

4. The materials used in idol manufacture were clay (Wis 15:5, Bel 1), wood (Is 44:14, Wis 13:10), silver and gold (Hos 8:4, Dn 3:9). They might be painted (Wis 13:15), dressed up (Jer 10:19, Ezek 16:16), crowned and armed (Bar 6:4-10). They were kept in shrines (Jer 17:5, Wis 13:9, etc.), and secured from tumbling down (Is 41:10, Jer 10:1).

The Historical—In the AV imagine always means 'conceive' and imagination 'imagination'. In the context imagine can be a bad image is always present (except Is 26:2 AVm), as in Ro 1:27 'they . . . became vain in their imaginations' (RV 'reasonings'); 2 Co 10:18 'casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself' (RVm 'reject images'). The words have in these passages the same evil intent as the AV word, so that the RV renderings are not so good. Coverdale translates Is 5:5 'Let the ungodly man forsake his ways, and the righteous his imaginations, and turne agayne unto the Lord.'

Coverdale translates Is 5:5 'Let the ungodly man forsake his ways, and the righteous his imaginations, and turne agayne unto the Lord.'

2. Historical situation.—In n.c. 735 the kings of Syria and Egypt formed an alliance against Judah, and their object of setting Tabebul, a nominee of their own, on the throne of David, and forcing the Southern Kingdom to join in a confederacy against Assyria. Ahas had only lately come to the throne, in a paper name composed with 'bed' (lord), and denominated (2 K 16:2). The purpose of Isaiah was to calm the terror of the people (Is 7), and to restore faith in Jehovah (v.9). But the policy of Ahas was to take the fatal step of invoking the aid of Assyria itself.

Hence, when the prophet offered him a sign from God, he refused to accept it, for fear of committing himself to the prophet's policy of faith and independence. He cloaked his refusal in words of apparent piety. A sign is, however, given—the birth of a child, who shall eat butter and honey (i.e. poor pastoral fare; cf. v.2) till (7) he comes to years of discretion. Before that time, i.e. before he is four or five years old, Syria and Ephraim shall be ruined (v.8). But Ahas and his own kingdom shall become the prey of Assyria (v.7); the chapter consists of pictures of desolation.

The interpretation of the sign is by no means clear. Who is the child and what does his name imply? Is the sign a promise or a threat? It should be noted, as probably an essential element in the problem, that it is the house or dynasty of David which is being attacked, and which is referred to throughout the chapter (vv.5-13).

1. Who is the child? (see Driver, Isaiah, p. 40 ff.).
(a) The traditional interpretation sees in the passage a direct prophecy of the Virgin-birth of Christ, and nothing else. In what sense, then, was it a sign to Ahas? The view runs counter to the modern concept of prophecy, which rightly demands that its primary interpretation shall be brought into relation to the ideas and circumstances of its age. The rest of the chapter does not refer to Christ, but to the troubles of the reign of Ahas; is it legitimate to tear half a dozen words from their context, and apply them arbitrarily to an event happening generations after? (b) It is suggested that the maiden is the wife of Ahas and that the son is Hezekiah, the king who from Isaiah rightly had such high hopes; and that she is the 'prophetess,' the wife of Isaiah himself. In both cases we ask why the language is so needlessly ambiguous. The chronological difficulty would seem to be fatal to (b). Hezekiah being almost certainly several years old in 735; and (c) makes the sign merely a duplication of that given in 8. It becomes a mere note of time (before the child grows up, certain things will have happened'); it is a simple, solemn way in which the birth is announced, the choice of the name, and its repetition in 8 would (if the usual reading be retained). It also separates this passage from 9-11, which almost certainly stand in connexion with it. Similar objections may be urged against the view (d), which sees in the maiden any Jewish mother of marriageable age, who in spite of all appearances to the contrary may call her child, then about to be born, by a name indicating the Divine favour, in token of the coming deliverance. The point of the sign is then the mother's faith and the period of time within which the deliverance shall be accomplished. (a) A more allegorical version of this interpretation explains the maiden as Zion personified, and her 'son' as the coming generation. But the invariable word for Zion and countries in such personifications is Betulah, not 'calm' (see art. Virgin). (c) There remains the view which sees in the passage a reference to a Messiah in the wider use of the term, as understood by Isaiah and his contemporaries. There probably already existed in Judah the expectation of an ideal king and deliverer, connected with the house of David (2 S 7:12-16). Now at the moment when that house is attacked and its representative proves himself unworthy, Isaiah announces in oracular language the immediate coming of that king. The reference in 8, and the passages in chs. 9, 11, will then fall into their place side by side with this. They show that the prophet's thoughts were at this period dwelling much on the fate and the work of the 'wondrous one,' who will, in fact, be a son of the house of David (9:11). Strong support is given to this view by Mic 5 ('until the time when she that bereareth hath brought forth'); however, the passage is not a reference to Is 7, and is of great importance as an indication of the ideas current at the time. With regard to the beliefs of the time, evidence has been lately brought forward (esp. by Jeremias and Gressmann) showing that outside Israel (particularly in Egypt and Babylonia) there existed traditions and expectations of a semi-divine saviour-king, to be born of a divine, perhaps a virgin, mother, and to be wonderfully reared. That is to say, there was already an existing tradition, the Virgin, mother, and to be wonderfully reared. It is true, however, that in the Greek New Testament, the Virgin Mary is mentioned, and in this context, the idea of a divine child being born of a woman is presented. This tradition included, we cannot say; e.g., did it include the name ‘Immanuel’? The ‘butter and honey’ seems to be a pre-existing feature, representing the idea of a divine nourishment on which the child is reared; so, according to the Greek legend, the infant Jesus is fed on milk and honey in the cave on Idâ. But in the prophecy, as it stands, it seems to be used of the hard land, to which the Jews were reduced by the captivity. We must indeed distinguish throughout between the conceptions of the primitive myth, and the sense in which the prophet applies these conceptions. The value of the expression that he was working on the lines of popular beliefs ready to his hand, is that it explains how his hearers would be prepared to understand his oracular language, and suggests that much that is obscure to us may have been clear to them. It confirms the view that the prophecy was intended to be Messianic, i.e., to predict the birth of a mysterious saviour.

Was the sign favourable or not? The text, as it stands, leaves it very obscure whether Isaiah gave Ahas a sign of a favourable kind, or of an ominous kind. The fact that the king had hardened his heart may have turned the sign which should have been of good omen into something different. The name of the child and the word of deliverance, ‘Immanuel’, and the rest of the chapter, of judgment, are not necessarily connected. It is perfectly true that Isaiah’s view of the future was that Ephraim and Syria should be destroyed, that Judah should also suffer from Assyrian invasion, but that salvation should come through the faithful remnant. The difficulty is to extract this sense from the passage.

The simplest method is to follow the critics who omit v. 16, or at least the words ‘whose two kings thou shalt overthrow’; but to add ‘and shall reign in Judah; if not, as it is usually understood, to Syria and Ephraim, the singular is very strange. The prophecy is then a simple announcement of judgment. Immanuel shall be borne, but owing to the unbelief of Ahaz, his future is mortgaged and he is born only to a ruined kingdom (cf. 80); it is not stated in this passage whether the hope implied in his name will ever be realized. Others would omit v. 17, and even v. 14, making the sign a promise of the fall of the coalition. Whatever view be adopted, the inconsistencies of the text make it at least possible that it has suffered from interpolation, and that the words have not got the prophecy in its correct form.

The real problem is not to account for the name ‘Immanuel’, or for the promise of a saviour-king, but to understand what part he plays in the rest of the chapter. Connected with this is the further difficulty of explaining why the figure of the Messianic king disappears almost entirely from Isaiah’s later prophecies.

5. Its application to the Virgin-birth.—The full discussion of the quotation in Mt. 1:23 is part of the larger subjects of Messianic prophecy, the Virgin-birth, and the Incarnation. The following points may be noticed here. (a) Though the LXX (which has parthenos ‘virgin’) and the Alexandrian Jews apparently interpreted the passage in a Messianic sense and as a virgin-birth, there is no evidence to show that this interpretation was sufficiently prominent and definite to explain the rise of the belief in the messianic conception. The text was applied to illustrate the fact or the belief in the fact; the text was not intended to meet the requirements of the text. The formula used in the quotation suggests that it belongs to a series of OT passages drawn up in the primitive church to illustrate the life of Christ (see Allen, St. Matthew, p. 11x.). (b) The text would not now be used as a proof of the Incarnation. ‘Immanuel’ does not in itself imply that the child was regarded as God, but only that he was to be the pledge of the Divine presence, and endowed in a special sense with the spirit of Jehovah (cf. Is 11:1). The Incarnation ‘fulfils’ such a prophecy, because Christ is the true realization of the vague and half-understanding longings of the world, both heathen and Jewish.

INCARNATION

particular points as the plural form of Elohim (God), or the triple repetition of the Divine name (Is 66, Nu 69), it may at least be said that the idea of God in Jewish thought is not a bare unit, and 'can only be apprehended as that which involves diversity as well as unity.'
Moreover, the doctrine of the Divine Wisdom as set forth in the Books of Proverbs and Wisdom (Pr 8,2 Wis 10,15,1) personifies the idea of God to a point of ascribing to it separate existence. The doctrine was carried further by Philo, with assistance from Greek thought, and prepared the way for St. John's conception of the Logos, the Word of God. (b) The Mesianic hope. This was at its root an anticipation of the union of Divine and human attributes in a single personality (see Messiah). It developed along several distinct lines of thought and expectation, and it will be noted that these are not combined in the OT; but Christianity claims to supply the explanation and fulfilment of them all.

2. The fact of the Incarnation in the NT. — (a) The Incarnation of Christ. It is beyond dispute that Christ is represented in the NT as a man. He was born, indeed, under miraculous conditions, but of a human mother. He grew up with gradually developing powers (1 a very remarkable people among whose ages do not appear to have recognized anything extraordinary in Him (Mt 13;). During the period of His life about which detailed information has been recorded, we have no physical or moral character, which He suffered weariness (Mk 4, Jn 4), hunger (Mt 2), thirst (Jn 103); he died and was buried. He felt even strong emotions: wonder (Mk 6, Lk 7), compassion (Mt 9, Lk 8), joy (Lk 10), anger (Mk 11, Mt 13, Mt 14).
He acquired information in the ordinary way (Mk 69, Jn 119,)
He was tempted (Mt 41, Lk 229). And it may be further asserted with the utmost confidence, that neither in the Gospels nor in any other part of the NT is there the smallest support for a Docetic explanation of these facts (that is, for the theory that He only seemed to undergo the experiences narrated). (b) The Divinity of Christ.
Side by side with this picture of perfect humanity there is an ever-present belief through all the NT writings that Christ was more than a man. From the evidential point of view the most important and unquestionable testimony to the early belief of Christ's disciples is contained in St. Paul's Epistles, especially those to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians, which are among the earliest books of the NT, and of the most undisputed genuineness. The Epistles alone are sufficient to show that the NT is co-ordinated with God in the necessarily Divine functions, in a manner impossible to the mind of a Jewish monotheist like St. Paul, unless the co-ordinated person is recognised to belong to the co-ordinating Divine Being.
In the Gospels we have an account of how this belief arose. The Synoptic Gospels supply a simple narrative of fact in which we can mark the growing belief of the disciples; and the Fourth Gospel distinctly marks stages of faith on the part of Christ's adherents, and of hatred on the part of His enemies. The following points may be specially noted in the Gospels:
(1) Extraordinary characteristics are constantly ascribed to Christ, not in themselves necessarily Divine, but certainly such as to distinguish Christ in a marked degree from other men. There is a personal influence of miraculous kind. This is natural, it is not described or dwelt upon, but every page of the Gospels testifies to its existence.
The earliest record of Christ's life is pre-eminently miraculous.
In spite of economy and restraint of power, mighty works are represented as having been the natural, involuntary, accompaniments of His ministrations.
Two special miracles, the Resurrection and the Virgin-birth, are noticed separately below. He spoke with authority (Mk 21). He claimed to fulfill the Law—law recognized as Divine—to be Lord of the Sabbath, and to give a new law to His disciples. In all His teaching there is an implicit claim to infallibility.
In spite of His being subject to temptation, the possibility of moral failure is never entertained. There is nothing that marks Christ off from other men more than this.
In all other good men the sense of sin becomes more acute with increasing holiness. In Christ it did not exist.
The title of 'Son of God' which He habitually used may have more meanings than one. But comparing the different conceptions in which it is used, we can hardly escape the conclusion that Christ identifies Himself with the consummation and perfection of humanity.
(2) He claimed to be the Messiah, summing up and uniting the different lines of expectation alluded to above. As has been pointed out, the Messianic hope included features both human and Divine; and although this was not recognized beforehand, it appears to us, looking back, that these expectations could not have been adequately satisfied except by the Incarnation.
(3) Of some of the points mentioned above it might be a sufficient explanation to say, that Christ was a man endowed with exceptional powers and graces by God, and approved by mighty wonders and signs.
But, even in the Synoptic Gospels, which are for the most part pure narrative, there is more than this. In the claim to forgive sins (Mt 16, 9), to judge the world (Mk 16, 9), to reveal the will of the Father (Mt 11,9), the claim of the Messiah (Mt 28, 19), the claim of the Church (Mk 16, 20), and the mystical title 'Son of Man' (Lk 24, 45, and above), all, perhaps, in the claim of personal adhesion which He ever made on His disciples, He assumes a relationship to God which would not be possible to one who was not conscious of being more than man.
(4) In the discourses in the Fourth Gospel, Christ plainly asserts His own pre-existence and His own essential relation to the Father. If these discourses represent even the substance of a side of Christ's teaching (a point which must be assumed and not argued here), He explicitly bore witness to His eternal relation to the Father.
(5) What crowned the faith of the disciples was the fact of the Resurrection. Their absolute belief in the reality of this fact swept away all doubts and misgivings.
At first, no doubt, they were so much absorbed in the fact itself that they did not at one reason out all that it meant to their beliefs; and in teaching they had to adapt their message to the capacities of their hearers; but there can be no question about the place which the Resurrection occupies in the Christian faith. In the human experience, in the growth of the human soul, and in the development of human society, the Christian faith has been based on the teaching of the Resurrection of the Lord of the Sabbath, and He is Lord of the Sabbath, ultimately to reveal God, and St. Paul appeals to the processes of nature as being an indication not only of the creative power, but also of the benevolence of God (Ac 14:1, cf. Ro 1:18). The OT is the history of God's redemption, which he is always looking forward to more perfect illumination, and the whole history of man is, according to the NT, the history of gradual enlightenment culminating in the Incarnation (He 1, 2, 18:1-10).

(c) Restoration of man.—It has been a common subject of speculation in the Church whether the Incarnation would have taken place if man had not sinned, and not only can be recognized, but to such a question no decisive answer can be given. As a fact the Incarnation was conditioned by the existence of man's sin, and the restoration of man is constantly put forward as its purpose. Three special aspects of this work of restoration may be noticed. (1) Christ offers an example of perfect and sinless humanity: He is the unique example of what God intended him to be. The ideal of the human race becomes actual in Him. His life was one of perfect obedience to the will of God (Mt 17:4, Lk 3:22, Jn 8:38). (2) He removed the barriers which sin had placed between man and His Creator. This work is invariably associated in the NT with the doctrine of the Incarnation that sin was the one thief who had slain man and that the doctrine of redemption, as an offering, a sacrifice, of Himself (He 9:9), which takes away the sin of the world (Jn 18:11). Many metaphors are used in the NT to describe the effect of His coming. Christ is described as the true sacrifice, and the OT does not convey the idea of a deliverance at a great cost from slavery; propitiation, or an act or process by which sin is neutralized; salvation, or bringing into a condition of health or safety; reconciliation with God, and remission of sin (see Atonement). (3) These two parts of Christ's work for man were accomplished by His earthly life, death, and resurrection. But they did not cease to be spiritual. Christ's work for man is not complete. (4) The NT doctrine to that of the Councils. - It has been seen above that the disciples knew the Lord first as a man, and that they advanced by degrees to a belief in His Divinity. Men educated in Jewish habits of thought would not readily apprehend in all its bearings the Christian idea of a Person who could be both God and man. It is therefore not surprising that there should be in the NT a diversity of treatment with regard to the question of the Person of Christ, and that it should be possible to recognize what may be called different levels of Christological belief. Before our Lord's death the disciples had recognized Him as the Messiah, though with still very inadequate ideas as to the nature of the Messianic kingdom which He was to set up. The resurrection and the ascension transformed this faith, and it naturally became the central point of their early teaching. The conception of Christ prominent in the earliest Apostolic age, and emphasized in the first part of the Epistles and in the Acts, in John, and in Paul, regards Him primarily as the Messiah, the glory of whose Person and mission has been proved by the Resurrection, who has been exalted to God's right hand, and who will sit on the throne. St. Paul in his earlier Epistles regards Christ's Person more from the point of view of personal relation, as One who has bridged over the gulf which sin has caused between God and man, and in whom man's desire for reconciliation with God finds satisfaction. St. Paul's later Epistles, as well as the Ep. to the Hebrews and St. John's Gospel, deal with the cosmological and mystical aspects of the Incarnation and contain the most definite statements of the Divinity of Christ.

It has been further maintained that the definitions of the doctrine made by the great Councils and embodied in the Creeds show an advance upon the doctrine contained in the NT. This was not so. Those who drew up the definitions, for they invariably appealed to the NT writings as conclusive, and believed themselves to be only formulating beliefs which had always been held by the Church. The language of the definitions was used only to some extent now, but it has never been shown that the substance of the doctrine expressed by them in any respect goes beyond what has been represented above as the teaching of the NT. If the NT writers really believed, as has been maintained above, that Christ was a Person who was perfectly human and who was also Divine, there is nothing in the dogmatic creeds of the 4th and 5th centuries which asserts more than this. What these definitions do is to negative explanations which are incompatible with the fundamental teaching of the NT. It is not surprising that men found it difficult to grasp the perfect Divinity as well as the perfect humanity of Christ, and that attempts should have been made to explain away one side or the other of the doctrine of the Incarnation. The attempt which met with the widest success, and most threatened the Church, was that of Arius, who taught that the Son of God was a created being, a sort of demi-god. This teaching found ready support and sympathy among those who had not shaken off the paganism of pagan habits of thought in opposing it the Church was contending for a true Theism, which cannot endure the multiplication of objects of worship, no less than for Christianity in the abstract. The first use of the term 'incarnation' was in the definition finally accepted, the celebrated hagiorotation — of one substance with the Father—which was not used by any NT writer, but was used unequivocally, and only because other attempts to assert beyond the possibility of cavil the true Divinity of Christ had failed, to be only formulating beliefs which had always been held by the Church. The difficulty of believing the same Person to be both God and Man led to attempts to explain away the perfect humanity. Apollinaris taught that the Word of God took the place of the human mind or spirit in Christ, as a later period the Monophysite teaching in the East, which was an extreme form of the doctrine of Nestorius. In the West the Manichaean teaching of one divine nature and one human nature was assimilated to the teaching of the Gospels that Christ was a truly human Person and they were absolutely separated by the Church; in language which do not always make clear from theological thought, but without adding anything to the substance of the Apostolic doctrine. INCENSE. — (1) tebônâ, which should always be translated 'frankincense' (wh. smokes), as it was the meat-offering (Lv 2:1, 16, 18, 19 etc.), and offered with the shewbread (Lv 24:5). (2) qērēh (cfr. κεραυνόν), lit. 'smoke,' and so used in Is 11:10, Ps 66:14; used for a definite substance, Ex 10:1, Ezek 14:7, and partly derived from the Heb. root, Rev 5:8, 18:18. The holy incense (Ex 30:34) was made of stacte, onycha, galbanum, and frankincense, but the incense of later times, which was offered daily (Jth 9:9, Lk 1:24-35), was more complicated, according to Josephus, it had thirteen constituents (Bv v. x. 5). Incense was originally burned in censers, but these were latterly used only to carry oils from the great altar to the 'altar of incense.' E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

INDIA (Heb. Hādūd) is named as the E. boundary of the empire of Ashurbanipal (Est 1:8). The Heb. is contracted from Hindu, the name of the river Indus. It indicated the country through which that river flows, not the great peninsula of Hindostan. So also in 1 Mac 8:4, 13, 13:14, 1 Esd 3:1. Possibly the drivers of the elephants (1 Mac 6:7) were true Indians. If India

INDITE

The verb indite is an archaic English term, a derivative of the Latin inditare meaning to dictate. It was used in a religious context, usually referring to the divine inspiration of the Bible, seen as the act of dictating the words of the Bible. The verb is often used in a liturgical context, particularly in the context of the publication of the Bible. The word is also used in a literary context, referring to the act of writing or composing poetry or prose, especially in a religious or devotional context. The verb is often associated with the act of religious duty or obligation, often linked to the divine command or inspiration.

INDITING.—This Eng. verb is now somewhat old-fashioned. When it is used, it means to write. But formerly, and as found in AV, it meant to inspire or dictate to the writer. Thus St. Paul indited and Tertullian wrote (Rom 16). The word occurs in the Preface to the AV and in Ps 45: ‘My heart is inditing a good matter.’ In the Douai version (though this word is not used) there is a note: ‘I have received by divine inspiration in my heart and cognition a most high Mystere.’

INFIDEL.—This word has more force now than formerly. In AV it signifies no more than ‘unbeliever.’ It occurs in 2 Co 6, 1 Ti 5 (RV ‘unbeliever’ in both). So ‘infidelity’ in 2 Es 7 is simply ‘unbelief’ (Lat. incredulitat).”

I. National and Religious Inheritance.—1. Property.—While land was the most important part of an inheritance, the rules for succession show that it was regarded as belonging properly to the family or clan, and to the individual heir only as representing family or tribal rights. Cattle, household goods, and slaves would be more personal possessions, which a man could divide among his sons (Dt 21). Originally wives, too, as part of the property of the deceased, would fall to the possession of the heir-in-chief (cf. 2 S 16-20, 1 K 2).

2. Heirs.—(a) The firstborn son, as the new head of the family, responsible for providing for the rest, inherited the land and had also his claim to a double portion of other kinds of wealth (Dt 21). To be the son of a concubine or inferior wife was not a bar to heirship (Gr 21, 1 Ch 5); though a jealous wife might prevail on her husband to deprive such a son of the right of succession (Gr 21, 19). That a father had power to transfer the birthright from the firstborn to another is implied in the cases of Ishmael and Isaac (Gr 21, 17, 25); Esau and Jacob (27), Reuben and Joseph (1 Ch 5).

Joseph, Gr 49; Solomon, 1 Ch 22: 10), and can hardly be adduced as survivals of the ancient custom of ‘Junior Right.’ (b) At first a daughter could not succeed (the inheritance of the daughters of Job [21]) even under those conditions of arrangement—on a principle which has been referred either to the influence of ancestral-worship, in which a male heir was necessary as priest of the family cult, or to the connexion between inheritance and the duty of blood revenge. For unmated daughters, however, husbands would almost invariably be found. In the case of the daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 27: 1-3) we see the introduction of a change; but it is to be noted that this was a change in the direction by the provision (Nu 27: 4) that he-Shirtles should inherit only within their father’s tribe, so that the inheritance might not be alienated from it. (c) For the widow in immediate place was taken in the Law (Deut).

So far from being eligible as an heir, she was strictly a part of the property belonging to the inheritance. According to the levirate law, however, when a man died leaving no son, his brother or other near-of-kind (go’el) must marry the widow, and her husband, if by this marriage became the heir of her previous husband (Dt 25). (d) For the order of succession the rule is laid down in Nu 27: 1-11, that if a man die without male issue the right of inheritance shall fall successively to his daughter, his brothers, his father’s brothers, his next kinsman thereafter. The provision for the daughter was an innovation, as the context shows, but the rest of the rule is in harmony with the ancient laws of kinship.

ii. National and Religious Inheritance.—1. The possession of the land of Canaan was commonly regarded as the inheritance of the whole people. In this particular case the inheritance was won only as the result of conflict and effort; moreover, theoretically at any rate, it involved the annihilation of the previous inhabitants. Consequently the inheritance of Canaan was not entirely devoid of the idea of succession. But the extermination of the Canaanites was never effected; and although the conquest was achieved only by the most strenuous efforts, yet the Israelites were strongly impressed with a vivid sense of Jehovah’s intervention on their behalf, to that subsequent generations it seemed as if they had entered into the labours of others, not in any sense whatever by their own power, but solely and entirely as Jehovah’s message to them; and this sense signified the secure possession of the land, as the gift of God to His people. ‘The dominant Biblical sense of inheritance is the enjoyment by a rightfull i right; the which is not the fruit of personal exertion’ (Westcott, Heb. 168).

2. It is not surprising that the idea of inheritance soon acquired religious associations. The Hebrew mind invested all social and political institutions with a religious significance. As Israel became increasingly conscious of its mission, and began dimly to apprehend its mission, the world, the peaceful and secure possession of Canaan seemed an indispensable condition of that self-development which was itself the necessary prelude to a more universal mission. The threatening attitude of the great world powers in the eighth and subsequent centuries B.C. brought the question prominently to the front. ‘Over and over again it seemed as if Jerusalem must succumb to the hordes of barbarian invaders, and as if the last remnant of Canaan must be irretrievably lost; but the prophets persistently declared that the land should not be lost; they realized the impossibility of Israel’s ever realizing her true vocation, unless, at any rate for some centuries, she preserved her national independence; and the latter, would, of course, be wholly unthinkable without territorial security. The career of Israel, as a nation, the influence, even the existence, of its religion, would be endangered by the dispossession of Canaan; moreover, it was recognized that as long as the people remained true to Jehovah, He on His part would remain true to them, and would not suffer them to be dispossessed, but would make them dwell securely in their own land. In order that they might establish on their side the conditions of arrangement—so arranged as to be the manifestation of the national obligations, if Jehovah’s covenant with them was to be maintained.

3. The possession of the land, the inheritance of Canaan, symbolized the people’s living in covenant with their God, and all those spiritual blessings which flowed from such a covenant. And inasmuch as the validity of the covenant implied the continuance of Divine blessing, the inheritance of Canaan was actually a symbol of the outward and visible sign of God’s presence and power among His own. We know how the remorseless logic of history seemed to point to an opposite conclusion. The Exile spelled disinheritance; and disinheritance meant a great deal more than the loss of a little strip of territory; it meant the forfeiture of spiritual blessings as a consequence of national sin. The more ardent spirits of the nation refused, however, to believe that these high privileges were permanently abrogated; they longed only temporarily withdrawn; and they looked forward to a new covenant whose spiritual efficacy should be guaranteed by national restoration. In the reconstituted theocracy, the Messiah figured as the mediator both of temporal and spiritual blessings. The idea of a restored inheritance suggested at once the glorious anticipations of the Messianic age, when the people, not by works which they had done, but by Jesus, were rendered and called to be the spiritual children of God, to enjoy in their estate a new inheritance.

4. In this sense 'the inheritance' became almost equivalent to the Messiah's salvation; and participation in this salvation is not a future privilege, but a present possession. In the OT the secular inheritance of the Holy Land was the outward symbol of these spiritual blessings; under the New Dispensation they are secured by membership in the Christian body.

5. As every Jew regarded himself as an inheritor of the land of Canaan, so also is each Christian an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven. He is not the heir, in the sense of enjoying an honorary distinction, or of having privileges of a future age; but he is already in a position of assured privilege, conferred upon him with absolute validity. As Lightfoot remarks, 'Our Father never dies; the inheritance never passes away from Him; yet nevertheless we succeed to the full possession of it' (Galatians 3:16).

6. Three particular usages remain to be noticed. (a) The Jews never lost the conviction that Jehovah was the supreme overlord of the land, and of the people that dwelt in it. Accordingly Canaan is the Holy Land, and Jehovah's own inheritance; and Messiah when incarnate came to His own country, and His own city, and His own nation (Jn 2:15). (b) The Jews recognized that the possession of Canaan had value only in so far as it assured them of the free exercise of their religion, and all other spiritual blessings. This they strove to express by boldly declaring that Jehovah was Himself the inheritance of His people. (c) The Messiah, through whom the inheritance should be brought to a close, and the covenant should be renewed, was naturally regarded as the supreme 'inheritor' or 'head' of all the promises and privileges implied in the covenant. As, moreover, the Messiah's unique relation to the Father became more clearly defined, the idea of His inheritance, connecting His unique primogeniture and universal supremacy, became enlarged and expanded. It was, moreover, through the humanity which He restored that the Son proved and realized His headship of all things; and thus His actual position is the potential exaltation of redeemed mankind.

INQUITY. —See Sin.

INJUSTIOUS.—In the language of the AV 'injustious' is more than hurtful; it is also insulting. It 'adds insult to injury.' It occurs Sir 8:1, 1 Ti 1:10, and the Gr. word used in these places is in Ro 1:28 translated 'despotic' (RV 'insolent').

INK is mentioned once in OT (Jer 36:10). Ex 32:27 and Nu 25:3 are adduced as evidence that the old Hebrew ink (derived from lamp-black (?) could be washed off. From the bright colours that still survive in some papyri, it is evident that the ink used by the Egyptians must have been of a superior kind. The NT term for 'ink,' occurring three times (2 Co 6:14, 2 Jn 8, 3 Jn 14), is melan (Lk., 'black'). See, further, under Waxed.

INKHORN.—In one of Ezekiel's visions (Ezk 2:2, 4, 11) a man appears with a scribe's inkhorn by his side (lit. 'upon his loins'). The 'inkhorn' consisted of a case for the reed pens, with a cup or bulb for holding the ink, near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the girdle (hence the above expression).

INN.—See Hospitality.

INNER MAN.—The implied contrast involved in this expression may be regarded as exclusively Pauline. The antithesis between the adorning of the visible body, and 'the incorruptible (ornament) of a meek and quiet spirit,' 'the hidden man of the heart' (1 P 3:4), is an example of the Paulinism which pervades this episcopal letter (see Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 250). The contrast, so vividly portrayed in Ro 7:23, is essentially ethical in its character. It is between the law which passion blindly follows, and that to which 'the mind' or the informed conscience yields a delighted because a reasoned obedience (cf. Sunday-Headlam, Romans, in loc.). Different from this is the contrast in 2 Co 4:4, where 'our outward man,' decaying and dying, stands over against 'our inward man,' which is in a constant state of renewal. Here we have the antithesis of the 'temporal' and the 'eternal' elements in man's complex personality (v. 14). This phrase is found in an absolute sense in Eph 3:17, where it denotes the entire basis of man's higher life, on which God's Spirit works, and in which Christ dwells. The intellectual and moral apprehension of the fruits of the incarnation depend, first and foremost, upon whether the 'inward man' has its roots stuck deep in that Divine love which is the first cause of man's redemption (v. 16, cf. Jn 3:34).

J. H. WHITNEY.

INSPIRATION.—The subject comprises the doctrine of inspiration in the Bible, and the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible, together with what forms the transition from the one to the other, the account given of the prophetic consciousness, and the teaching of the NT about the OT.

1. The agent of inspiration in the Holy Spirit (see p. 360) or Spirit of God, who is active in Creation (Gen 1, Ps 104), is imparted to man that the dust may become living soul (Gen 2), is the source of exceptional powers of body (Jg 6:14, 15) or skill (Ex 35:31); but is pre-eminently manifest in prophecy (wh. see). The NT doctrine of the power and presence of the Spirit of God in the renewed life of the believer is anticipated in the OT, inasmuch as to the Spirit's operations are attributed wisdom (1 S 38:11, 13), strength (1 S 31:4), courage (Jg 13:14), penitence, moral strength, and purity (Neh 9:15, Ps 51:14, Is 63:6). The NT (Acts 2:38, Soc 12), while recognizing that Christ to His disciples was fulfilled when He Himself after the Resurrection breathed on them, and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost' (Jn 20:22), and after His Ascension the Spirit descended on the Church with the outward signs of the wind and fire (Ac 2:3). The Christian life as such is an inspired life, but the operation of the Spirit is represented in the NT in two forms; there are the extraordinary gifts (charisms)—speaking with tongues, interpreting tongues, prophecy, miracles (1 Co 12),—all of which St. Paul subordinates to faith, hope, love (ch. 13); and there are the fruits of the Spirit in moral character and religious disposition (Gal 5:22, 23). Intermediate may be regarded the gifts for special functions in the Church, as teaching, governing, exhorting (Ro 12:8). The prophetic inspiration is continued (Ro 12:6); but superior is the Apostle (1 Co 129) (see Above).

2. The doctrine of the inspiration of the NT attaches itself to the promise of Christ to His disciples that the Holy Spirit whom the Father would send in His name should teach them all things, and bring to their remembrance all things that He had said to them (Jn 16:12); and that, when the Spirit of truth had come, He should guide them into all the truth, and should declare to them the things that were to come (16:13). These promises cover the contents of Gospels, Epistles, and apocalypse. The inspiration of Christ's own words is affirmed in His Christ recognizes the inspiration of the OT (Mt 22:29), and the authority of the prophets (Lk 24:27). The word 'inspire' is used only in Wis 15:4 ( "Because he was pleased of him that moulded him, and of building him, God inspired him into an active soul, and breathed into him a vital spirit."

The word 'inspiration' is used in this general sense in Job 32:24 AV. But there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration (RV 'breath') of the Almighty, giveth them understanding.' In special reference to the OT we find in 2 Ti 3:16 (RV) 'every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching,' etc. While the term is not used, the fact is recognized in 2 P 1:21. For no prophecy ever came by the will of man; but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost. It must be added, however, that both these passages are in writings the Apostolic authorship of which is questioned by many scholars. But the NT view of the authority of the OT is fully attested in the use made of the OT as trustworthy history, true doctrine, and sure prophecy. And just as the inaccuracy of the Old Testament is recognized in the authors, so the OT is sufficiently inspired by the Spirit of God; but it is questionable whether we can so formally define the process. (c) The dynamical theory recognizes the exercise of that faculty in the author, but maintains their Illumination, stimulation, and purification by the Spirit of God, in order that in doctrine and ethics the Divine mind and will may be correctly and sufficiently expressed; but this doctrine was not from life; (d) We may call the view now generally held personal inspiration: by the Spirit of God men are in various degrees enlightened, filled with zeal and devotion, endowed with the power of the Spirit, and brought into immediate and intimate communion with God; and this new life, expressed in their writings, is the channel of God's revelation of Himself to men. In place of stress on the subject, the emphasis is now laid on the moral character and religious disposition of the agents of revelation. ALFRED E. GARVEY.

INSTANT.—'Instant' and 'instantly' are now used only of time. In AV they have their earlier meaning of 'urgent,' 'urgently,' as in Lk 23:44 'they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified'; Lk 7:2 'they besought him instantly' (RV 'earnestly'). Cf. Erasmus, Paraphrase, i. 3, i. 'whose knocketh at the door instantly, to him it shall be opened.'

INSTRUMENT.—For musical instruments see Musc. The word is also frequently used in AV (thought twice in NT, both times in Ro 6:14) for any utensil, implement, or weapon, and in To 7:1, 1 Mac 13:8 for a legal document or deed.

INTERCESSION.—See Prayer.

INTEREST.—See Usury.

INTERMEDIATE STATE.—See Eschatology, 3 (d), and Paradise, 3.

INTERPRETATION.—This word and its cognates are found throughout the Bible with a wide variety in their use. 1. In the earlier stages of the history of mankind dreams were looked upon as manifestations of Divine intervention in human affairs, and it was regarded as of the first importance that their mysterious Revelations should be explained to men. From the story of Joseph we learn that a special class at the court of the Pharaoh discharged the function of interpreters of dreams (cf. 'magicians') [Rev 17:14, 'a great beast,'] Gn 41:8). A similar body of wise or learned men is mentioned in the Book of Daniel, for the same object at the court of Babylon (Dan 2:2, 4, 14). The idea that dreams were a means of communication between the Deity and men was also current amongst the Hebrews from a very early date. In the NT we find that dreams occupy the place of direct visions or revelations from God, and no difficulty seems to have been experienced by the interpreters as to their precise meaning (Mt 1:21, 20, 20, 25).

2. Turning again to the history of Joseph, we find there an incident which makes us believe that there was an official Interpreter, or a body of interpreters, whose work was to translate foreign languages into the language of the court (cf. 'the interpreter,' Gn 41:14). The qualification to act as interpreter seems to have been required of those who acted as ambassadors at foreign courts (cf. 2 Ch 32:24). That prominent politicians and statesmen had this means of international communication at their disposal is seen in the translation by the scribes from the Aramaic language into Aramaic (Ezr 4). As the Hebrew tongue ceased to be that of the common people, interpreters were required at the sacred services to translate or explain the Law and the Prophets after the reading of the original (see W. R. Smith, OT, 2/2, 161, 164). In the NT examples are frequent of the interpretation in Greek of a Hebrew or Aramaic phrase (Mt 1:27, Mk 6:15, 16, Lk 1:8, 19; and in this connexion it is interesting to recall the extract from the Wisdom of Enoch translated by Eusebius, in which Mark is called 'the interpreter of Peter' (see HE iii. 39)—a tradition accepted by Jerome and Athanasius. The most natural explanation is that which makes St. Mark the Chaplain of the Gospels in Greek of St. Peter's teaching in his native tongue.

3. The function of the prophets is described as that of interpreters or ambassadors explaining to Israel Jehovah's messages in terms suited to their capacity (Is 43:27, cf. Elisha's reference to the intercessory or ambassadorial work of angels in interpreting to man what God requires of him in the way of conduct, as well as the mystery of His dealings with men (Job 33:20)).

4. Frequent reference is made by St. Paul to a peculiar phase in the life of the early Corinthian Church—speaking with tongues. What was the power of interpreting these strange utterances? The speaker himself might possess the gift of interpretation and use it for the benefit of the congregation (see 1 Co 14:18), or, on the other hand, he might not. In the latter event his duty was to keep silence, unless an interpreter were at hand to make his message intelligible to the other assembled worshippers (1 Co 14:15, 20, 20, 26).

5. A somewhat ambiguous use of the word 'interpretation' occurs in 2 P 1:20, where the writer refers to the expounding of ancient prophecies; 'no prophecy of scripture is of private (RVm 'special') interpretation.' Two explanations of this passage are current: (1) the 'interpretation' is that of the prophet himself, who, because of his peculiar relation to the Spirit of God, uttered words the full meaning of which he did not comprehend; or (2) the word has a reference to the exegesis of the passage explained. The present writer is of opinion that neither explanation does full justice to the author's idea. If the word translated 'private' be confined solely in its meaning to the noun which it qualities, we may understand by the phrase that no single event or result can be looked on as a complete fulfilment of the prophet's message. It has a wider range or scope than the happening of any special occurrence, though that occurrence may be regarded as a fulfilment of the prophet's announcement.

J. R. WILLIS

INTREAT.—Besides the mod. sense of 'beseek, intercede' (spelled also 'entreat') means 'deal with,' 'meet,' 'treat,' always with an adverb 'well, ill,' 'shamefully,' etc. Coverdale translates it '40th.'

He shall gather the lambs together with his arms, and bear them in his bosom, and shall kindly intreat those that bear young.'

It is even more important to notice that when the meaning seems to be as now, viz., 'beseek, the word is often in reality much stronger, 'prevail on by entreaty.' Thus Gn 26:34 'And Isaac intreated the Lorn for his wife, ... and the Lorn was intreated of him,' i.e. yielded to the entreaty, as the Heb. means. Cf. Grafton, Chron. ii. 768, 'Howbeit she could in no wise be intreated with her good will to deliver him.'

In Jer 15:8 and its margin the two meanings of the word and the two spellings are used as alternative renderings, 'I will cause the enemy to entreat thee with the full of the mouth, and I will intreat the enemy for thee' (RV 'I will cause the enemy to make supplication unto thee').

INWARDS, INWARD PARTS.—1. The former of these expressions is frequently found in EV (Ex. and Lv.), meaning the entrails or bowls of the animals to be ate, according to the Levitical instructions (Ex 20:26, Lv 31. 10, 41, 41, 72 36. 8, etc.). The same idea is found in Gn 41:9, where EV has 'had eaten them up,' and LXX renders 'came into their belly' (see AVm which gives the alternative 'had come to the inward parts of them'; cf. also 1 K 17:2 AVm). For the most part, however, the expression 'inward parts' is used in a metaphorical sense, to denote the contrast between the inward reality and the outward clothing of human character. Stated within the 'inward parts' is the capacity for wisdom (Job 38:32, see nevertheless EVm, truth (Ps 51:1), ethical knowledge, and moral renovation (Jer 31:4), where 'inward parts' is almost synonymous with 'heart,' cf. Pr. 20) near, here, too, lie hidden the springs of active wickedness (Ps 8) and deceitful language (Ps 62:6 AVm). The power of deceiving as to character and motives comes from man's inherent ability to secrete, within the profound depths of the 'innermost parts,' his daily thoughts (Pr 18:10; cf. Ps 64:7). At the same time, these hidden designs are as open an book, beneath the bright light of a lamp, to the Lord (Pr 20:5), for, to a similar thought, Ps 20:7), Jer 11:26, Rev 5:2 etc.).

2. In the NT the expression is used only to denote the power of the hypocrites to deceive their fellowmen (Lk 11:43, cf. Mt 7:22). The curious phrase 'give for alms those things which are within' (Lk 11:43) may be taken as an incidental reference by Jesus to the necessity and the possibility of man's most life being renewed and restored to a right relationship with God and men (cf. Mt. 18:5). At least it is permissible to take the word rendered 'the things which are within' as equivalent to 'the inward man,' or 'the inward parts' (see Plummer, ICC, in loc.; Mt. 18:5). It is not enough to show the phrase used mechanically; the gift must be accompanied by the spontaneous bestowal of the giver's self, as it were, to the receiver.

IPHEDEIA.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 4:31).

IPTHAH.—A town in the Shephelah of Judah, Jos 15:46; site unknown.

IPHTAH.—A ravine NW. of Hannah, on the north border of Zebulun (Jos 19:17). It is identified by some with the Jotapata (mod. Jaffa) of Josephus.

IRA.—1. The Jairite who was kohen or priest to David (2 S 23:8). His name is omitted in the original (?) passage in 2 S 21, and from the passage in 1 Ch 19:3. The Jairite' denotes that he was of the Gileadite clan of the Jairites. The name probably means 'the watchful.' 2. The Ithrite, one of David's heroes (2 S 23, where perhaps Ithrite should be Jairite). 3. The son of Ishkke the Tekoite (2 S 22), another of David's heroes.

IR-HA-HERES.—In Is 19:4 the name to be given in the ideal future to one of the five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts': AV and RV 'one shall be called, the city of destruction.' The usual accepted translation of the passage is that the name 'city of heres, or destruction,'—or, more exactly, 'of tearing down' (the verb hars used being of pulling or tearing down cities, altars, walls, etc., Je 6:9, 14:13, Ex 36:20)—was chosen for the sake of a punning allusion to cheres, in Heb. a rare word for 'sun' (Job 9), the 'city of cheres,' or 'the sun,' being a designation which might have been used in Heb. to On, the city of the sun-gods, a city a few miles N.E. of the modern Cairo, in ancient times the chief centre of the sun-worship in Egypt, and full of obelisks dedicated to the sun-god Ra (or Thoth in Cleopatra's needle). On the other hand, On, the 'sun-god's temple, was originally one of these obelisks, erected by Thothmes III. in front of the temple of the sun-god (On); and the meaning of the passage being that the place which has hitherto been a 'city of the sun' will in the future be called the 'city of destroying,' i.e. a city devoted to destroying the temples and emblems of the sun (cf. Jer 43:9). The LXX have polite hasele, i.e. 'city of righteousness,' a reading which is open to the suspicion of being an alteration based on 19:4.

To some scholars, however, this explanation appears artificial; and the question is further complicated by historical considerations. The high priest Onias m., after his deposition by Antiochus, went to Egypt (1 Macc. 2:4), desiring of better times in Judah, sought refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor and conceived the idea of building there a temple dedicated to Jrr, in which 'the city of the sun-god's people might be carried on without molestation, and which might form a religious centre for the Jews settled in Egypt. Ptolemy granted him a site at Leontopolis, in the district, of Hicoporion or Hiknopion, the Osireion temple (Jos. B, 1. 1. 1, Ant. xii. 3. 1-3, and elsewhere; Ewald, Hist. v. 355 f.),—not improbably at Tell el-Yahudiyeh, about 20 m. N. of Leichopolis, near which there are remains of a Jewish necropolis (Nile), originally the Mount of the Jaw and the City of Ointis, pp. 18-20). In support of his plan, Onias had pointed to Is 19:4 and its context as a prediction that a temple to Jrr was to be built in Egypt (Jos. Ant. xii. 2. 1). These facts have indeed no bearing on Is 19:4, supposing the passage to be really Isaiah's; but many modern scholars are of opinion that Is 19:4 (10) and 20:1-2 are not Isaiah's, and even those who do not go so far as this would be likely to grant that one or two passages might be a later addition to the original text of Isaiah.

The following are the chief views taken by those who hold that this clause (with or without its context) is not Isaiah's: (1) Dieth and Mari Rend the verse as a prophecy on the part of a prophet not occurring in Heb. even in its usual Aramaic sense, should be found in Heb. is not probable. (2) Dillmann, while accepting the prophecy as a whole as Isaiah's, threw out the suggestion that v. 19b was added after the temple of Onias

The text contains a detailed analysis of the narratives concerning Isaac, son of Abraham and Sarah, and his life in the context of ancient Middle Eastern culture. The narrative describes Isaac as a child of circumcision and an important figure in the lineage of God's chosen people. The text explores the impact of Isaac's life on his surroundings, particularly his father Abraham and his role in the historical development of the Israelite nation. The narrative is set against the backdrop of a time when the ancient Near Eastern society was characterized by complex social, economic, and religious practices. The text highlights Isaac's role as a bridge between generations, emphasizing his piety and his importance in maintaining the covenant between God and Abraham's descendants. It also touches on the theme of faith and the challenges faced by Isaac and his family in their journey of faith.
ISAIAS

Our knowledge of the life and teaching of Isaiah rests on the book that bears his name, which, however, is not a book compiled by him, but one containing, together with other matter, some of his prophecy that have been preserved, and narratives relating to him; see, in detail, next article.

Isaiah received the call to be a prophet 'in the year that Ezechias' (or Azarias') grandfather (Is 6:1). The year is not quite certain. If Azarias king of Judah and the Azarias king of Juda mentioned in Tilgath-pileser's annals of the year 738 be identical, Isaiah's call cannot be later than 738. But if the identification is not admitted, and it is by no means certain, his call may with more probability be placed a few years earlier. His activity extended at least down to the invasion of Sennacherib in 701, and some years later, if the description of his events be correct that chs. 36-39 refer to two invasions of Sennacherib, of which that in 701 was the first. In any case Isaiah's public career covered at the least close on forty years, whence we may infer that, like Jeremiah (Jer 19), he became a prophet in early life. Unlike his contemporary Micah, his life, so far as we can trace it, was spent in Jerusalem. Not improbably he was a man of rank, at least he had easy access to the king (Is 8:1), and similar terms of intimate position (9:7). His father's name, Amoz, has in Hebrew no resemblance to that of the prophet Amos. Isaiah was married, and his wife is termed the prophetess (8:3), perhaps in the later periods of his life. She and his sons, Zachariah and Johanan, and Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8:5), names which briefly stated characteristic elements in his teaching; his own name, though of a normal and frequent Hebrew type, is interpreted to have a significance (help of Jehovah, or 'Jehovah helps') of which he could have made use; that he actually did so we may perhaps infer from 8:17, if we do not rather interpret that statement, so as to construe it as that which he pursued when he went 'half-clad and barefoot' (ch. 20).

It is impossible either to construct a complete biography of the prophet or to narrate the develop-ment in his thought and teaching. His prophecies have obviously not come down to us in chronological order, and many are without any clear indication of the date when they were delivered; any attempt to date accurately much of the material must therefore be exceedingly uncertain, and the numerous attempts that have been made naturally differ widely in their results. But there are four periods in which we may trace the prophet's life and thought in teaching; these are the time of his call, about b.c. 740 (ch. 6); of the Syro-Ephraimitish War (b.c. 732-734; 7:1-8:2); of the siege of Ashdod in b.c. 711 (ch. 20); and of the Invasion of Sennacherib in b.c. 701 (chs. 36-39).

The last-mentioned narratives are, however, of a later age than that of Isaiah, and require to be carefully used. At the time of his call Isaiah became conscious that he was to be a teacher whose primary task was to warn his people of judgment to come, of judgment which was to issue in the extermination of his nation (6:1-12)—the last clause is absent from the LXX, and probably not original. This judgment of Jehovah on His people was to be executed by means of Assyria, which, since the accession of Tilgath-pileser in 745, had entered on a course of conquest, and, as early as 740, had achieved marked success in Northern Syria. The causes of this coming judgment, Isaiah, like Amos before him, and not improbably in part owing to the influence on him of the teaching of Amos, found in the prevalent social and moral disorder (see e.g. 2:6-4:4); we are told (for the kind of offences which he denounced), in the ingratitude (e.g. 1:5-7) of the people to Jehovah, and in their failure to trust Him or to understand that what He required was not sacrifice, which was offered by the people in wearisome abundance, but justice and humanity (e.g. 1:10-20). In this teaching, as in his lofty conrection of God, Isaiah did not fundamentally advance beyond the already lofty moral and religious standpoint of Amos and Hosea, though there are naturally enough differences in the external conditions in which he taught. So far as we can see, he exercised a more direct, immediate, and decisive influence, owing to the fact that over a long period of years he was able to apply this teaching to the changing political conditions. For example, for the several political crises mentioned above, that the duty of Jehovah's people was to trust in Jehovah, and not in political alliances, whether with Assyria, Egypt, or Phœnicia (ch. 20; and Jer 701 30:4). (21:9); and to the fact that from the first he set about the creation of a society of disciples who were to perpetuate his teaching (of 58:).

Although judgment in general was the fundamental note of Isaiah's teaching, there was another note that marked it from the outset: Israel-Judah was to perish, but a remainder was to survive. This at least seems to be the significance of the name of Shear-jashub, who must have been born very shortly after the call, since in 753 he was old enough to accompany his father on his visit to Ahaz (7). Beyond the judgment, moreover, he looked forward to a new Jerusalem, righteous and perfect. How much further was the plan of the future developed? Was he the creator of those ideas more particularly summed up in the term 'Messianic,' which exercised so powerful an influence in later years? There is no certainty about this, and what we have among those most intimately connected with the prophet in the minds of the majority of students of the Bible? In particular, was the vision (6:9) of the Prince of Peace with world-wide dominion his? Or, to take another detail, did he hold that Zion itself was invincible, even though hostile hosts should approach it? These questions have been raised and have not yet received a definite answer, but this is not improbable that in the several collections of the ancient prophecies later passages of promise have in some instances been added to earlier prophecies of judgment; and that several of the Messianic passages, in particular, in the Book of Isaiah, stand isolated and disconnected from passages which bear unmistakably the impress of Isaiah's or his. On the other hand, Isaiah's belief in a remnant, which seemed secured (apart from the name and perhaps doubtful passages) by the name of his son, forms a certain and perhaps a sufficient basis for the more elaborate details of the future. Further, from the very fact that they dealt with the future, the passages in question, even if they were by Isaiah, might naturally bear less unmistakable evidence of their age than those which deal with the social and political conditions of his own time. And again, had Isaiah prophesied exclusively of judgment and destruction, we might have expected to find his name coupled with Micah's in Jer 26:14.

ISAIAS, ASCENSION OF.—See Apocalyptic Literature, No. 6.

ISAIAS, BOOK OF.—The Book of Isaiah is one of the four great collections of Hebrew prophecies. Like the book of 'The Twelve Prophets'—another of these great collections (see MICAH [BOOK OF])—it was formed by incorporating with one another smaller and earlier collections, and containing prophecies of many prophets living at different periods; with the exception of Isaiah's, the prophecies contained in the collection are anonymous, the term 'Deutero-Isaiah,' applied to the author of chs. 40-52 (or 40-48), being of course nothing more than a modern symbol for one of these anonymous writers.

1. Composition and literary history of the present book.—The Book of Isaiah, substantially as we now have it, probably dates, like the 'Book of the Twelve Prophets,' from towards the end of the 3rd cent. B.C. But The external evidence is scanty and some of it ambiguous; and the internal evidence of certain sections is differently interpreted; if, as the interpretation of Duhm and Wellhausen require us to hold, ch. 35 and ch. 40 were not written till towards the middle of the 2nd cent., and chs. 24–27 not until after B.C. 125, it is obvious that the collection which contains these sections did not attain its present form and bind some (possibly considerable) time later than B.C. 125.

The most important piece of external evidence is contained in Sir 48:24–34. In this passage the author, writing about B.C. 180, refers to Isaiah as one of the godly men of Israel, worthy of praise, and, as afterwards (49:4) in the case of Ezekiel and of Jeremiah, he cites, or alludes to, certain sections which now stand in the book that bears the prophet's name. Thus he says: 'v. 30 For Hezekiah did that which was pleasing to the Lord, and was strong in the ways of David his father, which Isaiah the prophet commanded, who was great and faithful in his vision; v. 31 In his days the sun went backward: and he added life to the king; v. 32 By a spirit of might he saw the end, and comforted the mourners in Sion; v. 33 For ever he declared the things that should be, and hidden things before they came.' Possibly before 132. The name of v. 30 refers to the Tenor of Isaiah (Is 11); certainly v. 32 refers to the narrative of Is 38 (—2 K 20), and v. 33 shows familiarity with the recurrent arguments from prophecy in Is 44–48 (see e.g. 44:18–28, 46:1–13, 48:1–22), while v. 34 is somewhat reminiscent of the actual phrasology of 49:6–12. Though it would be possible to invent somewhat different explanations of these facts, much the most probable is not so difficult, by the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., some (if not all) of the prophecies in chs. 1–35 had already been brought into a book, and to these had been appended, not necessarily or even probably at the same time (cf. 180 these chapters as one of the part thereof), and that the whole book at this time was attributed to Isaiah. Actual citations from the Book of Isaiah by name, which would help to prove the extent of the book at given periods, are not numerous before the 1st cent. A.D., when we find several in the NT: 11 is cited in Ro 9:3; 61 in Mt 13:11, Jn 12:24, Ac 28:27; 94 in Mt 17:12, 105 in Ro 9:17; 111 in Ro 15:4, 269 in Mk 9:1; 40–1 in (Mk 1) Mt 3:1; 49–4 in Mt 12:20–1; 53–1, 94, 56 in Lk 4:16, 8:4, 20, 611 in Ro 10:12. There are also some twenty-five unnamed citations in NT (Saved, Introd. to OT. In Greek, 385 f.), some of which, like the unnamed citations found in theMT, the book of Jeir, the Tenor of Isaiah (Is 40–1), and (about B.C. 50), are, taken in conjunction with the named citations, not without significance. Still, rigorous proof that the Book of Isaiah contained all that it now contains much before the final close of the canon (see Canon of OT), is wanting. The general considerations which, taken in conjunction with the proof afforded by Sir 48:24–34 that (most or all of) chs. 40–66 ranked as Isaiah's as early as B.c. 150, make it likely, failing strong evidence to the contrary, to reckon with the probability that by about that time the book was substantially of the same extent as at present, that (a) the history of the formation of the canon (see Canon of OT), and (b) the probability, created by the allusions in the prologue (about B.C. 132) to Siraich to translations of prophetic books, that our present Greek version dates from before 132. This version appears to proceed from a single age or hand, and yet it is, apart from brief glosses, of the same extent as the present Hebrew text of the book.

If we may adopt the most natural interpretation from 2 Ch 36:9—Ezr 1:1, external evidence would go far to prove that chs. 40—66 were taken from a single hand, and of Isaiah much before the close of the 3rd cent. B.C. For the Chronicler here attributes the prophecy of Cyrus, which forms so conspicuous a feature of Is 40–44 (see 41:1, 42:6–43:5, and esp. compare 2 Ch 32:30 with 1 Es 4:30), not to Isaiah but to Jeremiah, which he would scarcely have done if in his time (not earlier than B.C. 300) these anonymous chapters were already incorporated in a book entitled Isaiah. If we reject this inference, we shall on the evidence of the Book of Isaiah itself for the determination of the earliest date at which it can have been compiled.

Turning then to the internal evidence, we note first the structure of the Book of Isaiah. (a) All the sections, some of which are attributed to Isaiah (1:1–2:22 etc.), interspersed with narratives by or about Isaiah (chs. 6, 7, 8, 20); (b) chs. 36–39—historical narratives of the last and times of Isaiah, identical in the main to 2 K 18–20; (c) chs. 40–66—anonymous prophecies. Comparison with the Book of Jeremiah, which concludes with a chapter (52) about the times of Jeremiah derived from 2 K 24–25, suggests that our present book resulted from the union of a prophetical volume, consisting (in the main) of prophecies by or attributed to Isaiah, with an historical appendix and a book of anonymous prophecies. This union, as we have seen above, took place before B.C. 150; if any parts of chs. 1–39 are earlier than this, their presence in the book is due to subsequent interpolation.

If it were possible to write a full history of the literary process which culminated in the Book of Isaiah as we now have it, it would be necessary to trace in detail first the growth of chs. 1–39, then that of chs. 40–66, and lastly the causes which led to the union of the two. It is in particular, with regard to chs. 40–66, to be added that they were added to make the Book of Isaiah more nearly equal in size to the other prophetical collections—Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and the Twelve—with the result that as early as B.C. 180 these chapters (40–66), or whether something else, which we cannot conjecture, was the real cause of this union. But, apart from internal evidence pointing to the different periods in which different sections originated, certain indications of the complexity of the literary process do exist, particularly in the case of chs. 1–39; these we may consider. (1) The matter is not arranged chronologically; the call (cf. Ezek 1, Jer 1) of Isaiah, which naturally preceded any of his prophecies, is recorded not in ch. 1, but in ch. 6. Similarly, in the Koran the record of Mohammed's call does not occur till Sura 96; in this case the reason is that the editor of the Koran followed the rather mechanical principle of arranging the suras in the order of their occurrence in the Qur'aan (49:39). A collection of material, some of which had previously acquired a fixed arrangement; in other words, chs. 1–35 is a book formed not entirely, or perhaps even mainly, by the collection and free rearrangement of prophetical pieces, but rather by the incorporation whole of earlier and smaller books. Following these clues, we may first divide these chapters thus: (1) chs. 1 with title (v.7), probably intended to cover the larger collection; (2) chs. 2–12 with title 2; (3) chs. 13–23 with title 13 naming Isaiah, and corresponding sub-titles not mentioning Isaiah, in 15:17 19:21; 11:18 23:1 (cf. elsewhere 300); (4) chs. 24–27, distinguished from the preceding sections by the absence of titles, and from the following by the absence of the opening interjection; (5) chs. 28–31—group of woes; see 28:29 (RV 'H' represents the same Hebrew word that is translated 'lament' in 29:3 etc.) 32–35, which, like chs. 24–27, are without title. Some even of these sections seem to have arisen from the union of still smaller and earlier booklets. Thus it is reasonable to suppose that ch. 6 once formed the commencement of a book; again, chs. 2–4 are prophecies of judgment enclosed.
ISAIAH, BOOK OF

between Messianic prophecies 2:7 and 4:5; ch. 5 contains a brief group of 'Woes' (vv. 4, 8, 11, 14, 20, 21). It is impossible to enter into details here as to the dates when these several booklets first appeared, or as to the various processes of union or rearrangement or interpolation or other modifications. Merely to state theories which have been put forward, without adducing proof or offering criticism, would require more space than is available. And from the case it would be impossible to offer any complete theory that would not be in many respects uncertain. It is more important to appreciate the general fact, which is clear, that the Book of Isaiah is a composite work, intermingled literary history, than to be ready to subscribe to any particular theory of this history. But two points may be briefly touched on. (1) Much of the literary process just referred to lies after the Exile. As will be seen below, chs. 40-55 were not written till the last years of the Exile; chs. 56-66 are certainly of no earlier, and probably of later, origin. The union of chs. 1-39 and 40-66 cannot therefore fall before the close of the Exile, and, thirdly, a being placed in that far as to an editor; evidence is concerned, fall much before n.c. 180. But even 1-39 was not a volume of pre-exilic origin; for the appendix 36-39 is derived from Kings, which was not written till, at the earliest, n.c. 581 (cf. 2 K. 23:25), or even in what may be regarded as its first edition (cf. Driver, LOT, 189) before about n.c. 600. On this ground alone, then, the completion of chs. 1-39, by the intermined processes of union or rearrangements, cannot be placed after the Exile, and should probably be placed later. It must indeed be placed later, unless we regard all the sections in chs. 1-33 which are of post-exilic origin (see below), as interpolations rather than as what, in any case, they probably are, original parts of the booklets incorporated in chs. 1-39. Thus chs. 2-12 and 13-23 (apart from subsequent interpolations or amplifications) are of post-exilic origin; the editor who prefixed them to the earlier part of the book was not concerned with the earlier part of its story. (2) The earliest stage of this long literary process falls in the lifetime of Isaiah (c. n.c. 740-701). But even in its earliest stage the literary process was not uniform. As in chs. 6 and 8-14 we have there what is no reason to question are pieces of Isaiah's autobiography; Isaiah here speaks of himself in the first person. Chs. 7 and 20 may have the same origin, the fact that Isaiah is here referred to in the third person not being in itself conclusive. If it be necessary to attribute to Isaiah himself, others we do not improbably owe to the memory of his disciples. There is no reason for believing that the present arrangement of this matter, even within the several booklets, goes back to Isaiah himself; the division into chapters and verses is of course of very much later origin, and in several cases does violence to the original connexion, either by uniting, as in ch. 5, originally quite distinct pieces, or, as in the case of 9:10-14, what formed an undivided whole. Justice can be done to the prophetic literature only when the brevity of the several pieces is recognized, instead of being obscured by treating them as pieces of a single discourse. Unfortunately, we have not for the teaching of Isaiah, as for that of Jesus, a triple tradition. But the analogy of the diverse treatises of the same writer in the different Gospels may well warn us that sayings which lie side by side (as e.g. in 5:1-6) in the Book of Isaiah were not necessarily spoken in immediate succession.

But how far, if not in the order in which he spoke or wrote, have the words of Isaiah reached us substantially as he spoke them? The question is not altogether easy to answer, particularly in one respect. Isaiah was pre-eminently a prophet of judgment; but intermingled with his warnings are many passages of promise: see e.g. 2:4 and 4:4, concluding the warnings of ch. 8, and the constant inter-change of warning and promise in chs. 28-31. Are these passages of promise Isaiah's, or the work of some later writer with whom later editors saw fit to bring them into the Book, as well as to exhort their readers? These questions in general, and in detail with reference to each particular passage, are still far from settled. The general question of the nature of the Book of Isaiah is briefly considered in the preceding art.; for details see Cheyne's Introd. to the Book of Isaiah, or commentaries such as those of Duhm and Marti, or, on a smaller scale and in English, of Whitehouse. Here this alone can be suggested that the text of our English Bible down to which the history of the growth of the Book of Isaiah extends, and the complexity of that growth, would easily allow of these passages being incorporated as suggested by some theory, and have the present creation, for example, by the absence of the last clause of ch. 6 from the Greek text, that short consolatory annotations were still being made as late as the 2nd cent. a.c. Once the significance of the complexity of the Book of Isaiah is given in the previous paragraph, it will be clear, that the question, Is such and such a passage authentic? meaning, Was it written by Isaiah? proceeds from a wrong point of view. The proper question is: Is it useful to us, such and such a passage, as it stands in this collection of prophecies, made certainly after the Exile and probably not much before the close of the 3rd cent. a.c., belong? The presence of explanatory annotations is now generally recognized. For example, in 7:20 Isaiah speaks figuratively of Jehovah using a razor; an editor added a note, which has intruded into the text, that by 'razor' is not to understand the Assyrians. As to the number of such annotations scholars differ.

2. Summary.—The following summary of the Book of Isaiah and of the periods at which its several parts were written, or have been attributed to the editor, who prefixed them to the earlier part of the book, must be used in the light of the foregoing account of the origin of the book. In the clearer cases the evidence of date is briefly Indicated; in others one or two theories are mentioned. But for the evidence, such as it is, the reader must turn to larger works; it would require more space than the scope of the article allows, even to summarize it here. Again, in the majority of cases no attempt is made to indicate the smaller annotations of which a later editor, or even, as some think, a later age, has been the author, as well as the notes which are attached to the words which have been added, and the amplifications which are added which have been added, and the amplifications which have been added.

1. Title.—Probably prefixed by an editor who brought together a considerable collection of Isaiah's prophecies. The days of Ussiah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah describe the entire period of Isaiah's activity. Till comparatively recently it was generally regarded as a single discourse, constituting, as Ewald terms it, the greatest arrangement. But there was no agreement as to the period of Isaiah's lifetime to which it belonged; some scholars referring it to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitish War (cf. ch. 7), almost at the beginning, others to the time of Sennacherib's invasion at the close, of Isaiah's career. If, as is really probable, this is not a single discourse, these differences are in part accounted for. The chapter falls into these sections: (a) v. 1-v. 6, which may perhaps itself consist of two distinct pieces, vv. 1-4; (b) vv. 5-13, perhaps consisting of distinct sayings, namely, v. 13 and vv. 5-12, v. 6, v. 11, v. 12, which, again, as some think, are two fragments—v. 7 and v. 9, v. 10. Other passages (a) and (c) are distinct prophetic poems of Isaiah complete in themselves, (a) dating probably from 705, and (c) from 701, some of the former of v. 7 are better accounted for by the Assyrian invasion of that year than by that of the Syro-Ephraimitish army in 735; (d) v. 19, perhaps from about 705. The shortening of (b) and the fragment (d) are more difficult to date; (g) has been regarded by some as a denunciation of the Northern Kingdom, and therefore delivered before n.c. 722; by others as a post-exilic passage of promise (v. 13).

2. Title of a collection of Isaiahic prophecies. 2:4-9. The main body of this section, consisting of a poem announcing the near advent of the 'day of Jehovah' against 'everything proud and lifted up' (38:2), another (38:3-43) describing the imminent social disintegration of Judah, and a third denouncing the light and luxurious ladies of Jerusalem (39:4-6), the catalogue of whom (39:8-16) is perhaps the only part of the poem, appears to preserve the earlier teaching of Isaiah. It has been thought that in 39:8-16 Isaiah writes with the light of his later visions, and, as such, the poem is called the 'Third Isaiah' (39:17). The theme is fresh in mind, and this section alludes to Ahaz (death 738) as the reigning king. The section, in fact, is preceded by a refrain (cf. 4:6 and 38:16), as many think, rather than by Isaiah himself, with a consolatory conclusion. The opening poem (39:1-7) is certainly new, and the whole poem probably formed the last strophe.

Ch. 6. Isaiah's own record of his call in the year of Uzziah's death (a.c. 749), written perhaps some years later. 7-11, Narratives (in part, and originally perhaps wholly, autobiographical), probably of prophecies delivered at the opening of the reign. 12-23, The Assyrian War in n.c. 734. In detail: 7-10, Isaiah's interview with Ahaz; the sign of Immanuel (7:1-8), which, since Ahaz rejected it, is somewhat ambiguous, and probably not the immediate continuation of 7-11; 8-14, two signs indicating that Syria and Ephraim will perish before Assyria, v.7; Judah, not having trusted in Jehovah, will suffer, and (v.9-11) so will the nations that oppose Judah: v.12-14, Jehovah the only real and true God: v.15-19, the conclusion: his disciples are to preserve and witness to what he has said.

815-9. In spite of the link between 8 and 9, it is very likely that the latter is a later addition, probably written, which seemed to reach a very definite conclusion in 8:14. If not, its date is very uncertain. It consists of an enumeration of fragments (8:15-22) describing a period of great distress, a statement in prose of an imminent change of fortune (9:1), and a Messianic poem (9:2-4) celebrating the restoration, triumph, and prosperity of the people under their mighty Prince. Those who deny in toto the existence of Messianic passages in Isaiah's prophecies naturally treat this poem as a later interpolation, but it cannot be assigned to a time later than n.c. 500. The positive defence of Isaianic authorship is rendered difficult by its isolation and by the absence (not unusual in a prophetic writing) of the ideal future (v.6), and of any trace of direct allusions of Isaiah's age.

9:10-19 with 39:20-24. A carefully constructed poem of five stanzas (9:10-17, with 9:18, 19, part of the first stanza) of exactly equal length, marked off from one another by the refrain in 9:10, 15, 18. It belongs to Isaiah's early period (about n.c. 735), and deals with the collapse of the Northern Kingdom, Ephraim, before the Assyrians, who, without being named, is more vividly described in 39:6-8. 10-17. Assyria will be punished for its pride and misunderstanding of the purpose for which Jehovah used it. Date much debated; probably only part in the work of Isaiah.

10:1-32. A dramatic idyll portraying an (imaginary) Assyrian descent on Jerusalem. The period in Isaiah's lifetime to which it could best be referred is 701.

10:33. The 'Book of Oracles' (AV 'Burdens'). The untitled sections, 14:1-9 (14:4-7) 17:1-24, 18:20, which deal most closely with Judah, as contrasted with, and distinct from, prophecies directed against the foreign nations, perhaps formed no part of the original book.

13:1-22. The fall of Babylon (13:1-22). The section contains two poems (13:1-22 and 14:24-25) in the same rhythm as is used in the elegies of the Book of Lamentations. The first takes up the theme of the ease with which the Babylonians (13:18) would destroy Jerusalem. 14:21-25, the second, describes the march of the Medes, the Medes who were about to destroy Babylon. It was written under the influence of the fall of Babylon in 539 B.C., under the accession of Cyrus, or possibly Nergal-sharezer, who was its first king. The story in the context is given in 1:1-2:36. It is an account of the events that took place on the day of the fall of Babylon.
befallen him in so far that he then occupies the lower office of secretary (286-277).

286. An elegiac poem, closing (v.9) as it begins (v.1), is the approach of the Phoenicians: the occasion, according to some, being the siege of Tyre (vv.4-5) by Shalmaneser, between 853 and 851 B.C. according to others, the destruction of Sidon (vv.2-4, 14). In a.c. 348. After its fall Tyre will rise again and serve Jehovah (vv.13-14); cf. 19:14. 797. An aged Jew dying, speaks of his future destiny, in which we see universal catastrophe (24-25), which extends to the super-natural rulers or patron angels of the nations (24-4; cf. 27), for he sees the reign of Jehovah, to whom in his present condition he most heartily invites all nations; death is abolished and sorrows banished (25-8). The Jews, hidden during the time of judgment (26-27), are慰问ed from their refuge and set free to all and Jerusalem (27:1). Interpreted are songs or hymns (29:1-4; 30:1-24 27:4). Difficult of interpretation as apocalyptic is written, it is, in parts obscured by very serious textual corruption, it is yet clear that this is a post-exile work (e.g. cf. 27:14); and the occurrence of striking ideas, such as the universality (29:4), and patron angels, which occur elsewhere in the O.T only in its latest parts, suggests a relative late point even in this period.

Chs. 28-33. A group of prophecies brought together probably by an editor on account of the similar opening of the sections with "Woe" (see and read). In this section there is a constant and remarkable alternation between menace and promise, the consolation of hope being at times taken as the form of menace to the foes. Looked at from this standpoint, this booklist falls into the following sections: (a) the references, who to his corrections, are here given in brackets, 28-4 (28 *), 28-2 (28-33), 28-4 (29, 9-4, and possibly parts of 29-7, according to interpretation 28-33 (28-xl), 31-2 (30-18), 31-2 (32-14-32-20) (33). In some cases it will be seen that the promise follows abruptly on the threat, and consider the force of the latter. The menace and denunciations seem clearly to be the work of Isaiah, though some question his authorship of 32-4 (a parallel to 34-4); but the division is not generally accepted. Prophecies of promises to later writers, and a larger number do not consider ch. 33 to be the work of Isaiah. In any case, the section 28-47, 31-14 (30-18), and 31-2 (32-20) do not end in one period; 29-4 would appear to have been composed before the fall of Samaria in 722; the majority of the references point to a later composition, particularly those whose tendency is seen. The promise is a protestant one, which better describes the various purposes of the prophets, the judicial and moral, natural, if the not the only possible, interpretation the existence of the Temple and the presence of the speaker and his audience in Jerusalem; consequently that the Exile is over (or not yet begun); see 667; 7 (cf. 44-20) 60th, in chs. 60-62 the future of Judah and 62 Nehemiah; 61, 5-67, a stinging confession; (8) the contrasted characters and cause of the spiritual and moral, the idolatrous cull (cf. 56-7) of the former.

The difference of outlook, subject, and treatment between chs. 60-56 and chs. 60-62 is obvious, and the latter was more less regarded. In itself such difference need not necessarily imply difference of authorship, though it certainly suggests that the editor responsible for the latter, and his audience, had in mind some different purpose.

The Exile is over (or not yet begun); see 667; 7 (cf. 44-20) 60th, in chs. 60-62 the future of Judah and 62 Nehemiah; 61, 5-67, a stinging confession; (8) the contrasted characters and cause of the spiritual and moral, the idolatrous cull (cf. 56-7) of the former.

Is 41:2 refers to Cyrus as ruling both to the N. and E.; the prophet then writes after the conquest of Media; but he overstates the fall of Babylon, and therefore writes before that event. Between 549 and 538, and probably near the latter date, the prophecy was written.

The speaking generation of women and the Jews, the people of 727, are dominated by one ruling purpose, namely, to remove the exiles out of their despondency, and to fire them with enthusiasm for what the writer proposes as their future destiny, in vision, in Jahweh's ways and will,—in a word, in true religion. For this purpose he emphasizes and illustrates the omnipotence of Jahweh, and the conscience of the nations.

In general, the visions, in the prophetic sense, of the nations. Again, the passages dealing with the 'Servant of the Lord' (wh. see) are but one form in which he develops his main theme; for the Spirit is seen as the innermost of the people on which his purpose allows him to lay stress are those of despondency and unbelief; he is a savior, indeed, there is a sharp distinction as to the nature of that for nature of his message is that they are pardoned (46) These chapters, then, though the progress of thought in them may be less than a straight line through linear, and closely knit together. But when we turn to—

(6) Chs. 59-66, the contrast is great: this may be seen by a brief summary. Thus (1) the description of the terms on which the enmarch and the foreigner may be admitted to the Jewish community, and enforces the observance of the Sabbath; but which belongs to the Jews, and whose boundaries are an existing state of society in which the watchmen of the people are neglectful of their duties, and in which the people generally resort to various illegitimate rites; (2) the description of people sedulous in fasting, but given to inhumanity and libation; (3) the people's way of life is contrasted with the preceding, followed (vv.102-3) by a summation (in which Jehovah appears as a man of war (cf. 63:4); (5) the destruction of Babylon (ch. 51); (6) the destruction of Tyre (ch. 14); (7) the destruction of Tyre against Edom (cf. ch. 34); (7) 63-64, a stinging confession; (8) the contrasted characters and cause of the spiritual and moral, the idolatrous cull (cf. 56-7) of the former.

And there are other facts which confirm this view. book of which the English student can avail himself. Of commentaries in English, Skinner's (on the AV) and Whitehouse's (on the RV) are convenient and good. The larger commentary by Cheyne has been to some extent antiquated, particularly by his own edition of the book in the Polychrome Bible, and his invaluable Introduction to the Book of Isaiah. In these works, and in, e.g., Driver's Isaiah, his Life and Times, and his LOT, and G. A. Smith's 'Isaiah' (Expositor's Bible), the student will find sufficient guidance to the extensive literature which has gathered round the Book of Isaiah.

G. B. GRAT.

ISCARIOT.—See Judas Iscariot.

IDSAEL. (1 Es 58) = Ezr 2:6 and Neh 7:56 Giddel.

ISHBAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4:13).

ISHIK.—A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25:2—1 Ch 1:32). The tribe of which he is the eponym is somewhat uncertain.

ISHI-BENOB.—One of the four Philistines of the giant stock who were slain by the mighty men of David (2 S 21:14).-11.

ISHBOSETH.—1. The fourth son of Saul: on the death of his father and three brothers on Mt. Gibeon, he contested the throne of Israel with David for seven years. Driven by David over the Jordan, he took up his headquarters at Mahanaim, where, after having been deserted by Abner, he was murdered by two of his captains. His name is given in 1 Ch 8:20 and 9:1 as Eshek. The same variation meets us in the name of Jonathan's son—Nepheboseuth or Meriboth—and in the case of Jerubbaal or Jerubbesheth; similarly, we have Beesidah and Beisidah. In 1 S 14:18 Ishbaal has become Ishiv, which in its turn is a corruption for Ishioh, or 'man of Jahweh.' The change of Ish-baal, 'man of Baal,' to Ish-shabat, 'man of the shameful thing,' is ordinarily accounted for on the supposition 'that the later religion wished to avoid the now odious term Baal. The theory, however, is met by the difficulty that it is in the Chronicler that the form compounded with Baal occurs. Hence it has been suggested that Boseth is the fossilized name of a Babylonian deity, Bast, for which theory, however, little support is adduced. Ishshesh or Ishbaal is perhaps the true reading for Jashobeam in 1 Ch 11:1 etc., which is corrupted to Josheb-basshebeth in 2 S 23:8.

W. P. COBB.

ISHHOH.—A Manassite (1 Ch 27:18).

ISHI ('my husband').—The name which Hosea (2:2) recommends Israel to apply to J* instead of Baal (my lord').

ISHMA.—One of the sons of Etam (1 Ch 4:2).

ISHMAEL.—1. The son of Abraham by Hagar. His name, which means 'May God hear,' was decided upon before his birth (Gen 16:11). As in the case of the history of his mother, three documentary sources are used by the narrator. J supplied Gn 16:14-15, E 21:8-16, whilst P adds such links as 16:18, 17:21-22, 25:12-14, 31:17. For the story of his life up to his settlement in the wilderness of Paran, the northern part of the Sinaitic peninsula, see Hagar. At the age of thirteen he was circumcised on the same day as his father (Gen 17:12). In Paran he married two Amalekite wives, and of these grandchildren and great-grandchildren. For his life in Asia Minor, see Jashobeam (1 Ch 11:11). No other incident is recorded, except that he was associated with his step-brother in the burial of their father (25:24), and himself died at the age of 187 (25:23).

ISHMAEL.—2. An Ishmaelite who was an officer in the retinue of King David (1 Ch 11:11).

ISHMAEL.—3. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:20).

ISHMAEL.—4. A son of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Jonathan (1 Ch 5:19).

ISHMAEL.—5. Ancestor of the Zebadian who was one of Jeboab's judicial officers (2 Ch 19:4).

ISHMAEL.—7. A member of the royal house of David who took the principal part in the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 41:11). The story is told in Jer 40-41, with a summary in 2 K 25:25-26. It is probable that Ishmael coveted Nebuchadnezzar's appointment of Gedaliah as governor of Judah (Jer 40:6) instead of some member of the ruling family, and considered him as unpatriotic in consenting to represent an alien power. Further instigation was supplied by Baalz, king of Ammon (Jer 40:4), who, like Ishmael's father, was seeking either revenge or an opportunity to extend his dominions. Gedaliah and his retinue were killed after an entertainment given to Ishmael, who gained possession of Mizpah, the seat of government. Shortly afterwards he set out with his captives to Egypt (Bkz), but was overthrown by a body of Gedaliah's soldiers at the pool of Gibeon (Jer 41:12), and defeated. He made good his escape (41:15) with the majority of his associates; but of his subsequent life nothing is known. The conspiracy may have been prompted by motives that were in part well considered, if on the whole mistaken; but it is significant that Jeremiah supported (46), in memory of whose alleged death an annual fast was observed for some years in the month Tishri (Zec 7:31). 6. One of the priests persuaded by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10:19; cf. 1 Esdr. 9:7).

ISHMAEL. 1. The 'ruler' of the tribe of Zebulun (1 Ch 27:11). 2. One of David's 'thirty' (1 Ch 12:9).

ISHMERAI. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:9).

ISHPAH. The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8:9).

ISHPAH. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:9).

ISH-SHECH. In Ezr 8:10 it is said: 'And by the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Mahli,' where RV gives for 'man of understanding' the marginal proper name 'Ish-shekel.' It is suggested that a proper name is required is certain, but whether Ish-shekel is that name is not so certain. Isachar has been suggested. W. F. Coues.

ISHVAH. Second son of Asaher (Gn 46:21, 1 Ch 7:2).

ISLAND, ISLE. The Heb. word 'isle means primarily 'coastlands,' but sometimes lands in general, and in one passage (Is 42:16) 'dry land' as opposed to water. In Is 26:9 Palestine is called 'this isle' (AV), but RV 'coastland.' The islands of the Gentiles or heathen (Gn 10:23, Zeph 2:14) are apparently the coasts of the W. Mediterranean; the 'isles of the sea' (Est 10:1, Ezk 26:16 etc.) are the Mediterranean coast; 'the isles' (Ps 76:5, etc.) means the coasts of the East. Tyre is mentioned as an isle in Is 23:1, and here perhaps the term may be taken literally, as Tyre was actually at that time an island. The isle of Cyprus (Jer 23:21, Ezk 27:6) is probably Cyprus, and the isle of Caphtor (Jer 47:4, etc.) Crete. In the NT five islands are mentioned: Cyprus (Ac 4:31; 27:7, 9, 11), Crete (27:7, 9, 20), and the Euboean, Melita (28:1), and Patmos (Rev 1:4). E. W. G. Masterman.

ISMAEL (1 Es 9:10) = Ezr 10:19 Ismael.

ISMAEUS (1 Es 9:10) = Ezr 10:19 Amram.

ISRAEL. 1. History. 1. Sources. The sources of Jewish political and religious history are the OT, the so-called Apocryphal works, the writings of Josephus, the Aramaic and Egyptian inscriptions, allusions in Greek and Roman historians, and the Mishna and Talmud.

Modern criticism has demonstrated that many of these sources were composed by weaving together previously existing documents. Before using any of these sources except the inscriptions, therefore, it is necessary to state the results of critical investigation and to estimate its effect upon the historical trustworthy of the narratives. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua (the Hexateuch) are the product of one long literary process. Four different documents, each the work of a school of writers, have been laid under tribute to compose it. These documents are quoted so literally that they can still be separated with practical certainty one from another. The documents are the Jahwistic (J), composed in Judah by J; before B.C. 800, perhaps in the reign of Jehoshaphat, though fragments of older poems are quoted, and supplemented a little later by P; the Elohist (E), composed in the Northern Kingdom by E about B.C. 740 and expanded somewhat before Ex (Deuteronomistic code) composed by D about B.C. 650, which D prefixed a second preface about forty years later, the Chres of Hosea, compiled by P about B.C. 500 or a little earlier, the priestly 'Book of Origins' written by P about B.C. 650, and various supplementary priestly notes added by various writers at later times. It should be noted that D added various notes throughout the Hexateuch. These notes assigned to these documents are those given by the Graf-Wellhausen school, to which the majority of scholars in all countries now belong. The Ewald-Dillmann school, represented by Strack, still holds that P is older than D. For details see Hexateuch.

Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings were also composed by one literary movement, and it is the follower of D, who wrote probably about 600. The work received a supplement by a kindred writer about 600. The sources from which the earlier has been drawn are the same as in the first two chapters of Kings, the J and E documents in Je 6 & a poem composed about B.C. 1100 is utilized. The editor interpolated his own passages and wrote his own editorial framework, but the sources may still be distinguished from these and from each other. A few additions have been made by a still later hand, but these are readily separated. In 1 K 3-11 a chronicle of the reign of Solomon and an old Temple record have been drawn upon, but they are interwoven with glosses and later legendary material. In the synchronous history (1 K 12-2 K 17) the principal sources are the 'Book of the Chronicle of the Kings of Israel' and the 'Book of the Chronicle of the Kings of Judah,' though various other writings have been drawn upon for the narratives of Elijah and Elisha. The concluding portion (2 K 18-25) is dependent also upon the Judcm Chronicle. In all parts of Kings the Deuteronomistic editor allows himself liberties. For details see art. on the Books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings.

Chroniclers, Ezra, and Nehemiah are all the result of a late literary movement, and can be identified with about B.C. 300. They were composed under the influence of the Levitical law. The history was re-told in Chronicles, in order to furnish the faithful with an expurgated edition of the history of Israel. The chief sources of the Chronicler were the earlier canonical books which are now found in our Bibles. Where he differs from them he is of doubtless his own invention. See Chronicles. A memoir of Ezra and one of Nehemiah were laid under contribution in the books which respectively contain them. Apart from these the Chronicler composed freely as his own source. In the account of the earlier books 1 Maccaus is a first-rate historical authority, having been composed by an author contemporary with the events described. The other books of the Hexateuch are generally regarded as of inferior value. For the events in which he was an actor he is a writer of the first importance. In the non-Israelitish sources Israel is mentioned only incidentally, but the information thus given is of primary importance. The Mishna and Talmud are compilations of traditions containing in some cases an historical kernel, but valuable for the light they throw upon Jewish life in the early Christian centuries.

2. Historical value of the earlier books. If the oldest source in the Pentateuch dates from the 9th cent., the question as to the value of the narratives concerning the patriarchal period is forced upon us. Can we account of that time be relied upon as history? The answer of most scholars of the present day is that in part they can, though in a different way from that which was formerly in use. A great many who would dissolve these narratives into solar and astral myths, but the majority of scholars, while making allowance for legendary and mythical elements, are confident that important elements of tribal history are revealed in the early books of the Bible.

The tenth chapter of Genesis contains a genealogical table in which nations are personified as men. Thus the sons of Ham were Cush (Nubia), Mizraim (Egypt), Put (East Africa), and Canaan. The sons of Shem were Elam, Assyr, Mesopotamia, Lud (a land of unknown situation, not Lydia), and Aram (the Arameans). If countries and peoples are here personified as men, the name may be of the same, elsewhere, and in the case of Isaac, Jacob, Esau, and the twelve sons of Jacob, we may be dealing not with individuals but with tribes. The marriages of individuals may represent the alliances or union of tribes. Viewed in this light, these narratives disclose to us the formation of the Semitic nation.

The traditions may, however, be classified in two ways: (1) as to origin, and (2) as to content. By classification as to origin see Fiat, W. T. viii. (1904), 658 ff.)
1. (a) Some traditions, such as those concerning kinship with non-Palestinian tribes, the deliverance from Egypt, and concerning Moses, were brought into Palestine from the desert. (b) Others, such as the traditions of Abraham's connexion with various shrines, and the stories of Jacob and his sons, were developed in the land of Canaan. (c) Still others were learned from the Canaanites. Thus we learn from an inscription of Thothmes III. about B.C. 1500 that Jacob-el was a place-name in Palestine. (See W. M. Müller, Asien und Europa, 462.) Israel, as will appear later, was a name of one of the tribes before they entered Canaan. In Genesis, Jacob and Israel are identified, probably because Israel had settled in the Jacob country. The latter name must have been learned from the Canaanites. Similarly, in the Didascalia Joseph, Joseph, Jacob, is a place-name. Genesis (49:8) tells how Joseph was divided into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh. Probably the latter are Israelites, and are so called because other narratives are devoted to commonwealths or to laws. (b) Narratives which reflect the traditions of the various shrines of Israel. The stories of Abraham at Bethel, Shechem, Hebron, and Bersheba come under this head. The Hebrews, whose legendary survival and memory of these have an etiological purpose; they explain the origin of some custom or the cause of some physical phenomenon. Thus Gn 18:19—the destruction of Sodom and the other cities of the plain—is a story which grew up to explain the origin of the city and its surrounding area. (c) Narratives which reflect the traditions of the migration of Israel. These traditions were evolved by the Canaanites, and probably by the Israelites, as a result of the formation of the Patriarchal narratives, parallels to which have been found in Babylonian and Assyrian literature. (See KIB vi.)

2. Classified according to their content, we have: (a) narratives which reflect the traditions of the various shrines of Israel. The stories of Abraham at Bethel, Shechem, Hebron, and Bersheba come under this head. (b) Narratives which reflect the traditions of the westward movement of a tribe or group of tribes from which the Hebrews were descended. Isaac is a shadowy figure confined mostly to the south, and possibly represents a south Palestinian clan, which was afterwards absorbed by the Israelites. Jacob-Israel (Jacob, as shown above, is of Canaanitish origin; Israel was the name of the confederate clans) represents the north. Israel itself, Israel is called an Aramean (Di 20), and the account of the marriage of Jacob (Gn 29—31) shows that Israel was kindred to the Arameans. We can now trace in the cuneiform literature the appearance and westward migration of the Arameans. According to this account, we find that the Arameans began to be mentioned in the Euphrates valley about B.C. 1800, and were moving westward for a little more than a century (see Paton, Syrio and Palestine, 103 ff.). The Israelites were a part of this Aramean migration.

The sons of Jacob are divided into four groups. Six—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun—are said to be the sons of Leah. Leah probably means 'wild cow' (Delitzsch, Prolegomena, 80; W. R. Smith, Kinship?, 254). This apparently means that these tribes were of near kin, and possessed as a common totem the 'wild cow' or 'bovine antelope.' The tribes of Manasseh, Ephraim, and Benjamin traced their descent from Rachel. Rachel means 'ewe,' and these tribes, though kindred to the other six, possessed a different totem. Judah was, in the period before the conquest, a far smaller tribe than afterwards, for, as will appear later, many of the Palestinian clans were absorbed into Judah. Benjamin is said to have been the youngest son of Jacob, born in Palestine a long time after the others. The name Benjamin means 'sons of the south,' or 'southerners'; the Benjamites are probably the 'southerners' of the tribe of Ephraim, and were gradually separated from that tribe after the conquest of Canaan. Four sons of Jacob—Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher—are said to be the sons of concubines. This honourable birth probably means that they joined the confederacy later than the other tribes. Since the tribe of Asher can be traced in the el-Amarna tablets in the region of their subsequent habitation (cf. Barton, Semitic Origins, 245 ff.), this tribe probably joined the confederacy after the conquest of Palestine. Perhaps the same is true of the other three.

3. The beginnings of Israel. The original name of the Jacob-Israel tribe was Benjamite, but perhaps the Rachel tribes did not join the confederacy until they had escaped from Egypt (see § 6). They may have been Absalom tribes, along with those absorbed in Edom—Edomites—the Ammonites, Ammonites, and Moabites—moved westward from the Euphrates along the eastern border of Palestine. The Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites were the old inhabitants of the territories after the conquest. The Israelites, as a result of their conquest, were forced to live in the territory occupied by them. The Israelites appeared to have been compelled to move on to the less fertile steppe to the south, between Bersheba and Egypt, roaming at will as far as Sina (cf. Gen. xlii, 28). The Hebrews, as a result of the conquest of Egypt, were expelled from the land of Canaan, and on this account it was called Mura, Egypt being Muur or Mursam (cf. Winckler, Hibbert Jour., 571 ff., and KAT144ff.). Because of this, Winckler held (KAT 248, ff.) that the Hebrews were not the original inhabitants of the territory, but that the story of the Egyptian oppression of the Hebrews and their exodus from that country; all this, he contends, arose from a later misunderstanding of the name Mura. But, as Buddle (Rel. of Isr. to the Brit. of El) has pointed out, the firm and constant tradition of the Egyptian bondage, running as it does through all four of the Pentateuchal documents and forming the background of all Israel's religious and prophetic consciousness, must have some historical content. We know from the Egyptian monuments that at different times Bedu from Asa entered the country on account of its fertility. The famous Hyksos kings and their people found access to the land of the Nile in this way. Probability, accordingly, strengthens the tradition that Hebrews so entered Egypt. Ex 11 states that they were compelled to aid in building the cities of Pithom and Raamses. Excavations have shown that these cities were founded by Ramses II. (B.C. 1292—1255; cf. Hogarth, Authority and Archaeology, 55). It has been customary, therefore, to regard Ramses as the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Menephtah (Menephta, B.C. 1225—1215) as the Pharaoh of the Exodus. This way has in recent years been met with an unexpected difficulty. In 1896 a stele was discovered in Egypt on which an inscription of Menephtah states that in his fifth year, mentions the Israelites as already in Palestine or the desert to the south of it, and as defeated there (cf. Breasted, Anc.
Records of Egypt, iii. 266 ff.). This inscription celebrates a campaign which Menephtah made into Palestine in his third year (cf. Breasted, op. cit. 272). On the surface, this inscription, which contains by far the oldest mention of Israel yet discovered in any literature, and the only mention in Egyptian, seems to favour Winckler's view. The subject cannot, however, be dismissed in so light a manner. The persistent historical tradition which all Hebrew religions continue to hold up to this day, is not an opinion deduced from some reason unable to move directly upon it from the south (Nu 13. 14), perhaps because the hostile Amalekites interposed, they made a circuit to the eastward. According to the traditions themselves, the tribes extended around the territories of Edom and Moab, so that they came upon the territory north of the Arnon, where an Amorite kingdom had previously been established, over which, in the city of Heshbon, Sihon ruled. See Amonytes.

8. The trans-Jordanic conquest.—The account of the conquest of the kingdom of Sihon is given by E with a few additions from J in Nu 21. No details are given, but it appears that in the battles Israel was victorious. We learn from the P document in Nu 32 that the conquered cities of this region were divided between the tribes of Reuben and Gad. Perhaps it was at this time that the tribe of Gad came into the confederacy. At least they appear in real history here for the first time. The genealogies represent Gad as the son of a Jo-amorite, while the river banks of clay means that the tribe joined the nation at a comparatively late period. Probably the Gadites came in from the desert at this period, and in union with the Reubenites won this territory, which extended from the Arnon to a point a little north of Heshbon. It is usually supposed that the territory of Reuben lay to the south of that of Gad, extending from the Arnon to Elealeh, north of Heshbon; but in reality each took certain cities in such a way that their territory was interpreted (Nu 329). Thus the Gadites had Dibon, Ataroth, and Aror to the south, Jazer north of Heshbon, and Bethnimrah and Beth-baran in the Jordan valley; while the Reubenites had Geshur and Maachah and Bashan, which extended from the Arnon to the valley of Jazer (Nu 329). Thus the Gadites had Dibon, Ataroth, and Aror to the south, Jazer north of Heshbon, and Bethnimrah and Beth-baran in the Jordan valley; while the Reubenites had Geshur and Maachah and Bashan, which extended from the Arnon to the valley of Jazer (Nu 329). Thus the Gadites had Dibon, Ataroth, and Aror to the south, Jazer north of Heshbon, and Bethnimrah and Beth-baran in the Jordan valley; while the Reubenites had Geshur and Maachah and Bashan, which extended from the Arnon to the valley of Jazer (Nu 329).

9. Crossing the Jordan.—The conquests of the tribe of Gad brought the Hebrews into the Jordan valley, but the wide valley was barren, and its banks of clay formed an insuperable obstacle to these primitive folk. The traditions tell of a miraculous stoppage of the waters. The Arabic historian Nuwairi tells of a land-slide of one of the clay hills that border the Jordan, which afforded an opportunity to the Arabs to complete a military bridge. The account of this was published with translation in the PEFSJ, 1895, p. 263 ff. The J writer would see in such an event, as he did in the action of the winds upon the waters of the Red Sea, the hand of Jehovah. The accounts of it in which the priests and the ark figure are of later origin. These stories explained the origin of a circle of sacred stones called Gilgal, which lay on the west of the Jordan, by the supposition that the priests had taken these stones from the bed of the river at the time of the crossing.

10. The conquest of Canaan.—The first point of attack after crossing the Jordan was Jericho. In Jos 6 J's account and E's account of the taking of Jericho are woven together (cf. the Oxford Hexateuch, or SBOT, ad. loc.). According to the J account, the Israelites attacked by surprise one day they took the city, as they made no attack, the besiegers were thrown off their guard, so that, when on the seventh day the Israelites made an attack at the end of their marching, they easily captured the town. As to the subsequent course of the conquest, the sources differ widely. The D and
P strata of the book of Joshua, which form the main portion of it, represent Joshua as gaining possession of the country in two great campaigns, and as dividing it among the tribes by lot. The J account of the conquest, however, which has been preserved in Jg 1 and Jos 8–10, 13. 17-18, 21 15-16, 20 162, 3. 17 174-18 190, while it represents Joshua as the leader of the whole tribe of Judah, the tribe is indicated as leading a decisive victory near Gibeon, declares that the tribes went up to win their territory singly, and that in the end their conquest was only partial. This representation is much older than the other, and is much later in accord with the subseral made slave of the Canaanites, cut the Israelite territory into three sections. One of these consisted of Dor, Megiddo, Taanach, Beth-shan, and Beth-horon; the Canaanites occupied the great plain of Jezreel, while, holding as they did Jerusalem, Ajalon, Har-heres (Beth-shemesh), and Gezer, they cut the tribe of Judah off from their northern kinsfolk. J further tells us distinctly that not all the Canaanites were driven out, but that the Canaanites and the Philistines, whom he says, Israel came to be included in the Canaanites. This latter statement is perhaps true for those Canaanites who held out in these fortresses, but reasons will begin later for believing that by intermarrying and gradual fusion between Canaanites and Israelites took place.

Reasons have been adduced (I 3) for believing that the tribe of Asher had been in the country from about s.c.1400 (The conquest probably occurred about 1200.) Probably they allied themselves with the other tribes when the latter entered Canaan. At what time the tribes of Naphtali and Dan joined the Hebrew federation we have no means of knowing. J tells us (Jg 19-, 2) that the Danites struggled for a foothold in the Shephelah, where they obtained but an insecure footing. As they afterwards migrated from the Shephelah as a place, this region was called the 'Camp of Dan' (Jg 13, 19), probably their hold was very insecure. We learn from Jg 15 that they possessed the town of Zareh, where Samson was afterwards born.

11. Period of the Judges.—During this period, which extended from about 1200 to about 1020 B.C., Israel became naturalized in the land, and amalgamated with the Canaanites. The chronology of the period as given in the Book of Judges is certainly too long. The Deuteronomistic editor, who is responsible for this chronology, probably reckoned forty years as the equivalent of a generation, and 1 K 6 gives us the key to his scheme. He made the time from the Exodus to the founding of the Temple twelve generations (cf. Moore, 'Judges' in ICC, p. xixii). The so-called 'Minor Judges'—Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jg 10. 4-12 19-28)—were not included in the editor's chronology. The statements concerning them were added by a later hand. As three of their names appear elsewhere as clan names (cf. Gn 46: 21, Nu 26: 11, Dt 24: 11), and as another is a city (Jos 21: 18), scholars are agreed that these were not real persons, but that they enter in the reference to the mistake of a late writer. Similarly, Shamgar (Jg 3: 19) was not a real judge. His name appears where it does because some later writer mistakenly inferred that the reference to him was to some other event, at which time was assumed to have allusion to an earlier judge (cf. Moore, JAOIS xix. 159 ff.). Some doubt attaches also to Othniel, who is elsewhere a younger brother of a Caleb.—The Calebites, a branch of the Edomite clan of the Kenaz (cf. Jg 11 with 39: 6, 9), which had settled in Southern Palestine, perhaps made such an invasion is known to have existed at this time. Furthermore, had such a king invaded Israel, his power would have been felt in the north and not in Judah. If there is any historical kernel in this, it probably was the Edomites who were the perpetrators of the invasion, and their name has become corrupted (cf. Paton, Syr. and Pat. 161). It is difficult, then, to see how Othniel should be judged a great leader, as he seems to have belonged to a kindred clan, but the whole matter may have been confused by oral transmission. Perhaps the narrative is a distorted reminiscence of the settlement in Southern Judah of the Edomites' clan of Caleb and Othniel.

The real judges were Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Eli, and Samuel. Samson was a kind of giant-hero, but he always fought single-handed; he was no leader of men or even of himself. The Philistines fought so well that they conquered him, as did the Canaanites. Judges was a period of great tribal restlessness. Others were trying to do what the Israelites had done, and gain a foothold in the country. Wave after wave of invaders broke over the land. Each coming from a different direction affected a different part of it, and in the part affected a patriot would arouse the Hebrews of the tribe invaded. Wave after wave of invaders was defeated, and the wealth which the tribes derived from the spoils of war gave him, made such a person the leader of tribes as the time. Thus the judges were in reality great leaders, who owed their office to personal prowess. Because of their character their countrymen brought to them their cause to adjust, and they had no authority except public opinion whereby to enforce it, however, as he seems to have belonged to a kindred clan, but the whole matter may have been confused by oral transmission. Perhaps the narrative is a distorted reminiscence of the settlement in Southern Judah of the Edomites' clan of Caleb and Othniel.

There were four real invasions from outside during this period of the judges: that of the Moabites, which called Ehud into prominence; that of the Midianites, which gave Gideon his opportunity; that of the Ammonites, from whom Jephthah delivered Gilgal; and that of the Philistines, against whom Samuel, Eli, Saul struggled, but who were not overcome until the reign of David. The first of these invasions affected the territories of Reuben and Gad on the east, and of Benjamin on the west of the Jordan. It probably occurred early in the period. The second invasion affected the country of Ephraim and Manasseh, and probably occurred about the middle of the period. Saul's son Abimelech endeavoured to establish a petty kingdom in Shechem after Gideon had run his successful career, but the attempt at kingship was premature (cf. Jg 9). The Ammonite invasion affected only Gilgal, while the Philistine invasion was later, more prolonged, and affected all of Central Palestine. These people came into Palestine from the outside (cf. Philistines), pushed the inhabitants of the Maritime Plain back upon the Israelites, made many attempts to conquer the hill-country, and by the end of the reign of Saul held the greater part of the Plain of Jezreel.

The struggles with these invaders gradually called into existence a national consciousness in Israel. It is clear from the song of Deborah that when that poem was written there was no sense of national unity. A dim sense of kingship held the tribes together, but this history of the period is that they make it clear that Saul's hold upon the tribe of Judah was not a very firm one at the time of Deborah's appeal (Jg. 5:4). While the tribe of Judah is not mentioned at all.

At the end of the period, the kingship of Saul, who responded to a call to help Jabesh, a Gileadite city, against a second invasion of Ammonites, is the expression of a developing national consciousness.

At some time during this period a part of the Danites moved to the foot of Mount Hermon, to the city which was afterwards to be called Dan (Jg. 17:18). During these years the process of amalgamation between the Israelites and the tribes previously inhabiting the land went steadily forward. Perhaps it occurred in the tribe of Judah on a larger scale than elsewhere. At all events, we can trace it there more clearly. The stories of Judah's marriage in Gilead may represent the mingling of its races with those of that tribe. The union in the Knessites and Calebites, like that of Judah, has already been noted. The Kenites also united with them (Jg. 11:21), as did also the Jerahmeelites (cf. 1S. 30:29 with 1Ch. 2). What went on in Judah occurred to some extent in all the tribes, though probably Judah excelled in this. Perhaps it was a larger admixture of foreign blood that gave Judah its sense of aloofness from the rest of Israel. Certain it is, however, that the great increase in strength which Israel experienced between the time of Deborah and the time of David cannot be accounted for in natural increase. There were signs in the religion of the Israelites which, notwithstanding the absorption of culture from the Canaanites, enabled Israel to rise in turn the Canaanites themselves. The religious and ethical aspects of the period will be considered in connection with the religion.

12. Reign of Saul.—There are two accounts of how Saul came to the kingship. The older account (1S. 10:1-15; 11:1-13) tells how Saul was led to Samuel in seeking some lost asses, how Samuel anointed him to be king, and how about a month later that the men of Jabesh-gilead, whose Amnonites were besieging, sent out messengers earnestly imploring aid. Saul, by means of a gory symbolism consonant with the habits of his age, summoned the Israelites to follow him to war. They responded, and by means of the army thus raised he defeated the Philistines, which is a result in itself of an act of Saul's. He was proclaimed king, apparently by acclamation. The later account (which consists of the parts of 1S. 8:12 not enumerated above) presents a picture which is so unnatural that it cannot be historical. Saul gained his kingdom, then, because of his success as a military leader. Probably at first his sovereignty was acknowledged only by the Rachel tribes and Gilead.

The story, upon hearing that Israel had a king, naturally endeavoured to crush him. Soon after his accession, therefore, Saul was compelled to repel an invasion, by which the Philistines had penetrated to Michmas, within ten miles of their capital. Saul was separated from Saul's by the deep gorge of Michmas. Owing to the daring and valour of Jonathan, a victory was gained for Israel which gave Saul for a time freedom from these enemies (cf. 1S. 13:14-15). Saul occupied this respite in an expedition against Israel's old-time enemies the Amalekites. Our account of this (1S. 15) comes from the later (E) source, and gives us, by way of explaining Saul's later insanity, the statement that he did not destroy the accursed Amalekites with all their belongings, but presumed to take some booty from them.

Soon, however, Saul was compelled once more to take up the fight against the Philistines, whom he fought with varying fortunes until they slew him in battle on Mount Gilboa. During the later years of Saul's life fits of insanity came upon him with increasing frequency. Thither he repaired in his extremity, and it was observed that Jehovah had abandoned him; thus his followers were gradually estranged from him. A large part of the space devoted to his reign by the sacred writers is occupied with the relations between Saul and the youthful David. These narratives are purely personal. The only light which they throw upon the political petty Aramaean State of Zobah was drawn into the war, and was compelled to pay tribute (89°). Damascus, where its inhabitants, as kinsfolk of the people of Zobah, tried to aid the latter, was finally made a tributary State also (88°), so that within a few years David built up a considerable empire. This territory he did not attempt to organize in a political way, but, according to the universal Oriental custom of his time, he ruled it through tributary native princes. To, king of Hamath, and Hiram, king of Tyre, sent embassies to welcome David into the brotherhood of kings. Thus Israel became united, and gained a recognized position among the nations.

This success was possible because at the moment Assyria and Egypt were both weak. In the former country the period of weakness which followed the reign of the great Tiglath-pileser 1. was at its height, while in the latter land the 21st dynasty, with its dual line of rulers at Thebes and Tanis, rendered the country powerless through internal disunion.

David upon his removal to Jerusalem organized his court upon a more extensive scale than Saul had ever done, and, according to Oriental custom, increased his harem. The early life of this monarch was often predisposed to sexual weakness, and David exhibited the frequent bent of his race. His sin with Bathsheba, and subsequent treachery to her husband Uriah, need not be re-told. The preparations for his son's kingdom and the management of that kingdom produced more dire political consequences. Absalom led a rebellion which drove the king from Jerusalem and nearly cost him his throne. David on the other hand, distrusted by his sons, took refuge at Mahanaim, the east Jordanic hinterland. Here David's conduct towards the rebellious son was such that, but for the fact that the relentless Joab disregarded the express commands of his royal master and put Absalom to death after his army had been defeated, it is doubtful whether Absalom would not have triumphed in the end. A smaller revolt grew out of this, but the reduction of Abel near Dan in the north finally restored David's authority throughout the land.

During the reign of David, though we do not know in what part of it, two misfortunes befell the country. The first of these was a famine for three successive years (2 21). The means taken to win back the favour of Jehovah, which it was supposed Israel had forfeited, so that He should give rain again, is an eloquent commentary on the barbarous nature of the age and the primitive character of its religious conceptions. The other event was a plague, which followed an attempt of David to take a census (ch. 24), and which the Israelites accordingly believed Jehovah had sent to punish the king for his sin.

The last days of David were rendered unquiet by the attempt of his son Adonijah to seize the crown (1 K 1). Having, however, fixed the succession upon Solomon, to the great joy of Bathsheba, David is said to have left to him as an inheritance the duty of taking vengeance upon Joab and Shimeon (1 K 25°).

To the reign of David subsequent generations looked as the golden age of Israel. Never again did the boundaries of a united Israelitish empire extend so far. These boundaries, magnified a little by fond imagination, became the ideal limits of the Promised Land. David himself, idealized by later ages, became the prototype of the Messiah. The reign of David is said to have lasted forty years. It probably extended from about B.C. 1017 to 977.

14. Reign of Solomon. — Probably upon the accession of Solomon, certainly during his reign, 89°. Damascus, Edom and Damascus, gained their independence (1 K 11:18). The remainder of the empire of David was held by Solomon until his death. Up to this time the Israelites had been a collection of rural people untouched by the splendour or the culture of the world outside. Simple shepherds and vine-dressers, they knew nothing of the splendours of Tyre or Babylon or Egypt, and had never possessed wealth enough to enjoy such splendours as they knew them. David had risen from the people, and to his death remained a simple man of his race. Solomon, born in the purple, determined to bring his kingdom into line with the great powers of the world. He accordingly consummated a marriage with the daughter of Pharaoh, probably one of the Pharaohs of the Tanite branch of the 21st dynasty. This marriage brought him into touch with the old civilization of Egypt. In order to ship his capital with public buildings suitable to the estate of such an empire, Solomon hired Phoenician architects, and constructed a palace for himself, one for the daughter of Pharaoh, and a Temple of such magnificence as the rustic huts of the dwellers in the desert. Later generations have overlaid the accounts of these, especially of the Temple, with many glosses, increasing the impression of their grandeur (cf. Ezr 25), but there is no evidence that in the way of luxury he far surpassed anything previously known in Israel. The whole pile was approached through a hypostyle hall built on Egyptian models, called the 'house of the forest of Lebanon,' while into the Temple were worked and brazen instruments were introduced, in flagrant violation of Israelitish traditions. Even a brazen altar of burnt-offering was substituted for the traditional altar of stone. Ornamental work and furniture such as thrones and the temple of Melkart at Tyre decorated not only the interior of the Temple, but the brazen instruments as well. These religious innovations were looked upon with distrust by many of Solomon's contemporaries (cf. 1 K 12°), and the buildings, although the boast of a later age, were regarded with mingled feelings by those who were compelled to pay the taxes by which they were erected.

Not only in buildings but also in his whole establishment did Solomon depart from the simple ways of his father. He not only married the daughters of many of the petty Palestinian kings who were his tributaries, but filled his harem with numerous foreign women. Laterally the statement that he had 700 wives and 300 concubines (1 K 11:1) is the exaggeration of a later writer, but, allowing for this, his harem must have been very numerous. The method of living was of course accord with the magnificent buildings which he had erected. To support this splendour the old system of taxation was inadequate, and a new method had to be devised. The whole country was divided into twelve districts, each of which was placed under the charge of a tax-gatherer, and compelled to furnish for the king's house the provision for one month in each year (1 K 4°). It is noteworthy that in this division the conditions rather than tribal territories were followed. Not only were the tribes unequal in numbers, but the territory of certain sections was much more productive than that of others. Solomon's taxes, in consequence, were placed in the most fertile sections of the land. Solomon is also said to have departed from the simple ways of his father by introducing horses and chariots for his use. The ass is the animal of the simple Palestinian. The ancient Hebrew always looked askance at a horse. It was an emblem of pride and luxury. In his eyes it was the instrument of war, not of peace. The introduction of this luxury further estranged many of Solomon's non-Jewish subjects. His wealth was increased by his commerce with South Arabia. He established a fleet of trading vessels on the Red Sea, manned with Phoenician sailors (1 K 9°).

Early in his reign Solomon obtained a reputation for wisdom. 'Wisdom' to the early Hebrew did not mean philosophy, but practical insight into human nature and skill in the management of people (cf. 1 K 3:18). It was this skill that enabled him to hold his kingdom intact in spite of his many innovations. It was this skill that in the later traditions made Solomon, for the Israelite, the typical wise man. Although we cannot longer ascribe to him either the Book of Proverbs or the Book of Ecclesiastes. His reputation for wisdom was no doubt deserved.

Solomon's reign is said to have continued forty years (1 K 11:40). If this be so, n.c. 977-937 is probably the period covered. Towards the close of Solomon's reign the tribe of Ephraim, which in the time of the Judges could hardly bear to allow another tribe to take precedence of it, became restless. Its leader was Jeroboam, a young Ephraimitic officer to whom Solomon had entrusted the administration of the affairs of the ten tribes (1 K 11:26). His plans for rebelling involved the fortification of his native city Zeredah, which called Solomon's attention to his plot, and he fled accordingly to Egypt, where he would naturally gain the sympathy of the second dynasty, with which Solomon had intermarried, had passed away, and the Libyan Shishak (Shoshonk), the founder of the 22nd dynasty, had ascended the throne in n.c. 945. He ruled a united Egypt, and entertained ambitions to renew Egypt's Asiatic empire. Shishak accordingly welcomed Jeroboam and offered him asylum, but was not prepared while Solomon lived to give him an army with which to carry out his plan.

15. Division of the kingdom.—Upon the death of Solomon, his son Rehoboam seems to have been proclaimed king in Judah without opposition, but as some doubt remains concerning the loyalty of the other tribes, of which Ephraim was leader, seems to have existed, Rehoboam went to Shechem to be anointed as king at their ancient shrine (1 K 12:1). Jeroboam, having been informed in his Egyptian retreat of the proceedings of affairs, returned to Shechem and prompted the elders of the tribes assembled there to exact from Rehoboam a promise that in case they accepted him as monarch he would relieve them of the heavy taxation which his father had imposed upon them. After considering the matter three days, Rehoboam rejected the advice of the older and wiser counsellors, and gave such an answer as one bred to the doctrine of the Divine right of kings would naturally give. The latter part of his reply was: "My little finger shall be thicker than your father's loins." As the result of this answer all the tribes except Judah and a portion of Benjamin refused to acknowledge the dynasty of David, and made Jeroboam their king. Judah remained faithful to the heir of her old hero, and, because Jerusalem was on the border of Benjamin, the Judean kings were able to retain a strip of the land of that tribe varying from time to time in width from four to eight miles. All else was lost to the Davidic dynasty.

The chief forces which produced this disruption were economic, but they were not the only forces. Religious conservatism also did its share. Solomon had in many ways contravened the religious customs of his nation. His brazen altar and brazen utensils for the Temple were not orthodox. Although he made no attempt to centralize the worship at his Temple (which was in reality his royal chapel), his disregard of sacred ritual had its effect, and Jeroboam made an appeal to religious conservatism when he said, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." Since we know the history only through the work of a propagandist of a later type of religion, the attitude of Jeroboam has long been misunderstood. He was not a religious innovator, but a religious conservative.

When the kingdom was divided, the tributary States of course gained their independence, and Israel's empire was at an end. The days of her political glory had been less than a century, and her empire passed away never to return. The nation, divided and its parts often warring with one another, could not easily become again a power of importance.

Jeroboam to Abijah (937-875).—After the division of the kingdom, the southern portion, consisting chiefly of the tribe of Judah, was known as the kingdom of Judah, while the northern division was known as the kingdom of Israel. Judah remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty as long as she maintained her independence, but in Israel frequent changes of dynasty occurred. Only one family furnished more than four monarchs. Toward the end of this period several failed to transmit the throne at all. The kings during the first period were:

Few of the details of the reign of Jeroboam have come down to us. He fortified Shechem (1 K 12:20), but Tirzah (which Klostermann regards as the same as Zeredah) was also a residence (1 K 14:1). Jeroboam extended his royal patronage to two sanctuaries, Dan and Bethel, the one at the northern and the other at the southern extremities of his territory. Naturally there were hostile relations between him and Judah as long as Jeroboam lived, and these may have been referred to in the fact that this attack of the Egyptian monarch did not drive them to peace.

Shishak's campaign seems to have been a mere plundering raid. It established no permanent Asiatic empire for Egypt. After this attack, Rehoboam, according to the Chronicler, strengthened the fortifications of his kingdom (2 Ch 11:1-4). According to this passage, his territory extended to Meshoshah (Tell Sandokainah) and Gath (Tell es-Safl?) in the Shephelah, and southward as far as Hebron. No mention is made of any town north of Jerusalem or in the Jordan valley.

The hostile relations between the two kingdoms were perpetuated after the death of Rehoboam, during the short reign of Abijam. In the early part of the reign of Asa, while Nadab was on the throne of Israel, active hostilities ceased sufficiently to allow the king of Israel to besiege the Philistine city of Gibeon, a town in the northern part of the Maritime Plain opposite the middle portion of the Israelitish territory. The Israelitish monarch felt strong enough to endeavour to extend his dominions by compelling these ancient enemies of his race to submit once more. During the siege of this town, Baasha, an ambitious man of the tribe of Issachar, conspired against Nadab, accomplished his assassination, and had himself crowned as king in his stead (1 K 15:25-26). Thus the dynasty of Jeroboam came to an end in the second generation.

Baasha upon his accession determined to push more vigorously the war with Judah. Entering into alliance with Benhadad I. of Damascus, he proceeded to fortify Ramah, five miles north of Jerusalem, as a base of operations against Judah. Asa in this crisis collected all the treasure that he could, sent it to Benhadad, and bought off, perhaps by giving him his alliance with Israel and to enter into one with Judah. Benhadad thereupon attacked some of the towns in north-eastern Galilee, and Baasha was compelled to desist from his Judaean campaign and defend his own borders. Asa took this opportunity to fortify Geba, about eight miles north-east of Jerusalem, and Mizpah, five miles to the north-west of it (1 K 16:31-32). The only other important event known to us consisted of the erection by Asa's mother of an ashabah made in a distastefully realistic form, which so shocked the sense of the time that Asa was compelled to remove it, for fuller discussion, below, II. § 1 (3).

During the reign of Elah an attempt was made once more to capture Gibbethon. The siege was being executed by an able general named Omri, while the weak king was enjoying himself at Tirzah, which had been the royal residence since the days of Jeroboam.
While the king was in a drunken brawl he was killed by Zimri, the commander of his chariots, who was then himself proclaimed king. Omri, however, upon hearing of this, desisted from his activity and solemnly swore to Zimri, and himself became king. Thus once more did the dynasty change. Omri proved one of the ablest rulers of the Northern Kingdom ever had.
The Bible is silent as to his tricks, but this information we derive from outside sources enables us to place him in proper perspective. His fame spread to Assyria, where, even after his dynasty had been overthrown, he was thought to be the son of a recent ancestor of Israel's kings (cf. 1 K 16:31). Omri, perceiving the splendid military possibilities of the hill of Samaria, chose that for his capital, fortified it, and made it one of his residences, thus introducing to activity. The rise of Omri's dynasty is connected with the activity of his son, Ahab. We also learn from the Moabite Stone that Omri conquered Moab, compelling the Moabites to pay tribute.
According to the Bible, this tribute was paid in wool
(1 K 22:47). This information, as in the case of Omri, evidences that both in military and in civil affairs Omri must be counted as the ablest ruler of the Northern Kingdom. Of the nature of the relations between Israel and Judah during his reign we have no hint.
Probabilly, however, peace prevailed, since we find the next two kings of these kingdoms in alliance.

The monarchs of this period were as follows:

Ahab died, his son Ahaziah became king, and Omri's dynasty passed through a brief period of turbulence. Ahaziah seems to have had the same religious and economic policy as his father, and to have extended the boundaries of the kingdom. When the son of Ahab was slain anarchy and civil war prevailed in Judah for a considerable time. It is not, however, certain that the kingdom was divided into two, but, it is probable that the supremacy passed to the house of Omri, who thus became the ruler of the Northern Kingdom.

With the reign of Ahab we come upon a new period in Israel's history. Economic and religious forces which had been slowly developing for centuries now matured for action and made the period one of remarkable activity. Movements began which were destined in their far-off consummation to differentiate the religion of Israel from the other religions of the world.

The new king Jezebel was a Tyrian princess. According to one school of criticism of the time, she was an Orontes princess, the granddaughter of the king of Tyre, and the Canaanite Baal, and that she was indigenous to the Near East, and that she had married her native deities, Melkart and Ashart of Tyre. These gods were kindred to Jahweh and the Canaanite Baals in that all had sprung from the same antique Semitic conception of divinity, and produced similar effects on the superstitious minds of the believers. The siege was raised and the conquest of Moab abandoned.

The chief event of the reign of Jehoram of Judah, Jehoshaphat's successor, was the loss of Edom, which regained its independence (2 K 8:21). His son Ahaziah, the son of Athaliah, and a nephew of Jehoram, the reigning king of Israel, went to aid his uncle in the siege of Ramoth-gilead, which was still in possession of the king of Damascus. Joram was wounded in battle, and the two monarchs returned to the royal residence at Jerusalem, but the wound was healing. Meanwhile the prophetic circles, in which the traditions of the simple worship of Jahweh were cherished, determined to overthrow the hated house of Ahab. Elijah encouraged Jehu, a lowly office employed in the service of Ramoth-gilead, to return to Jezreel and slay the king. This he did, killing not only the king of Israel, but also the king of Judah, and exterminating Jezreel and all her offspring. This done, Jehu started for Samaria. On the way he was joined by Jonadab, son of Riekah, who had founded a kind of order of zealots for the preservation of the simpler forms of Jahweh worship. Accompanied by Jonadab, he went to Samaria, called a solemn feast there, and delivered an oracle to assembled, massacred them all. Thus barbarous and unethical were the Jahweh reformers of this period (cf. 2 K. 10). In the very year that Jehu thus gained the throne there was no power to prevent him from slipping away. A queen-mother counted for something; she had held that position but for a year, and now it was gone. Athaliah inherited the spirit and the ruthless ness of Jezebel. Accordingly she seized the reins of government and put to death, as she thought, all the royal seed that could in any way dispute her sway. Thus it happened that a daughter of Jezebel sat on the throne of David. Here no doubt she exercised her political power without hindrance. Her reign was not a glorious or glorious victory, the reign of Jehu, though long, accomplished nothing. In Judah, when Ahaziah was put to death, Athaliah, the sister of Jezabel, seized the opportunity and put She also seized the opportunity of the absence of her father at Eliza by her own right of succession, and reigned in the Northern Kingdom. She was not a prophet to do, predicts, however, accomplished. One little prince, Joash, had been rescued when the slaughter of the princes occurred, and after he had been concealed six years, under the guidance of his godfather, the priest, he was proclaimed king. Athaliah was assassinated (2 K. 11). Joash enjoyed a long reign of forty years, during the early part of which he was under the guidance of the priest. During his reign the temple was repaired, and the boundaries of Israel were expanded. He was completely restored the territory over which they ruled, almost to the limits of the Davidic boundaries. Jeroboam in his long reign extended the boundaries of Israel northward to Hamath and Damascus, perhaps including in his empire Damascus itself (2 K. 15), while Uzziah, who had devoted his boundaries southward to the Red Sea, and reduced the Philistines cities more to the position of tributaries. With outposts in all these directions, and the sea, a vigorous and successful trade sprang up in this long era of peace. Freed from the necessity of continual warfare, the spirit of the nation gave itself with tremendous enthusiasm to the acquisition of material advantages. Neither earthquake nor tempest could dampen their ardour by misfortune. Wealth increased greatly, and palaces which to the simple Israelites seemed vast were reared on every hand. Every document of the time speaks of the erection of buildings or palaces. Wealth and luxury created a literary epoch, as a result of which, about 750, the E document was composed. Wealth, however, was not evenly distributed. The palaces were for a comparatively small minority. The poor, while they saw prosperity increasing around them, were daily becoming poorer. The economic conditions of the reign of Ahaz, which had called forth the denunciations of Isaiah, not only existed now in an exaggerated form, but were daily becoming worse. A moneyed class, distinct from the old shepherd and agricultural class, had been evolved. Capitalists then, as now, desired interest for their money. Lending it to the poor husbandman, they naturally felt justified in safeg his land if he was unable to repay. This social condition appeared to the conservative worshippers of Jahweh as in the highest degree obnoxious. Jahweh had never been the God of a commercial people. For one of His worshippers to exact usury from another was regarded as an offence against Him; to take from one of His faithful ones land given him by Jahweh in payment for debt, however just the debt, was in Jahweh's eyes unpardonable oppression of the poor.

These social conditions, thus viewed, called forth a new set of prophets,—men of a higher moral and spiritual order than any known before in Semitic history. Two of these, Amos and Hosea, belong altogether to this period, while Isaiah began his city-hating work when two-thirds of it had passed. Amos (wh. see), the earliest of them, came forward about 755 to denounce the social injustices of the Northern Kingdom and to pronounce Jerusalem, a change occurred in Assyria, Gush or Tgirath-pi-si-re, as he now called himself, seized the throne (a.c. 745), subsequently proving himself, both as a general and as a statesman, one of the world's great men. This monarch was, however, occupied until the year 742 in reducing the East to his sceptre. When he turned his attention to the West, the siege of Arpad occupied him for two years, so that before he interfered in Palest- inia's affairs, the crocodile of the Nile was dead (II Kings 23:3), and he had won the title of king of Assyria.

The chronology of the Northern Kingdom after the death of Jeroboam II is very confused. Many of the statements of the present Biblical text are manifestly incorrect. The statement given above is conjectural reconstruction resting partly on the Assyrian evidence.

After Zechiah, the son of Jeroboam, had reigned but six months, a conspiracy removed him and placed Shallum on the throne. With Zechiah the house of Jehu disappeared.

Uzziah, who in his old age had become a leper, and had associated his son Joatham with him on the throne, was compelled Uzziah to pay tribute we do not know, but Tgirath-pi-si-re records him among his tribute payers (KIB II. 20). Uzziah died in that year. The short, independent reign of Joatham seems to have been uneventful. Menahem died about 735; his son Pekahiah was never crowned, and took his brother, king in Samaria (2 K 15:19-27). In Judah, Joatham was succeeded in the same year by his youthful son Ahaz. Pekah and Rezin, who now sat on the throne of Damas- cus, desired to form a new confederacy to throw off Assyria's yoke. Into this they attempted to draw Ahaz, and when he declined to engage in the hopeless enterprise they threatened to make war jointly on Judah, depose Ahaz, and place a certain Tabeel, the king of Damascus. Upon the receipt of this news, confinement reigned in Jerusalem, but both king and people were reassured by the prophet Isaiah (Is 7). Pekah was given the throne of Damascus after a considerable siege (a town which his predecessors had at various times for more than a hundred years tried in vain to capture), made it an Assyrian colony, put Pekah the king of Israel to death (KIB II. 33), carried captive to Assyria the principal inhabitants of the territory north of the Plain of Jesreel (2 K 15:29), reduced territories to the west of the Jordan to the Assyrian crown, and imposed a heavy tribute upon him. Ahaz, upon the approach of Tgirath-pi-si-re, had renewed his allegiance; and after the capture of Damascus he went thither to do homage in person to the Assyrian monarch. Thus the whole of Israel passed irrevocably into Assyria's power. At Damascus, Ahaz saw an altar the form of which pleased him. He accordingly had a pattern of it brought to Jerusalem, and one like it constructed there. The brazen altar which Solomon had erected before the Temple was removed to one side and reserved for the king's own use. The new altar, established in its place, became the altar of ordinary priestly services. One would suppose that the Northern Kingdom now received such a chastisement that further revolt would not be thought of, and apparently it was not, so long as Tgirath-pi-si-re lived. That monarch passed away, however, in 727; and soon afterwards Hoshea, encouraged by the king of a country to the south, witheld his tribute. The Biblical text calls this king 'So, king of Egypt' (2 K 17:4), and it has been customary to identify him with Shabaka, the first king of the 26th dynasty. It now appears, however, that either he was a king of the Musti to the south of Palestine, or was some petty ruler of the Egyptian Delta, otherwise unknown, for Shabaka did not gain the throne of Egypt until 712 b.c. (cf. Breasted, Hist. of Egypt, 549 and 601). The folly of Hoshea's course was soon apparent. Shalmaneser IV, who had succeeded Tgirath-pi-si-re, sent an army which overran all the territory left to Hoshea, cut off his supplies, and then shut him up in Samaria in a memorable siege. The military genius of Omri had selected the site wisely, but with the country in ruins it is a marvel that Samaria resisted for three years. While the siege dragged on its weary length, Shalmaneser died, and Sargon II gained the Assyrian throne. Perhaps the generals who were prosecuting the siege did not know that the change till Samaria had fallen, but Sargon counts the reduction of Samaria as one of the achievements of his first year. When Samaria fell, Sargon deported 27,290 (cf. KIB II. 55) of the inhabitants of the region, including no doubt the more wealthy and influential families, who had lately captured in the far East, and brought to Samaria people from Othlah and Sippar in Babylonia, and from Hamath in Syria, to mingle with the mass of Hebrews already there (2 K 17:24). The Israelite monarchy he abolished.

The foreigners who were introduced into Samaria at this time worshipped at first their own gods, but when the lions attacked them, they petitioned to have a priest of Jahweh to teach them the worship of the God of the land. Sargon granted their request, and sent back a captive priest. In due time these foreigners intermarried with the Israelites who had been left, the cult of Babylon was merged in the Jahweh cult, and they became the Samaritans. Those who seek for the ‘ten lost tribes’ should remember that they were never lost by captivity. Only the merest percentage of them were wrenched from their land. ‘Ten tribes’ is a misnomer; the substratum of later populations, and a handful still survives in the Samaritans (wh. see).

19. Hezekiah and Isaiah.—The fall of Samaria made doldering the events, and the date of the accession of Hezekiah is not quite certain, but it probably occurred before the fall of Samaria. Throughout his reign the prophet Isaiah was one of his chief advisers, and for the most part he ruled in accord with the prophetic ideals. About the time of his accession, and apparently before the fall of Samaria, another prophet, Micah, began to prophesy in the town of Moresheth (Maresha) in the Shephelah on the Philistine border. His burden was concerned with that of the three great literary prophets who had preceded him.

Judah escaped when Samaria fell, because she maintained that submissive attitude to Assyria which she had shown when Uzziah rebelled against Tiglath-pileser. This attitude secured her peace for some years to come, though it was not an easy attitude to maintain. On Judah’s western border the petty kingdoms of Philistia were always plotting to throw off the Assyrian yoke, and endeavouring to secure the co-operation of Hezekiah. Such co-operation, however, Isaiah steadily opposed. In the year 711 Ashdod succeeded in being the first nation which she herself would gain her freedom, but Sargon sent an army which soon brought her to terms (Is 20:1). The course of political events went on smoothly therefore until after the fall of Samaria, and the number of those who had happened in Oriental countries, many subject lands endeavoured to gain their independence before the new monarch could consolidate his power. Hezekiah was tempted now, not by the Philistines only, but by the Merodach-Isaladon (Marduk-apal-idin), a Babylonian king whom Sargon had early in his reign driven from Babylon and who now sought the opportunity to return (2 K 20:19, Is 30:4). In this new coalition the Egyptians also, now under the stronger control of the 26th dynasty, had a part. Although Isaiah still consistently opposed the move, Hezekiah nevertheless yielded. In the city of Ekron there was one petty king faithful to Senacherrib—him from his subjects delivered, and delivered to Hezekiah, who cast him into a dungeon (cf. KIB ii. 93). This was a direct act of rebellion, which Sennacherib was sure to avenge. Affairs in the East delayed the blow, but in 701 it finally fell. Sennacherib marched into the West, defeated the allies at Eltekeh, besieged and took Ekron, impaled many of the rebellious inhabitants, and invaded Judah. Forty-six of the smaller towns were captured, and Jerusalem itself was invested. Its inhabitants were of course panic-stricken, but Isaiah came forward, declaring Jerusalem to be the home of Jahweh, and, as such, inviolable in His eyes (Is 31:1). Hezekiah, meantime recognizing that his rebellion had been a grievous error, sent to Lachish, Sennacherib’s headquarters, and offered to pay indemnity and tribute. Meantime Sennacherib had sent his main army on to inflict punishment upon Egypt, the strongest member of the alliance against him. On the border of Egypt his army was attacked withubulous plague (such seems to be the meaning of 2 K 19:20 combined with 2 Chron. ii. 141), which rendered further operations impossible; but in 701 it finally fell. Sennacherib was killed in battle before Ashdod, and the other kings of the region were now at liberty to accept Hezekiah’s terms, raised the siege of Jerusalem, and withdrew to Assyria.

This event had a profound influence on Israel’s religious history. In the time of David and Solomon, Jerusalem was a new town to the Israelites, and a town without religious associations. The real home of Jahweh was on Mount Sinai, but the land contained scores of shrines more dear to Him than Jerusalem, because He had led the Israelites to this place, and they had been there. The innovations had tended to increase this feeling, and although the lapse of three hundred years had given Jerusalem an important place among the shrines, especially as the capital of Judah, nothing had occurred until now to make men think that it was the home of Jahweh par excellence. Now He had palpably abandoned the shrines of the Northern Kingdom, and by this victory vindicated as His the way of the prophet. He had shown that He had chosen Jerusalem as His permanent abode. Thus this event introduced Jerusalem to that place in the reverence and affection of the Hebrews which has made it the Holy City of three great religions.

According to 2 K 18:13 (RP), Hezekiah attempted to abolish the country shrines and centralize the worship in Jerusalem. Some have doubted this statement, and others have thought that it is an interpolation. A document quoted in 2 K 18:18 seems in accord with historical probability that, prompted by Isaiah, Hezekiah should in his closing years have made such an effort. A generation later, Hosea had taken refuge to Tiglath-pileser.

to persuade their countrymen that it was a foreign cut.

This turn of affairs drove those who cherished the ideals of Isaiah into retirement, where, being able to do nothing else for the cause they loved, one of them, about 650, drew up the legal code of Deuteronomy as the expression of the conditions which the prophetic experience had found to be necessary to the realization of their ideal.

The brief reign of Josiah was but a continuation of the reign of his father.

21. Josiah and the Deuteronomic Reform.—Of the early part of the reign of Josiah, who ascended the throne as a boy of eight, we know little. Probably the customs which the previous reign had established were continued. In his thirteenth year, Jeremiah, a young priest from Anathoth, came forward as a prophet. In the next year the great Assyrian king Ashurbanipal died, and Assyria, whose power had been shattered by the Assyrians, which was in accord with her conception of the ideal religion of Jahveh, declared to it to be the genuine Law of Moses. When this was read to the king he was filled with consternation, since the current cult violated it in almost every particular. To test the genuineness of the Law, it was submitted to a cold proph- etes, Huldah, who, since it agreed with her conception of the king and all the strength of the prophetic order were needed to carry it through, and the struggle continued for a generation. It was this reform, however, that brought to the vision of the Jew a kingdom of God, which would not still be a distinct figure in the world.

This struggle for a better religion went on successfully for some years, when the little Judean State was over- taken by a bad misfortune.

Assyria was tottering to its fall. Babylon, which had regained its independence upon the death of Ashurbanipal, in 635, was rapidly growing in power. Egypt, which under the 20th dynasty now possessed once more a line of native kings, had a monarch, Necho II., ambitious to re-establish for her an Asiatic empire. In 609 or 608 Necho marched an army into Asia and moved northward along the Maritaine Plain. Josiah, probably because he determined to claim sovereignty over all the territory formerly occupied by Israel, marched northward with an army, fought Necho at the ancient battle-field of Megiddo, and met with a defeat and death (2 K 25:35). A greater calamity could scarcely have befallen the party of religious reform. Not only was their king fallen, but their hope of a prosperous Judean kingdom, faithful to Jahveh's new Law, was crushed to the ground. For them, and for the rest of the world, the day of triumph had passed. They now lived in the shadow of Babylonian power, and it was never to be shed. Babylonian power was put to the test to secure as much of the Euphrates valley and of the West as possible. Assyria had fallen at the hands of Indo-European hordes in the year 606. Necho was defeated and Nebuchadnezzar following closely upon his heels (Jer 46). Thus perished Necho's dreams of Asiatic empire, and thus Judah passed into vassalage to Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar, on the border of Egypt, ready to invade and conquer it, was informed of the death of his father in Babylon, and hastened home to secure his crown.

So important in the history of his people did Jer- emiah consider this crisis that at this time he first began to put the substance of his prophecies in writing, that they might have wider and more permanent influence (Jer 56). Nebuchadnezzar appears not to have been able to establish order in Western Asia at once, so distracted was the country. He established his head- quarters at Riblah, and for several years sent out bands of soldiers whither they were most needed. Nebuchadnezzar, out of the idea of punishing the son and the nation for the deeds of the father, witheld his tribute, and some of these bands, composed of men of neighboring tribes, were sent against him (2 K 24:12). Jeremiah continued obstinate, however, and Nebuchadnezzar finally sent against him a heavy force in 605. Before it arrived Jehoiakim was no more, and his young son Jehoiachin was occupying his throne. Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, which after three months was compelled to capitulate, whereupon the Babyl- onian took ten thousand of the most prominent men, princes, warriors, priests, and craftsmen, and transported them to Babylon. Another son of Josiah, who now took the name of Zedekiah, was placed upon the throne, the effect of course to be a Babylonian tribute. Zedekiah, a youth of twenty, was taken prisoner to Babylon, to languish in prison for many years. It was now to be seen whether Judah would repeat the history of the Northern Kingdom or whether her king would have wisdom to remain faithful to Babylon. Jeremiah, as he had done for years, steadily proclaimed that Judah's sole safety lay in fidelity to Babylon; such was the will of Jahveh. There was in Jerusalem, however, a strong party who advocated an alliance with Egypt as a means of securing freedom from Babylon. The king himself was weak and unwise. Finally, in 588, when Hophra, filled with ambitions for an Asiatic empire, ascended the Egyptian throne, he made such promises of aid to Judah that the standard of revolt was raised. Jeremiah, one of the greatest religious prophets that ever lived, did not, like Isaiah a century before, proclaim Jerusalem's inviolable rights and interests, and not to further into the heart of religious reform, and now declared that Jahveh would abandon Jerusalem, and establish an inner covenant of the heart with all who were faithful. His younger contemporary, Ezekiel, a young priest who had been carried to Babylon in 598, and had in 593 become a prophet there, was also teaching a similarly high conception of religion, and, with Jeremiah, preparing the faith of the people to survive the approaching shock. In 587 the Babylonian army appeared and the siege of Jerusalem began. The tedious suffering of its weary months may be traced in the Book of Jeremiah.
Early in 588, Hophna marshed an army into Palestine, and Nebuchadnezzar was obliged to raise the siege to send his full force against the Egyptian. Jerusalem was then whirl with joy, thinking deliverance had come. Jerelsh and his party were laughed to scorn. Had beseiged, the siege of Jerusalem renewed and pressed to completion. In August the city surrendered, its wall was broken down, its glorious Temple destroyed, another large body of captives transported, and the central city of Palestine, hither to being the birthplace of the Hebrews, was taken there too (2 K 25). Thus Jerusalem suffered the fate of Samaria. Providentially, however, before Jerusalem fell, the work of the prophets had so taken root, and such a body of people had been constituted, that the future of spiritual religion was assured. Those who had been deported were again the more prominent citizens. The poorer people and the peasantry were not disturbed. Gedaliah was made governor of Judea, and, because Jerusalem was desolate, Mizpeh, five miles to the north-west, was made the capital. Gedaliah had been in office but two months when he was assassinated, and this event so terrified some friends of Jeremiah, who had been permitted with the prophet to remain in Palestine, that they took Jeremiah, contrary to his advice, and fled to Egypt (2 K 25:25, and Jer 41:43).

23. The Exile.-Counting women and children, perhaps 100,000 Jews had been transported to Babylonia in the two deportations of Nebuchadnezzar. These, with the exception of a few political leaders, were settled in colonies, in which they were permitted to have houses of their own, follow their own trades, and engage in business (Jer 29:4 etc.). Ezekiel gives us the picture of one of these at Tel-abib (Ezek 33:20 etc.). In the -b, by the river Chebar (a canal near Nippur; cf. Buhl, J. of Ur III, Corpus Texts, ii. 28), in which the Palestinian organization of 'elders' was perpetuated. In such communities the Jews settled down in Babylonia. The poorer ones in Palestine kept up here they could not get维持ed, the two cities, and that the poorer were more intelligent of the religious devotees transported to Babylon cherished the laws of the past, and fed their framed, for a future which they were confident would come. Such an one was Ezekiel, who lived and wrote among the captives till about B.C. 570. After the destruction of the city he elaborated a new religious poetry for his nation, hoping that it would form the basis of Israel's organization when the time for the re-construction of the State came. Some years later another writer (P) wrote the 'Holiness Code' gathering up the traditions of the past, and shaping them with a view to a future religious ideal. Meanwhile many of the practically minded Jews had engaged in business in Babylonia and were acquiring wealth.

Thus time passed on, Nebuchadnezzar died, and his weak successors were rapidly following one another, when in the East a new political figure appeared. Cyrus, a petty king of Anshan, a small district of Elam, had conquered Persia, then Media and the Indo-European armies called in the inscriptions 'Manda,' and was pushing his arms westward to the subjugation of Creesus of Lydia. At this juncture one of the world's great poets and prophets appeared among the captives, and in whom eloquent and poetic strain taught them that Cyrus was the instrument of Jahweh, the God of heaven, that he was conquering for Jahweh and for them, and that it was Jahweh's will that they should return to rebuild Jerusalem and the desolations of Judah. The name of this prophet is lost, but his work now forms chs. 40-45 of the Book of Isaiah. The hope of this poet in Cyrus was justified, for in 588 Cyrus captured Babylon, overturning the Chaldean empire, and re-established the policy of transportation which Assyrians had used, and Babylonians alike had pursued from the time of Tiglath-pileser III. Cyrus himself tells in a cuneiform inscription (KIB III. 121*) that he permitted captive peoples to return to their lands and rebuild their temples. This gave the Jews the opportunity for which the Second Isaiah (so-called) had hoped. The prophet's faith in his own people was not so well justified. It was years before any considerable number of the captives made use of their new liberty, the siege of Jerusalem renewed and pressed to completion. In August the city surrendered, its wall was broken down, its glorious Temple destroyed, another large body of captives transported, and the central city of Palestine, hither to being the birthplace of the Hebrews, was taken there too (2 K 25). Thus Jerusalem suffered the fate of Samaria. Providentially, however, before Jerusalem fell, the work of the prophets had so taken root, and such a body of people had been constituted, that the future of spiritual religion was assured. Those who had been deported were again the more prominent citizens. The poorer people and the peasantry were not disturbed. Gedaliah was made governor of Judea, and, because Jerusalem was desolate, Mizpeh, five miles to the north-west, was made the capital. Gedaliah had been in office but two months when he was assassinated, and this event so terrified some friends of Jeremiah, who had been permitted with the prophet to remain in Palestine, that they took Jeremiah, contrary to his advice, and fled to Egypt (2 K 25:25, and Jer 41:43).

24. Reconstruction of the Jewish State.—We have been accustomed to suppose, on the authority of the Book of Ezra, that when Cyrus issued his permission to exiled Jews to return to their countries, only a few thousand of them, a large number at once went back. Recent investigation has, however, discounted this view. Haggai and Zechariah twenty years later know of no such return, and probably did not take place. Twenty years later we find Zerubbabel, a grandson of the unfortunate king Jehoshaphi, present in Jerusalem as governor, and a high priest named Joshua in charge of the worship. The altar of Jahweh had been rebuilt on the old site, but Jerusalem and the Temple were still in ruins. The tolerance of the Persians is shown in allowing the Jews a governor of their own royal family. He, with a small revenue from his office, he, and a few returned to Babylon, but we have no evidence that others had come back.

The Jewish population which had been left behind in Babylonia, which had engaged in business in Babylonia, and which had been acquired wealth, was engaged in the construction of the Temple. A prolonged famine led Haggai in the second year of Darius I. (B.C. 519) to persuade the people that the Temple was not yet rebuilt. Another prophet, Zechariah, took up the same burden, and under their leadership and inspiration the Temple was rebuilt by B.C. 516 on the lines of the old wall. Contributions to this enterprise had been received from their brethren in Babylonia. The first six years of the reign of Darius were troublesome times. The reign of the false Bardiya had made nations suspect that the government of Persia was weak, and it became necessary for Darius to reconquer his empire, as many of the subject nations took the opportunity to rebel. It is probable that Zerubbabel represents such a movement. Scholars now have no doubt that Zechariah regarded Zerubbabel as the Messiah, and expected him to be crowned and reign jointly with the high priest Joshua. Such is the meaning which underlies the text of Zec 3 (cf. H. P. Smith, OT History. 387 ff.). How these expectations were thwarted we can only guess. We know with what a strong arm the great Darius put down revolutions elsewhere, and certain it is that Jewish hopes for the return to their lands were not at this time realized.

Our knowledge of the next eighty years, till the arrival of Nehemiah, is derived from Is 56-66, large parts of which appear to come from this period, and from the anonymous poems called Malachi, which perhaps were written shortly before Nehemiah's return. The tone of these writings is one of depression and anarchy, both in civil and in religious affairs. Zerubbabel had been succeeded by a foreign governor (Mal 19), who probably had little sympathy with Jewish ideals. The Nabataeans had pushed the Edomites out of their old territory, and the latter had occupied southern Judea almost as far as Hebron. These migrations caused unrest and suffering in Judah. The Samaritans, who had appended themselves to the valley of Ajalon, held many of the approaches to the city. The Jewish colony occupied but a small territory about Jerusalem, and in their distress some, as in the days of Manasseh, were seeking relief in the revival of long-discarded superstitions. (Is 65:10). There were nevertheless some souls of noble faith whose utterances we still cherish among the treasures of our Scriptures. Thus passed the reigns of Darius and Xerxes. Somewhere, whether in Babylonia or Palestine we cannot tell, the priestly Grundschrift—the main body of the Priestly document—was compiled by Priest during this period, about a.c. 450.

Such was the state of affairs when in b.c. 444, Nehemiah, the noble young Jewish cup-bearer of Artaxerxes, arrived in Jerusalem with a commission from the king to rebuild the walls. The energy with which Nehemiah devoted himself to the erection of the walls, the opposition which he met upon the way from the Samaritans, who wished to share in the religious privileges of the Temple, but whom his narrow conceptions excluded, and the success which attended his efforts, are for critics and historians a matter of intense curiosity. Before the summer of 444 was over, Jerusalem had a wall as well as a Temple. Nehemiah remained for some years as governor, and then returned to Persia. He came back a second time to the government in b.c. 420, and continued in the office for a length of time which we cannot now trace. Perhaps it was until his death, but we do not know when this occurred. During Nehemiah's administration in Jerusalem the Jews were made to do away with all foreign marriages; with it, is stated, the aid of Ezra the scribe, he introduced the Pentateuch, so constructed that the Levitical law was its heart and core, and bound the people to observe its provisions (Neh 8:9); and he completely separated the true Jews from the Samaritans (Neh 13:16), thus thoroughly organizing the Jewish community in civil and religious activities. Nehemiah completed what Eschil had begun. The whole Levitical ritual was at this time established. The menial offices of the Temple were assigned to Levites, to whom also was committed the singing. This organization a hundred years later was so thoroughly fixed that the Chronicler could attribute it to David. Probably it was at the time of Nehemiah that the first book of the Psalter (Ps 3-41) was compiled. When Nehemiah as Governor of the Jewish State was promoted, but was transformed into the Jewish Church.

25. Late Persian and Early Greek Periods.—After the time of Nehemiah our sources fail us for a considerable period. Only one other glimpse of the Jewish colony do we afford us before the fall of the Persian empire, and this glimpse is a somewhat confused one. Josephus (Ant. xi. vii. 1) tells us that the Persian general Bagoas, whom he calls Bagoas, entered the Temple, and oppressed the Jews seven years, because the high priest John murdered his brother Joshua, a friend of Bagoas, for whom the latter had promised to obtain the high priesthood. Perhaps there was more underlying this than Josephus has stated. The surface does not at least, that the action of Bagoas was the result of an attempt on the part of the Jews to regain their independence.

Josephus (Ant. xi. viii. 3 f.) also tells a tale of the fidelity of the priests Jaddus to Darius III., while Alexander the Great was besieging Tyre. Alexander summoned the Jews to aid him, so the story runs, but on the ground of loyalty he was refused. Alexander, after the surrender of Gaza, marched personally to Jerusalem to take vengeance upon it. At his approach the Jews, clad in white, marched out to Scopus. The high priests, wearing their glorious robes of office, led the assemblage, and Alexander seeing them forget his wrath and saluted the high priest graciously.

This story is no doubt mere legend. Arrian, for example, declares that the rest of Palestine had submitted before the siege of Gaza. Jerusalem was to Alexander simply one Syrian town. It was out of his way, and probably was never visited by him. The one element of truth in the tale is that the high priest was the head of the Jewish community.

During the wars that followed the death of Alexander, Judea must often have suffered. In the struggles between the generals of Alexander, Antiochus of Seleucia and Demetrius were at various times in this region. In 312 a great battle was fought near Gaza, and the Jews must have had their share of the hardship and uncertainty which in the shock of empire during those years tried men's souls. Palestine finally fell however, to the lot of Ptolemy Lagi, who had secured Egypt, and for a century was subject to the Ptolemaic line. Seleucus regarded it as rightfully his, but on account of the help Ptolemy had given him when his fortunes were at a low ebb, he did nothing more than enter a verbal protest, though Sulpicius Severus says (Sac. Hist. ii. 17) that he exacted 500 talents in tribute from him. The war was thus transferred to a period of rivalry between the Kings of Syria and of Egypt, which ended in the Ptolemies being driven from the Egyptian throne by Antiochus on the death of Seleucus. The Jews were thus left to the impulse along with others. During this century large settlements were made by them in Egypt, and probably elsewhere (see Dispersion). In 220 Antiochus the Great invaded Palestine for the first time, and in 219 it reverted to Egypt again. Finally, in b.c. 199, he permanently attached it to Syria, and its fortunes were never subject to the Ptolemys again.

The chief contrivance of the Hellenistic power during this period was through the payment of taxes. At one period the Egyptian king became dissatisfied with the high priest's management of the finances and committed them to the care of one of his sons, who he hoped would, through the sons led for a generation or two spectacular careers (cf. Ant. xii. iv.). At times tribute had to be paid both to Syria and to Egypt.

During this period the head of the Jewish community was the high priest, assisted by a Sanhedrin or council. The religious life of the community can only be inferred from the literature. An intense devotion to the Law was begetten in the minds of the Jewish people, as is shown by such psalms as the 119th. But the life of the community was a varied one. The 'Wisdom' literature was cultivated, and many a passionate psalm attests that a deep religious life superior to all formalism was springing up (cf. e.g. Ps 61).}

26. The Maccabean Revolt.—For many years the Hellenic civilization, radiating from the many cities founded by the Macedonians found no welcome among the little Jewish community in Jerusalem. Gradually, however, it penetrated even there, and under the Syriacs certain high priests adopted Greek names, and, to court the favour of the Syrian kings, cultivated Hellenic practices. In Jerusalem, where there was a Syrian garrison, Greek culture became popular, gymnasia were established, and men went so far as to attempt to remove artificial the signs of circumcision. The country towns were more conservative, but possibly even here the movement would have made its way had not Antiochus IV. determined to force upon the Jews both Greek culture and religion. One curious feature of this period consists in the fact that many have found in the story of the Maccabees, written by Josephus, the tale of Hellenization and Hellenism as described by Strabo (G. G. xxi. 3). The story of the Maccabees, written by Josephus, is not entirely without historical foundation. In b.c. 168, Antiochus commanded altars to Zeus to be erected throughout the land, and especially in the Temple at Jerusalem. He also directed swine to be offered in sacrifice upon them. The fear of Syrian arms secured wide-spread obedience to this decree. In the little town of Modin, however, an old priest, Mattathias, struck down the officiating priest and raised the standard of revolt. The faithful soon rallied to
At yearly death. Accordingly, 104-79 the A Here whom possession should joy. and the pileser was treacherously lured short throne. Alesander this before force, this than, the national religious struggle of made free-booter. was much, and Jonathan made independent. It was held in independence. Then at this Demetrius in, the next king of Syria, sent to Judea. This victory was long celebrated in a yearly festival. Judas himself fell before the end of the year 161 In a battle with the force which Demetrius sent to avenge the death of Nicanor.

The direction of the Jewish cause then fell to Jonathan, one of the brothers of Judas, who for nearly twenty years was the leader (161-143). At the beginning of this period the Maccabean fortunes were at their lowest ebbon. At first Jonathan thought of yielding refuge with the Nabataeans, but here he was treacherously treated and his brother John was slain. He himself, with a considerable force, was caught near the Jordan by the Syrians, and escaped only by swimming the river to the western side. Here Jonathan man-tained himself for some years as an outlaw in the wilderness of Judaea. After many unsuccessful efforts to capture him, the Syrians finally (n.c. 150) entered into a treaty with him whereby he was permitted to live at Michmash as a kind of licensed free-booter. Here, like David in his outlaw days, he ruled over such as came to him. A little later Alexander Balas appeared in the field as a contestant for the Syrian crown. This proved a great help to the Maccabaeans, and, as both parties were willing to bid high for the support of Jonathan, Jonathan for a time adhered to the cause of Alexander, who killed Demetrius I. and secured the crown. But although Alexander had driven Demetrius I. from the field, he was left but a short time in undisputed possession of the Syrian throne. Demetrius II. appeared, and bid high for his favour. He recognized Jonathan as high priest, and exempted the Jews from various taxes. This angered the adherents of Alexander, one of whom lured Jonathan to Ptolemais for a conference and treacherously put him to death. Another brother, Simon (143-136), then assumed the leadership. The star of Alexander Balas went down, and Demetrius II. made a treaty which once more recognized the independence of the Jews. This event created the wildest joy. Never since Uzziah had paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III. in n.c. 737, unless it was for a few years in the reign of Josiah, had the Jews been politically free. It seemed like a new birth of the nation, and it stimulated the national genius and devotion in all directions. Many psalms were written at this period, and the whole civil and religious polity of the nation were reorganized. Simon was made both political head of the nation and high priest, but as high priest he was ordained by the Jews that he should continue in his house for ever, or until a faithful prophet should arise (1 Mac 14:8). Simon spent his energies in the following years in organizing his government and consolidating his territory. He was successful in taking possession of Gezer, where he built a large city, recently excavated; also Joppa, which he made his port, and on the other side of the country, Jericho. At the latter place he was assassinated in n.c. 135 by his son-in-law, who hoped to seize the government.

27. The Hasmonaean Dynasty.—The chronology follows:

- John Hyrcanus I. 135-105
- Aristobulus I. 105-104
- Alexander Jannaeus. 104-79
- Alexander. 79-69
- John Hyrcanus II. 69-33
- Aristobulus II. 33

During the early years of Hyrcanus I. the vigorous Antiochus VII. (Sidedes), who had gained the Syrian crown, pressed him so hard that the struggle for independence not only had to be renewed, but seemed for a time to waver in the balance. Weaker hands, however, soon came into possession of the Syrian sceptre and Hyrcanus, his independence secure, set about consolidating the power of Judea. He conquered the Edomites, who had centuries before been pushed up into southern Judah, and compelled them to accept Judaism. Later he conquered Samaria and lower Galilee, treating the latter country as he had treated Edom (cf. Jos. Ant. xiii. 2). During the reign of Hyrcanus the Pharisees and Sadducees began to emerge into well-defined and opposing parties. The former were developed out of the Chaoster of the earlier time. They desired separation and exclusion from foreign influence, in order that they might devote themselves to the keeping of the Law. The Sadducees, on the other hand, consisted largely of the old priestly families, whose wealth and influence did not make them anxious for the deviation of the Pharisees. Hyrcanus threw in his lot with the latter.

Aristobulus I., upon his accession, assumed the title of king (Ant. xiii. xi. 1)—a step which still further estranged the Pharisees. He was a man of cruel and suspicious disposition, who imprisoned his brother and treated his subjects roughly. He conquered and subdued in the one year of his reign 'upper Galilee,' by which it is supposed Jrrus is meant.

Upon his death his widow, Alexandra, released her brother-in-law, Alexander Jannaeus, from prison and offered him her hand and the throne, both of which he accepted. In his long and chequered reign he not only put down rebellion on the part of his turbulent subjects, but conquered and subdued old Israelite territory across the Jordan, so that under him the little Jewish community spread, by conquest and forcible conversion, from the narrow limits of the days of Nehemiah to practically the limits of the territory of ancient Israel. Thus the foundations of the NT distribution of the Jewish people were laid by the Hasmonaean kings. On the whole the reign of Alexander the opposition of the Pharisees to the dynasty and its policy was exceedingly bitter. As his end approached, Alexander committed the government to Alexandra, advising her to make her peace with the Pharisees (Ant. xiii. x. 5). This she did, and for the next ten years the internal affairs of the kingdom were more pacific. Alexandra made her son, John Hyrcanus II., high priest. Upon her death she left the civil authority to Aristobulus II., the younger of her two sons (Ant. xiii. xvi. 1). This division of the two offices, which had been united from Simon to Alexandra, proved a fatal mistake. Each brother desired the offices of the other, and a civil war followed. This dragged itself on for several years. Aristobulus was more popular with the soldiery, and in a short time had defeated Hyrcanus and assumed the throne. The contemptible Hyrcanus would probably have been quietly relegated to private life had not an extraordinary man, Antipater, an Idumaean, appeared. He attached himself to Hyrcanus, and persuaded the latter to flee to Haretsheth m. (Aretas), king of the Nabataeans, who upon the promise that the cities which Alexander Jannaeus had taken should be restored to him, furnished an army for the prosecution of the civil war. The advantage seems to have been with Hyrcanus, when in the year 65, Scaurus, the representative of the Roman general Pompey, appeared in Damascus, and both brothers appealed to him. The interference of Scaurus gave Hyrcanus some advantage, but settled nothing, so that when in 64–63, Pompey himself appeared, both brothers were in his camp. These Roman commanders, however, preferred to commit the government to one whose ability had already been proved; they accordingly made Herod king and he returned to win his kingdom. Naturally Herod could do little until Antony, who was leading an expedition against the Parthians, could allow him troops with which to fight, but with aid so furnished he finally expelled Antigonus and became king of the Jews in fact as well as in name in B.C. 37.

29. Herod and his successors.—The reign of Herod (wh. see) was marked at first by a period of difficulty. His master, Antony, was the slave of the Egyptian Cleopatra, and Herod had not only the ordinary difficulty of a ruler of the Jews to contend with, but the caprices of Cleopatra as well. After the battle of Actium he won the favour of Augustus, who became the master of the whole Roman world, and a period of prosperity set in. Herod had a passion for building, and knew how to squeeze money out of his subjects for his purposes. He therefore built many cities, adorning them with the beauties of Greek architecture. He also built many temples. His rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem, for instance, perhaps, was one of these undertakings, but it is only one of many. The taxes necessary for his various enterprises fell heavily upon his subjects, and rendered them wretched and desperate. His domestic policy was to trade, though he had no disposition to the cause of this. During his reign Hellenism made new inroads into Judaea, and Pharisaism became consolidated in the celebrated schools of Hillel and Shammai.

When Herod died (B.C. 4), Augustus divided his dominions among his sons, Archelaus receiving Judaea and Samaria; Antipas, Galilee and Perea; and Philip, in name at least, Trachonitis. Antipas held his territory till A.D. 39, and was the ruler of Galilee in the time of Christ, but Archelaus proved such a bad ruler that in A.D. 6 Augustus removed him, banishing him to Gaul (Jos. B.J. ii. vii. 3). Judaea was then placed under procurators as a part of the province of Syria. The fifth of these procurators was Pontius Pilate, under whom Christ was crucified.

Once more (A.D. 41–44) all the dominions of Herod were united under Herod Agrippa I., a grandson of Herod the Great. Agrippa I. was a friend of the Emperor Caligula, who gave him this position, but his rule was brief. Upon his death the country passed once more under direct Roman rule through procurators.

30. Last political struggles.—From the time that Pompey conquered Jerusalem many Jews had entertained hopes of national independence. Some thought that the tables might be turned, and Jerusalem might replace Rome as the mistress of the world. Gradually these feelings pervaded most of the population, and became more intense. Finally, in A.D. 66, they took shape in open rebellion. The Roman general Vespasian was sent to put down the revolution, and had reduced Galilee and the outlying cities of Judaea when he heard of the death of Nero, and withdrew to Egypt to await events. During 69 Vespasian was fighting for the empire, which he finally won; but the Jews, instead of strengthening themselves for the coming conflict, were consuming one another by civil war. Finally, in A.D. 70, Titus appeared before Jerusalem with a Roman army, and after one of the most terrible sieges in its history, which Josephus fully describes (B.J. v. ii. ff.), it was once more devastated. The Temple was ruined, its sacred furniture taken to Rome, where the candlestick may still be seen carved on the Arch of Titus, the wall of the city broken down, and the whole site laid waste. The services of the Jewish Temple then ceased for ever.

The tenth Roman legion was left in charge of the spot, and camped here for many years. A small garrison of the Jews who had captured the fortress of Masada, on the shore of the Dead Sea, held out for three years longer, but was finally captured (Jos. 21st cent.).

After this terrible calamity the Jews were politically quiet for many years. The Sanhedrin removed from Jerusalem to Jabneh (Jamaa), a town in the Philistine plain south of Joppa, where in later years its sessions became famous for the discussions of Rabbis, Abba and others concerning Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs and other interesting questions.

In A.D. 118, under the Emperor Trajan, Jews in Cyprus and the East-Mediterranean lands raised a revolt, but it accomplished nothing. Hadrian, a ruler of just and tolerant spirit, is said to have granted permission for the rebuilding of the Temple, when the slanderers of the Samaritans caused the session of the Sanhedrin to be broken up and forced national resettlement. In 132 a new Jewish leader, called Bar Cochba, or 'Son of the Star,' appeared and led a new and stubborn revolution. This precipitated a bloody war. After the defeat of the main force a body of troops fortified themselves at Bether (mod. Bittir), where they held out till 133. Hadrian was so exasperated that he determined to erase the name of Jerusalem from the map. A Roman colony, called Elia Capitolia, was accordingly founded on the site of Jerusalem, from which all Jews were banished, and a temple to Jupiter was erected on the site of the Temple of Jehovah.

In Hamilcar was the last expression of Israel's national aspirations. In the centuries which have elapsed since, the Jews have been scattered in many countries. Often persecuted, he has in persecution cherished Messianic expectations. He has maintained his national identity without land or national government, content to stand as the representative of a religious idea once embodied in a glorious national life.

II. The Pre-Jahwist Religion of Israel.

—The history of the religion of Israel is the history of the religion of Jehovah. The religion of Jehovah was, however, introduced at a definite time in Israel's history, and has been developed as practiced by the next two centuries, many features which are identical with those of other Semitic religions. Several of these can be proved to have had their origin in very primitive conditions common to all the Semites, from which the Israelites had in a good degree emerged before the worship of Jehovah was introduced. It will aid to clearness of thought to note at the beginning what those features were which the Hebrews brought to the religion of Jehovah from their common Semitic and Semetic inheritance.

(1) In this early religion totemism prevailed. In Comparative Religion the term 'totemism' denotes the idea that a natural object—usually an animal—is kindled in blood to the worshipper. Such animals are held in great veneration; often they are regarded as specially related to the god of the tribe, and are then worshipped as the representatives of the deity. Traces of such a conception among the ancestors of the Israelites are found in the fact that the name Leah means 'wild cow'; Rachel, 'ewe'; Simeon, a kind of 'wolf' or 'hyena'; Caleb, 'a dog.' Confirmation of this view is found in the food taboos of the Israelites. Certain animals were 'clean.' and others 'unclean.' The latter class was in early times indistinguishable from 'holy' animals (Smith, RS 425 ff.). For further proof of totemism, see Barton, Semitic Origins, 34 ff., and the references there given.

(2) Another conception common to the primitive Hamite and Semite was the idea that deity manifested itself especially in the processes of reproduction, and that therefore the organs of reproduction were sacred. That this was true of these people generally is abundantly proved (cf. Barton, ch. iii.). One direct evidence that it survived in Israel is the fact that when in early times one swore by Jehovah he put his hand under the thigh (Gn 24:1), as one now puts it on the Bible.

(3) The 'pillar' (mazzebah) was a sacred symbol in the worship of Jehovah down to the reform of Josiah (cf. Gn 28:17, Hos 9:4; De 7:2). This object was not peculiar to the Israelites, but is found in all Semitic countries. The 'pillar' was at first a representation of a phallus (cf. Barton, 102), and no doubt, as such, came to be the symbol of deity. The Egyptian obelisks are but more conventionalized 'pillars.'

With the 'pillar' must be placed the asherah. This object was among the Hebrews at times a wooden post, but usually consisted of more than one. There is some reason for supposing that the asherah was not complete until there was carved in it a rude doorway, symbolic of the physical doorway of life, in which a figure of a goddess stood (cf. Ohmacht-Richter, Kypros, p. 165 ff., Plates 17, 18, 20, 50, 82; also 1 Ki 15:1). If further true, the pillar and the asherah together represented at every sanctuary the male and female organs of reproduction (cf. Whatham, Amer. Jour. of Race Psychology, 1, 25 ff.).

Ash'eroth stood by the altar of Jehovah down to the Deuteronomic reform (2 K 23:2). These symbols, then, were survivals from the pre-Jahwistic religion of Israel, and their existence proves that the conception of deity over which they are the expression formed a part of that early religion also. Cf. anti Semana.

(4) Circumcision is also an institution which the Hebrews inherited from their Semitic ancestry. It can no longer be regarded as a peculiarly Hebrew institution, for it was practised by both Hamites and Semites (Barton, 98–117), and is pictured on an Egyptian monument earlier than the 1st dynasty (Bull. de cor. hellénique, 1892, p. 307 ff., and pl. 1). Circumcision, like many other ideas and practices, underwent various interpretations at different periods; but its origin is clearly connected with that native conception of the connectedness of the reproductive organs with the Divine which characterized all the Semites (cf. Whatham, 'Origin of Circumcision,' i. 501 ff.).

The practice of circumcision among the Israelites is another proof that their conception of deity was in every time closely connected with the Hebrews conceptions of the world.

(5) From the pre-Jahwistic period came also the idea that spirits or numina dwelt in certain natural objects, such as trees, stones, and springs. This conception belonged to the primitive Semites, by whom it was held in common with primitive peoples generally (cf. RS 132, 167–183, 185–195; Sem. Or., 82 ff., 87–97). Sacred trees existed in many parts of Palestine. There was Abraham's oak of Mamre near Hebron (Gn 13:18), at Shechem they kept a locust tree (Jos 8:33), at Ophrah another (Jg 6:13), and at many other places they were found, and indeed they are still found in Palestine at the present day (cf. Curries, Prim. Sem. Rel. To-day, 91 ff.; Barton, A Year's Wanderings in Bible Lands, 162, 163, and Biblical World, xxiv. 170, 174).

Wells were also sacred. The fountain at Kadesh was called En-mishpat (Gn 14:12), or the 'spring of judgment,' no doubt because oracular decisions were obtained there. The well of Lahali-roi (Gn 16:14) had a story to account for its sacredness, as also the wells at Beer-sheba (Gn 21v22), which were evidently sacred. En-rogel (modern Job's Well) was so sacred that Adonijah held a sacrifice by it (1 K 14:17), while Solomon was anointed at Gihon (modern Virgin's Fountain) for the same reason.

A sacred circle of stones called Gilgal existed on the west of the Jordan (Jos 4:19). This sacred stone-circle, like many which exist still on the east of the Jordan (cf. Barton, A Year's Wanderings, 143, and Biblical World, xxiv. 177), was no doubt of pre-historic origin.

In the pre-Jahwistic religion, then, such numina were worshipped by the Hebrews under the name of 'pillars.'

(6) Another feature of this early religion was sacrifice. In later times sacrifice was regarded mainly as a gift of food to the deity (cf. Ps 50), and probably in early times this idea entered into it. The late W. J. Smith thought that the chief feature of primitive sacrifice was communion, i.e. that a communal feast, in which the god and the worshipper partook of the same food, and their kinship was consequently renewed, was its chief feature (ASV, vi.-xi.). Whether this was its sole feature or not, there can be no doubt that the sacrificial feast formed an important part of primitive sacrifice, and of sacrifice among the early Hebrews (cf. Ex 24:18). Curtiss believes that the origin of the pillar of cloud in its role as a guiding light for the Israelites was in the time of the plague of leopards and was probably connected with an ancient midrashic account of the death of the earth-godess’s son, i.e. the death of vegetation. Whatever the meanings attached to it (and in the long developments of pre-historic time they may have been many), sacrifice both of human beings and of animals was practised by the primitive Semites, and was perpetuated by the Hebrews into the OT period. Traces of human sacrifice were found by Mr. Macalister during the excavation at Gezer (cf. PEFSI, 1903, pp. 53 ff., 121, 306 ff.). The story of the sacrifice of Isaac (ASV 22:3) is an attempt to justify the discontinuance of the sacrifice of the human firstborn, and to substitute a ram for it. It is really the story of Isaac’s deliverance, not of his sacrifice. Its presence in the OT proves that in early times Judaism, in common with other Semites, practised human sacrifice.

(7) Probably the ‘ban’ (dāhām), by which even before a battle all the population of the enemies’ country and their livestock were doomed to destruction as a consequence of a covenant obligation to Jahweh, is another survival from primitive times. Many examples of it are found in the OT (cf. Nu 21:21, Jos 6:4, 1 S 15:3). It seems to have been the custom of the Moabites, for Moabite says (Moabite Stone, 1. 11 f.): ‘I killed all the people of the city—a pleasing sacrifice to Chemosh.’ So barbarous a custom was no doubt primitive.

(8) Abraham’s custom perpetuated by the Israelites from pre-Jahwistic times was the law of blood revenge, by which it became a religious duty, when one was injured, to inflict a like injury, and if the blood of one’s kinsman was shed, to shed the blood of those who had committed the deed. This idea not only meets us frequently in the OT (Gen 41:22, Ex 21:29), but is also found often in the Code of Hammurabi, a.c. 2100 §§ 127, 195-197, 200, 202, 210, 210, 222, 220, 231), and among the Arabs to-day (cf. e.g. Zwemer, Arabās, 155, 265). It is clearly one of the religious points of view which have come out of the primitive Semitic past.

(9) The Passover, or spring leaping festival, so called, probably because the young were then gambolling about, is another institution which, as is now generally recognized, the Israelites brought with them from their remote Semitic past (cf. RSV 1000 ff., 464; Sem, Or, 108 ff.; Kautzsch, in Hastings’ DB, Ext. Vol. 621 ff.; Schmidt, Prophet of Nazareth, 62). It is one of the survivals of the early Semitic worship of deity as the giver of animal life. And, like the ‘pillar’ and uṣārāh, is an evidence of the sacred nature of reproduction among the ancestors of the Hebrews. It underwent in later times a different interpretation at their hands (cf. Ex 12), but it is certain that this explanation does not account for its origin.

(10) It is probable that an autumn festival, which in primitive Semitic times was connected with the date harvest, and in the OT period was known as the Feast of Tabernacles, was brought by the Israelites into Jahweh-worship from their primitive life. This is not universally recognized as in the case of the Passover, but has been practically proved by Barton (Sem, OR, 111-115). In connexion with this festival probably in primitive times the waving of the warkas occurred, and also the ceremonies which accompanied the Feast and resurrection of vegetation. This waving was in the late Hebrew ritual interpreted as mourning for sin on the Day of Atonement (cf. RSV 411; Sem, Or, 289 ft.). Similarly after the settlement in Canaan it was regarded as the feast of the grape harvest instead of the date harvest.

(11) We can hardly say that the Hebrews were believers in pokethel before the covenant with Jahweh, but certainly they were not monothists. Probably each tribe had its god. One of these, the god of the tribe Gad, has survived in the OT with a specialized function (Is 60:4). These tribal deities received the special homage of their respective clans, but no doubt when men wandered into the region of other local numina they prostrated these also. Such a condition, where tribes worship one deity but do not recognize the reality of other deities, is called by some scholars ‘henotheism.’

2. The covenant with Jahweh.—The historical circumstances under which Jahweh became the God of Israel have been sketched above (1. 6).

(1) Those circumstances certainly suggest that Jahweh was the god of the Kenites before He was the God of Israel. This view, first suggested by Gilliland also independently by Fele, more fully urged by Stade, fully worked out by Buddé, is now accepted by Curtiss, Wideoer, H. F. Smith, Barton, and W. R. Harper. The reasons for it are: (a) Of the three documents which narrate the Exodus, Ex and P tell of a new introduction of Jahweh as a new god. Each religion a new name usually means a new deity. E, on whom Philo was dependent in this part of his narrative, was an Ephrathite, who preserved the traditions of the Ephraimites. (b) The account of the institution of the covenant (Gn 18:10) makes it clear that Yahweh offers the sacrifice. He really initiates the Hebrews into the worship of Jahweh. This is confirmed by the underlying manner of all the documents which contain data (Num, Deut, the Kenites were a branch of the Midianites) that Moses first learned of Jahweh. (c) For centuries before this final Sinai was regarded (Bretz, Moabite Stone, 1. 11 f.) as ‘the place where he marched forth to give victory to His people’ (Jg 5:12), De 33, Hab 3, Ps 69:8). Elijah also made a pilgrimage to Horeb to seek Jahweh in His holy mountain. (d) The Kenites during several succeeding centuries were the champions of the pure worship of Jahweh. Joel killed Sisera (Jg 9:5). The Rechabites, who from Jehu to Jeremiah (2 K 105, Jer 35) championed Jahweh, were Kenites (1 Ch 20). (e) Some of the Kenites joined Israel in her migrations (Nu 10:29), mingling with Israel both in the north (Jud 3:1) and in the south (Jg 19); some of them remained on the northern border of Judah, where they maintained a separate existence till the time of Saul (1 S 19), and were finally, in the days of David, incorporated into the tribe of Judah (1 S 30). It is this abomination of the Kenites by Judah, which, if Jahweh were a Kenite deity, explains why the J documents, written in Judah, regards the knowledge of the name Jahweh as something new, and perpetuates paraexpresses of Jahweh from the other tribes tended to perpetuate this in spite of contrary currents from other sources. We are therefore justified in regarding that Jahweh was the god of the Kenites, that some of the Hebrew tribes entangled in Egypt were ready to abandon their old gods for one that could deliver them, and thus became their God. The objections to this view urged by Kautzsch (loc. cit. 625 ff.) really do not touch the kernel of the argument. The words ‘God of the father’ on which he lays so much stress are written from a later point of view, and that point of view is quite well justified by the Kenite hypothesis (for the Kenites were absorbed by Judah) as by the supposition that Jahweh was the god of one of the Israelitish clans.

(2) What conception the Hebrews of the time of Moses held of Jahweh we can in broad outline define. Evidently they conceived Him to be a god of war. The needs of the oppressed tribes demanded a warrior. The people are said to have sung, after their deliverance, ‘Jahweh is a man of war.’ A book of old poems was called ‘The Book of the Wars of Jahweh’ (Ps 21), and ‘Jahweh of hosts’ (or armies) was afterwards one of His most constant names. There can be little doubt that this conception of Jahweh as a war-god had also developed among the Kenites, and had a large influence in drawing the Hebrews into His worship.

There is reason also to believe that, as Jahweh had long been worshipped around Mount Sinai, where severe thunder-storms occur (cf. Agnes Smith Lewis, Expos.
The feast of the Passover thou shalt keep.
4. The lighting of an new candle reed with a lamb.
5. None shall appear before the Lord with leavened bread, neither shall the sacrifice of the Passover be left until the morning.
6. On the seventh day thou shalt rest.
7. Thou shalt observe the feast of the date harvest.
8. Thou shalt not offer gifts to the Lord when leavened bread, neither shall the sacrifice of the Passover be left until the morning.
9. The offerings of thy flock thou shalt bring unto Jehovah thy god.
10. Thou shalt not see a kid in its mother's milk.

These commands are in part conjunctial, but as they are obtained from JT by omitting the agricultural and later elements, they are probably already in the form of the command itself.

(5) It will be noticed that the second command is not a prohibition of 1dols, but only of expensive idols.

Kutzbach (loc. cit. 269) thinks that the number of references to Jahweh's name is, probably, about three.

A late tradition (1 K 8. 3) says that it contained the Ten Commandments written on stone. The later versions of the Commandments differ so radically that it is not probable that a authoritative copy from such early time was preserved. Scholars suppose therefore that the ark contained an aeroline or some such symbol of Jehovah.

Centuries afterwards, when it was carried into the camp of the Philistines, it was thought that Jehovah Himself had come into the camp (1 S 4).

In the J document the ark plays a small part, while in the E document it is much more prominent.

J apparently thought much more of Sinai as the home of Jehovah.

This probably is true of the fact that the settlement the ark was in the possession of the Joseph tribes and became their shrine.

(7) According to the oldest sources, there seems to have been no priestly activity at this time except that of Moses himself. J tells us that when the covenant was ratified, Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu and seventy elders of Israel went up into Jehovah's mountain, but only Moses was permitted to come before him (Ex 33. 11), while E tells us of a 'tent of meeting' which Moses used to pitch at a distance from the camp, and to which he would go to consult Jehovah (Ex 33. 11), and then return. This tent Joshua, Moses' minister, also used (Ex 33. 11). It is clear that neither of these writers had any conception of the choice of the tribe of Levi for the priesthood. Indeed E makes no mention of the priestly tribe of Levi anywhere, while in the blood of the sacrifices of one of the Joseph tribes, and how the term 'Levite' for priest originated he does not tell us. In Jg 17 he tells us of a Levite who belonged to the tribe of Judah (cf. Ex 20. 19., so that here 'Levite' cannot have had a tribal significance. J tells us of a tribe of Levi to which a calamity happened (Gn 34. 29-31), and he tells us also (Ex 28. 31-33) of a number of men who in a crisis attached themselves to Moses for the preservation of the religion of Jehovah, and were, perhaps, accordingly called 'Levites.' Many scholars think that the later priesthood was developed out of this band, and that its identification with the unfortunate clan of Levi is due to a later confusion of the names. In the present state of our knowledge, this is, perhaps, the most probable view.

[For the great variety of opinion among scholars, cf. art. 'Levites' in JE vii. 21. 22.) The priesthood is probably a development later than Moses.

3. The pre-Prophetic religion in Canaan.—(1) The conquest of Canaan strengthened the faith of the Israelite tribes in Jehovah as the god of war. Their success strengthened the hold of Jehovah upon them. A Semitic people upon entering a new land always felt it Saul, from Jg the The and pills emerged was Jahweh of the armies. 17'''-), Jg as not for man it only as the shrines of the deities. When, in the first time of Jahweh. Both the shrines were of the simplest nature and without buildings. A wealthy citizen might in this period have a private temple in connexion with his residence (Jg 17).

(7) The priesthood in this period was not confined to any tribe. There seems to have been a feeling that it was better to have a local priesthood (a Levite) as may have meant; cf. Jg 17:9, Micah, an Ephrahite, made his son a priest (Jg 17:17); Samuel, a member of one of the tribes, acted as priest (1 S 9:30); and David made his sons priests (2 S 8:17v). When, in the time of J (cf. Jg 18:19), Jonathan, a grandson of Moses, started life as an impious resident of Bethel in Judah; in seeking his fortune he became a priest in the private shrine of Micah, the Ephrahite; then at the instigation of the Danites he robbed that shrine and fled with them to the north, becoming the founder of a line of priests in the temple of Dan. Even if his descent from Moses should not be credited, the story gives rise to a kind of irregularity in the priesthood which was still conceivable when the J document was composed. So far as Jerusalem was concerned, David improved this chaotic condition by regularizing the priesthood.

(8) The festivals at this period were of a simple, joyous character. They were held in the interest of the worshipper. A picture of one has been preserved in the book of Joshua (1 S 1. 2). The priests killed the sacrifice, pouring out the blood no doubt to Jahweh, and then the flesh was cooked. While it was cooking, the priest obtained his portion by a kind of chance (cf. 1 S 20:26), after which the victim was consumed by the worshippers in a joyous festival. This festival was the appropriate time to pray for children, and it is probable that considerable licence accompanied it (cf. Sem. Or. 2.87f.). The feast described occurred annually, but there were lesser feasts at the time of the new moons and on other occasions, which were probably observed in the same simple way (cf. 1 S 20:6). In addition to the sacrifices at such feasts (cf. 1 S 2:26), it is clear that on extraordinary occasions human sacrifice was in this period still practised. The story of Jephthah's daughter, whether historical in all its features or not, proves that such sacrifices were regarded as possible. It is probable that 1 K 16:4 is proof that children were still sacrificed when important structures were set up. The language of this passage has been greatly illuminated by the discoveries at Gezer (cf. above, § 1 (6)).

(9) A glimpse into the household worship of the time we obtain from the teraphim. These seem to have been household deities, similar to those found in Babylonia (Ezk 21:2) and among the Amorrites (Gn 31:19). Of their character we know little. They have been employed for divination (Zec 10), and they were sometimes made in human form (1 S 19). Throughout this period they were a recognized element in the worship (cf. Jg 18, Hos 3). Whether these gods formed the centre of the home worship or not we cannot tell. They were evidently a crude survival from an earlier time, and with regard to prophetic programs they did not.

In addition to the features of the religion of the pre-Prophetic period which have been enumerated, it must be remembered that the fundamental institutions of the pre-Jewish religion of Israel enumerated in § 1, continued through this period also.

(10) Another religious phenomenon of the pre-Prophetic period consisted in the development of a class of seers or prophets, who are to be carefully distinguished from the great moral and literary prophets of the next period. The prophets of this period were closely akin to the seers and fortune-tellers who are common the world over. They had their parallel in other Semitic countries, e.g. Phoenicia and Assyria. In the time of Saul there was a class of ecstatic prophets in Israel who used music to aid their prophetic excitement, who uttered themselves when possessed by an uncontrollable frenzy, and who went about in bands (cf. 1 S 16:14–15). These prophets have their analogue in a youth at Gebal in Phoenicia, of whom the Egyptian Wenamon makes report about n.c. 1100. This youth was seized by the spirit of the god and thrown into a frenzied, and then uttered prophecies which moved a king (cf. AJSL xxi, 105). This type of prophecy was therefore in this period widely spread or even beyond the bounds of the country. The 'sons of the prophets' referred to so often in the OT were simply guides of these men organized for mutual help. Music helped on the frenzy, and it was more commonly engaged when a number were together.

Saul was not sharply distinguished from the 'sons of the prophets,' although he was evidently a man of a higher order, believed by the people to possess superior gifts. He was called a 'seer' (1 S 9), and was believed to be able to direct people in finding lost property, and not to be above taking a fee for it (1 S 9). Somewhat parallel to such a seer is the one mentioned by Assurbanipal (G. Smith, Assurbanipal, 119 ff.).

These men were held in high esteem, and obtained their living by telling people what they wished to know. Their oracles were mostly about the future, but often no doubt they told a man whether or not that action was in accord with Jahweh, or told him, how to be saved, or warned him against coming to grief. They were ascribed to Jahweh as much as he was later to attribute his oracles to himself. He, who had been kept four hundred of these men organized a court, for a king had often to engage in hazardous enterprises of State. We find accordingly that Ahab kept four hundred of them about him (1 K 22). David and other kings had probably done the same. No doubt Nathan and Gad, whom later writers mention in connection with David, were really men of this character, who are in the narratives pictured like the nobler prophets of later time. These prophets by profession possessed no higher ethical tendencies than the other men of their time. Their sustenance was dependent on the pleasure of their royal patrons, they were nominally under the control of the court, and usually they gave such oracles as were desired. (For fuller account, see Batten, The Hebrew Prophet, 27–72.) The institution was held in high regard. When the exiled man and his higher servitors were by the excitement inhibited from action, he was, as such men usually are among savage and primitive people (cf. Davenport, Primitive Trails in Religious Beliefs, ch. v.), thought to be under the possession of a supernatural spirit. He was accordingly listened to most carefully, and his utterances were supposed to reveal the Divine will. It is significant that the Hebrews used the same word for 'prophet' and for 'insane.' This was capable nevertheless of high possibilities. If those came forward exercising its gifts who were animated by high ethical purpose and possessed a great spiritual message, the regard in which this institution was held did not prevent them from making an appeal to the people. The prophet thus became a moral leader and a religious reformer. If the earlier prophets had been kept in the background by the ruling classes, the later prophets were enabled to influence the masses of the people on purely religious lines. The whole history of the religious development of Israel is a history of the rise and power of the prophetic spirit.

4. Religion in the Prophetic period. —The period which we call Prophetic extends from Elijah to the great prophet of the Exile, the so-called Second Isaiah. It was a period of religious development, and we see in the labours of the great school of prophetic reformers, the religion of Israel become ethical and spiritual. They gave it this content, and by the new interpretation which they put on the covenant with Jahweh which Moses and Jethro had mediately, forced it upon the people. This was aided by the misfortunes and sufferings incident to the interference of Assyria and Babylon in Hebrew affairs. This period, in which the prophets changed the use of prophetic utterance. With one exception, they discarded the ecstatic, prophetic visions which were held to be inspired by Jahweh, and spoke as the result of prophetic inspiration. Just what they mean by 'vision' we may not say, but we may be sure that Intelligence and imagination had their part in it. It led to the perception of a noble ideal, and gave the beholder a holy passion to realize it.

(1) Elijah. The prophetic work began with Elijah. The main points of his career are well touched upon above (1 K 17). His significance lies in the fact that in the name of Jahweh he championed the poor against the rich. He said concepts of the Jealous Jehovah, that he opposed a foreign cult, are all incidental. Any enthusiastic member of a prophetic guild might have done any one of these three things. The significance of the work of Elijah lies in the fact that it marks the dawn of ethical purity and social justice in Jahweh's service. The method of Elijah, too, was an ethical. He delivered his message, and relied upon its weight for the results.

(2) The Jahwe Prophecy (J). We turn to the same. The Jahwe prophecies contemporary with Elijah. The first of the J writers was speaking at the beginning of Ahab's reign. He was pervaded by the prophetic spirit in its inception. He traces the creation of man to Jahweh, and is interested in the descent of the nations from Noah. He tells the stories of the patriarchs to illustrate the power of Jahweh, but the purely religious motive is not often present. He speaks of the nations as one, and tells the Canaanites about them, which indicates that he is not conscious that the religion of Jahweh is hostile to other gods. His conception of the basis of Jahweh's covenant with Israel is, as pointed out above (§ 2 (4)), ten commands of a purely ritual nature. The tone of his stories is serious. Clothing and child-bearing came in consequence of sin. The first agriculturist was the first murderer. The inventors of metal instruments and of music were especially wicked men. The civilization of Babylonia attempted such astounding structures, that, as Jahweh looked down from heaven, He found He could prevent men from reaching heaven only by confounding their language. To the Jahwe civilization man sin, pain, and trouble. He had no hopeful outlook. He represents the position of Jahweh's people in the time of Ahab. He says, in the name of Jahweh, that the religion of Jahweh is hostile to other gods. He is not conscious of the differences between the nations, the nobler religion of Israel owes him nothing.

(3) Elisha. Not to be regarded as Elijah's successor, but he belongs to a different class. The nobler religion of Israel owes him nothing.

(4) Amos, the first prophet to commit his message to writing, came, like Elijah, a prophet notable. He was called a minstrel to work with his harp, and not as a prophet (2 K 14). He was, too, who promptly Jehu, one of the bloodiest of usurpers and reformers, to undertake the task of reforming Israel. He kept faith with the covenant, and when it was accomplished Israel was not one whit more ethical or spiritual than before. Elisha is usually counted as Elijah's successor, but he belongs to a different class. The nobler religion of Israel owes him nothing.

as one (De 20:7). He represents a higher conception of God than J. J's anthropomorphism has disappeared. God is never seen in human form in E's narratives, but referred to in himself in dreams. The ethical character of E's conception of religion appears, however, in his conception of the basis of the social order, as Moses made it under Jahweh and Jahweh. The basis of this is a Decalogue in which the ritualistic is reduced to a minimum (Ex 20:1-17), as against the Decalogue of R. which combined the fundamental elements of morality, and a code of laws (Ex 20:17-23) embodying the principles of equity that were necessary for the life of a simple agricultural community. In giving expression to this conception, the Elohist placed himself in line with the great ethical movements which had denounced ritual as without place in the religion of Jahweh. The message had been enforced by the awful severity which had characterized Judaism, and it had, in consequence of Isaiah's friendship with Hoseah, moulded policies of State. Under Manasseh, however, it became painfully evident that it was not enough for moral means to eliminate impure ritual from the religion of Jahweh. No part of the world, not even the Hebrews, was ready for a religion without ritual. Jahweh had seen this in his old age. The Deuteronomist at all events saw it. Ritual should be retained, but it should be brought within manageable limits. The high places should be eliminated, the cult centralized in Jerusalem—the place which Isaiah's teaching and the signal defeat of Sennacherib had so clearly proved to be Jahweh's special dwelling-place. From all this sodemities and sacred niceties were heretofore to be excluded as unworthy even of the 'pillars and asketh, which were specially significant of the odious social practices. To accomplish this, the Deuteronomist did not arbitrarily raise the spiritual religion to higher levels, he did by the compromise of this code help those ideas to influence practical life.

Isaiah, perhaps the greatest of the prophets, made great advances in the conception of spiritual religion. There was in all his prophecies a desire after a higher love—a heart-throb,—like that of Hosea. The greatest significance of his teaching is not, however, the tenderly

(7) Isaiah continued the work of Amos and Hosea. He proclaimed Jahweh as the All-powerful, who fills heaven and earth, and proclaims His sanctity and the justice. For forty years, in many crises and under varying figures, Isaiah set forth this doctrine. Man is in Jahweh's hands as a clay in the potter's hand. The personal Assyrian is but the rod by which Jahweh in His wrath is chastising Israel; when His will is accomplished the rod will be broken and thrown away (Isa 10:25). Isaiah's monotheism, though lofty, had the same defect as Hosea's. In upholding this conception of God, Isaiah denounced the social sins which had called out the opposition of Amos and Hosea. So great is Jahweh's desire for justice, that Isaiah believed that He would one day raise up a prince great in all the qualities of a princey conqueror, who should be a 'Wonderful-counselor, a god of a warrior, a father of princes, and a prince of peace' (Isa 9). At another time he saw a vision of a kingdom of complete justice which an offshoot of the Dauidic dynasty should found (Is 11). This is one of Isaiah's conceptions in the prophetic One would organize human society. In addition to his work in keeping alive these lofty ideas, Isaiah, as prophet, was concerned with the development of Judaism. He was probably responsible also for that attempt to suppress the high places which afterwards found legal expression in the Deuteronomist's conception. One can be pointed out in considering that law. In Micah, a younger contemporary of Isaiah, the spirit and message of Amos reappear.

(8) The Deuteronomist, in the development of the Prophetic period, follows Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, and the other ethical movements, which had denounced ritual as without place in the religion of Jahweh. The message had been enforced by the awful severity which had characterized Judaism, and it had, in consequence of Isaiah's friendship with Hoseah, moulded policies of State. Under Manasseh, however, it became painfully evident that it was not enough for moral means to eliminate impure ritual from the religion of Jahweh. No part of the world, not even the Hebrews, was ready for a religion without ritual. Jahweh had seen this in his old age. The Deuteronomist at all events saw it. Ritual should be retained, but it should be brought within manageable limits. The high places should be eliminated, the cult centralized in Jerusalem—the place which Isaiah's teaching and the signal defeat of Sennacherib had so clearly proved to be Jahweh's special dwelling-place. From all this sodemities and sacred niceties were heretofore to be excluded as unworthy even of the 'pillars and asketh, which were specially significant of the odious social practices. To accomplish this, the Deuteronomist did not arbitrarily raise the spiritual religion to higher levels, he did by the compromise of this code help those ideas to influence practical life.

(9) Jeremiah, perhaps the greatest of the prophets, made great advances in the conception of spiritual religion. There was in all his prophecies a desire after a higher love—a heart-throb,—like that of Hosea. The greatest significance of his teaching is not, however, the tenderly...
This prophetic conception of God and religion, which thus developed from Elijah to the Second Isaiah, is unique in the world's history. Only once has this teaching been surpassed, Jesus of Nazareth, who perfected this conception of God and made it capable of being universally received, alone has gone beyond it. It was the teaching of these prophets that redeemed the root, Israel. This mission was unique in the Semitic religions. It is this that has made the religion of Jahweh the inspiration of the world as the religion of the one true God. This prophetic teaching is quite unaccounted for by its environment. Nothing like it had been heard of in any portion of the Semitic world, or among any other people. It is in the prophetic teaching and the influences which flowed from it that we find proof of the truth of the words: 'The Word of God, being moved by the Holy Spirit' (2 P 1:22).

5. From the Exile to the Maccabees.—(1) It is clear from the sketch given above (1. § 24), that in the rehabilitation of Palestine the whole sentiment of the organizers centered in the ritual. If there were prophets, such as Haghai, Zechariah, and Malachi, they uttered their prophetic visions to persuade the people to make sacrifices to restore and maintain the sacred ceremonies. It thus happened that the whole movement in the early days after the Exile was pervaded more by the priestly than by the prophetic spirit. The Priestly document with its supplements (for the analysis cf. Carpenter and Harford-Batterby's Hexateuch) was the heart of the whole movement. The religious life of the Judaean community did not become consistent until it was organized upon this basis, and as such, its organization was looked upon as forward consecrated. The author of the Priestly document (P) was the successor of Ezekiel, as Ezekiel had been the successor of the Deuteronomist. As Ezekiel took more interest in the organization of the ritual than did D, so P's interest greatly exceeded Ezekiel's. The prophetic movement had given P its pure monotheism. From it he had received a faith in an All-powerful, Holy Creator and Ruler of the universe. The nearness and warmth of God, as the prophets had conceived Him, escaped P, but with such elements of the prophetic conception as he could grasp he set himself to the organization of the ritual.

The ritual which had come down to him from his priestly ancestry he had received as the will of God. We can see that it had its birth in Semitic heathenism, but...
The first of these important creations was the Psalter, the hymn-book of the Second Temple. This greatest of the world's collections of sacred song was a gradual growth. Book 1. (Ps 1-85) came into existence probably in the time of Nehemiah. The other collections were gradually made at different times, the whole not being completed till the Maccabean age (cf. art. Psalms). In compiling it some earlier hymns were probably utilized though they were not necessarily written and do not clearly date into it. Into this collection there went every variety of religious expression. The breathings of anger against enemies mingled with tender aspirations after communion with God. One psalm, the 50th, treats sacrifice sarcastically, while many express a devotion to the Law which is extremely touching. One (Ps 51) expresses the most advanced and psychologically correct conception of man's moral and religious being. The Psalms are essentially a collection of songs that is found anywhere in the OT. A Judaism capable of producing such a book was noble indeed. To live up to the highest expressions of this the first-fruits of creative Judaism is to be a pious Christian.

(6) There was, however, in this period a class of rabbis who lived apart from the life of the Temple, untouched by the ceremonies of the priest or the aspirations of the prophet. They treated religious problems from that practical common-sense point of view which the Hebrews called 'wisdom.' The books produced by this class had a profound religious influence. The author of the Maccabean struggle, though he is not free from the atmosphere of the play of individuality. Their books are, therefore, written from various standpoints, and present widely divergent points of view.

The oldest of these, the Book of Job, discusses, in some of the noblest poetry ever written, the problem of suffering or the mystery of life. The author treats his theme with absolute freedom of thought, untrammeled by the priestly conceptions of the Law. In his conclusion, however, he is profoundly religious. He demonstrates at once the function and the limits of reason in the religious life, -its function to keep theology in touch with reality, and its inability to fathom life's mystery. Job does not find satisfaction till he receives the vision of God, and becomes wise, through the realization of the Divine Personality to trust even though his problems are unsolved (cf. Peske, Problem of Suffering in OT, 105 sq.).

The Book of Proverbs contains the sayings of sages of the practical, everyday sort. Their view of life is experiential. Wisdom is good because it pays, and the fear (worship) of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom. Sometimes, as in ch. 8, they rise to noble poetry in the praise of the maiden, but for the most part they pursue the humdrum pathway of everyday expediency. Their point of view is the opposite of that of the inspired Psalmists, but is in no way inconsistent with formal faithfulness in the observance of the Law.

Ecclesiastes is the work of a man who has almost lost faith in the Law, or, as the latest critic, renders it for him, the Law is dead, and the perception of a noble meaning in it gives him. He is not altogether able to throw off completely his childhood's faith, but they have ceased to be for him a solution of life's mystery, and he has scant patience with those who, in like case with himself, continue to volubly profess their devotion because it is the orthodox thing to do. He insists upon bringing all things to the test of reality.

Szech is a collection of maxims which continues the work of the Book of Proverbs.

(4) The religious life thus far described was that which flourished in Palestine. During this period, however, the Jews had been scattering over the world (cf. Discussion). These scattered communities had no idea of being anything but Jews. They had their synagogues in which the Law was read, and, like the Captivity in Babylonia, they remained as much of their religious life as they could away from the Temple. As often as possible they went to Jerusalem at the time of some great feast, and took part in its sacrificial worship. Contact with the heathen world, however, broadened the vision of these Jews. They saw that many Gentiles were noble men. Probably too here and there one of the noble Gentiles was attracted by the lofty religion of the Jew.

At all events there sprang up among the Diaspora a desire to win the heathen world to Judaism. The translation of the Bible into Greek, which was begun in the 3rd cent., was demanded not only to facilitate the use of the Greek-speaking Jews, but as an instrument in the hands of those who would fulfill the missionary conception of the Second Isaiah and win the world to Jahweh. Towards the end of this period a missionary literature began to be written. One portion of this, the Sibylline Oracles, the oldest part of which dates perhaps from the Maccabean age, represented the Sibyl, who was so popular in the Greco-Roman world, as recounting in Greek hexameters the history of the chosen people. The Book of Jonah dates from this period, and is a part of this literature, though probably written in Palestine. Its author satirizes the nation as a whole for her unwillingness, after all her chastisement, to do the mission to which Jahweh would send her, or to rejoice that He showed mercy to any but herself.

6. The reign of legalism.—With the beginning of the Hasmonaean dynasty, the period of Judaism was over, and the leaders, gathering up the heritage of the past, were crystallizing it into permanent form. This did not come about all at once, and the beginnings go back to the preceding period. The writers of the Priestly Law were the real intellectual ancestors of those Chaldeans, or enthusiasts for the Law, out of whom the Maccabees sprang. Having lost the Maccabean struggle, the religious, the religious tendencies were varied, and the genius of the nation too creative, for the priestly conceptions to master everybody. The struggle of the Maccabees for the life of the Jewish religion greatly strengthened the Chaldean legalism, while the Hanun rule developed into the Pharisaism. More numerous than the Sadducees, and possessing among the country people a much greater reputation for piety, they soon became the dominant party in Palestine. Some, as the Essenes (wh. see), might split off from them, but they were too insignificant to shatter the Pharisaic influence. The aim of the Pharisees was to apply the Law to all the details of daily life. Some of its provisions were indefinite. It called on the Hebrew not to work on the Sabbath, but some work was necessary, if man would live. They endeavoured to define, therefore, what was and what was not work within the meaning of the Pentateuch. Similarly they dealt with other laws. These definitions were not for some centuries committed to writing. Thus there grew up an Oral Law side by side with the Written Law, and in due time the Pharisees regarded this as of Divine authority also. This Oral Law in the grip of external observance upon the religious life, the epoch was not creative. They dreaded not create anything. Everything was given out either as an interpretation of the Law or as the declaration of some new law. There was development and growth, of course, but this was accomplished, not by creating the new, but by interpreting the old. In the rabbinical schools, which were developed in the reign of Herod, this system was finally unfolded itself, and became the archetype of orthodox Judaism to the present day.

In the rabbinical schools the method of teaching was by repetition. The sayings or interpretations of famous Rabbis were stated by the master and repeated again and again till they were remembered. Not originality but memory was the praiseworthy quality in a student. Thus after centuries later, the Oral Law was committed to writing, it was called Mishnah, or 'Repetition.' In the synagogue (wh. see), where the people worshipped on the Sabbath, and where the children were taught, the oral religious life was preserved, but synagogues gradually became centres for the propagation of Pharisaism. Beginning with the Maccabean struggles, a new class of literature, the Apocalyptic, was called into existence. Prophecy was completely dead. No one had the creative genius to unfold in his own name the Divine purposes. For some centuries those who had a message for their contemporaries in persecution presented it as a vision which some ancient worthy, Enoch, Daniel, Baruch, or Enoch, had seen. The apocalypticists were only in a secondary sense creative. They moulded the utterances of the prophets and traditional material borrowed from Babylonia, so as to make them express the hopes which they would teach. No fewer than seven of these works were attributed to Enoch, and six to Baruch; one was ascribed to Moses, one to Isaiah, while each of the twelve sons of Jacob had his "Testament," and Solomon a "Prophesy." In this literature the national consciousness of Judaism, in conflict first with Syria and then with Rome, finds expression. The hopes for the long-delayed kingdom of which the prophets had spoken, is portrayed; it is a kingdom of the Law; they pointed forward to that time when the faithful should have ability to serve God completely, and to the reward for all that they had suffered.

The great idea of God expressed by the Priestly document pervaded and still pervades Judaism. The Divine unity and majesty were and are its watchwords. The divine rights of kings, as its Pharisaic rigidities have been elsewhere in Talmud and Midrash, and transmitted to modern times. Judaism during the Christian centuries has had its history, its development, and its heresies. It has produced independent thinkers like Maimonides and Spinoza. In modern life the Reform Jew is casting off the forms of Pharisaism, but through the lapse of all the centuries Judaism, as shaped by the Pharisees and beheld by the successors, has been the orthodox religion of that race which traces its lineage to Israel.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

ISRAELITE (Jn 10).—This is the only instance of the term 'Israelite' in the Gospels. It has the particular significance, suggested by the story of Jacob in Gn 32v. 35v, of one belonging to the Jewish race, with special reference to the privileges conferred by God on His people: 'whose is the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the promise' (Ro 9). Its use (as distinct from 'Jew' and 'Hebrew') became closely associated with belief in the Messianic hope (cf. Jn 14), and the expression 'Israelite indeed,' addressed to Nathanael, breathes that sense of tragedy so apparent in the Fourth Gospel, inasmuch as those who were specially 'His own' received Him not. We may compare the attitude of the Jews, in ch. 6, who blindly claimed race privileges, and yet were enemies of Christ, and who cherished the very prejudice that Nathanael overcame (cf. Jn 14 with 6v, where the objection in both cases is to the commonplace origin of Jesus), when he readily responded to Philip's invitation, 'Come and see.' It is in this sense that Nathanael is 'without guile.' He does not allow his devout sense of privilege to destroy openness of heart towards the claim of Jesus of Nazareth. His action shows that he is sincere, frank, and without sinister aim (cf. 2 Co 12v. 1 Th 2v). To Jesus, therefore, he is an object of surprise.

R. H. STRACHAN.

ISSACHAR.—The fifth son of Leah, born after Gad and Asher, the sons of Zilpah, and the ninth of Jacob's sons (Gn 30v. 4, cf. 35v. 25). The name (in Heb. Yis-sakar) is peculiarly a form and is quite probable that it has arisen from the corruption of 'ish-sakhar as Wellhausen ('Sam. 95') suggests, and further, that the latter element is the name of a deity. Ball (SBO, ad loc.) suggests the Egyptian Memphite god Sokar. The name which corresponds to this name 'ish-Gad by which the Moabites knew the Gadites, J and E, however, both connect it with the root akhhar, 'to hire': J, because Leah 'hired' Jacob from Rachel with Reuben's mace, and E, because James 'hired' Jacob. The difference shows that the traditions are of little value as linguistic guides. Gn 49v. 10 also appears to play upon the root akhhar in its description of Issachar as 'a servant under task work.' This would correspond with the interpretation 'hired man' or 'labourer.' It has, however, little to commend it.

P's census at Sinai gives the tribe 54,400 (Nu 1v. 17), and at Moab 64,300 (2Ch 2v. 12); cf. 1 Ch 7v. 7. For the clans see Gn 46v. 1 and 1 Ch 7v. 7.

The original seat of the tribe appears to have been S. of Naphtali and S.E. of Zebulun, 'probably in the hills between the two valleys which descend from the Great Plain to the Jordan (Wady el-Bireh and Nahal Galiud)' (Moore, Judges, 151). On the N.W. it touched upon Mt. Tabor, on the S. upon Mt. Gilboa. Eastward it reached to the Jordan. P's list (Jos 19v. 17v-24v) assigns to the tribe sixteen cities and their villages, scattered throughout the eastern end of the rich Plain of Esdraelon and the Valley of Jezreel. The tribe participated in the war against Sisera (Jg 4v. 6), and Deborah perhaps belonged to it. The 'with' before Deborah might be 'the people of' but the verse is uncertain. To the Baasha, the son of Ahijah, who succeeded Nadab, was 'of the house of Issachar'; and, possibly, also Omri, who gave his name to the Northern Kingdom. The references of P's list of Jacob (Gn 49v. 9) would indicate that during the early monarchy Issachar lost both its martial valour and its independence. On the other hand, in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33v. 14) great commercial prosperity is envisaged, and the maintenance of Jacob's kingship for which 'the peoples' flock to the sacrificial worship. Tola the judge, the grandson of Dodo, was a man of Issachar (Jg 10v. 6). This name Dodo, occurring on the Ishbaa stele as that of a divinity, has led to the suggestion that he may have been worshipped in early times by the tribe. According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin drew from Issachar his most intellectually prominent members. See also Tribes of Israel.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

ISSHIAH.—1. One of the heads of the tribe of Issachar (1 Ch 7v. 7). 2. A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12v. 12). 3. The son of Uzziel (1 Ch 23v. 2v. 24v).

4. A Levite (1 Ch 24v. 4).

ISSIHAH.—One of those who married a foreign wife (Es 10v. 3); called in 1 Es 9v. 24.

ISSRACUS (1 Es 8v. 44).—'Uthni the son of Issracus' here stands for 'Uthni and Zabbud' in Es 8v. 34.

ITALIAN BAND.—See Band.

ITALY.—This word varied in sense from time to time. It first signified only the Southern (the Greek) part of the peninsula; later it included all the country south of the Lombard plain; and finally, before the time of Christ, it had come to bear the meaning which it has now. Its central position in the Mediterranean, the conformation of its coast, and the capabilities of its soil under proper cultivation, fitted it to be the home and centre of a governing race. In the 1st cent., there was constant communication between the capital Rome and every part of the Empire, by well-recognized routes. Among the routes to the E., which mainly concern the NT student, was that from Rome along the W. coast of S. Italy; to the North of it there was a passage to the Gulf of Corinth, then to Leuchaeum to Cenchrea (aw. see), and from there sailed to Ephesus or Antioch or Alexandria, as he desired.
ITCH

The best account of a home journey is in Ac 27. The Jews poured into Italy, especially to Rome, and had been familiar to the Italians long before Christianity came.

A. SOUli.

ITYAR.—See TIMA.

IYAHAN.—The fourth and youngest son of Aaron and Elisheba (Ex 28th; 25th); consecrated priest (Ex 28th); forbidden to mourn for Nadab and Abihu (Lv 19th), or to leave the Tent of Meeting (v.7); afterwards entrusted by Moses with priestly duties (Lv 10th and 19th); rebuked by him (v.23); set over the Ger- shomites and the Merarites in connexion with the service of the Tent of Meeting (Nu 4th-3 7th; cf. also Ex 28th); ancestor of Eli (cf. 1 K 2th with 1 Ch 24th; 23th). The family in David's time was only half the size of Eliazar's (1 Ch 24th). It was represented among the returned exiles (Ezr 8th).

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

ITHIEL.—1. A Benjamite (Neh 11th). 2. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his oracles (Prov 30th; 31th). 3. ‘The father of Amasa, and husband of Abigail, David's sister. He is described as an Israelite in 2 S 17th, but the better reading is 'Jether the Ishmonite' (1 Ch 27th). ITHRAIN.—1. Eponym of a Horite clan (Gn 36th, 1 Ch 14th). 2. An Asherite chief (1 Ch 7th), probably identical with Jether of the following verse.

ITHREAM.—The sixth son of David, born to him at Hebron (2 S 3th, 1 Ch 3th).

ITHRITE, THE.—A gentile adjective applied to the descendants of a family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 24th), amongst whom were two of David's guards (2 S 22nd; 1 Ch 11th Ira and Gareb). Possibly, however, the text of 2 S 23 and 1 Ch 11 should be pointed 'the Jathrites,' i.e. an inhabitant of Jattir (mentioned in 1 S 30th as one of David's haunts) in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 19th 211th). See JATRIT.

ITS.—It is well known that this word occurs but once in Av, Lv 25th, and that even there it is due to subsequent printers, the word in 111th being 'It'—'that which growth of it owne accord.' The use of 'It' for 'Its' is well seen in Shaks. King John, ii. i. 160, 'Go to it grandam, child: Give ita plum, a cherry, and a fig.' The form 'Its' was only beginning to come into use about 1811, and the usual substitutes in Av therefore 'his' and 'thereof.' Thus Mt 6th 'But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness,' where Tindale has 'the rightwises thereof.' (RV takes the pronoun to be masculine, referring to God, not kingdom, and retains 'His').

ITTAL.—1. A Gittite leader who, with a following of six hundred Philistines, attached himself to David at the outbreak of Absalom's rebellion. In spite of being urged by David to return to his home, he determined to follow the king in his misfortune, affirming his faithfulness in the beautiful words: 'As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether for death or for life, even there also will thy servant be' (2 S 15th). He therefore remained in the service of David, and soon rose to a position of great trust, being placed in command of a third part of the people (2 S 18th). 2. A Benjamite, son of Ribal, who was one of David's mighty men (2 S 23th, 1 Ch 11th in the latter RSV). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ITURAEA [the name is probably derived from Jetur, who is mentioned in Gn 25th and 1 Ch 1st as a son of Ishmael], with Trachonitis, constituted the tetrarchy of Philip (Lk 3th). Whether ituraea is employed by the Evangelist as a noun or an adjective is a disputed point. Ramsay contends (Expositor, Jan., Feb., Apr., 1894) that no Greek writer prior to Eusebius in the 4th cent. A.D. ever uses it as the name of a country. The Itureans as a people were well known to classical writers. According to Cicero (Philipp. ii. 112), they were a 'predatory people'; according to Caesar (Bell. Afr. 20), they were 'skilful archers'; according to Strabo (xvi. ii. 10 et seq.), they were 'lawless.' They seem to have migrated originally from the desert to the vicinity of Southern Lebanon and Syria. Both Strabo and Josephus (Ant. xiii. 3) locate them in these parts. The Romans probably caused them to retreat towards the desert again shortly before the Christian era. Lyonsan the son of Ptolemy is called by Dio Cassius (xlxi. 32) 'king of the Itureans.' He was put to death by Mark Antony in a.D. 34. Zenostratus, his successor died in a.D. 20, whereupon a part of his territory fell into the hands of Herod the Great; and when Herod's kingdom was divided, it became the possession of Philip (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3). Whether ituraea and Trachonitis overlapped (as Ramsay thinks), or were two distinct districts (as Strabo), is uncertain; G. A. Smith in his art. 'Ituraea' in Hastings' DB is non-committal. The passage in Luke seems to favour a distinct and definite district, which was probably somewhere N.E. of the Sea of Galilee.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

IVORY (šēm, lit. 'tooth'; and šemlabbēm, 'elephants' teeth' [but reading doubtful], 1 K 10th, 2 Ch 9th).—Ivory has been valued from the earliest times. In Solomon's day the Israelites imported it from Ophir (1 K 10th): it was used in the decorations of palaces (229th). The 'tower of ivory' (Ca 7th) may also have been a building decorated with ivory. Solomon had a throne of ivory (1 K 1014-33). 'Beds of ivory,' such as are mentioned in Am 6th, were, according to a cuneiform inscription, included in the tribute paid by Hezekiah to Sennacherib. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

IYAH.—A city named in 2 K 18th 19th, Is 59th, along with Sepharvaim and Hena, as conquered by the Assyrians. Its real name and location are both uncertain. It is frequently identified with AVVA of 2 K 17th. Some would make it the name of a city but of a god. Son, father, art. HENIA.

IVY.—This plant (Hosera hōzā) grows wild in Palestine and Syria. It is mentioned in 2 Mac 6th. See DIONYSIA.

IYE-ABARIM ('Iyim of the regions beyond,' distinguishing this place from the Iim of Jos 15th).—The station mentioned in Nu 21th 38th (in v.4 Iyim alone) and described (211th) as 'in the wilderness which is before Moab toward the sun-rising,' and more briefly (33rd) as 'in the border of Moab.' Nothing is known as to its position beyond these indications.

IYIM ('heaps' or 'ruins').—1. Short form of Iye-abarim in Nu 38th. 2. Jos 16th (AV and RV incorrectly Iim), a town in Judah, one of the 'uttermost cities toward the border of Edom.'

IYYAR.—See TIMA.

IZLIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:1). IZLIAH.—A chief of Issachar (1 Ch 7:9).

IZRAELITES.—Gentile name in 1 Ch 27:1, possibly another form of Zerahites, vv.11-13.

IZRI.—Chief of one of the Levitical choirs (1 Ch 25:1); called in v.4 Zeri.

IZZIAH.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ex 10:28); called in 1 Es 9:6 Edissas.

JAAALAH.—Son of JAALEN. JAALEN.—Son of AAZIAH. JAALEAN. JAALEAH.—The name of a family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned with Zerubbabel; called in 1 Es 5:10 Jeeldi.

JAAR.—A ringleader of nomadic shepherds, occurring about fifty times in the OT. It occurs once as a proper name, namely in Ps 119:190, where, speaking of the ark, the Psalmtist says that he was heard of at Ephrathah and found at Jaar. The parallelism of Hebrew poetry requires that Jaar shall be regarded here as set over against Ephrathah. The ark was brought from the region of Bethlehem (Ephrathah), jaa, from the woody heights of Kirjath-jearim. W. F. Cobb.

JAARESHEIAH.—1. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:7). JAARESHEIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8:7). JAARESHEIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 27:7), probably identical with 'the Mosebbite' of 11:4. JAARU (Ex 16:25) Kedahar or JAASAI (Jer 4:2), so RV. One of those who had married foreign wives.

JAARESHIAH.—1. A Judahite, one of the military commanders who came to Mizpah to give in their allegiance to Gedaliah (2 K 25:24—Jer 40:2 Isaiah). 2. A chieftain of the clan of the Rechabites (Jer 35:1). 3. Son of Azzur, who appeared in Ezekiel's vision as ringleader of seventy of the elders of Israel in the practice of secret idolatry at Jerusalem (Ezk 11:5). 4. Son of Azzur, against whose counsels Ezekiel was commanded to prophecy (Ezk 11:15).

JAAZIAH.—A son of Merari (1 Ch 23:5, 27).

JAAZIEL.—A Levite skilled in the use of the psaltery (1 Ch 15:19); called in v.20 Aziel.

JABAL.—Son of Lamech by Adah, and originator of the nomadic form of life, Gn 4:20 (J).

JABBOK.—A river now called Nahar ez-Zeraa (the Blue River), which rises near Amman, the ancient Rabbath-ammon, and after running first N.E., then N., N.W., finally bends S.W. to enter the Jordan. On almost the whole of its curved course of 60 miles it runs through a deep valley, and forms a natural boundary. On its curved upper reaches it may be said practically to bound the desert, while the gorge of its lower, straighter course divides the land of Gilead into two halves. It is mentioned as a frontier in Nu 21:14, Dt 28:3, 34, Jos 12, Jg 11:11, 22. The Jabbok is famous for all time on account of the striking incident of Jacob's wrestling there with the Angel (Gn 32:24-32). E. W. G. Masterman.

JABESH.—Father of Shullam, who usurped the kingdom of Israel by the assassination of king Zerubzah (2 K 15:18, 19, 21).

JABESH, JABESH-GILEAD.—A city which first appears in the story of the restoration of the Benjamites (Gg 21). Probably it had not fully recovered from this blow when it was almost forced to submit to the disgraceful terms of Nahash the Ammonite (1 S 11). In gratitude for Saul's relief of the city, the inhabitants rescued his body from maltreatment by the Philistines (1 S 31:1-12)—an act which earned them the commendation of David (2 S 29).

According to the Onomasticon, the site is 6 Roman miles from Pella. The name seems to be preserved in Yabeh, a wady tributary to the Jordan, which runs down at the south part of trans-Jordanic Masaheh. The site itself, however, is not yet identified with certainty.

JABEZ.—1. A city in Judah occupied by scribes, the descendants of Caleb (1 Ch 2:4). 2. A man of the family of Judah, noted for his 'honourable' character (1 Ch 2:41); called Yabedah, which is rendered as if it stood for Yordeh, 'he causes pain.' In his vow (v.9) there is again a play upon his name. W. Ewing.

JABIN ('[God] perceives').—A Canaanite king who reigned in Hazor, a place near the waters of Merom, not far from Kadesh. In the account, in Jg 4, of the defeat of Jabin's host under Sisera, the former takes up quite a subordinate position. In another account (Jos 11:7-9) of this episode the victory of the two tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali is represented as a conquest of the whole of northern Canaan by Joshua. Both accounts (Jos 11:9, Jg 4) are fragments taken from an earlier, and more elaborate, source; the Jabin in each passage is therefore one and the same person. W. O. E. Oesterley.

JABNEEL.—1. A town on the N. border of Judah, near Mt. Baalah, and close to the sea (Jos 15:22). In 2 Ch 26:27 it is mentioned under the name Jabneh, along with Gath and Ashdod, as one of the cities captured from the Philistines by Uzziah. Although these are the only OT references, it is frequently mentioned (under the name Jamnia) in the Books of Maccabees (1 Mac 4:42, 5:10, 15:4, 2 Mac 12:4, 18) and in Josephus. Judas is said to have burned its harbour; it was captured by Simon from the Syrians. In Jth 25:2 it is called Jenmann. After various vicissitudes it was captured in the war of the Jews by Vespasian. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Jabneh, now called Jamnia, became the home of the Sanhedrin. At the time of the Crusades the castle Delta stood on the site. To-day the village of Yebna stands on the ruined remains of these ancient occupations. It stands 170 feet above the sea on a prominent hill S. of the Wady Rubin. The ancient Majom or harbour of Jamnia lies to the West. This port would seem to be naturally better than any along the coast of Palestine S. of Cesarea. A Roman garrison was there.

2. An unknown site on the N. boundary of Naphtali not far from the Jordan (Jos 19:28).

JABNEEL.—See JABNEEL.

JACAN.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5:4).

JACHIN.—1. Fourth son of Simeon (Gn 46:14, Ex 6:14) called in 1 Ch 4:4 Jarib; in Nu 26:13 the patronymic
JACHIN AND BOAZ

Jachinites occurs. 2. Eponym of a priestly family (1 Ch 9:14, Neh 11:10).

JACHIN AND BOAZ.—These are the names borne by two brazons, or more probably bronze, pillars belonging to Solomon's Temple. They evidently represented the highest artistic achievement of their author, Hiram of Tyre, the master-workman and repairer, whom Solomon fetched from Tyre to do foundry work for him, whose name, however, was more probably Hiram-abi (2 Ch 2:13, Heb. text). The description of them now found in 1 K 7:18-23 is exceedingly confused and corrupt, but with the help of the better preserved Gr. text, and of other OT. references (viz. 7:41, 2 Ch 3:17; 4:11, and Jer 52:22-23 = 2 K 25:17), recent scholars have restored the text of the primary passage somewhat as follows—

'And he cast the two pillars of bronze for the porch of the temple; 18 eubits was the height of the one pillar, and a line of 12 eubits could compass it about, and its thickness was as finger-breath when it was hollow.' (with this cf. Jer 25:27). And the second pillar was similar. And he made two chapiters (i.e. capitals) of cast bronze for the tops of the pillars, each one of ten cubits in diameter of network work like the other, the chapiters which were upon the tops of the pillars, a network for the one chapiter and a network for the second chapiter. And he made the pomegranates; and two rows of pomegranates in bronze were upon the one network, and the pomegranates were 200, round about upon the one network, and upon the second network. He set up the pillars at the porch of the temple, etc. (as in v. 7 RV.)

The original description, thus freed from later glosses such as the difficult 'illy work' of v. 14, consists of three parts; the pillars, their capitals, and the ornamentation of the latter. The pillars themselves were hollow, with a thickness of metal equal to the thickness of our American one-cent pieces. The height, on the basis of the larger cubit of 203 inches (see Hastings' DB iv. 907*), was about 31 feet, while their diameter works out at about 6% feet. The capitals appear from 1 K 7:18 to have been globular or spheroidal in form, each about 8 feet in height, giving a total height for the complete pillars of roughly 40 feet. The ornamentation of the capitals was twofold: first they were covered with a specially cast network of bronze. Over this were hung festoon-wise two wreaths of bronze pomegranates, each row containing 100 pomegranates, of which it is probable that four were fixed to the network, while the remaining 96 hung free (see Jer 52:23). As regards their position relative to the Temple, it may be regarded as certain that they were structurally independent of the Temple porch, and stood free in front of it—probably on plinths or bases—Jachin on the north, Boaz on the north, each side of the steps leading up to the entrance to the porch (cf. Ezk 41*). Such free-standing pillars were a feature of Phoenician and other temples of Western Asia, the alignments of figures as writers on this point being confirmed by representations on contemporary coins. A glass dish, discovered in Rome in 1882; even shows a representation of Solomon's Temple with the twin pillars flanking the porch, as above described (reproduced in Benzingier's Heb. Arch. [1807], 218).

The names 'Jachin' and 'Boaz' present an enigma which still awaits solution. The meanings suggested in the margins of RV—Jachin 'stands firm' and Boaz 'in it is strength'—give no help, and are besides very problematical. The various forms of the names presented by the Greek texts—for which see EBr ii, 239* and esp. Barnes in JThS vii. [1904], 447-55—it will be perceived, point to possible original meanings as Boay, and Jachay—the latter a Phoenician verbal form of the same signification ('he will be') as the Heb. Jahweh.

The original significance and purpose of the pillars, finally, are almost as obscure as their names. The fact that they were the work of a Phoenician artist, however, makes it probable that their presence is to be explained on the analogy of the similar pillars of Phoenician temples. These, though viewed in more primitive times as the abode of the Deity (see Pillar), had, as civilization and religion advanced, come to be regarded as mere symbols of His presence. To a Phoenician temple-builder, Jachin and Boaz would appear as the natural adjuncts of such a building, and are therefore, perhaps, best explained as conventional symbols of the God for whose worship the Temple of Solomon was designed.

For another, and entirely improbable, view of their original purpose, namely, that they were huge candelabra or cressets in which 'the net of the sacrifices' was burned, see W. R. Smith's BS, 488; and for the latest attempts to explain the pillars in terms of the Semitic cult and mythology, see A. Jeremias, Das alte Test. im Lichte d. oriental. Myth. [1906], 494, etc.; Benzingier's Heb. Arch. 22d ed. [1807], 233, 331.

JACINTH.—See JEWEL AND PRECIOUS STONES, p. 467*.

JACKAL.—Although the word 'jackal' does not occur in the AV, there is no doubt that this animal is several times mentioned in OT; it occurs several times in RV where AV has 'fox.' (1) The RV is used in Heb. for both animals, but most of the references are most suitably tr. 'jackal.' The only OT passage in which the fox is probably intended is Neh 4, (2) (ananim pl.), AV 'dragons,' is in RV usually tr. 'jackals.' See Is 34:10, Jer 9:10, etc. Post considers 'wolves' would be better. (3) (nimi, tr. AV 'wild beasts of the island' (Is 13:8, 34, Jer 50:50), is in RV tr. 'wolves,' but Post thinks these 'nocturnal creatures' (which implies) were more probably jackals. (4) (chim, 'doleful creatures' (Is 13:2), may also have been jackals. The jackal (Canis aureus) is exceedingly common in Palestine; its mournful cries are heard every night. During the day jackals are frequently seen in the desert, but are usually kept at a distance (Jer 13:13, 34:13). But as soon as the sun sets they issue forth. They may at such times be frequently seen gliding backwards and forwards across the roads seeking for morsels of food. Their eyes are proverbial for their keenness (Ps 63:9). At the present day the Bedouin threaten an enemy with death by saying they will 'throw his body to the jackals.' Though harmless to grown men when solitary, a whole pack may be dangerous. The writer knows of a case where a European was pursued for miles over the Philistine plain by a pack of jackals. It is because they go in packs that we take the RV's tr. of Jg 15:4 to be jackals rather than foxes. Both animals have a weakness for grapes (Ca 2:39). Cf. art. Fox.

JACOB.—1. Son of Isaac and Rebekah. His name is probably an elliptical form of an original Jacob, which 'follows' (1 K 7:14, etc.), and which occurs both on Babylonian tablets and on the pylons of the temple of Karnak. By the time of Jacob this earlier history of the word was overlooked or forgotten, and the name was understood as meaning 'support' or 'strength' by the heel, and thus tries to trip up or supplant' (Gn 25:26, 27, Hos 12*). His history is recounted in Gn 25:26-50, the materials being unquestionably contributed from three sources. For the details of analysis see Dillmann, Com., and Driver, LXX*, p. 16. P supplies but a brief outline; J and E are closely interwoven, though a degree of original independence is shown by an occasional divergence in tradition, which adds to the credibility of the joint narrative. Jacob was born in answer to prayer (25:27), near Beersheba; and the later rivalry between Israel and Edom was thought of as prefigured in the strife of the twins in the womb (25:19). In the earlier stories, however, the differences between the two brothers, each contrasting with the other in character and habit, were marked from the beginning. Jacob grew up a 'quiet man' (Gn 32:25, 26; Rv 12:3). The tr. being still at home, he succeeded in overreaching Esau in two ways. He took advantage of Esau's hunger and heedlessness to secure the birthright, which gave him precedence even during the father's lifetime (43:1), and afterwards a double portion of the patrimony (Dt 21:7), with probably the domestic priesthood. At a later time, after careful consideration (Ge 27:1), he adopted the device suggested by his mother, and, alloying with ingenuous falsehoods (27:20) his father's suspicion, intercepted also his blessing. Isaac was dismayed, but instead of revoking the blessing confirmed it (27:4-23), and was not able to remove Esau's bitterness. In both blessings lasting and political and geographical conditions are reflected. To Jacob is promised Canaan, a well-watered land of fields and vineyards (Dt 11:33), with sovereignty over its peoples, even those who were 'brothers' or descended from the same ancestry as Israel (Ge 19:21, 2 S 5:21). Esau is consigned to the dry and rocky districts of Idumea, with a life of war and plunder; but his subjection to Jacob is limited in duration (2 K 28), if not also in completeness (Ge 27:42), which points to the restlessness of Edom.

Of this successful craft on Jacob's part the natural result on Esau's was hatred and resentment, to avoid which Jacob left his home to spend a few days (27:4) with his uncle in Haran. Two different motives are assigned. JE presents Rebekah as pleading with her son his danger from Esau; but P represents her as suggesting to Isaac the danger that Jacob might marry a sister (27:40). The tradition thus appears on diverging grounds to have come from different sources; but there is no real difficulty in the narrative as it stands. Not only are man's motives often complex; but a woman would have to use different words to a husband and to a son, and if a mother can counsel her son to yield to his fear, a father would be more alive to the possibility of an outbreak of folly. On his way to Haran, Jacob paid a visit to Bethel (cf. 11:8), and his sleep was, not unnaturally, disturbed by dreams; the cromlechs and stone terraces of the district seemed to arrange themselves into a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, with angels ascending and descending, whilst Jehovah Himself bent over him (28:12) with loving assurances. Reminded thus of the watchful providence of God, Jacob's alarms were transmuted into religious awe. He marked the sanctity of the spot by setting up as a memorial pillar the stone on which his head had rested, and undertook to dedicate a tithe of all his gains. Thenceforward Bethel became a famous sanctuary, and Jacob himself visited it again (35:1; cf. Hos 12:4).

Arrived at Haran, Jacob met in his uncle his superior for a time in the art of overreaching. By a ruse Laban secured fourteen years' service (29:7, Hos 12:1, Jth 5), to which six years more were added, under an ingenuous arrangement in which the exact number of years was not outwitted (30:11). At the end of the term Jacob was the head of a household conspicuous even in those days for its magnitude and prosperity. Quarrels with Laban were the seeds of special interest, for God is represented as intervening to turn their arbitrary actions (31:17) to Jacob's advantage. At length he took flight whilst Laban was engaged in sheep-shearing, and, re-crossing the Euphrates on his way home, reached Gilead. There he was overtaken by Laban, whose exasperation was increased by the fact that his teraphim, or household gods, had been taken away by the fugitives, Rachel's hope in stealing them being to appropriate the good fortune of her fathers. The dispute that followed was closed by an alliance of friendship, the double covenant being sealed by setting up in commemoration a cairn with a solitary boulder by its side (31:18), and by assigning a sacrificial feast. Jacob promised to treat Laban's daughters with special kindness, and both Jacob and Laban undertook to respect the boundary they had agreed upon between the territories of Israel and of the Syrian Choruphos Laban. Jacob returned home; and, Jacob continued his journey to Canaan, and was met by the angels of God (32:1), as if to congratulate and welcome him as he approached the Land of Promise.

Jacob's next problem was to conciliate his brother, who was reported to be advancing against him with a large body of men (32). Three measures were adopted. When a submissive message elicited no response, Jacob in dismay turned to God, though without any expression of regret for the deceit by which he had wronged his brother, and proceeded to divide his party into two companies, in the hope that one at least would escape, and to try to appease Esau with a great gift. The next night came the turning point in Jacob's life. Exhibiting the deceit he had been ambitious, steady of purpose, subject to genuine religious feeling, but given up almost wholly to the use of crooked methods. Now the higher elements in his nature gain the ascendancy; and henceforth, though he is less resourceful and politic, his fear of God ceases to be spiel by intervening passions or a competing self-confidence. Alone on the banks of the Jabbok (Wady Zerka), full of doubt as to the fate that would overtake him, he recognizes at last that his real antagonist is not Esau but God. All his fraud and deceit had been pre-eminently sin against God; and what he needed supremely was not reconcilia the two clans, with the sinister motives that prevailed on either side, would be gradually, perhaps slowly, brought to an issue. There would be time to persuade the Shechemites to consent to be circumcised, and to arrange for the treacherous reprisal. Jacob's part in the path was evidently confined chiefly to a vague reproach of his sons for entangling his household in peril, to which they replied with the plea that the honour of the family was the first consideration.

The feeling aroused by the vengeance executed on Shechem made it desirable for Jacob to continue his journey. He was directed by God to proceed some twenty miles southwards to Bethel. Before starting, due preparation was made for a visit to 20 spots. The amulets and images of foreign gods in the possession of his retainers were collected and buried under a teraebirth (35:5; cf. Jos 24:24, Jg 9:5). The people through whom he passed were smitten with such a panic by the news of what had happened at Shechem as not to interfere with him. Arrived at Bethel, he added an altar (35:2) to the monolith he had erected on his previous visit, and received a theophany, for which in mood he was prepared, a renewal of prosperity. The additional pillar he set up (35:4) was probably a sepulchral stele to the memory of Deborah (cf. 35:22), dedicated with appropriate religious services; unless there is an ambiguity as to the nature of the monument, and not really J's version of what E relates in 28:14. From Bethel Jacob led his caravan to Ephrath, a few miles from which place Rachel died in childbirth. This Ephrath was evidently not far from Bethel, and well to the north of Jerusalem (1 S 10:2, Jer 31:14), and therefore the gloss 'the same is Bethlehem' must be due to a confusion with the other Ephrath (Ru 4:11, Mic 5:5), which was south of the Jordan. The next stopping-place was the tower of Eder (35:22) or the 'flock'—a generic name for the watch-towers erected to aid in the protection of the flocks from robbers and wild beasts. Mic 4:8 applies a similar southern spur of Zion. But it cannot be proved that the two allusions coalesce; and actually nothing is known of the site of Jacob's encampment, except that it was between Ephrath and Hebron. His journey ended when he was placed at the last-named place (35:27), the home of his fathers, where he met Esau again, and apparently for the last time, at the funeral of Isaac.

From the time of his return to Hebron, Jacob ceases to be the central figure of the Biblical narrative, which thenceforward revolves round Joseph. Among the leading incidents are Joseph's mission to inquire after his family's welfare, the impressive courage of the old man on the receipt of what seemed conclusive evidence of Joseph's death, the despatch of his surviving sons except Benjamin to buy corn in Egypt (cf. Ac 7:10), the bitterness of the reproach with which he greeted them on their return, and his belated and despairing consent to another expedition as the only alternative to death from famine. The story turns next to Jacob's delight at the news that Joseph is alive, and to his own journey to Egypt through Heersheba, his early home, where he was encouraged by God in visions of the night (46:7). In Egypt he was met by Joseph, and, after an interview with the Pharao, settled in the pastoral district of Goshen (47:11), afterwards known as 'the land of Rameses' (from Rameses 11 of the nineteenth dynasty), in the eastern part of the Delta (47:11). This migration of Jacob to Egypt was an event of the first magnitude in the history of Israel (Dt 26:5, Ac 7:14), as a state in the great providential preparation for Redemption. Jacob lived in Egypt seventeen years (47:7), at the close of which, feeling death to be nigh, he extracted a pledge from Joseph to bury him in Canaan, and adopted his two grandsons, placing the younger, first in anticipation of the pre-eminence of the tribe that would descend from him (48:11). To Joseph himself was promised, as a token of special affection, the conquered districts of Shechem on the lower slopes of Gerizim (49:22, Jn 4:5). Finally, the old man gathered his sons about him, and pronounced upon each in turn a blessing, afterwards wrought up into the elaborate poetical form of 49:25-27. The tribes are reviewed in order, and the character of each is sketched in a description of that of its founder. The atmosphere of the poem in regard alike to geography and to history is that of the period of the judges and early kings, when, therefore, the genuineness of the narrative must take the form in which it has been preserved. After blessing his sons, Jacob gave them together the directions concerning his funeral which he had given previously to Joseph, and died (49:28). His body was embalmed, conveyed to Canaan by a great procession according to the Egyptian custom, and buried in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (50:1).

Opinion is divided as to the degree to which Jacob has been idealized in the Biblical story. If it be remembered that the narrative is based upon popular oral tradition, and did not receive its present form until long after the time to which it relates, and that an interest in national origins is both natural and distinctly manifested in parts of Genesis, some idealization may readily be conceded. It may be sought in three directions—in the attempt to find explanations of existing phenomena suggestive of the peculiar conceptions and sentiments that belonged to the narrator's times, and in the investment of the reputed ancestor with the characteristics of the tribe descended from him. All the conditions are best met by the view that Jacob was a real person, and that the incidents recorded of him are substantially historical. His character, as depicted, is a mixture of evil and good; and his career shows how, by discipline and grace, the better elements came to prevail, and God was enabled to use a faulty man for a great purpose.

2. Father of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1:16).

JACOB'S WELL.—See Sychar.

JACUBUS (1 Es 6:6')—Neh 8:2' Akkub.

JADA.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2:22, 27).

JADDUA.—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:2). 2. A high priest (Neh 12:21, 22). He is doubtless the Jaddua who is named by Josephus in connexion with Alexander the Great (Jos. Ant. xi. VIII. 5. vii. 2, viii. 7).

JADDUS (AV Addus)—A priest whose descendants were unable to trace their genealogy at the return under Zerub, and were removed from the priesthood (1 Es 5:9'). He is there said to have married Augi, a daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai, and to have been called after his name. In Ezr 2:26 and Neh 7:1 he is called by his adopted name Barzillai.

JADON.—A Meronothite, who took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3'). The title 'Meronothite' occurs again I Ch 27:29, but a place Meronoth is nowhere named. According to Jos. (Ant. VIII. 5. i. 1), Jadon was the name of the man of God sent from Judah to Jeroboam (1 K 13).

JAEEL.—The wife of Heber, the Kenite (Jg 4:17). The Kenites were on good terms with the Israelites (1 Es 18') and with the Canaanites, to whom Jabin and his general, Sisera, belonged. On his death by the Israelites, Sisera fled to the tent of Jael, a spot which was doubly sacred to the fugitive, on account both of intertribal friendship and of the rules of Oriental hospitality. The act of treachery whereby Jael slew Sisera (Jg 4:17) was therefore of the basest kind, according to the morals of her own time, and also modern ideas. The praise, therefore, accorded to Jael and her deed in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5:24-27) must be accounted for on the questionable moral principle that an evil deed, if productive of advantage, may be rejoiced over and commended by those who have not taken part in it. The writer of the Song of Deborah records an act which, though base, resulted in putting the seal to the Israelite victory, and thus contributed to the recovery of Israel from a 'mighty oppression' (Jg 4): in the exultation over this result the woman who helped to bring it about by her act is extolled. Though the writer of the Song would probably have considered it his duty to commit such a deed himself, he sees no incoherence in praising it for its beneficent consequences. This is one degree worse than 'doing evil that good may come,' for the evil itself is extolled; whereas, in the other case, it is deplored, and unwillingly acquiesced in because it is 'necessary.' The spirit which praises such an act as Jael's is, in some sense, akin to that of a Jewish custom (Corban) which grew up in later days, and which received the condemnation of Christ.

In Jg 5 the words 'in the days of Jael' create a difficulty, which can be accounted for only by regarding them, with most scholars, as a gloss. See doc. BARAK, DEBORAH, SISERA.

JAGUR.—A town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15:3). The site is unknown.

JAH.—See God, § 2 (g).

JAHAZ (in 1 Ch 6*, Jer 46* Jahazah).—A town at which Sihon was defeated by Israel (Nu 21:35, Dt 23, Jg 11). After the crossing of the Arnon, messengers were sent to Sihon from the 'wilderness of Kedemoth' (Dt 23), and he 'went out against Israel into the wilderness and came to Jahaz,' the wildness which is mentioned in connection with Kedemoth (Jos 13:18, 21). These places indicate a position for Jahaz in the S.E. portion of Shion's territory. Jahaz was one of the Levite cities of Reuben belonging to the children of Merar (Jos 13:18; see also in RVm, 1 Ch 26*). According to the Moabitic Stone (II 15-20), the king of Israel dwelt at Jahaz while at war with king Mesha, but was driven out, and the town was taken and added to Moabite territory. Jeshua (19) and Jeremiah (49) refer to it as in the possession of Moab. The site has not yet been identified.

JAHAZIEL.—1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12*). 2. One of the two priests who blew trumpets before the ark when it was brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15*). 3. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 23* 24*). 4. An Asaphite Levite who encouraged Jehoshaphat and his army against an invading host (2 Ch 20*). 5. The ancestor of a family of exiles who returned (Ezr 8*); called in 1 Es 8* Jezelus.

JAHDAI.—A Calebite (1 Ch 25*).

JAHDIEL.—A Manassite chief (1 Ch 5*).

JAHDO.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5*).

JAHLEEL.—Third son of Zebulan (Ge 46, Nu 26*); patron. Jahleelites (Nu 26*).

JAHMAI.—A man of Issachar (1 Ch 7*).

JAHWEH.—See God, § 2 (f).

JAHZAH.—The form of Jahaz (wh. see) in 1 Ch 6* and Jer 46*.

JAHZEBEL.—Naptali's firstborn (Ge 46, Nu 26*); in the patron. Jahleelites (Nu 26*).

JAHZEIAH.—One of four men who are mentioned as opposing (so RV) Ezra in the matter of the foreign wives (Ezr 10*). The AV regarded Jahzeiah and his companions as supporters of Ezra, announcing 'were employed about this matter.' This view is supported by LXX, 1 Es 8* RVm; but the Heb. phrase here found elsewhere (cf. 1 Ch 21*, 2 Ch 20*, Dn 11*) expresses opposition.

JAHZERAH.—A priest (1 Ch 9*); called in Neh 11* Ahzai.

JAHZIEL.—See JAHZEL.

JAIR.—1. A clan of Jairites lived on the east of Jordan who were called after Jair. This Jair was of the children of Manasseh (Nu 32*), and—if we may assume a traditional fusion—'a judge' (Jg 10*). The settlement of this clan marks a subsequent conquest to that of the west of Jordan. The gentile Jairite is used for Jair (2 S 20*). 2. The father of Mordecai (Est 2*). 3. The father of Elhanan. See ELHANAN, JAARE-OREGIN.

JAIRUS (—Jair).—This Greek form of the name is used in the Apocrypha (Ad. Est 11*) for Mordecai's father Jair (Est 2*); and (1 Es 6*) for the head of a family of Temple servants. In NT it is the name of the ruler of the synagogue whose daughter Jesus raised from the dead (Mk 5*, Lk 8*). In J Mt 9* he is not named. The story of this raising comes from the 'Petrine tradition' (see A. J. MACLEAN).

JAKEH.—Father of Agur, the author of the proverbs contained in Pr 30.

JAKIM.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8*). 2. A priest, head of the 12th course (1 Ch 24*).

JALAM.—A 'son' of Essau (Ge 36:11; 1, 1 Ch 23*).

JALON.—A Calebite (1 Ch 47*).

JAMBES.—See JANNE'S AND JAMBRES.

JAMBI.—A robber tribe which attacked and captured a convey under the charge of John the Macabee. The outrage was avenged by Jonathan and Simon, who waylaid and slaughtered a large party of the 'sons of Jambri' (1 Mac 9*).

JAMES.—1. James, the son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve, the elder brother of John. Their father was a Galilæan fisherman, evidently in a thriving way, since he employed 'hired servants' (Mk 1*). Their mother was Salome, and, since she was apparently a sister of the Virgin Mary (cf. Mt 27*—Mk 15* with Jn 19*), they were cousins of Jesus after the flesh. Like his brother, James worked with Zebedee in partnership with Simon and Andrew (Lk 5*), and he was busy with boat and nets when Jesus called him to leave all and follow Him (Mt 4*—Mk 1* 11*). He was coupled with John's in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10*—Lk 6*—Mk 3*—Lk 6*), which means that, when the Twelve were sent out two by two to preach the Kingdom of God (Mk 6*), they went in company. And they seem to have been men of like spirit. They got from Jesus the same appellation, 'the Sons of Thunder' (see BOANERGES), and they stood, with Simon Peter, on terms of special intimacy with Him. James attained less distinction than his brother, but the reason is not that he had less devotion or aptitude, but that his life came to an untimely end. He was martyred by Herod Agrippa (Ac 12*).

2. James, the son of Alpheus (probably identical with Clopus of Jn 1* RV), styled 'the Little' (not 'the Less'), probably on account of the shortness of his stature, to distinguish him from the other Apostle James, the son of Zebedee. His mother was Mary, one of the devoted women who stood by the Cross and visited the Sepulchre. He had a brother Jesus, who was apparently a believer. See Mk 1*, Jn 19*, Mk 15*.

Tradition says that he had been a tax-gatherer, and it is very possible that his father Alpheus was the same person as Alpheus the father of Levi the tax-gatherer (Mk 2*), afterwards Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist. If these identifications be admitted, that family was indeed highly favoured. It gave to the Kingdom of heaven a father, a mother, and three sons, of whom two were Apostles.
JAMES, EPISTLE OF

3. James, the Lord’s brother (see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). Like the rest of the Lord’s brethren, James did not believe in Him while He lived, but acknowledged His claims after the Resurrection. He was won to faith by a special manifestation of the risen Lord (1 Co 15:7); and thereafter he rose to high eminence. He was the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and figures in that capacity on three occasions. (1) Three years after his conversion Paul went up to Jerusalem to interview Peter. On that occasion he stayed with Peter for fifteen days with which that he knew no one else except James (Gal 1:18, 19). So soon did James’s authority rival Peter’s. (2) After an interval of fourteen years Paul went up again to Jerusalem (Gal 2:1-10). This was the occasion of the historic conference regarding the terms on which the Gentiles should be admitted into the Christian church; and James acted as president, his decision being unanimously accepted (Ac 15:8-9). (3) James was the acknowledged head of the Church at Jerusalem, and when Paul returned from his third missionary journey he waited on him and made a report to him in presence of the elders (Ac 21:18-19).

A JAMES, EPISTLE OF.—1. The author. The author claims to be ‘James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ’ (1:1). He is usually identified with the Lord’s brother the ‘bishop’ of Jerusalem, not a member of the Twelve, but an apostle in the wider sense (see JAMES, 3). The name is common, and the writer adds no further note of identification. This fact makes for the authenticity of the address. If this Epistle had been pseudonymous, the hypothetical author would have defined the position of the James whose authority he wished to claim, and the same objection holds good against any theory of interpolation. Or again, if it has been shown that James wrote under his own name, he must have distinguished himself from his better known namesakes. The absence of description supports the common view of the authorship of the letter; it is a mark of modesty, the brother of the Lord not wishing to insist on his relationship after the flesh; it also points to a consciousness of authority; the writer expected to be listened to, and knew that his mere name was a sufficient description of himself. So Jude writes merely as ‘the brother of James.’ It has indeed been doubted whether a Jew of his position could have written such good Greek as we find in this Epistle, but we know very little of the scope of Jewish education, and perhaps the opportunity for intercourse with Greeks in Galilee, and a priori arguments of this nature can at most be only subsidiary. If indeed the late date, suggested by some, be adopted, the possibility of the author being the Lord beker the author is excluded, since he probably died in 62; otherwise there is nothing against the ordinary view. If that be rejected, the author is entirely unknown. More will be said in the rest of the article on the subject; but attention must be called to the use of the word ‘faith’ in language between this Epistle and the speech of James in Ac 15.

2. Date.—The only indications of date are derived from indirect internal evidence, the interpretation of which depends on the view taken of the main problems raised by the Epistle. It is variously put, either as one of the earliest of NT writings (so Mayor and most English writers), or as one of the very latest (the general German opinion). The chief problem is the relationship of other writings of the NT. The Epistle has striking resemblances to several books of the NT, and these resemblances admit of very various explanations. (a) Most important is its relation to St Paul. It has points of contact with Romans: 1:18 and Ro 1:8 (hearers and doers of the law); 1:4 and Ro 5:4 (the gradual work of temptation or tribulation); 4:1 and Ro 3:14 (the critic self-condemned); 1:4 and Ro 7:9 13; and the contrast between 2:9 and Ro 4:1 (the faith of Abraham). Putting the latter aside for the moment, it is hard to pronounce on the question of priority. Sanday-Headlam (Romans, p. lxxix) see ‘no resemblance in style sufficient to prove literary connexion; there are no parallels in order, and similarities of language can mostly be explained from OT and LXX. Mayor, in the other hand, supposes that St Paul is working up hints received from James.

The main question turns upon the apparent opposition between James and Paul with regard to ‘faith and works.’ The chief passages are 2:14, 15, 20, 26, 28, with 1:26, 27; 2:1, 12, 16, 17; Gal 3:2, 3; 4:13; 5:4; and Col 2:16. The Epistle is nearly forty years later than the tape of Abraham, and yet, in the writer’s view, by no means does St James mean the same as St Paul; St James means a certain belief, mainly intellectual, in the one God (the fundamental creed of the Jew, to which a belief in Christ has been added. To St Paul ‘faith’ is essentially ‘faith in Christ’ (Ro 3:28, 30 etc.). The faith has been in his own experience a tremendous overmastering force, bringing with it a convulsion of his whole nature; he has put on Christ, died with Him, and risen to a new life. Such an experience lies outside the experience of a St James, a typically ‘good’ man, with a practical matter of fact, and somewhat limited view of life. To him ‘conduct is three-fourths of life,’ and he claims Epitaph that men shall authenticate in practice their verbal professions. To a St Paul, with an overwhelming experience working on a mystical temperament, such a demand is almost meaningless. To him faith is the new creation in Christ, and of that it brings forth works. ‘[The man of the] Spirit, if it exists at all; faith must always work by love’ (Gal 5:6). He indeed guards himself carefully against any idea that belief in the sense of verbal confession or intellectual assent is enough in itself (Ro 2:14), and defines ‘the works’ which he disparages as ‘works of the law’ (3:20). Each writer, in fact, would agree with the doctrine of the other when he came to understand it, though St James’s would appear to St Paul as insufficient, and St Paul’s to St James as somewhat too profound and mysterious (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, pp. 102 ff).}

It is unfortunately not so easy to explain the literary relation between the two. At first sight the two points of contact are so striking that we are inclined to say that one must have seen the words of the other. Lightfoot, however, has shown (Galatians, pp. 157 ff.) that the history of Abraham, and in particular Gn 15, figured frequently in Jewish theological discussions. The verse is quoted in 1 Mac 2:4, ten times by Philo, and in the Talmudic treatise Mechilla. But the antithesis between ‘faith and works’ seems to be essentially Christian; and it cannot, therefore, be called to the ground of the Jewish use of Gn 15, deny any relationship between the writings of the two Apostles. This much, at least, seems clear; St James was not writing with Romans before, and with the deliberate intention of contradicting St. Paul. His arguments, so regarded, are obviously inadequate, and make no attempt, even superficially, to meet St. Paul's real position. It is, however, quite possible that he may have written as he did to correct not St. Paul himself, but misunderstandings of his teaching, which no doubt easily arose (2 P 3:4). On the other hand, if with Mayer we adopt a very early date for the Epistle, St. Paul may equally well be correcting suggestions of his fellow-Apostle's position, which indeed in itself must have appeared insufficient to him; we are reminded of the Judaisers 'who came from James' before the conclusion of Ac 15:19. St. Paul, according to this view, preserves all that is valuable in St. James by his insistence on life and conduct, while he supplements it with a profounder teaching, and guards against misinterpretations by a more careful definition of terms; e.g., in Gal 2:4 (cf. Ja 2:24) he defines 'works' as 'works of the law,' and 'faith' as 'faith in Jesus Christ.' We must also bear in mind the possibility that the resemblance in language on this and other subjects may have been due to personal intercourse between the two (Gal 1:11, Ac 15:1); in discussing these questions together they may well have come to use very similar terms and illustrations; and this possibility makes the question of priority a dangerous one. The R.is very hard to pronounce with any certainty on the date of the Epistle from literary considerations. On the whole, they make for an early date. Such a date is also supported by the fact that the R.is the only New Testament word used in the Gospels. The other subject, the atmosphere and technical and usual word for 'begat' in 11:1 and the general circumstances of the Epistle (see below); and the absence of any reference to the Gentile controversy make it almost a date before the Council of Ac 15, i.e. before 52 a.D.

(b) Again, the points of contact with 1 Peter (11:5, 1 P 1:4, 4:6) and Hebrews (2:11, 11:12), though striking, are lost to us in the text. We come to the conclusion, in the view that James is 'secondary' throughout, and makes a general use of the Epp. of NT.

(c) It will be convenient to treat here the relation to the Gospels and particularly to the Sermon on the Mount, though this is still less decisive as to the date. The variations are too strong to allow us to suppose a direct use of the Gospels; the sayings of Christ were long quoted in varying forms, and in 5:3 St. James has a remarkable agreement with Justin (Ap. 1, 16), as against Mt 5:27. The chief parallels are the condemnation of 'bearers only' (132; Mt 7:28, 22:17), of critics (41, Mt 7:1-4), of worldliness (11:2, 4, etc., Mt 6:10, Mt 7:2, Mk 10:33, Mk 6:6), humility (4:9, Mt 23:12), the tree and its fruits (3:4, Mt 3:3); see Salmon, Intro. to NT p. 455. This familiarity with our Lord's language agrees well with the hypothesis that the author who had been brought up in the same home, and had often listened to His teaching, though not originally a disciple, it can hardly, however, be said necessarily to imply such a close personal relationship.

3. The type of Christianity implied in the Epistle.

We are at once struck by the fact that the direct Christian references are very few. Christ is only twice mentioned by name (1:20), not a word is said of His descent or resurrection. His example of patience (2:16; 1 contrast 1 P 2:21), or of prayer (5:7; contrast He 5:7). Hence the suggestion has been made by Spitta that we have really a Jewish document which has been adapted by a Christian writer, as happened, e.g., with 2 Esdras and the Didache. The answer is obvious, that no editor would have been satisfied with so slight a revision. We find, indeed, on looking closer, that the Christian element is greater than appears at first, and also that it is of such a nature that it cannot be regarded as interpolated. The parallels with our Lord's teaching already noticed, could not be explained as due to independent borrowing from earlier Jewish sources, even on the very doubtful assumption that any such existed as containing the substance of His teaching. Again, we find Christ mentioned (probably) in connexion with the Parousia (5:1) not probably not references to the crucifixion, and 'the Lord' is not original in 11:1; 'beloved brethren' (18:19, 20), the new birth (11:18), the Kingdom (24), the name which is blasphemed (27), and the royal law of liberty (12:4, 9) are all predominantly Christian ideas. It cannot, then, be denied that the general tone of the Epistle is Judaic. The type of organization implied is primitive, and is described mainly in Jewish phraseology: synagogue (28), elders of the Church (5:12), and ostracizing (4:3). Above all, we come again to the address 'to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion' (11), taken in its literal sense. St. James remained to the end of his life a strict Jew, noted for his devotion to the Law (Ac 15:28), and in the Epistle the Law, though transformed, is set before us as a synonym for the Gospel. His argument as to the paramount importance of conduct is exactly suited to the atmosphere in which he lived, and of which he realized all the dangers. The R.is the only one of the two (R. James and R. Paul) that at all resembles the Hebrews (4:1-11).

2. The Epistle was written probably during the first half of the 2nd century A.D., and the theme of the Epistle is the struggle against the influence of the Gentile type of Christianity, which is contrasted with the traditional Jewish type of Christianity. The Epistle is addressed to the Jewish Christians, and its main purpose is to show the necessity of adhering to the Jewish law and tradition, and to warn against the dangers of the Gentile type of Christianity. The Epistle is influenced by the teachings of Jesus Christ, and its main theme is the importance of righteousness and faith. The Epistle is a valuable source for understanding the spiritual and ethical teachings of Jesus Christ, and its main purpose is to encourage the Jewish Christians to remain faithful to the Jewish law and tradition, and to resist the temptations of the Gentile type of Christianity.
JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF

very abrupt. Of the theories, however, which have so far been advanced, the view that it is a primitive Christian writing at least presents the fewest difficulties, though it still leaves much unexplained.

4. Early canonization and antiquity. The Epistle presents points of contact with Clement of Rome, Hermas, and probably with Irenæus, but it is first quoted as Scripture by Origen. Eusebius, though he quotes it himself without reserve, mentions the fact that few of his contemporaries had done so (HE ii. 23), and classed it among the 'disputed' books of the Canon (iii. 25). It is not mentioned in the Muratorian Fragment, but is included in the Peshitta (the Syriac version), together with the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Catholic Epistles. The evidence shows that it was acknowledged in the East earlier than in the West, possibly as being addressed to the Eastern (?) Dispersion, though its apparent use by Clem. Rom. and Hermas suggests that it may have been written in Rome. The scarcity of quotations from it and its comparative neglect may be due to its Jewish and non-doctrinal tone, as well as to the fact that it did not claim to be Apostolic and seemed to contradict St. Paul. Others before Luther may well have found it 'an epistle of straw.'

5. Style and teaching. As has been said, the tone of the Epistle is Judaic. In addition to the Jewish features already pointed out, we may note its insistence on righteousness, and its praise of wisdom and poverty, which are characteristic of Judaism at its best. Its illustrations are drawn from the OT, and its style frequently recalls that of Proverbs, and the Prophets, particularly on its sternier side. The worldly are 'adulteresses' (46); cf. the OT conception of Israel as the bride of Jehovah, whether faithful or unfaithful', and writers' 'have of the Epistle is full of warnings and denunciations; 54 imperatives have been counted in twice as many verses. The quotations, however, are mainly from the LXX. 'greeting' (11) is the LXX formula for the , and occurs in the letter of Ac 15. The points of contact with our Lord's teaching have been already noticed; the Epistle follows him also in its fondness for metaphors from nature (cf. the parables), and in its positive element which appears continually: 117 is actually a hexameter, but it has not been recognized as a quotation. The style is vivid and abrupt, sometimes obscure, with a great variety of vocabulary; there are 70 words not found elsewhere in NT. There is no close connexion of ideas, or logical development of the subject; a word seems to suggest the following paragraph (e.g. ch. 1). Allusion is indulged in use of the Epistle. Its main purpose was to encourage endurance under persecution and oppression, together with consistency of life; and its leading ideas are the dangers of speaking of sin, of worldliness, and the value of true faith, prayer, and wisdom. The Epistle is essentially 'pragmatic'; i.e. it insists that the test of belief lies in 'value for conduct.' It does not, indeed, ignore the deeper side; it has its theology with its teaching of regeneration, faith, and prayer, but the writer's main interest lies in ethics. The condition of the heathen world around made it necessary to insist on the value of a consistent life. That was Christianity; and neither doctrinal nor moral purpose, as of the origin of evil, trouble him. The Epistle does not reach the heights of a St. Paul or a St. John, but it has its value. It presents, sharply and in emphasis, a side of Christianity which is always in danger of being forgotten, and the practical mind in particular will always feed the force of its practical message.

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF. — See GOSPELS [APOCRYPHAL]. § 5.

JAMIN. — 1. A son of Simeon (Gen 46:11, Ex 6:14, Nu 26:11, 1 Ch 4:14). The gentile name Jaminites occurs in Nu 26:11. 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 2:2). 3. A priest (?) or Levite) who took part in the promulgating of the Law (Neh 8:1; in 1 Es 9:3; Iadinus).

JANIECH. — A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4:4).

JAMNA (1 Mac 4:15 5:1 10:5 15:5, 2 Mac 12:8 8:49).— The later name of Jabneh (v.b. see). The gentile name Jamnites occurs in 2 Mac 12:8.

JANAL. — A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5:18).

JANGLING. —'Jangling,' says Chaucer in the Parson's Tale, 'is what man speketh to moche before folk, and dalpeth as a mille, and taketh no kepe what he seith.' The word is used in 1 Ti 3:5 'vain jangling' (RV 'vain talking'); and in the heading of 1 Ti 6:2 'to avoid profane jangling,' where it stands for 'babblings' in the text (1 Ti 6:9).

JANIM. — A town in the mountains of Hebron, near Beth-lappuveh (Jos 15:20). The site is uncertain.

JANAN. — An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:24).

JANNE'S AND JAMBRAS. — In 2 Ti 3:15 these names are given as those of Nicodemus and Cleopas: the latter is mentioned in Ex 30:24 (e.g. as a Semitic root meaning 'bitter', 'unfaithful), but both are named in Ac 13:10 (by name and in verse), and in Ac 152:1; in Ac 152:1; in 1 Ti 3:9, 2 Ti 3:15, the various reading 'Mambres' (or 'Mamre'). 'Jannes' is probably a corruption of 'Johannes' (John); 'Jambres' is almost certainly derived from a Semitic root meaning 'lame' (imperfect tense), the participle of which would give 'Mambres.' The names were even known to the heathen. Pliny the Elder (A.D. 23-79) mentions 'Moses, Jannes (or James), and Jotapates (or Lotapates) as Jewish magicians (Hist. Nat. xxx, 1, 11); thus 'Jannes,' at least, must have been a traditional name before the Christian era. Apuleius (c. a.D. 150) in his Apologia speaks of Moses and Jannes as magicians; the Cythigorean Numenius (2nd cent. A.D.), according to Origen (c. Cels. iv. 51), related the account respecting Moses and Jannes and Jambres, and Eusebius gives the words of Numenius (Prap. Ev. ix. 8). In his Commentary on Mt 27:27 (known only in a Latin translation), Origen says that St. Paul is quoting from a book called 'Jannes and Mambres' (etc.). But Theodoret (Com. in loc.) declares that he is merely using the unwritten teaching of the Jews. Jannes and Jambres are also referred to in the Apocryphal Gospel of Noodemos § 5 (4th or 5th cent. in its present form?), and in the Apostolic Constitutions, vili. 1 (c. a.D. 375). Later Jewish fancy ran wild on these names; according to one story, according to another, they were drowned in the Red Sea; or they were put to death, either for inviting Aaron to make the Golden Calf or at a later stage of the history. A. J. MACLEAN.

JANOAH. — 1. A town in the northern mountains of Naphtali, near Kedesh (2 K 10:28). It is probably the modern Yânûh. 2. A place on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16:7); situated where the present Yânûn now stands, with the supposed tomb of Nun.

JAPHETH (Heb. Yepheth). — 1. One of the sons of Noah. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain. In Gen 10 there is a play on names: the) and make wide (yaphû) for Yepheth (i.e. make room for him), that he may dwell in the tents of Shem.' The peoples connected with Japheth (10:4) occupy the northern portion of the known world, and include the Medes (Medes) on the E. of Assyria, Javan (Ionian Gk: i.e. Greeks) on the W. coast and islands of Asia Minor, and Tarshish (Tarshish) on the W. coast of Spain. On the two traditions respecting the sons of Noah see Ham. 2. An unknown locality mentioned in Jth 2:1.

the south border of Zebulun (Jos 19:3); probably the modern Ya'f節, near the foot of the Nazareth hills.

JAPHELET.—An Asherite family (1 Ch 7:31). JAPHELETTES.—The name of an unidentified tribe mentioned in stating the boundaries of the children of Joseph (Jos 16:11). JARAH.—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 9:4. In 8th b.c. he was Jobashadah.

JAREB.—It is not safe to pronounce dogmatically on the text and meaning of Hos 5:10. But our choice lies between two alternatives. If we adhere to the current text, we must regard Jareb (or Jarib) as a son of Judah, who by marriage to indicate the love of conflict which characterized the Assyrian king. Thus 'King Jarib' = 'King Warrior,' 'King Striver,' 'King Combat,' or the like; and the events referred to are those of n.c. 782 (see 2 K 15:34). Most of the ancient versions support this, as, e.g., LXX, 'King Jarins'; Symm. and Vulg., 'King Avenger.' If we divide the Hebrew consonants differently, We get 'the great king,' corresponding to the Assy. sharru rabbu (cf. 2 K 18:11). It has even been thought that this signification could be accepted without any textual change. In any case linguistic and historical evidence is against the idea that Jareb is the proper name of an Assyrian or an Egyptian monarch. Other, less probable, emendations are 'king of Arabia,' 'king of Jathrib or of Aribi' (both in N. Arabia).

JARED.—The father of Enoch (Gen 5:13, 18, 19, 20, 1 Ch 1:3, Lk 3:37).

JARH.—An Egyptian slave who married the daughter of master Sheshan (1 Ch 2:42).

JABIR.—1. The eponym of a Simeonite family (1 Ch 4:4—Jachin of Gn 46:16, Ex 6:14, Nu 26:20). 2. One of the 'chief men' who were sent by Ezra to Caspia in search of Levites (Ezr 8:33); called in 1 Es 8:19 Jerobias. 3. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ex 10:3); called in 1 Es 19:3 Jerobias.

JARIMOTH (1 Es 9:9)—Ezr 10:7 Jeremiah.

JARMUTH.—1. A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 10:8 etc.). In the Shekeliah, assigned to Judah (Jos 15:13). It is probably identical with 'Jermuch,' of the Onomasticon, 10 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the Jerusalem road. This is now Kherbet Yarmuk, between Wady es-Surat and Wady es-Sant, about 8 miles N. of Beit Jibrin. 2. A city in Issachar, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21:19, LXX B Remuhn). It corresponds to Ramoth in 1 Es 26:2 and Remeth appears in Jos 19:10 among the cities of Issachar. Guthe suggests er-Râmeh, about 11 miles S.W. of Jerin, but this is uncertain. W. Ewing.

JAROB.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5:9).

JASEELUS (1 Es 9:9)—Ezr 10:8 Sheelah.

JASHAR, BOOK OF (.Masker ha-yigshar, 'Book of the Righteous One').—An ancient book of national songs, which most likely contained both religious and secular songs describing great events in the history of the nation. In the OT there are two quotations from this book—(a) Jos 10:13; the original form must have been a personal description of the battle of Gibeon, in which would have been included the old-world account of Jahweh casting down great stones from heaven upon Israel's enemies. (b) 2 S 11:27; in this case the quotation is of interest only in relation to the account of David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan. In each case the Book of Jashar is referred to as well known; one might expect, therefore, that other quotations from it would be found in the OT, and perhaps this is actually the case with, e.g., the Song of Deborah (Jg 5) and some other ancient pieces, which originally may have had a reference to their source in the title (e.g. 1 K 18:41).

JAZIZ

by Khirbet Sār, about 7 miles W. of 'Am'mān, a mile E. of Wādy Stūr. Judas Maccabaeus took the city, which was then in the hands of the Ammonites (1 Mac 5:8; Jos. Ant. xii. vii. 1).

JAZZ.—A Hargite who was 'over the flocks' of king David (1 Ch 27:3).

JEALOUSY.—The law of the 'jealousy ordeal' (in which a wife suspected of unfaithfulness had to prove her innocence by drinking the water of bitterness ['holy water mixed with dust from the floor of the Tabernacle'] in the temple of Nu 5:11-31). The conception of idolatry as adultery and of Jehovah as the Husband of Israel led the OT writers frequently to speak of Him as a Jealous God (Ex 34:14; Deut 4:24; 1 Sam 15:29; 1 Kgs 14:16; 2 Kgs 17:7, 13, 14). This jealousy is the indication of Jehovah's desire to maintain the purity of the spiritual relation between Himself and His people. Extraordinary zeal for this same end is characteristic of the servants of Jehovah, and is sometimes called jealousy with them (2 Co 11:1, Nu 23:11, 1 K 19:4). A few times the word is used in a bad sense (Ro 13:10, 1 Co 3:2, 2 Co 12:20, Gal 5:20, Ja 3:10). D. A. Haynes.

JEARIM, MOUNT.—Mentioned only in 1 K 14:27, where it is identified with Chesalon (wh. sec.);

JEATHERAI.—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6:28); called in v. 9 Ethni.

JEBERECIAH.—The father of Zechariah, a friend of Isaiah (Is 8:2).

JEBUS, JEBUSITES.—The former is a name given to Jerusalem by J J 19:21 and imitated by the Chronicler (1 Ch 11:1); the latter is the tribe which inhabited Jerusalem from before the Israelite conquest till the reign of David. It was formerly supposed that Jerusalem was the original name of Jerusalem, but the letters of Abdi-Khiba among the el-Amarna tablets prove that the city was called Jerusalem (Ururu-sattin) about 1400. No trace of Jebusites appears then. The name of the city was brought down in the tents of the Jebusites. J states that at the time of the Israelite conquest the king of Jerusalem was Adoni-zedek (Jos 10:9), and that the Israelites did not expel the Jebusites from the city (Jos 10:9, 11, 12). During the time of the Judges the Jebusites (Jg 19:11), and gives a brief account of its capture by David (2 S 5:6-9). E mentions the Jebusites only once (Nu 13:20), and then only to say that, like the Hittites and Amorites, they inhabited the mountains. The favourite list of Palestinian nations which D and his followers insert so often usually ends with Jebusite, but adds nothing to their history. P mentions them once (Jos 10:18). They are mentioned in Neh 8:1 and Ezr 9:1, and are described as dwellers in Jerusalem, 'Jebusites' (so Wellhausen, Nowack, and Marti). The name of the king, Adoni-zedek, would indicate that the Jebusites were Semitic, probably related to the Canaanites.

David captured their city and dwelt in it, and it was subsequently called the 'city of David.' From references to this (cf. Jerusalem) it is clear that the Jebusite city was situated on the southern part of the eastern hill of present Jerusalem, and that that hill was called Zion. Its situation was supposed by the Jebusites to render the city impregnable (2 S 5:6).

One other Jebusite besides Adoni-zedek, namely, Araunah, is mentioned by name. The Temple is said to have been erected on a threshing-floor purchased from him (cf. 2 S 24:18, 23). It would seem from this narrative that the Jebusites were not exterminated or expelled, but remained in Jerusalem, and were gradually absorbed by the Israelites.

George A. Barton.

JECHELLAH (In 2 K 15:6 Jecollah).—The mother of king Uzziah (2 Ch 26:17).

JECCHONIAS.—See JECCHONIAS.

JECHONIAD.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:30); called in 9th Jarah.
JEHOADDAN

JEHOADDAN (2 Ch 25:2, and, as vocalized, 2 K 14:2). The covenants of the text in 2 K 14:4 give the form Jehaddan (see RV).—Mother of Amaziah king of Judah.

JEHOAHAZ. 1. Jehoahaz of Israel (in 2 K 14:4 and 2 Ch 34:18, 4:18) succeeded his father Jehu. Our records tell us nothing of him except the length of his reign, which is given as seventeen years (2 K 18:1), and the low estate of his kingdom, owing to the agressions of Syria. A turn for the better seems to have come before his death, because the forces of Assyria, pressing on the north of Damascus, turned the attention of that country away from Israel (v.4-5).

2. Jehoahaz of Judah (in 1 Es 1:4, 11:14 or Jeconias; in v.38 Zarakias) was the popular choice for the throne after the death of Josiah (2 K 23:28). But Pharaoh-necho, who had obtained possession of all Syria, regarded his coronation as an act of hostility, deposed him in favour of his brother Jehohanan, and carried him away to Egypt, where he died (v.5--6). Jeremiah, who called him Shallum, finds his fate sadder than that of his father who fell in battle (Jer 22:19-11).

JEHOASH, in the shorter form JOASH, is the name of a king in each of the two lines, Israel and Judah.

1. Jehoash of Israel was the son of Jehoahaz. When an eleven years old and in the temple treasury. Jehoash was assassinated by some of his officers (2 K 11:1).

2. Jehoash of Israel was the third king of the line of Jehu. The turn of the tide in the affairs of Israel came about the time of his accession. The way in which the Biblical author indicates this is characteristic. He tells us that when Elisha was about to die Jehoash came to visit him, and wept over him as a great power about to be lost to Israel. Elisha bade him take bow and arrows and shoot the arrow of victory towards Damascus, then to strike the ground with the arrows. The three blows which he struck represent the three victories obtained by Jehoash, and the blame expressed by Elisha indicated that his contemporaries thought the kingdom was in a slack in following up his advantage. Jehoash also obtained a signal victory over Judah in a war wantonly provoked; it would seem, by Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Ch 25:6).—H. P. Smith.

JEHOHANAN.—1. 1 Ch 26:1; a Korahite doorkeeper.

2. 2 Ch 17:16 one of Jehoshaphat's five captains. (2 Es 10:9, 1 Es 9:9, Johanan, Neh 12:21). Jonathan, Neh 12:21 high priest. He is called son of Eliashib in 1 Es 10:9, Neh 12:21, but probably his grandson. Jehoiada being his father (Neh 12:22, 25).

3. 4 Es 10:9 (Joanes, 1 Es 9:9), one of those who had taken 'strange' wives. 5. Neh 6:14 (Tohiah the Ammonite, Neh 12:18; the Ammonite, Neh 12:18) a priest in the days of Jehoiada.

JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah, ascended the throne when Nebuchadrezzar was on the march to punish the rebellion of Jehoiakim. On the approach of the Chaldean army, the young prince fled and was carried away to Babylon (2 K 24:12). His reign had lasted only three months, but his confinement in Babylon extended until the death of Nebuchadrezzar—thirty-seven years. Ezekiel, who saw him given as the rightful king of Judah even in captivity, pronounced a dirge over him (19:11). At the accession of Evil-merodach he was freed from durance, and received a yearly allowance from the royal palace (2 K 25:27). He is further alluded to in Jer 22:30; 25:27; 28:8, 29 as a true son of Judah, and in Is 14:27 as a true son of David. He was kept a prisoner in Babylon until his death (2 K 25:27; 2 Ch 36:11; Jer 22:30; 25:27; 28:8). The Book of Chronicles makes him the husband of the princess Jehooshan (or Jehoshebah, 2 Ch 36:20), by whose presence of mind infant prince Jehoash escaped the massacre by which Atahilah secured the throne for herself. Jehoiachin must have been privy to the concurrence of the prince, and it was he who arranged the coup d'etat which placed the rightful heir on the throne. This he may have been moved by a desire to save Judah from vanquish to Israel, as much as by zeal for the legitimate worship.

JEHONADAB or JONADAB.

JEHONADAB or JONADAB. 1. Son of Shimah, David's brother, and the friend of Amnon the son of David. He is described as 'a very subtle man.' He aided Amnon in his intrigue and was carried away by the king's officer. Among the thirty-seven years of Ezekiel, who saw him given as the rightful king of Judah even in captivity, pro
JEHONATHAN
formulator of the rules imposed upon descendants, by the Rechabites (Jer 35; see RECHABITES). Jehonadab was thoroughly in sympathy with the measures adopted by Jeho for the vindication of the religion of Y (2 K 10:14).

JEHONATHAN.—A more exact rendering of the name usually represented in English as Jonathan.
In RV this form occurs twice. 1. 2 Ch 17:1 one of the Laudies sent out by Jehoshaphat with the Book of the Law to teach the people in the cities of Judah.
2. Neh 12:1 the head of the priestly family of Shemai.
his name is not known in the OT.

1. Jehoram of Israel was a son of Ahab (2 K 3:9), came to the throne after the brief reign of his brother Ahaziah. The first thing that claimed his attention was the revolt of Moab. This he endeavoured to suppress, and with the aid of Jehoshaphat of Judah he obtained some successes. But at the crisis of the conflict the king of Moab sacrificed his son to his god Chemosh. The result was that the invading army was discouraged, and the allies retreated without accomplishing their purpose (2 K 3:27). It is probable that the Moabites assumed the offensive, and took the Israelite cities of whose capture Mesha boasts. The prophet Elisha was active during the reign of Jehoram, and it is probable that the siege of Samaria, of which we have so graphic an account in 2 K 6 and 7, also belongs to this period. Jehoram engaged in the siege of Ramothghim, and was wounded there. The sequel in the reign of Jehu is well known. See Jeju.

2. Jehoram of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat, came to the throne during the reign of the other Jehoram in Israel. He was married to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, and Jezebel. All that the history tells us is that he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, and that Edom revolted successfully from Judah in his time.
In view of these tendencies, the name Jehoram is a bad omen, but with a few of his men he cut his way through the troops that surrounded him (2 K 8:24).
3. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law
(2 Ch 17).

H. P. SMITH.

JEHOSHABEATH.—See Jehoshabea.

JEHOHAPATH.—1. The 'recordor' in the reigns of David and Solomon (2 S 25 etc., 1 K 4). 2. One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4:17). 3. Father He receives a good name from the compiler of 1 Book of Kings (1 K 22), this is chiefly because he carried out the religious reforms of his father.
The important thing in his reign was the alliance of Judah with Israel (v.14), which put an end to their long hostility.
Some suppose the smaller kingdom to have been tributary to the larger, but on this point our sources are silent.
The alliance was cemented by the marriage of the crown prince Jehoram to Ahab's daughter Athaliah (2 K 8:19).
Jehoshaphat appears as the ally of Ahab against Syria, and himself went into the battle of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22).
He also assisted Ahab's son against the Moabites
(2 K 5). He seems to have had trouble with his own vassals in Edom, and his attempt to renew Solomon's carnal ventures on the Red Sea was unsuccessful (1 K 22:30).

JEHOJASHAPATH, VALLEY OP (J 3:15).—The deep valley to the E. of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mt. of Olives, has since the 4th cent. A.D. been identified by an unbroken Christian tradition with the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Moslems and Jews have also for centuries looked upon this valley as the scene of the Last Judgement. The Jews especially consider this of all places on earth the most suitable for burial, as it is taught that all bodies buried elsewhere must find their way thither at the last day. The valley was the ordinary place for graves in pre-exilic times (2 K 23 etc.). In spite, however, of these traditions, it is quite probable that the name of this valley was at one time Wady Shafa't, from the neighbouring village of Shafa't, and that this suggested to early Christian pilgrims, in search of sites, the Biblical name Jehoshaphat. The so-called 'Tomb of Jehoshaphat,' which lies near the traditional location of Absalom, is an impossible site, for in 1 K 22:22 and 2 Ch 21:1 it is stated that he was buried in the city of David. The valley, moreover, does not suit the conditions, in that it is a wadis (dry), the wadis Kifer (wadi see), whereas the Valley of Jehoshaphat was in Heb.
an 'emeq (a wide, open valley). It has been suggested that the valley ('Emeq) of Berachah, where Jehoshaphat returned thanks after his great victory (2 Ch 20:28), may be the place referred to by Jehovah, as it seems as probable that the prophet did not refer to any special locality and gave the name Jehoshaphat, i.e. 'Jehovah judges,' to an ideal spot.

JEHOSEBA (2 K 11; Jehoshabeath in 2 Ch 22:1).—
Daughter of Jehoram of Judah. On the death of her half-brother Ahaziah, she was instrumental in preserving the Davidic stock, by concealing the infant Jehosha in a lumbler-room of the palace (R V m). According to the Chronicles, she was wife of Jehu.

JEHOVAH.—See Gen, § 2 (f).

JEHOVAH-JIREH.—The name given by Abraham
(Gn 22:1) to the spot where he offered a ram in place of his son. The name means 'Jehovah sees,' and probably also (with reference to Gn 22:2) 'Jehovah provides.' The proverb which is connected in v. 11 with the name clearly relates to the Temple hill, 'the mount of the Lord.' But it is not easy to see the exact connexion between the name and the proverb. The most obvious translation is 'in the mount of Jehovah one appears' (referring to the festal pilgrimages to Jerusalem), but in that case the connexion can be only verbal. Other possible translations are: (1) 'In the mount of Jehovah it is seen,' i.e. provided; this is a possible translation in the context; but it appears to be unappropriate since the proverb had an existence independently of the tradition of Abraham's sacrifice; in which case the meaning assigned to the verb is not a natural or obvious
one. (2) 'In the mount of Jehovah, Jehovah is seen.'
The significance of the phrase would then be that,
Jehovah sees the needs of those who come to worship Him, so as a practical result He is seen by them as a helper. Other translations have been suggested which do not, however, alter the general sense. Driver decides that, unless the connexion be regarded as purely verbal, the last suggestion quoted above seems the most satisfactory. In any case, the point lies in the connexion between the name which Abraham gave to the place of his sacrifice and some popular proverb dealing with the Temple at Jerusalem.

JEHOVAH-NISSI ("J" is my banner).—The name given by Moses to the altar he erected after the defeat of Amalek, Ex 17:15 (E). God is considered the centre or rallying point of the army of Israel, and the name of God as their battle-cry (cf. 156). The interpretation of v.16 is somewhat doubtful. Many critics read nsw ("banner") for k'w ("kisseh," "throne"), but this appears neither to be necessary nor to yield a suitable sense. "The meaning is probably either 'J' hath sworn" (EV), or 'I (Moses) swear" (with hand uplifted
"at J's throne)."

JEHOVAH-SHALOM.—The name given by Gideon to the altar he erected at Ophrah (Jg 6:17). The name means 'J is peace,' (i.e. well-disposed), in allusion to J's words in v.28 "Peace be unto thee.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH ("J" is there).—The name to be given to the restored and glorified Jerusalem (Gn 48:4; cf. Is 60:14-22; Rev 21:22). 'The prophecy beheld the Lion forseals His temple (ch. 11), and he JEBUDIAH (1 Ch 4:10 AV).—See HAEBUDIjah.

JEBUEL.—A Hemanite in Hezekiah's reign (2 Ch 29:12).

JEKABZEEL (Neh 11:10).—See KABZEEL.

JEKUTHIEL.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4:19).

JEBIMAH.—The eldest of Job's daughters born to him after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:4).

JEMNAAN.—A son of Jemuel (1 Ch 2:10).

JEPHTHAH.—Spoken of simply as 'the Gileadite,' and as being a 'mighty man of valour.' In Jg 11 it is said that he was 'the son of a harlot,' for which cause he was driven out from his home in Gilead by his brethren. Hereupon he gathers a band of followers, and leads the life of a freebooter in the land of Tob. Some time after this, Gilead is threatened with an attack by the Ammonites, and Jephthah is besought to return to his country in order to defend it; he promises to lead his countrymen against the Ammonites on condition of his being made chief (king?) if he returns victorious. Not only is this agreed to, but he is forthwith made head of his people (Jg 11:23).

In the long passage which follows, 11:17-32, Israel's claim to possess Gilead is urged by messengers who are sent by Jephthah to the Ammonite king; the passage, however, is concerned mostly with the Moabites (cf. Nu 20:21), and is clearly out of place here.

The 'spirit of the Lord' comes upon Jephthah, and he marches out to attack the Ammonites. On his way he makes a vow that if he returns from the battle victorious, he will offer up, as a thanksgiving to Jehovah, whoever comes out of his house to welcome him. He defeats the Ammonites, and, on his return, his daughter, an only child, comes out to meet him. The father keeps his child, according to his promise, and gives him over to the priests as a burnt offering. The daughter of Jephthah's only son was full of life and beauty, but not of long life, for the father's vow went wrong, and the daughter died of grief and despair. The story opens with a dovetail of this, and goes on to tell of the battle, of the siege of Mephibosheth by the Gibeonites, who threatened to kill the king, and of the ending, when the king is called back from battle to his kingdom, and he is superseded by his son, the last line telling of the end of the age, and the end of the story, when the Gibeonites have the right to offer the king of every generation till he dies, but the precise locality is not indicated.

Whether the story of the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter be historical or not, its mention is of considerable interest, inasmuch as it bears witness to the prevalence among the early Israelites of practices which were widely recognized among ancient peoples as belonging to the essentials of religion. In the story before us, the obvious fact not expected to see the original form; it is a compilation from more than one source, and has been worked over in the interests of later religious conceptions; that two totally distinct persons have, therefore, got mixed up together need cause no surprise. The first of these practices was the sacrifice of a human being at times of special stress (the sacrifice of the firstborn belongs to a different category); the second is that known as the 'Weeping for Tammus.' Among early peoples there were certain rites which represented the death and resurrection of vegetation, in connection with which various myths arose. In their original form (in which human sacrifice played a part) these rites were invented, and believed, to be the means of assisting Nature to bring forth the fruits of the earth. Among such rites was that known as the 'Weeping for Tammus' (v. 1—Adonis), cf. Ezek 8:14; the rite was based on the myth that Tammus, a beautiful youth, was killed by a boar; Tammus was the personification of the principle of vegetation, and represented the Summer, while the boar represented the Winter. This death of Tammus was celebrated annually with bitter wailing, chiefly by women (Jg 11:1); often (though not always, for the rite differed in different localities) his resurrection was celebrated the next day, thus ensuring by means of imitative magic the reappearance of fresh vegetation in its time.

The 'bawling of virginity' (v. 7), and the note, 'she had not known a man' (v. 15), are inserted to lay stress on the fact that Jephthah's daughter had a child. If he had had a wife, her father might have had no power over her; since, in the one case, her husband would have been her possessor, and in the other, she could have claimed protection from the father of the child, whether the latter were alive or dead.

JEPHUNNEH.—1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13:9).

2. A son of Jether an Asherite (1 Ch 7:44).

JERAHMEEL. — Mentioned in the genealogies of Gn 10:1 and 1 Ch 1:50 as a son of Joktan. Probably, in analogy with Jerahmeelites (Jb 5:20; 10:25), Jerahmeel (Mt 2:23) is to be understood as the designation of an Arabian tribe. The Arabic geographers refer to places named Wa'râkh, Ya'râkh, and Ya'râkh, with any one of which it might be identified. On the other hand, in Hebrew the word signifies 'a new moon'; it may therefore be the translation of a totemic clan-name. In fact, Bochart pointed out that 'sons of the moon' is a patronymic still found in Arabia.

W. M. NEUBER.

JERAMIAH. (May El have compassion!) 1. A non-Israelite clan in the extreme S. of Palestine, with which David cultivated friendly relations during his exile (1 S 27:3; 30:28). After Saul's death the Jerahmeelites formed part of the little principality over which he reigned in Hebron. How indistinct the recollection of them was appears from the various forms assumed by their name in MSS of the LXX: Jeremoe, Isaremele, Aeron, Isael, Jeramele. Subsequently they were considered to have been a Judahite clan (1 Ch 2:22—24). Here Jerahmeel is Caleb's elder brother; the list of his descendants in vv. 24-26 is of later origin than vv. 22-23 and brings them down to the Chronicler's day. We have no historical or other records connected with these names, save that Molid (v. 25) is a town mentioned elsewhere (Jos 19, Neh 11:31). 2. LXX and Old Lat. read Jerahmeel at 1 S 11 as the name of Samuel's grandfather. In all probability the Jerahmeel of MT is an abbreviated form, like Jacob for Jacob-ì, or the Yarkhamu found in a Babylonian list of Hammurabi's times. 3. One of the three men ordered by Jehoshaphat to arrest Jerahmeel and Baruch (Jer 36:14). AV follows Vulg. (RÌo Ameléch), calling him 'son of Hammelech'; RV, with LXX, 'the king's son.' He was a scion of the royal house, but not necessarily a calf of the royal family. 4. In a list of Levites (1 Ch 24:23-24) drawn up considerably later than that in 23:2, Jerahmeel's name is added as son of Kish (MT 'sons': the text is in a confused state). There must at the time be a division of Kishim called after him, and not, as previously, after Kish.

The son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah, the head of the Rechabites (Jer 35:6) in the time of the prophet Jeremiah. 7. A priest who returned with Nehemiah (Neh 11:12). His name was given to one of the twenty-two courses of priests (Ezr 2:39, Neh 7:32-125). 8. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh 10) and took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:23). The prophet. See next article.

JEREMIAH.—1. The time. — Jeremiah the prophet was born towards the close of Manasseh's long and evil reign (c. B.C. 696-641), the influence of which overshadowed his life (Josiah's reign 1521-2 K 23:29). He prophesied under Josiah and his sons from the year 626 to the fall of Jerusalem in c. 586 (11th), and for some short time after this until he vanishes from sight amongst the fugitive Jews (c. 40-44).

Through Josiah's minority (see Josran) the ethnico-religious regime of Manasseh continued; Jeremiah's earliest preaching (cha. 2-6), and the prophecies of his contemporaries, especially Zephaniah (who reveals a medley of heathen worship in Jerusalem, gross oppression and profugy, insolence, and sensibility characterizing both court and people. Meanwhile an international crisis is approaching. The giant power of Assyria, which for a century had dominated Israel's world, is in rapid decline, and is threatened by the new Median State on its eastern border; Nahum (wh. see) had already celebrated Nineveh's downfall in his splendid verses. The Assyrian capital was saved for the time by the irruption of the Scythian nomads (Essekler's Gog and Magog), who were swarming southwards from the Oxus plains and over the Caucasus passes. These hordes of wild horsemen overran Western Asia for a generation, leaving a lasting horror behind. Nineveh avoided capture by the Medes in 625 only at the expense of seeing her lands wasted and her dependencies stripped from her. The 'Scythian invasion' overhangs the sky of Zephaniah, and of Jeremiah at the outset of his ministry. The territory of Judah seems, after all, to have escaped the Scythian deluge, which swept to its very borders. The Scythian cavalry would reach with difficulty the Judaean highlands; and if Josiah, coming of age about this time, showed a bold front against them and saved his country from their ravages, we can account for the prestige that he enjoyed and used to such good purpose. At the same date, or even earlier, the Assyrian over-lordship had been renounced; for we find Josiah exercising independent sovereignty. It was not as the vassal of Nineveh, but in the assertion of his hereditary rights and as guardian of the old territory of Israel, that he challenged Pharaoh-necho, who was attempting to seize the lost western provinces of Assyria, to the fatal encounter of Megiddo in the year 608 (2 K 22:39; 2 Ch 35:20). The Pharaoh pointedly calls him 'thou king of Judah,' as if bidding him keep within his bounds (2 Ch 33:1). Jeremiah praises Josiah, in contrast to his son, as an upright and prosperous king, good to his people, and commanding his religion by his rule (Jer 22:15).

The great event of Josiah's reign was the reformation effected by him in his eighteenth year (c. B.C. 621), upon the discovery of 'the book of the law' in the Temple (2 K 22:3, see also chs. 26-23). So far as con-
JEREMIAH

Judah. On Jehoiakim's first revolt, in 601, he let loose bands of raiders on the Judahian territory (2 K 24:1, Jer 12:4); four years later he marched on the capital. Jehoiakim died just before this; his youthful son Jehoiachin (called also Jeremiah and Coniah) surrendered the city, with the queen-mother and the elite of the nobles and people, to Babylon, where he lived for many years, to be released upon Nebuchadrezzar's death in 561 (2 K 24:17-25:28, Jer 22:24-25).

The reign of Mattaniah-Zedekiah, raised to the throne by Nebuchadrezzar, was in effect a repetition of that of his elder brother. Zedekiah failed through weakness more than through wickedness; he sought Jeremiah's advice, and made an effort to reform. Early in his reign a conspiracy was on foot in Palestine against the Chaldeans, which he was tempted to join (Jer 27:1-2; see RV on v.1). The Jews, instead of being moved by the recent punishment, were eager for a rising; public opinion expressed itself in Hananiah's contradiction to Jeremiah's warnings (ch. 28). The same false hopes were exciting the exiles in Babylon (ch. 29). Nebuchadrezzar, aware of these movements, summoned Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer 51:34); the latter was able, however, to clear himself of complicity, and returned to Jerusalem. At last Zedekiah yielded to the tide; he broke his oath of allegiance to Nebuchadrezzar, and conducted sternly condemned by Ezekiel (1:14) as well as by Jeremiah—and the Jewish people were launched on a struggle almost as mad as that which it undertook with Rome 650 years later. The siege of Jerusalem was stubbornly prolonged for two years (588-586). The Egyptians under the new and ambitious Pharaoh-hophra (Apries, 588-569), effected a diversion of the Chaldean troops (Jer 57-58, Ezk 17); but, as often before, Pharaoh proved 'a broken reed to those who trusted in him.' Reduced by famine, Jerusalem was stormed, Zedekiah being captured in his attempt to escape, and meeting a pitiable death (2 K 25:25). This was the last of the national movements, Jeremiah was despatched to the Babylonian empire at its height, after the tragic incidents related in Jer 39-43, fled to Egypt. Jeremiah, who had in vain resisted this migration, was carried with the runaways; he had the distress of seeing his companions relapse in Egypt, protesting that they had fared better when worshipping the 'queen of heaven' than under the national Jehovah. Jewish tradition relates that he died at the hands of his renounced fellow-exiles. The prophet's prediction that the sword of Nebuchadrezzar would follow the fugitives, was fulfilled by the Chaldean invasion of Lower Egypt in the year 569, if not earlier than this. The Babylonian empire lasted from n.c. 665 to 536.—A little short of the '70 years' assigned to it, in round numbers, by Jeremiah (34th 29th)

2. The man.—The Book of Jeremiah is largely autobiographical. The author became, unconsciously, the hero of his work. This prophet's temperament and experience have coloured his deliverances in a manner peculiar amongst OT writers. His teaching, moreover, marks an evolution in the Israelite religion, which at one point, stamps it as its nature. The framework is broken up. In Jeremiah's life we watch the spirit of revelation being driven inwards, taking refuge from the shipwreck of the State in the soul of the individual. Jeremiah is the prophet of that '430 of within the nation,' traceable in its beginnings to Isaiah's time, to which the future of revealed religion is henceforth committed. This inner community of belief survives the exile; it gave birth to the Bible at the synagogue.

Jeremiah was a native of Anathoth, a little town some 3½ miles N.E. from Jerusalem, perched high on the mountain-ridge and commanding an extensive view over the hills of Ephraim and the Jordan valley, towards which his memory often turned (4:10; 7:14; 21:4-11; and 49:19). Jeremiah had no mere Judean outlook; the larger Israel was constantly in his thoughts. His father was 'Hilkiah' (not the Hilkiah of 2 K 229), of the priests that were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin (1:1); but he does not show, like the contemporary priest-prophet Ezekiel, the sacerdotal mind. Anathoth had been the site of the prophetic temple, the last high priest of Eli's house, who was banished, either by Solomon (1 K 2:28-31) or by Jehoiakim (2 K 23:24-28). Jeremiah may have been a scion of this deposed line. His mission brought him, probably at an early period, into conflict with 'the men of Anathoth,' who sought his life (11:15-18). His attempt to visit Anathoth during the last siege of Jerusalem, and the transaction between himself and his cousin into the field at Anathoth (32-37:4-11), go to show that he was not entirely cut off from friendly relations with his kindred and native place.

But (1:10-20), a solitary and unfortunate man,—not wanting in devotion, but shrinking from publicity, and with no natural drawing towards the prophetic career, yet he is 'set over the nations, to pluck up and to pull down, and to build and to pull down!' Already there begins the struggle between the implanted word of Jehovah and the nature of the man, on which turns Jeremiah's inner history and the development of his character. The prophet, in all probability, considered the noblest in the OT. His ministry was to be a long martyrdom. He must stand as 'a fenced city and an iron pillar and brazen walls against the word,' a solitary and impregnable fortress for Jehovah. The manner of his call imports an intimacy with God, an identification of the man with his mission, more close and complete than in the case of any previous prophet who was banished, either by Solomon (1 K 2:28-31) or by Jehoiakim (2 K 23:24-28). Jeremiah's imagination was haunted by his lost home happiness (2:16; 29:18 33:17). Endowed with the finest sensibilities, in so evil a time he was bound to be a solitary wanderer.

Behind the contest waged by Jeremiah with kings and people there lay an interior struggle, lasting more than twenty years. So long it took this great prophet to accept with full acquiescence the burden laid upon him. We may trace through a number of self-revealing passages, the general drift of which is plain notwithstanding the obscurity of some sentences and the chronological uncertainty. Jeremiah's progress from youthful consecration and ardour, through moods of doubt and passionate repugnance, to a complete self-conquest and settled trust (see, besides chs. 1. 11. 10 already cited, 8:18-19 13:20 and 14:17-21 18:4 20:26 and 30-32). The discipline of Jeremiah may be divided into four stages, following on his supernatural call:—(a) the youthful period of fierce denunciation, n.c. 626-621; (b) the period of disillusion and silence, subject to the severe process of Jehovah's reforms, 621-608; (c) the critical epoch, 608-604, opened by the fall of Josiah at Megiddo and closing in the fourth year of Jehoiakim after the battle of Carchemish and the advent of Nebuchadnezzar, when the purdah of Israel and silence and the silence and the silence and the silence of the future grew clear; (d) the stage of full illumination, attained during the calamities of the last days of Jerusalem.

To (a) belongs the teaching recorded in chs. 2-6, subject to the modifications involved in condensing from memory discourses uttered 20 years before. Here Jeremiah is on the same ground as Zephaniah. He strongly recalls Hoesa, whose love for 'Ephraim' he despises, and whose future is marked by the alliance of Jehovah and Israel supplies the basis of his appeals. Judah, he insists, has proved a more faithless bride than her northern sister; a divorce is inevitable. Ch. 5 reflects the shaking impression made by Jeremiah's first acquaintance with Jerusalem; in ch. 6 Jehovah's scourge—in the first instance the Scythians—'is held over the city. With rebukes mingle calls to repentance, and, more rarely, hopes of a relenting on the people's part (38:1-22. In other hopeful passages critics detect interpolation). Jeremiah's powerful and pathetic preaching helped to prepare the reformation of 621. But as the danger from the northern hordes passed and Josiah's rule brought new prosperity, the prophet's vaticinations were discounted; his pessimism became an object of ridicule.

(b) Jeremiah's attitude towards Jehovah's reformation is the enigma of his history. The collection of his prophecies made in 604 (see chs. 1-12), apart from the doubtful allusion in 11:1-11, ignores the subject; Josiah's name is but once mentioned, by way of contrast to Jehovah, in 22:11-13. From this silence we may not infer condemnation; and such passages as 77:25 and 88 do not signify that Jeremiah was radically opposed to the sacrificial system and to the use of a temple. We may be led, on the contrary, to believe that Jeremiah's judgment on the temple, from 17:1-17 (the authenticity of which is contested), that Jeremiah commended the Deuteronomic code. His writings in many passages show a Deuteronomic stamp. But, from this point of view, Jeremiah's public career showed itself a failure. It came from the will of the king, not from the conscience of the people. It effected no 'circumcision of the heart,' no inward turning to Jehovah, no such 'break of his covenant' as Jeremiah had called for; the good seed of the Deuteronomic teaching was 'sown among thorns' (48:4), which sprang up and choked it. The cant of religion was as in the mouths of ungodly men; apathy is raging in the people, in the popular temper, to hypocrisy. Convinced of this, Jeremiah appears to have early withdrawn, and stood aloof for the rest of Josiah's reign. Hence the years 621-608 are a blank in the record of his ministry. For the time the prophet was nonplussed; he had the evil he had foretold had not come; the good which had come was a doubtful good in his eyes. He could not support, he would not oppose, the work of the learned and sanctimonious king. Thrice and twenty times he demonstrated the emptiness of a political religion. They burnt into the prophet's soul the lesson of the worthlessness of everything without the law written on the heart. (c) Josiah's death at Megiddo pricked the bubble of the national religiousness; this calamity recalled Jeremiah to his work. Soon afterwards he delivered the great discourse of 7-9, which nearly cost him his life (see ch. 26). He denounced the false reliance on the Temple that replaced the idolatrous superstitions of 20 years before, thereby making 'the priests and the prophets,' to whose ears the threat of Shiloh's fate for Zion was rank treason, from this time his implacable enemies. The post-reformation conflict now opening was more deadly than the pre-reformation conflict shared with Zephaniah. A false Jehovahism had entrenched itself within the limits of the Covenant, armed with the weapons of fanatical self-righteousness. To this phase of the struggle belong chs. 7-10 (subtracting the great interpolation of 9:8-10:19, of which 10:18 is surely post-Jeremianic); so, probably, most of the matter of chs. 11-20. Identified with the 'many like the birds' that were added to the volume of Jeremiah burnt by Jehoiakim in the winter of 604 (36:2-4).

The personal passages of chs. 15. 17. 18. 20 belong to this decisive epoch (608-604, between Megiddo and Carchemish). The climax of Jeremiah's inward agony was brought about by the outrage inflicted on him by Paarhur, the Temple overseer (ch. 20), when, to stop his mouth, the prophet was scourged and put in the stocks. He breaks out, 'O Jehovah, thou hast befooled me, and I have been befool by thee' (vv. 1-9). Jehovah has used His Almighty power to play with a weak, simple man, and to make him a laughing-stock! Jehovah's word is 'a fire in his bones'; he is compelled to speak it, only to meet ridicule and insult. His warnings remain unheeded, and God leaves him in the lurch! He desires nothing but the people's good; yet they count him a traitor, and put down his terrifying visions to malignity! This last reproach cut Jeremiah to the heart, and again and again he has repeated it (1:5; 12:2; 18:2).
Jeremiah

The scene of ch. 20 was Jeremiah's Gethsemane. It took place not long before the crisis of 'the fourth year of Jehoiakim,'—the occasion when the roll of doom was prepared (ch. 36) which was read to the people and the king, and when, after the battle of Carchemish, Nebuchadrezzar was hailed as Jehovah's servant and executioner (ch. 25). At this juncture the conclusive breach with Jehoiakim came about, when the faithless king, by running his knife through Jeremiah's book, severed the ties which had bound prophecy to the secular throne of David since Samuel's day. Recalling at this date his father's family and his lineage, the prophet virtually tells us that they are past. From the years 605-4 he marches with firm step to the goal; he sees the end of God's kingdom, and the way Jehovah is at last equal to his office, ready to 'plunge in and to break down the nations, and to build up and to plant.' Master of himself, he is master of the world.

(d) Chs. 31-33 (33:14-26) are wanting in the LXX; the remainder of 33, along with 29:9-44, lies under grave critical suspicion) contain a distinct 'word of Jehovah,' committed to a separate 'book.' This is 'the book of the future of Israel and Judah' (Duhm), and the centrepiece of this life-work of a Christian prophet who wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, Jeremiah fled to the ideal and eternal from the horrors of the national downfall; as the earthly Zion sinks, the image of God's true city rises on his soul. The long foreseen catastrophe has arrived; Jeremiah meets it bravely, for 'days are coming,' Jehovah tells him, 'when I will restore the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, and I will cause them to return to the land of their fathers' (33:11). The prophet adds deeds to words: he takes the opportunity of buying, before witnesses, a field at Anathoth during the siege by his captors, in token that 'houses and vineyards shall yet again be bought in this land' (32:7). But the restoration means something far better than recovery of the land; it will be a spiritual renovation, a change of heart going deeper than Josiah's renewal of the old covenant. 'They shall be my people, Jehovah promises, 'and I will be their God; and I will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me for ever... And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, and I will put my fear in their hearts' (32:38-41; 33:8-11, vv.4-8 of this disputed chapter are full of Jeremianic traits). The announcement of the new covenant in ch. 31:1-44 is the kernel of the 'Book of the Future'; this is Jeremiah's greatest contribution to the progress of the Kingdom of God. This passage touches the high-water mark of OT prophecy; it was appropriated by the Lord Jesus at the Last Supper, and supplied the basis of the NT doctrine of salvation (see He 8:10-14). To deprive Jeremiah of the New-Covenant oracle (as B. Duhm, e.g., would do) is to remove the top-stone of his life's edifice; it is to make his groan one of 'plucking up the roots of the, with no compensatory buildings and planting' (110) upon the desolate site. Jeremiah had read first in his own heart the secret thus conveyed to Israel. The mission which he had borne for long as a painful yoke, he learnt to rest in in entire contentment. He is able to say, 'O delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart;' and he prophesies that, under the new covenant, every man shall say this.

Jeremiah's style and powers as a writer have been underestimated; better justice is done to them by recent scholars. The gloom overshadowing many of his pages has been repellent; and the mistaken attachment of his name to 'Lamentations' has brought on him the disfiguring epithet of 'the weeping prophet.' Much of the book comes to us from other pens; in its narrative parts we recognize the hand of Baruch; and allowance should be made for editorial glosses and insertions, here and there interrupting the flow and impairing the force of the original. Jeremiah's language is touched with occasional Aramaisms, and shows some falling off from the perfection of the classical Hebrew of the 5th century. Jeremiah has neither the sublimity and sustained oratorical power of Isaiah, nor the purity of Amos, nor the poignancy of Hosea, nor the fire and verve of Nahum, nor the subtlety of Habakkuk; but in richness of imagery, in fulness of human interest, in lucidity and naturalness, in his command of resources of poetry, eloquence, pathos, and practical appeal, by virtue of the combination of excellences he presents and the value of his total output, Jeremiah is the greatest of the writers of the Captivity.

3. The Book.—We owe the Book of Jeremiah to his collaborator Baruch (ch. 36). In fairness, this should be entitled 'The Book of Jeremiah, the prophet and Baruch the scribe.' With Baruch's help, it was issued in 604 'a roll of a book,' containing the sum of his public teaching up to that date. This volume was not too large to be read to the assembled people, and read aloud twice more in the course of the same year. The destruction of the first roll by Jehoiakim called for a new edition, containing 'many like words,' which added to the bulk of the first publication: chs. 1 and 14-30, with (possibly) 26, may be taken to contain the supplementary matter referred to in 36:32, extending and illustrating chs. 2-12 (ch. 13 is out of place, since it bears in the allusion of vvv.11-12 manifest reference to the captivity of 597). With the exceptions named, and some others of less moment, chs. 1-20 may be read as the re-written roll of Jer 36, which dates from the winter of a.c. 604.

In chs. 21-25 is a distinct collection of oracles, relating to the kings (down to Jehoiachin) and prophets, associated under the designation of 'shepherds'; it is prefaced by a story (in 3rd person: 21:1) about king Zedekiah, germane to the later collection of chs. 37-39. Chs. 13 and 26 and 27-29 are reminiscences of Jeremiah relative to the early years of Zedekiah's reign, subsequent to the First Captivity (597)—surely ch. 35, the story of the Rechabites (in 1st person), relating to Jehoiachin's closing years, should come in here. This added matter may have gone to make up a third edition of Jeremiah-Baruch's work, published about this date, extending over chs. 1-33, with the deducations and additions previously noted (ch. 26 is mentioned below).

Chs. 30-33 form a totally distinct work from the Book of Doom thus far analyzed; this is Jeremiah's book of promise or consolations, recording the revelation of his people's future given to him during the last siege of Jerusalem. Chs. 37-39, to which 21:1-19 should be attached, and 40-44, are two distinct memoirs, dealing on Jeremiah's life's history (a) in the final siege, and (b) after the capture of Jerusalem; the authorship of his secretary is indicated by the fact that the short oracle concerning Baruch (ch. 45) is set at the end of these narratives, though the event related took place

Ch. 36 is a detached narrative piece, out of place where it stands; this appears to be Baruch's account of the crisis in Jeremiah's work to which 7-8 relates (n.c. 658). Altogether, we may credit to Baruch's memoirs of Jeremiah chs. 26, 36, 37-39 and 40-45; to some extent he probably worked over and edited the matter received by dictation from his master.

The LXX departs from the Massoretic text in two main respects: (1) in arrangement,—the Foreign Oracles (chs. 46–51) being set in between vv. 13 and 14 of ch. 25, and running in a different order. The collection of Foreign Oracles, which have been separately placed at the end of Jeremiah's works, in chs. 46–51; and the Historical Appendix, ch. 52, borrowed by his editors from the Book of Kings (or by the copyist of Kings from this place). They stand in the midst of the Chaldeans and Babylon in chs. 50–51, judged by internal evidence, was certainly a postscript to Jeremiah's work and a product of the Exile; critical doubts, of less gravity, attach to other parts of the Foreign Oracles. In 38th-39th we find already inserted, in shorter form, the first part of the narrative incorporated in ch. 32. Ch. 52 supplies a valuable bit of tradition about the captivity in Babylon, misspelled also in the LXX text of Jeremiah. The final redaction of the canonical 'Jerem-

VII. The Historical Appendix: ch. 52, nearly identical, by general admission, with 2 K 24:18–25:19. The above must be taken as a general outline and sketch of the growth of the work. There are a number of detached fragments, such as 5:15–20 and 10:4–10, which are now attached to Jeremiah proper. These parts of the text, containing things, relatively numerous, must be recognized; the most conspicuous of these, besides the last three chapters, are 10:1-4 and 25:18-20.

JEREMIAH (1 Es 9)—Jeremiah in Ezra 10:1.

JEREMIEL—The archangel who in 2 Es 4 answers the questions of the righteous dead. AV has Uriel, the angel sent to instruct Eddras (2 Es 4:10 n).
JERIBAI.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11*).

JERICHO.—A city situated in the Jordan valley about 5 miles from the north end of the Dead Sea, now represented by the miserable village of er-Rhā. It was the first city conquered by the Israelites after their passage of the Jordan. The course of events, from the second passage of the river to the destruction of Achan for the infraction of the tabah on the spoil, is too well known to need repetition here (see Jos 1-7). A small hamlet remained on the site, belonging to Benjamin (Jos 18*), which was insignificant enough for David's ambassadors to retire to, to recover from their insulting treatment by Hanun (2 S 10, 1 Ch 19*). The city was re-founded by Hiel, a Bethelite, who apparently endeavoured to avert the curse pronounced by Joshua over the site by sacrificing his sons (1 K 16*). A college of prophets was shortly afterwards founded here (2 K 2), for whose benefit Eliash healed its bitter waters (v.14). Hither the Israelites who had raided Judah, in the time of Ahaz, restored their captives on the advice of the prophet Oded (2 Ch 26*). Here the Babylonians finally defeated Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, and so destroyed the Judean kingdom (5 K 25*, Jer 39* 52*, 252*). Baccichies, the last king of the Syrians in the Maccabean period, captured and fortified Jericho (1 Mac 9*); Aristobulus also took it (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1. 2). Pompey encamped here on his way to Jerusalem (ib. xiv. iv. 1). Its inhabitants, whom the great heat of the Ghor had deprived of fighting strength, fled before Herod (ib. xiv. xv. 3) and Vespasian (BJ iv. v. 2). In the Gospel Jericho figures in the stories of Bar thirsts (Mt 20*, Mk 10*, Lk 19*), Zacchæus (Lk 19*), and the Good Samaritan (Lk 10*).

The modern er-Rhā is not exactly on the site of ancient Jericho, which is a collection of mounds beside the spring traditionally associated with Eliash. The Roman and Byzantine towns are represented by other sites in the neighbourhood. Ancient aqueducts, mills, and other antiquities are numerous, as are also remains of early monasticism.

The site, though unhealthy for man, is noted for its fertility. Josephus (BJ iv. v. 3) speaks of it with enthusiasm. Even yet it is an important source of fruit. The district round Jericho is the personal property of the Sultan. R. A. S. Macalister.

JERIHEL.—A chief of Issachar (1 Ch 7*).

JERIAH (1 Ch 26*).—See Jeriah.

JEROMOTH.—1. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 77 12*). 3. 4. 5. Three Levites (1 Ch 24*) called in 257 Jeromoth 29*, 2 Ch 31*). 6. A son of David and father of Rechabah's wife (2 Ch 11*).

JERIOTH.—One of Caleb's wives (1 Ch 24*), but almost certainly the MT is corrupt.

JEROBOAM is the name of two kings of Israel.

1. Jeroboam I, the first king of the northern tribes after the division. His first appearance in history is as head of the forced labourers levied by Solomon. This was perhaps because he was hereditary chief in Ephraim, but we must also suppose that he attracted the attention of Solomon by his ability and energy. At the same time he resented the tyranny of the prince whom he served, and plotted to overthrow it. The design came to the knowledge of Solomon, and Jeroboam fled to Egypt. On the king's death he returned, and although he did not appear on the scene when the northern tribes made their demand of Rehoboam, he was probably actively enlisted in the movement. When the refusal of Rehoboam threw the tribes into revolt, Jeroboam appeared as leader, and was made king (1 K 11* 12-14*). Jeroboam was a warlike prince, and hostilities with Judah continued throughout his reign. His country was plundered by the Egyptians at the time of their invasion of Judah. It is not clear whether his fortification of Shechem and Peniel was suggested by the experiences of this campaign or not. His religious measures have been referred to the reprobation of the Biblical writers, but they were intended by Jeroboam to please the God of Israel. He embellished the ancestral sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan with golden bulls, in continuance of early Israelite custom. It is fair to assume also that he had precedent for celebrating the autumn festival in the eighth instead of the seventh month.

2. Jeroboam II, was the grandson of Jehu. In his time Israel was able to assert its ancient vigour against its hereditary enemy Syria, and recover its lost territory. This was due to the attacks of the Assyrians upon the northern border of Damascus (2 K 14*). The temporary prosperity of Israel was accompanied by social and moral degeneracy, as is set forth distinctly by Amos and Hosea. H. P. Smith.

JEROHAM.—1. The father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel (1 S 1*). 2. A Benjamite family name (1 Ch 89* 9*). 3. A priestly family (1 Ch 9*, Neh 11*). 4. Sons of Jerobam were amongst David's heroes (1 Ch 12*). 5. A Danite chief (1 Ch 27*). 6. The father of Azariah, who helped Jehoikim in the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Ch 23*).

JERUBBAAL.—A name given to Gideon (Jg 6* 7* see x 9*). 7. 8. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 23. It is "Baal strives, Baal being a name for J*, as in Jehovah, Mervah cannot — one who strives with Baal," as Jg 6* would suggest. This name was altered to Jerubbaale (beshetah = 'shame') when Baal could no longer be used as J* without offence (2 S 11*). cf. Jehovah, Mephibosheth.

JERUBBALETH.—See Jerubbaal.

JERUEL.—The part of the wilderness of Judaea that faces the W. shore of the Dead Sea below En-gedi. It was here that Jehoshaphat encountered a great host of the children of Moab, Ammon, and other trans-Jordanian tribes (2 Ch 20*).

JERUSALEM.—I. SITUATION.—Jerusalem is the chief town of Palestine, situated in 31° 40' 45' N, int. and 35° 13' 25' E. long. It stands on the summit of the ridge of the Judean mountains, at an elevation of 2300 feet above the sea-level. The elevated plateau on which the city is built is intersected by deep valleys, defining and subdividing it.

1. The defining valleys are: (1) The Wady en-Nār, the Biblical Valley of the Kidron or of Jehoshaphat, which, starting some distance north of the city, runs at first (under the name of Wady al-Ja'za) in a S.E. direction; it then turns southward and deepens rapidly, separating the Jerusalem plateau from the ridge of the Mount of Olives on the east; finally, it meanders through the wild mountains of the Judean desert, and finds its exit on the W. side of the Dead Sea. (2) A deep cleft now known as the Wady er-Rabbā, and popularly identified with the Valley of the son of Himmon, which commences on the west side of the city and runs down to and joins the Wady en-Nār about half a mile south of the wall of the present city. In the fork of the great irregular Y which these two valleys form, the city is built.

2. The chief intersecting valley is one identified with the Tyropean of Josephus, which commences in some old measure, and goes on to the forks of the Y, runs, ever deepening, right through the modern city, and finally enters the Wady en-Nār, about 1 mile above the mouth of the Wady er-Rabbā. There is also a smaller depression running a little to the W., from which they were West to East, intersecting the Tyropean at right angles. These intersecting valleys are now almost completely filled up with the accumulated rubbish of about four thousand years, and betray themselves only by slight depressions in the surface of the ground.

3. By these valleys the site of Jerusalem is divided into four quarters, each on its own hill. These hills are traditionally named Acra, Bezertha, Zion, and Ophel, in the N.W., N.E., S.W., and S.E. respectively; and Ophel is further subdivided (but without any natural line of division) into Ophel proper and Moriah, the latter being the northern and higher end. But it must be noticed carefully at the outset that around these names the recorded discussions have raged, many of which are as yet not within sight of settlement.

4. The site of Jerusalem is not well provided with water. The only natural source is an intermittent spring in the Kidron Valley, which is insufficient to supply the city's needs. Oftentimes have been excavated for rain-storage from the earliest times, and water has been led to the city by conduits from external sources, some of them far distant. Probably the oldest known conduit is a channel hewn in the rock, entering Jerusalem from the north. Another (the 'low-level aqueduct') is traditionally ascribed to Solomon: it brings water from reservoirs beyond Bethlehem, and a third (the 'higher aqueduct') was also concerned. The conduits from the Gihon (Ps 88:10, 1 Ch 11:1) are in general for the city; and its inhabitants are named Jebusites, mentioned in many marriages with the rest of the Amorites (Gen 15:18, Ex 23:31, Jos 3:4 et al.), and specially assigned to this city in Jg 17. Until the discovery of Tell el-Amarna correspondence it was supposed that Jebus was the primitive name of the city, changed on the Isrealite conquest to Jerusalem; but this has been rendered untenable, and it now seems certain that the name of Jebus is a mere derivative, of no authority, from the ethnic Jebusites, the meaning and etymology of which are still unknown. C. art. Jerusalem.

II. History.—1. Primitive period.—The origin of the city of Jerusalem is lost in obscurity, and probably, owing to the difficulties in the way of excavation, must continue to be matter of speculation. The first reference that may possibly be connected with the city is the incident of the mysterious Melchizedek, king of Salem (Gen 14:18), who has remained the center of much futile speculation, due to a great extent to misunderstanding of the symbolic use of his name by the authors of Ps 110 (v.4) and Hebrews (chs. 5-7). It is not even certain that the 'Salem' mentioned in the Deut. of Hammurabi is to be identified with Jerusalem (see Salem); there is no other ancient authority for this name being applied to the city. We do not touch solid ground till some eight or nine hundred years later, when, about 1400 B.C., we find 'Abd-Elkhla, king of Jerusalem, sending letters to his Egyptian over-lord, which were discovered with the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. The contents of these letters are the usual meagre record of Hittite diplomacy between the communities of Palestine, and to some extent they raise questions rather than answer them. Some theories, that have been based on expressions used by 'Abd-Elkhla, and supposed to illuminate the Melchizedek problem, are now regarded as of no value for that desirable end. The chief importance of the Tell el-Amarna correspondence, so far as Jerusalem is concerned, is the demonstration of the true antiquity of the name 'Jerusalem.'

Where was the Jerusalem of 'Abd-Elkhla situated? This question, which is bound up with the authenticity or otherwise of the traditional Zion, and affects such important topographical and archaeological questions as the site of David's tomb, is one of the most hotly contested of all the many problems of the kind which have been considered by students of Jerusalem. In an article like the present it is useless to discuss the details of the controversy and to discuss at length the arguments on both sides. But the majority of modern scholars are now coming to an agreement that the pre-Davidic Jerusalem was situated on the hill known as Ophel, the south-eastern of the four hills above enumerated, in the space intercepted between the Tyropoeon and Kidron valleys. This is the hill under which is the only natural source of water in the whole area of Jerusalem—the 'Virgin's Fountain,' an intermittent spring of brackish water in the Kidron Valley—and upon which is the principal accumulation of ancient débris, with ancient pottery fragments strewn over the surface. This hill was open for excavation until three or four years ago, though cumbered with vegetable gardens which would make digging expensive; but lately houses have been constructed on its surface. At the upper part of the hill, on this theory, we have the high place of the subjects of 'Abd-Elkhla would be situated; and the tradition of the sanctity of this section of the city has lasted unchanged through all the varying occupations of the city—Hebrew, Jewish, Byzantine, Arab, Crusader, and modern Mohammedan. Whether this be the 'land of Moriah' of Gn 22:3 is doubtful: it has been suggested that the name is here a copyist's error for 'land of Midian,' which would be a more suitable name for Jehovah worship in the days of Abraham than would the high place of the guardian nemus of Jerusalem.

In certain Biblical passages (Jos 18:7, but see E.V., Jg 19:1, 1 Ch 11:1) an alternative name, Jebus, is given for the city; and its inhabitants are named Jebusites, mentioned in many marriages with the rest of the Amorites (Gen 15:18, Ex 23:31, Jos 3:4 et al.), and specially assigned to this city in Jg 17. Until the discovery of Tell el-Amarna correspondence it was supposed that Jebus was the primitive name of the city, changed on the Isrealite conquest to Jerusalem; but this has been rendered untenable, and it now seems certain that the name of Jebus is a mere derivative, of no authority, from the ethnic Jebusites, the meaning and etymology of which are still unknown. C. art. Jerusalem.

2. David and Solomon.—The city remained foreign to the Israelites (Jg 19:14) until the end of the period of the Judges (R. 737) when David reigned in Hebron, when he felt himself powerful enough to attack the Jebusite stronghold. The passage describing his capture of the city is 2 S 5:6-9, and few passages in the historical books of the Old Testament are more obscure or more subject to textual corruption and partly to topographical allusions clear to the writer, but veiled in darkness for us. It appears that the Jebusites, trusting in the strength of their gates, threw taunts to the Israelite king that the blind and the lame would be enough to keep him out; and that David retorted by applying the term to the defenders of the city: 'Go up the drain,' he said to his followers, 'and smite those blind and lame ones.' He evidently recognized the impregnable of the defences themselves; but discovered and utilized a convenient drain, which led underground into the middle of the city. A similar drain was found in the excavation at Gezer, with a device in the middle to prevent its being used for this purpose. During the revolt of the tellahim against Ibrahim Pasha in 1834, Jerusalem, once more besieged, was entered through a drain in the same way. It is not very likely that David's 'gutter' has not yet been identified with certainty.

If the identification of the Jebusite city with Ophel be admitted, we cannot fail to identify it also with the 'city of David,' in which it is said (2 S 5:7): But when we read further that David 'built round about from Millo inward,' we are perplexed by our total ignorance as to what Millo may have been, and where it may have been situated. The word is by the LXX rendered Acras, and the same word is used by Josephus. The position of the Acras is a question as much disputed as the position of the Jebusite city, and it is one for which far less light can be obtained from an examination of the ground than in the case of the other problem mentioned. As soon as David had established himself in his new surroundings, his first care was to bring the ark of Jahweh into the city (2 S 6), but his desire to erect a permanent building for its reception was frustrated by Nathan the prophet (2 S 7). The site of the Temple was chosen, namely, the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24) or Ornan (1 K 1), one of the original Jebusite inhabitants, and preparations were made for its erection.

As soon as Solomon had come to the throne and quelled the abortive attempts of rivals, he commenced the work of building the temple in the fourth month of his reign, and finished it in the eighth month of his eleventh year (1 K 6). His royal palace occupied thirteen years (1 K 7). These erections were not in the 'city of David' (1 K 9), which occupied the lower slope of Ophel to the south, but on the summit of the same hill, where their place is now taken by the Mohammedan 'Noble Sanctuary'. Besides these works, whereby Jerusalem received a glory it by which the aged 'before', Solon profited. In 2 Ch 26, 14 is the record of his fortifying the city with additional towers and battlements; the work of strengthening the fortifications was continued by Jotham (2 K 15, 2 Ch 27), thanks probably to these precautions, an attack on Jerusalem by the kings of Syria and of Israel, in the next reign (Ahaz's), proved abortive (2 K 16). Hezekiah still further prepared Jerusalem for the struggle which he foresaw from the advancing power of Assyria, and to him, as generally believed, is due the engineering work now famous as the Siloam Tunnel, whereby water was conducted from the spring in the Kidron Valley outside the walls to the reservoir at the bottom of the Tyropoeon inside them. By another gift from the apparently inexhaustible royal and sacred treasures, Hezekiah endeavoured to keep Sennacherib from an attack on the capital (2 K 18); but the attacking army, driven by insulting words from the emissaries of Sennacherib, was finally averted by a mysterious calamity that befell the Assyrian army (2 K 19). By alliances with Egypt (Is 30) and Babylon (ch. 39) Hezekiah attempted to strengthen his position, Manasseh built an outer wall to the 'city of David', and made other fortifications (2 Ch 33). In the reign of Josiah the Book of the Law was discovered, and the king devoted himself to the repairs of the Temple and the moral reformation which that discovery involved (2 K 22). The death of Josiah at Megiddo was disastrous for the kingdom of Judah, and he was succeeded by a series of petty kingships, all of them puppets in the hands of the Egyptian or Babylonian monarchs. The fall of Jerusalem could not be long delayed. Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon captured and looted it, and carried away captive first Jehoiachin (2 K 24), and finally Zedekiah, the last king of Judah (ch. 25).

The aspect and area of the Jerusalem captured by Nebuchadnezzar must have been very different from that conquered about 420 years before by David. There is no direct evidence in the Old Testament that the hill now known as Zion; but the city must rapidly have grown under him and his wealthy successor; and in the time of the later Hebrew kings included no doubt the so-called Zion hill as well. That it also included the modern Acre is problematical, as we have no information as to the position of the north wall in pre-exilic times; and it is certain that the quite modern quarter commonly called Bezelth was not occupied. To the south the city was traced to the verge of the Wady er-Rababb. The destruction by Nebuchadnezzar and the deportation of the people were probably complete, and only the poorest of the people were left to carry on the work of agriculture.

4. The Return.—When the last Semitic king of Babylon, Nabonidus, returned from his expedition to Syria, he proceeded to Jerusalem, and established there Nebuchadnezzar's son Belshazzar as his puppet king. The Book of Jeremiah contains the fullest account that we have of the fortifications of Jerusalem, and it has been the most carefully studied by any source of the reconstructions on the site. A paper by Prof. H. G. Mitchell on the 'Wall of Jerusalem according to Nehemiah' (in the JBL for 1903, p. 85) is a model of exhaustive treatment. Careful comparison is made therein between the statements of Nehemiah and the results of excavation. We cannot here go into all the arguments brought forward for the identifications, but they seem conclusive. Starting at the head of the Wady er-Rababb (Valley of Hinnom so-called), we find at the S.W. corner of the wall a rock-scarp which seems to have been prepared for a strong tower, identified with the tower of the furnaces (Neh 3). Then comes the Valley-gate, which has been found half-way down the valley (Neh 3). At the bottom of the valley, where it joined the Kidron, was the Dung-gate (Neh 3), outside of which was found what appears to have been a cess-pit. Turning northward, we find the Fountain-gate (Neh 3) in close proximity to the temple, and the pool of Siloam at the foot of the Tyropoeon Valley; and the Water-gate on Ophel, over the Virgin's Fountain. The gates on the north-east and north sides of the wall cannot be identified, as the course of that part has not been definitely determined. They seem to have been, in order, the Horse-gate the East-gate, the gate Hamiphkud ('the appointed'), after which came the Sheep-gate, the Fish-gate, and somewhere on the north or north-west side, the Old-gate. Probably the Euphrates and Corner-gates (2 K 15) were somewhere in this neighbourhood. Besides these gates, the Temple was provided with entrances, some of whose names are preserved; but their identification is an even more complex problem than that of the city-gates. Such were the gate Surch and the Gate of the guard (2 K 15); the Shallecheth-gate as the west (1 Ch. 26); the Gate of Parchon (20), and the East-gate (Ezk 11). The Beautiful-gate, of Ac 3 was probably the same as the Nicanor-gate, between the Women's and the Priests' Court; it is alluded to in the epitaph of the donor, Nicanaor, recently discovered at Jerusalem.

6. From Alexei to Pompey.—By the battle of Issus (B.C. 333) Alexander the Great became master of Palestine; and the Persian suzerainty, under which the Jews had enjoyed protection and freedom to follow their religion, was in an end. Herod the Great was the signal for the long and complicated struggle between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, between whom Jerusalem passed more than once. One result of the foreign influences which was set to the maintenance of Deuteronomic purity, and the unrest was fanned into revolt in 168, when Antiochus Epiphanes set himself to destroy the Jewish religion. The desecration of the Temple, and the attempt to force the Jews to sacrifice to pagan deities (1 Macc. 1, 2), led to the rebellion headed by the Maccabean family, wherein, after many vicissitudes, the short-lived Hasmonaean dynasty was established at Jerusalem. Internal discord rent the family. To settle a squabble, Pompey besieged Jerusalem, and profaned the Temple, which was later pillaged by Crassus; and in B.C. 47 the Hasmonaeans were superseded by the Idumean dynasty of the Herods, their founder Antipater being established as ruler of Palestine in recognition of his services to Julius Caesar.

7. From the time of Christ to the destruction of Jerusalem.—The events in the life of Christ, in so far as they affect Jerusalem, are the only details of interest known to us for the years succeeding the death of Herod in B.C. 4. These we need not dwell upon here, but a word may fitly be spoken regarding the central problem of Jerusalem topography, the site of the Holy Sepulchre. The authenticity of the traditional site fails at once, if it lie inside the north wall of Jerusalem, as it was in Christ's time, for Christ suffered and was buried without the walls. But this is precisely what cannot be determined, as the line of the wall, wherever it may have been, is deeply covered by houses; and it is very doubtful whether such fragments of wall as have from time to time been found in digging foundations have anything to do with each other, or with the city rampart. A precise site has not been established, and with the best of arguments the identification of the site cannot with certainty be traced back earlier than Helian; and, though she visited Jerusalem as early as 326, yet it must not be forgotten that in endeavouring then to find the tomb of Christ, without documents to guide her, she was in no hesitating manner, for the man who, under similar circumstances should at the present day endeavour to find the tomb of Shakespeare, if that happened to be unknown. Indeed, Helena was driven worse than the hypothesis viz. that Pilate commemorated a death, and presumably the tradition, have been continuous in Stratford-on-Avon, which certainly was not the case with Jerusalem from A.D. 30 to 326. A fortiori these remarks apply to the rival sites that in more recent years have been suggested. The so-called 'Gordon's Calvary' and similar fantastic identifications we can dismiss at once with the remark that the arguments in their favour are far from probable, and can be adduced against them; that they cannot even claim the minor distinction of having been hallowed by the devotion of six centuries; and that, in short, they are entirely unworthy of the smallest consideration. The only documents nearly contemporary with the crucifixion and entombment are the Gospels, which supply no data sufficient for the identification of the scene of these events. Except in the highly improbable event of an inscription being at some time found which shall identify them, we may rest in the certainty that the exact sites have never been, and will never be, identified.

8. From the destruction of Jerusalem to the Arab conquest.—The events following must be more briefly enumerated. In 134 the rebellion of the Jews under Bar Cochba was crushed by Hadrian, and the faith of Judaism extinguished from the city, which was rebuilt as a pagan Roman town under the name of Aelia Capitolina. By 333 the Jews had acquired the right of visiting annually and lamenting over the placated stone on which their altar had been erected. Under Constantine, Christianity was established, and the great flood of pilgrimage began. Julian in 362 attempted to rebuild the Temple; some natural phenomena ingeniously explained as the explosion of a forgotten store of naphtha, such as was found some years ago in another part of the city—prevented him. In 450 the Empress Eudocia retired to Jerusalem and built the walls; she built a church over the Pool of Siloam, which was discovered by excavation some years ago. In 532 Justinian erected important buildings, fragments of which remain incorporated with the mosques, but these and other Christian buildings were ruined in 614 by the destroying King Chosroes II. A short breathing space was allowed the Christians after this storm, and then the young strength of Islam swept over them. In 637 Omar conquered Jerusalem after a four months' siege.

9. From the Arab conquest to the present day.—Under the comparatively easy rule of the Omeyyad Califs, Christians did not suffer severely; though excluded from the Temple area (where 'Abd el-Melek built his beautiful dome in 658), they were free to use the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre. This, however, could not last under the fatbanic Fatimids, or the Seljuks who succeeded them; and the sufferings of the Christians led to that extraordinary series of piratical invasions, commonly called the Crusades, by which Palestine was harassed for almost a century, which would be singularly foolish strategically. The identification of the site cannot with certainty be traced back earlier than Helian; and, though she visited Jerusalem as early as 326, yet...

Jeshur.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:5).

Jeshimon.—This word, derived from a Heb. root meaning 'to be waste or desolate,' is used either as a common noun (=desert,' 'wilderness') or (with the art., 'the Jeshimon') as a proper name (Nu 21:19 23:9, 1 S 23:19 24:20). In the latter usage the reference is either to the waste country in the Jordan valley N. of the Dead Sea and east of the river (so apparently in Numbers), or to the eastern part of the hill-country of Judah on the western shore of the Dead Sea (so 1 Sam.).

Jeshshi.—A Gadite family (1 Ch 5:10).

Jeshobiah.—A Simeonite family (1 Ch 4:6).

4. A man of the house of Pahath-moab whose descendants returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2:2, Neh 7:2 [1 Es 5:4 Jesus]); perhaps identical with No. 2 above.
5. A Levitical house or its successive heads in the times of the Maccabees; mentioned in connexion with the building of the Temple (Ezr 3:9), the explanation of the Law (Neh 8:1, cf. 9:14), and the sealing of the covenant (10:6). Cf. also Ezr 2:21 [1 Es 5:4 Jesus] 5:2 [1 Es 6:4 Jesus], Neh 7:12 5:29. 5:3. The high priest who along with Zerub. headed the first band of exiles. In Ezr. and Neh. he is called Jeshua, in Hag. and Zec. Joshua. He took a leading part in the erection of the altar of burnt-offering and the laying of the foundations of the Temple (Ezr 3:2). In Hag. and Zec. he is frequently coupled with Zerub., after these prophets had begun to stimulate the people to undertake building operations in earnest (Hag 1:1 16, Zec 3:4 8:11). He is eulogized in Sir 40:12 (Jesnaal). 7. A priestly family, Ezr 2:21 = Neh 7:2 = 1 Es 5:4 Jesus. 8. A town in the south of Judah (Neh 11:1). The site is possibly at the ruin Sa'we west of Tell 'Arad and south of 'Ain.

Jeshurun.—A poetical or a pet-name for Israel which occurs four times in the O.T. (Dt 33:8 33:11, Is 44:1). It is found in the later writings, and represents a patriotic feeling that Israel was =yashar-Eli, 'the upright of God.' If this be so, then we may accept the rendering of Jeshurun as the 'righteous little people.' In Balaam's elegy, 'Let me die the death of the righteous' seems to refer to the Israel of the pre-dating clause, and in Ps 83:15 the thought which underlies Jeshurun appears, if we adopt the tempting reading: 'Truly God is good to Israel.'—W. F. Coxe.

Jesias (1 Es 8:5)—Ezer of Jeshahiah.

Jesimiel.—The eponym of a Simeonite family (1 Ch 4:6).

Jesse (more correctly Jeshi, cf., as regards formation, Hitt; perhaps an abbreviated form; the meaning of the name is quite uncertain).—A Benjamite, best known as the father of David. The earliest historical mention of him (1 S 17:12; see David, §1) represents him as already an old man. On this occasion he sends David to the Israelite camp with provisions for his brothers; this was destined to be a long separation between Jesse and his son, for after David's victory over the Philistine giant he entered definitely into Saul's service. There are two other accounts, each of which purports to mention Jesse for the first time: 1 S 16:14, in which Samuel is sent to Bethlehem to anoint David; and 1 S 16:4, in which Jesse's son is sent for to play the harp before Saul. Nothing further is heard of Jesse until we read of him and his 'house' coming to David in the 'cave' of Adullam; David then brings his father and mother to Mizpeh of Moab, and entrusts them to the care of the king of Moab (1 S 22:9). This is the last we hear of him. In Is 11 the 'stock of Jesse' is mentioned as from which the Messiah is to issue; the thought probably being that of the humble descent of the Messiah as contrasted with His glorious kingdom which is to be.

Jesus Christ.—There is no historical task which is more important than that set forth the life and teaching of Jesus Christ, and none to which it is so difficult to do justice. The importance of the theme is sufficiently attested by the fact that it is felt to be His due to reckon a new era from the date of His birth. From the point of view of Christian faith there is no way to be set beside the deeds and the words of One who is adored as God manifest in the flesh, and the Saviour of the world. In the perspective of universal history, His influence ranks with the Greek culture and as one of the three most valuable elements in the heritage from the ancient world, while it surpasses these other factors in the spiritual quality of its effects. On the other hand, the superlative task has its peculiar difficulties. It is quite certain that a modern European makes many mistakes when trying to reproduce the conditions of the distant province of Oriental antiquity in which Jesus lived. The literary documents, moreover, are of no great compass, and are reticent or obscure in regard to many matters which are of capital interest to the modern biographer. And when erudition has done its best with the primary and auxiliary sources, the historian has still to put the heart-searching question whether he possesses the qualifications that would enable him to understand the character, the experience, and the purpose of Jesus. He who would properly write the Life of Jesus Christ must have a pen dipped in the imaginative sympathy of a poet, in the prophet's fire, in the artist's charm and grace, and in the reverence and purity of the saint' (Stewart, The Life of Christ, 1906, p. viii).

Gospels and their purpose.—It is now generally agreed that the Gospel according to Mark is the oldest of the four, that it was written by the disciple Mark, who was one of the companions of Peter and Paul, and that it presents a sketch of His public ministry, with specimens of His teaching, and carries the narrative to the morning of the Resurrection. The original conclusion has been lost, but there can be no doubt that it reconstructed at least certain Galilean appearances of the risen Lord. This Gospel supplies most of our knowledge of the life of Jesus, but its main concern is to bring out the inner meaning and the religious value of the story. It is, in short, a history written with the purpose of demonstrating that Jesus was the expected Messiah. In proof of this it is sufficient to point out that it describes itself at the outset as setting forth the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God (Mark 1:1), that the faith of the disciples culminates in Peter’s confession that He is the Christ (Mark 8:29), that the ground of his condemnation is that He claims to be “the Christ, the Son of the Blessed” (Mark 14:61), and that the accusation written over His cross is “The King of the Jews” (Mark 15:20).

The Gospel according to Matthew is now usually regarded as a second and enlarged edition of an Apostolic origin for the simple reason that it stands on the ground of a note of Papias (Euseb. HE II. 30), was a collection of the Memorabilia of Jesus. As the Logia consisted mainly of the sayings of our Lord, the missing part of it with the narrative of Mark, in order to supply a more complete picture of the Ministry, and at the same time added fresh material from independent sources. Its didactic purpose is that of exhibiting Jesus as the Messiah, and it supports the argument by citing numerous instances of the fulfillment of the life of Jesus of OT prediction. It is sometimes described as the Gospel of the Jewish Christians; and it appears to have addressed itself specially to the difficulties which they felt in view of the destruction of Jerusalem. Could Jesus, they may well have asked, be the Messiah, seeing that His mission had issued, not in the deliverance of Israel, but in its ruin? In answer to this the Gospel makes it plain that the overthrow of the Jewish State was a punishment which was foreseen by Jesus, and also that He had become the head of a vaster and more glorious kingdom than that of which, as Jewish patriots, they had ever dreamed (28:17-20).

The Gospel according to Luke is also dependent on Mark, for the general framework, and derives from the Primitive, known as the Old Gospel by Nazareth and Jerusalem (14:1-28, 19:9-44), and Luke’s discovery among the Gentiles of the faith for which he sought (17:18-49). It is also characteristic of Luke that he gives in full length the six commissions of the beginning of the missionary activity of the Church (10:1-20).

The author of the Fourth Gospel makes considerable use of the narratives of the Synoptists, but also suggests that their account is an important, though defective, and often particular, erroneous. The serious defect, from the Johannine point of view, is that they represent Galilee as the exclusive scene of the Ministry until shortly before the end, and that they know nothing of a series of visits, extending over two years, to Jerusalem and the feast, as part of His mission. That there was a design to correct as well as to supplement appears from the displacement of the Cleansing of the Temple from the close of the Ministry, and from the emphasis which was placed on the way in which attention is drawn to the accurate information as to the day and the hour of the Crucifixion. And still more deliberately in the earlier Gospels is the history used as the vehicle for the disclosure of the secret and the glory of the Person of Jesus. The predicate of the Messiah is reaffirmed, and the Saviour He appears in the most sublime and tender characters, but the Prologue furnishes the key to the interpretation of His Person in a title which imports the highest conceivable dignity of origin, being, and prerogative: “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.” And the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, glory as of the only-begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth” (1:14).

Trustworthiness of the Gospels.—It is impossible to proceed on the four biographies, viewed as we perceive them, if the authenticity of the entire narrative is being given by inspiration, are absolutely immune from error. The means by which they were brought into shape are very different from the method of Divine inspiration. The Evangelists were severely limited to the historical data which reached them by ordinary channels. They copied, abridged, amplified, and added. The case documents evidence was freely handled in this fashion by Mt. and Lk. was historical Mk. That mistake is not in the history of a fact is proved by the occurrence of conflicting accounts of the same events, and by the uncertainty as to the order of events which is often palatable in Mt. and Mk., and which in some extent baffled Lk. in his attempt to trace the course of all things accurately. There is therefore considerable diversity in the report of many of our Lord’s sayings, and the Church in its dogmatic tradition, was to conclude that the report is more or less inaccurate. Whatever giving effect to their own convictions, or reproducing changes which had been made by the mind of the Church in the earlier tradition, writers coloured and altered to some extent the sayings of our Lord. At the same time the canon, when tested by ordinary canons, must be pronounced to be excellent authorities. They may be dated within a period of forty to fifty years after the death of Christ—Mark, about 40 A.D., and (probably) not later than 80 A.D. The great mass of the Synoptic Gospels had assumed its permanent shape not later than the period A.D. 60-70, and the changes which it underwent after the great catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem were but small, and can without difficulty be recognized (Sanday, Notes on the Synoptics). Further, that Gospels composed in the second generation can be trusted to have reproduced the original thought of the Synoptics with general accuracy. The ground on which they were used throughout the intervening period in the Church, and the memory of witnesses must thus have been in a position to preserve the continuity of the report, and to check any serious deviations from the oldest testimony. The general trustworthiness is further supported by the consideration of the originality of the Synoptic picture of Jesus and His teaching. The character of Jesus, and the acts in which He is revealed, form a whole, which is the unmistakable stamp of historical reality, and forbids us to think that to any great extent it can have been the product of the collective Christian mind. Jesus, in short, is asked to explain the Church and cannot without His own explanation (Sanday, Notes on the Synoptics). It is also to be noticed that the Synoptic teaching has a clear-cut individuality of its own, which shows that it has stubbornly refused to blend with the Apostolic type of theology.

With the Fourth Gospel the case stands somewhat differently. If it is indeed the witness of which its authority stands higher than all the rest. In that case the duty of the historian is to employ it as his fundamental document, and to utilize the Synoptics as an auxiliary. In the view of the present writer the question is one of great difficulty. It is true that there is a powerful body of Patriarchal testimony in support of it. The Fourth Gospel was composed by the Apostle John in Ephesus.
JESUS CHRIST

in his old age—about A.D. 95. It is also true that the Gospel solemnly stake its credit on its right to be accepted as the record of an eye-witness (I Tim. 21). The position is strengthened by the fact that, in the judgment even of many unsympathetic witnesses, it embodies a larger and more substantial amount of valuable information.

On the other hand, it is a serious matter that a Gospel, appearing at the close of the century, should practically remain that of Jesus which had been circulated in the world for sixty years, and should put forward a view of the course of the Ministry which is not even suspected in the other Apostolic documents. Passing in this process which was indiscernible in the Synoptic report has here actually taken place, and that the discourses of Jesus are assimilated to a well-marked type of Apostolic document. There is reason to believe that for both history and doctrine the author had at his disposal Memorabilia of Jesus, but in both cases also it would seem that he has handled his data with great freedom. The treatment of the historical matter, it may be permitted to think, is more largely topical, and the chronological framework which it provides is less reliable, than is commonly supposed. The discourses, again, have been expanded by the reporter, and east in the mounds of his own thought, so that in them we really possess a combination of the words of Jesus of Nazareth with those of the illumined Christians speaking in the experience of a disciple. The hypothesis which seems to do justice to both sets of phenomena is that John was only the author in a similar sense to that in which Peter was the author of Mk., and Matthew of canonical Mt., and that the actual composer of the Fourth Gospel was a disciple of the second generation. He was served heir to the knowledge and personality of the Apostle, and who claimed considerable powers as an executor. In view of this considerations, it is held that a slice of the life of Jesus is primarily based on the Synoptic record, and that in utilizing the Johannine additions it is desirable to take up a critical attitude in regard to the form and chronology. There is also much to be said for expounding the teaching of Jesus on the basis of the Synoptics, and for treating the Johannine discourses as primarily a source for Apostolic doctrine. It is a different matter whether the interpretation of Christ which the Fourth Gospel supplies is trustworthy, and on the value of this, its main message, two remarks may be made. It is, in the first place, substantially the same valuation of Christ which pervades the Pauline Epistles, and which has been endorsed by the saintly experience of the Christian centuries as answering to the knowledge of Christ that is given in intimate communion with the risen Lord. Moreover, the doctrine of Providence comes to the succour of a faith which may be distressed by the breakdown of the hypothesis of inerrancy.

For it is a reasonable belief that God, in whose plan with the race the work of Christ was to be a decisive factor, took order that there should be given to the after world a record which should sufficiently instruct men in reply to the question, 'What think ye of Christ?'

(2) The Epistles.—From the Epistles it is possible to collect many striking facts as to the existing condition at the death, and the resurrection of Christ. Incidentally St. Paul shows that he could cite His teaching on a point of ethics (1 Co 11, 14), and give a detailed account of the institution of the Lord's Supper (1 Co 11, 23, 24).
Paul,
also significant that in allusions to the Temptation (He 4), the Agony (5), and the Transfiguration (2 P 1, 19), the writers can reckon on a ready understanding.

(8) Extra-Canonical Sources: (1) Christian; (a) Patristic references.—The Fathers make very trifling additions to our knowledge of the facts of the life of Jesus. There is nothing more important than the statement of Justin, that as a carpenter Jesus made ploughs and yokes (Dial. 88). More valuable are the discourses to the canonical sayings of Jesus (Westcott, Intro. to the Life of Christ, 1900, p. 79, of the 167 Logia which have been claimed, Ruck drones 43 worthless, 13 of possible value, and 14 valuable (Die Spruche Jesu, 1896). The following are deemed by Huckle to be noteworthy (Synopsen der die Christengesch., 1900):—

(1) 'Ask great things, and the small shall be added to you; and ask heavenly things, and the earthly shall be added to your kingdom' (Acta Philippi, ch. 44).

(2) 'If ye exalt not your low things, and transfer to your right hand the things on your left, ye shall not enter into my kingdom' (Acta Philippi, ch. 34).

(3) 'He who is near me is near the fire, he who is far from me is far from the kingdom' (Origen, Hom. in Jer. xx. 3).

(4) 'If ye kept not that which is small, who will give you that which is great?' (Clem. Rom. ii. 8).

(5) 'Be thou saved and thy soul' (Exo. 4.3 Theod. ap.Clem.
ii. 2) valuable information.

(6) 'Show yourselves tried bankers' (Clem. Alex. Strom.
1. 28).

The 'Thou hast seen thy brother, thou hast seen God'
(Cb. 1. 10).

More recent additions to the material are to be found in Grenfell and Hunt, Sayings of our Lord (1897) and Sayings of Jesus in the Eschatological Phase of the Synoptic Gospels. These fall into three groups according as they deal with the history of Joseph and Mary (Provenzalism of James), the Infancy (Gospel of Thomas), and Pilate (Act of Pilate). They are worthless elaborations, with the addition of grotesque and sometimes beautiful fancies ('Apopryphal Gospels, Acts and

Of more value are the fragments of the Gospels of the Hebrews, the Epigrams, NT extra canonem recepsum, 1870–84; Swete, The Akhimm Fragment of the Gospel of Peter, 1903).

(8) Jewish sources.—Josephus mentions Jesus (Ant. xi. 8, 1), but the now famous passage, iii. 20, is mainly, if not entirely, a Christian interpolation.

The Jews remembered Him as charged with deceiving the people, practising magic and speaking blasphemy, as having been crucified at the direction of Pilate, as having been brought before the Sanhedrin and Talmud as to the circumstances of His birth appear to have been comparatively late inventions (Hudricus, Sapheer Toledot Jeschua, 1703; Lalib, Jesus Christus im Talmud, 1900).

(3) Classical sources.—There is evidence in the classical writers for the historical existence, approximate date, and death of Jesus, but otherwise their attitude was ignorant. What is said of Jesus is common sense, and is not to be expected in a work like Josephus, who is not a man of faith, nor a Christian, but one who is essentially modern because the value of his ideas and of his message is perennial (Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums, Eng. tr. 1901; another of such a man, above all, the spokesman of unfilled apocalyptic dreams (J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu zum Reichliche Gottes, 1892). Bousset mediates between the two views (Jesus, 1906).
JESUS CHRIST

III. Reproduction of the Biblical account in general agreement with the faith of the Church—Neander, Das Leben Jesu Christi, 1837 (Eng. tr. 1848); B. Weiss, Das Leben Jesu, 1882 (Eng. tr. 1888); Ewald, The Life and Teachings of Jesus the Messiah, 1884; Didon, Jesus Christ, 1901; Sanday, Outlines of the Life of Christ, 1906. This shows that a majority of the Church has accepted the statements of the Fourth Gospel as a valuable history. The works of Weiss and Sanday dispose of the attack on the inspiration of Schweitzer (op. cit. 277). As to more recent scholarship, which regards the cardinal questions as settled in a negative sense, (a full bibliography see Schweitzer, op. cit. art. "Jesus Christ" in P.R.E.).

3. The Conditions in Palestine (Schrader, G. F. V [R.P. n. l. 1 ff.]).—The condition of the Jews at the birth of Christ may be summarily described as marked by political impotence and religious decadence. (1) The political situation.—From the age of the Exile, the Jews were a people no longer subject to a foreign domination—Persian, Greek, Egyptian, Syrian, in rapid succession. Following upon a century of independence under the Maccabees, the country was incorporated in the Roman Empire as a division of the province of Syria. In certain circumstances, which have a parallel in British India, the Romans recognized a feudatory king, and it was with this status that Herod the Great reigned in Palestine in b.c. 37. His dominions were divided among his three sons; but on the deposition of Archelaus in 6 a.d., Judea and Samaria were placed under a Roman procurator. Herod Antipas and Pontius Pilate continued to rule as vassal princes, without the title of tetrarchs, over Galilee and Iturea respectively. The pressure of the Roman rule was felt in the stern measures which were taken to suppress any expressions of national feeling, and also in the enactments of the publicans to whom the taxes were farmed. Internal administration was largely an affair of the Jewish Church. To a highly spirited people like the Jews, with memories of former freedom and power, the loss of national independence was galling; and their natural restlessness under the foreign yoke, combined as it was with the Messianic hopes that formed a most vital element of their religion, was a sore to a people not only subject to the Roman authorities but to their own leaders. (2) The religious situation.—From the religious point of view it was a decadent age. No doubt there is a tendency to exaggerate the degradation of the world at our Lord's coming, on the principle that the darkest hour must have preceded the dawn; and in fairness the indictment should be restricted to the statement that it is possible the Jewish religion may have declined from its highest level of OT religion. It had, in fact, many of the features which have reappeared in the degenerate periods of the Christian Church. (a) One such feature was the substitution of the representation of the prophetic man—otherwise replacement as a religious authority by representatives of sacred learning. As the normal condition of things in the Christian Church has been similar, it cannot in itself be blamed to be symptomatic of anything worse than a silver age that the exponents of the Scriptures and of the tradition were now the chief religious guides of the people (see SCRIEES). Moreover, a very genuine religious tenacity and fervor had continued to find expression in the Apocalyptic literature of later Judaism (see APOCALYPSTC LITERATURE). (b) A more decisive proof of degradation is the exaltation of the ceremonial and formal side of religion as a substitute for a spiritual religion of love and self-sacrifice. This tendency had its classical representatives in the Pharisees. The best of their number must have exhibited, as Josephus shows, a zeal for God and a self-sacrifice like that of Roman Catholic saints—otherwise the veneration of the people, which Josephus stated, would be inexplicable (Ant. xvii. ii. 4); but as a class our Lord charges them with sins of covetousness and inhumanity, which gave the colour of hypocrisy to their ritualistic scruples (Mt 24; see PHARISEES). (c) A further characteristic of decadence is that the religious organization tends to come in the place of God, as the object of devotion, and there appears the powerful ecclesiastic who, whether his hopes and even self-will, is indispensable as the symbol and protector of the sacred institution. This type was represented by the Sadducees—in their general outlook men and the world, in their domination over an ostensibly basis of conservatism,—who filled the priestly offices, controlled the Sanhedrin, and endeavoured to maintain correct relations with their Roman masters. It can as well be believed that, as Josephus tells us, they presumed an aristocratic dignity to political theocracy, which they nevertheless dominated; and that they humoured the multitude by an occasional show of religious zeal (see SADDUCEES). In the world presided over by pedants, formalists, and political ecclesiastics, the common people receive a fairly good character. Their religion was the best that then had a footing among men, and they were among the most serious and zealous of the world, in their devotion to God, and they were bound to be bound for repenting of their wrongs have a desire about it. They had been purified by the providential discipline of centuries from the last vestiges of idolatry. It is noteworthy that Jesus brings against them no such sweeping accusations of immorality and hypocrisy as are met with in the Synoptists. The notable fault was that they were disposed to look on their religion as a mere of procuring them worldly good, and that they were blind and unresponsive in regard to purely spiritual truth. The Gospels show that the Sadducees, towhom they showed that they were capable of reverence, and eager to obey, those who seemed to them to speak for God; and their response to the preaching of John the Baptist was still more to their honour. There is evidence of a contemporary strain of self-renouncing idealism in the existence of communities which sought deliverance from the evil of the world in the austerities of an ascetic life (Jos. Ant. xix. 1. 5; see ESSEANCES). The Gospels introduce us to the sects of the Gospel world, who impress us as exemplifying a simple and noble type of piety—nourished as they were on the religion of the OT, and waiting patiently for the salvation of God. Into a world pervaded by this atmosphere Jesus was born.

4. Date of Christ's Birth (cf. art. CHRONOLOGY, p. 155x, and In Hastings' B.D.).—If John began to baptize in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (Lk 3) in A.D. 29—and if Jesus was thirty years of age when He was baptized (v. 23), the traditional date fixed by Dionysius Exiguus would be approximately correct. But it is probable that the reign of Tiberius was continued by Lk. from his admission to joint-authority with Augustus in A.D. 11-12, so that Jesus would be thirty in A.D. 28-6, and would be born about B.C. 5. This agrees with the statement of Mt. that He was born under Herod, since Herod died A.C. 4, and a number of events of the Infancy are mentioned as occurring before his death. A reference in Jn 28 to the forty-six years during which the Temple had been in course of construction leads to a similar result—viz. A.D. 28 for the second year of the Ministry, and A.C. 5 for the Birth of Jesus.

5. Birth and Infancy (cf. Swete, The Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1907).—Mt. and Lk. have a narrative of the Infancy, and agree in the following points—that Jesus was of David's line, that He was miraculously conceived, that He was born in Bethlehem, and that the Holy Family permanently settled in Nazareth. The additional incidents related by Mt. are the appearance of the angel to Joseph (1:21), the adoration of the Magi (2:10), the flight into Egypt (vv.19-23), the massacre at Bethlehem (v. 16-18). Lk.'s supplementary matter includes the promise of the birth of the Baptist (1:29), the Annunciation to Mary (vv.32-38), the visit of Mary to Elisabeth (vv.39-41), the birth of the Baptist (vv.57-59), the census (2:1), the vision of angels (23-44), the adoration of the shepherds (vv. 13-20), the circumcision (v.2), the presentation in the Temple (vv. 21-41).

The narratives embody two ideas which are singly implied in, and in combination make a profound appeal to the feelings and the imagination. The humiliation of the Saviour is emphasized by one set of events—the lowly parentage, the birth in a stable, the rage of Herod, the flight of His parents to a distant land. The other shows Him as honoured by heaven, while earth also agrees, in the representatives of its wealth and its poverty, its wisdom and its ignorance, to do Him honour at His coming. A halo of miracles is formed around the central miracle, comparable to the rays of the rising sun (Lange, Life of Christ, Eng. tr. i. 257, 258).

At this point the influence of theologcal standpoint makes itself acutely felt. In the 'Lives' written from the naturalistic and Unitarian standpoint, the mass of the material is described as mythical or legendary, and the only points left over for discussion are the sources of invention, and the date at which the stories were incorporated with the genuine tradition. The residuum of historical fact, according to O. Holtzmann, is 'Jesus was born at Nazareth, Galilæa, the son of Joseph and Mary, being the eldest of five brothers and several sisters, and there He grew up (Lk. 2. 11-19). The chief grounds on which the negative case is rested may be briefly considered.

(1) The narratives of the Infancy are not a part of the original tradition, since they are known to only two of the Evangelists, and have no Biblical support outside these. This view seems to be supported by the fact that it may have been made later from a good source, and that there were obvious reasons why some at least of the incidents should be kept in a text with reserve.

(2) The two Gospels which deal with the Infancy discredit one another by the incompatibility of their statements. Mt., in his usual, though not excessive, hyperbolic way, claims that Mary was wise. Lk. says that he made a visit to Bethlehem on the occasion of a census. According to Mt., the birth in Bethlehem was followed by a flight into Egypt; according to Lk., they visited Jerusalem and then returned to Nazareth. But the difficulties have been exaggerated. Though it is quite possible that Mt. did not know of an original residence in Nazareth, he does not actually deny it. And although neither Evangelist may have known of the other's story, it is quite possible for an excessive histrionic seal, to work the episodes of Mt. into Lk.'s scheme. The accounts may be combined with considerable plausibility if we suppose that Joseph and Mary remained a full year in Bethlehem, during which the presentation in the Temple took place, and that the visit of the Magi was much later than the adoration of the shepherds' (Gлаг. Introduct. to the Synoptic Gospels, pp. 128, 137).

(3) It is also said to be inconsistent with the indirect evidence of other portions of the Gospels. If they really occurred, why was Mary not prepared for all that followed? Did she not believe in Him? (Mt. 28, 29). In particular, the body of the Gospel contains, it is said, evidence which is inconsistent with the Virgin birth. The difficulty is a real one, but greater than the difficulty presented in the fact that the mighty works of the Ministry did not overbear doubt and disbelief in those who witnessed them.

(4) The narratives in question are also said to have had their origin in man's literary idiosyncrasy as to the proper manner of the coming of a Divine messenger. The history of the founders of other religions—e.g. Confucius and Gautama—shows a fond predisposition to invent the birth of a Saviour or a mighty prophet with a miraculous halo, and it is suggested that similar stories were invented about Christ, with the effect of making the Incarnation an altogether plausibly possible event. They are 'deformed inventions' misheaded by courtiers in the spirit of the just;' (Martinian, Life and Gons). There is undeniable force in this, but it will be noticed that it is an observation which would make an end, as indeed those who use it intend, of the whole miraculous element in the life. If, on the other hand, we believe that the life of Christ was supernatural, it is easily credible that the raising of the Sun was heralded, in Lange's phrase, 'a ray of glory.

Of the events of the glorious cycle which have the joint support of Mt. and Lk. there are three which have been felt to have religious significance.

(1) The Davidic descent. — It was an article of common belief in the primitive Church that Jesus was descended from David (Ro 1. 2). Mt. and Lk. supply genealogies which have the purpose of supporting the belief, but do not strengthen it prima facie, as one traces the descent through Solomon (Mt. 1. 6), the other through a son of David called Nathan (Lk. 3. 33). The favourite way of harmonising them is to suppose that Mt. gives the descent through Joseph, Lk. through Mary, while others think that Mt. gives the list of heirs to the Davidic throne, Lk. the actual founder of the messianic branch. It may well be believed that descendants of the royal house preserved the record of their origin; and on the other hand it seems unlikely that Jesus could have been accepted as Messias with the least possible support of an origin, or that a late fabrication would have been regarded as such.

(2) The Virgin-birth (cf. Gore, Dissertations on the Incarnation, 1895; Lobsen, The Virgin-Birth of Christ, Eng. tr. 1908).—The student is referred for a full statement on both sides to the works above cited, but a remark may be made on the two branches of the evidence. The objections are based on the eternal literary grounds, as distinct from anti-dogmatic prejudices, of considerable weight. No account of Mk.'s purpose satisfactorily explains his omission if he knew of it and it seems incredible that, if known, it would not have been fulfilled in the Pentateuch. Upon this it can only be said that it may have been a fact, although it had not yet come to the knowledge of Mk. and Paul. Further, Mt. and Lk. themselves raise grave difficulties, since the genealogies seem to be that Jesus was descended from David through Joseph. The usual, though not quite convincing, answer is, that Jesus was legally the son of Joseph, and therefore David's heir. It must probably be admitted that the original compilers of the genealogies shared the ignorance of the earliest Gospel, but ignorances or silence is not decisive as to a fact. (b) It has been urged that by the doctrinal necessity of the tenet. It is usually held to have been necessary to preserve Jesus from the taint of original sin; but as Mary was truly His mother, an additional miracle must have been necessary to prevent the transmission of the taint through her, and this subsidiary miracle could have safeguarded the sinlessness of Jesus without the miraculous conception. Nor can it be said that it is a necessary corollary of the Eternal Sonship of Christ, since it is found in the Gospels which say nothing of His pre-existence, and is absent from the Gospel which places this in the forefront. And yet it would be rash to say that it has no value for Christian faith. The unique character of Christ, with its note of sinless perfection, cannot be explained by purely natural factors; and the doctrine of the Virginbirth at least renders the service of affirming the operation of a supernatural causality in the constitution of that character. It must also be said that the negation is generally felt to be a phase of an anti-supernatural campaign to which the overthrow of this position means the capture of an outwork, and a point of departure for a more critical attack. It is also difficult for a Christian thinker to abandon the dogma without feeling puzzled and distressed by the alternative explanations which it opens up.

(3) The Birth at Bethlehem (cf. Ramsay. Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 1902).—For the birth at Bethlehem we have the statement of the Gospels. Lk. seems to have investigated the matter himself, and explains the presence of Joseph and Mary at Bethlehem as due to a census which had been ordered by Augustus (Lk. 2:1). It has frequently been assumed that Lk. has blundered, as Quirinius was not governor of Syria, and the impossible date to which we are thus led seems to discredit the whole combination. In defence of Lk. it is pointed out that Quirinius held a military appointment in Syria about a.c. 6 which may have been loosely described as a governorship, and that there is evidence for a twelve years' cycle in Imperial statistics which would give a first enrolment about the same date. We have many references in the silent period, vol. ii., p. 2).—

The silence of the Gospels as to the boyhood and early manhood of Jesus is broken only by the mention of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Lk 2:22). Even if it be true to Nazareth that Jesus was born, there have been expected that the piety of His disciples would have recovered some facts from the public memory, and that in any case the tradition would have been enriched by later members of the family. The only possible explanation of the silence is that during the years in Nazareth Jesus did and said nothing which challenged notice. It is also evident that the silence is an indirect testimony to the credibility of the Gospels. It is of little wonder why the tradition, had it not been bound by facts, should have invested the earlier period with supernatural surprises and stories.

Jesus Christ—Early in time, and probably chief in importance, was the education in the home. The Jewish Law earnestly impressed upon parents, especially upon fathers, the duty of instructing their children in the knowledge of God, His mighty acts and His laws, and also of disciplining them in religion and morality. 'We take most pains of all,' says Josephus, 'with the instruction of children, and esteem the knowledge of them, with which we are corresponding with them, the most important affairs of our whole life' (c. Apion, i. 12). 'We know the laws,' he adds, 'as well as our own name.' It was the home in Nazareth that opened to Jesus the avenues of knowledge, and first put Him in possession of the treasures of the OT. It also seems certain that in His home there was a type of family life which made fatherhood a sacred and imposing duty, and the elders may sometimes have done their work as a labour of love, and there is evidence that it could be laid on the chazan as an official duty. The stated services of the synagogue, in which the child partook, were the expounding of the Scriptures by any person possessed of learning or a message, must have been an event of the deepest interest to the awakening mind of Jesus. From early childhood He acquired His parents' interest in Jerusalem to keep the Feast—the utmost stress being laid by the Rabbis upon this as a means for the instilment of piety. It has also been well pointed out that the land of Palestine was itself a wonderful educational instrument. It was a little country, in size less than the Scottish Highlands, of which a great part could be seen from a mountain-top, and every district visited in a journey; and its valleys and towns, and, above all, Jerusalem, was filled with memories which compelled the citizen to live in the story of the past, and to reflect at every stage and prospect on the mission of his people and the ways of God (Ramsay, The Education of Christ, 1902). To this has been added the discipline of work. Jesus learned the trade of a carpenter, and appears to have practised this trade in Nazareth until He reached the threshold of middle age (Mt 12:8). It is perhaps remarkable that none of His imagery is borrowed from His handicraft. One has the feeling that the work of the husbandman and the vinedresser had more attraction for Him, and that His self-sacrifice may have begun in the workshop. The deeper preparation is suggested in the one incident which is chronicled. The point of it is that even in His boyhood Jesus thought of God as His Father, and of His house as His true sphere of work (Lk 2:49). The holy of holies was the years of childhood associated with God in which He knew the Divine Fatherhood to be a fact, and became conscious of standing to Him in the intimate relationship of a Son.

Knowledge of Jesus—There is no reason to suppose that Jesus studied in the Rabbinical schools. Nor is there more ground for the belief, which has been made the motive of certain 'Lives of Christ' (Venturini, Naturliche Geschichte der Propheten von Nazareth, 1800-2), that He had acquired esoteric wisdom among the Essenes. It has also become difficult for those who take their impressions from the historical records to believe that, while in virtue of His human nature He lived the Messianic years of power and dominion, in virtue of His Divine nature He was simultaneously omniscient. All we can say is that He possessed perfect knowledge within the sphere in which His vocation lay. The one book which He studied was the OT, and He used it continually in temptation, conflict, and suffering. He knew human nature in its littleness and greatness— the littleness that spoils the noblest characters, the greatness that only the lowest pollutes, and the radiance. He read individual character with a swift and unerring glance. But what chiefly have impressed the listeners were the intimacy and the certainties, the assurance of God in the world of nature He pointed out the tokens of His bounty and the suggestions of His care. The realm of human affairs was to Him instinct with principles which illustrated the kingdom of God. He spoke as One who saw into the very heart of God, and who knew at first hand His purpose with the world, and His love for sinful and sorrow-laden men. The Jews and the Samaritans—The religious commonplaceness of the age, which has been described above, was at length broken by the appearance of John the Baptist, who recalled the ancient prophets. He proclaimed the approach of the Day of the Lord, when the Messiah would pass to Him and His power and reign. He rejected the idea that the Jews could claim special privileges on the ground of birth (Mt 3:1), and proclaimed that the judgment, with which His work would begin, would be searching and pitiless. He also, like other Galileans Jesus repaired to the scene of the ministry in the lower Jordan valley, and received baptism (Mt 3:1), not, indeed, as though He needed the signal of repentance, but as the symbol and signal of His consecration to the work which lay before Him. The Gospels are more deeply interested in the impression made by Jesus on John, modern writers in the influence exerted by John upon Jesus. According to the Synoptics, John proclaimed the near advent of the Messiah; according to Mt., he may have implied that Jesus was the Messiah (3:34); while the Fourth Gospel states that he explicitly pointed Him out as the Messiah to His disciples (19:28). If we suppose that Jesus held intercourse for a time with the Baptist, it is easy to believe that the stanchness and commanding greatness of His character at least evoked from the Baptist an avowal of His divinity. That He went so far as to declare Him the Messiah whom He preached is a statement which is difficult to accept literally, or as meaning more than that the school of the Baptist pointed to His consummation in the school of Christ. On the other hand, contact with the Baptist's ministry evidently precipitated the crisis in the life of Christ. The man who re-discovered the need and the power of a prophetic mission was an instrument in bringing Jesus face to face with His prophetic task; while his proclamation of the impending advent of the Messiah must have had the character of Jesus of a call to the work for which, as the unique Son, He knew Himself to be furnished. It is evident that the act of baptism was accompanied by something decisive. According to Mk., Jesus then had a vision of the Spirit descending upon Him like a dove, and heard a voice from heaven: "Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (111, 11). This is more probable than the statement that it was a public revelation (Lk 3:22), or that it was the public declaration of the visible manifestation (Mt 17:5). We shall hardly cry if we suppose that Jesus spoke to the disciples of His baptism as the time when His Messianic consciousness became clear, and He received an endowment of strength for the task to which He was called.

8. The Temptation.—The view taken of the significance of the Baptism is confirmed by the narrative of the Temptation, which would naturally follow closely upon the acceptance of the Messianic vocation (Mt 3:13-17, Mt 4:1-11, Lk 4:1-13). Like the scene at the Baptism, the temptations probably came to Jesus in the form of a vision, which He afterwards described to His disciples. It has generally been agreed that the temptations must be understood as growing out of the Messianic commission, but there is wide difference of opinion as to their precise significance. The view which seems most probable to the present writer may be briefly stated. It is presumed that Luke's order serves to answer best to the logic of the situation. Assuming that in the Baptism Jesus accepted the Messianic call, the possibilities of the ensuing ordeal of temptation were such that He should be called from the position that He should misconceive it, or that, rightly apprehending it, He should adopt wrong methods. The first temptation, accordingly, may very naturally be supposed to have consisted in the suggestion that He should choose comfort rather than hardship—that He should turn back, when there was yet time, from the arduous and perilous path, and live out His days in the sheltered life of the home. As He rejected on the ground that there are higher goods than comfort and security; 'man shall not live by bread alone' (Mt 4:4). The heroic course resolved on, the great question to be next faced was if He was to aim at establishing a kingdom of the political kind which the people generally expected, or a kingdom of a spiritual order. To found and maintain an earthly kingdom, He knew, meant the use of violence, craft, and all other unsanctified means; and of such means, even if the end had approved itself to Him as His vocation, He refused to make use (Mt 4:2-4). This decision taken, the question remained as to the way in which He was to win belief for Himself and His cause. For one with perfect trust in God, there was a natural suggestion to challenge God to own Him by facing risks in which His life could be saved only through the interposition of a stupendous miracle (4:6). But this He put aside as impious, and cast upon the Father the care of making His path plain, while He awaited, prudently as well as bravely, the gradual disclosure of His call to work and danger.

9. Duration of the Ministry (cf. also C. V. S. Gordon, above and in DB).—The Synoptics give no certain indication of the length of the period. It is argued that the incident of plucking the ears of corn (Mk 2:21) points to April or June of one year, and that the feeding of the five thousand, which is in the spring ('green grass,' Mk 6:39) of the year following; while at least another twelve months would be required for the journeys which are subsequently recorded. The chronological scheme usually adopted is based on the Fourth Gospel, which has the following notes of time:—a Passover (2:23), four months to harvest (4:30), a feast of the Jews (5:1), another Passover (6:4), the feast of Tabernacles (7:1), the largest of the year (7:18), the last Passover (7:39). The first four can be combined in more than one way to fit into a single year—e.g. (a) Passover—May—any lesser feast—Passover; or (b) Passover—January—Purin (February)—Passover. 'From 6 to 11° the space covered is exactly a year, the autumn Feast of Tabernacles (77), and the winter Feast of Dedication (1090), being signalized in the course of it.' (Art. 'Chronology' in DB I. 4994. 4084). It was a wide-spread opinion in Ptolemaic times, supported by the phrase 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk 4:19), that the ministry lasted only one year; and while the opinion of some modern scholars can be maintained that even the Fourth Gospel includes its material between two Passovers (Westcott and Hort, Greek Test.; Briggs, New Light on the Life of Jesus). On the other hand, it was asserted by Irenaeus (adv. Haer. II. 22) on the ground of Jn 30, and of an alleged Johannine tradition, that from ten to twenty years elapsed between the Baptism and the Crucifixion. Jn 377 is quite inconclusive, and the best authority for the Johannine tradition, Judges II, and the Fourth Gospel, the evidence of which is summed up by saying that 'while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 3; 25 to Jn 1117' (art. 'Chronology' in DB).

10. Periods of the Life of Christ.—The divisions are necessarily affected by the view which is taken of the chronological scheme of the Fourth Gospel.

Keim, who generally follows the guidance of the Synoptics, divides as follows:—

(a) Preliminary period of self-recognition and decision.

1. The Galilaean spring-time, beginning in the spring of A.D. 34 (certainly too late), and lasting for a few months.

Characteristics: the optimism of Jesus, and the responsiveness of the people.

2. The Galilaean storms, extending over the summer and autumn of A.D. 34 and the spring of the following year.

Characteristics: Galilee and the neighboring regions. Characteristics: increasing opposition, especially the polemical note in the teaching of Jesus.

Scene: Persea and Jerusalem (Jesus of Nazareth).

The Johannine material can be combined with the Synoptic in two periods, each of which lasted about a year. The following is the scheme of Hase:—

Preliminary history.

1. The 'acceptable year of the Lord,' marked by hopefulness, active labour, and much outward success. Scene: Galilee, and the Gadarenes. Time: from the second to the last Passover.

2. The year of conflict. Scene: Galilee, Persea, Judea. Time: from the winter to shortly before Passover of the following year.

Time: Passover (Gesch. Jesu).

The months between the Baptism and the first Passover must be regarded as a period with distinct characteristics, and we may distinguish (1) the year of obscurity, (2) the year of public favor, (3) the year of opposition (Stalker, Year of Jesus Christ, 1879).

The division into sub-periods has been most elaborately carried out by Dr. Sanday (Outlines of the Life of Jesus Christ).—

A. Preliminary period—from the Baptism to the call of the leading Apostles. Sources: Mt 3:14, Mk 1:16, Lk 3:17, Jn 1:45. Scene: mainly in Galilee, but partly also in Judaea. Time: winter a.d. 26 to a few weeks before Passover, a.d. 27.

B. First active or constructive period. Sources: Mt 4:13—16, Mk 1:21—45, Lk 4:14—9, Jn 5. Scene: mainly in Galilee, but also partly in Jerusalem. Observations: from about Pentecost, a.d. 27, to shortly before Passover, a.d. 28.

Weiss's scheme agrees with the above so far as regards the duration of the ministry (from 2 to 3 years), and the date of the Crucifixion (Passover, a.d. 29). His periods are:

JESUS CHRIST

(1) the preparation, corresponding to Dr. Sanday's 'preliminary period' down to the wedding in Cana of Galilee; (2) the period, including the remainder of 'the preliminary period,' and the first active or constructive period; (3) the period of first conflicts; (4) the period of crisis, commencing to the sending out or culminating period; (5) the Jerusalem period, corresponding to the close of the active period; (6) the Passion and the subsequent events.

Useful as the above schemes of Writers and Scholars are in bringing the subject of historical framework, it is a very precarious assumption that the Synoptic material, which is largely put together from a topical point of view, can be assigned its proper place in the scheme. Further, it is by no means clear that we are in a right in supposing that there was a Jewish ministry which ran parallel with the Galilean ministry. There is much to be said for the view that the narratives of the Fourth Gospel presuppose a situation towards the close of their ministry, and that in interweaving them with the Synoptic narratives of the Galilean period, we anticipate the actual march of the history. The view here taken is that there was a Galilean ministry for which the Synoptics are almost the sole source; that this was followed for some months before the end by a Jewish ministry, the materials of which are supplied mainly by the Fourth Gospel; and that finally the source of the Galilean ministry was closed, and that the distinctness of His mission from that of John. He may also have been a relic of Hebraic frame.

He may also have been a relic of Hebraic framework.

(A) The Galilean Ministry.—Jesus seems to have remained with the Baptist until the latter was put in prison (Mk 1:9), when He turned towards Galilee. The change of scene, which in any case was natural in view of the blow that had been struck, served to mark the distinctness of His mission from that of John. He may also have been a relic of Hebraic framework. That the centre of His activity was the populous district, studied with prosperous towns, which lay around the Sea of Galilee. From Capernaum, in which He lived for a time (Mt 4:13, Mk 1:29), He had easy access to the other cities on the lake, and He also appears to have made wider circuits throughout Galilee, in the course of which He preached in the synagogues at Nazareth (Lk 4:16). At the close of the period He penetrated to the regions beyond—being found on the 'borders' of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7:24), then in the heathen district of Decapolis to the east of Jordan (v. 39), afterwards in the territory of Cesarea Philippi in the dominions of the tetrarch Philip (87). Except for the incidental references above referred to, there is nothing to fix the duration of the Galilean ministry; but though crowded with minor works, and incidents, it seems to have been comparatively short. Its importance is measured by the fact that it set the Christian gospel in circulation in the world, and laid the foundation of the Christian Church.

(1) Treatment of the materials.—In dealing with this period, the characteristic task of the historian may almost be said to begin where that of the Evangelists ends. The modern student is not only interested in chronology and in the details of the environment, but he tries to bring the course of events under the point of view of development, and to penetrate to the causes which explain the movement and the issue of the history. The Gospels, on the other hand, contribute a picture rather than a history—a picture, moreover, in which the setting is presupposed rather than described, while they leave us in ignorance of much that should be known about hidden forces and springs of action. It seems advisable to begin by reproducing in its salient aspects the Synoptic picture of the Galilean ministry, based primarily on Mk., and thereafter to advert to some contributions which have been made to the better elucidation of the course of events.

(2) The picture of the Galilean Ministry.—The principal source is the sketch in Mk., which sets forth the Ministry from the point of view of one who regarded it as the manifestation of the Messiah. The chronological order of events is necessarily distorted, as the narrative describes a mission and its outcome; but the arrangement as well as the selection of the material is largely governed by topical considerations. The topics of Mk. may be summarized thus:

(a) the preliminary attestation of Jesus as the Messiah;
(b) the Messianic activities;
(c) the opposition to Jesus, and His self-vindication;
(d) the attitude of Jesus Himself towards the question of His Messiahship;
(e) the results of the Galilean Ministry.

The above argument is taken over by Mt., with some change in the order of the sections, while he supplements from the other Apostolic sources the meaning given by Mk. of the contents of the teaching of Jesus.

Lk. follows Mk. more closely in the sections dealing with the Galilean ministry, but incidentally shows the uncertainty of the chronological scheme by transferring to the beginning the visit to Nazareth (4:14-30); cf. Mk 6:6-4, Mt 13:54-58, on the apparent ground that it could be regarded as in some respects a typical incident.

(a) The preliminary attestation.—The Synoptic tradition puts in the forefront certain credentials of Jesus. John the Baptist predicted His coming (Mt 1:9), a voice from heaven proclaimed Him to be the Son of God, the demons knew Him (vv. 32-35; cf. 57), while the chosen few, though as yet not knowing Him for what He is, instinctively obeyed His call (1:14), and the multitude recognized in Him an extraordinary man (1:26). The references to the Baptist and the vision at the Baptism, the facts which underlay this apologetic argument were that demoniacs were peculiarly susceptible to His influence, and that upon the uncorrupted and unprejudiced heart by His knowledge by His knowledge of the nature of the demons they were peculiarly susceptible to His influence, and that upon the uncorrupted and unprejudiced heart He was able to bring about a change of heart in them. With the distinctness of His mission from that of John. He may also have been a relic of Hebraic framework. That the centre of His activity was the populous district, studied with prosperous towns, which lay around the Sea of Galilee. From Capernaum, in which He lived for a time (Mt 4:13, Mk 1:29), He had easy access to the other cities on the lake, and He also appears to have made wider circuits throughout Galilee, in the course of which He preached in the synagogues at Nazareth (Lk 4:16). way of comment on some casual incident, or of a rejoinder made to a question or an objection. On other occasions, e.g., when preaching in the synagogue, we must suppose Him to have treated of some large subject in a set discourse, but it is unlikely that any one contained more than an exposition of an OT passage (Lk 4:18-19), or the message of one of the parables (Mt 13:18-21). The grand characteristic of His manner of teaching has been described as the combination of utmost degree of popular intelligibility with memorable pregnancy of expression (Wendt, § 2). (a) The means by which indistinctness was attained was the copious use of the concrete example, and of the comparison of ideas. The simile, the metaphor, and the parable. The parables, again, obviously fall into three classes. In one class we have a story which illustrates by a concrete example an attitude which Jesus desired to commend or to condemn (the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:33; the Pharisee and the Publican, 15:17-19). Those of a second class draw attention to a law operating in the natural world which has its counterpart in the Kingdom of God (the Seed Growing Secretly, Mk 4:26-27, the Mustard Seed, 4:31-32). In a third class there is a description of an event which has occurred in special circumstances, or in a course or day or night, or in the dealings of man with man, and the particular event is employed to illustrate some aspect of the Divine message (the Sower, Mt 13:18; the Prodigal Son, Lk 15:11-32). (b) The second note of the teaching of Jesus, which might perhaps be called didactism, is illustrated by the numerous short sayings, or aphorisms, into which He condenses a body of doctrine or precept (Mt 23:24; Lk 10:18). It is also seen in the naked, often paradoxical, fables, in which He states a principle in which the doctrine of non-resistance, e.g., He teaches in uncompromising form by means of the special instance (Mt 26:41-42), and leaves it to the disciple to discover the other considerations which complement its application. This inner observation is of importance as a preservative against the errors of an excessive literalism in the interpretation of the teaching of Jesus. It is also desirable to bear in mind, when it is said that He understood the meaning of His words, that each of the parables of Jesus is to be regarded as the vehicle of one great lesson, and that it is illegitimate to treat it as an allegory every detail of which has been consciously filled with didactic meaning. As regards the aim of Jesus in His teaching, it might be thought self-evident that it could be nothing else than to make His message known to His hearers. In which He states a principle, and leaves it to the disciple to discover the other considerations which complement its application. (ii) The mighty works (cf. Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels, 1886).—The teaching ministry was accompanied from the first by acts of healing, and these were followed later by other acts involving superhuman power. The Synoptic account of the mighty works, when briefly summarized, is as follows:—(1) They were very numerous, and of different kinds. In addition to the miracles which are described in detail, there are references of a general sort which imply that Jesus’ word was effective to a large extent in the form of some kind of intervention (Mt 1:5-8). Some of the miracles might be understood as faith-cures wrought upon persons suffering from nervous disorders or mental derangement, but those are inextricably bound up with others which are not explained by moral therapeutics, while a third group not explained imply a supernatural control of the forces of external nature. The healing miracles may be divided as follows:—(a) cures of organic defects (the blind, Mk 10:46-47; the deaf and dumb, 7:32-37); (b) disease (leprous, Mk 1:40-44, Lk 17:14-17; fever, Mk 1:29-31; dropsy, Lk 14:1-6; paralysis, Mk 2:5-11, Lk 8:43-45); (c) death (Mt 9:24-25, Lk 8:41-42). As a special group, conceived as the counterpart of the Son of God, are the cures of epilepsy and lunacy (Mt 17:14-19, 5:22-25, 9:25-30, 13:15-21). The latter miracles have been classified as (a) miracles of creative power (feeding the multitude, Mk 6:30-44, walking on the water, 6:18-20); (b) Miracles of Providence, including (1) miracles of blessing, in the form of draught of fishes, Lk 5:1-4; the stilling of the tempest, Mk 4:35-41; and (ii.) a miracle of judgment (the curing of the fig-tree, Mt 11:19-21, cf. Westcott, Introduction to the Gospels, 1885, App. E).—(d) The working of miracles was conditioned in various ways. The general condition on the side of the patients was the presence of faith (the woman with the issue, Mk 5:25-34; Bartimeus, Mk 10:46-52). In the absence of faith Jesus could do nothing or little (Mt 6:6-14, Mt 15:28). It was not, however, necessary that this faith should be personal: in some cases it was the vicarious faith of a parent or of a relative. Jesus had healed evil which had prevailed (the centurion’s servant, Mt 8:6-13; the daughter of the Syrophoenician woman, Mk 7:24-37). In some instances the miracle is represented as having its spring in sympathy, apart from any reference to the spiritual condition of the sufferer (the fever, Mk 1:29-31; dropsy, Lk 14:1-6); while in cases of possession it could take place in the face of resistance and antagonism (the unclean spirit, Mk 1:22, the man in the tombs, 5:41-42). As regards the powers of Jesus, the impression is not given that He was in possession of an omnipotence which He was able to wield at will. For what He is able to accomplish He is dependent on the Father, who supplies Him with power in the measure of its application. He could come out by nothing nothing (Mk 9:29) and His energies which gave rise to a feeling of physical exhaustion (Mt 8:4).—(3) The significance of the miracles. The leading point of view in which they are regarded in the Gospels is undeniable the evidential. In the fundamental narrative the argument advances from the testimonies as the first link, to the mighty miracles as the second, and in the exclamation of surprise that they were witnessed by the witnesses. The effect of the Ministry was that Jesus, like the prophets of old, John the Baptist, and the Rabbis, gathered around Him a group of disciples. The great body of those who regarded Him as a Divinely sent teacher must have remained in their homes, and been content to hear Him when they had a convenient opportunity; and there is no reason to think that they were organized in any way into societies, except in so far as a natural instinct would prompt them to meet and speak one to another of the things which they had seen and heard. There was a second body of disciples, sometimes large but fluctuating in size, which accompanied Him on His journeys. Some He invited to join this company, others He sternly invited to count the cost (Mt 8:19-22). Within this company He formed an inner circle of twelve, Mk 10:35-45, with a few breaks were found constantly at His side. The call of Simon and Andrew, James and John (Mt 4:18-22), is related to have occurred in the first days of the Galilean ministry. An early Christian tradition (Ep. Barn. 8) speaks of the Apostles as reclaimed sinners of the worst type, but this is manifestly an exaggeration designed to illustrate the regenerative power of the gospel. The leading members of the band were fishermen—of a craft which is pursued under a sense of dependence on Providence, and therefore tends to foster the spirit of piety. The sons of Zebedee seem to have been in better circumstances than the rest, and Matthew the tax-gatherer doubtless wielded a competent pen; hence the ignorant men accepted by the scribes and Pharisees of the schools, whether ancient or modern. Humility, sincerity, and prudence, coupled with trust in God and devotion to Himself, were the qualifications which rendered these men acceptable to the Master.

In calling the Apostles, Jesus was satisfying a need of His own inner life. It was a maxim of the Rabbis that it was a sin to have no friend with whom to discourse of the Divine Law, and for Jesus this opportunity was provided by their intimate converse. It is evidently that He was wont to feel strengthened by their sympathy (Mt 14:37). On the other hand, He needed them for the work of the Kingdom. It was necessary for Him, in the righteousness of the Kingdom, that the Sovereign should be personally manifested, so that men might see their good works and glorify the Father (Mt 5:19). For this reason we find that it becomes increasingly the business of Jesus to teach their training in knowledge and character. He also looked to them as instruments to aid Him in His work.

'To the disciples were left the details of the daily provision of food; they must fulfill in hand the needs of humanity. Sometimes one and sometimes another of them executed His commissions; they were His channels of communication to the people, with the sick, with the Pharisees (Keim, iii. p. 258).

They were to Jesus 'arms and eyes,' and even in a sense 'an extended personality.' He assigned to them powers and duties similar to His own. He appointed twelve this to mediate between men and God. Sometimes one and sometimes another of them executed His commissions; they were His channels of communication with the people, with the sick, with the Pharisees (Keim, iii. p. 258).

(c) The opposition and self-vindication.—Two sections in Mk., with parallels in Mt. and Lk., are devoted to explaining why certain classes refused to believe in Jesus. Of especial importance in this connexion is the statement that Jesus was own teacher of the people (Mt 13:35, Lk 10:38). The charges may be reduced to three heads: blasphemy, irreligious conduct, and insanity.

(i) The charge of blasphemy was early brought against Jesus by certain of the scribes, on the ground that He professed to forgive sins (Mt 27). The reply of Jesus is that in healing the paralytic He gives evidence that He has received this authority from God. The same general charge is implied in the request of the Pharisees, 'seeking of Him a sign from heaven, tempting Him' (51)—the ground taken being that it was impious to teach as He did, unless He could produce satisfying evidence of a Divine sanction. Had the Evangelist edited his material with inventive licence, we should have expected to this question the same reply as was sent to John the Baptist. Instead, we have the startling reply, 'With this generation I seek a sign! There shall no sign be given' (v. 17). It is incredible that this should mean that Jesus disclaimed to work miracles; but it certainly implies that He did not and probably that He could not, when He was challenged to perform them out of connexion with moral conditions, and as a mere contribution to a controvery.

(ii) Religious conduct.—There are charges of sins of omission and of sins of commission. Among the sins of omission charged against Jesus is His neglect of fasting—a recognized exercise of the holy life, which had been enforced by John the Baptist (Mk 2:18). The reply is that there is a time to fast, and that the time will come for His disciples when their Master is taken away (vv. 19-20). To the same category belongs the accusation which was preferred by the Pharisees and certain of the scribes, that some of His disciples neglected the laws of ceremonials, and especially the rules about the hand-washing. He replies that defilement consists in the impure heart, which is the source of all evil (v. 28). Of the sins of commission the chief transgression charged was that He did not keep the Sabbath; a question to which He answered, and He defended Himself by appealing to OT precedent, and by laying down the principle that the Sabbath law could not be broken by doing good to man on that day. The answer was also a form of self-vindication. He makes man a manner of life, especially His consorting with disreputable persons, stamped Him as wanting in the character of sanctity (24). He replied that He visited them as a physician (v. 17).

(iii) The charge of insanity was also made. The Evangelist does not shrink from recording that some of His friends thought that He was beside Himself (Mk 3:24). Scribes from Jerusalem repeated this in the form that He was the tool of diabolical influences (v. 23). How can Satan,' He asked, 'cast out Satan?' (v. 28).

(d) The attitude of Jesus Himself to the Messiahship.—While the Synoptics labour to show by accumulated evidence that Jesus was His Messiah, He very clearly did not regard Him as obliterating the claim. On the contrary, He enjoys silence upon those who know. He forbids the spirits to testify (19). He even takes steps to keep secret the notable achievements—such as raising the leper (14), and the raising of the daughter of Jairus (50), which would have been likely to carry conviction to the general mind. The impression which is conveyed is that Jesus desired to keep His disciples to Himself, but that they were sometimes prominent, and as the result of their knowledge of Him, should draw the right inference as to His dignity and mission. Even when the grand discovery was made and proclaimed by the disciples, Jesus restrained them (20). All the Gospels this confession is recognized as momentous—Jesus enjoined reserve (Mk 8:29-38, Mt 16:13-15).

Henceforward, He spoke of it freely to the Twelve with the purpose of preparing them for the unexpected issue of His Messiahship in suffering and death. Following upon Peter's confession, 'He began to teach them that he must suffer many things, and be killed, and on the third day rise again' (Mk 8:31). The same was the burden of the teaching of the Galilean period. These predictions of His Passion, it may be added, were manifestly precious to the Primitive Church as removing a stumbling-block in the way of believing the Messiahship. The Crucifixion was a very real difficulty to faith, but it would have been much greater had not the Apostolic witnesses testified that He who claimed to be the Messiah had also foretold His own death.

(e) The results of the Galilean ministry.—The Synoptic tradition, while not concealing the darker side of the picture, is most concerned with the achievements and the gains of the Galilean period. It is well known that, as Jesus foretold, much of the seed fell on bad soil or came to nothing. We read of a Woe pronounced by Jesus on Chorazin and Bethsaida which expresses a sense that He had failed to produce a general change for the better in the cities by the Lake (Mt 11:20, Lk. 10:15, in particular, puts in the forefront the people of His own town (Lk 4:45-48). But as the Primitive Christians looked back on it, it might well seem, in the light of later confidence and optimism, that the success was more conspicuous than the failure. The people revered in Him One of superlative greatness—either the Baptist, or Elias, or 'the prophet' (Mk 8:29). He had gathered round Him a body of disciples, who were the germ of the future Church (Mt. 16:14). Above all, they had risen, in spite of prejudice and opposition, to a heroic avowal of the faith in His Person and in His mission which was to move and to transform the world (Mk 8:29).
JESUS CHRIST

The epic treatment of the Galilean ministry.—In the treatment of this period many modern \textit{Lives} proceed on the foundation that the Galilean ministry has the tragic intensity of a splendid failure following on the brightest hopes. It has been common enough in public life for great men to sink from popular admiration through confusions and to neglect and impotence, and there is not a little to suggest that it was so with Jesus in Galilee. The usual representation is that, after being born to a life on a tidal wave of enthusiastic growth, he now grew more persistent and envenomed, he was forsaken by the followers, and was forced to make his way from place to place with a handful of faithful followers. The dramatic effect is sedulously laboured by Keim, who represents Him as becoming a homeless fugitive, seeking safety from His enemies in distant journeys or in obscure places. Graphics are drawn of the change in the popular attitude. Formerly the people went to see Him; now He sits alone in the house with a disciple, and the collectors of the Temple know not whether they are to assess Him as still a member of their community (O. Holtmann, \textit{Die Christentumsgeschichte} (1927, p. 71)).

In explanation of His desertion by the multitude, use is made of the incident recorded in Mk 7:1-8, which, it is thought, was popularly regarded as meaning that He had been definitely repudiated by the people of Galilee. The latter, it is supposed, moved the Galilean authorities to action which menaced the liberty of Jesus, and even His life. The dramatic treatment is not wholly justified by the records, and is to some extent dependent on inherent probability. In the idyllic early days, when we are told that the first murmurers among the disciples were those who Mk says that the cry of blasphemy and of Sabbath-breaking was raised against Him, and that there was a conspiracy to murder Him (Mk 3:6). At the close of the period, again, when He is pictured as a discredited popular hero, it is that He is a devil's messenger (Mk 10:33), while at the Transfiguration, which follows in the darkest days, a great multitude still attains to His sight. This is that He is a holy Messenger

Synoptics, especially Mk, have given insufficient expression to the element of movement and to the proportion of failure, and so, the truth has been strung with strong effects. At the same time the modern work has certainly brought into clearer relief certain points. It seems certain that there was a broad base, and not limited to the part of the religious authorities, as seems in the fact that Jesus ceased to preach in the synagogues. There was a message (as Keim calls it) was the inevitable result of the absence of the patriotic note from the teaching of Jesus, and of the high-pitched spirituality of His demands. Jesus, moreover, regarded the response of Galilee to His preaching as having been representative given, and as tantamount to a refusal to repent and believe the gospel. As to the motives of the journeys of the last months there are various considerations to be taken into account. That one motive, to avoid the machinations of His enemies is quite possible, but there is more counsel given by Him to His disciples (Mt 10:1). But this was not the main purpose to proclaim the gospel in regions hitherto unevangelised. And if, as is true, there is little evidence that these journeys had a missionary aim, it may well be that for Jesus the most pressing necessity now was to devote Himself to the training of the disciples, and in their society to prepare them, along with Himself, for the trials and the tasks that awaited them at Jerusalem.

Theories of development.—It is characteristic of the modern writing of history to postulate a process of evolution and to try to explain its causes; and reference may here be made to the treatment from this point of view of the central theme of the period—the Messianic consciousness of Jesus. The Gospels know of development only in the form of a growth in the faith of the disciples, and of a modification of the eductive method of Jesus, but the question is raised whether the original plan of Jesus, and the direction in which He proposed to accomplish it, were not also altered during its course. The theories which may be noticed are those of (1) a modifying of His earlier ideas under the influence of the Baptist; (2) the substitution of the idea of a purely spiritual Kingdom for that of a theocratic State, under the influence of the Parable of the Creation by the providential order of events; (3) His more complete adoption of the outcome of the Apocalyptic ideas of the Kingdom, and promised to return in the clouds to establish by supernatural means a Kingdom of a heavenly pattern. The interesting fact brought out by this line of investigation is that in His Messianic utterances Jesus applied to Himself, to a much greater extent than was formerly supposed, the contemporary Jewish conceptions about the Messiah, the manner of His advent, and the exercise of His power. But the attempt so to enter into His consciousness as to trace a development in His attitude towards these ideas is too speculative to be readily endorsed.

At the opposite pole is the theory of Wrede (\textit{Die Messianenfrage}, 1901), who denies that Jesus ever claimed to be the Messiah, and regards the relative passages, and also the injunctions to secrecy, as mere means of preserving the Messianic secret. Proponents of the Resurrection would not have created the belief in the Messiahship had Jesus not made the claim in life (Jülicher, \textit{Die Einzigarten der Geschichte} (1906), p. 30).

(3) Another theory is that the Galilean ministry formed the footstool of Jesus after His departure from Galilee, we have to choose between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. All that the former directly tell us is that He next entered upon a mission in Judas and the Galilean region (Mt 10:1-20, and Mk 3:18; Lk 6:12-16), and that after an undefined interval He travelled by way of Jericho, with a company, to keep the last Passover in Jerusalem. According to the Fourth Gospel, the Poranai sojourn was only an episode in a Southern ministry which extended over six months, and of which the scene was laid mainly in Jerusalem. There can be little doubt that at this point the Fourth Gospel is in possession of information, Mk. and Lk. and Mat. are very vague in their notices, and Lk. uses the journey to Jerusalem (96-18) as the framework of a mass of material which obviously belongs to a number of different sources. It is to be inferred that there are incidental references in Mk. and Lk. which imply that there were visits to Jerusalem before the end—notably the incident at the inhospitable Samaritan village, which may well have occurred when Jesus went up on an earlier occasion from Galilee (Lk. 9:38-39; cf. 17:14-15). We may hold, as Tatian held, that the Fourth Gospel misplaces important events, and even that events of the Jeanine circle were dated; but it seems certain that it is right in placing a mission to Jerusalem immediately after the closing scenes in Galilee. Apart from the confidence and circumspection of the report, there are various considerations which make it probable that He proceeded to Jerusalem. For Jesus Himself, with His knowledge of the destined end, felt the necessity of bringing things to a decisive issue. He was straitened in His baptism and must be accomplished (129). From the point of view of the disciples, who could not believe in the tragic event, it was natural to expect Him to lay before the religious leaders and the people of the capital the evidence that had illuminated their own faith. We also hear of a natural taunt of those who believed not. Why hesitate to submit the case to those who are really competent to judge? (Jn. 7). On the other hand, there are facts which are difficult to explain on the supposition that Jesus only arrived in Jerusalem a few days before the Crucifixion. The knowledge and the hatred of His enemies disclosed in the last week, point to earlier collisions, and an earlier ministry of His. The duration seems clearly implied in the words, 'How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' (Mt. 23:9).

(1) Sequence of events.—At the Feast of Tabernacles, which fell in the third week of the month Tishri (Sept.-Oct.), Jesus appeared in Jerusalem, where He taught and disputed in the courts of the Temple, making many discourses (Jn. 8:1). The healing of the man blind from birth belongs to this time. After a brief retirement (180), He returned to the Feast of Dedication (105) on the last week of the ninth month (Nov.-Dec.), when His claims and rebukes led to a threat of sedition or His own arrest (105-106). He withdrew beyond Jordan, where His ministry met with much success (Jn. 10:34-38, with which in Mk. 10, Mt. 19:20, Lk. 18-19-20° may be parallel). Hence He returns to Bethany on hearing of the sickness of Lazarus, whom He raises from the dead (Jn. 11-12°). Next follows a sojourn with His disciples at Ephraim, a town supposed to be in the N.E. of Judaea (114°). The narratives are combined by the hypothesis that from Ephraim He proceeded to join the train of Galilean pilgrims—probably at Jericho (Mk. 10, Mt. 20, Lk. 18°); and that in company He made His last journey to Jerusalem. He arrived on the Friday, before the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, and lodged at Bethany (Jn. 12-1). (2) The Johannine picture.—In passing from the Synoptic to the Fourth Gospel, the writer confronts many differences. In contrast to the free movement of mind and speech, there is something stereotyped in the way in which events develop and arguments are sustained. In place of the vividness and the rich variety of the Synoptic discourses, we have the frequent recurrence of a few themes, and the iteration and expanification of the fundamental ideas of the Gospel. But what is most noticeable is that, while with the Synoptists the Messiahship of Jesus is a secret which is spoken of only after a great venture of faith in the Apostolic circle, there is here no evidence whatever of reserve. The confession of Peter is mentioned (68°), but many have known Him before.—Andrew as far back as the Baptism (14°). Moreover, the point of most of the discourses delivered by Jesus is that He is the Messiah, and more than the Messiah, and that His claim rests upon the strongest authentication. To this was added the burden of His teachers, and it has been justly observed that the Fourth Gospel may well believe, for it is quite in accordance with the situation disclosed by the Synoptics at the close of the Galilean ministry, that Jesus, after being assured of the faith of the Apostles, should have proceeded to urge His claim in the boldest and most public way. But for the same reason it is difficult to believe that the discourses connected with earlier visits to Jerusalem, which contain the same message, are properly dated. The interview with Nicodemus, as well as the cleansing of the Temple, may well belong to the later phase of the ministry; and the story of the woman of Samaria may be an incident of the journey from Galilee to the Feast of Tabernacles. The supposition that the Fourth Gospel has interwoven with the Galilean period events which all belong to the one Judean ministry of the last six months seems to light the difficulties of the harmonist, and to make it possible to profit, without being misled, by its history. (a) The self-univers of Jesus.—He publicly claims to be the Messiah. 'If thou believest,' He says to the Pharisees, 'Jesus answered, I said unto you, and ye believed not, (106, 5); cf. 33°). There is also developed a high doctrine of His origin and primordial dignity. He is from God (273); He is before Abraham was (89); He and the Father are one (106)—which last is interpreted to mean that being a man, He makes Himself God (v. 30). Proportional to His dignity are the blessings which He bestows—repose and refreshment of soul (75°); cf. 45°). True life (50°), spiritual freedom (89°), resurrection and life everlasting (112°). (b) The proof of Christ's claim.—To the repeated demand for corroboration Jesus appeals to God as His witness. The source of His doctrine and also His testimony truth (84°). In this connexion the healing of the blind man (ch. 7) is thought of as decisive: 'When the Christ shall come, the multitude seek, will He do more signs than those which this man hath done?' (v. 8). His Divine mission, it is further declared, is accredited by His disinterested zeal for God's glory (89°). On the other hand, great stress is laid on the fact that the attitude to Christ is determined by the spiritual and the life of those who come in contact with Him. Those who are of the truth instinctively recognize Him for what He is, as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd (v. 39). To a good man Christ is self-evident: 'If any man wills to do His will, he shall know of the teaching whether it be of God' (71°). (c) The explanation of the Passion.—He speaks of His sufferings and death not merely to His disciples, but to the half-believing (39°), and before the multitude (106-20). The points of view under which the Passion is presented are that it is not an evidence of God's rejection, but an act of self-surrender which calls forth the Father's love (107°), that death comes in the line of the vocation of a good shepherd (106), that it is His own voluntary act (109°), and that it is at once the ground of salvation (91°) and the secret of the gospel's spell (129°). (4) The response of the hearers.—The Fourth Gospel shows us Jesus surrounded by three classes—a band of believers, the multitude which, though divided and wavering, is deeply impressed, and the religious leaders who regard Him with hatred or contempt. The charges, as in Galilee, are mainly Sabbath-breaking (74°) and blasphemous utterances (109); and the attempt is made further to discredit Him as unlearned (74°) and a Galilean (v. 6). Finally, a definite resolution is formed; the Messiahship of Jesus is a secret which matters to no one, according to this account, was the raising of

Lazarus, which produced a popular excitement that preceded the acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, and gave reason to fear the infliction of the most severe retribution by the Romans (11:44).

11. The week of the Passion.—A view may be given of the probable order of events between the arrival of Jesus in Bethany on the eve of the Sabbath and the Crucifixion.

Saturday: The supper in the house of Simon the leper (Jn 12:2, Mk 14:3). On the Sunday, Jesus enters Jerusalem (Mk 11:10), visit to the Temple, return to Bethany (Mk 11:11).

Monday: visit to Jerusalem, the cursing of the fig-tree (Mk 11:16-34), the cleansing of the Temple (Mk 11:14-15), return to Bethany (y.19).

During the week, Jesus, teaching in the Temple, was confronted by the Sanhedrin (Mk 11:17-33), Pharisees and Sadducees (Mk 12:24-41), and others; parables (Mk 12:38-39); return to Bethany.

Wednesday: visit to Jerusalem, denunciation of the Pharisees (Mk 12:38-40), discourse on the last things (Mk 13:1-37), deliberations of the Sanhedrin (14.), the overthrow of Judas (14), return to Bethany.

Thursday: preparation for the Passover (Mk 14:12-17), the Last Supper (Mk 14:18-25), the Agony (Mk 14:32-42), the betrayal and the arrest (14:43-45).

The chief difficulties presented by the narratives may be briefly noticed. (a) The Synoptists make the triumphal entry take place on the Monday, the pilgrims from Galilee (Mk 11:1), while according to John it was arranged while Jesus was staying at Bethany (12:12). (b) The anointing in Bethany, which is seemingly placed by John (14:2) two days before the Passover, and expressly dated by Jn. (12) six days before the Passover. (c) The day of our Lord’s death, according to all accounts, was on the Friday; but while the Synoptists make this to have been the Passover day, or the 15th Nisan (Mk 15:14), the Fourth Gospel represents it as the day before the Feast of the Passover (13), or the 14th Nisan. In each of these cases there is reason to believe that the Fourth Gospel is accurate. As regards the day of our Lord’s death, it is unlikely that the Passover day, which had the sanctity of a Sabbath, would have been profaned by the Jewish authorities engaging in business, while the evidence of haste in carrying out the crucifixion points to the same conclusion.

(1) The activity of Jesus.—In agreement with the general view of the Jewish ministry given in the Fourth Gospel, the work of Jesus during the last week falls mainly under the point of view of an affirmation of His Messiahship in deed and word. Naturally, also, His mind is turned to the future, and His discourses set forth the power and glory reserved for the crucified Messiah. The explanation of His vindication of His mission have their counterpart in an attack upon the principles of those who had rejected Him and who were plotting His destruction.

Synoptic Apocalypses (Mk 13:17-27, Mt 24:15-28, Lk 21:28-36), with the topics of the Day of the Son of Man, the Passover, and the Last Judgment. The other leading thought is that the guilt of the rejection of their Messiah will be terribly avenged upon the Jews in the horrors of the last days, and especially in the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Temple (Mk 13:2, Mt 24:2).

(II) The polemics.—The self-vindications of Jesus and the natural descriptions which involved an examination of the position of those who rejected His claim. We have already seen the nature of His replies to the detailed objections which were made to His teaching. As the crisis approaches, He advances, in the manner represented by the Fourth Gospel to be characteristic of the whole Jewish ministry, to an attack upon the religious position of His opponents—especially of the professed saints and religious guides. Their hypocrisy, their spiritual pride, their blindness, the cruelty and cupidity which their pretended sanctity could not conceal, the most merciless invective (the Woes of Mt 23:1-9).

(2) Reasons for the hatred of Jesus.—We are accustomed to think of the opposition to Jesus and His work as due to a temporary ascendency of a diabolical element in human nature, but as a fact the hatred of the principal parties, and the murderous conspiracy in which it issued, are too easily intelligible from the point of view of average political and social conditions at the time. The Pharisees, who dominated the Sanhedrin, who were set in motion the machinery of the law. As we saw, they were statesmen and ecclesiastics, and it is the recognized business of these to defend the interests of an institution, by such measures as the expressions of the case seem to demand. And if they were convinced that the popular excitement aroused by Jesus was likely to be made a pretext by the Romans for the destruction of the Fourth Gospel, and to attack upon the religious position of His opponents, an administrative act under the compulsion of higher exigencies. The Pharisees, while less able to strike, exercised a more venomous hatred. They represented the standpoint of religious conservatives; and it has been no uncommon thing, or universally censured, for men to believe that what is essential in religion is old and unchangeable, and that it is a duty to God to suppress, if necessary by violence, the intrusion of new and revolutionary ideas. And though it is true that the old, to which they clung, itself contained the promise of the new, the new approached the unexpected, and they opposed the development of the Spirit of the Christian dispensation was a attempt to crush it. Again, political and ecclesiastical leaders depend greatly on public respect and confidence, and are moved by the instinct of self-preservation to protect themselves, and the triumphal entry, in which Jesus was offered and accepted the homage of the multitude (Mk 11:18), is decisive evidence that He made the claim to be the Messiah. Evidently, also, there is a natural connexion between the public assumption of His dignity and the cleansing of the Temple. According to one account, Jesus proceeded immediately after His triumphal entry to carry out the reform of the Temple of God (Mt 21:18).

(3) The Pharisaic discourses.—The burden of the discourses in which the Messianic claim is prominent is that there awaits Him the same fate as the prophets—that He will be rejected by His people and put to death. References are made to the destruction of the city and the Vineyard, Mk 12:9-12, and the Marriage Feast, Mt 22:14-15. But beyond this seeming failure, two vistas open up into the future. The death is the prelude to a glorious future, when Christ will return a second time, accompanied by the angels, and will have at His command all power needed for the establishment and defence of His Kingdom. For this type of teaching the main source is the so-called declaration of the Messianic power (Mk 13:18-20).
framed by the Sanhedrin, was as to His authority (Mk 11:1-20). If we may believe the Fourth Gospel, He had often enough claimed to be from God, and to speak the words which the Father had showed Him; but He refuses to fall in with their design, and puts a question to John the Baptist which reduces them to confusion. It is quite probable that the incident of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7:53-8:1) occurred at the same time—the intention being to compromise Jesus by exhibiting a merciful judgment which would have enlarged the character of the repudiation of a Mosaic commandment. Jesus avoided the snare—inasmuch as He did not challenge the law which visited adultery with death, but at the same time made an appeal to the consciences of the accusers which constrained them to fall away from the charge. The question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar (Mk 12:13-17) was designed to procure a deliverance which He did not extend. While this answer baffled the immediate purpose of His questioners, it may be that it far served their end as to damp the popular enthusiasm with which He had been welcomed to Jerusalem. The question about re-marriage and immortality (Mk 12:18-27) does not seem to have had any more serious purpose than to make a sceptical point; while the question of the scribe touching the first commandment, it is quite likely to have been made in all innocence of the plot (12:18f.).

(4) The maturing of the plan. On the Wednesday a meeting of the Sanhedrin was held in the house of Caiaphas (Mt 26:1, i.e., Mk 14:1), at which it was resolved to apprehend Jesus. It was of importance to avoid a tumult, and they found a welcome instrument in Judas, who might undertake to guide them to His place of retirement. Many moderns, following Dr. Quiney, have thought that the action of Judas was intended to force Jesus to put forth His power. It would thus be of a kind with the policy of Themistocles when he knew that the Greek fleet could conquer if driven into a corner, and sent a seemingly treacherous message to the Persians urging them to advance to the attack. It is more probable that Judas was a patriotic fanatic who could not reconcile himself to the new conception of the Messiah, and now judged it to be a lost cause.

12. The Last Supper. The Wednesday night, as before, was passed at Bethany. On the forenoon of the Thursday Jesus sent two of His disciples into the city, to bespeak a room from one of His friends, and to make the necessary preparation for the Paschal meal. The chronological difficulty already referred to is best surmounted by supposing that Jesus in partaking of the Passover with His disciples anticipated by a day the regular celebration. The matters recorded are the foot-washing (Jn 13:3-17), the announcement of the betrayer (Mk 14:10-11), the institution of the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper (Mk 14:22-25, Mt 26:26-29, Lk 22:14-20, 1 Co 11:23ff.), and the farewell discourses (Jn 14-17).

13. The Institution of the Lord’s Supper. It was in accordance with a deeply human instinct that Jesus, knowing the hour of separation to be at hand, desired to celebrate in the company of His disciples, whom He sometimes called His children, the most solemn domestic and religious act of the OT religion (Lk 22:14-20). In agreement with His method of teaching that, in distributing to them bread and wine, He should have given to the act the significance of a parable and made it testify of spiritual things (Mk 14:22ff.). In the older period of controversy the questions agitated were of a kind which could be settled only by high doctrinal considerations, but there has been a recent discussion of a whole subject, conducted on low grounds, in which the following questions have been raised.

(1) Did Jesus intend to institute a rite which should be regarded among His followers as the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper? The main reason for denying it is that there is no injunction to repeat it in Mk. or Mt., or in the oldest text of Lk. But the conditions in which He was present when St. Paul (1 Cor. 11:20) and we are therefore the same is that of the rite of the Lord’s Supper, as the case. Some have therefore thought of the Apostle, who was familiar with the word of mysteries, as the founder of the institution (P. Gardner, The Origin of the Lord’s Supper, 1863). But the recollection of its repetition as a sacrament goes back to the earliest days of the Church (Ac 2:42); and, besides, it is incredible that a usage which was practically the invention of St. Paul could have spread from an outlying Gentile Church over the whole of Christendom (Sanday, Outlines).

(2) Are the elements of the bread and wine an essential part of the observance? It has been contended by Harnack (VU vii. 2) that in the primitive usage the only constant element was bread, and that water was frequently, if not commonly, used in place of water. If a liberty is to be allowed with the original institution, there is less to be said in favour of unfermented wine, which destroys the symbolism, the water, which was an emblem of the highest blessings which He bestows (Jn 4:15, 7:38).

(3) How was the sacrament intended to be observed? Was it intended to become an element in a purely religious service, or to be enacted as a real meal upon the social life of a community? It was, in connexion with a common meal; in Apostolic times it followed on, if it was not identical with, the Agape; and this mode of observance continued to be popular, as Augustine shows us down to the fifth century. But, while there may be reason to regret that a mode of observance ceased which was calculated to have a hallowing influence in the sphere of social intercourse, now almost entirely secularised, we must believe that St. Paul that the primitive observance was not necessary for the purpose which our Lord had in view. There was the greater danger of secularising, and even profaning, the sacrament (1 Co 11:17-24).

(4) What meaning did Jesus intend the sacrament to convey? In recent discussion it has been conceived as essentially predictive in character—i.e., as a foretaste of the communion which the disciples would enjoy with their Master in the future Kingdom of Heaven. Its central lesson has also been declared to be that food and drink will only be received by those who, during life, partake of the fruit of the soul when partaken of with thanksgiving, in memory of Christ’s death (Harnack). Without denying to these suggestions an element of truth, it may be firmly held that the average thought of the Church has more nearly divined the meaning of Jesus in interpreting it as a parable of His sacrifice. The meal is the ceremonial symbol of the strength and joy which Christ bestowed through His life-giving gospel, and He desired His death to be remembered as the means whereby the earth was ratified and ushered in the new dispensation (Mk 14:24).

The attitude of the Fourth Gospel to the Lord’s Supper is enigmatic. It relates the incident of the foot-washing (Lk 13:19ff.), and furnishes in another context a discourse which has the aspect of containing the sacramental teaching of the Gospel (6:24ff.). It is incredible that there was a purpose of denying the institution of the ordinance by Christ, but it may well be that the Fourth Gospel intended to emphasize the truth that ‘eating of the flesh and drinking of the blood’ of Christ is a spiritual act which is not tied exclusively to the rite of the Lord’s Supper.

14. The latter life of Jesus during the period. The soul of Jesus was agitated by a succession of deep and conflicting emotions. Amid the hosannas of the triumphal entry He wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19:41). It pain and woe He confided with His enemies, and in the intervals of conflict He spoke of a peace which the world could not take away, and uttered words of thanksgiving and joy. He was gladdened by tokens of faith and devotion in Jerusalem (Lk 19:44). It was during the discourses of Lk 19:45-48, Jn 12:12, He was also wounded in the house of His friends, and one of the Twelve became the tool of His enemies, and even Peter’s faith failed. More and more exclusively He felt Himself thrown for sympathy on the unseen.
JESUS CHRIST

presence of the Father (182). "Every night he went out, and lodged in the mount that is called the Mount of Olives" (Lk 21:37). He probably spent the night in the open air and gave hours of vigil to the duty, which He now so earnestly enforced, of watching and praying. It was to look around and before to look upward to the Father, that He left the supper-room and "went unto a place called Gethsemane" (Mk 14:32). It may well be that there were many thoughts that burdened His mind in the night, but the plain sense of the narrative is that He prayed that He might be enabled, in some other way than through shame and death, to accomplish the work which had been given Him. Being truly man, He could shrink from the impending ordeal of humiliation and suffering, and ask to be spared; being the perfect Son, He added, "hovelot not what I will, but what thou wilt" (v.36). "To such a prayer the only possible answer was that He received from the Father the assurance that according to His holy and loving counsel there was no other possible way" (Weiss, ii. 500). Then He arose and went forward to meet the armed band which Judas had guided through the darkness to His arrest.

15. The Passion.—The order of events.

The primary source is the narrative in Mk., which, however, becomes meagre and somewhat external in its record of the events subsequent to Peter's fall. The author of the Fourth Gospel claims to have had opportunities for a more intimate view of things (Jn 18:15), and as a fact gives illuminating information about the more sensitive side of the authorities. Lk adds some incidents, notably the appearance before Herod.

(1) The trials.—In the Jewish trial there are usually distinguished two stages—a private examination before Annas (Jn 18:13), and the prosecution before the Sanhedrin under the presidency of Caiphas (Mk 14:62). There is, moreover, reason to suppose that the second of these was a meeting of a committee of the Sanhedrin held during the night, or of the Sanhedrin meeting as a committee, and that it was followed by a regular session of the Council at daybreak, at which the provisional finding was formally ratified (Mk 10:15).

(1) The examination before Annas.—Annas, who had been deposed from the high priesthood twenty years before, continued to be the de facto leader of the Council, and it was natural for him to wish to see Jesus, with a view to putting matters in train. In reply to his question after the disciples at His teaching, Jesus asked him to call his witnesses—the point being that according to Jewish law a man was held to be innocent, and even unaccused, until hostile witnesses had stated their case.

(2) The trial before the Sanhedrin.—At the subsequent meeting of the Council the ordinary procedure was followed, and the indictment was made by witnesses. The charge which they brought forward was a constructive charge of blasphemy, founded on the statement that the temple of each day's worth of money (Mk 14:2). The evidence not being consistent (v.18), the high priest appealed directly to Jesus to say if He claimed to be the Christ (v.6). Though this question was contrary to law, which forbade any one to be condemned to death on his own confession, Jesus answered 'I am.' The supernatural claim was forthwith declared, with signs of horror and indignation, to amount to incitement to sedition, and He was 'condemned to be worthy of death' (v.9). That a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin was thereupon held to ratify the judgment is implied in Mk 15, and it was probably necessary to regularize the proceedings, as capital trials might be begun only in the daytime. (On this and cognate points, see Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ, 1905.)

(3) The Roman trial.—It is not quite certain whether the Sanhedrin had the right of trying a person for a capital charge; in any case, a death-sentence required to be endorsed by the Roman governor. The Jews obviously took the position that in a case of the kind it was the duty of the governor to give effect to their judgment without going into its merits; but Pilate insisted on his right to make a full review of the charge and its grounds. In this situation, against which they protested, they felt the difficulty of securing sentence to blasphemy, and accordingly fell back on the political charge of treason. 'They began to accuse him, saying, We found this man perverting our nation, and to do deeds of incitement to the people and to take away the law, and to call himself King of the Jews.' (Lk 23:2). In reply to Pilate's question, Jesus claimed to be a king, but doubtless disarmed the governor's suspicion by some such addition as that He was a king in the realm of the truth (Jn 18:36). Then follow three devices of Pilate to evade responsibility—the remand to the tribunal of the vassal-prince of Galilee, Herod Antipas (Lk 23:12); the proposal to scourge Him and release Him (v.16); and the reference to the multitude (Mk 15:18). Failing only in the day's right when the accusers put the matter in a light which overwhelmed his scruples. They threatened to complain that he had not supported them in stamping out treason (Jn 19:12). Tiberius was known to be a particularly sensitive on the point of laesa majestas, while Pilate's hands were not so clean that he could welcome any investigation; and he therefore pronounced Him guilty of sedition as a pretended king of the Jews, and delivered Him to be crucified (v.18). He was then scourged, dressed with mock emblems of royalty, treated with derision and insult, and led forth to the place of execution (Mt 27:38).

The action of the judges.—There has been considerable discussion of the action of the judges of Jesus from the point of view of Jewish and Roman law. The procedure and verdict of the Jewish authorities were according to the law which they were set to administer has been ably argued by Salvador (Hist. des Institutions de Mosc, 1862), but it seems to have been shown that in the proceedings the most sacred principles of Jewish jurisprudence were violated, that the process had no form of a judicial trial (Taylor Innes, op. cit.). It has also been argued that, in view of the requirements of the Roman law, and of the duties of his position, Pilate was right in passing sentence of death (Fitzjames Stephen, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity). On this it must be said that as Pilate did not believe Jesus to be guilty of the crime imputed to Him, he must be held to have transgressed the spirit of Roman justice. On the other hand, it is true that 'the claim of Pilate was truly inconsistent with the claim, which Caesar represented,' and that in sentencing Jesus to death Pilate faithfully, if unconsciously, interpreted the antagonism of the Roman Empire and the Christian religion (Taylor Innes, op. cit., p. 122).

(2) The disciples in the crisis.—The disciples made no heroic figure in the catastrophe. They took no part in the arrest (Mt 26:56), and Peter, who followed afar off, denied his Master with curses (v.76). It is also significant that no attempt was made to capture the Apostles; apart from Jesus it was evidently thought that they were in no danger. It is only to be remembered that the two opportunities which they might have had of showing their courage were denied them—they were forbidden by Jesus to resist when He was arrested (Mt 269), and no witnesses were allowed to come forward in His defence at the trial. The beloved disciple, along with Mary, the mother of Jesus, and two other women, was present at the crucifixion (Jn 190).

(3) The bearing of Jesus—The words of Jesus during the last day were few. For the most part He listened to the accusations, and bore the indignities, in silence. The oldest report, while making Him testify that He suffered and died as the Messiah, represents Him as deliberately refusing to answer the false witnesses, or to plead before Pilate. The other accounts relate that He condescended, as is probable enough, to point out the iniquity of the procedure (Mt 26a, Jn 19), and to explain to Pilate the true nature of His claim to the title of King (Jn 19).

The decision in Gethsemane gave Him the insight and the resolution that bore Him unshaken through the ordeal of the trials. He expressed the assurance that, bad He asked, the Father would have delivered Him by His angels (Mt 26a); but He knew the Father's will, to which He had bowed, to be that, according to the Scriptures (v.34), He should be led as a lamb to the slaughter. He felt towards His enemies—those gathered from His silence—which may have had in it an element of holy scorn, but certainly also involved compassion for the blinded men who were now fixedly committed to their murderous purposes. Whether actually heard by witnesses or not, the first word on the cross (Lk 23) assuredly expresses an authentic thought of Him who had taught, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you' (Mt 5).

Only less strikingly is the self-forgetting sympathy that came to expression in the journey of Jesus to the cross, when the women bewailed and lamented Him: 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children' (Lk 23).

(4) The Crucifixion.—The scene of the execution was Golgotha (Mt 27), possibly so named from the skull-like contour of the eminence. Crucifixion was a form of death which was resorted to by slaves and rebels, and that combined the height of ignominy with the extremity of suffering. 'Terrible were the sufferings caused by the piercing of the hands and feet in the most sensitive parts, the extirpation of the limbs with their burning wounds, the impeding of the circulation of the blood, the growing oppression and exhaustion, the increasing thirst under the long-drawn mortal agonies' (Nestle, ii. 500). The indignity during a death was heightened by the spectacle of the soldiers casting lots for His garments (Mt 27), and by the taunts of His fellow-sufferers, of the multitude, and of the priests (Mt 27). The narcotic draught which was usually offered to the victim, was refused by Jesus (v.26).

For six hours, according to vv.28–30, His torments endured; and late in the afternoon, with a loud cry, He expired (v.54). The accompanying signs, according to Mk., were a darkness lasting for three hours (v.31), and the rending of the veil of the Temple (v.34), to which Mt. adds the portent—many bodies of the saints that fallen asleep were raised' (279). Both, along with Lk. (23), record a confession of faith by the Roman centurion. Jn. relates, with a solemn affirmation of the authority of an eye-witness, that a soldier 'pierced his side with a spear, and straightway there came out blood and water' (191).

The Seven Words on the cross are commonly supposed to have been spoken in the following order:

1) 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do' (Lk 23)—assigned to the time when He was being nailed to the cross.

2) 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise' (v.46)—spoken to the penitent robber.

3) 'Woman, behold thy son' (Jn 19)—spoken to Mary, and to the beloved disciple.

4) 'My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt 27).

The 'words' are not all equally certain. On textual grounds (1) is placed by WH in double brackets, and is regarded by Weiss as unreasonably a second-century addition. The incident of the penitent robber was unknown to the oldest tradition. Evidently there was also uncertainty as to the last utterance of Jesus. That reported by Mk—Mt. is certainly authentic; none could have invented a saying which seemed to Jesus a sense of desertion by the Father in the hour of death. On the other hand, the character of Jesus requires us to believe that upon the agony there supervened the filial trust which find expression in the Lukan and Johannine words.

(5) The burial.—There were friends of Jesus who, though powerless to resist the general will, were at least able to secure the decent burial of the body. With Pilate's permission, Joseph of Arimathea, with whom Nicodemus is associated (Jn 19), had the corpse removed from the cross, wrapped in a linen cloth, and laid in a rock-hewn tomb which was closed by a great stone (Mt 27). Mt. adds that, at the request of the Jewish authorities, the stone was sealed, and a guard set over the tomb (27–28).

The Resurrection.—Nothing in history is more certain than that the disciples of Jesus believed that, after being crucified, dead and buried, He rose again from the dead on the third day, and that at intervals thereafter He met and conversed with them in different places. The proof that they believed this is the existence of the Christian Church. It is simply inconceivable that the scattered and disheartened remnant could have found a rallying-point and a gospel in the memory of one who had been put to death by a criminal, if they had not believed that God had owned Him and accredited His mission in raising Him up from the dead. There are many difficulties connected with the subject, and the narratives, which are disappointingly meagre, also contain irreconcilable discrepancies; but those who approach it under the impression of the uniqueness of Christ's Person and of His claim on God, find the historical evidence sufficient to guarantee the credibility of the central fact.

(1) The rising on the third day.—There is a consensus of testimony in the Gospels to the following facts—that on the morning of the first day of the week certain women went to the sepulchre, that they found the stone rolled away and the grave empty, that they were informed by an angel that Jesus was risen, and that they were bidden to convey the news to the other disciples. Whether the discovery was first made by Mary Magdalene alone (Jn 20), or in company with other women (Mt 28); whether there was one angel (Mt 28), or two (Jn 20); whether fear or joy preponderated (Mt 16, Mt 28), were points on which the report varied. A more serious discrepancy is that, according to the oldest source, the message to the disciples was that they would meet the risen Lord in Galilee (Mt 16, Mt 28); while as a fact all the Gospels, except the mutilated Lk., proceed to narrate appearances in Jerusalem, and Lk. knows of no other. It cannot, however, be said that the inconsistency is insuperable, as Mt. has consciously combined the Galilean promise with a reference to a preliminary appearance in Jerusalem (Mt 28).
The accounts present many difficulties. Why does Mt. relate the appearance in Jerusalem to the women only, and ignores the all-important manifestations to the Twelve? If, according to the message of the angel, the scene of the intercourse of the risen Lord with His disciples was to be in Galilee, why does Lk. record only appearances in Jerusalem and in the neighbourhood? Further, as the disciples are in Jerusalem eight days after the Resurrection, and again at the Ascension, it seems difficult to interpret a return to Galilee in which the Apostles resumed their former avocations (Jn 21). It has been supposed by some that after the Crucifixion the disciples returned to Galilee, that it was among the Galileans which were instinct with memories of Him that Jesus returned to them in vision, and that this older recollection, though not altogether eradicated, has been blurred in the Gospels by later manipulations. All the facts in regard to the belief in the Resurrection began on the third day—which points to Jerusalem; while the difficulty about fitting the Galilean appearances into the chronological scheme is reduced by consideration of the rapidity with which the soul appeared.

(5) The mode of existence of the risen Christ.—There are two sets of notices which are not easily combined in an intelligible conception. On the one hand, there are several statements which create the impression that Jesus resumed the same mode of bodily existence which was interrupted at His death upon the cross. The story of the empty tomb (Mk 16:8-11) meant that the body which had been upon the cross was revived. That it was a body of flesh and blood, capable of being handled, and sustained by food and drink—not an apparition of a spiritualistic kind—is a point which is specially emphasized in details of the Narrative (Jn 20, Lk 24). On the other hand, it is far from being a normal life in the body. His face and form have a strange aspect. He appears suddenly in the midst, the doors being shut (Lk 24:31), and as suddenly it vanishes out of their sight (Lk 24:46). To this series belong the references of St. Paul, who places the appearance to himself on a level with the others, and speaks of Christ possessing a body, which, although not of blood, has been transfigured and glorified (1 Co 15:38, 50). The explanation of the phenomena, according to Schleiermacher, is that in the one set of statements we have the matter described from the side of the Christ, in the other an account of the impression which He made on the disciples (Leben Jesus). Others conceive that while after the Resurrection He existed as a spiritual being, He yet assumed material substance and form at special moments for special purposes (Roth, Theologische Ethik). The primitive theory probably was that after the Resurrection His mode of existence was the same as during the ministry, with an augmentation of the properties of the body. He even then possessed (Mk 6:49), and that only at the Ascension was the body transformed. Some modern theologians hold that the body was raised from the grave as a spiritual body; others, that it was gradually materialized in the period between the Resurrection and the Ascension. The phenomena belong to a sphere about which we cannot dogmatize.

(4) Denial of the Resurrection.—The negative case has two branches: (1) a critical examination of the historical evidence; (2) a hypothesis which shall explain how the Church came to believe that Jesus had risen from the dead. On the first head it has already been suggested that it is unfair to magnify the discrepancies and ignore the important consensus.

The explanations began with (1) the theory of imposture. The disciples, it was said, were unwilling to return to work, in order that they might have a monopoly of the body, and pretended that Christ had risen (Reimarus, Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger, 1792). No one now believes that any gross religion, least of all Christianity, was founded on fraud. The disciples might indeed have been able to persuade themselves by finding the tomb empty. Joseph of Arimathea might have removed the body to another grave without the knowledge of the disciples (G. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, 1901). But is it for that Jesus, whose spirit has apprehension so easily corrected could have been allowed to develop to the universal belief that He had been seen alive? (2) In the school of Eighteenth Century Rationalism the favourite explanation was that Jesus did not really die on the cross, but revived in the tomb of the sepulchre, and again convinced among His disciples (most recently, Hase, Gesch. Jesu, 327 ff.). It is true that to escape with His life after being nailed to the cross might have been described as a resurrection from the dead, but it is incredible that the Roman soldiers should have failed to carry out the execution of a condemned man, and equally incredible that a lacera tier should have survived such an event. Their wounds, should have made the impression of having come off as more than a conqueror.

The usual explanation now given from the naturalistic standpoint is that the appearances were pure visionary. Intrusive are common phenomena of the religious life in times of excitement; they are often repeated during a long period, and it is supposed that they began with the women, probably with Mary Magdalene (Hennicke, Leben von Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 596), and were repeated for a time in the presence of the disciples. The most weighty objection to this hypothesis are, that while in other cases the visions have followed faith, in this case before they created it out of sorrow and despair, and also that while other visions have led to nothing considerable, these brought the Church into existence and immeasurably enriched the higher life of the world.

(4) The hypothesis of Kain is to the effect that the appearances were real. Thus to God, produced upon the minds of believers impressions which they interpreted as bodily manifestations. Christian faith oversteps these boundaries (of the natural order), not merely in the certain assurance that Jesus took His course to the higher world of spirits, but also in the conviction that He was and no other who, as dead yet risen again, as celestially glorified even if not risen, vouchsafed visions to His disciples. It thus completes and denominates that which science regards as the vexatious limitation of its knowledge (Jesus of Nazar, Eng. tr. p. 546). This theory deserves to be treated with more respect than it has usually received from apologists. It at least rejects the idea that the visions were hallucinations; and we are not so well-informed as to the nature of existence as to be able to deny reality to what is given in experiences which are due to the power, and which are according to the nature of such power, and which is not of the serious difficulty for those who follow the records that it supposes that the grave was not left empty, and that the body underwent corruption.

(6) Another theory, which has recently had some currency (Martinet, Staat der Authority in Religion, pp. 365-7) finds the basis of the belief in a physical resurrection in a misconception of the meaning of mystical utterances of the disciples about union and communion with Christ. It is, however, clear that St. Paul distinguished very clearly between the experience that to him 'to live was Christ,' or that 'Christ lived in him,' and the appearance which he had witnessed on the road to Damascus. 'They said they had seen His head, and His hearers understood them to mean they had seen Him in the body.' If they were not put right by the Apostles, it is doubtful how He ever brought their character for candour (Bruce, Apologetics, 361 ff.).

The impression conveyed by a review of the various theories is that the phenomena which generated the faith of the Church have not been explained on naturalistic principles. They are intelligible only as an intermingling of two universes of being ordinarily kept distinct. They have something in common with the phenomena of Spiritualism, and as a fact the Spiritualist claims to understand elements in the story which Christians have humbly accepted in faith, and to find supremely credible what the ordinary rationalism dismisses as superstitious. It is, however, only in a very indirect way, that Christian faith can derive support from Spiritualism. It seems to be proved that if communication is established at all with the spirit-world, it is merely with the drugs and lesis of the unseen unseen, and it was not mankind in spirit who did not the power, or else the will to communicate anything of importance to man; and, this being so, the Resurrection and appearances of Christ, with their unique and far-reaching spiritual order, resolve the problem of the apparent Divine economy. In the risen Christ we have the one authentic glimpse of the world which otherwise can do no more than attest its existence to those who p e e and m u t t e r (Witte, Studies in Mysticism, 1906).

JESUS CHRIST

(5) Significance of the Resurrection.—(a) In the Primitive Church the Resurrection was regarded as at once the authentication of Christianity, and a vitally important element of doctrine. Its apologetic value was supreme and direct. And Gentiles (Ac 4th 17th). The argument was that God had accredited Jesus' mission and accepted His work in raising Him up from the dead. In recent apologetic, at least in the English school, there has been a tendency to secure the truth of Christianity for the Resurrection (Row, Christian Evidences, 1887); but it is always to be remembered that the evidence for the Resurrection is the only evidence that it can be used on the anterior impression of the supernatural made by the Person of Christ. It is not so generally recognized that the Resurrection has the value of a vindication of the ways of God. Had the Ruler of the Universe given no sign when the spotless and loving Christ was made away with by His murderers, the problem of evil would have been well-nigh overwhelming, and faith in the supremacy of the coming order would have been one more than the Divinity supports. (b) Dogmatically the Resurrection was regarded as possessing a high significance for Christ Himself. It is, indeed, an exaggeration to say that for St. Paul the Resurrection had the importance which earlier thought claimed for the Baptism, and later thought for the Virgin Birth, viz. of constituting Jesus Son of God; but He at least regarded it as marking the transition from the fore- shadowing to the full reality of the power and glory of the Son of God (Ro 1st). It was also the source of the most characteristic and vital elements of His eschatological teaching. In the life of the risen Christ He saw the prototype of the life which awaits those that are His in the future state (Phil 3rd). He also used the resurrection of Christ, though assuredly without any suggestion that it was only a figure, as a parable of the beginning, the manifestations, and the goal of the new life (Ro 6th).

16. The character of Jesus.—In this section it is not proposed to deal with the doctrine of the Person of Christ (see Person of Christ), but only to gather up the main features of the character of the Man Christ Jesus as it is portrayed in the Gospels. The point of view is somewhat modern, but does not necessarily imply a naturalistic or Unitarian interpretation of Christ (Keim, Jesus of Nazareth, Eng. tr. vol. ii.; Peabody, Jesus and the Christian Character, 1906, ch. ii.).

The task of describing the character of Jesus is difficult. Jesus, one of the most real and life-like figures in history, and there is a way of observing, feeling, and judging which is unmistakably Christ-like; but when we try to describe Him we are in danger of setting forth 'a more personified system of morals and psychology, consisting of a catalogue of all possible virtues and capabilities' (Hase). There is therefore something to be said for leaving the matter where it is left by the Gospels, which simply reveal the character in telling the story of the life. The general observation which is most convincing is that in Jesus there were combinations of qualities which are usually found in isolation, and regarded as mutually inconsistent. This holds good, first, in the region of temperaments. It is easy to show that at least three of the recognized temperaments—the sanguine, the melancholic, and the choleric, were manifested by Jesus, and that the man of good in the philosophic counterpart in His repose and purposefulness. From a similar point of view it has been said that 'there was in Him the woman-heart as well as the manly brain—all that was human, the familiar man; but also the spiritual man, whose thoughts and dreams were of another world' (F. W. Robertson, Sermon. ii. 231; but contrariwise Hase: 'His character was thoroughly masculine,' §51). It has been held by some that He belonged to the class of ecstatic men, by others that He was one of the modernists, and acted with the serenity of the sage: the truth is that repose was the normal condition of His spirit, but that it was intermittingly broken by prophetic experiences of vision and tumult. On the intellectual side we find the abstract power which unerring seizes upon the vital principle, united with the poet's mind which delights to clothe the idea with form and colour, and to find for it the most perfect artistic expression. Another and more impressive contrast is presented in respect to the gentleness of His character. From Him there went out an influence which either awed men into docile submission or roused them to a frenzy of opposition, while the same Jesus spoke words of tenderest kindness, and healing the sick, and called the little children to His side. He also combined with wide outlook and sublime purpose an active interest in small things and in inconsiderable persons. Recognizing it as His vocation to build the Kingdom of God, He did not consider a day lost in which He conversed with a woman of Samaria at a wayside well.

While these and similar traits help to give greater vividness to our conception of Jesus, the essential content of what is called His character lies in His attitude, on the one hand to the Father, on the other to the problems of duty which arise for a man among men. (1) Beginning with the character of the Christ, that which we describe as piety, we find that it combines familiar traits with others which are novel and unique. To a large extent it is a fulfillment of the Jewish ideal of piety, but it is the most impressive, omission, and deviations from the OT pattern. He fulfills it in that He has a constant sense of the presence of God, and regards all events as instinct with a Divine meaning of guidance, of blessing, or of judgment. He lives in habitual prayerfulness, giving thanks, supplicating, interceding for others. He shows a sensitive reverence for all that is called God—His name, His word, His house, and is full of praise for His honour. It is His meat and His drink to labour in the tasks which are made known to Him as the will of God. When that will approaches Him as a call to suffer and die, He trusts implicitly in the wisdom and goodness of the Father, and prays that His will be done.

There are, however, two significant particulars in which the relation of Jesus to God, if we may so term it, differed from the piety of Hebrew saints, as well as of the saints of Christian times. (a) The penitential note is one of the most distinctive features of the OT. The depth of the sin may almost be said to be the measure of sanctity, and the same may be said of those whom the Christian Church has chiefly venerated as its religious heroes. But of penitence the experience of Jesus shows no trace. While teaching His disciples to pray, 'Forgive us our debts,' He Himself never confessed sin. Neither in Gethsemane nor on the cross, when the near approach of death challenged Him to pass righteous judgment on His past life, was He conscious of any lapse from fidelity to the Father's commands.—(b) A second note of Hebrew piety is a sense of dependence upon God, accompanied by the knowledge that He belongs to the earth and that the human instrument counts for nothing in comparison. But Jesus, while confessing His dependence on the Father in teaching and healing, does not speak of Himself as a mere agent who delivers a message and accomplishes a work—and is forthwith forgotten. Enjoying a filial intimacy with God which contrasts markedly with the aloofness of God in OT times, and the fear manifested in His presence even by prophets, He claimed prerogatives which would have resulted as a usurpation of the office of God. For He forgave sins, claimed a faith and a devotion toward Himself which were indistinguishable from worship, and foretold that He would return to judge the world. What makes these utterances the more striking is that He simultaneously invited men to learn of Him as meek and lowly in heart (Mt 11:29). We therefore seem to be driven to the conclusion that Jesus was less than a saint, unless He was more than a man. Unless He was sinless, He was a union of a self-righteousness which was more blinded than that of the Pharisees; and unless He had a unique dignity and commission, He was guilty of an overarching arrogance. The hypothesis of a unique experience and vocation, or the belief that He was in a unique sense Divine, is more credible than the charge of imperfect piety.

(2) In studying the character of Jesus on the ethical side, it is useful to observe the way in which He recognized and realized the fundamental virtues. Wisdom He would scarcely have described as a virtue. He did not Himself possess or value it in the range which it began to assume among the Greeks, but He assuredly had that wisdom in the grand way of thinking deep thoughts about God and man which have been worked up in philosophical systems, and also in the homely form of prudent dealing with the world's business. Courage He certainly did illustrate in the typical form that it assumes in a man of war; but there is abundant proof of physical as well as of moral courage in the heroism which led Him, while discarding force and foreseeing the issue, to go up to confront His powerful enemies in the Name of God and truth. One glimpse of His bearing is unforgettable. And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going before them; and they were amazed, and they that followed were afraid' (Mk 10:30). The virtue of temperance or self-control might seem to lie on a plane on which He did not condescend to be tried. But in its essence, as the virtue which requires the surrender of the lower for the higher, of the temporary for the enduring good, it has its illustration, not merely in the victory of the Temptation, but in the mould of self-sacrifice in which His whole life was cast. Justice, as the virtue which would render to all He did of the poor and acted upon into the thought and life of Jesus. The parable of the Unjust Steward, which on a superficial view makes light of dishonesty, is placed in a setting of words of Jesus from which it appears that He thought it useful to give His disciples the test of an honest man, and even made common honesty a condition of admission to life (Lk 16:13-15). It is also noteworthy how often He commends the wise and faithful servent; while His own ideal might be summed up as the performance with fidelity of His appointed work. Not even the sympathy of Jesus is more distinctive than His conscientiousness in regard to the claims both of God and of man.

The character of Jesus also exemplified the fundamental quality of steadfastness. He praised it in others: John the Baptist, who was not seized with the wind; Simon, whom He summoned the rock-like man. His whole ministry, which began with victory in the Temptation, had behind it the force of steady and of resolute purpose. 'He steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9:51) may serve for a description of the way in which He held straight on to His preconceived and predetermined goal.

On this general ground work of character there emerges the love of Jesus, which was marked by extraordinary range and intensity. For mankind as a whole, we have 'a passionate galaxy of sympathy' and looked on Himself as a debtor to all who were burdened by suffering or sin. It may indeed be observed that His love, while all-embracing, had degrees. The centurion of Capernaum and the Syrophoenician woman came within its scope, but He looked on the people of Israel as those who had the first claim on His affection and service. He shared the feelings for Jerusalem which were common in many of the Psalms, and yearned over the holy city more than over the cities of the Lake. Within the house of Israel there were three—perhaps four classes, whom He regarded with a peculiar tenderness. First in order came the disciples, next the common people and the social outcasts, and doubtless we may add the children. It is hard to believe that the family-circle at Nazareth was not also one of the nearer groups, but during the period of the Ministry the attitude of His kinsfolk, with the probable exception of Mary (Jn 19:26), diverted His strong natural affection to those who were His kinsfolk after the spirit. The ways in which His love expressed itself were on the one hand to seek to make those He loved truly His own by binding them to Himself by their faith and devotion; on the other, to bestow on them, and that at whatever cost to Himself, all benefits which it lay within His vocation to confer. The forms of service to which His sympathy prompted Him were as many as the forms of human distress. His mission, indeed, proceeded on the footing that the worst evils from which men suffer are spiritual; and that the best things they chiefly need is one who will lead them to repentance and show them the Father. But no small part of His ministry was also occupied with works of the philanthropic kind, which should be interpreted on the analogy of some modern enterprises, as having the more purpose of creating a favourable disposition for the gospel. His distinctive work was to comfort by saving, but He also acted as one who felt that the relief of pain had its own independent claim.

In seeming contrast with the gentleness of the sympathetic Christ was the sternness which marked many of His words and acts. It is of interest to note that the disciple, whom Jesus loved is remembered in the Synoptics (Lk 9:42-44) chiefly as a man with a capacity for fiery indignation; and this quality may well have been one that drew Jesus and John more closely together. There were some sins that moved Jesus hardly to compassion, there were others that roused Him to holy wrath. Those who, like prodigals and fallen women, could be described as their own worst enemy, He chiefly pitied, but sterner measure was never rendered to all who made Jesus to those who had guilt had the quality of profligacy or of inhumanity. The profanity which irreverently dealt with the things of God—in swearing, in corrupting His word, in polluting His Temple, was unsparingly rebuked—the memorable occasion by act; and the great offence of the Pharisees in His eyes was that, while making a parade of sanctity before men, they were insulting God by acting a lie. The second type of sin which provoked His burning invective was inhumanity towards the weak. An example is the sin of those who make one of the little ones to offend (Mt 18), which may perhaps be taken literally of those who pervert children; and the unpardonable aggravation of the guilt of the scribes was that, while making long prayers, they devoured widows' houses (Mk 12:40).

While the character of Jesus has commonly been regarded, even by non-Christians, as the noblest thing that has been seen, it has not escaped criticism in ancient or modern times. Two forms of the indictment may be adduced to. Renan professes to find evidence of deterioration, and in this the real tragedy of the life of Jesus. Writing of the last days, he says: 'His natural gentleness seems to have abandoned Him: He was sometimes harsh and capricious, contact with the world pains and revolted Him. The fatal law which condemns an idea to decay as soon as it is applied to practice, even to be modified to the wishes of His enthusiastic friends; and to have acquiesced in a pretended miracle which was a man. He had 'a passion of sympathy' and looked on Himself as a debtor to all who were burdened by suffering or sin. It may exacting and more difficult to maintain (p. 252). To a person who is not accustomed to living in a primitive society, there may be something congenial in this representation. As a fact, the idea of degeneration is borrowed from the career of Mohammed and the Sufferer, and the assumption that Jesus was uncommissioned to represent the Divine wrath against sin. Very different was the insight of him who wrote that He learned obedience by what He suffered, and was thus made perfect (He 5:9).

From the Hebraistic point of view it is a common criticism that the character of Jesus is only one-sided or fragmentary. There are, it is said, elements of human excellence which He either did not possess or which He deliberately undervalued and renounced. There were whole spheres of valuable human experience with which He did not enter—married life, political service, scientific labour, the realm of aesthetic interests. His attitude, also, to the economic side of human affairs was unsatisfactory: He taught men to despise wealth and distribute it among the poor, and thus struck at the very foundations of the social fabric. In reply to this indictment, it is sometimes urged that the character of Jesus was such that He would have been an ideal—not the aesthetic sense as seen in His close observance of the law or the love of things beautiful, intellectual vitality and acquisitiveness, and the temperate enjoyment of the pleasures of the table in the society of His friends. It is also pointed out that His principles sanction a much wider range of activity than He Himself actually exemplified. In His love to man, which designed to bestow every form of real good, there lay the sanction of all the activities of the modern religious, political, and economic world; as religious and philanthropic, filling out with helpful service the various spheres of duty in the modern world. At the same time it must be admitted that Jesus was not the universal man in the literal sense, but was limited in His equipment and aim by the nature of the character of His mission. He was unconscious of the sense that in His scheme of values He severely subordinated all the good of this world to spiritual blessings, and that the first were the despised and in the measure in which they imperilled the second. He exemplified self-limitation and self-sacrifice, not indeed as an end in itself, but as a necessary condition of accomplishing the highest for God and man.

17. The fundamental ideas of our Lord's teaching.—It is one of the aims of modern theology that Biblical Theology is separated from Dogmatics, and that the sacred writers are allowed to speak for themselves without being forced into consistency with a system of ecclesiastical doctrine. In pursuance of this historical task, interest has centred chiefly in the attempt to expound and systematize the teaching of Jesus. It was naturally felt that no Christian documents are so valuable for an understanding of the Christian religion as those which contain the teaching of the Founder, and that, indispensable as the Apostolic writings are, they are in a very real sense derivative and supplementary. Experience also showed that the teaching of Jesus was, as a rule, given in the form of parables and more or less elliptical, and that the emphasis of the Primitive Church has been able to quicken and refresh the religious life of a not few in the modern world who had ceased to feel the power of the stereotyped phrases of a traditional theology. An account of our Lord's teaching, it has to be added, is properly based on the Synoptics. The authentic matter of the Fourth Gospel is so inextricably blended with believing experience and tradition that it can only be set forth as a supplement to the heads of doctrine collected from the Synoptists (Wendt), or utilized as a source for the Johannine Theology (Weiss).

In addition to the sketches in the great manuals of NT Theology (Weiss, Bibl. Theol. der NT, Eng. tr. 1882-3; Beyer, Lehrsatz, Eng. tr. 1891; Holtmann, Lehrbuch der NT, Eng. tr. 1890, 1891), there are numerous monographs, of which the most important is Wendt, Lehrb. Jesu (Eng. tr. 1892), and the most interesting and important are already in the Kingdom of God (Eng. tr. and Harmanick, Das Wesen des Christenthums (Eng. tr. 1901)).

A. THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—The Evangelists give as the summary description of the message of Jesus—the gospel of the kingdom.' And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom' (Matt 4:17; cf. Mark 1:14, 15, Luke 4:18). As Jesus was conscious of the promised Messiah, it was natural that His teaching ministry should be largely directed to setting forth the nature, the privileges, and the laws of the Messianic Kingdom. Most modern expositors, accordingly, have treated the idea of the Kingdom as central, and as supplying a scheme under which the whole body of the teaching may be arranged. Thus, after determining the nature of the Kingdom in relation to the past of Israel, and to the ideas of contemporary Judaism, Weiss treats of the coming of the Kingdom in the Messiah and His Work, of its realization in the righteousness and the perfection of its members, and of its predicted consummation in the future.

(i) The nature of the Kingdom.—In elucidating Christ's conception of the Kingdom, it is usual to begin by contrasting it with pre-existing ideas. In the first place, it is clear that, while Jesus claimed to fulfill OT prophecy, and to be the Messiah for whom the people waited, He was not the kind of Messiah that was expected. He was a spiritual Messiah, as is shown by His rejection of the OT concept of the Kingdom. In the OT, the Kingdom was earthly and temporal, and was a kingdom of force and bloodshed. In the NT, the Kingdom is spiritual and eternal, and is a kingdom of love and peace. The Kingdom is not an earthly kingdom, but a spiritual kingdom. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of force, but a kingdom of love. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of bloodshed, but a kingdom of peace. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of poverty, but a kingdom of abundance. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of darkness, but a kingdom of light. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of death, but a kingdom of life. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of sin, but a kingdom of righteousness. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of wrong, but a kingdom of right. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of evil, but a kingdom of good. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of darkness, but a kingdom of light. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of death, but a kingdom of life. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of sin, but a kingdom of righteousness. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of wrong, but a kingdom of right. The Kingdom is not a kingdom of evil, but a kingdom of good.
it, as future. 'Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5:20). ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world' (Mt 25:34). Moreover, the notion that a large portion of Jesus' teaching is concerned with the manner of the establishment of the Kingdom in the last days, and with the sublime events by which it is to be brought in and established.

The time of the Consummation, Jesus declared, was unknown even to theSon (Mt 13:22), but it would be heralded by the signs of the times, 'This generation will not pass, until all these things are accomplished' (Mt 24:34). The immediate purpose of the Return is to unite the righteous and God and execute punishment upon the enemies of God, and to gather together the elect from the four winds (Mt 24:30). Thereafter there is established the Kingdom to which cannot be moved, in which the blessed enjoy all that is promised them in the love of God. The scene appears to be laid on earth (Mt 5). So far as the purpose is elaborated, it is by utilizing the tones and colours of earthly experience, as well as familiar forms of dignity, power, and enjoyment (Mt 10:14, Mt 24:4). At the same time the spiritual blessings are of course the chiefest (Mt 5:5), and the transfiguration of the natural is suggested in a significant particular (Mt 12:25).

The distinction of the two aspects of the Kingdom.—There are three main views as to the relation of the two sets of utterances about the Kingdom; they may be distinguished as the one derived from the eschatological, and the eschatological.

(a) According to the traditional view, both groups of utterances about the Kingdom are easily combined as a consistent whole. Jesus could say that the Kingdom was present in respect that it had come, and future in respect that it was to come in glory and power and all the history falls into two stages, one of which is now under the dispensation of the Spirit, the other to come in stupendous acts of judgment and mercy as he is about to be sought in another sphere. As a fact the current conceptions of his religious and ethical teaching are borrowed not from the political, but from the domestic and the social life. When it is said that the Kingdom must be present and future is interpreted as a continuous process where the ruses parallel with the history of nations and churches. That this view has some support in the Fourth Gospel must be admitted. The return of which Christ there speaks with much fulness is the mission of the Spirit, and the judgment which is before the coming of the Kingdom is almost always the judgment which is simultaneous with character and conduct. There may even be claimed for it some support from the application of the principle of the return ('In Christ there is a likeness of the return') (Mt 20:21), and the distinction of the days of the Son of Man (Lk 17:24), and also in the association of the Second Coming with the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24). But on the whole it must be said that the attempt to implicate the purely spiritual conception to Jesus is unhistorical. It may be argued that his sayings are examples of prophecy, and that theology has a warrant to recast prophetic sayings in new forms. But it can hardly be gainsaid that Jesus thought of the Return as a definite event, visible and impressive, which would challenge the attention of all mankind, and involve acts that would revolutionize the order of our world.

(b) Some modern scholars hold that the distinctive teaching of Jesus was that the Kingdom was a supernatural Kingdom, to be established by the power of His Second Coming, and that the references in the Gospels to a present Kingdom with a gradual development are either illusory or perverted (J. Weiss, David Piscator, etc.). On this view Jesus claimed to be the Messiah only in the sense that He looked forward to becoming the Messiah. He was, like John the Baptist, a forerunner, but with the difference that the future Messiah to whom He bore witness was the Jesus of the Second Advent. The Gospels which supports the view that Jesus founded a present Kingdom of God on earth before His death is discounted on the ground that an event which is otherwise implicitly said to be present cannot be confused at Casarea; Philippi is to be taken poetically; it merely means that Peter believed that He was the Messiah designate, or the heir to the office. Jesus departed from this life with the consciousness that the Kingdom was not yet established' (J. Weiss). The parables which speak of the gradual development of the Kingdom of the 'future.' Come

B. THE HEAVENLY FATHER AND HIS CHILDREN.—It may be doubted if the teaching of Jesus is most satisfactory, as it is, to the Christian and Jewish, that the Kingdom is a power to be yoked in to, and that it is difficult to see why Jesus should have put his Kingdom in the remote and remote past, as it is, in the texts quoted. Above all, it is impossible to believe that Jesus, who taught that the highest blessings are enjoyed in communion with God, did not hold that the Kingdom was present among those who experienced his love and who obeyed his will.

1) The Heavenly Father.—Christ could take for granted in His parables the elements of the knowledge of God set forth in the OT, as one God, all-powerful, all-wise, all-holy, all-good. This splendid spiritual inheritance He enshrined with the content of His doctrine of God as the Heavenly Father. The name, indeed, was not new. Even the Greeks spoke of Zeus as the father of gods and men; while in not a few OT passages God is likened to and even named a Father. For the Greeks, however, the Fatherhood of God was present more than that He was the God of Creation and Providence, while in OT thought God, as Father was the protecting God of Israel, or the Father of the Messianic King. On the lips of Jesus the name meant that God was the Father of individual men, who lived upon each other the utmost resources of a Father's wise and tender care. It may, in fact, be said that if we study human fatherhood at its best, and all that is tender and gracious that was realized or adumbrated in an earthly home, and then attribute these in imperfect form to the heart and will of the Almighty, we discover the head of the teaching of Jesus concerning the heavenly Father.

The relation of an earthly father to his children involves at least seven points—to him they owe existence, from him they borrow his nature and likeness, he provides for their wants, he educates and disciplines them, he holds intimate intercourse with them, he is graciously disposed to forgive their offences, and he makes them his heirs. All this, now, Jesus has affirmed of God in relation to men. The first two points—that it is He that made us, and not we ourselves, and that we are made in His image—are articles of OT doctrine which He did not need to emphasize; though it may be pointed out that His conception of the infinite value of the individual soul had its roots in His belief that man bears the image of the Heavenly Father. The other points mentioned are quite explicitly emphasized.

2) God's Provision for the Wants of His Children. He is aware of their bodily wants (Mt 6:3). The God who feeds the fowls and clothes the lilies, will not suffer His children to be in want. This, in fact, is deduced directly from the idea of fatherhood. If, ye, being evil, know (Mt 6:20) how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? (7th). That the provision includes spiritual blessings as its chief part is made explicit in Lk 11.

(3) God educates and disciplines His children. Jesus does not say this expressly, but it may be noticed that there are two aspects of a child's earthly training which are reproduced in what He says about the Divine education of His disciples. A child's education, though hard and painful, is designed for its good; and similarly, Jesus says, Blessed are the poor, the mourners, the persecuted, the reviled (Mt 5th). The second aspect is that the children do not always appreciate the wisdom and kindness of the discipline, but must be asked to take it on trust. Similarly, the earthly child must often trust the Heavenly Father's love where he cannot comprehend His purpose, saying, 'Yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight.' (Mt 11th).

(4) God holds intimate intercourse with His children. It does not lie in the idea of an earthly parent to hold aloof from his children, and God admits His to close communion with Himself. On their side it takes the form of prayer, on His of response. They are encouraged to seek both spiritual and material blessings, and that importunately (parables of the Importunate Widow, and the Friend at Midnight, 11th), and they are assured that 'whatsoever they shall ask in prayer, believing, they shall receive' (Mt 21st).

(5) God is graciously disposed to forgive His children's offences. Away with sinners is not the way of a loving Father, with his enemy, to whom he refuses on any terms to be reconciled, or of a creditor with his debtor, who insists on full payment, but that of a father, who meets a penitent son in a spirit of magnanimity, rejoices over his return, and receives him back to his home. The point of the three great parables in Lk 15 is that, while the respectable world was sceptical about the restoration of the erring, and from among those who attempted to destroy the one in heaven a charity that believeth all things, and joy unspeakable over one sinner that repenteth.

(6) God destines His children to an inheritance. This it is, as has been indicated, a distinct and large topic of the teaching of Jesus, and it is insufficient here to refer to a text in which the logic of the relationship is clearly brought out: 'Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12th).

(7) God wills the fullness of the great design, wisdom, and power of the Father, to be the Father, in the full sense of the word, of those who are living in impenitence and in alienation from Him. He is the Father of all to the extent that they are created by Him, are made in His image, have their wants supplied by Him, and are disciplined by Him; but just as it is impossible for an earthly father to forgive a contumacious son, to hold intercourse with an absent son, and to make an heir of a son who has already squandered his portion, so it is impossible for God to be in the full sense a Father to those who shun His face and spurn His gifts.

(2) The terms of sonship.—The next great theme is the question how men become members of the family-Kingdom. Negatively Jesus teaches that we are not born into it, as one was born into the Jewish State, and that membership is not an order of merit conferred in recognition of distinguished attainments in piety and virtue. The most important and comprehensive utterance of our Lord on the point is this—'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18th). Here again we can trace the fidelity of the detail to the fundamental idea of the family-Kingdom: what should be so necessary in the son as childlikeness? On examination childlikeness proves to include a variety of qualities which are elsewhere declared to be conditions of sonship: (a) Trustfulness.—When Jesus proposed the children as a model, there can be little doubt that He had prominently in mind the child's capacity of faith. He would have His followers take it on trust in the wisdom and the love of the Father with the sublime confidence with which a child naturally trusts an earthly parent. There are examples of the joy which He felt at unexpected cases of heroic faith, e.g. of a centurion of Capernaum and the Syrophcenician woman. The grand object of this faith was God. 'Have faith,' He says, 'in God' (Mt 11th). But this faith in God included also faith in Himself as the appointed instrument for the performance of God's great work with men. (b) Sense of need.—A child, being cast upon others for the supply of its wants, has a keen sense of need. And this sense, which from one point of view is humility, is a prominent mark of the children of the Kingdom. We are asked to admire the publican, who, in contrast to the self-satisfied Pharisee, confessed his unworthiness and his need of mercy (Lk 18th). The self-complacency of the Rich Young Ruler showed that though not far from he was still outside of, the Kingdom of God (Mt 10th). The Beatitude is for those who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Mt 5th). (c) The penitential spirit.—With childlikeness may also be associated the grace of penitence, for childhood, when not spoiled by hardening influences, is the period of the sensitive conscience. In any case penitence is closely bound up with faith as the essential condition. 'He came into Galilee preaching and saying, Repent ye and believe the gospel!' (Mt 4th). The stages of penitence are vividly illustrated in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15th). (d) Resolution.—A fourth parallel is that in the child there is, with a sense of need, a resolute determination to secure what it values. There are some, it is true, who receive the heavenly blessings in response to an invitation, or almost under compulsion, but the rule is that they are like the merchantman seeking goodly pearls, and willing to make any sacrifice to secure what they seek. 'The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force.' (Mt 11th).

(3) The privileges of the children.—The enumeration of these has already been anticipated in what has been said of the implications of the Divine Fatherhood. The children possess, in fact or in promise, the fulness of the blessings which God as the heavenly Father is and will be, in accordance with His wisdom, power, and all-powerful, is disposed to bestow. They include the forgiveness of sins, access to the Father in prayer, the provision needed for the supply of bodily and spiritual wants, guidance in perplexity, protection in danger, power of a supernatural kind, and the assurance that their names are written in heaven (Lk 10th). The privileges are summarily described as life (Mt 7th, Mk 9th) and as salvation (Lk 19th). Their exceeding value is emphasized in particular maxims (Mt 18th), and in the parables of the Hidden Treasure and of the Pearl of Great Price (Mt 13th). In spite of the hardships and perils of the life to which they are called, the habitual mood of the children is one of repose and even of joy (Mt 11th-12th, Lk 6th).

(4) The filial and fraternal obligations.—The observation that the teaching of Jesus is in substance a system built up out of the higher elements of family life is confirmed when we approach its practical ideal. This is made up of filial obligations towards God, and of fraternal obligations towards men. (i) The duties towards God are those which naturally devolve upon the children in consideration of their spiritual filiation, and not goodness. Love being the great thing manifested by God towards them, their fundamental duty is to love Him in return with all their heart, and with all their soul, and with all their mind, and with all their strength.
(Mk 12:28). Their special duties towards God, which are also privileges, are these—to trust Him wholly, to make their desires known to Him in prayer, to perform with fidelity the work He gives them to do, and to submit in meekness and patience when He calls them to suffer.

(6) Duty towards man.—The supreme paternal obligation, like the filial, is love. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Mk 12:31). It requires us to understand all who are in need, and whom it is in our power to help (parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:29-37).

When we inquire how this principle manifests itself, it appears that the Christian ethic has three features which are commonly described as inwards, self-sacrificing service, and the passive virtues. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to illustrate how these form an ethical ideal which has its prototype in the life of the family.

(a) Inwards. A distinctive feature of the ethical teaching of Jesus is the insistence that it is not sufficient to refrain from overt acts of wrong, and to perform the overt acts which duty requires. The heart must be pure and the motive right. From this point of view, benefactions that are not accompanied by sympathy lose half their value. On the other hand, the evil purpose has the quality of an evil act; hatred is murder in the minor degree. Now, standing on the demand for a perfect heart in an ethic of general obligation, it is familiar enough in family life. There a woman counts all benefactions as worthless if she does not possess her husband's confidence; and, again, the interest of brothers and sisters is once felt to have an enormity of guilt beyond that of most evil deeds.

(b) Disinterested service.—In what is said of the forms of service the ideal is manifestly suggested by brotherhood. Of the chief forms may be distinguished first, beneficence, which is specially directed to the relief of the poor, the entertainment of the homeless, the tending of the sick, the visiting of the infirm (Mt 25:35), the comforting of the sorrowful, the reconciliation of those who are at feud (Mt 5:24). Another is the ministry of teaching; without doubt Jesus intended His disciples, as one of their chief forms of service, to follow Him in the disseminating of the truths and precepts of the Christian life. A third is the spiritual ministry proper, which has the same end as His own pastoral work—to save souls from sin, and to help them to rise to higher ends of excellence and nobility. The Lord, in short, is that of the home born who have borne hardships meekly, endured wrong patiently, and been ready to forgive unto seventy seven.

(5) The unique Son and His work.—It may be thought that the scheme which has been followed is inconsistent with the witness borne by Jesus to His Person and His work, inasmuch as His claims have no obvious counterpart in the family. The word is treated in a special article (Pennon on Cunliff, but must be glanced at here in the general context of Synoptic doctrine. In the first place, it is certainly true that Jesus ascribed to Himself a peculiar dignity, and as His work a peculiar efficacy. He calls Himself not a Son, but the Son (Mt 1:1), who stands in a unique relation to the Father, and who also makes upon the other children a demand for faith and obedience. If now we ask what it is that makes of inspiration; and first, that the stress is laid upon three particulars—(a) He is in the Father's confidence, and from Him the other children obtain their knowledge of the Father (ib.). (b) He fully possesses the privileges and fulfils the obligations which are involved in sonship. (c) His death was the means of procuring for them the highest blessings (Mt 14:25).

Now, all these things, if not explained by, have at least parallels in, the life of the family. The son, who in all respects obey his father's will, enjoys a position of peculiar intimacy and influence. The eldest son in many countries, and not least in the Jewish tradition, often occupies an intermediate position between the head of the family and the subordinate members of the family. And if Jesus, as He certainly did, looked upon Himself as the eldest brother of the family—Kingdom—who first realized its privileges and its responsibilities, and as that to which the Father was well pleased, and whom consequently He took into His deepest confidence—we can see how He could teach that faith in Him was an element in the gospel. Nor are the references to the necessity of His death, as is sometimes said, inconsistent with the gospel of the Heavenly Father. Every death in a family tends to be a means of grace; the death in a noble cause of one who is revered and loved is an almost infallible source of inspiration; and the more so as it is seen apart from deeper theological explanations, why Jesus should teach that His death would do more even than His life to make effective the gospel of Divine and human love.

(6) The brotherhood as a society.—It followed from the nature of the teaching of Jesus that His followers should form themselves into a society. Community of faith and aim made two acceptable rules. (a) The service of the church, those whose relations were of the nature of brotherhood were bound to realize it in a common life and common service as well as in common institutions. That purpose of Jesus went in this direction, as is seen from the call and training of the twelve Apostles. In the later period of His Ministry we have references to a Christian society under the name of the Church (Mt 16:18-19). These references have indeed been thought by some critics to be of later ecclesiastical origin; but when the breach with the Jewish authorities became inevitable, He must, in thinking of the future, have conceived of His followers as a separate society. The omissions are as remarkable as the provisions. There is nothing said about forms of worship, nothing about ecclesiastical constitution. The few provisions may be gathered up under the following heads:

(a) General principles. The ruling spirit is the desire of each member to help all and each according to the measure of his ability. Titles which involve the assumption of personal authority are to be avoided (Mt 23).

(b) Honesty and influence. The position between the head and the subordinate members of the family. In the light of these maxims the promise to Peter must be interpreted (Mt 10:6). It certainly meant that Peter was the chief instrument by which in the primitive period the Church was to be built up, but the promise was not necessarily confined to Peter and his successors; it applies to all who make themselves his successors by sharing his faith.

(1) The doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood, on which virtually everything turns, is inexpressibly beautiful and consoling; but there is evidence that Jesus Himself was conscious of difficulties. Otherwise one has no doubt that He revealed His Fatherhood in the act of prayer, in the parables, in the benediction of the blessing, in His human life and work, in the expression of His love. For He conceived of the society as an instrument which should carry on His works of preaching and healing. The risen Lord lays on the conscience the duty of making disciples of all nations (Mt 28:19).

The work of the Church, which is spoken of in most detail is discipline, the aim of which is declared to be the improvement of the erring brother, while the stages of the procedure are laid down (Mt 18:15-17).

Importance is also attached to the function of binding and loosing (v. 18), which is regarded as the prerogative of the Christian society as a whole, not of a particular class. The reference is to conferring and permitting—i.e., framing maxims and rules of life which should be recognized as operative within the society.

(2) The religious rites.—There is every reason to believe that Jesus instituted a simple rite to be observed in the society. That baptism was appointed by Him has been denied, on the ground that it is vouched for only in the narrative of the post-resurrection life, and that it embodies a Trinitarian formula (Mt 28:19).

It is, however, antecedently probable from the connexion of Jesus with the Baptist, that He took over the rite of baptism, while its use from the beginning of the Christian Church as the sacrament of initiation presupposes the practice of Peter and the Seventy, in which He appoints and enjoins them upon the Lord's supper as a standing ordinance has already been referred to.

(7) The future and the inheritance.—The teaching of Jesus on the subject, so far as dealt with the return, has already been touched on, and it is sufficient now to note—(1) references to the growth of the Christian society on earth; (2) the glimpses of the final inheritance.

(c) The development of the society.—There are a number of passages, especially in the parables, which imply a history of the Church marked by three features—a gradual growth to a world-wide influence; overshadowing influence, debasement through a large admixture of evil elements, and experiences of trial and persecution (Mt 13).

As a final portion.—It is in vain that we look in the teaching of Jesus for instruction upon many eucharisticalogical questions which have exercised the minds of theologians. His message may be summed up in the two articles, that there is a fearful punishment reserved for those who come to the judgment in unbelief and impenitence, and that for those who are His there remains a great and an enduring inheritance. As to the conditions and the content of the blessedness of those who enter into life there is a large measure of reserve. He has no doctrine of the intermediate state.

He fixes our gaze on the final state in which there is no longer any human impediment to prevent the bestowal of all that is in the heart of the Father upon the saved, blessedness, glory, with opportunity of service. As to the ultimate fate of the wicked, we can only say that it is a problem for the solution of which the letter of certain sayings Jesus instituted two indefinite directions (Mt 25:31), while His proclamation of the Father's unlimited and unifying love makes in the other.

18. The credibility of the teaching.—The teaching of Jesus contains two salient features (apart from the Christology), which are of such fundamental importance in a view of life that they may be briefly touched on from an apologetic point of view. The questions are—Is the Fatherhood of God, as Jesus proclaimed it, a fact? Is the Christian ethic, as expounded in the Sermon on the Mount, practically realizable to all who desire to become Christians? We shall try to answer both questions positively.
precepts of the Sermon on the Mount. They endure wrongs meekly, do not strike back, and are incapable of sustaining a feud. But it may still be, and actually is, a great thing for a strong man to do from principle what a weakening does from indolence or cowardice.

The objection that the Christian ethic is impracticable is more frequently heard, at least in Great Britain. Even the Church finds it impracticable to act on our Lord's principle of secrecy in the matter of giving, while it would seem that the individual who carried out His precepts in business would be ruined, and that the nation which followed His programme of non-resistance would perish. The weight of the objection is so far reduced by the observation that our Lord's precepts are designed to be followed, not in the letter, but in the spirit—so that, e.g., the really important thing is, not to give to a thief who may have stolen a coat a cloak in addition, but to cherish kindly feelings for him, and to act in his best interests, which may mean putting him in gaol. Similarly, our duty to the poor is to give an expression to our love of them, which may very properly take account of the experience that indiscriminate charity increases the distress which it professes to relieve. The really essential thing is that brotherly love should prevail, that that which is to a large extent a fact in the sphere of the family should become truly operative in the class, the community, the nation, and among the peoples of the earth. It is to be remembered, too, that every ideal which has become practicable was once deemed impracticable—there have been states of society in which deemed impossible to be honest, or temperate, or chaste; and though the Christian ideal towers high above the general practice of our generation, it may be that that practice will one day be looked back on as belonging to the half savage practice of the past youth. And in the present it has often been made sublimely practicable for those whom the Holy Spirit touched, and whose hearts were set aflame with a Christ-like love of man.

W. P. PATerson.

JETHER.—1. Father-in-law of Moses (R.Vm of Ex 418 E), prob. a mistake for Jethro. 2. Eldest son of Gideon (Jg 8:29). 3. An Ishmaelite, father of Amasa (1 K 2:40, 1 Ch 27:5. See JETHRA). 4. 5. Two men of Judah (1 Ch 2:41). 6. A man of Asher (1 Ch 7:9); called in v.27 Jethra, the name of an Edomite clan (Gn 36:29).

JETETH.—An Edomite clan (Gn 36:1 = 1 Ch 1). JETHRO (once, Ex 4:18 Jethro).—An Arab sheik and priest of the Sinaiic Peninsula, the father-in-law of Moses; referred to by this name in Ex 3:18 18:29 (Ex), as Reuel in the present text, of Ex 6:22 (U), and as Hobab in Nu 10:22 (also J). He welcomed Moses and received him into his family (Ex 2:21), and many years later visited him at Sinai (Ex 18:11, 12), with wonder and delight of the doings of Jehovah on behalf of Israel (v.17), and gave advice about administration (v.18). Later still he probably acted as guide to the Israelites (Nu 10:21; cf. the AV of Jg 1st and 41st). As to the two or three names, it may be noted that Arabic Inscriptions (Melinean) repeatedly give a priest two names. The name Jethro (Heb. Yithro) may mean 'pre-eminent.' See art. HOBAB.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

JEZUR.—See YITUR.

JEZUS.—The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8:42).

JEW.—The name by which the descendants of Israel have been known for many centuries. It is corrupted from Judaism. After the division of the kingdom in B.C. 937, the southern portion was called by the name of the powerful tribe of Judah, which composed most of its inhabitants. It was, in this kingdom that the Deuteronomist reform occurred, which was the first step in the creation of an organized religion sharply differentiated from the other religions of the world. This religion, developed during the Exile, bore the name of the kingdom of Judah. All Israelites who maintained their identity were its adherents, hence the name 'Jew' has absorbed the term 'Israel.' For their history, see ISRAEL (1. 21-30) and DISPERSION. For their religion, see ISRAEL (11. 6, 6).

On the special meaning of 'the Jew' in Jn. see p. 481 f.

JEWEL.—Gn 24:19 the servant brought forth jewels of silver, and jewels of gold.' They were not jewels set in silver and in gold. Ornaments made of gold or silver were in older English called jewels. Now the word is confined to precious stones.

JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.—The greater number of the precious stones in the Bible occur in three lists which will be instructive to tabulate at the outset. These are: (A) the stones in the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28:18 39:14-19); (B) the stones in the 'covering' of the king of Tyre (Ezk 28:13); (C) those in the foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:19, 20). The three lists are to some extent mutually connected. A contains 12 stones. B in Heb. has 9, all taken from A with traces of A's order in their arrangement. In LXX the two lists are identical, and possibly the Heb. of B is corrupt. C also has 12 stones, and is evidently partly dependent on the LXX of A and B.

A reference to these tables will simplify the use of the following notes, which include other precious stones of the Bible besides those mentioned above. In endeavouring to identify the stones in List A, three things have to be kept in view. From the dimensions of the breast-plate—a span (8 or 9 inches) each way (Ex 28:—the 12 stones which composed it must, even after allowing space for the settings, have been of considerable size, and therefore of only moderate rarity. Further, as they were engraved with the names of the tribes, they can have been of only moderate hardness. Lastly, preference should be given to the stones which archæology shows to have been actually used for ornamental work in early Biblical times. In regard to this point, the article by Professor Flinders Petrie (Hastings’ DB iv. 619–21) is of special value.

B.—The ‘Covering’ of the King of Tyre (Ezk 28:)

Adiantum (Ezk 3:2, Zec 7:21).—See Diamond below.

Agate (List A 8 [Heb. shebo]). The Gr. equivalent ακάθαρτος (whence ‘agate’) was the name of a river in Sicily. The modern agate is a form of silica, occurring in nodules which when cut across show concentric bands of varying transparency and colour. The ancient ακάθαρτος (Pliny, HN xxxvi. 54) probably included the opaque coloured varieties of silica now distinguished as jasper (see Jaspel below). Flinders Petrie suggests that shebo may be the carnelian—also a form of silica (see Sardius below). ‘Agates’ (RVm ‘rubies’) stands for Heb. LXX in Is 54:2 (LXX 28:7). In regard to this point, the article by Professor Flinders Petrie (Hastings’ DB iv. 619–21) is of special value.

Chalcedony (List C 3). The modern stone of this name is semi-opaque or milky silica, but the ancient one was probably the green diopside (silicate of copper). This at least seems to have been the kind of smaragdus that was found in the copper mines of Chalcedon (Pliny, HN xxxvi. 18). There was some confusion, however, between the ‘stone of Chalcedon’ and the carthodonia (stone of Carthage), which was red (Pliny, ib. xxxvi. 25, 30). Carcachelon occurs as a various reading for chalcedon in Rev 21:19.

Rhosyolite (RV; AV ‘chrysolyte’; List C 7). In modern archæology this is the peridot (see Topaz below). The ancient gem was some other golden-coloured stone. Yellow quartz, yellow corundum, jacinth, or some variety of beryl may possibly be understood.

Chrysoprase (RV; AV ‘chrysoprasus’; List C 10). The prasitus of Pliny (HN xxxvi. 34) was a leaf-green chalcedony (from Gr. prasinos, a leek), of which there was a golden-tinted variety. The latter may be the NT chrysoprase. Possibly, however, both chrysoprase and chrysolite in List C refer to yellowish shades of beryl. The modern chrysoprase is a slightly translucent ellicol, coloured a beautiful apple-green by oxide of nickel.

Coral (Job 28:8, Ezek 27:15). The is the ‘red coral’ or ‘red coral’ secreted by some of the compound actinoids. Red coral (corallium rubrum) is common in the Mediterranean Sea and the Indian Ocean. In the living state the calcareous framework is covered by the ‘conosarc’ or common tissue of the organism, from which the individual polyps protrude. In the coral of commerce the living tissue has of course disappeared, and only the solid ‘skeleton’ remains. Coral is also a possible rendering of penemum (so RVm in the passages under Ruby below).

Crystal.—In Job 28:8, AV thus renders Heb. לְצֵקְסִית, but RV understands ‘glass.’ In the next verse, however, RV has 'crystal' for Heb. ḡābīṣ, instead of AV 'pearls'. In Ezek 13:1 'crystal' stands for Heb. qeraḥ (RV 'ice'). In NT krystallos appears in Rev 4:18 21:22. In all these cases except the first, the reference is probably to rock-cystal (colourless transparent quartz).

Diamond (List A 6, B 3). The Heb. yahalom probably stood in the twelfth place in List A, where LXX has onyxikon. Hence in this List RV has 'sardonyx' for 'diamond.' The latter is in any case an impossible rendering. The diamond was unknown in ancient times. It would have been too hard to engrave, and a diamond large enough to have borne the name of a prince and to have occupied a place in the high priest's breastplate would have been of incredible value. The yahalom was most likely the onyx, a banded form of silica (see Onyx below). 'Diamond' also occurs in Jer 17:9 as the material of an engraving tool. The Heb. is shamar, which is rendered 'adamant' in two other passages where it is found (Ezk 3:3, Zec 7:14). The occurrence is probably to corundum or emery (aluminium oxide), a very hard mineral.

Emerald (List A 4, B 8; also Ezk 27:5 [Heb. nopehek, LXX antraz, RV 'carbuncle']). Some red fiery stone is plainly intended, the red garnet being the most probable. 'Emerald' is probably the equivalent of Heb. bareqeth in List A 3, B 9 (see Carbuncle above). The common emerald is identical in composition with the beryl, but differs from it in hardness and in its bright green color. The Oriental 'emerald' (green RV 'onyx') is very rare. In NT 'emerald' stands for smaragdos; in List C 4, and in Rev 4, where the rainbow is compared to it. The latter passage is among Flinders Petrie's grounds for supposing that smaragdos is rock-cystal, which produces by its refraction all the prismatic colors. So RV 'emerald' occurs in List C. The modern cincite is a silicate of zircon. RV reads 'jacinth' for Heb. leshem in List A 7 (AV 'jewel').

Jasper (List A 12, B 6). The Heb. is yashkeph, and in B this corresponds to the LXX taspis. Probably yashkeph should stand sixth in A also, in which case taspis would again be the LXX equivalent. In NT jasper is in List C 1, and also in Rev 4:10 21:14. In 21:10 the 'jasper' stone is luminous and clear as crystal. The taspis of Pliny was primarily a green stone ('HN xxxvii. 37), but he enumerates many other varieties. It was not transparent, and he may have been more familiar with the Crystalline quartz ('jacinth'), which was actually used in Egyptian work, and is a hydrated form of the same substance as peridote. He was the last name of a Roman woman (Met. 10:4), an emerald or sapphire, so Pliny describes it as a gemstone. of aluminium), teak (aluminate of aluminium with sodium, potassium or calcium), beryl and common emerald (aluminate of aluminium and beryllium), lapis lazuli or ancient sapphire (aluminate of aluminium and sodium), garnet (aluminate of aluminium and calcium, or a similar combination).

A third group consists of aluminium oxide (alumina), and includes the opaque corundum, of which emery is an impure form, and the transparent modern sapphire (blue), Oriental ruby (red), Oriental topaz (yellow), Oriental amethyst (violet), and Oriental emerald (green).

Lastly, we have an aluminate (alumina in combination with a metallic oxide) in the spinel ruby (aluminate of magnesium).

Alabaster in the modern sense is gypsum or sulphate of lime. The ancient or Oriental alabaster, however, was a form of carbonate of lime, and was largely used for vases, which were thought to be specially adapted for preserving unguents (Pliny, H.N. xii. 13). The term "alabaster" seems to have been applied in a general sense to vases even when not made of this material. There are two well-known instances in NT in which an alabaster box (AV) or "cruse" (RV) of ointment was used (Lk 21:10, Mt 26:7, Mk 14:3).

JAMES PATRICK.

JEWRY.—This old term occurs frequently in the older versions, but rarely in AV. In Dn 5:7 it stands for Judah: in Lk 29:4, Jn 7:1 and occasionally in the Apoc. for Judaea.

JEZANIAH.—A Judahite military officer who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer 40:10). He is called in 2 K 25:25 Jassaniah, and is apparently to be identified also with Azariah of Jer 43:5.

JEZEBEL (meaning uncertain).—Daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and previously high priest of the Tyrian Baal; wife of Ahab, king of Israel, of the dynasty of Omri. Jezebel's evil influence in the land of Israel, especially in combating the religion of Jehovah in the interests of Baal-worship, was exercised not only during the twenty-two years of Ahab's reign, but also during the thirteen years of the rule of her two sons, Ahabiah and Joram; moreover, this influence extended, though to a lesser degree, to the Southern Kingdom of Judah, where Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel, seems to have followed in the footsteps of her mother (2 K 4:27). In her strength of character, her just for power, her unshrinking and resolute activity; her remorseless brushing aside of anything and everything that interfered with the carrying out of her designs, she was the veritable prototype of Catherine de Medici. In the OT the figure of Jezebel is presented in connexion with some dramatic episodes which are probably recorded as illustrations, rather than as exceptionally flagrant examples of her normal mode of procedure. The account of the capture of the tribe of Benjamin and the destruction of the walls of Jericho (Neh 13:16-19), the narrative about Naboth and his vineyard (1 K 21:1-18), and, as illustrating her obstinate, unbending character to the very end—note especially her words to Jehu in 2 K 9:30—the story of her death (2 K 9:27). In Rev 2:20 the name of Jezebel occurs; she calls herself a prophetess, and tempts men to wickedness. It is questionable whether the mention of the name here has any reference at all to the queen Jezebel.

W. O. E. OSTEENLEY.

JEZELUS.—1. 1 Es 8:9—Est 8: Jahziel. 2. 1 Es 8:8—Est 8: Jehiel.

JEZIEL.—The head of the Jerizites (Nu 26:7, 1 Ch 7:24).

JEZRAEL.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 12:9).

JEZRAELAH.—The leader of the singers at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 12:26). In 1 Ch 7:30 the same name is rendered Jahaziel.

JEZREEL.—The Hebrew name from which is derived the name of the Plain of Esdraelon (see ESDRASELON). The plain is called 'the Valley of Jezreel' in Jos 17:18, Jg 6:1, Hos 4:14.
JOACHAZ

JOACHUS.—One of the sons of Jesus, the son of Josedek (1 Es 9:49); called in Ezra 10:14 Gedaliah.

Joahaz.—1. Father of Josiah, the 'recorder' (2 Ch 34:1). 2. See Jehoahaz, 1.

Joakim.—The name is spelt Jehoiakim in canonic books, but Joachim or Joachim in Apoc. (AV), and Joakim everywhere in Apoc. RV. In Apoc. the name belongs to six persons. 1. King Jehoiakim (1 Es 10:2, Bar 1:4). 2. Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, who is erroneously called Joahaz in 1 Es 14:8. 3. A priest, son of Hilkiah, to whom the captives are said to have sent money for the purchase of offerings and incense (Bar 1:7). 4. A high priest in the days of Holofernes and Judith (Jth 4:11). 5. A son of Zorobabel (1 Es 5:8). 6. The husband of Susanna (Sus., 4, 4).

Joanan.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:31).

Joanna.—The wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas, one of 'certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities.' She ministered to Jesus of her substance, and after the crucifixion helped to anoint His body (Lk 8:24).

Joarib.—The head of the priestly family from which the Maccabees descended (1 Mac 21:46). Acc. to 1 Ch 24:3 this family, there called that of Jehozarib, was the first of the twenty-four courses of priests.

Job.—1. The man Job.—Job is referred to in the OT in the book bearing his name, and in Ezk 14:1-7, where he is mentioned as a conspicuous example of righteousness; in the Apoc. In Sir 49[18][Heb. after Smend and Rysел], and the Vulg. of To 23; and in the NT in Ja 5:1, the last two passages alluding to his patience. The reference in Ezk. shows that righteous Job was a familiar figure in some Jewish circles in the 6th cent. B.C. On the assumption that the Job of the book is sketched, as to the main outlines, after ancient tradition, probably the same in substance as that known to Ezk., we have to think of him as a Gentile living in patriarchal times either in the Hauran or on the confines of Idumea and Arabia (see U2), and his friends also must be regarded as Gentiles.

This conclusion is supported by the names of God generally employed in the poem. The Tetragrammaton, which is used 31 times by the writer in the prose parts, occurs only once in the poetic portions (129), and is ascribed to Job only in one verse in the Prologue (15). Adonai is also met with once (284). God is usually referred to by Job and his associates by names not distinctlyively Jewish: El, 55 times; Eloah, 41 times out of 57 in the whole OT; and Shaddai, 31 times out of 48 in OT; Elohim is comparatively rare in the poem. The entire absence of distinct allusions to Israelitic historical history points to the same conclusion. The word 'lorah,' 'law,' is used only once (225), and then in the general sense of 'instruction.' According to a lost work, Concerning the Jews, by Ben Sira (Tell el-Amarna Letters, No. 237, Winckler [118 Petrie]), may be a Canaanite equivalent, but no stress is laid on the similarity. Noticed that elohi in Bab. meant 'enemy' (ib. 50 Winckler [147 Petrie]), but this cannot be regarded at present as more than a coincidence.

2. The Book of Job.—(1) Place in the Canon.—Except in the Syriac Bible, which locates it between the Pentateuch and Joshua, on account of its supposed great antiquity, the book is always reckoned as one of the Kethubim or Hagiographa, and is often given the third place. It is usually grouped with Ps. and Prov., with which it is associated by the use of a special system of accented words (except in the Prologue and Epilogue), but the order of the books varies.

In a baraitha in the Bab. Talm. (Baba bathra 14b), which probably gives the most ancient order (Ryle, Canon of OT, 239), it comes after Ruth and Ps., in many Heb. MSS., especially Spanish, and in the Massorah, after Ch. and Ps.; in the German MSS., which have been followed in most printed editions, after Ps. and Proverbs. Codex B has the remarkable order: Ps., Pr., Ezc., Ca., Job, Wis., Sir.; A has Ps., Job, Proverbs. In printed editions of the LXX and Vulg. Job is usually coming first, but this order is generally adopted in European versions, owing no doubt to the influence of the Latin Bible.

(2) Text.—The Heb. text of Job was long regarded as excelling, but has been much attacked by recent years. Some critics resorting very largely to emendation with the help of the Versions and free conjecture. The reaction against the earlier view has probably led some scholars to consider its text, with its bold treatment in many places, and the large number of words, forms, and uses not met with elsewhere (according to Friedrich Delitzsch, 259) are duly taken into account, the condition of the text is seen to be less corrupt than might have been expected. Much discussion has been occasioned by the peculiar character of the LXX as restored to its original form by means of the Sinaitic translation first published in 1889. This version differs from the Massoretic text more widely in Job than in any other book. There are two interesting additions: the expansion of 2 and the appendix at the end of the book; but the latter is characteristic of the LXX, a little less than one-fifth of the Heb. text is absent—about 400 lines out of, roundly speaking, 2200 for the whole book and 2075 for the poetic portions. A few have found in this shorter edition the original form of the book, but most Joah and the LXX to defective understanding of the Hebrew, imperfect acquaintance with the structure of Heb. poetry, and the desire to conform to Halenic standards, etc., rather than to variation of text. This version therefore, in the present and competent judges, is of little use for the restoration of the text. Here and there it suggests a better reading, e.g. in 3:36 "latter end" for "paths," but in the main the Massoretic text is greatly to be preferred. It is rarely improbable, however, and the arrangement of the latter is wrong in a few passages: e.g. in ch. 31, where vv. 36-37 form a more fitting close than vv. 34-35.

(3) Analysis.—The book, as we have it, is a poem framed in prose, with bits of prose interspersed. The prose portions are as follows: the introduction, often called the Prologue (ch. 1 f.), stating the problem, "the undeserved suffering of a good man," giving a partial solution, and bringing on the scene the hero's three friends; short headings (1-4 etc.); a supplementary note (31:16); a brief introduction to the speeches of Elihu (32:1-4); and the so-called Epilogue (42:1-7). The poem opens with a monologue in which Job curses the day of his birth (ch. 3). This is followed by a series of three dialogues extending over chs. 4-28: (i.) 4-14; (ii.) 15-21; (iii.) 26-28. These three friends are in succession, in his own words, probably in order of seniority, reason with Job, all from the generally accepted standpoint that suffering is a sure indication of sin. As the discussion proceeds they become more and more bitter, until the most moderate and dignified of them, Eliphas, actually taxes Job with flagrant iniquity (22:17). In the third dialogue we have it, one of the speakers, the Epic, is silent. Job repeats at length each expostulation, sometimes sinking into depression on the verge of despair (14-16), occasionally rising for a moment or two into confidence (16:19-24), but throughout maintaining his integrity, and, notwithstanding passionate utterances which seem not unrelated to blasphemy (10:14-19), never wholly losing his faith in God.

The dialogues are followed by a monologue spoken by Job (chs. 29-31), consisting of a vivid retrospect of the happy past (ch. 30), a dismal picture of the wretched present (ch. 30), and what Marshall calls "Job's oath of self-vindicication"—an emphatic disavowal of definite forms of transgression, in a series of sentences most of which begin with "If," sometimes followed by an imprecation (ch. 31). The succeeding six chapters (32-37) are ascribed to a new character, a young man, Elihu the Buzite, who is dissatisfied with both Job and his friends. The distinguishing note of his argument is the stress laid on the thought that God teaches by means of affliction; in other words, that the purpose, or at least one main purpose, of trial is discipline (30:14-32:4). Elihu takes up the case of his father's friends, and the remainder of the poem (chs. 38-42) is devoted to Jehovah's answer to Job's complaint, calling attention to the Divine power, wisdom, and tenderness revealed in creation, in the control of natural forces and phenomena, in the life of birds and beasts, and in the working of Providence in human history, and suggesting that He who could do all this might surely he trusted to care for His servant; and Job's penitent retraction of his "presumptuous utterances.

(4) Integrity.—On the question whether the hook, as we have it, is a single whole or a combination of two or more parts, there is a general agreement among scholars in favour of the latter alternative. There are clear indications of at least two hands. The speeches of Elihu (chs. 32-37) are ascribed by most (not by Budde, Cornill, Wildeboer, Driggs, and a few others) to a later writer, perhaps a Hebrew student. The remaining portion of the poem, extending from chs. 38-42, is attributed to Job's self-composition. The only thing that seems to be certain about the poetic method of the writer or writers is the use throughout-out of the parallelism of members, which has long been known as the leading feature of ancient Oriental poetry. The verse usually consists of lines of ten Hebrew letters each, but there are many lines where there are three (31:11, 19), and one at least where there is only one (14:20). More than eight hundred out of a thousand lines, according to Delitzsch, bear the accent of poetic metre, each of which has three independent words. But here again....

God differing from what is met with in the rest of the book (Marshall, Job and his Friends, p. 289). The third of these reasons has been shown to be inconclusive. The language of Elihu is not inconsistent with the same, that these chapters were written by the author of the dialogues. The fourth reason is not without weight, but it must be allowed that there are some very fine things in these chapters, and it must be remembered that they have probably been handed down less carefully than any other parts of the book, on account of the disfavour with which some of the ancient Jews regarded Elihu (inspired by Satan—Test. of Job, ch. 41). In any case, Friedrich Delitzsch has gone too far in describing the author as 'a fifth-rate poet.' The remaining three reasons, however, seem to be nearly decisive.

The fine poem in ch. 28, which contrasts the success of man in finding precious ore with his utter failure to find wisdom, does not fit in with the context, and is therefore regarded by many as an addition. The striking, but rather turgid, descriptions of the hippopotamus and the crocodile in chs. 40. 41 are also held by many to be an interpolation. Some question the verses about the ostrich in chs. 29-30, and in English by Dunn. Epilogue are considered by some to be the relics of an earlier work in prose. A few scholars go much further in critical analysis. Bickell, for instance, in his search after the main thoughts of Elihu, finds three maxims in the poem; these are ascribed to Job and Elihu, and are considered as the result of the whole controversy. Job and Elihu, he seems to think, have had a common aim, namely, to prove the justice of God's treatment of the wicked.

(5) Nature of the Book.—The class of Heb. literature to which the Book of Job belongs is clearly the Chokmah or Wisdom group, the other representatives of which are Pr., Ec., and Sir.—the group which deals with questions of practical ethics, religious philosophy, and speculation. The book is mainly—not entirely, as one of the Rabbis thought (Baba bathra, 16a)—a work of imagination, but, in the judgment of most, with a traditiona}l nucleus, the extent of which, however, is uncertain, as there are features in both the Prologue and the Epilogue which suggest literary invention: e.g., the recurrence of the words 'I only am escaped alone to tell thee' (41:17-18, 19), the use of the number 6 (12, 13, 21, 32) and the doubling of Job's possessions (42:19). The poem, as handed down to us, can hardly be described in modern terms. It contains lyrical elements, but could not appropriately be designated lyrical. It has more than one dramatic feature, but is not really a drama. It reminds one of the epic, but is not an epic. It is didactic, but, as Baudissin has observed, soars high above a mere didactic poem. It is emphatically sui generis. It stands absolutely alone, not merely in the literature of Israel, but in the literature of the world.

(6) Poetic Form.—The Austrian scholar Bickell, who has been followed by Dunn, has shown that the poem was written throughout in quatrains, but the textual havoc wrought in the attempt seems to prove clearly that he is, in part at least, on the wrong track. Very often number 6 (12, 13, 21, 32) and the doubling of Job's possessions (42:19). The only thing that seems to be certain about the poetic method of the writer or writers is the use throughout-out of the parallelism of members, which has long been known as the leading feature of ancient Oriental poetry. The verse usually consists of lines of ten Hebrew letters each, but there are many lines where there are three (31:11, 19), and one at least where there is only one (14:20). More than eight hundred out of a thousand lines, according to Delitzsch, bear the accent of poetic metre, each of which has three independent words. But here again....

there are many exceptions, some no doubt due to textual corruption, but more in all probability to the poet's manner of the forms which he employed.

(7) Purpose and teaching.—The chief object of the poet to whom we owe the dialogues, and probably the Prologue and the Epilogue, and the speeches of Jahweh, and which we may adopt, of the compiler of the whole book, is to give a better answer to the question, 'Why are exceptionally good men heavily afflicted?' than that generally current in Jewish circles down to the time of Christ. A subsidiary object is the delineation of spiritual experience under the conditions supposed, of the sufferer's changing moods, and yet indestructible longing for the God whom he cannot understand. The poet's answer, as stated in the speeches of Jahweh, seems at the first reading no answer at all, but when closely examined is seen to be profoundly suggestive. There is no specific reply to Job's bitter complaints and passionate outcries. Instead of reasoning with His servant, Jahweh reminds him of a few of the wonders of creation and providence, and leaves him to draw the inference. He draws it, and sees the God whom he seemed to have lost sight of for ever as he never saw Him before, even in the time of his prosperity; sees Him, indeed, in a very real sense for the first time (42:1). The book also contains other partial solutions of the problem. The speeches of Elihu lay stress, as already observed, on the almost miraculous value of sufficient teaching (36:27), who 'delivereth the afflicted by his affliction, and openeth (uncovereth) their ear by adversity' (36:4). The Prologue lifts the curtain of the unseen world, and reveals a mysterious personality who is Divinely permitted to inflict suffering on the righteous, which results in manifestation of the Divine glory. The intellectual range of the book is amazingly wide. Marshall observes the common question which the mind of man has ever framed [of] the problem of the absolute, of the righteous, and the prosperity of the wicked]. It is to be found in the Book of Job.' On the question of the character of the teaching of the book as a whole differs a little from that of the OT in general. There is yearning for something better (14:4-14), and perhaps a momentary conviction (19:27), but the general conception of the life after death is that common to Hebrews, Assyrians, and Babylonians.

(8) The characters.—The interest of the Book of Job is concentrated mainly on the central figure, the hero. Of the other five leading characters by far the most important is the 'man of the midst,' the half-angel, half-person, by no means identical with the devil as usually conceived, and yet with a distinctly diabolical tendency. The friends are not very sharply differentiated in the book as we have it, but it is probable that the parts are wrongly distributed in the third dialogue, which is incomplete, no part being assigned to Zophar. Some scribes 277-10. 12-14 to Zophar, and add to Bildad's speech (which in the present arrangement consists only of ch. 25) vv.14 of ch. 26, what is left of Job's reply being found in 26:1-27:14. Marshall finds Zophar's third speech in chs. 25 and 26 and Bildad's in 24:14-15, and 24. There seems to be considerable confusion in chs. 25-27, so that it is difficult to utilize them for the study of the characters of Bildad and Zophar. Eliphaz seems to be the oldest and most dignified of the three, with something of the seer or prophet about him (40:18). Bildad tradition of the origin of the three is that of the youngest, is very differently estimated, one scholar designating him as a rough noisy fellow, another regarding him as a philosopher of the ascetic type. It must be allowed that the three characters are not as sharply distinguished as would be the case in a modern poem, the writer being concerned mainly with Job, and using the others to some extent as props. Elihu, who has been shown to be almost certainly the creation of Job's own will, is not by any means and even one of the three. He is an ardent young man, not free from consciences, but with noble thoughts about God and insight into God's ways not attained by them.

(9) Date.—In the Heb. Sinaitic tradition (40:14) Job is referred to after Ezekiel and before 'the Twelve.' which may possibly suggest that the writer regarded the book as comparatively late. The oldest Rabbinic opinion (Baba b. h. 14b), which the later editor of the whole book placed Job in the period of the return from the Exile (ib. 15b), one as late as the Persian period (ib. 15b). These opinions have no critical value, but the first has exercised considerable influence. Modern students are generally agreed on the following points:—(1) The book in all its parts implies a degree of reflexion on the problems of life which fits in better with a comparatively late than with a very early age. (2) The dialogue, which is unquestionably one of the oldest portions, indicates familiarity with national catastrophes, such as the destruction of the kingdom of Samaria, the overthrow of Damascus, and the leading away of large bodies of captives, including priests and nobles, from Jerusalem to Babylon (12:13-23), which again, on the assumption that the writer is an Israelite, points to an advanced stage of Israelitish history. Many take a further step, 'The prophet Jeremiah in his persecutions, Job who is called by Jahweh "my servant Job" (42,2), and the suffering Servant of Jahweh in the exilic prophet are figures which seem to stand in the connexion of a definite "period" (ib. 76,28) and to belong to the earliest to the Exile and the decades immediately preceding it. These and other considerations have led most recent critics to date the main poem near, or during, or after the Exile.

Some earlier scholars (Luthard, Franz Delitzsch, Carroll, and Stanley) recommended the age of Solomon, others (Noldeke, Hitzig, and Reuss) the age of Isaiah, and others (Ewald, Keil, and apparently Bleek) the age of the Books of the Captivity. Marshall thinks that the dialogue may have been written as early as the time of Tiglath-pileser III (n.c. 745-729), but not earlier. Dillmann, König, Davison (in Hastings' DB), and Driver favour the period of the Exile; Cheyne (in EB) puts the earliest part after n.c. 519; G. Hoffmann, c. a.d. 90; John, from 600 to 450; Bude, E. Kautzsch, and Peake, c. 400; the school of Kensten, the 4th or 5th cent.: O. Holmberg the age of the Ptolemies; and Siemens (in the JE), the time of the Macabeans.

At present the period from c. n.c. 600 to c. 400 seems to command most approval. The later portions of the book, especially the speeches of Elihu, may have been written a century or more after the main poem. Marshall thinks that the language of Malachi, and Dubm. confidently assigns 'Elihu' to the 2nd cent. n.c. A definite date is evidently unattainable either for the whole or for parts, but it seems to be tolerably certain that even the earlier portions are much later than used to be assumed.

(10) Authorship.—Besides the Talmudic guess cited above, very few attempts have been made to fix an author. Calmet supposed Solomon, Bunson Buruch, and Royer (in 1801) Jeremiah. None of these views needs to be discussed. Whoever was the author of the main poem, he was undoubtedly an Israelite, for a Gentile would not have used the Tetragrammaton so freely. Of familiarity with the Law there are, indeed, very few traces, but that is doubtless owing to the poet's wonderful skill, which has enabled him to maintain throughout a Gentile and patriarchal colouring. There is no reason for thinking that he both wrote in Babylonia or in Egypt. He must have lived in some region where he could study the life of the desert. It has been remarked that all the creatures he names (except the hippopotamus and the ostrich which have been introduced by a later hand) are desert creatures.

He was intimately acquainted with the life of caravans (61:17). He knew something of the astronomy of his time (9, cf. 38:14). He had some acquaintance with the myths and disastrous structures of Western Asia; cf. 14:15, 25:26, 62, where there may be allusions to the

Babylonian myth about the struggle between the dragon of Chaos and Marduk, the god of light; 3rd-2nd c., where reference may be made to popular notions about eclipses and to the chalices of magicians; and perhaps 29th c., where some find an allusion to the fabulous phoenix. He was probably familiar with the Wisdom-Jore of Israel, and possibly of Edom, and may safely be assumed to have been a priest, or at least an excommunicated one. The text was written in the script of the books of Ezr and Ne, and is probably found in the library of the Hebrews of Arabia. (See also Zor.) P. 156 ff.

JOEL.—1. A son of Jochai, in the genealogies (Gn 10:4; 1 Ch 2), and therefore probably an Arabian geographical name. Glaser identifies Jobah with YAHAB (likely Ukhayjhab), a tribe mentioned in the Sahcon inscriptions. Samaritans through the LXX form Jobor relates it to Wadr, a considerable region in S. Arabia. 2. A king of Edom (Gn 36:37, 1 Ch 1:41), confused, in the apocryphal appendix to the LXX version of Job, with Jabin, king of Hazor against Joshua (Jos 11:1). 4. Name of two Benjamites (1 Ch 8:2 and 18), W. NAEBERT.

JOCHEBED.—A sister of Kohath, married to Amram her nephew, and mother of Aaron and Moses (Ex 6:20). An earlier writer, E, in narrating the birth of Moses, speaks of his mother as a daughter of Levi, but does not give her name (Ex 2).

JOED.—The tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 10th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

The immediate occasion of the call to prophecy is a plague of locusts of exceptional severity (1:2), extending, it would seem from the promise in the second part (2:25), over several years, and followed by drought and famine so severe as to necessitate the discontinuance of the meal- and drink-offering, i.e. probably the daily sacrifice (cf. where the same Heb. words are used of the daily meal-offering and drink-offering). This fearful calamity, which is distinctly represented as present ('before our eyes' 1:1), heralds 'the great and very terrible day of Jehovah' (2:3), and which is ushered in by yet more fearful distress of the same kind (2:13). The reason of all this suffering actual and prospective is national sin, which, however, is not specified. Israel's people have turned away from Him (2:22-25). Let them turn back, giving expression to their repentant sorrow in tears, mourning garb, general fasting, and prayer on the day of the Lord (2:17).

(2) The second part opens with the declaration that the prayer for mercy was heard: 'Then...the Lord...had mercy on his people.' It seems to be implied that the people had repented and fasted, and that the priests had prayed in their behalf. The rendering of this passage by the AV. Then will...the Lord...be mercifully rejected by modern scholars as inaccurate, being, according to Driver, grammatically indefensible. What have we in the original is not prediction, but historical statement. This Divine pity, proceeds the prophet, speaking in Jehovah's name, will express itself in the removal of the locusts (2:25), and in the great drought (2:26), which will restore to the land its normal fertility, and so replace famine by plenty (2:24). But higher blessings yet are in store for the people of Jehovah. The Spirit shall...be poured out on all, inclusive even of slaves (2:28; Heb. 31:1). And when the Day of Jehovah comes in all its terror, it will be terrible only to the Gentile world which has not expressed Israel. The gathered hosts of the former, among whom Phoenicians and Philistines are singled out for special condemnation (3 [Heb. 4 14-5], shall be destroyed by Jehovah and His angels in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (3 [Heb. 51-5]), and Jehovah, unlike Egypt and Edom, will be a happy nation dwelling in a happy house well-watered land, and Jehovah will ever abide in its midst (3 [Heb. 4 14-5]).

2. Integrity.—The unity of the book was questioned by the French scholar Vernes (in 1851), who, however, recognized the weakness of his case, and the German scholar Rothstein (in 1896), the latter finding a follower in Rysel (in the JE). These critics assign the two parts to different writers in different ages. Badusian (Einleitung) suggests extensive revision. These theories have found little acceptance. Recent criticism generally regards the book, with the exception of a gloss or two, as the work of one hand.

There are indeed two distinctly marked parts, as was shown in the analysis, but that is by no means inconsistent with unity of authorship, for the following reasons: (a) The second part does not contradict but supplements the first part, and brings the book to a close. (b) The thought of 'the terrible day of Jehovah' is common to both (1:1 and 2:2, [Heb. 3:1]). (c) The alleged lack of originality in the second part, in so far as it exists, can be reasonably accounted for by its apocalyptic character. (d) The distinctive features of the first part, which is mainly historical, are largely due to the special theme—the description of locusts and their ravages, which is unique in Hebrew literature.

3. Date.—There is no external evidence. The place of the book in the canon is not certain, for the Book of Nahum, which was manifestly written after the fall of Nineveh, is also found in the former part of the collection of the Twelve, and comes before Micah, the earliest portions of which are beyond doubt much older. Hence the question can be answered in far as an answer is possible, only from the book itself.

The facts bearing upon it may be briefly stated as follows (1) The people addressed are the inhabitants of Judah, as Judah is called in [Heb. 4], 3, Jerusalem (2) [Heb. 4], 3, and Zion is mentioned in 2, 3, 4, 8. There is no trace of the kingdom of Samaria. The name 'Israel' is indeed used 2, 3, [Heb. 4], 3, but, as the first and last of these passages show, it is not the Jerusalem of Israel that is meant, but the people of God, dwelling mainly about Jerusalem. (2) There is no mention of royalty or army. The people are repeatedly referred to in It', Sin' 3, 3 [Heb. 4], 4, and by implication in the phrase 'my holy mountains' (3, 4) found here. 2) Its ritual is regarded as of high importance (1, 2, 29), and its ministers stand between the people and their God, giving expression to their prayers. There are a few Aramaicisms. (4) The people are called on to repent of sin (29), but in general terms. No mention is made of idolatry or formalism, or of any other specific sin or moral failing. Amos and Isaiah. (5) The foreign nations denounced as hostile to Israel are the Philistines (3, 4), the Egyptians and Edom (3, 4, 9). Reference is also made to the Grecians ('sons of the Ionians,' 3, 9, and the Sabaeans or Sabians (3, 9) as slave-dealers. Assyria, Babylonia, and Aram are neither named nor alluded to. (6) The history of Judah and Jerusalem includes a national catastrophe when the people of Judah were taken into captivity among the nations, and the land of Judah was divided amongst new settlers (3, 9). (7) This book of 75 verses contains 37 expressions or clauses to which no exact parallel can be adduced from any other OT writings, mainly prophetic. In 12 passages there is verbal or almost verbal correspondence: of [Heb. 4] 31; 1 of [Heb. 4] 3; 2 of [Heb. 4] 2 and 1 of Neh 2; 2 of [Heb. 4] 11; 2 and Ex 34; 3 of [Heb. 4] 3, 23, 28; and Ex 30, 34; [Heb. 4] 3, 4; and Mal 2, 10; 2 of [Heb. 4] 29, 20; 2 of [Heb. 4] 30; 2 of [Heb. 4] 1, 17; 3 of [Heb. 4] 1, 3, 14; and Am 12; 3 of [Heb. 4] 1. In two other places this is contrasted as well as parallelism; [Heb. 4] 3, 26, and Ezek 33, 28. (8) The last line has 'on the house of Israel,' 'the former man on all flesh,' and 3 of [Heb. 4] 16 is the reverse of 2, and 4 of 2 of [Heb. 4] 16. The Temple is not in connexion and nowhere else. (9) The book exhibits some features which are more common in later than in the earlier literature of the OT; 'shaddah,' 'hinder part,' '29' for 'gin,' the Hiphil of 'nachah,' 'bitter part' (29) for 'gis,' the Hiphil of 'nachah,' 'hazard part' (29) for 'gis.' (2) and the Hiphil of 'nachah,' 'bitter part' (29) for 'gis.'

JOELAH.—A warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12, 1). JOEZER.—One of David's followers at Ziklag (1 Ch 12, 1). JOGEBEH.—A town of Gad in Gilead (Nu 32, 3), named also in connexion with Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jg 8, 11). It is the present ruin el-Jubehat (or A'behab), N.W. from Rabat-aman, and about a mile west of that place and es-Sault.

JOGL.—The Danite chief who took part in the division of the land (Nu 34, 17).

JOEAH.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8, 2). 2. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11, 1).

JOHANAN.—1. 2 K 25, Jer 40, 48, the son of Kazah, chief of the captains of the forces, who after the fall of Jerusalem joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. After the murder of Gedaliah he pursued Ishmael and the other conspirators, recovered the captives, and, in spite of the protest of Jeremiah, carried them to Egypt. 2. A son of Josiah (1 Ch 3). 3. 1 Ch 34, 20, 1 Ch 34, 18, 20 post-exilic prince of the line of David. 4. 1 Ch 6, 10, a high priest. 5. 6. 1 Ch 12, 25, 30, two warriors who came to David to Ziklag, a Benjamite and a Gadite respectively. 7. Ezr 8, 2, Ioannes, 1 Es 8, 1, one of the sons who returned with Ezra. 8. 2 Ch 28, 32, an Ephramite. 9. See Jonathan, No. 7, and Jehohanan, No. 3.

JOHN.—1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the five Maccabean brothers (1 Mac 2). 2. The eldest son of Menahem (1 Mac 9, 25), and prince of the seven holy men of the Maccabees (1 Mac 9, 25) for whom he was slain by the 'sons of Jambri' (1 Mac 9, 49, 4). In 2 Mac 8, and perhaps again 10, 4, he is by mistake called Joseph. 3. The father of Eupolemus (1 Mac 9, 49, 2 Mac 41), who was said to be a devotee of Simon. 4. An envoy sent by the Jews to treat with Lysias (2 Mac 11). 5. One of the sons of
JOHN THE BAPTIST

Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16), commonly known as John Hyrcanus, and described as a 'valiant' man,' (Joshua 10:31, See Maccabees § 5. 5). The father of Simon Peter (Jn 1:21) is RV; AV, Bar-Jona), who is called in Mt 16:13 Bar-Jona(b). In the latter passage the form Baro may be a contraction for Joakas, or possibly from Baro (two names), as in the case of Saul-Paul. 7. One of the high-priestly family (Ac 4:6). 8. John Mark (see Marc). 9. For the Apocalypse see the following two articles.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.—The single narrative of John’s birth and circumcision (Lk 1) states that, as the child of promise (v.14), he was born in ‘a city of Judah’ (v.55), when his parents were old (v.57). They were both of priestly descent (v.6), and his mother was a kinswoman of the mother of Jesus (v.36). John was a Nazirite from his birth (v.55); he developed self-reliance in his lonely home, and learnt the secret of spiritual strength as he communed with God in the solitude of the desert (v.40). In the Judean wilderness—the wild waste which lies to the west of the Dead Sea—this Elijah-like prophet (v.35) found rough thorns and, finding his ascetic affinities with the Essenes, he was not a vegetarian, his diet consisting of edible locusts (Lv 11:21) as well as the vegetable honey which exudes from fig-trees and pomegranates (Mt 3:4). For other reasons—as, e.g., his zeal as a social reformer,—John cannot be called an Essene (Graetz). It was not from these ‘Philistines in the superlative degree’ (Schrader) that the last of the prophets learnt his message. His familiarity with the OT is proved by his frequent use of its picturesque language (Lk 3:7, cf. Am 9, Is 66:2); Jn 1, cf. Is 40; Jn 1:9, cf. Is 53, Ex 29:12), but he heard God’s voice in nature as well as in His word: as he brooded on the signs of the times, the barren trees of the desert, fit only for burning, and the vipers fleeing before the flaming sword, became emblem of the nation’s peril and lent colour to his parents’ hopes of impending wrath (cf. G. A. Smith, HOGH p. 495).

In the wilderness ‘the word of God came unto John’ (Lk 3:2). The phrase implies (I S 15:16 etc.) that, after more than three centuries of silence, the voice of a prophet was to be heard in the land, and the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 3:2-7, Mk 1:6-11, Lk 3:1-18) tell of the stirring effects of his preaching in ever-widening circles (Mt 3:8), and give a summary of his message. It is probable that, in the course of his successful six months’ ministry, John moved northwards along the then more thickly populated valley of the Jordan, proclaiming the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven to the crowds of people who flocked to ‘the whole region circumspect to John’ (Lk 3:4); once at least (Jn 10:3) he crossed the river (cf. Sunday, Sacred Sites of the Gospel, p. 33 etc.; Warfield, Expositor, iii. [1895] p. 287 ff.; and see Bethany, Salim). ‘The kingdom of heaven is at hand’ (Mt 3:2) was the Baptist’s theme, but on his lips the proclamation became a warning that neither descent from Abraham nor Pharisaic legalism would constitute a title to the blessings of the Messianic age, and that it is vain for a nation to plead privilege when its sins have made it ripe for judgment. There is a Pauline ring in the stern reminder that Abraham’s spiritual seed may spring from the stones of paganism (Lk 3:7), but also Mt 3:2; cf. Ro 4:9, Gal 4:22). On the universality of the coming judgment is based John’s call to repentance addressed to all men without respect of persons. The axe already laid to the root of the trees’ (Lk 3:9) will spare those bringing forth good fruit, and not those growing in favoured enclosures. Soldiers, publicans, and inquirers of different classes and ages made practical and lowly varied are the good works in which the ‘fruits of repentance are seen (Lk 3:8).

The baptism of John was the declaration unto all men, by means of a symbolic action, that the condition of entrance into God’s Kingdom is the putting away of sin. It was a ‘repentance-baptism,’ and its purpose was ‘remission of sins’ (Mt 16) [Weiss regards this statement as a Christianized version of John’s baptism, agreeing with Bultmann (SGT, in loco), as in the case of Saul-Paul]. John’s baptism was no copying of Essene rites, and it had a deeper ethical significance than the ‘divers washings’ of the ceremonial law. It has close and suggestive affinities with the prophet’s teaching in regard to spiritual cleansing (Is 11:4, Ezek 36, Zec 13), the truth expressed in their metaphorical language being translated by him into a striking symbolic act: but John’s baptism has most definite connexions with that of proselytes, which was the rule in Israel before his days (Schurer, HJP, r. 322 f.). John sought to make men ‘proselytes of righteousness’ in a new and higher order. He came, as Jesus once said, ‘in the way of righteousness’; and the righteousness he wished men to possess did not consist in mere obedience to the law of a carnal commandment, but in repentance towards God and deliberate self-consecration to His kingdom’ (Lambert, The Sacraments in the NT, p. 62). When Jesus was baptized of John (Mt 3:13, Mk 1:9, Lk 3:21), he did not come confessing sin as did the other men (Mt 3:7); he declared His identity with His Messianic work, and His identification of Himself with sinners. It was part of His fulfillment of all righteousness (v.13), and was followed by His anointing with the Holy Spirit. John knew that his baptism was to prepare the way for the coming of a ‘mightier’ than he, who would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mt 11). But after Pentecost there were disciples who had not advanced beyond the Baptist’s point of view, and were unaware that the Holy Spirit had been poured out (Ac 18:19).

The narrative in Jn 1:26-34 assumes as well known the Synoptic account of John’s activity as evangelist and baptizer (v.30), as well as his baptism at the baptism of Jesus, and from intercourse with Jesus, he had learnt that his mission was not only to announce the Messiah’s coming, and to prepare His way by calling men to repent, but also to point Him out to men (Jn 1:41-49).

Many critics regard the words, ‘Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world’ (v.29), as inconsistent with John’s later question, ‘Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?’ (v.28); but it cannot be overlooked that John had learnt from Jesus what was His ideal of the Messiah’s work, it may well be, as Gary writes, that Jesus for a time at Jerusalem raised John’s mind to the height of its own realization, that when the influence of Jesus was withdrawn, John closed to his own familiar modes of thought; and that the answer of Jesus by the two disciples—‘He was a kindly reminder’ of an earlier conversation (Expositor, vi. [1902] v. 375).

This heightened sense of the glory of Jesus was accompanied by a deepening humility in John’s estimate of his own function as the Messiah’s forerunner. In his last testimony to Jesus (Jn 3:30) ‘the friend of the bridegroom’ is said to have rejoiced greatly as he heard the welcome tidings that men were coming to Jesus (v.30). It was a high theology when Jesus said, ‘John hath borne witness unto the truth’ (Jn 5:30); but it also implied the high claim that the lower members of the Church, which is His bride, enjoy greater spiritual privileges than he who, in spite of his own disclaimer (Jn 1:19), was truly the Elijah foretold by Malachi (Mt 11:14; cf. Mal 4:1)—the herald of the day of which he saw only the dawn—was the putting away in the early Church there were some who attached undue importance to his teaching and failed to recognize the unique glory of Jesus—the Light to whom he bore faithful witness (Jn 1:8). The Synoptic narrative of the imprisonment and murder of John yields incidential evidence of his greatness as a prophet. There were some who accounted for the mighty works of Jesus by saying 'John the Baptist is risen from the dead' (Mk 6:14).

Josephus (Ant. xviii. v. 2) makes the preaching of John the condition of a passage through Antipas for his adultery with his brother's wife (Mk 6:18). Some historians (e.g. Ranke) arbitrarily use Josephus as the foundation, to the disgrace of the Gospels. But Sollertinsky (JThSt i. 507) has shown that when the expression 'he was stoned' (Lk 9:50) is considered, 'we are bound to consider the historian's statements with the greatest care.' Schürer (op. cit.), who holds that the real occasion of John's imprisonment was Herod's fear of political trouble, never-} theless allows that there is no real inconsistency between the statement of Josephus and the further assertion of the Evangelists that John had roused the anger of Herod, and still more of Herodias, by his stern reproof.

The last mention of John in the Gospels (Mt 21:23, Mk 11:10, Lk 20:9) shows that Herod had good cause to fear the popular temper. John's influence must have been permanent as well as wide-spread when the chief priests were afraid of being stoned if they slighted him. After the transfiguration our Lord alluded to the sufferings of John, as He endeavoured to teach His disciples the lesson of His cross: 'I say unto you that Elijah is come, and they have also done unto him whatsoever they listed' (Mk 9:12).

JOHN THE APOSTLE.—The materials for a life of St. John may be divided into three parts: (2) the story in the Inland John; which was written later than the canonical Gospels; (2) traditions of a legendary character, which cannot be accepted as history, but which possess an interest and significance of their own. But when all the evidence on the subject is gathered, it is impossible to give more than a bare outline of what was in all probability a long life and an unspeakably important ministry. The present article must be taken in conjunction with those that follow, in view of the controversies which have arisen concerning the authorship of the 'Johannine' writings.

1. The Scripture data.—John was a son of Zebedee, a master-fisherman in good position, plying his craft in one of the towns on the Lake of Galilee, possibly Bethsaida. It is probable that his mother was Salome, one of the women who 'ministered' to Christ in Galilee (Mk 15:40), a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. This may be inferred from a comparison of Mt 27:55 and Mk 15:40 with Jn 19:25.

The last passage is best understood as naming four women who stood by the Cross of Jesus—His mother, His mother's sister Salome, wife of Clopas who was also the mother of James and John, and Mary Magdalene. The interpretation which would find only three persons in the list, and identify 'the sister of Clopas' with the sister of Jesus' is open to the objection that two sisters would have the same name, and it involves other serious difficulties.

In Jn 1:42 two disciples are mentioned as having heard the testimony of John. These are Peter and Andrew. John then went up and having accompanied the new Teacher to His home. One of these was Andrew, and it has been surmised that the other was John himself. If this was so, the incident must be understood as constituting the very beginning of John's discipleship.

In Mt 4:18-22, Mk 1:16-20 an account is given in almost the same words of the call of four fishermen to follow Jesus. Two of the sons of John and his elder brother James, who were with their father in a boat on the Lake of Galilee, mending their nets. In Lk 5:11 a different account of the call is given. Nothing is said of Andrew; Peter is the principal figure in the scene of the miraculous draught of fishes, while James and John are mentioned only incidentally as 'partners with Simon.' Directly or indirectly, however, we are told that to John, whilst engaged in his craft, the summons was given to leave his nets and become a disciple. Peter was immediately obeyed, and constitutes an intermediate link between the initial stage of discipleship and the appointment to be one of twelve 'apostles.' In the lists of the Twelve (Mt 10:10, Mk 3:16, Lk 6:14), John is always named as one of the first four, and in the course of Christ's ministry he was one of an inner circle of three, who were honoured with special marks of confidence.

Three alone were permitted to be present on three occasions—the raising of Jairus' daughter, narrated in Mk 5:25, Lk 8:41; the Transfiguration, described in three accounts (Mt 17:2, Mk 9:2, Lk 9:28); and the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane, mentioned by two of the Synoptists (Mt 26:37 and Mk 14:42). On one or perhaps two occasions Andrew was associated with these three—possibly at the healing of Peter's wife's mother (Mk 1:31), and certainly at the interview described in Mk 139, when Jesus sat on the Mount of Olives and was 'asked privately' concerning His prophecy of the overthrow of the Temple.

On two notable occasions the brothers James and John were associated together. They appear to have been alike in natural temperament. It is in this light that the statement of Mk 3:18 is generally understood—

'He surnamed them Boanerges, which is Sons of thunder.' This uncertainty attaches to the derivation of the word, and the note added by the Evangelist is not perfectly clear. But no better explanation has been given than that the title was bestowed, perhaps by anticipation, in allusion to the zeal and vehemence of character which both the Apostles markedly exhibited on the occasions when they appear together. In Lk 9:4 they are represented as desirous to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritan village, which shows their readiness to put hospitality to their Master. In Mk 10:35 they come to Christ with an eager request that to them might be allotted the two highest places in His Kingdom, and they profess their complete readiness to share with Him whatever suffering or trial might be called to pass through. According to Mt 20:20, their mother accompanied them and made the request, but v. 28 shows that indignation was roused 'concerning the two brethren,' and that the desire and petition were really their own. Once in the Gospels John is described as associated with Peter, the two being sent by Christ to make ready the Passover (Lk 22:3). Once he figures by himself alone, as making inquiry concerning a man who cast out demons in the name of Jesus, though he did not belong to the company of the disciples (Mk 9:33, Lk 9:33). As an indication of character this is to be understood as evincing zeal, but mistaken, loyalty. Christ's reply was, 'Forbid him not'; evidently John was disposed to manifest on this occasion the fiery intolerance which he and his brother together displayed in Samaria. Though the manner of spirit ye are of do not form part of the best-attested text in Lk 9, they doubtless describe the kind of rebuke with which on both occasions the Master found it necessary to check the eagerness of a disciple who loved his Master well, but not wisely.

In the early part of the Acts, John is associated by name with Peter on three occasions. One was the healing of the lame man by the Temple gate (3:1). The next was their appearance before the Sanhedrin in ch. 4, when they were found to be men untrained in Rabbinical knowledge, mere private persons with no official standing, and were also recognized by some present as having been personal followers of Jesus, and seen in His immediate company. In 8 we read that the two were sent by their brother-Apostles to Samaria, after Philip had exercised his evangelistic ministry there. Many had been admitted into the Church by baptism, and the two Apostles completed the reception by prayer and the laying on of hands, 'that they might receive the Holy Spirit.' These typical instances show that at the outset of the history of the Church and John was instructed not only in the Baptist, but also recognized as a leader, though they were very different in personal character, and Peter appears always to have been the spokesman. This note of personal leadership is confirmed by the incidental reference of Paul in Gal 2:1.
JOHN THE APOSTLE

where James (not the son of Zebedee), Cephas, and John are "reputed to be pillars" in the Church at Jerusalem.

Our knowledge of John's history and character is largely inferred, and the interest in his personality is greatly deepened, if he is identified with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' the author of the Fourth Gospel, and the John of the Apocalypse. Both these points are sought with 'great lights' in Asia—John, who was both a witness and a teacher, who reigned upon the throne of the Lord, and, being a priest, wore the sacred plate,' as having fallen asleep at Ephesus. The Muratorian Fragment, which dates about A.D. 180, records an account of the origin of the Fourth Gospel, to the effect that John wrote it in obedience to a special revelation made to himself and Andrew. This story is somewhat mythical in character and is not elsewhere confirmed, but it proves the early prevalence of the belief in the Apostolic origin of the Gospel. Irenæus states that the Gospel was written specially to confute unbelievers like Cerinthus, and that it was only translated from Polycarp, the familiar story that St. John refused to remain under the same roof with the arch-heretic, lest the building should fall down upon him. Ephesus is said to have been the scene of this incident. All traditions agree that he lived to a great age, and it is Jerome (in Gal. vi. 10) who tells of his being carried into the church when unable to walk or preach, and simply passing the words, 'Little children, love one another.' Tradition, however, gives Christ's enigmatical answer to Peter, 'If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?' led, as John 21st indicates, to the belief that John would not die, but would be translated.

Still, in spite of the record, the legend lingered long in the Church, and is mentioned by Augustine, that, though apparently dead, the beloved Apostle was only asleep, and that the dust upon his tomb rose and fell with his breathing. The poet Browning, in his dramatic monologue, speaks of an ancient tradition concerning the Apostle's great age and lingering death, and imagines him recalled from a deep trance and the very borderland of the grave to deliver a last inspired message.

The universal belief of the early Church that St. John maintained a prolonged ministry in Ephesus has never been challenged till recent years. The arguments adduced against it, though quite inadequate as set aside positive evidence, have been accepted by critics of weight, and at least deserve mention. The chief fact of importance urged is the silence of writers who might well be expected to refer to it. Polycarp in his letter to the Philippians, and Ignatius in writing to the Ephesians, refer to Paul and his writings, but not to John or his ministry. Clement of Rome, writing about A.D. 95, mentions the existence in Ephesus and their successors, makes no reference to John as an eminent survivor, but speaks of the Apostolic age as if completely past. If John did labour in Asia for a generation, and was living in the reign of Trajan, it is not unnatural to expect that fuller reference to the fact would be found in the writings of the sub-Apostolic Fathers. But the reply is twofold. First, the argument from silence is always precarious. The literature of the early years of the 2nd century is so scanty, and little is known of the circumstances under which the fragmentary documents were written or of the precise objects of the writers. The silence of the Acts of the Apostles in the 1st cent., and of Eusebius in the 4th, is in many respects quite as remarkable as their speech and much more inexplicable. It is quite impossible for the most acute critic in the 20th cent. to reproduce the conditions of an obscure and remote age, and to understand why some subjects of little importance to us are discussed in the literature and others of apparently greater significance ignored.

It is the weight of positive evidence, however, on which the tradition really rests. Irenæus, in a letter to Florinus preserved for us by Eusebius, describes how as a boy he had listened to 'the blessed Polycarp,' and had heard 'the accounts which he gave of his intercourse with John and with the others who had seen the Lord.' And lest his memory should be discredited, he tells his correspondent that he remembers the events of that early time more clearly than those of recent years; 'for what boys learn, growing with their mind, becomes joined with it.' It is incredible that a writer brought so near to the very person of John, and having heard his words through only one intermediary, should have been entirely in error concerning his ministry in Asia. Polycrates, again, a bishop of the city in which St. John had long resided and laboured, wrote of his ministry there after an interval not longer than that which separates our own. Some of these legendary tales will be Refo, or buff of 1832 or the battle of Waterloo. His testimony obviously is not that of himself alone, it must represent that of the whole Ephesian Church; and what Irenæus remembered as a boy others of the same generation must have remembered according to their opportunities of knowledge. The explicit testimony of three writers like Polycrates, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria carries with it the implicit testimony of a whole generation of Christian extremists throughout the entire area. The silence of others notwithstanding, it is hardly credible that these should have been mistaken on a matter of such great importance. The theory that a theory which was argued between the Apostle and a certain 'John the Elder' is discussed in a subsequent article (see p. 483), but it would seem impossible that a mistake on such a subject could be made in the minds of those who were divided from the events themselves by so narrow an interval as that of two, or at most three, generations.

3. Later traditions.—It is only, however, as regards the question of the testimony of John the Evangelist of the 2nd cent. may be thus confidently relied on. Stories of doubtful authenticity would gather round an honoured name in a far shorter period than seventy or eighty years. Even if the legend itself be false, it probably contain an element of truth, whilst others are the result of mistake or the product of pious imagination. They are valuable chiefly as showing the directions in which tradition moved, and we need not draw on any of the interesting myths of later days in order to form a judgment on the person and character of John the Apostle, especially if he was in addition, as the Church has so long believed, the kinsman of Jesus, a youth in his early discipleship, eager and vehement in his affection and at first full of ill-instructed ambitions and still undisciplined zeal, John the son of Zebedee was regarded by his Master with a peculiar personal tenderness, and was fashioned by that transforming affection into an Apostle of exceptional insight and spiritual power. Only the disciple whom Jesus loved could become the Apostle of love. Only a minute and delicate personal knowledge of Him who was Son of Man and Son of God, combined with a sensitive and ardent natural temperament and the spiritual maturity attained by long experience and patient breeding meditation on what he had seen and heard long before, could have produced such a picture of the Saviour of the world as is presented in the Fourth Gospel. The very silence of John the Apostle in the narratives of the Gospels and the Acts is significant. He moved in the innermost circle of the disciples, yet seldom opened his lips. His recorded utterances could all be compressed into a few lines. Yet he ardently loved and was beloved by his Master, and after He was gone it was given to the beloved disciple to 'tarry' rather than to speak, or toil, or suffer, so that at the last he might write that which should move a world and live in the hearts of untold generations. The mission of Christlike the Apocalypse has left this legacy to the Church—that without him it could not have adequately known its Lord.

JOHN THE APOSTLE

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

JOHN, GOSPEL OF.—Introductory.—The Fourth Gospel is unique among the books of the NT. It is a combination of minute historical detail with lofty spiritual teaching, in its testimony to the Person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the preparation it makes for the foundations of Christian doctrine, it stands alone. Its influence upon the thought and worship of the Christian Church has been proportionately deep and far-reaching. It is no disparagement of other inspired Scriptures to say that no other book of the NT has left such a mark at the same time upon the profoundest Christian thinkers, and upon simple-minded believers at large. A decision as to its character, authenticity, and trustworthiness is cardinal to the Christian faith. This Gospel is thus so far-reaching in its matter of comparatively secondary importance in the interpretation of a document, and in the determination of its significance; in this instance it is vital. That statement is quite consistent with two other important considerations. (1) We are not dependent on the Fourth Gospel for the facts on which Christianity is based, or for the fundamental doctrines of the Person and work of Christ. The Synoptic Gospels and St. Paul's Epistles are more than sufficient to establish the basis of the Christian faith, which on any hypothesis must have spread over a large part of the Roman Empire before this book was written. (2) On any theory of the authorship, the document in question is of great significance and value in the history of the Church. Those who do not accept it as a 'Gospel' have still to reckon with the fact of its composition, and to take account of its presence in and influence upon the Church of the 2nd century.

But when these allowances have been made, it is clearly a matter of the very first importance whether the Fourth Gospel is a genuinely eye-witness, belonging to the innermost circle of Jesus' disciples, who after a long interval wrote a trustworthy record of what he had heard and seen, interpreted through the medium of half a century of Christian experience and service; or, on the other, a treatise of speculative theology cast into the form of an imaginative biography of Jesus, dating from the second or third decade of the 2nd cent., and testifying only to the form which the new religion was taking under the widely altered circumstances of a rapidly developing Church. Such a question as this is not of secondary but of primary importance at any time, and the critical controversies of recent years make a decision upon it to be crucial. It is impossible here to survey the history of criticism, but it is desirable upon a few words upon a universally accepted tradition, extending from the third quarter of the 2nd cent. to the beginning of the 19th, John the Apostle, the son of Zebedee, was held to be the author of the Gospel, the three Epistles that went by his name, and the Apocalypse. This tradition, so far as the Gospel was concerned, was unbroken and almost unchallenged, the one exception being formed by an obscure and doubtful sect, or class of unbelievers, called Alogi by Ephraimus, who attributed the Gospel and the Apocalypse to Cerinthus. From the beginning of the 19th cent., however, and especially after the publication of Bretschneider's Prophetae in 1829, an almost incessant conflict has been waged between the traditional belief and hypotheses which in more or less modified form attribute the Gospel to an Ephesian elder or an Alexandrian Christian philosopher belonging to one half of the NT. In contemporary, Baur of Tübingen, in whose theories of doctrinal development this document held an important place, fixed its date about A.D. 170, but this view has long been given up as untenable. Keim, who argued strongly against the Johannine authorship, at first adopted the date A.D. 100-115, but afterwards regarded A.D. 130 as more probable. During the last fifty years the conflict has been waged with great ability on both sides, with the effect of modifying extreme views, and more than once it has seemed as if an agreement between the more moderate critics on either side had become possible. Among the conservatives, Zahn and Weiss in Germany, and Westcott, Strong, and Drumbond in this country, have been conspicuous; whilst, on the other hand, Holtzmann, Jülicher, and Schniedel have been uncompromising opponents of the Johannine hypothesis. Any term of Schmiedel, Harnack, and others have taken up a middle position, ascribing the book to a disciple of John the Apostle, who embodied in it his master's teaching; whilst Wendel and some others have advocated partition theories, implying the existence of a genuine Johannine document as the basis of the Gospel, blended with later and less trustworthy matter.

The position taken in this article is that the traditional view which ascribes the authorship of the Gospel to John the Apostle is still far by the most probable account of its origin, the undeniable difficulties attaching to this view being explained by a reasonable consideration of the circumstances of its composition. Fuller light, however, has been cast upon the whole subject by the discussions of recent years, and much is to be learned from the investigations of eminent scholars and careful discussion. In the case of the Johannine authorship especially when these do not rest upon a denial of the supernatural element in Scripture. In the present treatment of the subject, controversy will be avoided as far as possible, and stress will be laid upon the positive and constructive elements in the examination. The method adopted will be to inquire into (1) the External Evidence in favour of St. John's authorship; (2) the Internal Evidence; (3) the sources of the Gospel in relation to the Synoptics; (4) Objections and suggested alternative Theories; (5) Summary of the Conclusions reached.

External Evidence.—It is not questioned that considerably before the close of the 2nd cent. the four Gospels, substantially as we have them, were accepted as authoritative in the Christian Church. This is proved by the testimony of Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, in his writings, about a.d. 180; Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, about a.d. 170; Clement, head of the catechistical school in Alexandria, about 190; and Tertullian, the eloquent African Father, who wrote at the end of the century, and who says freely from all the Gospels by name. The full and explicit evidence of the Muratorian Canon may also be dated about a.d. 180. Irenæus assumes the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel as generally accepted and unquestioned. He expressly states that after the publication of the other three Gospels, 'John the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned upon His breast, himself also published the Gospel, while he was dwelling at Ephesus in Asia.' He tells us that he himself when a boy had heard from the lips of Polycarp his reminiscences of 'his familiar intercourse with John and the rest of those that had seen the Lord.' He dwells in mystical fashion upon the significance of the number four, and characterizes the Fourth Gospel as corresponding to the 'flying eagle' among the living creatures of Ezek. 10 and 16. Theophilus of Antioch quotes it as follows: 'John says, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God' (Aut. 22). The Muratorian Fragment, which gives a list of the canonical books recognized in the Western Church of the period, ascribes the Fourth Gospel to 'John, one of the disciples,' and whilst recognizing that in the single books of the Gospels different principles are taught, the writer adds that they all alike confirm the faith of believers by their agreement in their teaching about the birth, passion, and resurrection of the Lord. Clement of Alexandria, in laying down 'the tradition of the elders from the first,' says that 'John, last of all, having observed that the bodily things had been exhibited in the Gospels, exhorted by his friends and inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual gospel' (Eus. HE vi. 14). Tertullian, among other testimonies, shows his opinion of the authorship and his discrimination of the character of the Gospels by quoting John and the Apocalypse. John and Mark are often mentioned as the faithful within us; among the companions of the Apostles, Luke and Mark renovate it' (adv. Marc. iv. 2).

Was this clearly expressed and wide-spread belief of the Church well borne? First of all it must be observed that the personal link supplied by Irenæus is of itself so important as to be almost conclusive, unless very strong counter-reasons can be alleged. It was impossible that he should be mistaken as to 'the Gospel of Polycarp,' and Polycarp had learned directly from John himself. On the broad issue of John's ministry in Asia and his composition of a Gospel, this testimony is of the first importance. The suggestion that confusion had arisen in his mind between the Apostle and a certain 'Presbyter John' of Asia will be considered later, but it is exceedingly unlikely that on such a matter the elder Polycarp or his youthful auditor could have made a mistake. The testimony of churches and of a whole generation of Christians, inheritors of the same tradition at once, corroborates the emphatic and repeated statements of Irenæus.

It is quite true that in the first half of the 2nd cent. the references to the Gospel are neither so direct nor so abundant as might have been expected. The question was whether Justin knew it, and really added up the parallels and constructive elements in the examination. His references to the Gospel narrative are very numerous, and the coincidences between the form of the records which he quotes and those of the Gospels are often close, and his statement of the Johannine authorship in connection with the Gospels, as has been much debated. His references to the first of the four Gospels are numerous, and the coincidences between the form of the records which he quotes and those of the Gospels are often close, and he mentions no authors' names. In his first Apol. ch. 61 (about a.d. 160), however, we read, 'For Christ also said, Except ye be born again, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven.' In the 2nd he adds, 'Christ as the Word' and the 'Word' are suggestive. The recent discovery of Irenæus' Diátaxaros (c. a.d. 160) makes it certain that that 'harmony' of the Gospels began with the words, 'In the beginning was the Word,' and that the whole of the Fourth Gospel was interwoven into its substance. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians (before a.d. 120) apparently quotes Jn. 1 in the words, 'For every one who does not acknowledge that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is an antichrist,' but no express citation is made. The Epistles of Ignatius (about a.d. 110) apparently show traces of the Fourth Gospel in their references to 'living water,' 'children of light,' Christ as 'the Word,' and 'the door,' but these are not conclusive. Papias may have known and used this Gospel, as Irenæus seems to imply (Ad. Tat. 36); and Eusebius distinctly says that he 'used testimonies from the first Epistle of John' (HE iii. 39).

Some of the most noteworthy testimonies to the use of the Gospel in the former part of the 2nd cent. are drawn from heretical writings. It is certain that Hirsch- eon of the Valentinian school of Gnostics knew and quoted the Gospel as a recognized authority, and it would even appear that he wrote in an elaborate commentary on the whole Gospel. Origen quotes him as misapprehending the text, 'No one has seen God at any time.' Hippolytus in his Refutation of all Heresies (vi. 30) proves that Valentinus (about a.d. 150) quoted Jn. 10, 'The Saviour says, All that came before me are thieves and robbers,' and that Basilides a little earlier made distinct reference to Jn. 12: 'As it is said in the Gospels, the true light that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world.' Slightly and more doubtless references are found in the Clementine Homilies and other heretical writings, and these go at least some way to show that the peculiar phraseology of the Fourth

Gospel was known and appealed to as authoritative in the middle of the 2nd century.

It is not, however, by explicit references to "texts" that a question of this kind can be best settled. The chief weight of external evidence lies in the fact that between A.D. 150 and 180 four Gospels were recognized in the Church as authentic records, read in the assemblies, and accepted as authoritative. Also, that the fourth of these, which would imply sininity ascribed directly to John, as written by him in Asia at the very end of the 1st century. This acceptance included districts as far apart as Syria and Gaul, Alexandria, Carthage and Palestine, 181; and A.D. 180 have not utterly mistaken on such a point? True, the early Christians were 'uncritical' in the modern sense of the word criticism. But they were not disposed lightly to accept alleged Apostolic writings as genuine. On the other hand, the inquiry into their authenticity was usually close and careful. A period of fifty years is short when we remember how generations overlap one another, and how carefully traditions on the most sacred subjects are guarded. It is possible that on such salient questions as the residence of the Apostle John for twenty years in Asia, and the composition of one of the four authoritative Gospels, any such concrete conclusion could have arisen so early. At least the prima facie external evidence is so far in favour of Johannine authorship that it must stand accepted, unless very serious objections to it can be shown in some more satisfactory account of the origin of the Gospel can be suggested.

2. Internal Evidence.—The first point to be noted under this head is that the book makes a direct claim to have been written by an eyewitness, and indirectly points to the Apostle John as its author. The phrase 'We beheld his glory' (116) is not decisive, though, taken in connexion with 1 Jn 1:4, if the Epistle be genuine, the claims that the whole church is in John have taken. There can be no question concerning the general meaning of 19th, though its detailed exegesis presents difficulties. The verse might be paraphrased, 'He that hath seen hath known, and his knowledge is genuine and real; and he knoweth that he speaketh things that are true, so that ye also may believe.' No one reading this can question that the writer of the narrative of the Crucifixion claims to have been present and to be recording what he saw with his own eyes. A peculiarity is used in 'he knoweth,' and Sunday, E. A. Abbott, and others would interpret the word emphatically, of Christ; but its use is probably due to the fact that the writer is speaking of himself in the third person, and emphasizing his own personal testimony. Parallel instances from classical and modern writers have been adduced. In 21st further corroboration is given of the accuracy of the events and the author of the narrative. It appears, however, to have been added to the Gospel by others. 'We know that his witness is true' is probably intended as an endorsement on the part of certain Ephesian elders, whilst the 'I suppose' of v. 36 may indicate yet another hand. In addition to these more or less explicit testimonies, notes are freely introduced throughout the Gospel which could proceed only from one who was a member of the innermost circle of Christ's disciples, though the writer never mentions his own name. Instead, he alludes to 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' in such a way that by a process of exhaustion it may be proved from chs. 20 and 21 that John was intended. It can hardly be questioned that the writer deliberately but unmistakably claims to be that disciple himself. An ordinary pseudonymous writer does not proceed in this fashion. The authority of an honoured name is sometimes claimed by an unknown author, as in the Ascension of Isaiah and the Apocalypse of Baruch, not fraudulently, but as a literary device to give character to his theme. In this case, however, the indirect suggestion of authorship either must indicate that the Apostle wrote the book, modestly veiling his own identity, or else it points to an unwarrantable pretension on the part of a later writer, who threw his own ideas into the form of an apparently genuine work. Some modern critics do not shrink from this last hypothesis; but it surely implies a misleading misrepresentation of facts incredible under the circumstances. A third theory, that the book was written on the part of one of John's own disciples, will be discussed later.

Does the Gospel, then, as a whole bear out this claim, directly or Indirectly made? Is it such a book as may have proceeded from one who ranked amongst the foremost figures in the sacred drama of whom Jesus of Nazareth was the august centre? The answer cannot be given in a word. Many features of the Gospel strongly support such a claim. Putting aside for the moment spiritual teachings, its minute knowledge of details which could have come only from an eye-witness who was intimately acquainted not only with the places and scenes, but with the events, and is also the more remarkable when compared with the Synoptics, it is difficult to challenge the book's authenticity. No artistic imagination could have enabled an Ephesian Christian of the 2nd cent. either to insert the minute topographical and other touches which bespeak the mind of an eye-witness, or to do incidently like those in chs. 4 and 9, bearing a verisimilitude which commands them at once to the reader. On the other hand, there is so much in the Gospel which implies a point of view entirely different from that of Christ's contemporaries, and there are so many divergences from the Synoptics in the description of our Lord's ministry—as regards time, place, the manner of Christ's teaching, and particular incidents recorded—as render it possible to ascribe it to the son of Zebedee without a full explanation of serious difficulties and discrepancies. But for these two diverse aspects of the same document, well have we no Johannine problem.' It will be well to take the two in order, and see if they can be reconciled.

It has been usual to arrange the evidence in narrow circles; to show that the author must have been a Jew, a Palestinian, an eye-witness, one of the Twelve, and lastly the Apostle John. It is possible, however, to array here all the proofs available. It must suffice to say that a close familiarity with Jewish customs and observances, such as could not have been possessed by an Ephesian in A.D. 150, is shown in the account of the Feast of Tabernacles (ch. 7), the Dedication (10th), Jews and Samaritans (41st), conversation with women in public (49th), ceremonial pollution (18th), and other phenomena in itself, is a unique demonstration of great weight. The numerous references to the Messianic hope in chs. 1, 4, 7, 8. and indeed throughout the Gospel, indicate one who was thoroughly acquainted with Jewish views and expectations. Familiarity with the Jewish Scriptures and a free but reverent use of them are apparent throughout. The places mentioned are not such as a stranger would or could have introduced into an imaginary narrative. As examples we may mention Bethany beyond Jordan (19th), Gedera (24th), Ephraim (114th), the treasury (53th), the pool of Siloam (99), Solomon's porch (10th), the Kidron (18th). It is true that difficulties have been raised with regard to some of these, e.g. Sychar (49); but recent exploration has in several instances confirmed the writer's accuracy. Again, the habit of the writer is to specify details of time, place, and number which must either indicate exceptional first-hand knowledge, or have been gratuitously inserted by one who wished to convey an impression of 'local colour.' The very hour of the day at which events happened is noted in 1st 40th 19th; or the early morning' is mentioned, as in 18th 20th 21st; or the night, as in 3rd 13th. The specification of six water-pots (29), and twenty furlongs (60th), two hundred cubits (21st), and the hundred and fifty-three fishes (21st), is a further illustration.
either of an old man's exact reminiscences of events long past or of a late writer's pretended acquaintance with precise details.

The portraiture of persons and incidents characteristic of the Gospel is not graphic. The pictures are so graphic, and the effect is produced by so few strokes, often unexpected, that it must be ascribed either to an eye-witness or to a writer of altogether exceptional genius. His conversations recorded, the scene of foot-washing, the representation of the Samaritan woman, of the man born blind, the portraiture of Peter, of Pilate, of the priests and the multitude, the questionings, all the revolution of secret motives and fears, the interpretations of Christ's hidden meanings and difficult sayings—may be an abstract possibility, have been invented. But if they were not—and it is hard to understand how a writer who lays so much stress upon truth could bring himself to such a perversion of it—then the author of the Gospel must have moved close to the very centre of the sacred events he describes. In many cases it is not fair to present such a dilemma as this. The use of the imagination in literature is often not only permissible, but laudable. It is quite conceivable that a Jew of the 2nd cent. before Christ might use the name of Solomon, or the author of the Cohortes in the Septuagint, or the name of a secular person, or the name of a daughter of a Roman senator, or a romance, without any idea of deception in his own mind or in that of his readers. But the kind of narrative contained in the Fourth Gospel, if it be not genuinely and substantially historical, in which such an attempt to produce a false impression of first-hand knowledge becomes seriously misleading. The impossibility of conceiving a writer possessed of both the power and the will thus deliberately to alter the facts, to form an important link in the chain of argument. The historical additions to the canonical Gospels are extraneous, and their style is well known. They present a marked difference from the characteristic features of the document before us. The name of John is never once mentioned in the Gospel, though the writer claims to be intimately acquainted with all the chief figures of the Gospel history. As a deliberate self-suppression this can be understood, but as an attempt on the part of a writer a century afterwards to pose as 'the beloved disciple,' a prominent figure in elaborate descriptions of entirely imaginary scenes, it is unparalleled in literature and incredible in a religious historian.

A volume might well be filled with an examination of the special features of the portrayal of Christ Himself. Even the most superficial reader must have noticed the remarkable combination of lowliness with sublimity, of superhuman dignity with human infirmities and limitations, which characterizes the Fourth Gospel. It is in its fidelity to the Son's human nature. Christ's human nature, by the well and His thirst upon the Cross, of the personal affection of Jesus for the family at Bethany, and His tender care of His mother in the hours of His last agony. But it is in the same record that the characteristic 'glory' of His miracles is most fully brought out; in it the loftiest claims are made not only for the Master by a disciple, but by the Lord for Himself—as the Light of the World, the Bread from Heaven, the only true Shepherd of men, Himself the Resurrection and the Life. He is saluted not only by Mary as Rabbouni, but by Thomas as 'My Lord and my God.' The writer claims an exceptional and intimate knowledge of Christ. He tells us what He felt, as in 11:4-5 and 13:1; the reasons for His actions, as in 6; he is bold to describe the Lord's secret thoughts and purposes (10:22; 15:19). The Prologue of a Gospel which describes the humanity of the Son of Man, He is set forth as the only Son of God, the Word made flesh, the Word who in the beginning was with God and was God, Creator and Sustainer of all that is. This marked characteristic of the Gospel has indeed been made a ground of objection to it. We cannot concede, it is said, that one who had moved in the circle of the Immediate companions of Jesus of Nazareth could have spoken of Him in this fashion. The style of the Fourth Gospel, if it is actually presented? If its form will be an entirely incredible picture, an extravagant attempt to portray a moral and spiritual prodigy or monstrosity, an impossible combination of the human and the Divine, then we may well suppose that human imagination has been at work. But if a uniquely impressive Image is set forth in these pages, which has commanded the homage of saints and scholars for centuries, and won that of millions of those simple souls to whom the highest spiritual truths are so often revealed, then it may be surmised that the Fourth Gospel is not due to the fancy of an unknown artist of genius in the 2nd cent., but it is due to one who reflected, as in a mirror, from a living reality the splendour of Him who was 'the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.'

3. Scope of the Gospel and its Structure.—It cannot be denied that there are grave difficulties in the way of our accepting the conclusion to which we are irresistibly led by the above arguments. Some of these were felt as early as the 2nd and 3rd cents., and have always been felt, more or less, by men of the scholarly and devotional classes. Others have been more clearly brought out by the controversy concerning the genuineness of the Gospel which has been waged through the first half-century. It is a kind of dilemma to try to answer the question, How does this Gospel, if written by the Apostle John, stand related to the other three, how can the obvious discrepancies be reconciled, and how can the writer's object and method and point of view account for the unique character of the narrative he has presented?

It is clear, to begin with, that the plan of the Fourth Gospel differs essentially from the Three. The writer himself makes this plain in his own account of his book (20:30 ff.). He did not undertake to write a biography of Christ, even in the limited sense in which that may be said of Matthew, Mark, and Luke; he selected certain significant parts and aspects of Christ's work, for the purpose of winning or conserving faith in Him, presumably under special difficulties or dangers. We are therefore prepared for a certain difference in the very framework and structure of the book, and this we assuredly find.

The Fourth Gospel opens with an introduction to which there is no parallel in the NT. The circumstances of Christ's birth and childhood, His baptism and temptation, are entirely passed by. His relation to John the Baptist is dealt with from a later, doctrinal point of view, rather than from that of the chronicle describing events in their historical development. Only typical incidents from the ministry are selected, and only such aspects of these as lend themselves to didactic treatment. It will be convenient here to give a brief outline of the plan and contents of the Gospel.

PART I: 11:12th. Christ's manifestation of Himself in a Ministry of Life and Love.

1. The proclamations of the Huts. 2. The testimony of the Baptist, of His works, and of His disciples. 3. The beginnings of faith and unbelief, 11-12. 4. The period of Controversy and Conflict. Christ's vindication of Himself against adversaries, partly in discourse, partly in miracle-works, 11-12th.

PART II: 11-20th. Christ's manifestation of Himself in Suffering, in Death, and in Victory over Death. 1. His last acts, discourse and miracles, 11-17th. 2. His betrayal, trial, death, and burial, 18-19th. 3. His Resurrection and Appearance to His disciples, ch. 20.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

The following are some detailed differences of importance. The exact duration of Christ's ministry cannot be determined either by the Synoptic narratives or by St. John's; but it would appear that in the former it might be compressed within the course of one year, whereas in the latter its mention of Passovers and Festivals would require more than three. Again, the Synoptic Gospels describe a ministry exercised almost entirely within Galilee, the closing scenes in Jerusalem; St. John has little to say of Galilee, but he does mention an important visit to Samaria, and narrates at length events and controversies in Jerusalem of which the other Evangelists say nothing. On these points, however, it may be remarked that none of the Gospel's professed to be complete; that an exact chronological outline can with difficulty be constructed from any of them; and that each gives passing hints of events of which the writer had cognisance, though it does not come within his purpose to describe them.

Minute difficulties of detail cannot be discussed here. But the difference between the Synoptists and St. John with regard to the date of the Last Supper and Christ's death has a special importance of its own. The first three Gospels present Jesus as partaking of the regular Passover with His disciples, and as being crucified on the 15th of Nisan; St. John describes the Last Supper as on the day of unleavened bread, and the crucifixion as taking place on the 14th Nisan, the great day of the Passover. Various modes of reconciliation have been proposed, turning upon the question of the sequence of the Passover, the Jewish mode of reckoning days from sunset to sunset. It has been further suggested that the term 'Passover' was applied by the Synoptists to some other event of the week, the Passover being offered on the first Paschal day immediately after the morning service. The explanations offered of the difference are ingenious, and no one of them can be correct. But it can hardly be said that any has commanded general acceptance among critics, and meanwhile the difficulty remains. It must not be supposed, however, that this necessarily implies an error on the part of the Fourth Gospel. Many critics contend earnestly that St. John has retold the tradition that the Johannine and the Passover Suffering of the Jews of the Synoptists, which has been considered an impossible one. At any rate, it is now certainly conceded that the two are not irreconcilable; that the Fourth Gospel uses the same somewhat peculiar style, whether he is reporting Christ's words or adding his own comments, and that it is sometimes difficult to tell which of the two. In doctrine also, it is contended, there are irreconcilable differences between the Three Evangelists and the Fourth. Judgment is viewed by the Synoptists as a great eschatological event in the future, but by St. John as a present spiritual fact accomplished even whilst Christ was on earth. It is said, further, that Gnostic and other heresies of various kinds belonging to the 2nd cent. are alluded to in the Gospel, and that the authentic Johannine author is not the same as the author of the Fourth. Last, but by no means least, the use of the word Logos to describe the Eternal Word, and the doctrines associated with the name that are found in the Prologue, point, it is said, conclusively to an Alexandrian origin, and are practically irreconcilable with the authorship of the son of Zebedee.

An adequate solution of these acknowledged difficulties can be found only in a full consideration of the circumstances under which, and the objects for which, the Gospel was written. It is an essential part of the hypothesis of Johannine authorship that the book was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. Dr. Hort, in his 'Prolegomena,' implies that the 'Johannine Paper' was written by the 'Apostle' to the Ephesians, a community where Christianity had been established for nearly half a century. Such an interval, at such a rapidly advancing period of Christian history, demanded changes of a deep and far-reaching kind. At any rate, it may be said that the Johannine author could not have written any changes to the Gospel that were in any way advanced Christology—that is to say, a fuller development of the doctrines implied in the fundamental Christian belief that 'God was in Christ,' and that Christ was 'the Son of the living God'—was to be expected. The bearing of this truth upon current religious ideas among both Jews and Gentiles became more clearly seen in every succeeding decade. No writer, be he aged Apostle or Ephesian elder, could write in A.D. 100 as he would have written fifty years before. The very point of view from which the wonderful Life of lives was considered and estimated had changed. With it had changed also the proportionate importance of the details of that life and work. The central figure was the same. His words and deeds remained, indelibly imprinted upon the mind of one who had lived 'when there was mid-sea and the mighty mountains.' But if an artist at the same time knew his work and is true to the realities he paints, his perspective changes, the lights and shadows of his picture alter, and the relative size of objects depicted is altered, when a new point of view is taken up.
If the Apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel at all, it must have been composed under these conditions, as a tradition asserts that it was. The tradition declares that it was written under pressure from without, that it presupposed the first three Gospels, and was not intended to cover the ground occupied by them. Yet it was 'a spiritual Gospel—perhaps the only other way of saying what the author himself has told us, that he recorded some among the many signs that Jesus did, viewed from the side of a Divine mission and purpose,' that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life through his name' (Jn 20:31). Omissions and additions, therefore, such as are obvious in a comparison between this Synoptic, the Fourth, and the Fourth Gospels, are arguments against the authenticity of the latter. Neither can a more completely developed doctrine of the Person of Christ, nor a somewhat altered representation of His words and works, be accounted for, nor are the modifications observable in the latest narrative of all, written after a long time, under altered conditions, and from a different point of view, imply an incompatibility so marked of one narrative referred to an eye-witness and an Apostle. All the Gospels are confessedly fragmentary, and if one of the Twelve was induced after the lapse of nearly two generations to supplement the Christ's life already in existence, and to present a selection of his own reminiscences for the purpose of inducing and maintaining Christian faith, quite as large a measure of difference in the narrative as that sketched in a previous paragraph may justly be expected. Some of these discrepancies have been exaggerated. For example, the mode of speaking of 'the Jews' in the Fourth Gospel is prepared for by the expressions found in Mt 23:1-3; Mk 7:1, Lk 7:33; and 23:8. Indeed, every habit of thinking and describing the members of a nation which had so steadily set itself against Christ and His followers as to have become the very embodiment of virulent opposition to Christianity was inevitable. Again, it is undeniable that, as St. John from his later point of view discerned not only the glory that should come after the shame and the death of the Saviour, but the glory that was implied in His suffering and death on behalf of the world, as he described not only the final judgment that was to come at the end of all things, but the present judging, searching, siftiug power of Christ's words and presence in the world as the Synoptists do not. His point of view in this and in other respects is confessedly more 'spiritual.' But he is not unmindful of that aspect of judgment which predominates in the Synoptics. In nearly every two points of estimating and describing the very definite reference is made to a final judgment as an eschatological event. If it is true, as we read in 12, that 'now is the judgment of this world,' the same chapter reminds us that 'the world has not judged him.' St. John's words will judge men 'in the last day.' There is no contradiction, except for shallow interpreters, between the statements that the Kingdom of God is already come, and that its coming must be waited for with patience, perhaps during a long period. A believer 'in judgment' already accomplished is so far prepared for the confident expectation of a final judgment at the end of the ages.

But the examination of details necessarily lies outside the scope of the present article. The only further point which can be noticed here concerns the style and diction of the Fourth Gospel, and the contrast observable between the discourses of Jesus as reported in it and in the three Synoptics. So marked a difference in this respect does obtain, that an upholder of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel must be prepared to admit that the aged Apostle wrote as he did not through a medium of his own, and casts his record into a shape moulded by the habit and working of his own mind. The personal stamp of the writer is very strongly impressed upon his material. Inspiration is quite consistent with marked individuality in the prophet's character and writings, and the highest kind of inspiration is included from this. An adherence of the chronicler who regards himself as a mere recording pen is one thing, the truth of the artist or historian who passes all that he knows through the alchemic of his own vision and style is another. And this is the form of the narrative, St. John, if he be the writer, must have allowed himself freedom to present his record in a mould determined by the later working of his own mind and the circumstances of the times in which he lived. He presents us not with an exact photograph—though traces of the photography of memory are fairly abundant—but with a free and true picture of the life of Him w hose was as is the life of the World. Such freedom, however, is not really misleading. A measure of translation, of re-statement and reproduction, was necessary from the very nature of the case. Harman of the NT general in the Greek language lies upon these writings only like a diaphanous veil, and it requires hardly any effort to retranslate their contents into Hebrew or Aramaic. Such slight, but easily pene-trable, and partial, though not total, moses, is therefore not to be considered as severe on the text or the translation, necessarily rests over the four narratives of our Lord's life and ministry which have been handed down through different media and under different conditions. The argument here briefly sketched out goes to show that the Fourth Gospel contains no representation of the Person, words, or works of Christ incompatible or seriously inconsistent with those of the Synoptics, and that at the same time it bears the indubitable marks of a sacred individuality of its own.

4. Alternative theories.—A considerable number of eminent scholars of the last two generations have not been satisfied by the line of argument indicated above, and they decline to accept not only the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel, but also its historical trustworthiness. It is easy to understand that considerations which would strongly appeal to Christian believers might have small weight with those who rely upon the supernatural, and cannot admit the evidence of an alleged eye-witness of the raising of Lazarus, and who profess to be able to trace the growth of the legend which transformed the mere local testimony of the Word of God Incarnate. For them the document we are examining is an ideal composition of the 2nd cent., of no greater historical value than the Gospel of Nico-

John, Gospel of

The document in question is a section of the New Testament, specifically the Gospel of John. It discusses the authorship and dating of the Gospel. The text notes that the Gospel of John is considered the most distinctive among the four Gospels and is often seen as the most independent. It also comments on the historical context and the possible authorship, mentioning figures such as John the Apostle, John the Evangelist, and Eusebius. The text further explores theories about the Gospel's sources and dating, discussing the work of scholars and the historical significance of the text. The section is a detailed examination of the Gospel's composition and its place within the New Testament canon.
JOHN, EPISTLES OF

In style and diction indicate a connexion between them, but their internal character and the external evidence in their favour are so different that it will be convenient to deal with them separately.

1. EPISTLE I. AUTHORSHIP, GENUINENESS, ETC.—The Epistle ranked from the first among the Homologoumena, and the testimony in favour of its authenticity is early, varied, and explicit. Its great similarity to the Fourth Gospel in phraseology and general characteristics made it natural to attribute the two documents to the same author; and few questions, or none, were raised upon the subject till comparatively recent years. A very small number of eminent critics at present dispute the identity of authorship.

(1) So far as external evidence is concerned, Polycarp, writing about A.D. 115 to the Philippian, quotes the words, For whatsoever does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is an antichrist, with evident allusion to 1 Jn 4, though the author is not named. Polycarp was a disciple of John, as his own disciple Irenaeus informs us. Eusebius several times refers to the Epistle, saying that Papias used it (v. 20) that Papias made use of it. The passages 1 Jn 2 and 3 are expressly attributed by Irenaeus to the Apostle. According to the Marcionist Canon, the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle closely resemble, and one might wonder that John makes so many references to the Fourth Gospel in his Epistle, saying of himself—and then follows a quotation of 1 Jn 1. Clement of Alexandria, on the other hand, quotes from a very early Christian author, some of the words of John in his larger Epistle. Tertullian quotes the language of 1 as that of the Apostle John, and Origen definitely refers the words of 3 to John in his Gnomon Epistle. All the ancient versions include the Epistle among those canonically recognized, including the Peshitta and the Old Latin. The only exceptions to this practical universal recognition of its genuineness and authenticity are the unbelievers vaguely called Alogi, because they rejected the doctrine of the Logos, and Marcion, who accepted no books of NT except St. Luke's Gospel and St. Paul's Epistles. So far as external testimony is concerned, the early recognition of the Epistle as written by St. John is conclusively established.

(2) The similarity of diction between Gospel and Epistle is so close that it cannot be accidental, and it cannot escape the notice of the most superficial reader. The repeated use, in a characteristic way, of such cardinal words as Life, Love, Truth, Light, and Darkness; the recurrence of phrases which in both documents figure prominently in the teaching of the truth, the words: 'the only begotten Son,' 'the Word,' 'Knowing God,' 'walking in the light,' 'overcoming the world,' and the special use of the word 'believe,' speak for themselves. The condition of literary parallel is here such as never before required care; but in this case the similarity is so close as incontestably to establish a connexion between the two documents, whilst the handling of the same vocabulary is so fine as to be almost imperceptible; but the writer of the Gospel borrowed from the Epistle, or vice versa, but that the two writings proceed from the same hand. If this is so, the genuineness of one is doubly attested.

Jos. Scaliger in the 16th cent. was practically the first to challenge the genuineness of all three Epistles, but not until the time of Baur and the Tübingen school did opinion in the last century was a sustained attack made upon them. Since that time there have never been wanting critics who have denied the Johannine authorship of the First Epistle. Some contend that Gospel and Epistle proceed from the same author, who, however, was not John. Presbyter or some other writer. The view taken by Holtzmann, Schmiedel, and some others is that the two documents come from different writers who belong to the same general school of thought.

The three Epistles known by this name have from the beginning been attributed to the Apostle John, and were admitted as canonical in the 3rd cent. Some points of obvious similarity...
JOHN, EPISTLES OF

The chief ground of the objections raised against the Johannine authorship of the First Epistle is the alleged presence of references to heretical modes of thought which belong to a later age. Docetism, Gnosticism, and even Montanism are, it is said, directly or indirectly rebuked, and these forms of heresy do not belong to the Apostolic period. The reply is threefold. (a) Those who ascribe the Epistle to John the Apostle do not date it before the last decade of the 1st cent., when the Apostle was passing into the latter years of life. No references to full-grown Gnosticism and other errors as they were known in the middle of the 2nd cent. can here be found. But (c) it can be shown from other sources that the germ of these heresies, the general tendencies which resulted afterwards in fully developed systems, existed in the Church for at least a generation before the period in question, and at the time named were both rife and mischievous.

The points chiefly insisted on are: the doctrine of the Logos; the form of the rebuke given to the antichrists; the references to 'knowledge' and 'anointing'; the insistence upon the coming of Christ to the flesh, in condemnation of Docetic error; the distinction between mortal and venial sins; and some minor objections. In reply to (a) it is shown that these are definite enough to require a later date than A.D. 100. The Epistle is indeed indirectly polemic in its character. While constructing his argument, the passages given to opponents of the truth are strong enough to make it clear that the opposition was active and dangerous. But it is true that many of those condemned as enemies of Christ had more fully developed tendencies than is evident here. Gnosticism is not known to have marked itself in Christology at the end of the 1st century. Judaizing Gnosticism had appeared much earlier than this, as evidenced by the Epistles to the Colossians and the Pastoral Epistles. The use of the words 'Paraclete' (2) and 'propitiation' (25), and the way in which the coming of Christ is mentioned in 208, have also been brought forward as proofs of divergence from the teaching of the Gospel, on very slender and unconvincing grounds.

2. Place and Date.—Whilst very little evidence is forthcoming to enable us to fix exactly either of these, the general consensus of testimony points very decidedly to Ephesus during the last few years of the 1st century. Irenæus (Adv. Haer. iii. 1) testifies to the production of the Greek by John, during his residence in Asia, and the probability is that the Epistle was written after the Gospel, and is, chronologically perhaps the very latest of the books of the NT. If, as some maintain, it was written before the Gospel, it cannot be supposed much earlier. The determination of this question is bound up with the authorship and date of the Apocalypse,—a subject which is discussed elsewhere. (See REVELATION [Book i.] 39.)

3. Form and Destination.—This document has some of the characteristics of a letter, and in some respects it is more like a theological treatise or homiletic essay. It may best be described as an Encyclical or Pastoral Epistle. It was addressed to a circle of readers, as is shown by the words, 'I write unto you,' 'beloved,' and 'little children,' but it was not restricted to any particular church, nor does it contain any specific personal messages. The term 'catholic epistle' was used from very early times to indicate this form of composition, but in all probability the churches of Asia Minor were kept more especially in view by the writer when he penned these words, which were in any respect addressed for the Church of Christ at large. A reference in Augustine to 33 as taken from John's Epistle to the Parthians' has given rise to much conjecture, but the title has seldom been taken seriously in its literal signifying. It is quite possible that there is some mistake in the text of the passage (Quast, Evang. ii. 39).

4. Outline and Contents.—Whether Gospel or Epistle was written first, the relation between the two is perfect. In both the Apocalypse, John writes for the imagination, but in the Gospel the foundations of Christian faith and doctrine are shown to lie in history; in the Epistle the effects of belief are traced out in practice. In both the same great central truths are exhibited, in the same form and almost in the same words; but in the Gospel they are traced to their fount and origin; in the Epistle they are followed out to their only legitimate issues in the spirit and conduct of Christians in every age. So far as there is a difference in the presentation of truth, it may perhaps be expressed in Bishop Westcott's words: 'The theme of the Epistle is, the Christ is Jesus; the theme of the Apocalypse, Jesus is the Christ.' Or, as he says in another place: 'The substance of the Gospel is a commentary on the Epistle: the Epistle is (so to speak) the condensed moral and practical application of the Gospel.'

The style is simple, but baffling in its very simplicity. The sentences are easy for a child to read, their meaning is difficult for a wise man fully to analyze. So with the sequence of thought. Each statement follows very naturally upon the preceding, but when the re-arrangement of paragraphs is to be explained, and the plan or structure of the whole composition is to be described, systematization becomes difficult, if not impossible. Logical analysis is not, however, the best mode of exposition, and if the writer has not consciously mapped out into exact subdivisions the ground he covers, he follows out to their issues two or three leading thoughts which he keeps constantly in view. The whole theme is fellowship with the Father and the Son, realized in love of the brethren. Farrar divides the whole into three sections, with the headings, 'God is light,' 'God is love,' 'God is truth.' Plummer reduces these to two, omitting the second. With some such general clue to guide him, the reader will not go far astray in interpreting the thought of the Epistle, and its outline might be arranged as follows:—

Introduction: The life of fellowship that issues from knowledge of the gospel (1-5).
1. God is Light. The believer's walk with God in light (5-12): sin and its remedy (13-14); the life of obedience (15-17); fidelity amidst delusion (18-19).
3. Conclusion: The assured enjoyment of Life Eternal (32-33).

Such an outline is not, however, a sufficient guide to the thought, and a very different arrangement might be justified. The writer does not, however, as has been asserted, 'ramble without method,' nor is the Epistle a 'shapeless mass. The progress discernible in it is not the straightforward march of the logician who proceeds by ordered steps from premises to a foreseen conclusion: it is rather the ascent by spiral curves of the meditative thinker. St. John is here no dreamer; more practical instruction is to be found in St. Paul or St. James. But his exhortations do not enter into details: he is concerned with principles of conduct, the minute application of which he leaves to the individual conscience. The exunciation of principles, however, is uncompromising and very searching. His standpoint is that of the ideal Christian life: not of the effort to attain it. One who is born of God 'cannot sin'; the 'love of God is perfected' in the believer, and perfect love casts out fear. The Epistle allows no room for doubt or hesitation or conflict. One who is guided by its teaching has no need to pray, 'Help thou my unbelief.' The spirit of truth and the spirit of error are in sharp antagonism, and the touchstone which distinguishes them must be resolutely applied. The 'world,' the 'evil one,' and 'antichrist' are to be repelled absolutely and to the uttermost; the writer and those whom he loves say, 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one.' Bright light casts deep shadows, and the true Christian of this Epistle walks in the blaze of gospel day. One who knows the true God and has eternal life cannot but "guard himself from idols."

The writer of such an Epistle is appropriately called the Apostle of love. Yet the title taken by itself is misleading. He is the Apostle equally of righteousness and of faith. He 'loved well' because he hated—hated the wickedness which hinders loving.' There is a stern ring, implying however no harshness, about the very exhortations to love, which shows how indissolubly it is to be identified with immutable and inviolable righteousness. If to this Epistle we owe the great utterance, 'God is love'—here twice repeated, but found nowhere else in Scripture—to it we owe also the sublime declaration, "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." And the Epistle, as well as the Gospel, makes it abundantly clear that the spring of Christ's love and the primary essential of Christianity is love.

3. Evils of the Epistle.—The Epistle shows less unity of design than either of the two previous. In it are developed the ideas of the weakness of faith, the power of the devil, and the necessity of constant watchfulness. It is an epistle of comfort, regulating a soul's conflict with itself and with God. The writer was the Apostle of faith, and the Epistle is a faithfulness to the name he bore. It is written in the form of an exhortation, warning, and comfort, and is written with the view of assuring its readers of the power of the Holy Spirit to maintain them in their momentary weakness and to comfort them in the difficulties of life.

Textual questions can hardly be touched upon in this context. With pointing out that where the corrected text restores the latter half of 239, which in AV is printed in italics as doubtful, there can now be no doubt of the reading of the Vulgate, referring to the three witnesses in heaven, as read in AV, does not form part of the Epistle. The words are wanting in all Greek and Latin except a few of exceptionally late date; nor are they found in the majoritv of the Greek Fathers, or in any ancient version except the Latin and undoubted form is given which found its way into the text from Latin sources; and the insertion really breaks the connexion of thought in the paragraph.

II. The Second Epistle.—The Second and Third Epistles of St. John are distinguished from the First by their brevity, the absence of dogmatic teaching, and their private and personal character. They are found among the Antilegomena of the early Church in their relation to the Canon: apparently not because they were unknown, or because their authorship was questioned, but because their nature made them unsuitable for use in the public worship of the Church. The Muratorian Canon (A.D. 180) refers to two Epistles of John as received in the Catholic Church. And Irenæus about the same date specifically quotes 2 Jn 1st, as coming from 'John the disciple of the Lord.' He also quotes v. 1, apparently as occurring in the primitive Epistles of the Church of Alexandria by a mention of John's 'larger Epistle' shows that he was acquainted with at least one other shorter letter. Origen states that the two shorter letters were quoted by all as genuine, although the second, or 'the presbytery and they are omitted from the Peschitta Version, and Eusebius describes them as disputed by some but in the later 4th cent. they were fully acknowledged and received into the Canon. The Second Epistle, therefore, though not universally accepted from the first, was widely recognized as authentic. The letter of St. John, the 'Elder' does not militate against this, but rather supports it. No ordinary presbyter would assume the style of the elder and write in such a tone of absolute confidence. It is written in an anonymous way; wishing to give the sanction of the Apostle, would have inserted his name. But no motive for anything like forgery can in this case be alleged. The similarity in style to the First Epistle is very marked. Jerome among the Fathers, Erasmus at the time of the Reformations, and many modern critics have ascribed the Epistle to 'John the Presbyter' or Ephesus, but there is no early reference to such a person except the statement of Papias quoted by Eusebius and referred to in a previous article.

Much discussion has arisen concerning the person addressed. The two leading opinions are (1) that the words 'elect lady and her children' are to be understood literally of a Christian matron in Ephesus and that a church personified, with its constituent members, was intended. Jerome in ancient times took the latter view, and in our own day it has been supported by scholars so different from one another as Lightfoot, Wordsworth, Hillenfeld, and Schmiedel. It is claimed on this side that the exhortations given are more suited to a community, that the 'children of thine elect sister' can be understood only of a sister church, and that this mode of describing a church personified is not unusual, as in 1 P 2:19, 'She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you.' On the other hand, it is urged that this mystical interpretation destroys the simplicity and natural meaning of the letter (see especially vv. 1-19), that the church being constituted of members, the distinction between 'the lady' and the children would disappear, and that if a lady were the private person in the description the parallel would be broken and the form of salutation to another private Epistle in the Third Epistle is out of place. Another hypothesis still leaves difficulty in the exact interpretation of the words Ekklesia Kyrie. Some would take it as a polite name for a Christian, as others take the former as her name, so that she would be 'the lady Ekklesi,' others would render 'to the elect Kyrie,' while the majority accept, in spite of its indefiniteness, the translation of AV and RV. On the whole, this course is to be preferred, though the view that a church is intended not only is tenable but has much in its favour. The fact that the early churches so often gathered in a house, and that there was so strong a personal and individual element in their community-life makes it natural that the primitive church and a large and influential family should be very close. Thus an ambiguity may arise which would not be possible to-day.

It remains only to say that, in style, so in spirit, the similarity to 1 Jn. is very noticeable. The same emphasis is laid on love, on obedience, on fellowship with the Father and the Son, and the inestimable importance of maintaining and abiding in the truth. The same strong presentiment is manifest against deceivers and the antichrist, and the same intensity of feeling against unbelievers or false teachers, who are not to be received into the house of a believer or to have any mention in his home, is evident in both. But there is a frankness in the Second Epistle which was not as evident in the First. It contains wholesome and uncompromising, not harsh and intolerant, exhortation, such as Christian Churches in all ages may not unprofitably lay to heart. It appears to have been addressed at least as early as the time of Dionysius of Alexandria, and they are mentioned together by Irenæus (Hyp. 25), who refers to the Epistles 'called the second and third of John, whether they belong to the Evangelist or to another person of the same name.' They are found together in the Old Latin Version, are both omitted from the Peschitta, and they were included in the lists of canonical books at the end of the 4th cent. by the Council of Laodicea and the Third Council of Carthage. References to the Third Epistle and quotations from it are very few. It contains a warning written to a private person, it does not discuss doctrine, and its counsels and messages are almost entirely personal. But its close relationship to the Second Epistle is very obvious, and the two form together a very valuable picture of value from the point of view of history; and St. John's Third Epistle, like St. Paul's personal letter to Philemon, is not without use for general edification.

The person to whom it is addressed is quite unknown. The name Caius (Lat. Caius) is very common, and three other persons so called are mentioned in NT, viz., Caius of Corinth (1 Co 16:17); Caius of Asia (Ac 20:1); and Caius of Macedonia (Ac 19:29). A bishop of Pergamum, appointed by the Apostle John and mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions, was also called Caius, and some critics disposed to identify him with St. John's correspondent. This is, however, a mere conjecture, and the letter is addressed, not to a church official, but to a private layman, apparently of some wealth and influence. It is written in a free and natural style, and deals with the case of some of those travelling evangelists who figured so prominently in the primitive Church, and to whom reference is made in the Didache and elsewhere. Some of these, perhaps commissioned by John himself, had visited the Church to which Caius belonged, had been hospitably entertained, and had helped forward on their journey, probably with material assistance. But Didymus—an official of the church, perhaps its 'bishop' or a leading elder—who loved power, asserted himself arrogantly, and was disposed to resist the Apostle's authority. He declined to receive these worthy men who at their own charges were approaching the gospel in the districts, and he also stirred up feeling against them, and at least threatened to excommunicate any members of the church who entertained them. The example of Didymus is the real example of those contemporaneous, according to its author, who seems to have given Caius some support. It is evident from the good praiseworthy conduct of the eponymous Demetrius, who, with Caius, was addressed in a personal note, that the former was no false accuser; for the Church was excellent, who had won the confidence of the Apostle, and—higher commendation still—had 'the witness of the truth itself.' Didymus was the most搜索 for all the following: the best available English translation, according to its younger readers, was that of John's character rang true. Full information is not given as to all the circumstances of the case. Probably Didymus was not wholly to be blamed. It was not unusual, as it was necessary, as the Didache shows, to beware carefully into the character of these itinerant preachers. Some of them were mercenary in their aims, and the conflict of opinion in this instance may have had some connexion with the current controversy between Jewish and Gentile Christians. But it is the spirit of Didymus that is blameworthy, and the little picture here drawn of primitive ecclesiastical communities with their rules and their excellences, is worth reading and studying. We have no information as to the time at which, or the places from and to which, these brief letters were written. They rank, with the Gospel and the First Epistle of St. John, as among the latest documents in the NT.

JOHN, THEOLOGY OF.—It is the object of this article to give a brief account of St. John's teaching as contained in his Gospel and Epistles. Without prejudging in any way the authorship of the Apocalypse, it will be more convenient that the doctrine of that book should be considered separately. Enough if it be said here that, despite the obvious and striking difference in the form and style of the book, the underlying similarities between it and those to be now considered are by no means unimportant. Careful study, not blinded by the symbolism and other peculiarities of the Revelation, who have concentrated attention upon its main ideas and principles, have come to the conclusion that if it did not proceed from the same pen that wrote the Gospel and Epistles, it belongs to the same school of Christian thought. See Revelation (Book op).

1. Some general characteristics of the teaching of St. John.—(1) It is not in vain that the designation 'the theologian' was given to him, as in the title of the Apocalypse and elsewhere. The word means in this connexion that it was St. John's habit to consider every subject from the point of view of the Divine. Not only is God to him the most real of all beings—that should be true of every religious man—but all the details of his very practical teaching are traced up to their origin in the nature and will of God. The opening of his Gospel (1:1) is viewed firmly as a part of the point of eternity, the life of Jesus is to be narrated not from the point of view of mere human observation, but as a temporal manifestation of eternal realities.—(2) But it must not for a moment be understood that the treatment of human affairs is quite neglected. Indeed, St. John has a firm hold upon the concrete, and his insight into the actual life and needs of men is penetrating and profound. He is not analytical as St. Paul is, nor does he deal with individual virtues and vices as does St. James. But in the unity and simplicity of a few great principles he reaches to the very heart of things. His method is often described as intuitive, contemplative, mystical. The use of these epithets may be justified, but it would be misleading to suppose that a teacher who views life from so high a vantage-ground sees less than others. The higher you climb the more things you see. Those who contrast the spiritual with the practical create a false antithesis. The spiritual teacher, and he alone, can perceive and deal with human nature, the subtle and the absolute, the mystical and the practical, as it really is at its very core.—(3) Only it must not be forgotten that the view thus taken of nature and conduct is ideal, absolute, uncompromising. The moral dualism which is characteristic of St. John is in accordance with the very great moral chasm between light and darkness—good and evil—truth and falsehood—life and death—these are brought into sharp and relentless contrast. Half-tones, delicate distinctions, the subtle and gradual approach, are not to be looked for, the complex working of motives in human life, disappear in the blaze of light which St. John causes to stream in from another world. 'He that is begotten of God is not sin' (1 Jn 3:9); he that 'dwelleth in the Son is not the Father' (1 Jn 5:20); 'we are of God, the whole world lieth in the evil one' (5:18). Such a mode of regarding life is not unreal, if only its point of view be borne in mind. In the drama of human society the sudden introduction of these absolute and irreconcilable principles of judgment would be destructive of distinctions which have an importance of their own, but the forces, as St. John describes them, are actually at work, and the day their fundamental and irreconcilable character will be made plain.—(4) Another feature of St. John's style and method which arrests attention at once is his characteristic use of certain words and phrases: 'witness' (47 times), 'truth,' 'signs,' 'world' (78 times), 'eternal life,' 'know' (55), 'believe' (98), 'glory,' 'judgment,' are but specimens of many. They indicate a unity of thought and system in the writer which finds no precise parallel elsewhere in Scripture, the nearest approach, perhaps, being in the characteristic phraseology of Deuteronomy in the OT. St. John is not systematic in the sense of presenting his readers with carefully-ordered reasoning—a progressive argument compacted by links of logical demonstration. He sees life whole, and presents it as a whole. But all that belongs to human life falls within categories which, from the outset, are very clear and definite to his own mind. The Gospel is carefully constructed as an artistic whole, the First Epistle is not. But all the thoughts in both are presented in a setting prepared by the definite ideas of the writer. The molten metal of Christian thought and teaching has taken shape in the mould of a strikingly individual mind: the crystallization of the ideas is his work, and there is consequently a unity and system about his presentation of them which may be described as distinctly Johannine.
truth he taught was gained direct from the Master, and its form largely so. But in describing the teaching we must not lose sight of the name of the divine Logos.

2. The doctrine of God which underlies these books is as sublime in its lofty monotheism as it is distinctively 'Christian' in its manifestation and unfolding. No word, no phrase as defies interpretation inside the metaphysical, absolute and absoluteness of the only God (Jn 5:24, 'the only true God' (179), whom 'no man hath seen at any time' (181)); yet none more completely recognizes the eternal Sonship of the Son, the filthiness of the Godhead seen in the mind and will of God Himself, giving a personal and historical interpretation to the phrase. The Word, according to the teaching of the Prologue, is Eternal, Divine, the Mediator of Creation, the Light of mankind throughout history; and in the latter days the Word made flesh, tabernacled amongst men, is the Only-Begotten from the Father full of grace and truth.

This cardinal doctrine once laid down, there is no further reference to it in the Gospel, and in the only other places in NT where a similar expression is used (1 Jn 1 and Rev 19:14) it is employed with a difference. Even in the Prologue the conception of the Word is not abstract and philosophical, but when the introduction to the Gospel is finished, the idea never appears again; the narrative of the only Son, revealing for the first time the Father in His essence, proceeds as if no account of the Logos had been given. When the basis of the Gospel story has been laid in a deep doctrine of the Eternal Godhead, the idea has done its work, and in the actual narrative it is discarded accordingly. The Christology which would have been incomplete without his doctrine of the Logos, but is not dependent on this. Christ's unique Personality as Son of God may be fully known from His life on earth, and the Prologue gives to the narrative of His ministry in the flesh a background of history and of eternity. In all ages the Logos was the medium of Divine revelation, as He had been of creation itself, and of the Father. And it was possible in former days of piety and pre-inciperation having been described with sublime brevity, the Evangelist proceeds calmly with the story to which this forms an august introduction.

See also Art. Logos.

4. The Fatherhood of God, and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit.—It is unnecessary to point out how influential the Prologue has been in the history of Christian thought, but it is well to remember also that to St. John more than to any other writer we owe the development of the Christian doctrine of the Godhead, as modified by the above cardinal conceptions. The doctrines of the Fatherhood of God and of the Holy Spirit as a Divine Person do not find their witness in the words of St. John. The Synoptists and St. Paul, not to speak of other NT writers, would furnish a perfectly adequate basis for these vital truths of Christian faith. But neither would have influenced Christian thought so profoundly, and neither would have been so clearly understood, without St. John's teaching and Christ's words as reported by him. The meaning of the term 'Son of God' as applied to Jesus is brought to light by the Fourth Gospel. Without it we might well have failed to gain an adequate conception of Fatherhood and Sonship as eternal elements in the Divine nature, and the unique relationship between the Father and the Son Incarnate is brought out in the fifth and other chapters of the Gospel as nowhere else. So with the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The whole of Scripture bears its testimony. Even in the OT more vividly the Spirit of God than that of the Father; and the teaching of St. Paul and St. Luke is full of instruction. But without the farewell discourses of Christ to His Apostles as recorded in Jn 14-16, our ideas of the Person and office of the Holy Spirit would be comparatively meagre. The very term 'Paradice,' not found outside the Gospel and 1 Ep., is itself a revelation. The personality of the Spirit and His distinctness from the Father and the Son, whilst Himself one with them, are elucidated with great clearness in these chapters. On the other hand, in his Epistle, St. John has much less to say

than St. Paul of the Spirit in relation to the life of the believer.

5. On the subjects of sin and salvation, St. John's teaching harmonizes fully with that of the NT generally, whilst it maintains an individual note of his own, and brings out certain aspects of Christ's teaching as none of the Synoptists does. To him we owe the definition, 'sin is lawlessness' (1 Jn 3:4). He describes sin in such a way as a principle or fund, as the generator of all evil, as the very root of all evil.

The perennail conflict between these is hinted at in the Prologue, and it is terribly manifest alike in the ministry of the Saviour and in the life of the Christian in the world. To St. John's writings, chiefly we owe the idea of the world as a dark and dire enemy,' vague and shadowy in outline, but most formidable in its opposition to the love of the Father and the light of the life of sonship. The shades of meaning which 'world' is employed vary (see 182 191 194. 204 and 1 Jn 2:18). The existence of evil spirits and their connexions with the sin of man are dwelt on by St. John in his own words. He does not dwell on the phenomena of demoniacal possession, but he has much to say of 'the devil' or 'the evil one' as a personal embodiment of the principle and power of evil. Upon his doctrine of Antichrist and 'the sin unto death' we cannot now dwell.

Potential as are the forces of evil, perfect conquest over them may be gained. The victory has already been virtually won by Christ as the all-sufficient Saviour, who has emancipated God as manifested that He might undo or annul the works of the devil (1 Jn 3:8). His object was not to condemn the world, but to save it (3:17). That the Cross of Christ was the centre of His work, and that both in the descent and ascension, and in His body, which was obtained for man, is made abundantly clear from several different points of view. John the Baptist points to the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world (1:28). The world was made manifest to be 'a serpent' like the serpent in the wilderness (3:1), and will draw all men unto Himself (12:32).

He gives His flesh for the life of the world (6:51). Only those who 'eat his flesh' and 'drink his blood' have eternal life (6:56). He is the propitiation for the sins of the world (1 Jn 2:2), and It is His blood that cleanses all sin those who walk in the light and have fellowship with the Father and the Son (1 Jn 1:7). St. John dwells little upon the legal aspects of sin and atonement; his doctrine on these matters is characteristic, confirming, whilst in supplements, the doctrines of St. Paul concerning justification and sanctification. What Paul describes as entire sanctification John electifies as perfect love—two names for the same full salvation, two paths to the same consummate goal.

It is most instructive to compare St. Paul and St. John in their references to faith and love. No student of these two great twin brothers in Christ could decide which of them deserves to be called the Apostle of faith, or which the Apostle of love. St. John uses the word 'faith' only once (1 Jn 5), but the verb 'believe' occurs nearly 200 times in his writings, and his usage of it is more plastic and versatile than that of St. Paul or the writer of Hebrews. Again, if the word 'love' occurs much more frequently in St. John, he has composed no such hymn in its honour as is found in 1 Co 13. The light he exhibits as a simple white ray St. Paul dispenses into all the colours of the rainbow. The shade of meaning in St. John's use of the word 'believe' and his delicate distinction between two Greek words for 'love' deserve careful study.

The true believer in Christ was upon a new life. The nature of this life is fully unfolded in St. John's writings, in terms which show an essential agreement with other parts of NT, but which are at the same time distinctively his own. The doctrine of the New Birth is one example of this. The Gospel gives a full account of the discourse of Christ with Nicodemus on this subject, but both Gospel and Epistle contain many of the Apostle's own statements, which show no slavish imitation in his part either of the words of the Master or of Paul, but present his own vision of his teacher consistently worked out. In the Prologue the contrast between natural birth 'of blood, of the will of the flesh, of the will of man,' and the being spiritually born 'of the Father,' is very marked. Those who have been thus renewed are described as 'having the right to become children of God,' and the condition is the 'receiving' or 'believing on the name of' Him who, as Word of God, had shown, St. John, said, 'the grace used for the most part in Jn 3 and in 1 Jn, is 'begotten again' or ' anew' or 'from above.' The word 'begotten,' not employed thus by other NT writers, lays stress on the primary origin of the new life, not so much on its changed character. Two participles are employed in Greek, one of which emphasizes the initial act, the other the resulting state. But all the passages, including especially 1 Jn 2:24-5, draw a very sharp contrast between the new life which the believer in Christ enjoys and the natural life of the ordinary man. He to whom the new life has been imparted is a new being. It is 'doeth righteousness' and 'does not commit sin,' he cannot sin,' because he has been begotten of God and his seed abideth in him.' Love and knowledge are marks of this new being, and the new life is given to 'whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ.' Some difficulty attaches to the interpretation of the phrase in Jn 5:9, but it is clear from that verse that he who enjoys the new life 'doth not sin,' and that 'the evil one toucheth him not.' The change is mysterious, but very real, and the term used by St. John to indicate this relation—'children,' instead of 'sons' as is usual with St. Paul—lays stress upon the close and intimate personal bond thus created, rather than upon the status or the name. This love emphasizes the vital, not the legal, element; believers are not merely called children, 'such we are' (1 Jn 3:2) and cannot be otherwise. When new life has actually been bestowed, it must manifest its characteristic quality in its changed character.

The nature of the Christian's vital union with God in Christ is illustrated from different points of view. Our Lord's allegory—not parable—of the Vine and the Branches is full of instruction, but no analogy drawn from vegetable life suffices adequately to describe the fellowship between Christ and His disciples; this is rather to be moulded after the pattern of the spiritual fellowship between the Father and the Son in 2 Jn 17-18, and the terms 'communion' and 'abiding' are strongly characteristic of the First Epistle (2:12 17. 28 3:4 13 etc.). The strong phrases of Jn 6, 'eating the flesh' and 'drinking the blood' of Christ, are employed, partly to express the extreme closeness of the appropriation of Christ Himself by the believer, partly to emphasize the benefits of His sacrificial work, as the faithful receive in the Lord's Supper the symbols of His broken body and blood poured out for man.

Lost, however, what might be called the mystical element in John's theology should be exaggerated, it is well to note that the balance is redressed by the stress laid upon love in its most practical forms. Love of the world—that is, the bestowal of supreme regard upon the passing attractions of things outward and visible—is absolutely inconsistent with real love to the Father and real life in Christ (1 Jn 2:15). Similarly strong language is used as regards social relationships and the love of others; for the word 'brother' must not be narrowed down to mean exclusively those who belong immediately to the Christian communion. No man whose life in relation to men is not actuated by love can be said to walk in the light (1 Jn 2:10); hatred is murder (3:15); willingness to help another in need is a test of true love, nominal and professed affection will not suffice (3:16); a man who professes to love God and does not manifest a spirit of loving helpfulness adds falsehood to his other sins—he is a liar!' (4:18). The frequent repetition of some of these phrases and their interchanges with others, such as 'doing righteousness,' 'walking in the light,' 'being in the light,' 'abiding in us,' and the like, show that St. John is dealing with the very central core of spiritual life, and that for him, as for St. Paul, it is true that 'he that loveth his own soul hath not fulfilled the law... for love is the fulfillment of the law.'

No more comprehensive phrase, however, to describe in brief the blessings of the gospel is to be found in St. John's theology than 'eternal life.' It occurs 17 times in the Gospel and 6 times in the First Epistle, while 'life' with substantially the same meaning is found much more frequently. 'Life' means for St. John that fulness of spiritual existence, whatever form it may take, be it the great ends for which existence has been given to men, and it is to be realized only in the fulfillment of the highest human ideals through union with God in Christ. Judgments in the present, as well as of mind, which makes God in Christ to be a true possession of the soul—that fellowship with God which constitutes the supreme possession for man upon the earth. But a contrast is drawn, e.g. in 3rd and 10th, between 'eternal life' and 'perishing' or 'mortal rules'; and in one of St. John's sharp and startling contrasts, the choice open to man is described as including only these two solamn alternatives—'He that believeth in Christ shall have everlasting life, but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him' (3:34). The idea thus broached carries us beyond the boundaries of earthly existence; according to Christian teaching, whenever we use His word 'shall' to designate the taste of death' (3:19), and 'though he die, yet shall he live' (11:25). Knowledge of God and union with Christ impart to the believer a type of being which is not subject to the changes and changes of temporal existence, but is in itself unending, imperishable, so that in comparison with it no other kind of life deserves the name.

This opens up naturally the question of St. John's personal history. It has already been said (see p. 441) that some critics find an inherent contradiction between St. John's view of judgment and that set forth by the Synoptists, and it has been pointed out in reply that he only extends this teaching which is not merely as here and now present in history, but as still to be anticipated in its final form in the life beyond the grave. Similar statements have been made in reference to Christ's 'coming' and the 'resurrection.' That each of these three events is recognized as still in the future, to be anticipated as coming to pass at the end of the world, or at 'the last day', is clear from such passages as the following: 'judgment' in Jn 12:48, and 1 Jn 4:17; 'coming' in Jn 14:1 and 1 Jn 4:2; 'resurrection' in Jn 5:28, 29, 29, 11th etc. But it cannot be questioned that St. John, much more than St. Paul or the Synoptists, uses these words in a spiritual sense to indicate a coming to earth in the course of history, a spiritual visitation which may be called a 'coming' of Christ (see Jn 14:1, 28, 28 and perhaps 21:22), as well as a judgment which was virtually pronounced in Christ's lifetime (12th etc.). Similarly, in 21:16 it is said that the Son 'the quickeneth whom he will,' where the reference cannot be to life beyond the grave—a view which is confirmed by v.v. 18, 19, where we are told that he who hears Christ's words has passed from death to life, do not come into judgment, and that 'the bour now is' in which the dead shall hear His voice and live. There is nothing in these descriptions of present spiritual blessing to interfere with the explicit statement that after death there shall be a resurrection of life and a resurrection of judgment (20:11), any more than Thomas's statement concerning the resurrection at the last day, when He said to her, 'I am the resurrection and the life' (11:25).

It may perhaps be fairly said that St. John in the Gospel and Epistles lays emphasis upon the present spiritual blessings of salvation rather than upon future eschatological events described by means of the sensuous and material symbolisms of the Apocalypse. But the two ideas, so far from being inconsistent, confirm one another. The man who believes in the present moral government of God in the world is assured that he must be a great day of consummation hereafter; while he who is assured that God will vindicate Himself by some Great Assize in the future life cannot surely imagine that meantime He has left the history of the world without control. The spiritual man knows that the future lies hid in the hints and suggestions of the present; he is certain also that such hints and suggestions must find their perfect realization and issue in a consummation yet to come. No Christian teacher has understood the deep-lying unity between the material and the spiritual, and the present and the future, the temporal and the eternal, more completely than St. John: 'the divine,' W. T. Davison.

JOLADA.—1. One of the two who returned 'old gate' (Neh 3). 2. High priest, son of Elisheb (Neh 12:3, n. 25). One of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 13:18).

JOLAN.—A high priest, son of Jeshua (Neh 12:24, n. 25).

JOLAM.—1. Esr 8th, one of the two teachers sent by Ezra to Iddo to ask for ministers for the Temple. 2. Neh 11, one of the chiefs of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem; in Nehemiah's time. See also JENOLAM.

JOKDEAM.—A city of Judah (Jos 16:21), whose site has not been identified. See JOKKEM.

JOKIM.—A Judaite (1 Ch 4:1).

JOKKEM.—A town in Ephraim given to the Levites near Beth-horon (1 Ch 6:4). In Jos 21:24 it is called Kibim. No site answering to either of these names is known. Jokkem is mentioned also in 1 K 4:39, where AV has incorrectly 'Jokneam.'

JOKKEM.—A royal Canaanite city 'in Carmel' (Jos 13:27), on the boundary of Zebulun (19th), the 'brook' before it being the Kishon. It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Jos 21:4). It is probably identical with the Cymon of Jew 7th. The Onomasticon places 'Gimona' 6 Roman miles N. of Legion, on the road to Ptolemais. This points definitely to Tell Kaimin, a striking mound about 7 miles N.W. of el-Lejjein, with remains of ancient buildings. W. Ewing.

JOKSHAN.—Son of Abraham and Keturah, and father of Sheba (Saba) and Dedan (Gen 25:1, 1 Ch 1:1). The name seems quite unknown, and the suggestion that it is identical with Joktan seems the most plausible.

JOKTAN, according to the genealogical tables in Genesis and 1 Chron., was one of the two sons of Eber, and the father of thirteen sons or races (Gen 10:24-26, 1 Ch 1:23-25); in the first table it is added that his descendants dwelt from Mesha to Sephar. Though the names of the majority of his sons have not been satisfactorily identified, it is clear that he is represented as the ancestor of the older Arabian tribes. The list of his sons is probably not to be taken as a scientific or geographical classification of his tribes or districts, but rather as an attempt on the part of the writer to incorporate in the tables such names of Arabian races as were familiar to him and to his readers. It will be noted that Seba and Havilah occur also as the sons of Cush.
JONATH ELEM REHOKIM

time of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 130). 17. A priest who led the prayer at the first sacrifice after the Return (Ezr 3:10). JONATH ELEM REHOKIM—See PSALMS, p. 772.

JOPPA.—The principal seaport of S. Palestine; a place of high antiquity, being mentioned in the tribute lists of Thothmes III., but never before the Exile in Israelite hands, being in Philistine territory. It was theoretically assigned to the tribe of Dan (Jos 19th), and is spoken of as a seaport in 2 Ch 28th and Ezr 3rd [where RV reads 'to the sea, unto Joppa' in place of AV 'to the sea of Joppa']; these, and its well-known connexion with the story of Jonah (18), are the only references to the city to be found in the OT. The Macabees wrecked it more than once from the hands of their Syrian oppressors (1 Mac 10th 12th 130); it was restored to the latter by Pompey (Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 4), but again given back to the Jews (b. xiv. 6. 8) some years later. Here St. Peter for a while lodged, restored Tabitha to life, and had his famous vision of the sheet (Ac 9. 10). The traditional sites of Tabitha's tomb and Simon the Tanner's house are shown to tourists and to pilgrims, but are of course without authority. The city was destroyed by Vespasian (a.d. 68). In the Crusader period the city passed successively to the Saracens and back more than once; it was captured first in 1126, retaken by Saladin 1187, again conquered by Richard Cour de Lion in 1191, and lost finally in 1193. In recent years it is remarkable for Napoleon's successful storming of its walls in 1799. It is now a flourishing seaport, though its harbour—little more than a breakwater of reefs—is notoriously bad and dangerous. A railway connects it with Jerusalem. It is also one of the chief centres of the fruit-growing industry in Palestine, and its orange gardens are world-famed. Tradition places here the story of Andromeda and the sea-monster.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JORAH.—The name of a family which returned with Zerrubabel (Ezr 2nd): called in Neh 7th Hariph, which is probably the true form. 1 Es 5th reads Arpiluth.

JORAI.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5th).

JORDAN.—The longest and most important river in Palestine. The name 'Jordan' is best derived from Heb. yerd 'to descend,' the noun Yarden formed from it signifying 'the descender'; it is used almost invariably with the article. In Arabic the name is es-Sud'eh, or 'the watering-place,' though Arabic writers before the Crusades called it el-Urdan. Quite fanciful is Jerome's derivation of the name from Jar and Dan, the two main sources of the river, as no source by the name of Jar is known.

2. Geology.—The geology of the Jordan is unique. Rising high up among the foothills of Mt. Hermon, it flows almost due south by a most tortuous course, through the two lakes of Huleh and Galilee, following the bottom of a rapidly descending and most remarkable geological fissure, and finally emptying itself into the Dead Sea, which is 1292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. In its short course of a little more than 100 miles it falls about 3000 feet, and for the greater portion of the journey runs below the level of the ocean. No other part of the earth's surface, uncovered by water, sinks to a depth of even 300 feet below sea-level, except the great Sahara. Professor Hull, the eminent Irish geologist, accounts for this great natural cleft by supposing that towards the end of the Eocene period a great 'fault' or fracture was caused by the contraction of the earth's crust from the Glacial period the waters decreased until they reached their present state. Traces of water, at heights 1150 feet above the Dead Sea's present level, are found on the lateral slopes of the Jordan valley.

3. Sources.—The principal sources of the Jordan are three: (1) the river Hasbani, which rises in a large fountain on the western slopes of Mt. Hermon, a half-mile farther on from the celebrated fountain under Tell el-Qudi, or Dan, at an altitude of 500 feet—the most copious source of the Jordan; and (3) the river Baniyas, which issues from an immense cavern below Banias or Cesarea Philippi, having an altitude of 1200 feet. These last two meet about five miles below their fountain-heads at an altitude of 1400 feet, and, by a half-mile farther on by the Hasbani. Their mingled waters flow on across a dismal marsh of papyrus, and, after seven miles, empty into Lake Huleh, which is identified by some with 'the waters of Merom' (Jos 11th). The lake is four miles long, its surface being but 7 feet above sea-level.

4. The Upper Jordan is a convenient designation for that portion of the river between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee. Emerging from the marshes, it flows placidly for a space of two miles, and then dashes down over a rocky and tortuous bed until it enters the Sea of Galilee, whose altitude is 662 feet below the top of the Mediterranean. It flows there 104 miles, 689 feet. At certain seasons its turbid waters can be traced for quite a considerable distance into the sea, which is 128 miles long.

5. The Lower Jordan is a more accurate designation for that portion of the river between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. The distance in a straight line between these two seas is but 65 miles, yet it is estimated that the river's actual course is of sufficient length to be described as 'dead' by its sinuosity. In this stretch it falls 610 feet, the rate at first being 40 feet per mile. Its width varies from 90 to 200 feet. Along its banks grow thickets of oleanders, poplars, and bushes of various kinds, as, for example, behind the prophet Jesus. Numerous rapids, whirlpools, and islets characterize this portion of the Jordan. The river's entire length from Banias to the Dead Sea is 104 miles, measured in a straight line.

6. Tributaries.—Its most important tributaries flow into the Lower Jordan and from the East. The largest is the Yarmuk of the Rabbs, the Héromaz of the Greeks, and the Shor'at el-Manadireh of the Arabs, which drains Galilee and Bassan in part. It enters the Jordan 5 miles south of the Sea of Galilee. The Bible never mentions it. The only other tributary of considerable importance is the Jabbok of the OT, called by the natives Nahr ez-Beira or Wady el-Arab. It rises near 'Amman (Philadelphia), describes a semicircle, and flows into the Jordan at a point about equidistant from the two seas. On the west are the Nahv el-Jalud, which rises in the spring of Harod at the base of Mt. Gilboa and drains the valley of Jesreel, Wady Fârob, which rises near Mt. Ebal and drains the district east of Shechem; and the Wady el-Kell, by Jericho, which is sometimes identified with the brook Cherith. 7. Fords.—The fords of the Jordan are numerous. The most celebrated in that period was Jobethah, or Mahâdet el-Hajla, where modern pilgrims are accustomed to bathe. There is another called el-Ghôrantékhi near the mouth of Wady Nimrin. North of the Jabbock there are at least 14, and in ancient times the Jordan seems to have been crossed almost exclusively by fords (1 S 13th, 2 S 10th); but David and his household were possibly conveyed across in a 'ferry-boat' (2 S 13th). The renderance of the fathers on these is doubtful.

8. Bridges are not mentioned in the Bible. Those which once spanned the Jordan were built by the Romans, or by their successors. The ruins of one, with a single arch, may be seen at Jisr ed-Damieh near the mouth of the Jabbok. Since its construction the river bed has changed so that it no longer spans the real channel. This bridge is on the direct route from Shemamoth to Edom, and there is another called Jisr ed-Mujtamih, closed by that of the new railroad from Haifa to Damascus, or about 7 miles south of the Sea of Galilee. A third, built of black basalt and basaltic tuff, is known as the Jisr Ben Ed-Tayqun, 'bridge of the daughters of Jacob,' situated about two miles south of Lake Huleh on the direct caravan route from Acre to Damascus. A temporary wooden bridge, erected by the Arab, spans opposite Jericho.

9. The Jordan valley.—The broad and ever-descending valley through which the Jordan flows is called by the Arabs the Ghôr or 'bottom': to the Hebrews it borders the land of Bashan. It is a long plain, sloping uniformly at the rate of 9 feet to the mile, being at the northern end 3, and at the southern end 12 miles broad. For the most part the valley is fertile, especially in the west. This accounts largely for the unpeopled condition of the Lower Jordan valley both to-day and in former times.

11. Flora and fauna.—The trees and shrubs of the Jordan valley are both common and varied. The retam or broom plant, thorns, oleanders, flowering bamboo, castor-oil plants, tamarisks, poplars, acacias, Dead Sea 'apples of Sodom,' and many other species of bush all grow in the valley. The papyrus is especially luxuriant about Lake Huleh.

Animals such as the leopard, jackal, boar, hyena, ibex, porcupine, and fox live in the thickets which border the banks. The lion has completely disappeared. The river abounds in fish of numerous species, many of them resembling those found in the Nile and the lakes of tropical Africa. Of the 35 species, however, known to exist, the crocodile is peculiar to the Jordan.

12. The Jordan as a boundary.—In view of what has been said, it is obvious that the Jordan forms a natural boundary to Palestine proper. In the earlier books of the OT we frequently meet with the expressions 'on this side Jordan,' and 'on the other side of the Jordan,' which suggest that the Jordan was a dividing line and a natural boundary. In Nu 34:4, indeed, it is treated as the original eastern boundary of the Promised Land (cf. Jos 22:1). Yet, as Lucien Gautier suggests (art. 'Jordan' in Hastings 'DCO'), it was not so much the Jordan that constituted the boundary as the depressed Ghôr valley as a whole.

Some references.—The Jordan is frequently mentioned in both the OT and the NT. Lot, for example, is said to have chosen 'all the circle of the Jordan' because 'it was well watered everywhere' (Gn 13:10; Joshua and all Israel crossed over the Jordan on dry ground (Jos 3:17); Eudath seized the fords of the Jordanites, cutting off their retreat (Jg 3:6); Gideon, Jephthah, David, Elijah, and Elisha were all well acquainted with the Jordan; Naaman the Syrian was directed to go wash in the Jordan seven times, and his leprosy was cleansed (2 Ki 5:10; and it was at the Jordan that John the Baptist preached and baptized, our Lord being among those who were here sacramentally consecrated (Mt 3 and parallels). To-day thousands of pilgrims from all parts of the civilized world visit the Jordan; so that, as G. A. Smith ('IHL', p. 496) reminds us, 'what was never a great Jewish river has become a very great Christian one.'

JOSEPH.—Jacob's eleventh son, the elder of the two sons of Rachel; born in Haran. The name is probably contracted from Jósephu (Ps 81:5), 'May God add' (cf. Gn 30:24, where etymologies from two sources are given). Joseph is the principal hero of the later chapters of Genesis, which are composed mainly of extracts from three documents. J and E supply the bulk of the narrative, and as a rule are cited alternately, the compiler often modifying a quotation from one document with notes derived from the other. From P some six or seven short excerpts are made, the longest being Gn 40:5-31, where the object and the poetic quality are evident. For the details of analysis, see Driver 'LOT', 17 ff. The occasional differences of tradition are an evidence of original independence, and their imperfect harmonization in the joint narrative is favourable to the substantial historical.

At present the date of Joseph can be only provisionally fixed, as the account of his life neither mentions the name of the ruling Pharaoh nor refers to distinctive Egyptian manners or customs in such a way as to yield a clue to the exact period. The Pharaoh of the oppression is now generally taken to be Ramesses II of the 19th dynasty (c. B.C. 1275-1205); and if this be correct, the addition of the years of residence in Egypt (Ex 12:40) would bring Joseph's term of office to the reign of the later Hyksos kings (c. B.C. 1599-1577; for dates and particulars, see Petrie, 'History of Egypt').

With the return of Jacob to Hebron (Gn 35:29) he ceases to be the central figure of the story, and Joseph takes his place. Of his life to the age of 17 (Gn 37) nothing is told, except that he was his father's favourite, and rather too free in carrying complaints of his brothers and telling them of his boyish dreams. Sent to Shechem, he found that his brothers had taken their flocks northwards fifteen miles, to the richer pastureage of Dothan. As soon as he came within sight, their resentment perceived its opportunity, and they arranged to get rid of him and his dreams; but the two traditions are not completely harmonized. J represents Judah as inducing his brothers to sell Joseph to a company of Ishmaelites; but E makes Reuben a mediator, whose plans were frustrated by a band of Midianites, who had in the interval kidnapped Joseph and stolen him away (40:1). The phraseology is again of the identification of the two companies; and the divergent traditions point to a natural absence of real agreement among the brothers, with a frustration of their purposes by means of which they were ignorant. What became of Joseph they did not really know; and to protect themselves they manufactured the evidence of the blood-stained coat.

In Egypt, Joseph was bought by Potiphar, a court official, whose title makes him chief of the royal butchers amongst that body-guard in and the protection and trustworthiness of the slave led quickly to his appointment as major domo (Egypt. mer-per), a functionary often mentioned on the monuments (Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 187 f.). Everything prospered under Joseph's management; but his comeliness and courtesy attracted the notice of his master's wife, whose advances, being repelled, were transformed into a resentment that knew no scruples. By means of an entirely false charge she secured the removal of Joseph to the State prison, which was under the control of Potiphar (40:9), and where again he was soon raised to the position of overseer or under-lieutenant. He was placed in due worship, the chief of the Pharaoh's butlers and the chief of his bakers, who had for some unstated reason incurred the royal displeasure. Both were perplexed with dreams, which Joseph interpreted to them correctly. Two years later his wife herself had interpreted to him a vision of the fat and lean kine of the full and thin ears; and as much significance was attached in Egypt to dreams, the king was distressed by his inability to find an interpreter. It was Joseph's spirit that was required. The chief butler recalled Joseph's skill and his own indebtedness to him, and mentioned him to the Pharaoh, who sent for him, and was so impressed by his sagacity and foretelling the rise of the Pharaoh that royal seal followed, with a degree of authority that was second only to that of the throne. The Egyptian name of Zaphenath-paneah (of which the meaning is perhaps 'The God spake and he came into life,' suggesting that the bearer of the name owed his promotion to the Divine use of him as revealer of the Divine will) was conferred upon him, and he married Asenath, daughter of one of the most important dignitaries in the realm, the chief butler of the great nation. Two sons of the sun was, on or near Arisropolis, seven miles north-east of the modern Cairo.

So far as Egypt was concerned, Joseph's policy was to store the surplus corn of the years of plenty in granaries, and afterwards to dispose of it as to change the system of land-tenure. Famine in that country are due generally to failure or deficiency in the annual inundation of the Nile, and several of long endurance have been recorded. Brugsch (Hist. i. 304) reports an inscription, coinciding in age approximately with that of Joseph, and referring to famine lasting 'many years,' during which a distribution of corn was made. This has been doubtfully identified with Joseph's famine. Other inscriptions of the kind occur, and are sufficient to authenticate the fact of prolonged famines, though not to yield further particulars of the one with which Joseph had to deal. His method was to sell corn first for money (irrespective of gold, which formerly was the standard of Egyptian currency), and when all this was exhausted (47:19), corn was given in exchange for cattle of every kind, and finally for the land. The morality of appropriating the surplus produce and then compelling the people to buy it back, must not be judged by modern standards of justice, but is defensible, if, at all, only in an economic condition where the central government was responsible for the control of a system of irrigations, with the fertility of the land. Since the cultivation directly depended, and where the private benefit of the individual had to be ignored in view of a peril threatening the community. Instead of regarding the arrangement as a precedent to be followed in different states of civilization, ground has been found in it for charging Joseph with turning the needs of the people into an occasion for oppressing them; and certainly the effect upon the character and subsequent condition of the people was not favourable. The system of tenure in existence before, by which large landed estates were held by private proprietors, was changed into one by which all the land became the property of the State, the actual cultivators paying a rent of one-fifth of the produce (47:26). That some such change took place is clear from the monuments (cf. Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 102), though they have not yielded the name of the author or the time of the change. No exception was made in favour of the priests (47:27), who were supported by a fixed income in kind from the Pharaoh, and therefore had no need to part with their land. In later times (cf. Diodorus Siculus, i. 73 f.) the land was owned by the kings, the priests, and the members of a military caste; and it is not likely that the system introduced by Joseph lasted long after his death. The need of rewarding the services of successful generals or partisans would be a strong temptation to the expropriation of some of the royal lands.

The peculiarity of the famine was that it extended over the neighbouring countries (47:28), and that is the fact of significance in regard to the history of Egypt, with which the narrative in consequence resumes contact. The severity of the famine in Canaan led Jacob to send all his sons except Benjamin (42:1) to buy corn in Egypt. On their arrival they were received in favour, and prostrated themselves before him (37:29); but in the grown man, with his shaven face (on the monuments only foreigners and natives of inferior rank are represented in such a way, on which side of the range of Egyptian life their father increased) was maintained under two at least of the dynasties, aroused their fears, and an attempt was made to assuage Joseph's suspicions by detailed information. Joseph catches at the opportunity of discovering the truth concerning Benjamin, and, after further confirming in several ways the apprehensions of his brothers, retains one as a hostage in ward and sends the others home. On their return (42:22), or at the first lodging-place (42:7), or in the way, the discovery of their money in their sacks increased their anxiety, and for a time their father positively refused to consent to further dealings with Egypt. At length his resolution broke down under the pressure of the famine (43:1 f.), and the sons were received courteously, and invited to a feast in Joseph's house, where they were seated according to their age (45:1), and Benjamin was singled out for the honour of a special 'mash' (cf. 2 S 119) as a mark of distinction. They set out homewards in high spirits, unaware that Joseph had directed that each man's money should be placed in his sack, and his own diviningcup of silver (44:2); the method of divination was hydromancy—an article was thrown into a vessel of water, and the movements of the water were thought to reveal the unknown) in that of Benjamin. Overtaken at almost their first halting-place, they were charged with theft, and returned in a body to Joseph's house. His reproaches elicited a frank and pathetic speech from Judah, after which Joseph could no longer maintain his incognito. He alludes to the fears of his Egyptian brothers by the assurance that they had been the agents of Providence 'to preserve life' (45:4; cf. Ps 105:15); and in the name of the Pharaoh he invited them with their father to settle in Egypt, with the promise of support during the five years of famine that remained.

Goshen, a pastoral district in the Delta about forty miles north-east of Cairo, was selected for the new home of Jacob. The district was long afterwards known as ‘the land of Rameses’ (47th) from the care spent upon it by the second king of that name, who often resided there, and founded several cities in the neighbourhood. In Egypt swine-herds and cow-herds were ‘an abomination’ to the people (46th; cf. Hdt. ii. 47, and Erman, op. cit. 438f.), but there is no independent evidence that sheep were, and the concept must be regarded as confined to those whose duties brought them into close contact with cattle, for the rearing of cattle received much attention, the superintendent of the royal herds being from the tribe of the house of Machpelah, and his household and brothers flourished during the seventeen years (47th?) Jacob lived in Egypt. Before his death he blessed Joseph’s two sons, giving preference to the younger in view of the greatness of the tribe to be served from him, and leaving to Josephus himself one portion above his brethren, viz. Shechem (45th E.Vm.). After mourning for the royal period of seventy days (50th; cf. Diod. Sic. i. 72), Joseph buried his father with great pomp at Machpelah, and cheered his brothers by a renewed promise to nourish and help. He is said to have survived the age of 110 (50th), and to have left injunctions that his body should be conveyed to Canaan and buried there, but was restored to Egypt, fully embalmed (50th), and enclosed in a mummy-case or sarcophagus. In due course it was taken charged of by Moses (Ex 13th), and eventually buried at Shechem (Josephus, Ant. ii. 7). Of the general historicity of the story of Joseph there need be no doubt. Allowance may be made for the play of imagination in the long period that elapsed before the traditions were reduced to writing in their present form, and for the tendency to project the characteristics of a tribe backwards upon some legendary hero. But the incidents are too natural and too closely related to be entirely a product of fiction, and the Egyptian colouring, which is common to both of the principal documents, is fatal to any theory that resolves the account into a mere elaboration in a distant land of racial pride. Joseph’s own character, as depicted, shows no traces of constructive art, but is consistent and singularly attractive. Dutifulness (1 Mac 20) is perhaps its keynote, manifested alike in the resistance of temptation, in uncomplaining patience in misfortune, and in the modesty which was his bond of power. Instead of using opportunities for the indulgence of resentment, he recognizes the action of Providence, and nourishes the brothers (Sir 49) who had hitherto brotherly affection for him. On the other hand, there are blemishes which should be neither exaggerated nor overlooked. In his youth there was a degree of vanity that made him rather unpleasing company. That his father was left so long in ignorance of his safety in Egypt may have been unavoidable, but leaves a suspicion of inconsiderateness. When invested with authority he treated the people in a way that would now be pronounced tyrannical and unjust, enriching and strengthening the throne at the expense of their own; though, judged by the standards of his own day, the charge may not equally lie. On the whole, a very high place must be given him among the early founders of his race. In strength of right purpose he was second to none, whilst in the graces of reverence and kindness, of insight and assurance, he became the type of a faith that is at once personal and national (He 11), and allows neither misery nor a career of triumph to eclipse the sense of Divine destiny.

JOSEPHUS (In NT).—1. 2. Two ancestors of our Lord, Lk 2nd, 36,

3. The husband of Mary and ‘father’ of Jesus—Every Jew kept a record of his lineage, and was very proud if he could claim royal or priestly descent; and Joseph could boast himself ‘a son of David’ (Mt 1st). His family belonged to Bethlehem, David’s city, but he had migrated to Nazareth (Lk 2nd), where he followed the trade of a carpenter (Mt 13th). He was betrothed to Mary, a maiden of Nazareth, being probably much her senior, though the tradition of the apocryphal History of Joseph that he was in his ninety-third year and she in her fifteenth is a mere fable. The tradition that he was a widower and had children by his former wife probably arose in the interest of keeping the dogma of the perpetual virginity. The Evangelists tell us little about him, but what they do tell redounds to his credit. (1) He was a pious Israelite, faithful in his observance of the Jewish ordinances (Lk 2nd). (2) He was a kindly man. When he discovered the condition of his betrothed, he drew the natural inference and decided to disown her, but he would do it as quietly as possible, and, so far as he might, spare her distance. And, when he was surprised of the truth, he was very kind to Mary. On being summoned to Bethlehem by the requirements of the census, he would not leave her at home to suffer the slanders of misjudging neighbours, but took her with him and treated her very gently in her time of need (Lk 2nd). (3) He exhibited this disposition also in his nurture of the Child so wondrously entrusted to his care, taking Him to his heart and well deserving to be called His ‘father’ (Lk 4th). The heart of Joseph never appears in the Gospel story after the visit to Jerusalem when Jesus had attained the age of twelve years and became ‘a son of the Law’ (Lk 2nd); and since Mary always appears alone in the narratives of the public ministry, it is a reasonable inference that he had died during the interval. Tradition says that he died at the age of one hundred and eleven years, when Jesus was eighteen.

4. One of the Lord’s brethren, Mt 13th, where AV reads Joseph, the Greek form of the name. Cf. Mk 6.

5. Joseph of Arimathea.—A wealthy and devout Israelite and a member of the Sanhedrin, he was a disciple of Jesus, but, dreading the hostility of his colleagues, he kept his faith secret. He took no part in the condemnation of Jesus, but neither did he protest against it; and the likelihood is that he prudently abseased himself from the meeting. When all was over, he realized how cowardly a part he had played, and, stricken with shame and remorse, plucked up courage and went ‘in unto Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus’ (Mk 15th). It was common for friends of the crucified to purchase their bodies, which would also have been cast out as refuse, a prey to vultures and beasts, and give them decent burial; and Joseph would offer Pilate his price; in any case he obtained the body (Mk 15th). Joseph had a garden close to Calvary, where he had hewn a sepulchre in the rock for his own last resting-place; and there, aided by Nicodemus, he laid the body swathed in clean linen (Mt 27th) = Mk 2nd, 34 — Lk 23rd, 50 — Jn 19th, 42.

6. Joseph Barsabas, the disciple who was nominated against Matthias as successor to Judas in the Apostolate. He was born, like James the Lord’s brother, Justus (Ac 1st). Tradition says that he was one of the Seventy (Lk 10th). 7. See Barnabas. David Smith.

JOSEPHUS (1 Es 9th) = Joseph, Ezr 10th.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS.—Jewish historian and general, born about a.d. 37 or 38, and died in the first years of the 2nd century.

1. Life.—According to his Life, Josephus was descended from a Maccabean house, and was thus of both the royal and priestly lineage. He states that he showed great precocity, and that the learned men of his race used to consult him when he was fourteen years of age. He studied successively with the Essenes and the Pharisees, as well as with the Sadducees. For three years he was a student with a berait named Banus—very probably one of the Essenes—although Josephus does not seem to have been admitted to the higher grades of the order. At the age of 26 he went to Rome to bring about the acquittal of certain priests who had been arrested and sent to Rome for trial by Felix. In this he was successful, and even gained the favour of the Emperor Augustus.

Not long after his return from Rome the revolution of A.D. 66 broke out, and he was at once swept into its current. Of the events which follow he has given us two accounts, the earlier in the Jewish War [BJ], the later in his Life, written shortly before his death. These accounts are not always consistent, the latter showing more servitude to the Romans. In particular, he attempts to justify himself, and the Pharisees with whom he identified, for insurrection in the revolt, by declaring that they judged it better for moderate men than for radicals to direct the course of events. The BJ, however, does not suggest this questionable proceeding on the part of the Jewish authorities.

The course of the war in Galilee, and particularly his own relations therewith, are minutely narrated by Josephus. His position was one of great difficulty. The Galileans were grouped in various parties, ranging from those who opposed war with Rome to radicals like those who followed John of Giscala. The plans of Josephus and his fellow-commissioners from Jerusalem were complicated by jealousies between various cities, particularly Sepphoris, Tiberias, and Tarichees. None the less, Josephus seems to have gone about the work of organizing the revolution energetically. He fortified the cities as well as he could, and attempted to introduce Roman military methods among the troops he was gathering. Whether he was, as he claims, too strict in the matter of booty, or, as his enemies claimed, too lukewarm in the cause of the Jews, or, as Vespasian, himself, judged, was too lenient with the Jews in their treatment, is of inestimable value as far as its record of facts is concerned, and particularly for the light it throws on the general state of society in the midst of which Jesus laboured.

The book found favour with Vespasian and Titus and Agrippa II. The Antiquities of the Jews, in twenty books, is one of the most important monuments of antiquity. It was probably issued before 79, as it was presented to Vespasian. Because of the reference to the Temple of Peace as finished (BJ vii. v. 7), it must have been written after 75. The work, while inaccurate at many points, and often a transcript of his own or the account of his own, was, in the estimation of the Jews, as acceptable a light as possible, of inestimable value so far as its record of facts is concerned, and particularly for the light it throws on the state of society in the midst of which Jesus laboured. It was published in the year 93. It covers the history of the Jews from the earliest Biblical times to the outbreak of the revolution of A.D. 66. It is particularly interesting as an illustration of the method by which the facts of Hebrew history could be re-written for the edification of the Greeks and Romans. It abounds in legends and curious interpretations. Josephus was by no means dependent upon the works of non-Biblical writers, mentioning by name most of the Greek and Roman historians. He used constantly the works of Alexander Polyhistor, Josephus used Herodotus. The work abounds in collections of decrees and inscriptions which make it of great value to secular as well as to Biblical historians. The latter give very full accounts of the life of Herod, for which Josephus is largely dependent upon Nicholas of Damascus, the historiographer of Herod. In his treatment of the Maccabees he is largely dependent upon Ptolemy, who himself gives a full account of the history of the Maccabees. The account of Herod is hardly more than a sketch, but that of the events leading up to the revolution is more complete.

The Life.—This work was written in reply to Justinus of Tiberias, by whom Josephus was accused of causing the revolt. In his Life Josephus represents himself as a friend of the Romans, but many statements are disproved by his earlier work, the BJ. This Life appeared after the death of Agrippa II, that is, in the beginning of the 2nd century.

Agamemnon.—This is a defence of the Jewish people against the attacks of their enemies and calumniators, chief among whom was Apion, a grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote during the first half of the 1st cent. A.D. It was written probably about the same time as the Life, and is particularly valuable as a narrative of the charges brought against the Jewish religion by the Greeks. It also serves as an exposition of the customs and views of the Jews of the 1st century, not only in Judea but throughout the Dispersion.

The importance of Josephus to the Biblical student is that the NT writers often quote his work, and even translate into Biblical language the phraseology of the NT. It describes the Jewish background of Christian history as does no other writer of antiquity. The Book of Acts is particularly illuminated by his writings, while the chronology of the Apostolic period is given its fixed dangers by his references to Jewish and Roman rules.
 Josephus, it is true, does not add to our knowledge of the life of Christ. While his reference to John the Baptist is possibly authentic, and while it is not impossible that he mentions Jesus, the entire passage (Ant. xviii.
 3) can hardly have come from Josephus in its present form. At the same time, his narrative of the events of the Gospel period and his description of the character of the various rulers of Judea serve to corroborate the accuracy of both the Gospels and Acts. As furnishing data for our knowledge of Jewish legends, parties, practices, and literature, his importance is exceptional.
 Even if we did not have the Mishna, it would be possible from his passages to reconstruct a satisfactory picture of the Jewish life of NT times. His few references to the current Messianic expectations of his day are valuable. On the other hand, his comments upon and explanations of the OT are of comparatively small value.

 JOSEPH.—One of the 'brothers of the Lord' (Mk 6:3 13:34; Mt 27:26). In Mt 13:18 AV has Jesus, but RV correctly Joseph. 2. The name is (Ac 6:4 AV) of Barnabas; RV correctly has Joseph.

 JOSHUA.—A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4:9).

 JOSHPHAT.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:4).

 JOSHAHIAH.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:9).

 JOSHEPH.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25:21).

 JOSHEB-BASSEBETH occurs in RV of 2 S 23:24 as a proper name in place of the meaningless 'that sat in the seat' of the AV. But the text is corrupt, and the original name Jathhebeam must be restored from the parallel passage, 2 Ch 11:15, just as the 'Rachmonite' must be substituted for the 'Tachemonite.'

 JOSHIBIAH.—A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4:9).

 JOSHUA (on forms and meaning of the name see next art.).—1. The successor of Moses. See next article.
 2. The Jehoshaphat in whose field was the stone on which the ark was set, on its return from the land of the Philistines (1 S 4:14). 3. The governor of Jerusalem in the time of Josiah (2 K 23:24). 4. The high priest who along with Zerub, directed affairs at Jerusalem after the restoration (1 Esdr 1:12, etc.). 2 Esdr 3:1, 3. In the books of Hag. and Zec. he is called Joshua, in Ezr. and Neh. Joshua (wh. see). See also Jesus, 2. JOSUH (cf. JESUS, 1.).—The successor of Moses as leader of Israel. He is called Hoshah in Dt 31:26, Nu 13:6; and Joshua is used as his original. But Nu 13 is late, and the versions in Dt. show that 'Joshua' was probably the original reading. The most likely rendering of the name is 'Jahweh is salvation.'
 The son of Nun and of the tribe of Ephraim, he commanded the army in the battle with Amalek (Ex 17:15), attended on Moses at Mt. Sinai (2 S 22:1), and at the Tent of Meeting (33:7); all these passages are from E; acted as one of the twelve spies (Nu 13:16-29), was spared along with Caleb (14:24; 6:5; p). His subsequent history belongs to the story of the conquest of Canaan (see following article). He was buried in Timnath-serah (Jos 19:23f) or Timnah-heroes (Je 20), in the hill-country of Ephraim.

 The view is widely held that Joshua has no historical reality as a person, that his name is merely the name of a cliché, and that his leadership in Israel represents, and puts back into the period of the conquest, the commanding position which Ephraim had come to hold in the Israelite configuration. And so it is made to show that he makes his appearance first in E, the N. Israelite or Ephraimite source. But the old poetic fragment Jos 10:1-14 represents him as speaking in the name of united Israel, and Jos 17:11-brings him into view in his dealings with his own tribe as having more than their interests in his mind, as being in some sense the arbiter of the confederacy. And while it is difficult to see how the whole period of the war that took place after all our sources say nothing about the conquest of Central Palestine, this becomes doubly difficult if originally this was the scene of Joshua's first activity and influence. The historical foundation for making the hero of Ephraim into the conqueror of all Canaan is absent.

 It seems more probable that Joshua led the nation in their first assault on Palestine, that under his leadership the entry by Jericho was won, and a wedge thrust into the land by the capture of Bethel and Ai. For his early and united victory, the tribes may have divided for their future settlements, and the separate conquests may have been carried out, as the traditions in Jg. represent them, in a more piecemeal and imperfect fashion. But this is not incompatible with the fact that Joshua may have retained the position of arbiter as, of the 17th century, residence confederacy, which still recognized its unity against its enemies, may have turned naturally for guidance to one who led its early efforts. In our later sources the conquest was conceived in a different fashion. It was represented as thorough, and as carried out by a united people. The writers naturally grouped all round this the name of one who had been able, though only for a short time, to give the tribes a sense of unity and to lead them. They idealized both his person and his work.
 But only on the supposition that there was something to idealize is it possible to understand why a man, who lived in Ephraim which is otherwise unknown, came to be set up as the hero under whom they won their foothold among the nations, and passed from wandering tribes into a people.

 JOSHUA.—The book was placed by the Jews among the Early Prophets, i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel. Our generally accepted view is that this is for the fact that Joshua, unlike Exodus or Leviticus, does not contain Torah or law. But Genesis, which recounts only the origins of the nation to which the Torah was delivered, was included in the books of Joshua, which relates the conquest of the land where the Torah was to be practised, was excluded. Jewish tradition worked with criteria of which we are ignorant, but in separating Joshua from the Pentateuch it may have recognized the presence of different traditions.

 Modern criticism has insisted on connecting the book more closely with the Pentateuch, on the ground that since all the Pentateuch documents look forward to the fuller triumph of Jehovah's promise of Palestine, Joshua, which relates the conquest, is a necessary sequel. This, however, is based on a misreading (a) that all Hebrew traditions of the conquest of Palestine are a single story of conquest, and (b) that Deuteronomy looks forward beyond the conquest to the historiography of a national bond, for which nothing is needed in Joshua other than the foundation.
 There are other evidence that Joshua formed part of a history which extended through the period of the Judges to the rise of the kingdom in Jerusalem. It is possible that a wider recognition of this fact may help to clear up some of the difficult questions as to its origin.

 2. Structure and contents. — The book falls into three parts: (a) the conquest, chs. 1-12; (b) the division of the land, chs. 13-21; (c) a conclusion, chs. 22-24.
 It is convenient to discuss these separately.

 (a) In chs. 1-12, an account, closely akin to JE, supplies the foundation. It relates the mission of the spies to Jericho (2:4, 10-24), and the consequent passage of Jordan (3:1-17; 4:1-19). In the latter story a difference in substance proves the presence of two accounts, but every effort to identify one of these with J, the other with E, fails from insufficient criteria.
 It does not recount the circumcision of Deuel, which it views as a novelty (the 'second time' of 2:11 is away from the LXX), since by this means the scope of the circumcised Egyptians is removed from the people
 (cf. Ex 12). The story of the capture of Jericho and Ai (in both of which the presence of an artificial component is apparent) (18:27-29) follows (5:14,26-7:26-8:29), with the treachery of Achan.
 Joshua then makes a compact with the Gibeonites (9:1-27), and advances to the victory at Beth-boron (10:7-11:24), to the execution at Makkedah (1035-32, 317.), and to the victory at the Walls of Megiddo (114-10, in part). This story has been thoroughly revised by an editor who is closely akin in spirit and language to the author of the framework of Deuteronomy. He added an introduction into which he has fused earlier material (ch. 21a). He brought out certain features in common with the passage of Joshua—Jordan—of which he has a sort of the Canaanites, the presence of the 2 tribes, the exaltation of Joshua by Jahveh (2057, 34-4 34th, 11, 14, 36-35). He gave a different reason for the circumcition at Gilgal (51-7), and added some details to the story of the Gibeonites (97, 9th, 10, 35, 77), and to the story of Beth-horon (9, 10, 16). He concluded the conquest of the South (1044-45) and the victory at Jericho (114-20, with a summary of the result: and he added a review of the entire conquest in ch. 12. In his work he does not add independent material to his original, but by his arrangement and omissions gives a new aspect to the account. Thus, several indications that are not worthy of chronology do appear in the chapters in comparison with earlier books. It gives prominence to the stories which governed Joshua, and to the Divine support promised and received. He marks the leader's success, and considers him the representative of the nation and the successor of Moses.

A few verses in this section, 413, 15 629-37 71 915, 16-31, are generally assigned to P, but they are so isolated and vague that nothing can be done with them except catalogue them, and express the doubt whether they ever belonged to a separate work.

(b) In chs. 13-21 the situation is different, and the critical results more uncertain. The same three sources can be traced as in the earlier section; but, on the one hand, the portions assigned to P take a character and range wholly unlike those which characterize this document throughout the Pentateuch: on the other, it is still a subject of debate whether the section owes its final form to a Deuteronomic or a Priestly editor, D or P. The present writer's view is that D edited this section along the lines of sources JE and what is called P. (Other view is held, e.g., by Driver.)

(1) P (so called), as the more complete, is given first. It began with the assembly of the tribes at BeShelehem (134-19), and a statement as to the lot assigned to the 2 tribes (138-32). It then proceeded to the division (14-4). The lot of Judah is first described (145-12, 29-44, 45-52). Then follows the lot of the Benjaminites (1517-27, 27, 7, 8, 16), who are counted as two, and of whom Manasseh, as first-born, is named first. The lots of Benjamin (1815-34), Simeon (19-9), Zebulun (vv.10-18), Issachar (vv.17-20), Asher (vv.21-31), Naphtali (vv.32-40), Dan (vv.41-45) were described, and then comes a conclusion (v.41) corresponding with the opening (v.18). On this followed the law and list of the cities of refuge (204-36, 47-9), and a list of the Levitical cities (214-43).

D incorporated with this, material drawn from JE. He introduced the division of the land with a review of the un divided land, and a statement of the lot assigned to the 2 tribes (13-41). He therefore dislodged the introduction (v.28). Into the lot of Judah he inserted the account of Caleb's settlement there (144-16, 154-19), and of Jerusalem (v.20). [vv.46-47 may be a late addition, written, after the Philistines had disappeared, to conform Judah's boundary to the idea of v.18.] Into the lot of Ephraim he inserted material from the older source (184-7, 173, 4, 46, 138-18), which represented the lot of the sons as one (174-19). Before the lot of Benjamin he placed the statement of a survey made for the seven remaining tribes (184-9, 10). From JE, v.7 is from D). This may represent the historical fact that the two strong claims of Judah and Ephraim were the first to be settled. But the breaks at this point in the original source gave occasion to insert 158 here. In the description of the remaining seven lots only a few verses (194-7, 47-11) come from JE, but the list of Naphtali's cities comes from a separate source, which is entirely different in character. The description of the other lots, may be from JE, according to which (18) the country was distributed by cities. This is one of the facts which support those who hold that P edited JE.

It deserves notice that the account of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon—the districts which were inhabited after the Exile—is more exhaustive than that of the others. The fact suggests that the compiler, who gave the accounts in this form, wrote at a late date, or at least that late hands re-touched the book.

In the account of the cities of refuge (ch. 20), vv.17-8, which have been added to the earlier sources, are absent from the LXX. They must have been added at a late date to bring the section into agreement with the Deuteron. The (3) D concluded the section on the division of the land with his formal close, 219-10.

(c) In chs. 22-24 D took the account of the dismissal of the 24 tribes (223-34) from P, providing it with his own introduction (vv.1-4). The account is late, since it views the conquest as simultaneous, complete, and national. He took ch. 24—the renewal of the covenant (2417-22) and the reign of Josiah (2420, 2640), and added only a few verses (17b, 18, 14). To these he attached Joshua's parting counsels (ch. 23).

The source named P takes much the same position about the conquest as the final editor. The chief difference lies in the fact that it associates Eleazar with Joshua, but these two formally divide the conquered territory. It seems probable that the Book of Joshua once formed part of a greater whole—a history written in the Deuteronomic spirit and based on earlier sources, which covered the period from the conquest to the kingdom. This view is tenable along with the opinion that P was the final editor, who, adding some sections on the division which he extracted from older sources, brought the book to its present form.

A. C. WELCH

JOSEPH—1. King of Judah, who succeeded his father Amon when only eight years old (2 K 22). The religious condition of the people, which was bad under Amon, continued without essential improvement, so far as we know, until the eighteenth year of Josiah. The sudden change then made resulted from the finding of the Book of Instruction in the Temple (v.8); but it is possible that the minds of king and people were prepared for it by the Skiptorean invasion and the reform of the book for a thorough reformation powerfully affected the king and his officers. The book was read publicly, and king and people entered into a solemn covenant to act according to its injunctions. Its chief demand was the removal of all altars in the country except the one at Jerusalem. This was henceforth to be the only sanctuary in Judah. The carrying out of this programme is related in detail, and we learn that the removal of the worship of wood and stone was marked by the celebration of the Passover in a new manner and with unusual solemnity (23:9).

Josiah's reign was characterized by justice, as we learn from Jeremiah, but we know no more of it until the end of the king's life. The Assyrian empire was tottering to its fall, and Pharaoh-necho thought to seize the provinces nearest him and attach them to Egypt. He therefore invaded Palestine with an army. Josiah was ill-advised enough to attempt resistance. In the battle which ensued he was slain (23:10). His motive in undertaking this expedition has been much discussed. Probably he hoped to restore the real independence of Judah. That he was beloved by his people is indicated by their deep and long-continued mourning.

Josias, king of Judah (1 Es 7:18, 31-33, 21-23, Bar 1:1); 1 Es 8:4 Josiphaia.

Josiphaiah—the father of one of Ezra's companions (Ezr 8:1); 1 Es 8:6 Josiphas.

Jot and Tittle.—In Mt 5:19, Jesus says, 'Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (v.16, 17). The Greek words γραμμή και στυλός (Williams) were translated by Tindale 'iott and 'tylle,' and these forms were retained in all the versions. The 1611 ed. of AV has 'iote' (one syllable) and 'title,' but modern printers have turned iote into 'jot,' and title into 'tittle.' The iota is by the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet, as is the yod in the later Hebrew. The kerāta (literally 'little horn') is any small mark distinguishing one letter from another, like the stroke of a t.

Jotbhah.—Named only in 2 K 21:9. It was probably in Judah, but the site is unknown.

Jotbathah.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites (Nu 33:27, Dt 10:1), described as 'a land of brooks of waters. Its position is unknown.

Jotham (judge).—The youngest son of Jerubbab, who, by hiding himself, escaped the massacre of his brethren by Abimelech (Jg 9:2). When Abimelech had been proclaimed king by the shechemites, Jotham appeared, close to where they were assembled, on Mt. Gerizim, and addressed them in the 'Trees' (9:24). The parable, which is somewhat inanuous in parts, is intended as an appeal to the conscience of the Shechemites; in case the appeal should turn out to be fruitless (which indeed proved to be the case), Jotham utters a curse (v.29) against both Abimelech and the Shechemites; this curse is shortly afterwards fulfilled. After his address, Jotham flees to Beer-sheba, fearing the vengeance of Abimelech, and we hear of him no more.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

Jotham.—1. A king of Judah in the time of Isaiah. His father was afflicted with leprosy, and Jotham had some sort of regency before becoming sole ruler (2 K 15:26). We know nothing of him except that he rebuilt or ornamented one of the gates of the Temple (v.8), and that the hostilities which later culminated in the invasion of Judah began before his death (v.7, 9).

Joy.—

The noun joy and its synonyms, rejoicing, gladness, mirth, the verb joy—more usually rejoice, also be (and make) joyful, be glad, gladness or merriment—with the corresponding adjectives, represent in the OT a rich variety of Heb. synonyms not easily distinguishable. NT Greek expresses the emotion by three leading words: (α) the ordinary char (vb. charē; cf. charis, 'grace'); (b) a term signifying excited, demonstrated

7. An expounder of the Law (Neh 8:1 [1 Es 9:2 Jozabudus]).

2. 1 Es 9:5 = Ezr 10:4 Zabbai.
3. 1 Es 9:6 = Neh 8:9 Jozabud.

Jozacar.—In 2 K 12:1 it is said that Jozacar ben-Shimeath and Jehozabad ben-Shomer murdered Josiah.
The Chronicler tells us that it is clear that there was but one murderer named, and that his name has been duplicated. Jozacar and Zekahiah have the same meaning, ‘a Jahweh remembers.’—W. F. Cosin.

Jubal.—A son of Lamech, Adah, and inventor of musical instruments, Gen 4:23. The name prob. contains an allusion to Japheth, ‘ram’s horn’.

Jubilees, Book Of.—See Apocalyptic Literature, § 2.

Jugal.—See Jehovah.

Juda.—A name first appearing in To 11 as applied to the old kingdom of Judah (of which Judah is merely the Greek-Roman equivalent).—It was re-occupied after the Captivity by the returned descendants of subjects of the Southern Kingdom. Though sometimes (as in Lk 2:4) and more definitely in Ac 10:29, the name employed to denote the whole of Western Palestine, the name was properly confined to the southermost of the three districts into which the Roman province of Western Palestine was divided—the other two being Galilee and Samaria. It lay between Samaria on the north and the desert of Arabia Petraea on the south; but its exact boundaries cannot be stated more definitely. After the death of Herod, Archelaus became ethnarch of Judaea, and after his deposition it was added to the province of Syria, and governed by a procurator with his headquarters in Cesarea.

It was in the wilderness of Judah that John the Baptist came forward as the forerunner of Christ (Mt 3:1; cf. Mk 1:3, Lk 3:1, ‘the wilderness’). It is probably the same as the ‘wilderness of Judah’ (Jg 1:4, Ps 69:7 [title], the desert tract to the W. of the Dead Sea).—R. A. S. Macalister.

JUDAH (‘he is to be praised’); the popular etymologies seem to regard the name as an unabbreviated Hoph. impf. of judah, ‘to praise.’—Judah is represented as the fourth son of Leah by Jacob (Gen 29:30 [J] 35:25 [P]). Though he was of late birth, the Judahian document (J) nevertheless gives him precedence over Reuben, the firstborn, who is favoured by the later Ephraimitic document E. According to J, it was Judah who persuaded Lot to desert Sodom in order to avert the danger which threatened him at the hands of his brethren (Gen 19:24). Similarly, when they return to Joseph’s house with the silver cup, J gives the pre-eminence to Judah, and makes him spokesman for all in his pathetic appeal to Joseph (44:14-15). Reuben, because of his lust towards Bilhah (Gen 49:4, cf. 35:22), and Simeon and Levi, because of their barbarous conduct towards the Shechemites, fall before their enemies and into disfavour with their brethren, and Judah succeeds to the primogeniture.

A tradition is preserved in Gen 38 which is generally supposed to be of great value as bearing upon the early development of the tribe. Judah is said to have withdrawn himself from his brethren and to have gone down to a certain Adullamite whose name was Hirah. There he met with Bath-shuah, a Canaanitish woman, whom he took to wife. She bore him three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er and Onan were slain by Jahweh for their wickedness. Er’s widow, Tamar, a Canaanitess also, it seems, posing by the wayside as a hcredile, enticed Judah into a trap and impregnated him with her, and of her he was the twin brother of Perez and Zerah were born to Judah. This story is usually held to be based upon facts of tribal history, though cast in the form of personal narrative, and also to prove clearly that Judah, like other tribal names, is but the eponymous head of the tribe. It points to the settlement of Judah in the region of Adullam and its union with foreign stock. Hirah is a Canaanite clan; Er and Onan stand for two other clans which became united to Judah, but early disappeared; the other three continued to exist as constituents of Judah. Besides these it would appear that in the time of David the Galilite and Jerahmeelite tribes, mentioned in Gen 37 as descendants of Perez, were incorporated into the tribe. In 1 S 27:4, 30:4 they still appear to be independent, though the Chronicler makes both Caleb and Jerahmeel descendants of Judah through Perez and their twin sons, to whom he assigned the land of Judah, which, after the settlement of Moses, belonged to the tribe of Judah. But in Nu 32:15, Jos 14:14 (R), Jg 3 etc., he is a Kenite of the tribe of Judah. From the last passage we see that Othniel, whose chief source is Kishah, son of Shisha (Debir), was another closely related tribe, and both appear from Gen 36:47 (P) to have been Edomites. Kenites, commonly supposed to be of Midianite origin, are told in Jg 1:7, also to have come from Jethro and Judah into the Wilderness.

Of all these foreign elements by which the tribe of Judah was increased, the Calebite was the most important. In fact the Calebites and Jerahmeelites, both of whom were not Cornwall in the Jewish stock, are represented as having been largely of Hethite or Canaanite origin. It was the Calebite capital, Hebron, that under David (himself said to be Hezronite) became the capital of Judah. After this time the history of the tribe becomes the history of the Southern Kingdom.

P’s Sinaic census (Nu 17:24) gives 74,600, and that of the Wilderness 76,500 (Nu 26:32).

The territory of the tribe is described in Jos 15:47, but this is late and an ideal appportionment. In the Song of Deborah Judah is not even mentioned, because ‘it was not yet made up by the fusion of Israelite, Canaanite, Edomite, and Arabic elements,’ as Stade (Essai sur la d 1135) puts it. The following table, based on Jg 2:6, shows that of the provinces of this tribe and that of Moses (Dt 33:17) reflect conditions during the monarchy. How the tribe entered W. Canaan and obtained its early seat around Bethel is impossible to say. See also Tribes Of Israel.

Judaism.—See Israel, II. §§ 5-6.

Judas (in Apoc.), the Gr. equivalent of the Heb. name Judah. 1. The third son of Mattathias, called Maccabaeus (1 Mac 2:4 etc.). See Maccabees, § 2. 2. One of two captains who stood by Jonathan at Hazor (1 Mac 11:17). 3. A Jew holding some important position at Jerusalem; he is named in the title of a letter sent from the Jews of Jerusalem and Judah and the Jewish Senate to their brethren in Egypt, and to a certain Aristobulus (2 Mac 11:14). 4. A son, probably the eldest, of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16:9). In n. 156, he, with his father and another brother named Mattathias, was murdered at Dok by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (161-117). 5. 1 Es 5:6 = Judah of Ezr 10:3.

Judas (in NT).—1. Judas Issariot.—See preceding article.
2. Judas, the son of James (see James, 4), one of the twelve Apostles (Lk 6:14), called by Mt. (10:3) Lebbaeus and by Mk. (2:14) Thaddeus. The only thing recorded of him is that, when Jesus promised in the Upper Room to manifest Himself to the man that loved Him, He inquired: 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thine self unto us, and not unto the world?' (Jn 14:2 R.V.); showing that he had attained the common ideal of the Messianic Kingdom. He pictured it as a worldly kingdom, and was not satisfied that Jesus was destined presently to reign in majesty before an astonished world and ascend the throne of David; and he wondered what could have happened to prevent this consummation.

8. "THREE OF THE TWELVE."—See BROTHERS OF THE LORD. He was the author of the Short Epistle of Jude (i.e., Judas), where he styles himself 'the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James' (v.1), and, like James, exhibits a stern zeal for morality.

4. Judas, the Galilean.—He is so called both in the NT (Ac 5:17) and in Josephus, though he belonged to Gamala in Gaulanitis on the eastern side of the Lake of Galilee; perhaps because Galilee was the scene of his patriotic enterprise. At the enrolment of soldiers Quirinius a.d. 7, Judas raised an insurrection. He perished, and his followers were scattered, but their spirit did not die. They banded themselves into a patriotic fraternity and held the significance and dignity of its name. Judas pledged, by undying hostility against the Roman tyranny and ever eager for an opportunity to throw off its yoke.

5. Judas, a Jew of Damascus (Ac 9:12).—His house was in the house of Simon and Saul of Tarsus lodged there after his conversion.

6. Judas Barsabbas, one of two deputies—Slas being the other—who were chosen by the rulers of the Church at Jerusalem to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, and report to the believers there the Council's decision on the question on what terms the Gentiles should be admitted into the Christian Church (Ac 15:29). Judas Barsabbas is described as 'chief man among the brethren' (v.2) and 'prophets' (v.25). Since they bore the same patronymic, Judas may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 13:5). An ancestor of Christ.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.—One of the Twelve, son of Simon Iscariot (Jn 6:71 13:28 R.V.); Iscarioth (more correctly Iscariot) means 'the man of Kerioth,' Kerioth was a town in the south of Judas, and Judas was the only one of the Twelve who was not a Galilean. He had an aptitude for business, and acted as treasurer of the Apostles' band (Jn 12:13). Judas turned traitor, and sold the Lord to the high priest of silver, the price of a slave (Ex 21:13); and this dire treachery constitutes one of the hardest problems of the Gospel history. It seems to present an inevitable dilemma: either Jesus did not know what would happen, thus falling in foresight and discernment; or, as St. John expressly declares (66), He did know, and yet not only admitted Judas to the Apostolate, but appointed him to an office which, by exciting his cupidity, facilitated his crime. A solution of the problem has been sought by making out in various ways that Judas was not really a criminal.

1. In early days it was held by the Cinnai, a Crypto- sect, that Judas had attained a higher degree of spiritual enlightenment than his fellows, and compassed the death of Jesus because he knew that it would break the power of the evil spirits, the rulers of this world. (2) Another ancient theory is that he was indeed a covetous man and sold the Master for greed of money; which is St. Matthew's view, but never thought that He would be slain. He anticipated that He would, as on previous occasions, extricate Himself from the hands of His enemies and when he saw Him condemned, he was overwhelmed with remorse. He rejoined, thought Paulus in more recent times, on the multitude rising and rescuing the ruler of the world, the wonderment of the disciples at the Lord's procrustation in coming forward as the King of Israel and claiming the throne of David, and thought for His hand and precipitate the desired consummation. 'His hope was,' says De Quincey, 'that Christ would no longer vacillate: he would give the signal to the populace of Jerusalem, who would then rise unanimously.' Cf. Rosenzweig, INRI, Eng. p. 263. (4) His faith in his Master's Messiah-ship, thought Neander, was wavering. If He were really the Messiah, nothing could harm Him; if He were not, He would perish, and it would be right that He should.

Such attempts to justify Judas must be dismissed. They are contrary to the Gospel narrative, which represents the Betrayal as a deliberate and premeditated, crime (cf. Jn 6:71, Lk 22:4). If the Lord chose Judas with clear foreknowledge of the issue, then, dark as the mystery may be, it accords with the providential ordering of human affairs, being in fact an instance of God's foreknowledge and abiding problem, the 'irreconcilable antimony' of Divine foreknowledge and human free will. It is no whit a greater mystery that Jesus should have chosen Judas with clear preknowledge of the issue, than that God should have made Saul king, knowing what the end would be.

Of course Judas was not chosen because he would turn traitor, but because at the outset he had in him the possibility of better things; and this is the tragedy of his career, that he obeyed his baser impulses and surrendered to their domination. Covetousness was his besetting sin, and he attached himself to Jesus because, like the rest of the disciples, he expected a rich reward when his Master was seated on the throne of David. His discipleship was a process of disillusionment. He saw his worldly dream fading, and, when the toils closed about his Master, he decided to make the best of the situation. Since he could not have a place by the throne, he would at least have the thirty shekels.

His resolution lasted long enough to carry through the entire bargain with the high priest. (Mt 26:15-16 = Mk 14:11-12, Lk 22:3-4) evidently on the Wednesday afternoon, when Jesus, after the Great Indictment (Mt 23), was occupied with the Greeks who had come craving an interview with Jesus (Jn 12:22). Fortunately for the world, Judas was far too short-sighted to watch for an opportunity to betray Him into their hands. He found it next evening when he was dismissed from the Upper Room (Jn 13:28). He knew from the Eucharist Supper that Jesus was the Messiah and, thither he conducted the rulers with their band of soldiers. He thought, no doubt, that his work was now done, but he had yet to crown his ignominy. A difficulty arose. It lay with the soldiers to make the arrest, and, seeing not one man but twenty, they knew not which to take; and Judas had to come to their assistance. He gave them a token: 'The one whom I shall kiss is he'; and, advancing to Jesus, he greeted Him with custom. Jesus, as St. Mark expressly tells (46, Mk 14:14 = Lk 22:47), 'I have been a faithful servant.' After the Supper, Judas howled, and thither he conducted the rulers with their band of soldiers. He thought, no doubt, that his work was now done, but he had yet to crown his ignominy. A difficulty arose. It lay with the soldiers to make the arrest, and, seeing not one man but twenty, they knew not which to take; and Judas had to come to their assistance. He gave them a token: 'The one whom I shall kiss is he'; and, advancing to Jesus, he greeted Him with custom. Jesus, as St. Mark expressly tells (46, Mk 14:14 = Lk 22:47), 'I have been a faithful servant.'

It must have been a terrible ordeal for Judas, and in that hour his better nature reasserted itself. He realized the enormity of what he had done; and he followed his Master and, in an agony of remorse, watched the tragedy of His trial and condemnation by the Sanhedrin. It maddened him; and as the high priests were leaving the Hall of Hwen Stone, the Sanhedrin's meeting-place, he accosted them, clutching the accursed shekels in his wild hands. 'I have sinned,' he cried, 'in that I betrayed innocent blood.' He thought even now to annul the bargain, but they spurned him and passed to the Sanctuary. He followed, and, as they could close the entrance, hurled the coins after them into the Holy Place; then rushed away and hanged himself (Mt 27:4, Lk 23:50). Is this the true account? The tragedy was so appalling that legends grew space in the primitive Church, and St. Luke has preserved one of those in a parenthesis in St. Peter's speech at the election of Matthias (Ac 1:26). One is glad to think that St. Matthew's is the actual history. Judas sinned terribly, but he terribly repented, and one wishes that, instead of destroying his miserable life, he had rather fled to the Cross and sought mercy at the feet of his gracious Lord. There was mercy in the heart of Jesus for the publican, but he repented and was pardoned; and one wishes that Judas had done likewise. Was Judas present at the Eucharist in the Upper Room? St. Luke does not mention his departure; and since he does not record the institution of the Supper, it is open to question whether the traitor 'went out' after it or before it. From Lk 22:32-33 it has been argued that he was present, but St. Luke's arrangement is different from that of St. Mark, who put the incident after the announcement of the Betrayal (Mt 26:14-16; Mk 14:18-19). According to St. John's account, Judas has to go immediately after the announcement of the Betrayal, following 13th, and at 14:15 he commits suicide. DAVID SMITH.

JUDE, EPISODE OF.—This short epistle is an earnest warning and appeal, couched in vivid and picturesque language, addressed to a church or a circle of churches which have become suddenly exposed to a mischievous attack of false teaching.

1. Contents.—(1) Text.—For its length Jude offers an unusual number of textual problems, the two most important of which are in v. 1, and v. 22-23. Though the RV is probably right in translating 'Lord' in v. 1, many ancient authorities read 'Jesus.' Also, the position of 'once' is doubtful, some placing it in the following clause. In v. 22-23 editors differ as to whether there are two clauses or three. The RV, following the Sinaitic, has three; and Weymouth also, who, however, follows A in his 'resultant' text based on a consensus of editorial opinion. But there is much in favour of a two-claused sentence beginning with either 'have mercy,' or 'refute.'

(2) Outline.—

(a) Salutation, vv. 1-2. The letter opens most appropriately with the prayer that mercy, peace, and love may be multiplied to the readers, who are guarded by all the grace of God unto the day when Jesus Christ shall appear.

(b) Description of the invaders, vv. 3-10. With elaborate greeting Jude informs his readers that he was engaged upon an epistle setting forth the salvation hold by all Christians. In vv. 3-6 editors differ as to whether there are two clauses or three. The RV, following the Sinaitic, has three; and Weymouth also, who, however, follows A in his 'resultant' text based on a consensus of editorial opinion. But there is much in favour of a two-claused sentence beginning with either 'have mercy,' or 'refute.'

(c) Warnings from history, vv. 11-19. Vested as they are in Scripture, they should take warning from the judgments of God under the Old Covenant. His people were destroyed for apostasy, though they had lately been saved from Egypt. Even angels were punished with eternal punishment for breaking bounds, and for fornication like that for which afterwards the children of God were punished. There are allusions in the epistle to the enemies of the Church that await those guilty of apostasy and sensuality.

(d) Description of the invader, vv. 17-23. Boasting of their own knowledge through visions, these false teachers abandon themselves to sensuality, degenerate and mock the spiritual world. Yet even Michael the archangel, when contending with Satan for the body of Moses, did not venture to dispute his function as Accuser, but let him and his blasphemies to a higher tribunal. But these persons, professing a knowledge of the spiritual realm of which they are really ignorant, have no other knowledge than that of sensual passion like the beasts, and are on their way to ruin. Sceptical like Cain, greedy iniquity to lust like Balaam, rebellious like Korah, they are plunging into destruction. Would they be so much as to say to deceive the world, and resist the disintegrating influence of these essentially unspiritual persons. The unity of the Church is to be preserved in edification in which true, by the indwelling Spirit, by keeping within the range of divine love, and by watching the day when Christ will come in mercy and grace. Vawlers must be mercifully dealt with; even the sensual are not past hope, though the work of rescue is very dangerous.

2. Situation of the readers.—The recipients of Jude may have been the church at Jerualem, or the very one, however, to trace in one district. They were evidently Gentiles, and of some standing (vv. 1-5). The Epistle affords very little evidence for the locality of the readers, but Syria or the Hellenistic cities is the most likely. Among the conditions. Syria would be a likely field for a distortion of the Pauline gospel of grace (v. 4). Also, if Jude was the brother of James of Jerusalem, whose influences were exercised throughout Palestine, and probably Syria (Gal 1:17), the address in v. 1 is explained. Syria was a breeding-ground for those tendencies which developed into the Gnostic systems of the 2nd century. Even as early as 1 Cor. ideas similar to these were troubling the Church (1 Cor 5:11-13), and when the Apocalypse was written the churches of Asia were distressed by the Nicolaitans and those who, like Balaam, led the Israelites into idolatrous fornication (Rev 2:14). In 3 Jn. there is further evidence of a disturbance of the Church to Apostolic authority. New esoteric doctrine, fornication, and the assumption of prophetic power within the Church for the sake of personal aggrandizement are features common to both. Jude shows in Jude a highly elaborated speculative system like those of the 2nd cent. Gnosticism. These persons deny the gospel by their lives,—a practical rather than an intellectual revolt against the Church. Jude's reasoning from v. 1-7 is that these errorists would not refuse to acknowledge the OT as a source of instruction; being in this also unlike Gnostics of the 2nd century. The Authorship.—The author of this Epistle is very susceptible to literary influence, especially that of Paul. Compare Jude 1 with 1 Th 1:1-2 Th 2:14; Jude 16-18 with 1 Co 3:14-16; Jude 32 with Ro 5:8-9; Col 2:7; Jude 24-25 with Ro 16:17-20; Col 1:12, and with the Pastoral Epistles frequently, e.g., 1 Ti 1:1-13 2 Ti 3:1-9 4:4. His relation to Peter is so close that one probably is borrowed from the other. He is given greater power of opinion as to which. See PATER [SECOND Ep. OR].

4. (e) Bigg suggests that the errors denounced in both Epistles took their origin from Corinth, that the disorder was spreading, that St. Peter took alarm and wrote his Second Epistle, sending a copy to St. Jude with a warning of the urgency of the danger, and that St. Jude at once issued a similar letter to the churches in which he was personally interested. Jude also is unique in the NT in his use of apocalyptic writings—the Assumption of Moses in v. 4, and the Book of Enoch in v. 8, 14, 15—almost in the same way as Scripture. The Jude who writes cannot be the Apostle Judas (Jk 6:6, Ac 1:13), nor does he ever assume Apostolic authority. James (v.) must be the head of the Jerusalem Church, and the brother of our Lord, Jude probably called himself 'servant' and not 'brother' of Jesus Christ (Mt 13:55, Mk 6:3), because he felt that his uncle in Jesus in the days of His flesh did not make that term a title of honour, and he may have come to understand the truth of the faith; not being able to be added to Christ. The difficulty of accounting for the choice of such a pseudonym, and the absence from the letter of any substantial improbability against the traditional view, make it reasonable to hold that Jude the brother of our Lord was the author. He may have written it between a.d. 75 and 80, probably before
JUDGES

81, for Hegesippus (170) states that Judas’s grandsons were small farmers in Palestine, and were brought before Donatian (81–96) and contemptuously dismissed.

4. External testimony.—In the age of the Apostolic Fathers the only witness to Judas is the Didache, and that so faint as to count for little. By the beginning of the 3rd cent. it was well known in the west, being included in the Muratorian Fragment (c. 200), commented upon by Clement of Alexandria, and accepted by Origen and by Tertullian. Eusebius places it among the “disputed” books, saying that it had little early recognition. It is absent from the Peshitta version. The quotations from apocryphal writings hindered its acceptance, but the early silence, on the assumption of its genuineness, is to be accounted for chiefly by its brevity and its comparative unimportance.

R. A. FALCONER.

JUDGES.—An examination of Ex 18 shows that the Hebrew word for ‘judge’ means originally to pronounce the oracle; thus, when we read of Moses sitting to ‘judge the people’ (v.10), a reference to vv.11-18 shows that what is meant is the giving of Divine decisions: ‘... the people come unto me to Inq. of God: when they have a matter they come unto me; and I judge between a man and his neighbour, and I make known the statutes of God, and his laws’ (cf. v.12-15). In the next place, the same chapter shows the word in process of receiving a wider application; owing to the increasing number of those who came to seek counsel, only specially difficult cases are dealt with by Moses, while the ordinary ones are deputed to the heads of the families, etc., to settle (vv.15-22).

A ‘judge’ was therefore originally a priest who pronounced oracles; then the elders of the people became judges. But at an early period the functions of the judges, at any rate the more important of them, were exercised by a chief, chosen from among the elders probably on account of superior skill in warfare,—an hereditary succession would, however, naturally tend to arise—who was to all intents and purposes a king. So the probability is that those who are known as the ‘judges’ in popular parlance were in reality kings in the ordinary sense of the word. In connexion with this it is interesting to note that in somewhat later times than those of the judges’ one of the main duties of the kings was to judge, see e.g. 2 S 15-19.

Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land. And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment; (cf. 2 chs. 2 20; 2 K 12). Moreover, ‘judge’ and ‘kings’ seem to be used synonymously in Am 2, Hos 7, Ps 20.

The office of the kingship (hereditary) to the ‘judge’ Gideon (Jg 8-9) fully bears out what has been said. The Deuteronomistic legislation is primarily based on theocratic grounds, called those rulers ‘judges’ who were actually kings in the same sense as Saul was; fundamentally there was no difference between the two, but nominally a difference was implied.

JUDGES (BOOK OF).

1. Name.—The Heb. title שופטים (‘Judges’) is parallel to מלחמים (‘Kings’); both are abbreviations, the full title requiring in each case the prefixing of ‘Book of’; this full title is found for Judges in the Syriac version, for Kings in, e.g., 2 Ch 20 (where ‘of Israel’ is added) 247. Just as the title ‘Kings’ denotes that the book contains an account of the doings of the various kings who ruled over Israel and Judah, so the title ‘Judges’ is given to the book because it describes the exploits of the different champions who were the chieftains of various sections of Israelites from the time of the entry into Canaan up to the time of Samuel. It may perhaps be questioned whether the title of this book was originally ‘Judges,’ for it is difficult to see where the difference lies, fundamentally, between the ‘judges’ on the one hand, and Joshua and Saul on the other; in the case of each the main and central duty is to act as leader against the foes of the tribes. The title ‘Judges’ is not applied to three of these chieftains, namely, Ehud, Barak, and Gideon, and ‘seems not to have been found in the oldest of the author’s sources’ (Moore, Judges, p. xii), In the three divisions of which the canon is made up, the Book of Judges comes in the first section of the second division, being reckoned among the ‘Former Prophets’ (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Sam., 1 and 2 Kings), the second section of the division comprising the prophetic books proper. In the LXX the Book of Ruth is sometimes, in some MSS, included in that of Judges, other MSS treat the Pentateuch and Jgs. as one whole. (For the meaning of the word ‘judges’ see preceding article.)

2. Contents.—The book opens with an account of the victories gained by Judah and Simon; Caleb appears as the leader of the tribe of Judah, though he is not spoken of as one of the judges. There follows then an enumeration of the districts which the Israelites were unable to conquer; the reason for this is revealed by the messenger of Jahweh; it is because they had not obeyed the vow of Jahweh, but had refrained from breaking down their altars. The people thereupon lift up their voices and weep (whence the name of the place, Bochim). The Israelites sacrifice to Jahweh. The same sentence breaks off. This section (11-9) serves as a kind of introduction to the book, and certainly cannot have belonged originally to it; the whole character of Jg 12-19 gives evidence that it was not composed for its place, but is an extract from an older history of the Israelite occupation of Canaan’ (Moore, p. 4). As this introduction must be cut away as not belonging to our book, a similar second name of the division comprising with chs. 17–21; these form an appendix which does not belong to the book. It will be best to deal with the contents of these five chapters before coming to the book itself. The chapters contain two distinct narratives, and are, in their original form, very ancient; in each narrative there occurs twice the redactional note, ‘In those days there was no king in Israel’ (17* 18* 19* 21*), showing that the period of the Judges is implied. Chs. 17. 18 tell the story of the Ephraimite Micah, who made an ephod and teraphim for himself, and got a Levite to be a ‘father and a priest’ to him; but he is persuaded by 600 Danites to go with them and be their priest; they then conquer Laish and found a sanctuary there, in which a graven image (which had been taken from Micah) is set up. The narrative, therefore, purports to give an account of the origin of the sanctuary of Dan, and it seems more probable that two traditions of this have been interwoven in these two chapters. In chs. 19–21 the story is told of how a concubine of a certain Levite left him and returned to her father; the Levite goes after her and brings her back. On their return they remain for a night in Gibeah, which belonged to the Benjamites; here the men of the city so maltreat the concubine that she is left dead on the threshold of the house in which her lord is staying; the Levite takes up the dead body, brings it home, and after having cut it up, sends the pieces by the hands of messengers throughout the borders of Israel, as a call to avenge the Levite. The Israelites assemble, and resolve to punish the Benjamites; as a result, the entire tribe, with the exception of six hundred men who manage to escape to the wilderness, is annihilated. Although six hundred men have survived, it appears inevitable that the tribe of Benjamin must die out, for the Israelites had sworn not to let their daughters marry Benjamites; but he is persuaded by 600 Danites to go with them. Thereupon the threatened disaster of the loss of a tribe is averted through the Israelites procuring four hundred maidens from Jabez in Gilad, the remaining two hundred required being carried off by the Benjamites during the annual feast at Shiloh. The children of Israel then depart every man to his home. The narrative appropriately ends with the words, 'Every man did that which was right in his own eyes.' As much of these chapters have been very considerably worked over by later hands, it is probable that they have some basis in fact; it is difficult to account for their existence at all, except as the result of a desire, for in themselves they are quite purposeless; there cannot originally have been any object in writing such a gruesome tale, other than that of recording something that actually happened.

The Book of Judges itself is comprised in 2:1-18; and here it is to be noticed, first of all, that a certain artificiality is observable in the structure; the exploits of twelve men are recounted, and the idea seems to be that each represents one of the twelve tribes of the twelve patriarchs, thus: Judah is represented by Othniel, Benjamin by Ehud, the two halves of the tribe of Manasseh by Gideon (West) and Jair (East), Issachar by Tola, Zebulun by Eliakim, Naphtali by Barak, Ephraim by Abdon, Gad by Jephthah, and Dan by Samson; besides these there are Shammur and Ibzan, two unimportant Judges, but against them there are the two tribes Reuben and Simeon, who, however, soon disappear; while the tribe of Issachar occupies an exceptional position. This general correspondence of twelve judges to the twelve tribes strikes one as more as artificial in that some of the judges play a very humble part, and seem to have been brought in to make up the number of twelve more than for anything else. The following is an outline of the contents of these chapters:—

There is, first of all, an introduction (2:1-3) which contains a brief statement of the period about which the narrative deals with; as long as Joshua was alive, it says, the children of Israel remained faithful to Jehovah; but after his death, and after the generation that knew him had passed away, the people rose against Jehovah, the God of their fathers, and served Baal and Ashtaroth; the consequence was that they were oppressed by the surrounding nations. (2:4-15) sound what is the theme of the whole book: the nation distressed, a judge raised up who delivers them from their oppressors, and restores them to their national life. The introduction is followed by a list of the nations which had been left in the Promised Land with the express purpose of 'proving' the Israelites. (For the historical value of this Introduction, see § 5.) Of the twelve Judges dealt with, seven are of quite subordinate importance, little more than a bare mention, of them being recorded; they are: Othniel (3:14), who delivers the children of Israel from Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia; he is mentioned as being the same as Ehud, who carried the dagger of Caleb; Shammai (34:1), of whom nothing more is said than that he killed six hundred Philistines; Tola (10:1-5); Jair (12:3-6); Sisera (15:36-40); and Abdon (12:15-19). Of real importance are the accounts which are given of the other three judges: (1) Ehud, who delivers Israel from Egypt, killing Jeroboam king of Israel (3:14-29). (2) Barak, of whom we have an instrument of Deborah; chs. 4, 5 give accounts, in prose and poetry respectively, of the Israélite victory over Sisera. (3) Gideon. Of the last there are likewise two accounts (6:1-7 and 8:1-34), with a later addition (8:35-39); some introductory words (6:1-23) tell of the Midianite oppression; 6:24-25 Jeribe the call of Gideon, of which a second account is given in 6:28-32; the invasion of the Midianites and Gideon's preparations to resist them (6:3-33) follows; and in 6:49 the story of the sign of the fleece is told. Ch. 7 gives a detailed account of Gideon's victory over the Midianites, and 8:1-23 contains an appendix which tells of Ephraim's dissatisfaction with Gideon for not summoning them to help the Midianites, and the skillful way in which Gideon pacifies them. In 8:24-35 we have a second account of Gideon's victory, the result of which is the offer to him of the kingship and his refusal thereof (8:28-35); 8:28-32 forms a transition to the story of Gideon's sons. (4) The history of Jephthah is prefaced by 10:11-14, which tells of the Ammonite oppression; Jephthah's exploits are recounted in 11:1-12:2; a note (11:13-14) introduces the hero, a passage (11:15-35) follows, discussing how the conflict with the Ammonites arose; it is a question concerning the ownership of the Jezreel valley; the Jezreel valley and the Arabah are claimed by the Ammonites, but which the Israelites maintain have been in their possession for three hundred years. As no agreement is arrived at, war breaks out, section, which is of great interest archeologically (11:30-34), tells of a vow which Jephthah made to Jehovah, to the effect that if he returned from his struggle with the Ammonites, he would offer up in sacrifice the first person whom he met on his return coming out of his dwelling. He is said to have returned and to have met his daughter (11:31), and she had raised hands in mourning, and had not come forth to meet him (11:32); as a result of this connexion,—his vow he then proceeds to fulfil. The next passage (12:1-3), which tells of a battle between Jephthah and the Ephraimites, in which the latter are worsted, reminds one forcibly of 8:32, and the two passages are clearly related in some way. (5) Lastly, the story of Samson and his doings is recorded, chs. 13-16; these chapters contain three distinct stories, but they form a self-contained whole. The first story (ch. 13) tells of the wonderful experiences of the parents of the hero prior to his birth; how an angel foretold that he was to be born, and that he was to be a Nazirite; and how the angel ascended in a flame from the altar on which Manoah had offered a sacrifice to Jehovah: vv.24-25, a record his birth and his growth to manhood, the spirit of Jehovah being upon him. The fourteenth chapter gives an account of Samson's courtship and marriage with the Philis- tine woman of Timnah: vv.1-4, his first meeting with her, his desire that his parents go down to Timnah to secure her for them, if at first demur, but latterly they accompany him thither. His exploit with the lion, his riding during the wedding-feast, the theft of his wife in obtaining the answer to the riddle from him, and the way in which he paid the forfeit to the wedding guests for having found out the answer to the riddle, all this is told in the remainder of the chapter (vv.5-20). Further exploits are recounted in ch. 15: Samson's burning of the Philistines' vineyard; his meeting with Delilah and her hypotheses; his obtaining his wife back from her again. In ch. 16 there is a continuation of Samson's adventures: his carrying off the gates of Gaza (vv.1-3), his relationship with Delilah and her hypotheses; his death, and his burial by the Philistines (vv.25-31); the rejoicing of the Philistines (vv.32-33) the destruction of the house, and death of Samson (vv.33-34); his burial (v.35).

The section dealing with Abimelech (ch. 9), though certainly belonging to the Gideon chapters (6-8), stands on a somewhat different basis, inasmuch as Abimelech is not reckoned among the judges (see following section); Abimelech is made king of Shechem (v.4); his brother, delivers his parable from Mt. Gerizim, and then flees (v.7-8); the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites (v.22-32); and Abimelech raises a revolt (v.23-35). Abimelechquilts the revolt (v.34-35); Shechem is captured and destroyed (v.36); its tower burned (v.37); Abimelech's attack on Thebez (v.38-42). Lastly, there is the short section 10:4-18, which, like 11-12, partakes of the nature of Introduction, and is of late date.

3. Arrangement and Sources.—The question of the sources of our book comes next; it is clear that the different hypotheses put forward are sometimes of a very contradictory character, and proportionately bewildering. It seems, indeed, not possible to assign, with any approach to certainty, the exact source of every passage in the book; but there are certain indications which compel us to see that the book is compiled from sources of varying character and of different ages; so that, although we shall not attempt to specify a source for every passage—believing this to be impossible with the book as we now have it—yet if it will be possible to point out, broadly, the main sources from which it is compiled:—

1) It may be taken for granted that the exploits of tribal heroes would be commemorated by their descendants, and that the narrative of these exploits would be composed very soon, probably immediately, in some cases, after the occurrences. On this custom, that even as late as the Middle Ages we find it still in vogue in Europe, the 'Troubadours' being the counterpart of the singers of far earlier ages. It is therefore clear that there would be compiled the various Israelite tribes a body of traditional matter regarding the deeds of tribal heroes which originally floated about orally within the circumscribed area of each particular tribe. Moreover, it is also well known that these early traditions were mostly sung—or, to speak more correctly, recited—in a primitive form of poetry. The earliest sources, therefore, of our book must have been something of this character.

However, quite confidently we may discerned that some intermediate stages were gone through before the immediate antecedents of our present book became existent. In the first place, there must have taken place at some time or other a collection of these ancient records which belonged originally to different tribes; one may confidently assume that a collection of this kind would have been put together from written materials; these may have been collected during the warlike experiences of a particular tribe, so that the collector would have felt himself perfectly justified in discriminating between what he had before him; some records he would retain, others he would discard. For generations these different accounts are handed down orally; ultimately some are lost, others are written down; and thus a collection of tribal traditions, i.e., in their original form they were the immediate antecedents of our present accounts in Jg 4th and 5th.

We assume, then, as reasonably certain, the existence of a body of traditional matter which had been compiled from different sources; this compilation represents our Book of Judges in its original form; it is only through this medium, as it were, that we have the redactional or Massoretic collection of the histories of the Judges. This name is given because the book in its present form shows that an editor or redactor took the collection of narratives and fitted them into a framework, adding introductory and concluding remarks; and the additions of this editor exhibit a phraseology and colouring different from that of the rest of the book, being imbued strongly with the spirit of the Deuteronomic (Driver). It is possible, lastly, that some still later redactional elements are to be discerned (Cornill). Speaking generally, however, the various parts of the book may be arranged as follows: In the earliest layer, contains fragments, probably themselves from different sources, of some early accounts of the first warlike encounters between Israelite tribes and Canaanites. In the introduction, 2nd-3rd, to the central part of the book, the hand of the Deuteronomic compiler is observable, but part of it belongs to the pre-Deuteronomic form of the book. The main portion, 3rd-18, is for the most part ancient; where the hand of the Deuteronomic is most obvious is at the beginning and end of each narrative; the words, 'And the children of Israel did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord ...' at the beginning, and '... cried unto the Lord, and the land had rest ...' so and so a year or ayer of the end, occur with monotonous regularity. 'It is evident that in this part of the book a series of independent narratives has been taken by the compiler and arranged by him in a framework, designed for the purpose of stating the chronology of the period, and exhibiting a theory of the occasion and nature of the work which the Judges generally were called to undertake (Driver). The three parts of the book, of which 1st-7th, 8th-17th, and 18th, are historical of the Song of Deborah, and there are some passages which defy emendation. In the Greek there are two independent translations, one of which is a faithful reproduction of the Massoretic text, and is therefore not of much assistance (Moore).

4 Text.—A glance at the apparatus criticus of any good edition of the Massoretic text, such as Kittel's, shows at once that, generally speaking, the Hebrew text has come down to us in a good state; it is better preserved than that of any other of the historical books of the Old Testament. There are, of course, corrections in the versions, and above all by the Greek version. The only part of the book which contains serious textual defects is the Song of Deborah, and here there are some passages which defy emendation. In the Greek there are two independent translations, one of which is a faithful reproduction of the Massoretic text, and is therefore not of much assistance. In the Vulgate the text is generally that, to gauge its historical value the component parts of the book must be dealt with separately; it is also necessary to differentiate, wherever necessary, between the historical kernel of a passage, and the matter which has been superimposed by later editors; this is not always easy, and nothing would be more unwise than to claim infallibility in a proceeding of this kind. At the same time, it is impossible to go into very much detail here, and only conclusions can be given. 1-21 is, as a whole, a valuable source of information concerning the history of the conquest and settlement of some of the Israelite tribes west of the Jordan; for the period of which it treats it is one of the most valuable works which we possess.

2nd-3rd, which forms the introduction to the main body of the book, is, with the exception of isolated notes such as 22, 3rd, of very little importance. In every time the people are oppressed, the calumny is stated to be due to apostasy from Jahweh, one cannot help feeling that the statement is altogether out of harmony with the spirit of the text. The theory is too characteristic of the Deuteronomic spirit to be reckoned as belonging to the period of the Judges. 3rd-18, the story of Othniel, shows too dearly the hand of the Deuteronomic redactor for it to be regarded as authentic history; whether Othniel is an historical person or not, the mention of the king of Mesopotamia in the passage, as having so far conquered Canaan as to subjugate the Israelite tribes in the south, is sufficient justification for questioning the historicity of the section.

On the other hand, the story of Ehud, 3rd-18, is a piece of genuine old history vividly told. Indeed, not wanting at the beginning and end, but the central facts of the story, such as the Moabite oppression and the conquest of Jericho, the realistic description of the assassination of the textual critic, it is sufficient justification for questioning the historicity of the section.

The 'judgeship' of Deborah and Barak is the most important historical section in the book; of the two accounts of the period, chs. 4 and 5, the latter ranks by far the higher; it is the most important source in existence for the history of Israel; by the vividness of every touch, and especially by the elevation and intensity of feeling which pervades it, it makes the impression of having been written by one who had witnessed the events which it describes. Whether this was so or not, there can be no doubt of its high historical value; apart from the manifest overworking...

of the Deuteronomic redactor, it gives a wonderful insight into the conditions of the times.

Chs. 6—8, which combine two accounts of the history of Gideon, have a strong historical basis; they contain much ancient matter, but even in their original forms there were assuredly some portions which cannot be regarded as historical, e.g. 2 Macc 1:24.

Ch. 9, the story of Abimelech, is one of the oldest portions of the book, and contains for the most part genuine history: it gives an instructive glimpse of the relations between Canaanites and Israelites now brought side by side; 'the Canaanite town Shechem, subject to Jeroboam of Ephraim, was self-governing son Abimelech, who naturally belongs to his mother's people; the successful appeal to blood, which is 'thicker than water,' by which he becomes king of Shechem, ruling over the neighboring Israelites also; the interloper Gaal, and his kinsmen who assisted him, in the end in jealously insurrection against Abimelech by skillfully appealing to the pride of the Shechemite aristocracy—all help us better than anything else in the book to realize the situation in this period' (Moore).

The section 10:1—18 contains a few historical notes, but is mostly Deuteronomic. The Jephthah story (11:1—29), again, contains a great deal that is of high value. Generally the narrative does not all come from one source, and the Deuteronism of the hand is, as usual, to be discerned here and there, but that it contains genuine historical traits' (Kuenen) is universally acknowledged.

Chs. 13—16, which recount the adventures of Samson, must be regarded as having a character of their own: if these adventures have any basis in fact, they have been overlaid with legendary matter that it is be precipice to pronounce with any degree of certainty any part of them in their present form to be historical.

Chs. 17. 18 are among the most valuable, historically, in the whole book. The instructive picture of the social and religious state of the people during the period of the Judges, and bear every mark of truthfulness.

Chs. 19—21. Of these chapters, 19 is not unlike the rest of the book in character; it is distinctly 'old-world,' and must be regarded as anachronistic; 21:1—24 has likewise a truly antique ring, but the remainder of this section is devoid of historical reality.

JUDGING (Ethical).—The subject of ethical judging meets us frequently in the NT. 1. It is the right and duty of a moral being to judge of the goodness or badness of actions and qualities; and Christianity, by exalting the moral standard and quickening the conscience, makes ethical judgments more obligatory than before. In cases where our judgments are impartial there is no difficulty as to the exercise of this right. As possessed of a conscience, a man is called upon to view the world in the discriminating light of the moral law (Ro 2:14, 2 Co 6:14). As possessed of a Christian conscience, a Christian man must test everything by the law of God (Ph 1:19 RVm, 1 Th 5:23). 'He that is spiritual judgeth all things' (1 Co 2:15).

2. So far all is clear. But when we pass to the sphere of judgments regarding persons, the case is not so simple. It might seem at first almost as if in the NT all judgment of persons were forbidden. There is our Lord's emphatic 'Judge not' (Mt 7:1). There is St. Paul's demand, 'Why dost thou judge thy brother?' (Ro 14:3), his injunction, 'Let us not therefore judge one another' (v. 3), his bold claim that he that is spiritual is judged of no man (1 Co 2:15). There is the assertion of St. James that the man who judges his brother is making himself a judge of the law (Jas 4:12), i.e. the royal law of love (cf. 2:8). But it is impossible to judge of actions and qualities without passing on to judge the persons who perform them or in whom they inhere. If an action is sinful, the person who commits it is sinful; indeed, the moral quality of an action springs from its association with a moral personality. In condemning anything as wrong, we necessarily condemn the person who has been guilty of it. And when we look more closely at the teaching of the NT, we find that it is not a question of judgment of persons, but a judgment of actions that is forbidden, but unfair judgment—i.e. a judgment that is biased or superficial or narrow or censorious and untouched with charity. 'Judge not,' says Jesus, 'that we be not judged'; and the context shows that His meaning was, 'Do not judge others with unfounded, or first judging yourself.' Let us not judge one another,' says St. Paul; but it is in the course of a plea for liberty in non-essentials and charity in all things. 'He that is spiritual,' he says again, 'is judged of no man'; but his meaning is that the natural man is incompetent to judge the spiritual man in regard to spiritual things. And when St. James couples judging our brother with speaking against him, and represents both as infractions of the royal law, it seems evident that he refers to a kind of judging that is not charitable or even just, but is inspired by malice or springs from a corning habit. Ethical judgment of personal worth was a function freely exercised by Jesus Christ (e.g. Mt 16:13 21666, Mk 10:30, Lk 13:35, Jn 1:46), and it is the privilege and duty of a Christian man. But if our judgments are to be pure reflections of the mind of Christ, and not the verdicts of ignorance, prejudice, or selfishness, the following NT rules must be observed. We must (1) let our judgments begin with ourselves (Mt 7:4, Ro 13:12); (2) not judge by appearances (Jas 5:13); (3) respect the liberty of our brother's conscience (Ro 14, 1 Co 10:23); (4) not seek to usurp the office of the final Judge (1 Co 4, Ro 14:19); (5) beware of the censorious spirit (Ja 4:11).

JUDGMENT.—Biblical eschatology centres about the Judgment to which all humanity is to be subjected at the end of this 'age.' As the introduction to the Messianic Age, it was expected to occur at a definite time in the future, and would take place in the heavens, to which all humanity, whether living or dead, would be raised from Sheol. The Judge was sometimes said to be God (He 12:23), sometimes His representative, the Christ, assisted by the angels (Ro 2:13, Mt 25:31 24:31—46, cf. Eth. Enoch 48). In Lk 23:39, 1 Co 6:1, Christians are also said to be judges. At the Judgment, sentences would be pronounced determining the eternal states of individuals, both men and angels. Those who had done wrong would be doomed to punishment, and those who had accepted Jesus as Christ, either explicitly, as in the case of the Christians, or implicitly, as in the case of Abraham, would be acquitted and admitted to heaven. The question as to the basis of the great discussion between St. Paul and the Jewish Christians, and was developed in the doctrine of justification by faith. By its very nature the thought of judgment is eschatological, and can be traced from the conception of the Day of Jehovah of the ancient Hebrews. While the Scripture writers sometimes conceived of disease and misery as the result of sin, such suffering was not identified by them with the penalties inflicted at the Judgment. These were strictly eschatological, and included non-participation in the resurrection of the body, and suffering in hell. (See APOSTASY, DAY OF THE LORD, BOOK OF LIES, GEHENNA.) For 'judgment' in the sense of justice see art. JUSTICE.

JUDGMENT-HALL.—See PRACCTORIUM.

JUDGMENT-SEAT.—The usual word employed for this in the NT is θέαμα (Mt 27:40, Jn 19:23, Ac 18:19, 20, 15:17, 16:17, Ro 14:18, 22, 1 Th 1:7, 2 Th 2:1; 2 Tm 3:16). The word εὐκρίνησις used in Jn 21 occurs also in 1 Co 6:1, where it is translated in RVm by 'tribunal.' See, further, art. GABRIEL.

JUDITH.—1. A wife of Esau, daughter of Beeri the Hittite (Gn 20:6; cf. 36:6). 2. Daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon (cf. Nu 1:49); widow of Manassea of the same tribe. For the book of which she is the heroine see art. APOCRYPHA, § 9.

JULIA.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16th, perhaps a 'dependent of the Court,' and wife or sister of Philologus (Lightfoot, Philipp. p. 177).

JULIUS.—For the voyage to Rome St. Paul was committed with other prisoners to the charge of a centurion named Julius, 'of the Augustan band' or cohort (Ac 27). Julius showed much kindness to the Apostle, and evidently treated him as a man of importance, though he did not take his advice on a matter of navigation (27:3. 2. n. 2. 3. 27:6). Sir Wm. Ramsay suggests (St. Paul, p. 320) that, as Julius rather than the captain 'sailing master' (not 'owner') had supreme command (27:7), the ship must have been a Government vessel. He and his soldiers were probably frumentarii or soldiers, having a camp at Rome and engaged in the commissariat of distant legions, and in bringing political prisoners. In 28th some MSS (not the best) say that the prisoners were delivered to the captain of the galley service. This, if a gloss, is at least probably true, the captain of the peregrini would be meant. (See also art. BAND.)

JUNIA or JUNIA.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16th, but it is uncertain which form is to be taken, i.e. whether a man or a woman intended. As Junias and Andronia (wh. see) were 'of note among the apostles' (the last word being used in its widest sense), the former view is more probable. Junias (short for Junianus) was a 'kinsman' of St. Paul, i.e. a Jew. A. J. MACLEAN.

JUNIPER (rotham) is undoubtedly the Arab. ralalm, a species of broom very common in desert places in Palestine and Sinai. This broom (Relam rotham) is in many such places the only possible shade; it sometimes attains a height of 7 to 8 feet (1 K 19). The root is still burned to furnish charcoal (Ps 120). In Job 30:1 mention is made of the roots being cut up for food. As they are bitter and nauseous and contain very little nourishment, this vividly pictures the severity of the famine in the wilderness. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JUPITER.—This god is not really referred to in the Bible. The Roman god Jupiter ('Father of Light' or 'of the sky') was recognized by the Romans as corresponding in attributes to the Greek god Zeus, and hence in modern times the term 'Zeus' in the Bible (2 Mac 36) has been loosely translated 'Jupiter.' The name Zeus is itself cognate with the first part of the word Jupiter, and suggests the ruler of the firmament, who gives light and sends rain, thunder, and other natural phenomena from the sky. He was conceived as having usurped the authority of his father Kronos and become the chief and ruler of all the other gods. Such was recognized by the author of Acts to correspond, as their chief god, to the Greek Zeus. All that we know of this god is that his temple at Lystra was without the city wall (Ac 14:15), and that Barnabas, as the big silent man, was taken for him. In Ac 19:19 the phrase 'from Jupiter' simply means 'from the sky' (cf. what is said above).

JUSTICE (1.)—Justice, as an attribute of God, is referred to in Jb 37:14; Ps 82:3 (EV 'righteousness'); and Jer 50:5. In all cases the Heb. is tsedeq or tsedeqah, the word generally represented by 'righteousness' (see art.). The Divine justice is that side of the Divine righteousness which exhibits it as absolute fairness. In one passage this justice, in operation, is represented by mishpat (Job 30:1). The thought of the Divine justice is sometimes expressed by the latter word, tr. in EV 'judgment': Dt 32:4; Ps 89:13, Is 30:1. It is implied in Abraham's question. (Gen 18:35) 'Are you the true judge of all the earth to do right?' rather 'do justice? (Heb. mishpat). In Dt 4:30 'His ways are judgment,' the original is dtn. In Ac 28:9 EV has 'Justice' instead of vengeance. As the capital J is intended to indicate, the writer must have had in mind the goddess of Justice of Greek poetry, Dikē, the virgin daughter of Zeus, who sat by his side. But the people of Malta were largely Semites, not Helleens. What was her equivalent? Apositively named at best (see art.) it may be noted that Babylonian mythology represented 'justice and rectitude' as the children of Shamash the sun-god, 'the judge of heaven and earth,' and that the Phenicians had in their pantheon a Divine being named taseeq. W. TAYLOR SMITH.

JUSTICE (II.).—1. The administration of justice in early Israel.—(a) The earliest form of the administration of justice was that exercised by the head of the family. He was not only the final authority to whom the members of a family appealed when questions of right and wrong had to be decided, and to whose sentence they had to submit, but he also had the power of announcing even the death penalty (see Gn 39:1). On the other hand, the rights of each member of the family were jealously safeguarded by all the rest; if harm or injustice was done to him, the other members were bound to avenge him; in the case of death the law of blood-revenge laid upon all the duty of taking vengeance by slaying a member of the murderer's family, preferably, but not necessarily, the murderer himself.

(b) The next stage was that in which justice was administered by the 'elders' of a clan or tribe (see Nu 11:16). A number of families, united by ties of kinship, became, by the formation of a clan, a unity as closely connected as the family itself. In this stage of the organization of society the procedure in deciding questions of right and wrong was doubtless much the same as that which obtains even up to the present day among the Bedouin Arabs. When a quarrel arises between two members of the tribe, the matter is brought before the acknowledged head, the shiek. He seeks to make peace between them; having failed, he declares who is right and who is wrong, and settles the form of satisfaction which the latter should make; but his judgment has no binding force, no power other than that of moral suasion; influence is brought by the members of the family of the one declared to be in the wrong, urging him to submit,—the earlier regime thus coming into play, in a modified way; but if he is not to be prevailed upon, the issue is decided by the sword. In Ex 18:13-27 we have what purports to be the original institution of the administration of justice by the elders of clans, Moses himself acting in the capacity of a kind of court of appeal (v. 19); it is, of course, quite possible that, so far as Israel was concerned, this account is historically true, but the institution must have been much older than the time of Moses, and in following Jethro's guidance, Moses was probably only re-instating a regime which had long existed among his nomad forefathers. It is a more developed form of tribal justice that we read of in Dt 21:14-21; here the father of a rebellious son, finding his authority set at nought, appeals to the 'elders of the city'; in the case of being found guilty the death-sentence is pronounced against the son, and the sentence is carried out by representatives of the community. The passage is an important one, for it evidently contains echoes of very early usage, the mention of the mother may imply a distant rem-iusence of the matriarchate; and the fact that the head of the family exercises his power recalls the earlier régime already referred to, while the present institution of the administration of justice by elders is also borne witness to, further. J. Nethon.

Another point of importance which must be briefly alluded to is the 'judgment of God.' In the case of questions arising in which the difficulty of finding a solution appeared insuperable, recourse was had to the 'judgment of God' (see Ex 22:8, and esp. Dt 33:24. And of Levi be said, Thy Thummim and thy Urim are with thy godly one. . . .'). It is easy to see how, under these circumstances, the authority of the priesthood, in all matters, tended constantly to increase (see, further, Dt 17:18-19:5).

But in spite of the rise of these two new factors—the king and the priesthood—it must be borne in mind that the elders of the cities still continued to carry out their judicial functions.

Regarding what would correspond to the modern idea of a law court, we have no data to go upon so far as the earliest period is concerned; but it may be taken for granted that, among the nomads, those who had a quarrel would repair to the tent of the sheik, in which an informal court would be held. From the time of the settlement of Canaan, however, and onwards, when city life had developed, there is plenty of information on the subject. The open space in the immediate vicinity of the city gate was the usual place for assemblies of the people, and it was here that the more formal courts of law were held (see Amos 5:10; Dtn 17:5-6; Ex 21:1). The whole idea of 'judgment' of king Solomon [1 K 7], already referred to, was of course exceptional.

2. Post-exilic period.—The law of Ezra finds that the administration of justice by the elders of the city, which had continued throughout the period of the monarchy, is still in vogue (see Ezr 7:10-15); they presided over the local courts in the smaller provincial towns. These smaller courts consisted of seven members; in the larger towns the corresponding courts consisted of twenty-three membes. In the event of these lower courts not being able to come to a decision regarding any matter brought before them, the case was carried to the superior court at Jerusalem, the Sanhedrin (wh. see). The procedure in these courts was of the simplest character: the injured person brought his complaints before the judges, notice having been given, and publicly gave his version of the matter; the accused then in his turn defended himself;—judging from Job 31:4 a written statement was sometimes read out;—the testimony of two witnesses at least was required to substantiate an accusation; according to the Talmud, these witnesses had to be males and of age, but the testimony of a slave was not regarded as valid. Before witnesses gave their testimony they were adjured to speak the truth, and the whole truth. False witnesses—and these were evidently not unknown—had to suffer the same punishment as the victim of their false testimony would have had to undergo, or had undergone. If no witnesses were forthcoming, the truth of a matter had, so far as possible, to be obtained by the cross-questioning and acumen of the judges.

3. In the NT.—The administration of justice under the Roman régime comes before us in connection with St. Paul (Ac 24 ft.). According to Roman law, when a Roman citizen was accused of anything, the magistrate could fix any time that suited him for the trial; however the king's representatives would appear, and the prisoner would be brought to answer. By that time, however, the prisoner would be brought up before the magistrate in some form or other, and the trial might be so speedily completed that the prisoner would be discharged. But there were different kinds of imprisonment recognized by Roman law, and it lay within the magistrate's power to decide which kind the prisoner should suffer. These different grades of custody were: the public gaol, where the prisoner was bound in chains (see Ac 12:21); in the custody of a soldier, who was responsible for the prisoner, and to whom also the prisoner was responsible; and an altogether milder form, according to which the accused was in custody only so far that he was under the supervision of a magistrate, who stood surety for him; it submitted to the judgment of God; the intermediaries between God and men were the priests, who carried the matter into the Divine presence, received the Divine answer, and announced that answer to those who came for judgment (see Ex 22:8, and esp. Dtn 33:24. And of Levi be said, Thy Thummim and thy Urim are with thy godly one. . . .'). It is easy to see how, under these circumstances, the authority of the priesthood, in all matters, tended constantly to increase (see, further, Dtn 17:18-19:5).

But in spite of the rise of these two new factors—the king and the priesthood—it must be borne in mind that the elders of the cities still continued to carry out their judicial functions.

Regarding what would correspond to the modern idea of a law court, we have no data to go upon so far as the earliest period is concerned; but it may be taken for granted that, among the nomads, those who had a quarrel would repair to the tent of the sheik, in which an informal court would be held. From the time of the settlement of Canaan, however, and onwards, when city life had developed, there is plenty of information on the subject. The open space in the immediate vicinity of the city gate was the usual place for assemblies of the people, and it was here that the more formal courts of law were held (see Amos 5:10; Dtn 17:5-6; Ex 21:1). The whole idea of 'judgment' of king Solomon [1 K 7], already referred to, was of course exceptional.

2. Post-exilic period.—The law of Ezra finds that the administration of justice by the elders of the city, which had continued throughout the period of the monarchy, is still in vogue (see Ezr 7:10-15); they presided over the local courts in the smaller provincial towns. These smaller courts consisted of seven members; in the larger towns the corresponding courts consisted of twenty-three membes. In the event of these lower courts not being able to come to a decision regarding any matter brought before them, the case was carried to the superior court at Jerusalem, the Sanhedrin (wh. see). The procedure in these courts was of the simplest character: the injured person brought his complaints before the judges, notice having been given, and publicly gave his version of the matter; the accused then in his turn defended himself;—judging from Job 31:4 a written statement was sometimes read out;—the testimony of two witnesses at least was required to substantiate an accusation; according to the Talmud, these witnesses had to be males and of age, but the testimony of a slave was not regarded as valid. Before witnesses gave their testimony they were adjured to speak the truth, and the whole truth. False witnesses—and these were evidently not unknown—had to suffer the same punishment as the victim of their false testimony would have had to undergo, or had undergone. If no witnesses were forthcoming, the truth of a matter had, so far as possible, to be obtained by the cross-questioning and acumen of the judges.

3. In the NT.—The administration of justice under the Roman régime comes before us in connection with St. Paul (Ac 24 ft.). According to Roman law, when a Roman citizen was accused of anything, the magistrate could fix any time that suited him for the trial; however the king's representatives would appear, and the prisoner would be brought to answer. By that time, however, the prisoner would be brought up before the magistrate in some form or other, and the trial might be so speedily completed that the prisoner would be discharged. But there were different kinds of imprisonment recognized by Roman law, and it lay within the magistrate's power to decide which kind the prisoner should suffer. These different grades of custody were: the public gaol, where the prisoner was bound in chains (see Ac 12:21); in the custody of a soldier, who was responsible for the prisoner, and to whom also the prisoner was responsible; and an altogether milder form, according to which the accused was in custody only so far that he was under the supervision of a magistrate, who stood surety for him; it was only those of high rank to whom this indulgence was accorded. In the case of St. Paul it was the second of these which was put in force.

As regards appeals to the Emperor (Ac 25:11-12), the following conditions applied: namely, a clear claim to this right. In the Roman provinces the supreme criminal jurisdiction was exercised by the governor of the province, whether procurus, procurator, or procurator; no appeal was allowed to provide for the governor's judgment; but Roman citizens had the right of appealing to the tribunes, who had the power of ordering the case to be transferred to the ordinary tribunals at Rome. But from the time of Augustus the power of the tribunes was centred in the person of the Emperor; and with him alone, therefore, lay the power of hearing appeals. The form of such an appeal was the simple pronunciation of the word 'Appeal'; there was no need to make a written appeal, the mere utterance of the word in court suspended all further proceedings there.

JUSTIFICATION, JUSTIFY

Justification is the doctrine of the Christian faith that includes the assurance that man is justified (made righteous, made an object of righteousness, justified) in the sight of God upon certain conditions.

The usage of the LXX and NT, applying the word to persons, begins under (3) above, but only as taken in bonam partem; in other words, justification in Biblical sense is a matter of moral righteousness. It is only in the late Hebrew, of Da 12:2 (rendered in EV 'turn ... to righteousness'). The Greek equivalent had a wide range of meaning—denoting (1) to set right, correct a wrong thing done; (2) to deem right, claim, approve, consent to anything; (3) to do right by any one, either in vindication or in punishment.

The difference between OT and NT Pauline usage, esp. characteristic of Rom. and Galatians.

1. In common parlance, one is 'justified' when pronounced just on trial, when cleared of blame or suspicion. Similarly, where his character or influence bore the appearance of injustice and have been, or might be, arraigned before the human conscience; see Job 8:7, Ps 51:18 (Ro 3:30; Mt 11:9, Lk 7:36, also 1 T 3:4). Similarly God's servants may be 'justified' against the misjudgments and wrongful accusations of the world (Ps 37:7, cf. Ex 23:1, Job 23:1-11 and 42:2-4, Ps 73:13-15, 31:34, 43:7-8; 1 T 3:4, etc.; and in the NT, Mt 13:30, Ro 2:3; 1 P 2:12, cf. 1 T 3:4, Rev 11:11). The wicked may be, relatively, 'justified' by comparison with the more wicked (Jer 3:1, Ezk 16:1; cf. Mt 12:14-16).

But OT thought on this subject arrived at a moral impossibility, a contradiction that seemed to admit of no escape. In the days of judgment on the nation Israel felt that she was 'more righteous' than the heathen oppressors (Hab 1:9) and, at a certain point, she had 'recovered' his hand double for all her sins (Is 48:13), and J's covenant pledged Him to her reestablishment (Is 54:10). In this situation, towards the end of the Exile, the Second Isaiah writes, 'My justifier is at hand ... my lord J will help me ... who is he that will bring me to the victorious servant?' (Jer 31:37, cf. Ro 8:28-30). For the people of J a grand vindication is coming: more than this, 'J's righteous servant'—either the ideal Israel collectively, or some single representative in whom his character and sufferings are ideally embodied—is to 'justify many' in bearing their iniquities, this vicarious office accounting 'for the shameful death inflicted on him (Is 53); his meek obedience to J's will in the endurance of humiliation and anguish will redound to the benefit of sinful humanity at last (59:21). While the spiritual Israel is thus represented as perfected through sufferings and made the instrument of J's grace towards mankind, the deepened consciousness of individual sinfulness expressed as the final judgment (1:17), Ps 51:130.143 (Ro 3:20), and raised the problem of Job 23, 'How can a man be righteous with God?' Mic 6:2 reveals with perfect clearness the way of justification by faith; Mic 7:1-4 shows man the law of righteousness, and Mic 7:11-12 points to the one direction in which hope lay, the covenant grace of J. The seed of Israel is to be 'justified in J' and 'saved with an everlasting salvation' (Is 45:17-21); the actual Israel is radically vicious and stands self-condemned (59:21, 64:10). Such is the final verdict of prophecy.

Under the legal régime dominating 'Judaism' from the age of Ezra onwards, the principle of which was expressed by Paul in Gal 3:21 ('He that doeth those things shall live in them'), this problem took another and most acute form. The personal favour of God, and the attainment by Israel of the Messianic salvation on its own, and the work of God in the fulfillment of the Mosaic Law, and circumcision was accepted as the seal, stamped upon the body of every male Jew, of the covenant based on this understanding (Gal 9). Ro 7:25 shows how utterly this idea had failed for the individual, and Ro 9:30-32 asserts its national failure.

2. St. Paul's doctrine of Justification is explained negatively by his recoil from the Judaic law-executive. In the cross of Christ there had been revealed to him, after his abortive struggles, God's way of justifying men (Ro 7:9). This was in reality the old way, trodden by Yahwah (Ro 4:4), 'through faith, by his power towards the prophets—by the Mosaic sacrifices and the Isaiac promises. Paul takes up again the threads that dropped from the hands of the later Isaiah. He sees in Jesus Christ and him crucified the mysterious figure of Is 55—an identification already made by John the Baptist and by the Lord Himself; cf. Ro 5:2-19 with Is 53:10. Upon this view the death of the Messiah on Calvary, which so terribly affronted Saul the Pharisee, must be explained. And so the doctrine changed to glory (1 Co 15:21-22, Gal 3:13-14, 3:21, 2 Co 5:19).

The 'sacrament of sin' made in the death of Jesus vindicates and reinstates mankind before God. Justification is a matter of moral righteousness, and is synonymous with 'reconciliation' (atonement)—see Ro 3:25, 8:1-2, esp. 2 Co 5:19, where God is said to be 'reconciling the world to himself' in 'not imputing to them their trespasses'; the same act which is a reconciliation as it concerns the disposition and attitude of the parties affected, is a justification as it concerns their ethical footing, their relations in the order of moral law. The ground of the Christian justification lies in the grace, concurrent with the righteousness, of God the Father, which offers a pardon wholly gratuitous as regards the offender's desert (Ro 3:24, 4:6-8, 9:31, etc., He 2:9).

The means is the vicarious expiatory death of Jesus Christ, ordained by God for this very end (Ro 3:25, 4:15, 8:1, 2 Co 5:19; Mt 20:28, 26:39, He 9:23, 10:10, 1 P 2:24, 1 Jn 1:4-5, 8, Rev 1:5, etc.). The sole condition is faith, with baptism as its outward sign, repentance being of course implicit in both (Ro 6:4, 8, Gal 3:27; Ro 6:11, 1 Co 6:1, Ac 20:26, 28:26, etc.; i.e. the trustful acceptance by the sin-convicted man of God's grace manifesting him in Christ (Ro 4:26, Gal 2:20, etc.); the clause, 'through faith'; cf. Ro 3:25, 3; is the subjective counterpart (man meeting God) of the objective expression 'through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (God meeting man) in v.21.

There underlies this whole doctrine the assumption—of the solidarity of mankind with Jesus Christ: He did not interfere from the outside, to make Himself a substitute for man—the ethical objection to Paulinism based on this presumption is irrelevant—but offered himself unblemished to God from within humanity, being 'the one man' willing and able to perform 'the one justificatory act,' to render 'the obedience' which availed for all men unto a life-giving justification (Ro 5* 8). Hence Paul is careful to refer the justification of mankind to the 'grace of the one man Jesus Christ,' in whom the race recognizes its highest self, side by side with the 'grace of God' conveyed by Him and lodged in Him, the Son. All great boons are won in achievements realized by individual leaders, 'captains of salvation' for their fellows. Moreover, the proprietary offering was not the mere negative satisfaction of repentence, a vicarious apology on Christ's part for the rest of us; it was rendered by His positive obedience unto death, yea, the death of the cross, by His meek acceptance of the penalties of transgression falling on Him the undeserving, by His voluntary submission to the law that binds death to sin and that 'numbered' Him 'with the transgressors,' since He had cast in His lot with them (Is 53* 8, Lk 22* 27f.; Gal 4* 4, Ro 5* 4); this is what was meant by saying that He became a curse for us, that we might become a righteousness of God in him (2 Co 5* 19, Gal 3*). Our Representative was 'delivered up' to the execution of Calvary 'because of our trespasses'; He was 'raised' from the dead, released from the prison-house, 'because of our justification' effected by His sacrifice (Ro 4* 25) —or, as the latter clause is often understood, 'raised to effect our individual justification. Fundamentally then, justification is the sentence of acquittal passed by God upon the race of mankind in accepting Christ's expiation made on its behalf, the reinstatement of the world in the Divine grace which embraces 'all men' the scope (Ro 5* 21, 1). All great boons are won in those who hear the good news and believe; by these the universal amnesty is personally enjoyed (Ro 1* 3 2* 5, 1 Co 6* 5f. etc.).

It is realized in (a) the forgiveness of sins, and (b) adoption into the family of God, whereof 'the Spirit of God's Son,' poured into the heart, is the witness and seal (Ro 8* 28, 2 Co 1* 21, Gal 4* 6, Eph 1* 6).

That personal justification, according to St. Paul's idea, embraces sonship along with pardon is evident from the comparison of Gal 3* 21, and 4* 1 with 2 Co 5* 19 and Eph 1*; on the one hand 'adoption' and the promise of the Spirit, on the other hand 'forgiveness' or the 'non-imputation of trespasses,' are immediately derived from 'redemption in Christ's blood' and the 'reconciliation of the world to God'; they are alike conditioned upon faith in Jesus. The two are the negative and positive parts of man's restoration to right relationship with God.

St. James' teaching on Justification in 2* 15-20 of his Ep., is concerned only with the 'justification,' which 'restores the sinner,' which 'saves,' which 'worketh righteousness,' and not the ethical belief in God which 'demons' may have as truly as a saint. On this point Paul and James were in substance agreed (see 1 Th 1* 1, 2 Th 1* 3, Gal 5*); the 'works of faith' which James demands, and the 'works of the law' which Paul rejects, are quite different things. The opposition between the two writers is at the bottom merely verbal, and was probably unconscious on the part of both.

JUSTUS.—This surname is given to three people in NT. 1. Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 1* 26), 2. Titus or Titius, host of St. Paul at Corinth (Ac 18* 7 RV; the MSS vary between these two forms, and some omit the first name altogether), apparently a Roman citizen who was a 'proselyte of the gate' (as he would later have been called), and converted to Christianity by the Apostle (Romans, St. Paul the旅, p. 280). 3. A Jew named Jesus or Joshua who was with St. Paul in his first Roman imprisonment (Col 4*). A. J. MacLean.

JUTAH or JUTTAH (in Jos 15* 4 AV has Juttah, which is read in 21* 26 by both AV and RV).—A town of Judah (Jos 15* 4) given to the priests as a city of refuge for the manslayer (Jos 21* 6, etc.). It takes its name from the catalogue of cities of refuge in 1 Ch 4* 18, but QPR adds note: 'Insert, Juttah with her pasture grounds.' It has been suggested that Juttah was the residence of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist (Lk 1* 35 'a city of Judah'). Jutah is probably the modern village of Yutah, standing high on a ridge 16 miles from Beit Jibrin (Elieutheropolis).

KABZEEL.—A town in the extreme south of Judah, on the border of Edom (Jos 15* 28, 2 S 23* 30); called in Neh 11* 30 Jekabzeel. Its site has not been identified.

Kadesh or Kadesh-Barnea was a place of note in olden time (Gn 14* 18*). This it could not have been without a supply of water. The Israelites may therefore have expected to find water here, and finding none—a peculiarly dispiriting experience—were in naturally embittered. The flow of the spring, by whatever means it had been obstructed, was restored by Moses, under Divine direction (Nu 20* 2), and for a long time it was the centre of the tribal encampments (Nu 20* 14). It was the scene of Korah's rebellion (Nu 16*), and of Miriam's death (20*). The spies were sent hence (Nu 32* 13, Dt 1* 24), and returned hither (Nu 13*). Before moving from here, the embassy was despatched to the king of Edom (Nu 20* 14, Jg 1*).

Kadesh-barnea lay on the south boundary of the Amorite highlands (Dt 1*), 'in the uttermost border' of Edom (Nu 20*). The conquest of Joshua reached thus far (10*): it was therefore on the line, running from the Ascent of Akrabbim to the Brook of Egypt, which marked the southern frontier of Canaan (Nu 34*), Jos 15*). In 20* it is placed east of Gerar; and in Ezk 47* 48* between Tamar and the Brook of Egypt. All this points definitely to the place discovered by the Rev. J. Rowlands in 1842. The ancient name persists in the modern 'Ain Qudis, 'holy spring.' An abundant stream rises at the foot of a limestone cliff. Caught by the wells and pools made for its reception, it creates in its brief course, were it is absorbed by the desert, a stretch of greenery and beauty amid the waste. From the high grazing grounds far and near, the flocks and herds come hither for the watering. The place was visited again by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, whose book, Kadesh Barnea (1884), contains a full account of the spring and its surroundings. It lies in the territory of the 'Azazite Arabs, about 60 miles south of Beersheba, to the south-west of Noph el-Safāh—a pass opening towards Palestine from Wady el-Fegra, which may be the Ascent of Akrabbim—and east of Wady Jerū. The name 'En mishpat, 'Fountain of Judgment' (Gn 14*), was doubtless due to the custom of coming here for the authoritative settlement of disputes (Driver, Genesis, ad loc.).

For Kadesh on the Orontes see Tahtim-Rodhmi.

KADMIEL.—The name of a Levitical family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2:6—Neh 7:4; cf. 1 Es 5:6). In Ezr 3rd (cf. 1 Es 5:6), in connexion with the laying of the foundation of the Temple, as well as in Neh 9th (the 21st mention) and 10th (the sealing of the covenant), Kadmiel appears to be an individual. The name occurs further in Neh 12:14.

KADMONITES.—One of the nations whose land was promised to Abram's seed (Gen 15:18). Their habitat was probably in the region of the Dead Sea. The fact that Kedemah is said to be a son of Ishmael (Gen 25:15) renders it likely that they were Ishmaelite Arabs. Ewald, however, regarded Qadmoni as equivalent to Bine Geshem ('Sons of the East')—which seems to have been a general name applied to the Keturahite tribes (see Gen 25:4-5).

W. M. Neef.

KAIN.—1. A city in the uplands of Judah (Jos 15:57), probably to be identified with the modern Keribet Fadak, on a hill S.W. of Hebron, with tombs, cisterns, and other traces of an ancient town. A neighbouring sanctuary is pointed out as the tomb of Cain. 2. A clan name—Ekdineth (wh. see), Nu 24:20 (RV); Jg 4:11 (RV), W. Ewans.

KALLAI.—The head of a priestly family (Neh 12:9).

KAMON (AV Camon).—The burial-place of Jar (Jg 10:4). The site has not been recovered. It was probably east of the Jordan; possibly identical with the Kamin of Polybius (v. lxx. 12).

KENAN.—1. A 'brook' or wady in the borders of Ephraim (Jos 16:17), which has been identified (doubtfully) with Wady Kanah near Shechem (Kabbas). 2. A town in the northern boundary of Asher (Jos 19:27), possibly to be identified with the modern Kano, a short distance S. of Tyre. R. A. S. Macalister.

Kaph.—See Caph.

KAREAH ('braed').—Father of Johanan, No. 1.

KARIATHIARIUS.—1 Es 5:4 for Kiriath-jearim (wh. see).

KAR.—An unknown place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15:59).

KARKOR.—A city apparently in Gilead (Jg 8:15).

The site is unknown.

KARTAH.—A city of Zebulum (Jos 21:12); not mentioned in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 6:7. The site is unknown. It might be for Kattath by a clerical error.

KARTAH.—A city of Naphtali (Jos 21:24). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6:6, has Kattathia.

KATTATH.—A city of Zebulum (Jos 19:18), perhaps to be identified with Katarah or with Kilron of Jg 14:3. The site is unknown.

KEDAR.—The name of a nomadic people, living to the east of Palestine, whom P (Gen 20:21) regards as a division of the Ishmaelites. Jeremiah (49:9) counts them among the 'sons of the East,' and in 29 refers to them as symbolic of the East, as he does to Cilicia in Cyprus as symbolic of the West. In Isaiah (21:7) they are said to produce skillful archers, to live in villages (42:13), and (60:7) to be devoted to sheep-breeding. The latter passage also associates them with the Nebescoth. Jeremiah alludes also (44:19) to their nomadic life, to their sheep, camels, tents, and curtains. Ezekiel (27:17) couples them with 'Arab,' and speaks of their trade with Tyre in lambs, rams, and goats. In Ps 120 Kedar is used as the type of barbarous uncivilized people, and in Ch 1 their tents are used as a symbol of blackness. The Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (c. 668-626), in his account of his Arabian campaign (cf. KTB ii. 220), mentions the Kedarites in connexion with the Arvšt (the 'Arab' of Ezekiel) and the Nebiscoth, and speaks of the booty, in asses, camels, and sheep, which he took. It is evident that they were Bedouin, living in tents and camps as such as seen in the southern and eastern parts of Palestine to-day, who were rich in such possessions as certain to nomads, and also skilled in war.

George A. Barton.

KEDEMAH.—A son of Ishmael (Gen 25:1-1 Ch 1:31). The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been identified. See also KADMONITES.

KEDEMOTH.—A place apparently on the upper course of the Arnon, assigned to Reuben (Jos 13:10), and a Levitical city (21:7-1 Ch 6:19). From the wilderness of Kedemoth messengers were sent by Moses to Sihon (Dt 2:10). The site may be the ruin Um er-Rassas, N.E. of Dibon.

KEDESH.—1. A city in the south of Judah (Jos 15:52), whose site is uncertain. It is probably to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea. 2. A city in Issachar (1 Ch 6:6), where, however, Kadesh is not improbably a textual error for Kishion of the parallel passage (Jos 21:19). 3. See next article.

KEDESH-NAPHTALI. (Jg 4:5; called also 'Kedesh' Jg 12:23; Jg 4:14; 2 K 3:3; and 'Kedesh in Galloth' in Jos 20:27-1 Ch 6:7).—Evidently, from the name meaning 'holy,' a sacred site from ancient times; a city of refuge (Jos 20:19) and a Levitical city (21:25). It was the home of Barak (Jg 4:6). It was captured by Tithath-piller (2 K 3:3) in the reign of Pekah. The site is the village of Kedesh, one of the most picturesque spots in Galilee; to the E. of the village the ground is strewed with ancient remains. There are several fine sarcophagi and the ruins of a large building, possibly once a Roman temple.

E. W. G. Masterman.

KEHELATHAH (Nu 33:22-24).—One of the 'stations' of the children of Israel (Nu 33:24). Nothing is known about its position.

KELAH.—A city of Judah in the Shephelah, named with Nezib and Azahb (Jos 15:39). David delivered it from the marauding Philistines, and it became his residence for a time. Becoming aware of the treachery of its inhabitants, he left it (1 S 23:24). It was re-occupied after the Exile (Neh 3:17; 1 Ch 4:21). It is commonly identified with Keribet Kith, about 7 miles E. of Beth Jothb. It lies very high, however, for a city in the Shephelah, being over 1500 ft. above the level of the sea.

KELALAH.—A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:36), called in 1 Es 9:22 Colus. In Ezr. the gloss is added 'which is Kelita' (in 1 Es. 'who was called Calitas'). Kelita appears in Neh 8:1 as one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the Law (cf. 1 Es 9:22 Calitas), and his name occurs amongst the signatories to the covenant (Neh 10:18). It does not follow, however, that because Kelalah was also called Kelita he is to be identified with this Kelita.

KELITA.—See Kelalah.

KEMUEL.—1. The son of Nahor and father of Aram. (Gen 22:20; contrast 21:20, where Aram is son of Shem). 2. The prince of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the twelve commissioners for the dividing of the land (Nu 34:19). The father of Hahashibah, the ruler of the Levites (1 Ch 27:7).

KENAN.—Son of Enoch and father of Mahalalel (Gen 5:13 AV Cainan; but AVm, like RV, Kenan), 1 Ch 1). The name Kenan is simply a variation of Cain.

KENATH.—A city lying to the E. of the Jordan, taken by Robah, whose name for a time it bore (Nu 32:30). Gezur and Aram re-conquered it in such a manner that it is usually identified with Kanaau, fully 16 miles N. of Bozrah, on the W. slope of Jebel ed-Druze. It occupies a commanding position on either bank of the Wady Kanaawed, which here forms a picturesque waterfall.
KENAZ

There are tall, graceful columns, and massive walls, together with other impressive remains of buildings from Graeco-Roman times. The modern village, later to be the site, is occupied by the Jews. (Baedecker (Pat., 207), stating no reason, Moore (Judges, 222), for reasons that do not appear adequate, and others reject the identification. To speak of Qana-as 'in the remote north-east' (Moore), conveys a worse impression. It is only some 50 miles N.E. of Jerusalem, which in turn is near the S. boundary of Gilead.

No other identification seems possible. W. Ewing.

KENAZ.—See Kenizzites.

KENITES.—A nomadic tribe, closely connected with the Amalekites (wh. see), and probably indeed a branch of them, but having friendly relations with Israel, and ultimately, it seems, at least in the main, absorbed in Judah. Hobab, Moses' father-in-law (Jg 1 19, 24; RVm.), had been invited by Moses and had doubtless accepted the invitation—to be a guide to Israel in the wilderness (Nu 10:25-28), was a Kenite; and his descendants came up from Jericho with the tribe of Judah into the S. part of their territory (Arad is about 17 miles S. of Hebron), though afterwards, true to their Bedouin instincts, they roamed beyond the border and rejoined their kinsmen, the Amalekites, in the N. of the Sinaitic Peninsula (Jg 11:2); read in this version the 'Sons of LXX, 'the Amalekite people'—three letters have dropped out in the Heb.). When Saul, many years later, attacked the Amalekites, he bade the Kenites separate themselves from them, on the ground that they had shown kindness to David at the time of the Exodus (1 S 15:1, alluding doubtless to Hobab's guidance, Nu 10:25-27). In Jg 4:11 Heber the Kenite is mentioned as having separated himself from the main body of the tribe, and wandered northwards as far as the neighbourhood of Beer (near the Waters of Merom). From 1 S 27:29-30 we learn that in the time of David there was a district in the S. of Judah inhabited by Kenites; it is possible also that Keniah, in Jud 8:7, and Kain in 1 S 19:15, and Kain in 2 K 14:1, were Kenite settlements.

The Rechabites, with whom the nomadic life had become a religious institution (Jer 35), were Kenites (1 Ch 20). In Gn 15:18 the Kenites are mentioned among the ten nations whose land was to be taken possession of by Israel; the reference is doubtless to the absorption of the Kenites in Judah. In Nu 24:14. Balaam, with a play on the resemblance of the Heb. 'ken,' 'nest,' declares that though their 'nest' is among the rocky crags (namely, in the S. of Judah), they would in the end be carried away captive by the Assyrians ('Kain' in v. 17) is the proper name of the tribe of which 'Kenites' is the gentilic adj.; cf. Jg 4:19. RVm. Observe here that the oracle on the Kenites follows closely upon that on the Amalekites).

The word kenotes means in Heb. a 'spear' (2 S 219), and in Arab. an 'iron-smith'; in Aram. also the word corresponding to 'Kenite' denotes a 'metal-worker'; it has hence been conjectured (Sayce) that the 'Kenites' were a nomad tribe of smiths. There is, however, no support for this conjecture beyond the resemblance in the words.

KENIZZITES.—A clan named from an eponymous ancestor, Kenaz. According to J (Jos 13:7, Jg 11, Caleb and Othniel were descended from him. (The inference, sometimes made, that Kenaz was a brother of Caleb, arose from a misunderstanding of these passages.) R in Jos 14:14 definitely calls Caleb a Kenizzite, as P does in Nu 32:22. R also (Gn 15:18) counts the Kenizzites among the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine. P in Gn 36:12 enrols Kenaz among the 'dukes' of Edom, while a Priestly supplement counts him both as a 'duke' and as a grandson of Esau (Gn 36:13, 14). The Chronicler names Renaz as a grandson of Esau (1 Ch 1:18), and also as a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4:18-19). The probable meaning of all these passages is that the Kenizzites overspread a part of Edom and southern Judah before the Israelitish conquest and continued to abide there, a part of them being absorbed by the Edomites, and a part by the tribe of Judah. This latter portion embraced the clans of Caleb and Othniel.

KENOSIS.—This word means 'emptying,' and as a substantive it does not occur in the NT. But the corresponding verb 'be emptied' ('kenos') occurs. This passage is very important as a definite statement that the Incarnation implies limitations, and at the same time that these limitations were undertaken as a voluntary act of love. In the Co 3:9 is a declarative statement. The questions involved are not, however, to be solved by the interpretation of isolated texts, but, so far as they can be solved, by our knowledge of the Incarnate Life as a whole. The question which has been most discussed in recent years relates to the human consciousness and knowledge of Christ, and asks how it is possible for the limitations of human knowledge to coexist with Divine omniscience.

The word kenosi, and the ideas which it suggests, were not emphasized by early theologians, and the word was used as little more than a synonym for the Incarnations, regarded as a Divine act of voluntary condescension. The speculations which occupied the Church during the first five centuries were caused by questions as to the nature and Person of Christ, which arose inevitably when it had been realized that He was both human and Divine; but while they established the reality of His human consciousness, they did not deal, except incidentally, with the conditions under which it was exercised. The passages which speak of our Lord's human knowledge were discussed exegetically, and the general tendency of most early and almost all medieval theology was to explain them in a more or less docetic sense.

From the 16th cent. onwards there has been a greater tendency to revert to the form of the Gospel narrative, consequently a greater insistence on the truth of our Lord's manhood, and more discussion as to the extent to which the Son, in becoming incarnate, ceased to exercise Divine power, especially in the sphere of human knowledge. The question is obviously one that should be treated with great reserve, and rather by an examination of the whole picture of the human life of Christ presented to us in the NT than by a priori reasoning. The language of the NT appears to warrant the conclusion that the Incarnation was not a mere addition of a manhood to the Godhead, but that the 'Son of God, assuming human nature, really lived in the humanly proper human conditions, and ceased from the exercise of those Divine functions, including the Divine omniscience, which would have been incompatible with a truly human experience. It has even been held that the Son in becoming incarnate ceased to live the life of the Godhead altogether, or to exercise His cosmic functions. But for this there is no support in the NT, and Col 1:15 and Heb 1:2 more than suggest the contrary.

KERAS (1 Es 5:30) = Ear 24th and Neh 7:26 Keros.

KERCHIEFS (from the Fr. couvrechef, a covering for the head) are mentioned only in Ezk 13:4, 5, a somewhat obscure passage having reference to certain forms of divination or sorcery, which required the head to be covered. They evidently varied in length with the height of the wearer (v. 16), and perhaps resembled the long veils worn by the female captives from Lachish represented on an Assyrian sculpture, see Dress, § 6 (6).

R. S. Kennedy.

KEREE or QERE.—See Text of OT.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (lit. 'horn of antimony').—The youngest daughter born to Job in his second estate of prosperity (Job 42:10). The name is indicative of beautiful eyes, from the dye made of antimony, used to tint the eyelashes (2 K 9:2, Jer 4:4).

KERIOH.—A city of Moab, named in Jer 48:4; Am 2:9, and in line 13 of the Moabitic Stone. It has been identified with Ar, the capital city of Moab, as that has been with Rabbah—both identifications being precarious. More is to be said for Kerioh being the same as Kir-heres of Is 16th and of Jer 48th. The latter is a stronghold to this day, and fits in with the suggestion of the passages above that Kerioh was a capital city of Moab, and the seat of the worship of Chemosh.

W. F. COBB.

KERIOH-HEZRON (Jos 15th).—See Hazor, No. 3.

KEROS.—Name of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:49; Neh 7:53); in 1 Es 2:32 Ezech. KESITAH is given in RV as the Heb. word rendered 'pieces of money' in the three passages Gn 33:19, Jos 24:14, and Job 42:11. No clue has yet been found to the weight, and therefore the value, of the kesitah; but that it was an ingot of precious metal of a recognized value is more probable than the tradition represented by several ancient versions, which render it by 'lamb'.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KETAB (1 Es 5:8).—Head of a family of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

KETHIBH.—See Text of OT.

KETTHE.—See Text of OT.

KETTLE.—Is 2:24 only. See House, § 9.

KETURAH.—Abraham's wife (Gn 25:4), or concubine (1 Ch 18:17; cf. Gn 29:25), after the death of Sarah; named only by J and the Chronicler in the passages referred to and said to be the mother of six of the twelve tribes, several of which are distinctly Arabian—Midian, Sheba, Dedan. Some Arabic writers mention an Arabian tribe near Mecca called Qatūrā. The old Israelites evidently regarded some Arabs as distant relatives (see artt. Abraham, Esau, Hagar). The name Qatūrā = 'incense,' is a perfume-name like Kesittah (Job 42:11).

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

KEY.—See House, § 6. Of the passages where this word is used in a figurative sense the most important are Is 22:20 (cf. Rev 5:9), where the key is the symbol of authority and rule; Lk 11:5 'the key of knowledge'; and the aorup interpretum, Mt 16:19, for which see Power of the Key of David. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KEZIACH ('cassia').—The name of the second daughter born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:15).

KIDRROH-HATTAAVAAH ('graves of lust,' Nu 11th 32th, Dc 49th).—The march from Taberah (Nu 11th) is not mentioned in Nu 32th, but Kidrroh-hattaaavah was one day's journey from the wilderness of Sinai. It is placed by tradition to the N. of Naqab-el-Havva ('mountain path of the wind'), which leads to the plain below the traditional Sinai. W. EWING.

KEZRAM.—See Jokram.

KID.—See Goat, and (for Ex 23:19) Magic, p. 569b.

KIDNAPPING.—See Crimes, etc., § 7.

KIDNEYS.—1. Literal.—(1) The choice portions of animals sacrificed to J incl. the kidneys (Ex 29:25, Lv 3:15, 16, 24:17, 18; J 11:5; cf. Is 3r-44). The term is very transferred (if the text is correct) to choice wheat (Dt 32:14). (2) Limited to poetry is the use of this term in regard to human beings, and the rendering is always 'relais' (see below). They are 'possession' (RV 'formed') by J (Ps 139:19), and are, metaphorically, wounded by J's arrows (Job 6:15; cf. 19:6, Is 3:15). (3) AV rendered Lk 15:22 is incorrect; there is no mention of reins; and in Is 11 the word 'rendered means 'joins.'

The rendering is always 'relains' (Lat. rennes, pl.; the Gr. equivalent being nephritos, whence 'nephritis,' etc.). The avoidance of the word 'kidneys' is desirable, because we do not regard them as the seat of emotion. But the Biblical writers did so regard them. It was as natural for them to say 'This gladdens my reins' as it is natural—and incorrect—for us to say 'This gladdens my heart.' And, in fact, in the passages now cited the terms 'reins' and 'heart' are often parallel; Ps 78:16 26th 729; Ps 22:23, Ps 118:23, Ps 119:100, 114, 119, 121, 188, 205, Wis 11, 1 Mac 2:9, Rev 2:20.

H. F. B. CAMPBELL.

KIDRON.—A place fortified by Cendebeus (1 Mac 15th, a), and the point to which he was pursued after his defeat by the Macchabees (16th). It may be the modern Katrah near Jebna, and is possibly identical with 'Gederoth of Jos 15th, 2 Ch 23th.

KIDRON (AV Gedron), THE BROOK (nachath, 'torrent valley,' wady, 'wadi,' 2 Es 11th, 15th, 1 K 22th, 2 Ch 33th, Neh 22th etc.; Gr. chelmarious, Jn 18th).—The name of a valley, nearly 3 miles in length, which bounds the plateau of Jerusalem on the E. It is always dry except during and immediately after heavy rain; it is the same valley that is referred to as the Valley of Jehoshaphat (wh. see). It commences about 14 miles N. of the W. of the city walls, as a wide, shallow valley. At first it runs S.E., receiving tributaries from the W. and N., but where it is now crossed by the modern carriage road to the Mt. of Olives, it turns South. Near this point (as well as higher up) there are a number of little tombs; among them on the W. side of the valley are the so-called 'Tombs of the Kings,' and on the E. the reputed tomb of 'Simon the Just,' much venerated by the Jews. The first of this open section of the valley is to-day known as Wady al-Joz (Valley of the Nuts): it is full of fertile soil, and in a great part of its extent is sown with corn or planted with olives or almonds. As the valley approaches the E. side it rapidly deepens, and rocks appear on each side; it now receives the name Wady Sitt Reymah, i.e. Valley of the Lady Mary. Opposite the Temple area the bottom of the valley, now 40 feet below the present surface, is about 300 feet below the Temple platform. S. of this it continues to narrow and deepen, running between the village of Silwān (see Siloam) on the E. and the hill Ophel on the West. Here lies the 'Virgin's Fount,' ancient Gihon (w. see), whose waters to-day rise deep under the surface, though once they ran down the valley itself. A little farther on the valley again expands into a considerable open area, where vegetables are now cultivated, and tributaries which was once the 'King's Garden' (wh. see). The Tyropean Valley, known now as-el-Wad, joins the Kidron Valley from the N., and farther on the Wady ar-Rabbi (traditionally Hinom, wh. see), runs in this Wadi. The area again narrows at Bār Eyyub, the ancient Enrogel (wh. see), and the valley continues a long winding course under the name of Wady en-Nār ('Valley of Fire') till it reaches the Dead Sea.

There is no doubt whatever that this is the Kidron of the OT and NT. It is interesting that the custom of burying Israelites there, which is observed to-day (see Jehoshaphat [Valley of]), is referred to in 2 K 23th, and 2 Ch 34th. It is probable that the place of the 'graves of the common people' (Jr 26th) was also here, and it has been suggested, from a comparison with Jer 31th, with less plausibility, that this may have been the scene of Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (Ezk 37). The 'fields of Kidron' (2 K 23th), though generally identified with the open part of the valley when it is joined by the Tyropean Valley, are more likely to have been the open upper part of the valley referred to above as Wady el-Joz, which were on the way to Bethel.

The Valley of the Kidron is mentioned first and last in the Bible at two momentous historical crises,—when David crossed it (2 S 15th) and the lamentations of his people as he fled before Absalom, and when Jesus went forth with His disciples over the brook Kidron (Jn 18'), for His great and terrible agony before His crucifixion.

KILAN.—Sixty-seven sons of Kilan and Azetas returned with Zerub (1 Es 5'), in the lists of Ezra 2 and Neh 7 the names are omitted.

KING.(MEN OF). KINSMAN, AVENGER OF BLOOD, GOEL.—1. "Next of kin" is the nearest equivalent in modern English to the Heb. g'd m, itself the participle of a verb originally signifying to claim (vindicate), then to buy back. The duties devolving on the goel belonged to the domain both of civil and of criminal law. If a Hebrew, for example, were reduced to selling a part, or the whole, of his property, it was the duty of his next of kin to purchase the property, if it was in his power to do so. The classical instance of the exercise of this 'right of redemption' is the case of the prophet Jeremiah, who purchased the property of his cousin Hanamel in Anathoth, on being asked to do so in virtue of his relationship (Jer 32'). Similarly, should a sale have actually taken place, the right of redemption fell to 'his kinsman that is next to him' (Lv 25'). The case of Naomi and 'the parcel of land' belonging to her deceased husband was complicated by the presence of Ruth, who went with the property, for Ru' must be read 'thou must buy.' So the Moabitess, the wife of the Moabite Ruth. The true goel accordingly transferred his rights to Boaz, who came next to him in the degree of relationship. In all these cases the underlying idea is that the land is the inalienable property of the clan or 'family' (Ru 2') in the wider sense.

The duties of the goel, however, extended not merely to the property but also to the person of a relative. Should the latter have been compelled by misfortune to sell himself as a slave, it fell to his next of kin to redeem him. Hence arose an extensive use of the verb and its participle in a figurative sense, by which J is represented as a goel (EV redeemer), and Israel as His redeemed (so esp. in Is 41', 42', and oft.).

2. The most serious of all the duties incumbent on the goel, in earlier times more particularly, was that of avenging the murder of a relative. In this capacity he was known as the avenger of blood (g'd m had-dam). The practice of blood-revenge is one of the most widely spread customs of human society, and is by no means confined to the Semitic races, although it is still found in full vigour among the modern Arabs. By the Bedouin of the Sinai Peninsula, for instance, vendetta is kept up to the fifth generation (see the interesting details given in Lord Cromer's Report on Egypt, 1906, 13 ff.). In primitive times, therefore, if a Hebrew was slain, it was the sacred duty of his next of kin to avenge his blood by procuring the death of his slayer. This, it must be emphasized, was in no sense a matter of private vengeance. It was the affair of the whole clan, and even tribe, of the murdered man (2 S 14'), the former, as it were, delegating its rights to the nearest relatives. Hebrew legislation sought to limit the application, and generally to regulate the exercise, of this principle of a life for a life. Thus the Book of the Covenant removes from its application the case of accidental homicide (Ex 21'; cf. Dt 19', Nu 35'-41'), while the legislation of Dt. further restricts the sphere of the vendetta to the actual criminal (Dt 19'). In the original legislation the local high places appear as asylums for the manslaughter, until his case should be proved to be one of wilful murder, when he was handed over to the relatives of the man he had slain (Ex 21', Nu 35'). With the abolition of the local sanctuaries by the reforms of Josiah, it was necessary to appoint certain special sanctuaries, which are known as cities of refuge (see Refuges [Critas of]).

An interesting feature of the regulation concerning blood-revenge among the Hebrews is the almost total absence (cf. Ex 21') of any legal provision for compensation with the relatives of the murdered man by means of a money payment, the point of the Greeks (see Butter and Lang's tr. of the Odyssey, 408 fl.) and the wager of Saxon and Old English law.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KINAH.—A town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15'). The site is unknown. Cf. Kenanah.

KINDNESS.—The pattern of all kindness is set before us in the Bible in the behaviour of God to our race. He gives the sunshine and the rain, and fruitful seasons and glad hearts, food and all the good they have to the just and the unjust alike (Mt 5' 7', Ac 14'). But the exceeding wealth of His grace is shown unto us in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus (Eph 2'). God's glory no man can look upon and live. It is a light that no man can approach unto. It is inconceivably great, incomprehensibly grand, unimaginably exalted above the grasp of man's mind. But the kindness of God is God's glory stooping to man's need. It is God's power brought within man's reach. It is God's mercy and God's love and God's grace flowing through time and through eternity, as broad as the race, as deep as man's need, as long as man's immortality. The Bible reveals it. Jesus incarnated it. In His life the kindness of God is found its supreme manifestation. The children of God are to be like the Father in this regard (Mt 5', Ro 12', Col 3'). The philanthropy of men (Tit 3') is to be reproduced in the philanthropy of God (2 F 1').

D. A. HAYES.

KING.—1. Etymology and use of the term.—The Heb. name for 'king' (malk) is connected with the root meaning 'advice,' counsel,' rule,' and it seems to have first signified 'the wise man, the counsellor,' and then 'the ruler. The root occurs in the names of several Semitic deities, e.g. Molech, the tribal god of the Ammonites, and the Phoen. Melkart. In the days of Abraham we find the title 'king' applied to the rulers of the city-states of Palestine, e.g. Sodom, Gomorrah, etc. (Gn 14'). We also find references to kings in all the countries bordering on Canaan—Syria, Moab, Ammon, Egypt, etc., and in later times Assyria, Babylonia and Persia. In the NT the title 'king' is applied to the vassal-king Herod (Mt 2', Li 1') and to Agrippa (Ac 25'). In the Psalms and the Prophecies God Himself is constantly designated 'King of Israel' or 'my King' (e.g. Is 43' 44', Ps 105' 114; 9. 10 44' 74' 84' etc.), and the Messianic advent of the true King of the Kingdom of God is predicted (Zc 9', Is 22', etc.). In the New Testament the Christ is represented as the fulfilment of this prophecy and as the true King of God's Kingdom (cf. Jn 18', 21, 1 Ti 6', Rev 17').

The office of king in Israel.—(1) Institution. The settlement of the people of Israel in Canaan, and the change from a nomadic to an agricultural life, laid the incommens open to ever fresh attacks from new adventurers. Thus in the time of the judges we find Israel ever liable to hostile invasion. In order to preserve the nation from extermination, it became necessary that a closer connexion and a more intimate bond of union should exist between the different tribes. The judges in the period subsequent to the settlement open, with the possible exception of Gideon (Jg 8'), to have been little more than local or tribal heroes, carrying on guerilla warfare against their neighbours. The recognised in the west of the Philistines made it clear to the patriotic minds that the tribes must be more closely connected, and that a permanent leader in war was a necessity. Accordingly Saul the Benjamite was appointed by Samuel (1 S 10'), and appointed by popular acclamation (16' 11'). The exploits of Saul and his sons against the Ammonites (11'), against the Amalekites (15'), and against the Philistines (14') showed the value of the kingly office. When his sons fell on Mt. Gilboa, it was not long till David the outlaw chief of Judah was invited to fill his place.
KING

KINGDOM OF GOD (OR HEAVEN)

(2) The duties of the king are partly indicated by the history of the rise of the kingship. The king was (a) leader in war. He acted as general, and in person led the troops to battle (cf. Saul on Mt. Gilboa, 1 S 31; Abash at Ramoth-gilead, 1 K 22:11). By and by a standing army grew up, and forresses were placed on the frontiers (cf. 1 K 12:17, 2 Ch 17). (b) Besides being leader of the army in war, the king was the supreme judge (cf. 2 S 14:4, 1 K 3:4). Before the institution of the monarchy judicial functions were exercised by the heads of the various houses—the elders. These elders were gradually replaced by officials appointed by the king (2 Ch 19:10), and the final appeal was to the king himself, who in Am 2:9 is called 'the judge.' (c) The king's advice was sought by the prophetess and by other elders. The king was also the chief minister from a religious point of view. This idea has been lost sight of by later Jewish writers, but there is little doubt that in early times the king regarded himself as the supreme religious director, the chief priest. Thus Saul sacrifices in Samuel's absence (1 S 13:14-14:29), so also David (2 S 6:12-24); while both David and Solomon see to appoint and dismiss the chief priest at pleasure (cf. 2 S 8:17, 1 K 2:27-28), and both bless the people (2 S 6:1, 1 K 3:4). Jeroboam sacrifices in person before the altar in Bethel (1 K 12:25), and Ahaz orders a special altar to be made, and offers sacrifices to it (2 K 16:10). In later times, however, the priestly functions of the kings were less frequently exercised, priests being appointed, who are usually regarded as royal officials and not as ministers among the other servants (2 S 8:18). (3) The kingship hereditary. It was a fixed idea in ancient Israel that the office of the kingship passed from father to son, as the judgeship passed from Gideon to his son Jephthah, or from Samuel to his sons (1 S 8:17). Although Saul was chosen by the people and David invited by the elders of Judah to be king, yet Saul himself regarded it as the natural thing that Jonathan should succeed him (1 S 20:33-35). Adonijah assumed that he had a right to the throne (1 K 1:11), and even the succession of his younger half-brother Solomon was secured without any popular election. It is impossible to speak of an elective monarchy in Israel. The succession in Judah remained all along in the house of David, and in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes father always succeeded son, unless violence and revolution destroyed the royal house and brought a new king to the throne. (4) Power of the king. While the monarchy in Israel differed considerably from other Oriental despots, it could not be called a limited monarchy in our sense of the term. The king's power was limited by the fact that, to begin with, the royal house differed little from other chief houses of the nation. Saul, even after his election, resided on his ancestral estate, and came for the most as a private citizen (cf. 1 S 11:8). On the one hand, law and ancient custom exercised considerable restraint on the kings; while, on the other hand, acts of deroping violence were allowed to pass unquestioned. A powerful ruler like David or Solomon was able to do much that would have been impossible for a weakling like Rehoboam. Solomon was practically an Oriental despot, who grounded down the people by taxation and forced labour. David had the power to command the death of Uriah and take his wife, but public opinion, as expressed by the prophets, exerted a considerable influence on the kings (cf. Nathan and David, Elijah and Ahab). The idea was never lost sight of that the office was instituted for the good of the nation, and that it ought to be a help, not a burden, to the people at large. Law and ancient custom were, in the people's minds, placed before the kingly authority. Naboth can refuse to sell his vineyard to Ahab, and the king is unable to compel him, or to appoint a horseman to drink his wine for him. Naboth has been regularly condemned before a judicial tribunal (1 K 21:8). Thus the king himself was under law (cf. Dt. 17:16-20), and he does not seem to have had the power to promulgate new enactments. Josiah basis his reform not on a new law, but on the newly found Book of the Law (2 K 22:6-9), to which he and the elders swear allegiance. (5) Royal income. The early kings, Saul and David, do not seem to have subjected the people to heavy taxation. Saul's primitive court would be supported by his ancestral estate and by the booty taken from the enemy, perhaps along with personal compulsory, from his friends or subjects (1 S 10:7-16). The census taken by David (2 S 24:3) was probably intended as a base for taxation, as was also Solomon's division of the land into twelve districts (1 K 4). Eliezer (45: 46), speaks of crown lands, and such seem to have been held by David (1 Ch 27:30). The kings in the days of Amos laid claim to the first cutting of grass for the royal horses (Am 7). Caravans passing from Egypt to Damascus paid toll (1 K 10:8), and in the days of Solomon foreign trade by sea seems to have been a royal monopoly (1 K 10:10). It is not quite certain whether anything of the nature of a land tax or property tax existed, though something of this kind may be referred to in the reward promised by Saul to the sleyer of Goliath (1 S 17); and it may have been the tenth mentioned in 1 S 8. Special policy is imposed to meet special emergencies (cf. 2 K 23), and the kings of Judah made free use of the Temple treasures. (6) Royal officials have the general title 'princes' (qadoth). These included (a) the commander-in-chief, 'the captain of the host,' who in the absence of the king commanded the army (e.g. Joab, 2 S 12:27). (b) The prefect of the royal bodyguard, the leader of the fifty men of valour' (1 K 19:15), and the 'Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 S 8:20). (c) The recorder, lit. 'one who calls to remembrance.' His functions are nowhere defined, but he seems to have held an influential position, and was probably the chief minister among the other servants (2 S 8:16, 2 K 18:2). (d) The scribe (sohr) frequently mentioned along with the 'recorder' seems to have attended to the royal correspondence, and to have been the Chancellor or 'Secretary of State' (2 S 8:24, 2 Ch 24). (e) The officer who was 'over the tribute' (2 S 20:9) seems to have superintended the forced labour and the collecting of the taxes. (f) The governor of the royal household, the royal steward or High Priest, seems to have held an important position in the days of the later monarchy (Is 36:22, 22:1). Mention is also made of several minor officials, such as the king's 'officer' (2 K 22:7), the king's 'friend' (1 K 4:9), the 'king's counselor' (1 Ch 27:9), the 'head of the wardrobe' (2 K 22:4), the head of the eunuchs (AV 'officers,' 1 S 8:9), the 'governor of the city' (1 K 22:10). We hear much from the prophets of the oppression and injustice practised by these officials on the poor of the land (cf. Am 2:10, 1 S 9, Jer 15, Mic 3 etc.). W. F. Boyce.

KINGDOM OF GOD (or HEAVEN).—The Biblical writers assume that the Creator of the heavens and the earth must needs be also the everlasting Ruler of the same. The universe is God's dominion, and every creature therein is subject to His power. And so the Hebrew poets conceive God as the sovereign of all the regions and forms of nature. Wind and storm, fire and earthquake, lightnings and torrents of waters are but so many signs of the activity of the Almighty Ruler of the world (Ps 18:7-15, Mal 2:21). The same heavenly Power is also the supreme Sovereign of man and nations. 'The kingdom is Jehovah's, and he is the ruler over the nations' (Ps 22:28), 'Jehovah is king over all the earth' (Zec 14:9). He steth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are grasshoppers. He bringeth princes to nothing' (Is 40:24). This general idea of God's dominion over all things receives various forms of statement from the various Biblical writers, and the entire presentation constitutes a most important portion of the revelation of God and of Christ. But the Biblical doctrine has its OT and NT setting.

1. In the Old Testament.-Apart from that general concept of God as Maker and Governor of the whole world, the OT writers emphasize the Divine care for individuals, families, tribes, and nations of men. It is God who takes care of those creation who exist in His image and likeness that calleth for our special study, and this great truth is manifest from various points of view.

(1) From Am 9:10 we learn that Jehovah is the supreme Ruler of all the peoples: Assyrians, Philistines, Edomites, as well as the tribes of Israel, were led by Him and settled in their separate lands. So He gave all the nations their inheritance (Dt 32:8). But one most conspicuous feature of the OT revelation is God's selection of Abraham and his posterity to be made a blessing to all the families of the earth. When this peculiar family had become a numerous people in the land of Egypt, God led them marvellously out of that house of bondage and adopted them to be 'a people for his own possession above all peoples upon the face of the earth' (Dt 7:6), and 'a kingdom of priests and a holy nation' (Ex 19:6). The subsequent facts of the history of this chosen people reveal a noteworthy aspect of the Kingdom of God among men. (2) Along with this idea of the election and special guidance of this people there was gradually developed a lofty doctrine of the Person and power and the holiness of the God of Israel.

The unique and sublime monolatry, which worshipped Jehovah as greatest of all the gods (Ex 15:18), there issued the still higher and broader monothetism of the great prophets, who denied the real existence of any other god or Saviour besides the Holy One of Israel. He was conceived as seated on a lofty throne, surrounded with holy seraphs and the innumerable hosts of heaven. Namely, for the naturally highest embodiment of personal power, and godhead and adopted them to be 'a people for his own possession above all peoples upon the face of the earth' (Dt 7:6), and 'a kingdom of priests and a holy nation' (Ex 19:6). In the case of the heavenly kingdom became also enlarged so as to include the idea of a righteous Judge of all the earth. This idea appears conspicuously in the vision of Dan 7:13 where the Eternal is seen upon Him. Thought of fiery flames, with ten thousand times ten thousand ministering before Him. His execution of judgment is as a stream of fire which issues from His presence and devours His adversaries. Zechariah 3:2 also represents Him as 'gathering the nations and assembling the kingdoms,' in order to pour out upon them the fire of His fierce anger. And so in prophecies, in psalms, and in historical narrative we find frequent declarations of Jehovah about His entering into judgment with the nations and also with His own people. The unmistakable doctrine of all these Scriptures is that God is the supreme Judge and Ruler of the world. His overthrow of mighty civilizations, like Nineveh and Babylon, is a way of His 'executing judgment in the earth,' and the prophets call such a national catastrphé a 'day of Jehovah.' (3) The Messianic prophecies throw further light on the NT doctrine of the Kingdom of God. From the times of David and Solomon towards the highest ideal of 'the Anointed of Jehovah' was that of a powerful and righteous king of Israel. The name of David became a synonym of the ideal king and shepherd of the people (Hos 3:5; 14:5). These ideals became the growing Messianic hope of Israel. According to Is 9:6, 7, the child of wonderful names is to sit 'upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it in judgment and in righteousness for ever.' In Ps 2 we have a dramatic picture of Jehovah establishing His Son as King upon Zion, and in Ps 110 the conquering hero, to whom Jehovah says, 'Sit thou at my right hand until I make thy enemies thy footstool.' united in Himself the threefold office of king, priest, and judge. (5) In all these and in other Messianic scriptures we should notice that the 'sitting upon' the throne of Jehovah is an exalted associate of the Most High. He executes judgment in the earth; He himself possesses no wisdom or power to act apart from Jehovah. We also note the fact that God's dominion over the earth is entirely compatible with diverse forms of human administration. It is not a question of essences toJson much spiritual penetration, and his baptism of repentance was a Divinely appointed preparation for the Kingdom of heaven which he declared was close at hand.

The chief source of the NT doctrine is the teaching of Jesus Christ Himself. His preaching and that of His first disciples announced the Kingdom of heaven as at hand (Mt 4:17, Mk 1:15). Such a proclamation could have meant only to the hearers that the reign of the Messiah, of whom the prophets had spoken, was about to come.

The real nature of this Kingdom, however, is to be learned only by a careful study of the various sayings of Jesus upon the subject. (a) It should first be observed that our Lord gave no sanction to the current Jewish expectation of a temporal prince, who would fight for dominion and exercise worldly forms of power. He did not directly oppose the prevalent belief, so as to provoke opposition, but sought rather to inculcate a more spiritual and heavenly conception of the Kingdom. His views were evidently different from those of John, for while He exalted him as His immediate forerunner, 'greater than he,' was recognized, and never passed beyond the necessary limitations of the pre-Messianic age. (b) The spiritual and heavenly character of the Kingdom is indicated, and indeed emphasized, by the phrase 'Kingdom of heaven.' This accords with the statement that the Kingdom is not of this world (Jn 18:36), and comes not with observation (Lk 17:27). It belongs, therefore, to the unseen and the spiritual. It is the spiritual inheritance of the 'poor in spirit,' 'the meek' in the 'righteousness' sake,' and whose righteousness shall exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5:10, 12, 30).

The great ones in this Kingdom are such as become like little children (Mt 18:4), and as to rulership and all glory to the greatest, as the minister and bond-servant of all (Mk 10:42, 43).

It may be noticed that the phrase 'Kingdom of heaven' (or 'of the heavens') is peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew, in which it occurs about thirty times. In 2 Ti 4:1 we read of 'his heavenly kingdom,' but elsewhere the term employed is 'kingdom of God.' There is no good reason to doubt that Jesus Himself made use of all these expressions, and we should not look to find any recondite or peculiar significance in any one of them. The phrase 'kingdom of God' occurs also four times in Mt., and often in the other Gospels and in the Acts and Epistles. We may observe, for illustration and suggestion, 'the Father's kingdom' (Mt 26:29), 'my heavenly Father' (Mt 15:28), and observe in the parallel texts of Mt 22:21, Mk 14:27, Lk 19:13, the Lord spoke, was about to enter the kingdom,' 'my kingdom,' and 'the kingdom of God.' All these designations indicate that the Kingdom is heavenly in its very nature.

(c) The parables of Jesus are especially important for learning the nature and mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven. They show in many ways that the heavenly Kingdom has to do with the spiritual nature and possibilities of man, and is, in fact, the dominion of Jesus Christ over the hearts of men. They show also that the Kingdom has its necessary collective and communal relations upon this a prophet,' and 'every one that receiveth the Kingdom of God.' The parables which teach that to govern an individual life have also their profound application to the life of a community and of all organized societies of men. Several of our Lord's parables indicate the judicial transfer of the Kingdom of heaven from the Jews to the Gentiles (Mt 21:28-45, Lk 19:1-10). The parable of the Two Sons warned the Jewish priests and elders that publicans and harlots might go into the Kingdom of God before them (Mt 21:31-44). From all this it is evident that the Kingdom of heaven includes the dispensation of heavenly grace and redemption which was inaugurated and is now continuously carried forward by the Lord Jesus. It is essentially spiritual, and its holy mysteries of regeneration and the righteousness of faith can be only spiritually discerned. (d) The important petitions in the Lord's prayer, 'Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth,' are of great value in determining the nature of the Kingdom. This prayer assumes by its very terms a moral and spiritual relationship and the ideal of a moral order in the universe of God. As the word 'kingdom' implies an organized community, so the will of God implies in those who do it a conformity to God in spiritual nature and actions. The coming Kingdom is not a material worldly establishment, but it has its foundations in the unseen and eternal, and its power and growth will become manifest among men and nations according as the Son of God is done on earth as it is in heaven. The performance of all the will of God requires in moral beings may vary in degrees of perfect observance in heaven in the world. It is especially remarkable in being a measure of perfection far above that of earthly things. But the members of the Kingdom of God, whether on earth or in heaven, have this in common, that they all do the will of the heavenly Father. (e) So far as the Gospel of John supplies additional teachings of Jesus concerning the Kingdom of God, it is in essential harmony with what we find in the Synoptics, but it has its own peculiarities of statement.

In 3:6, 'Except a man be born from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' The Kingdom, then, is not a spectacle of worldly vision, but has to do first of all with the inner life of man. Jesus said to Nicodemus that no one can receive anything unless it be given him from heaven (Jn 3:1-3). In 4:14-15 Jesus explained this to the Samaritan woman. The Kingdom is spiritual and is to be seen only by the man who has believed that Jesus is the Messiah. The Kingdom is the Kingdom of the Son of Man. The Son of Man is the fulfiller of the predictions concerning the Messianic King. The Kingdom is the Kingdom of God, and the phrase is used by the Lord Jesus Christ as a means by which He describes that kingdom or reign of God which is not of this world, but which is to come in the Spirit (Jn 17:12). The Kingdom of God is the heavenly kingdom which has as its King Jesus Christ. The Kingdom of God is the Kingdom of the Spirit. (f) In the Paralitc Epistles, the Kingdom of God is represented as the blessed spiritual inheritance of all who enjoy life in God through faith in Jesus Christ. Its spiritual character is obvious from Ro 14:3, where, in discussing questions concerning touching meats and drinks, it is said that 'the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.' So it is not a dominion that concerns itself about ceremonial pollutions; it grasps rather after the attainment of all spiritual righteousness. It is impossible for the unrighteous and idolaters, and thieves and extortioners, and such like, to inherit this Kingdom (1 Co 5:9, Gal 5:19, Eph 5:5). (g) Other portions of the NT add filling to this doctrine of the Kingdom, but offer no essentially different idea. In He 12:28 mention is made of our 'receiving a kingdom that cannot be shaken.' The context has in view the removal of some things that were of a nature to be shaken, and the allusion is to the old fabric of defunct Judaism, which was a cult of burdensome ritual, and had become 'old and aged and nigh unto vanishing away' (Gal 3:24). These temporary things and their 'sanctuary of this world,' which were at the most only 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things,' must needs be shaken down and pass away in order that the immovable Kingdom of heaven might be revealed and abide as an 'eternal inheritance.' The old Jerusalem and its temporary cult must pass away and give place to the 'heavenly Jerusalem,' which affords personal communion and fellowship with God and a glimpse of the immaterial habitation of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect (12:28-29).

(5) Eschatological elements of the NT doctrine.—Questions of the time and manner of the coming of the kingdom of God were a favorite topic of the teachings of Jesus. Numerous sayings of Jesus, and the prophecies of the OT, as well as the teaching of the NT writers, which have seemed difficult to harmonize. From the point of view of the Son of God and of the first Apostles, the Kingdom of heaven was at hand, but not yet come. The coming of the Kingdom is also associated with the Parousia, or coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, the resurrection, and the final judgment of all men and nations. Jesus spoke of 'the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory' (Mt 19:28). His great eschatological discourse, reported in all the Synoptics (Mt 24, Mk 13, Lk 21), represents His coming and the end of the age as in the near future, before that generation should pass. It also clearly makes the sublime Parousia follow immediately after the woes attending the ruin of the city and Temple of Jerusalem. Also in Mt 18 and the parallels in Mk. and Lk. Jesus' parables are eschatologically interpreted. There are some of these that stand here who shall in no wise taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. The exegetical problem is to show how these statements may be united to form a gradually growing power and dominion which appears in Daniel's vision of the stone which 'became a great mountain and filled the whole earth' (2:35), and is also implied in Jesus' parables of the Mustard Seed, the Leaven, and the Seed Growing Secretly.—'If the blind lead the blind, the both fall into the pit.' (Mt 15:14). The problem is also complicated by the fact that nearly two thousand years have passed since these words of Jesus were spoken, and 'the end of the world' is not yet. Of the many attempts at the explanation of these difficulties we here mention only three.

(a) A considerable number of modern critics adopt the hypothesis that the new Jerusalem of Jesus was misconstrued by those who heard Him, and have been reported in a confused and self-contradictory manner. The disciples confounded the fall of the Temple with the end of all things, but Jesus probably distinguished the two events in a way that does not now appear in the record. Statements scattered in fragments of a small Jewish apocalypse have been incorporated in Mt 24. This hypothesis is supported by the fact that the exponent of the NT is to be understood, inter alia, as a considerable amount of conjecture, and leaves the various eschatological sayings of Jesus in a very untrustworthy condition.

(b) According to another class of expositors, the prophecies of Mt 24 contain a double sense, the primary reference being to the fall of Jerusalem, whereas the ultimate fulfillment, of which the first is a sort of type, is to take place at the Second Coming of Christ and the end of the world. It is believed that the two events are closely conjoined, but it is thought that vv.32-38 deal mainly with the former event, and from v.39 onwards the latter subject is swallowed up in the greater, and the statements made refer mainly to the still future coming of the Lord. But scarcely any two interpreters, who adopt the double-sense theory, agree in their exposition of the different parts of the chapter.

(c) Another method of explaining and adjusting the teaching of Jesus and of all the NT statements about the coming of Christ, the resurrection and the judgment, is to understand all these related events as part and parcel of the consummation of the Kingdom of God, according to Jesus (Lk 17:20), is not a matter of physical observation, so that one could say, 'Lo, it is here!' or, 'Lo, it is there!' Like the lightning it may appear in the east or in the west, or anywhere under the whole heaven, at one and the same moment of time. Nevertheless, no reported sayings of Christ are more positive or more notably reiterated than his declarations that some of His contemporaries would live to see the kingdom of God come with power and glory. 'This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled' (Mt 16:28).

The coming of a kingdom which belongs to the things unseen, heavenly and eternal, is not a matter to be limited to a given day or hour. There need be, then, no contradiction or inconsistency in the sayings of Jesus as they now stand in the Gospels. No great and noteworthy event could more decisively have marked the end of the pre-Messianic age and the Jewish cult than the destruction of the Temple. But the powers of the age to come were manifested before that apocalyptic crisis, and the 'times and seasons' of such spiritual, unseen things are not matters for men or angels or even God. Nevertheless, it is noteworthy that the NT writers, in their view of the relationship of the new age to the present one, have emphasized the fact that it will not be an immeasurable length of time before the consummation of all things. Thus, the NT writers emphasize the nearness of the Kingdom of God, and the continuous answer to the prayer, 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.' The Apostles, like their Lord, thought and spoke of things supernatural and invisible after the manner of the Hebrew prophets. St. Paul's picture of the Lord's coming from heaven (1 Th 1:10-11) is in striking accord with the language of Mt 24:29-34, and yet has its own peculiar points of difference. In Ro 14:19 he speaks of 'the God of peace' bruising Satan' under your feet shortly, and in 2 Th 2:17 he teaches that the Antichrist, 'the man of sin,' is destined to be destroyed by the manifestation of the coming of the Lord Jesus. It was probably not given to the Apostle to understand that he saw in the vision of a moment which would occupy millenniums. In his forms of speech he may introduce personal or hypothetical ways of thinking and speaking, and a failure to distinguish times and seasons and methods in which the Kingdom of heaven is ultimately to overcome the prince of the powers of wickedness in high places. But in all essentials of content his prophetic picture of the coming and triumph is true to fact and to the teaching of the Lord Himself. St. Paul also speaks of the Kingdom of God as an inheritance. It is in part a present possession, but it contemplates also a future eternal blessedness. The redeemed 'shall reign in life through Jesus Christ.' Our heavenly Father makes us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, draws us out of the power of darkness and translates us into the kingdom of the Son of his love' (Col 1:12, 13). Such heirs of God are 'sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of God's own possession' (Eph 1:14).

According to this conception of the heavenly Kingdom, Christ is now upon His throne and continuously making all things new. His Parousia is millennial. He is drawing all men unto Himself, and the resurrection of the dead is as continuous as His life and His age. Whenever 'the earthly house' of any one of His servants is dissolved, he has a new habitation from God, 'a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' (2 Esd
KINGS, BOOKS OF

20:1-4). Each man must have his own last day, and each one be made manifest and answer for himself before the judgment-seat of Christ. And when all things are ultimately true in Christ, then shall the Son of God Himself have perfected His redemptive reign, and God shall be all in all. See AUTHORITY, DOMINION, PAROUSIA, POWER.

KINGS, BOOKS OF — 1. Title, etc.—This is the name of two well-known narrative books of the OT. In Heb. MSS and early printed editions they appear as one book, and even to the present day the Massoretic note appears at the end of the second Book only. The division into two was made for the convenience of Greek readers, and passed from the LXX to the Vulgate, and so to the Church. In fact, the division between the parts of the great narrative which extends from Genesis to 2 Kings is more or less arbitrary,—there is no clear line of demarcation between 2 Samuel and 1 Kings, any more than between 1 and 2 Kings.

2. Method and sources.—What we have just said does not imply that the Books of Kings are exactly like the other historical books. They differ in their method, and in the way in which the narrative is presented. The most striking feature is the attempt to date the events recorded, and to keep two parallel lines of history before the reader. The period of time they cover is something over 400 years, and when it is remembered that these books are in subjection unto the historians of events in Israel for this period, their historical value will be evident. At the same time, the light they throw on the method by which the Biblical authors worked is almost equally great. To eliminate the historical value, it will be necessary to look at the literary method. The phenomenon which first strikes the reader's attention is the unevenness of the narrative. In some cases we have an extended and detailed story; in others, a few perfunctory words. The reign of Solomon occupies eleven chapters—about a fourth part of the work; while the longer reign of Manasseh is disposed of in sixteen verses. From our point of view there is reason to think that the reign of Manasseh was quite as interesting and quite as important as the other.

Still closer examination shows that there are well-marked characteristics of style in certain sections which are replaced by equally marked but totally different ones in other sections. Moreover, there are seemingly contradictory assertions which can hardly have come from the same pen, though they might have occurred in different documents, and have been retained by the compiler who did not fully realize their force. Thus the account of Solomon's forced labour 'raised out of all Israel' seems inconsistent with the other declaration that Solomon made the band-servants of Israel (1 K 4:23 and 2:2). One passage says without qualification that there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days; another tells us how Rehoboam gathered a mighty army, but dismissed it at the word of a prophet. These indications of a compulsory activity, such as we find also in other parts of the OT, are confirmed by the author's reference to some of the books from which he has drawn. Two of these are mentioned so often that they attract the attention of every reader. They are the Books of Annals (in our version 'books of chronicles') of the kings of Israel and of the kings of Judah. To these we may add the references to the BOM of the Acts of Solomon. The author had these three books in his hand, and, what is of more importance, he thought his readers would be likely to have them at their command.

This is the reason why he refers to them—that they were not on his table for further detail. We may also find them in these books. It follows that these sources of his are not the archives of the two kingdoms, but regular books circulated and read among the people at large. But it is clear that other sources were drawn upon.

Some of the material cannot have come from either of the books named. The description of the Temple might supposedly have been embodied in the Acts of Solomon, though this seems improbable. But it is quite certain that the extended life of Elijah and the equally diffuse life of Elisha never had a place in the history of the kings. There must have been a Life of Elijah circulated by some of his disciples after his death, and the probability is strong that there was also a separate Life of Elisha. Whether these two may not have been embodied in a general work on the Lives of the Prophets, where the sections which interested them were taken by our author, we may not be able to determine. That these sections did not come from the source with which they are most nearly combined is evident from the difference in tone and point of view. Ahab appears very differently in the Elijah sections and in the chapters which treat of the Syrian wars.

The narratives which deal with Isaiah suggest reflexions similar to those which come to our mind in looking at Elijah and Elisha. They look like portions of a biography of Isaiah. This biography was not our Book of Isaiah, in which some sections are duplicates of what we find in the Second Book of Kings. But other portions of the Book of Isaiah have been drawn from the same Life of Isaiah which furnished the duplicate material of which we have spoken.

Although some of the points that may have been touched upon are more or less familiar, we are justified in saying that the Books of Kings are a compilation from at least five separate sources—three which the author cites by name, a Temple chronicle, and a History of the Prophets. The hypothesis of compilation explains some of the discrepancies already noted, and it also explains some of the violent transitions in the narrative. Ch. 20 of 1 Kings is inserted between two passages which belong together, and which are in duplicate. The author introduces Benhadad as though we knew him, when in fact we have not heard of him. In like manner Elijah appears suddenly in the narrative, without the slightest intimation as to who he is or what he has been. Ahab. These indications confirm the theory of compilation, and they show also that the author has in no case (so far as we can discover) embodied the whole of any one of his sources in his work. He used his freedom according to his main purpose, taking out what suited that purpose and leaving the rest behind.

3. Purpose.—The next inquiry is, What was the purpose which explains the book? In answer to this question we must at once see that it was not for purposes of history. The author was not trying to write history; he was trying to enforce a lesson. For those who were interested in the history as history he gave references to the sources in which the history could be found. For himself, there was something more important—this was to point a moral so plainly that his people would take heed to it and act accordingly. This comes to view plainly in the recurring sentences which make up what has been called the framework of the book. These are not always exactly alike—sometimes they are scanty, sometimes they are fuller. But they are the same in purport. A complete example is the following: 'Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab, king of Israel. Thirty-five years old was Jehoshaphat when he began to reign; and twenty-five years he reigned in Jerusalem; and his mother's name was Azubah, daughter of Shilhi. He walked in all the way of Asa, his father; he turned not from it, doing right in the eyes of Jahweh. Only the high places were not removed,—the people continued sacrificing and offering at the high places. ... And the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat and the mighty deeds that he did—are they not written in the Book of Annals of the kings of Judah?' ... And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David, and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead' (1 K 22:31-34, 40). The first part of this formula is found at the beginning of a reign, the rest at the end. Sometimes there is so little recorded about a king that the two parts come in immediate sequence. But usually they are separated by a narrative, longer or shorter according to what the author thinks fit to give us. The framework itself shows that the author desires to preserve the name of the king, his age at accession, and name of his reign, the name of his mother, who was of course the first lady of the land. These items he was interested in, just because his work would not have been a history without them. But what most interested him was the judgment by which he felt justified in pronouncing on the character of the monarch. The very fact that he gives such a judgment in every case shows that he had before him more material than he has handed down to us, for it would have been obviously unjust to pronounce so positively if he had as little ground for his opinion as in many cases he gives to us.

It is important to notice the reference to the high places which comes in immediate sequence to the judgment on the character of the king. The high places in the opinion of later times were illegitimate places of worship. Their toleration casts a shadow on the purity of kings otherwise commendable, while their destruction is regarded as a proof of religious zeal. What light this throws on the date of the book will appear later. For the present it is sufficient that the treatment of the high places distinguishes the good kings, which the kings are graded in excellence. The first place is given to Horekiah and Josiah (who are classed with David), just because they did away with these sanctuaries. Hereafter we notice that all the kings, Assa, Jeshophat, Jehochab of Judah, Amaziah, Uzziah, and Joatham, and we notice that they all effected certain reforms in the Temple. With reference to each of these, the condition of the Temple is temporarily by the statement that the high places were not taken away. In the third class we find the remaining kings of Judah, and all the kings of Israel, who are condemned as bad. The formula for the kings of Israel is not quite the same as the one just noticed. For one thing, the name of the queen-mother is not given—whether because the names had not been handed down, or because they were thought to be of minor importance after the destruction of the kingdom, is not clear. The formula may be illustrated by the one used for Baasha,—In the third year of Assa king of Judah, Baasha son of Ahijah became king over Israel in Tirzah, (and reigned) twenty-four years. He built the eyes of Jahweh, and he walked in the ways of Jeroboam, and in his sin by which he made Israel sin... And the rest of the affairs of Baasha, and what he did, and his power, are not written in the Book of Ammals of the kings of Israel? And Baasha slept with his fathers and was buried in Tirzah, and Elah his son reigned in his stead' (1 K 15:24-25). The reason given for the condemnation which is visited on all the kings of the Northern Kingdom is that they walked in the ways of Jeroboam, that is, that they fostered the worship of the golden bullocks (calves they are called in derision) at Bethel and Dan. This is, in the eyes of the author, distinct rebellion against the God whose legitimate sanctuary is at Jerusalem.

While the longer quotations from his sources usually show the compiler's religious intent, yet he often presents us with brief notices for which he is probably indebted to the Books of Annals, but which have no very direct bearing on his main object. Thus in the case of Jeshophat he inserts in his framework a brief notice to the effect that this king made peace with Israel. In the three monarchs between Zimri, Tibni, and Omri (1 K 16:29-32) he compresses the story of a prolonged civil war into a few lines. In the case of Omri we find a brief notice to the effect that this king built the city of Samaria, having bought the land from a man named Shemer (1 K 16:29). Such notices probably compress a detailed account in which Omri was glorified as the founder of the capital.

As some of these shorter notices duplicate what we find elsewhere, it seems as if the compiler made out his framework or epitome first and filled in his excerpts afterwards. In the insertion of these longer passages the religious motive is always apparent. The matter of supreme importance in the Book of Kings is the history of the God of Israel as carried on at the Temple in Jerusalem. He is under the influence known as Deuteronomistic. This is seen first in the phrases which recur in those sections which we suspect be from this composition. In many cases it is not possible to say whether these sections come from the hand of the compiler or whether they were inserted by one of his followers. This is, in fact, of minor importance,—if various hands have been concerned they worked under the same bias. The attitude taken towards the high places is distinctly Deuteronomistic, for the demand that these sanctuaries should be abolished was first formulated by Deuteronomy. Josiah's reforms, well known as the result of the finding of this book in the Temple. Hence the strong, we might say extravagant, commendation of this king.

Moreover, it was laid down by the writer of Deuteronomy that obedience to the law which he formulates will be followed by temporal well-being, and that disobedience will be punished by calamity. Now, one of the useful purposes of the compiler of the Book of Kings is to show how this has proved true in the past. He is less thorough in the application of this theory than the author of the Book of Chronicles, but that he has it at least in mind is evident in the way in which he gives the reasons for the fall of the kingdom. It is not always easy to see in this the punishment for the king's sins. The historic fact seems to be that the revolt preceded the defection, so that the punishment came upon the crime. In any case, the compiler has dealt freely with his material, dating both the defection and the revolt late in the king's reign, at a time when some weakness would excuse the wise man for yielding to his wishes.

The most distinct instance in which the author teaches his lesson is the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple. It was the custom with ancient historians, as we know, to compose speeches for their heroes which tell us what ought to have been said rather than what was actually said. Our author makes use of this perfectly legitimate literary device. A reading of the prayer shows that it is Deuteronomistic in word and thought throughout. More than one hand has been concerned in it, but the tone is that of the Deuteronomistic school. It confirms what has been said about the purpose of the book. It follows that the historical value of the work must be estimated with due allowance for this main purpose.

4. Date. The date of the Book of Kings in its present form cannot be earlier than the Babylonian exile. The latest event which it mentions is the release of king Jehoiachin from confinement, which took place in the year B.C. 561; and as the author speaks of the allowance made to the king 'all his life' (2 K 25:26), we conclude that he wrote after his death. It will not be far out of the way, therefore, to say that the work was completed about n.c. 550. Some minor insertions may have been made later. While this is so, there are some things which point to an earlier date for the greater part of the work. The purpose of the author to keep his people from the mistakes of the past is intelligible only at a time when the avoidance of the mistakes was still possible,—that is, before the fall of Jerusalem. We find also some phrases which indicate that the text containing those parts of the K.f. had not yet come. The recurrence of the phrase 'until this day' (1 K 8:5; cf. 9:1 12:9, 2 K 2:20 7:16) is one of these indications. It is, of course, possible that all these belong to the older sources from which the author drew, but this hardly seems probable. On these grounds it is now generally held that the substance of the book was compiled about n.c. 600, by a writer who was anxious to enforce the lesson of the past. This first edition extended to 2 K 23:22 or 2t. About fifty years later an author living in the Exile, and who sympathized with the main purpose of the book, composed a later form. The K.f. of 2 Chr runs, however, in some parts of the OT. This version contains some confirmation from the double scheme of chronology which runs through the book. As has been shown in the formula quoted above, there is a series of repetitions concerning the length of each king's reign, and also a series of synchronisms, according to which each king's accession is brought into relation with the era of his contemporary in the other kingdom. The two sources are not always consistent—a state of things which is best accounted for on the theory that one was the work of one author, the other the work of the other.

5. Text.—The text of the Books of Kings has not been transmitted with the Ezekiel, which has been shown in some parts of the OT. The LXX shows that early copies did not always agree in their wording or in the order of the paragraphs. In some cases the LXX has a better reading. But the differences are not such as to affect the meaning in any essential point.

H. F. SMITH.

KING'S GARDEN (2 K 25:7, Jer 39:22, Neh 3:25).—This garden was clearly near the 'gate of the two walls' which was near the Pool of Siloam, and it was in all probability just outside the walls, being irrigated by overflow water from the Siloam tunnel and pool, just as the land in this situation is treated to-day. Indeed, the garden may have covered much the same area as is now cultivated as irrigated vegetable garden by the women of Sibtan. See Kidron (Brook of), Siloam E. W. G. Masterman.

KIR.—An unidentified place, subject in the 8th and 7th cents. to Assyria. Amos (1:1), according to the present Hebrew text, predicted that the Arameans should be carried captive to Kir. In 9th he declared that Jahweh brought them from Kir. It is said in 2 K 16:19 that Tiglath-pileser carried the people of Damascus captive to Kir, while in 2 K 23:17 Kir is mentioned in connection with Elam as furnishing soldiers to the Assyrian army which fought against Israel. It has been identified with Kaur, a river flowing into the Caspian Sea; with Cyparissos; with the Erian province of Cyrus; with Cyprena; with Kerma in Media; with Kuris, north of Aleppo; with Koa of Ezekiel 34:24, which has been supposed to be the same as Guttum of the Barb-Assyr. inscriptions, which possessed a high civilization as early as n.c. 3000. In reality nothing certain is known of the locality of Kir. George A. Barron.

KIR (of Moab).—Coupled with Ar of Moab (Is 15:6), possibly identical with it. Following the Targum, Kir of Moab has long been identified with the modern Kerak, a place of great importance in the times of the Crusades. Kerak is situated on a lofty spur between the Wady el-Kerak and the Wady 'Atin Frani, about 4000 feet above the Dead Sea level. The hills behind rise much higher, so that it is commanded on every side by higher ground, which explains 2 K 3:8-27. It was surrounded by a wall of great thickness, and there are remains of ancient rock-hewn cisterns. The gates were to be reached only through long tunnels in the solid rock. C. H. W. Johns.

KIRAMA (1 Es 5:9) = Ear 2nd Ramah.

KIR-HARESET (Is 16:7, Kir-hareseth (2 K 3:8 AV [pau[form]), Kir-heres (Jer 44:29, Kir-hareseth (Is 16:7 AV [pau[form]).—A place of great strength and importance in Moab; generally regarded as identical with Kir of Moab (wh. see). The LXX and Vulg. take these names as phrases, and translate them on some more or less fanciful Hebrew etymology. The Targum on Isaiah renders Kerak tokhephon, which suggests that hareseth may be connected with the Assyrian harushu, 'a cliff,' etc., but the word may be Moabite or Canaanite, and seems to occur in Harosheth of the Gentiles (Jg 4:1, 11). The modern Ksar Haresch, 35 minutes' walk above Dera'a, is a similar title. C. H. W. Johns.

KIRIATH is the st. constr. of Kiriah, the complement of which, -jeirm, seems to have fallen out in Jos 19:3, from its resemblance to the word for cities which follows. Therefore we ought probably to read Kiriaith-jeirm, a reading supported by the LXX. W. Ewing.

KIRIATH-ARBA is used as a name for Hebron (wh. see) in Gn 23:6. Only in Gn 35:28 and Neh 11:15 is Arba written with the article. The city may have been so called as the seat of a confederacy between four men or tribes, or the name may be identical with Tereopit, 'the city of four quarters.' The Heb. text explains it as 'the city of Arba, 'the greatest man among the Anakim' (Jos 14:15 RV), or 'the father of Anak' (19:31). In the first passage LXX reads 'the city Argob, the metropolis of the Anakim'; in the second the city Arbo, metropolis.' Perhaps in the last two, therefore, we should read 'the mother of, I.e. the metropolis,' instead of 'abi, father.' W. Ewing.

KIRIATH-ARMIM (Ezr 2:29).—See KIRIATH-JEIRIM.

KIRIATH-BAAL.—See KIRIATH-JEIRIM.

KIRIATH-HUZOTH.—A spot unidentified, apparently between Ar-moa and Bamoth-baal (Nu 32:9, cf. v. 8). It may be Kureid, S. of Jebel 'Ammara. W. Ewing.

KIRIATH-JEIRIM (city of forests).—One of the cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 19:9), occupied by the Danites (Jg 19:4), on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 19:18). From there David brought up the ark (2 S 6:1, 1 Ch 13:8, 2 Ch 15). Its elder name appears to have been Kiriath-baal (Jos 19:9) or Baalah (Jos 19:13, 1 Ch 13). It is also mentioned as Baale Judah (2 S 6:7), and through a textual error as Kiriath-jeirim (1 Ch 14:15). It was probably, like Kedesh, Gezer, etc., an old Canaanite 'high place.' In Jer 26:8 it is mentioned as the home of Urah the prophet, the son of Shemaiah. (3 Kgs also 1 Ch 5:5, 1 Ch 13:10). In this last place it is called Kariathiarus. The site of this important ancient sanctuary and frontier town has been very generally accepted, since the 5th cent. A.D., as close to the site of the modern Kurit el-Enab, a flourishing little village on the high-road from Jerusalem to Nablus, about 9 miles from the latter. The ancient remains are to the W. of the village, but a handsome Crusading Church in the village itself has recently been restored. Kurit el-Enab is generally known as Abu Ghosh, after a family of semi-brigands of that name who established themselves there nearly a century ago, and for long held the whole surrounding country at their mercy. Another site, which has been powerfully advocated by Conder, is Khurbet `Erma, on the S. of the Vale of Sorek, just where the narrow valley opens into the plain. The similarity of `arim (Ex 23:29) and `erma, and the nearness of this site to Zorah and Eshtaol, are in its favour. There, too, is a great rock-platform which would appear to mark an ancient 'high place.' On the other hand, it is far from the other cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 9:25). The question cannot be considered as settled.

KIARAHT-SANNAH, KIARAHT-SEPHER

—See DEMH, No. 1.

KIISEUS.—The form in Ad. Est. 110 of Kish (Est 2:9), the name of the great-grandfather of Mordecai. See Kish, No. 4.

KISH.—1. The father of Saul the first king of Israel (1 S 9:10ff. 14:1, Ac 13:3). His home was at Gibeath (rendered 'the hill of God' and 'the hill' in both AV and RV of 1 S 10:20 and 11:18). 2. The uncle of the foregoing (1 Ch 8:36). 3. The eponym of a family of Levites (1 Ch 23:27, 25:29). 4. A Benjaminite ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2:2).

KISHI.—A Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan (1 Ch 6:4; the parallel passage, 1 Ch 6:5, has Kushaiash, probably the correct form of the name).

KISHION.—A town allotted to Issachar (Jos 19:21), given to the Levites (21:29). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6:7, reads Kedesh, which is perhaps a textual error for Kishion. The latter name has not been recovered.

KISHON (Jos 4:5*, 1 K 18:27, Ps 83:5*).—The ancient name of the stream now called Nahar el-Makhtejeh, which drains almost the whole area of the Great Plain of Esdraelon. The main channel may be considered as rising near the W. foot of Mt. TaHore, and running W. through the centre of the plain until it enters the narrow valley between the S. extension of the Galilean hills and the E. end of Carmel. After emerging from this it enters the Plain of Akka, running a little N. of the whole length of Carmel, and enters the sea about a mile E. of Haifa. The total length is about 25 miles. In the first part of its course it is in winter a sluggish stream with a bottom of deep mud, and in summer but a chain of small marshes; from just below where the river is crossed by the Nazareth road to the S. of Carmel it usually has a certain amount of water all the year round, and in parts the water, which is brackish, is 10 or 12 feet deep. At its mouth, however, it is almost always fordable. Numerous small watercourses from the Galilean hills on the N. and more important tributaries from 'Little Hermos,' the Mountains of Gilboa, and the whole southern range of Samaria and Carmel on the E. and S., contribute their waters to the main stream. The greater number of these channels, in places 10 or 15 feet deep with precipitous sides, are perfectly dry two-thirds of the year, but during the winter's rains are filled with raging torrentia. A number of copious springs arise along the edge of the hills to the S. of the plain. At Jemmis there are plentiful fountains, but they are, during the summer, entirely used up in irrigation; at Tar’min, at Leqjoum, near el-Koft, at the E. end of Carmel, and at the 'Ayun el-Safl, perennial fountains pour their water into the main stream. Those who have seen the stream only in late spring or summer can hardly picture how treacherous and dangerous it may become when the winter's rain fills every channel with a tumultuous flood of chocolate-brown water over a bottom of sticky mud often itself several feet deep. Both animals and baggage have not infrequently been lost at such times. Under such conditions, the Kishon, with its steep, uncertain banks, its extremely crooked course, and its treacherous fords, must have been very dangerous to a flying army of horses and chariots (Jos 5:2-9). Of all parts the section of the river from Mt. Arbel to Jezreel, called by the Gentiles' (now el-Harithyeh), where the fiercest of the battle against Sisera was fought (cf. Jg 5:20 and 4:9), must have been the most dangerous. The other OT incident connected with this river is the slaughter there of the prophets of Baal (1 K 18:20-40), after Elijah's denunciation of Jehovah on the heights of Carmel (1 K 18:40).

E. W. G. MASTERMANN.

KISS. (Heb. נִחָשׁ, Gr. χίλιον).—Kissing is a mark of affection between the Gentiles (Av 9:25, W. G. M. DeLBach). Usually it is between members of a family, or near connections (2 S 20:1, Ac 20:20), Guests are received with a kiss (Lk 7:41). A kiss from a superior marks condescension (2 S 15:18). These kisses may be on the lips, but are usually on the cheek or neck. The kiss was a token of love (Ca 1:5), of homage and submission (Gn 41:4, Joh 31:21, Ps 28:8), and was also an act of volatilous worship (1 K 19:18, Hos 13:1). The Moslems kiss the black stone at Mecca. Juniors and inferiors kiss the hands of seniors and superiors. A wife kisses the hand or heard of her husband. The hand of criminals, even the feet of one appealed to may be kissed. Probably Judas presumed to salute with the kiss of an equal (Mt 26:23 etc.). A kiss on the hand would have been natural. The 'holy kiss,' or 'kiss of love' (1 Co 16:18, 1 P 5:14), marked the tie that united Christians in a holy brotherhood.

KITHE.—1. κιθήν. In Lv 11:14, Dt 14:9 AV renders this word by 'kite,' in Joh 28:19 by 'vulture'; RV has uniformly 'vulture.' 2. κιθήν. Lv 11:14 (AV 'vulture,' RV 'kite').

KITRON.—A Canaanite town in the territory of Tzebulin (Jgs 1:19). See KATTATH.

KITTIM (AV Chittim, which is retained by RV in 1 Mac 1:8) designates properly the island of Cyprus, and is to be so understood in the geographical list of the descendants of Javan (wh. see), that is, the Ionians, in Gn 10:6. The name is based on that of the settlement on the south-east of the island, called Kition by the Greeks, the modern Famagusta. This was the first trading post of the Phoenicians on the Mediterranean, hence it is vaguely used in Ezk 27:7 as the mother-city of all the maritime settlements westward. The connection with the Ionians or Greeks is not quite clear, since these were not the first settlers on the island. There were, however, undoubtedly Greek colonists there in the 8th cent. B.C., as we learn from the inscription of the Assyrian Sargon of 720, pointing to a settlement of Ionian Cyprians in Ashdod. A use of the word, still more vague, is found in Dn 11:2, where it refers to the Romans, while in Nu 24:24 (as in 1 Mac 1:19) it is applied apparently to the Macedonians.

J. F. M'CURDY.

KNEADING-TROUGHS.—Only Ex 38:22 and RV of Dt 28:17 (AV 'store'). See BREAD, HOUSE, § 9.

KNEE, KNEEL.—The knees are often referred to in Scripture as the place where weakness of the body, especially manifesting itself in terror (Job 4:1, Dn 5:5), or fasting (Ps 103:3). The reference in Dt 28:17 seems to be to 'joint leprosy,' in which, after the toes and fingers, the joints of the larger limbs are attacked (Dn 3:23). In the childhood on the knees of father or grandfather seems to have involved recognition of them as legitimate members of the family (Gn 30:2). In many passages of Scripture kneeling is spoken of as the attitude assumed in prayer (1 K 8:4, Ps 95:6, Dn 6:9, Ac 20:30 etc.).

KNIFE

'how the knee' is equivalent to 'worship' (1 K 19:8, Is 45:20, Ro 14:14 etc.). To fall upon the knee before a superior is an act at once of reverence and of subjection (Ex 24:4, Ezk 40:5 etc.). In the court of an Eastern judge the writer has often seen men prostrate themselves, and then make their plea, resting upon their knees.

W. Ewing.

KNIFE.—Of the various sorts of knives noticed in the OT mention may be made of the flint knives used for the rite of incision (Jos 3:14, cf. Ezk 46) — an instance of conservatism in ritual, to which parallels may be found in all religions. The knives for ordinary purposes under the monarchy were mostly of bronze, of which, as of the earlier flint knives, the recent excavations have furnished many varieties. We also read of sacrificial knives (Gen 22:16, Ezr 1:1), of 'a barber's knife' or razor (Ezk 5), and of a scribe's knife (2 Esd 1:38 EV 'penknife'), used for sharpening his reed-pen and making the necessary erasures. Cf. Hosea, § 9.

A. R. S. Kennedy.

KNOP.—Another form of 'knob,' is used to render two different words in EV. 1. The knobs of the stem and arms of the golden candlestick, or rather lampstand, of the Tabernacle (Ex 25:27 etc.) were the spheroidal ornaments still recognizable in the representation on the Arch of Titus. 2. Knobs also denote certain ornaments, probably of oval or gourd-shaped, carved on the inner lining of the walls of Solomon's Temple (1 K 6:24—note RVm), and similar ornaments on the 'brazen sea' (7 K).

KNOWLEDGE.—I. HUMAN KNOWLEDGE.—1. In the OT.—Knowledge, so far as it has a theological use, is moral rather than intellectual. It is assumed that a knowledge of God is possible, but this is a result of the revelation of Himself by God, and not a speculative knowledge achieved by man. So knowledge becomes practically equivalent to religion (Ps 25:14, Is 11:1), and ignorance to irreligion (1 S 25, Hos 4:6). The Messianic age is to bring knowledge, but this will be taught of God (Is 54:13). This knowledge of God is therefore quite consistent with speculative ignorance about the universe (Job 38:39). Perhaps some expressions in the NT which seem to refer to Gnostic ideas may be explained by this view of knowledge.

2. In the NT.—(a) In the Gospels knowledge is spoken of in the same sense as in the OT. Christ alone possesses the knowledge of God (Mt 11:36). This knowledge gives a new relation to God, and without it man is still in darkness (Mt 5:20, Jn 7:17). (b) In St. Paul's Epistles.—In the earlier Epistles knowledge is spoken of as a gift of the Spirit (1 Co 10:21, 2:12), although God could in a main extent be known through nature (Acts 17:28, Ro 1:20). 1 Cor. especially urges the substitution of knowledge to charity. In Col 2 and 1 Ti 6 a wrong kind of knowledge is spoken of — perhaps an early form of Gnosticism. True knowledge, however, centres in Christ, who is the mystery of God (Col 2). In Him all questions find their answer, and this knowledge is not, like Gnosticism, the property of a few, but is intended for all men (Col 1:27). In the Pastoral Epistles knowledge is spoken of with reference to a definite body of accepted teaching, which is repeatedly alluded to; it is, however, not merely intellectual but moral (Tit 1:9). (c) In the other NT books knowledge is not prominent, except in the use elsewhere, there, however, there is nothing special characteristic. In Hebrews the ordinary word for 'knowledge' does not occur at all, but the main object of the Epistle is to create and confirm a certain kind of Christian knowledge. Although knowledge in both OT and NT is almost always moral, there is no trace of the Socratic doctrine that virtue is knowledge.

II. DIVINE KNOWLEDGE.—It is not necessary to suppose that perfect knowledge is ascribed to God throughout the Scriptures. In some OT books—Jeremiah, Lamentations, Psalms—the ignorance of man is emphasized in order to bring God's omniscience into relief (cf. also the personification of the Divine Wisdom in the Books of Proverbs and Wisdom).

H. DIVINE AND HUMAN KNOWLEDGE IN CHRIST.—The question has been much debated how Divine and human knowledge could co-exist in Christ, and whether in His human nature He was capable of ignorance. It is a question that has often been argued on many grounds, but it should rather be considered with reference to the evidence in the records of His life. The Gospels certainly attribute to Christ an extraordinary and apparently supernatural knowledge. But even supernatural illumination is not necessarily Divine consciousness, and the Gospel records also seem to attribute to our Lord such limitations of knowledge as may be supposed to make possible a really human experience. There are direct indications of ordinary limitations. He advanced in wisdom (Lk 2:40); He asked for information (Mt 6:5, 8, 9, Lk 8:47, Jn 11:6); He expressed surprise (Lk 12:26, 27). His use of prayer, and especially the prayer in the garden (Mt 26:42) was different in the crosses (Mt 15:19), joint in the same direction. 2. With regard to one point our Lord expressly declared Divine knowledge (Mk 13:32). 3. In the Fourth Gospel, where claiming unity with the Father is involved, His teaching as derived from the Father under the limitations of a human nature (Jn 3:3, 6, 8, 18, 20, 21). While speaking with authority, and in a way which precludes possibility of fallibility in the delivery of the Divine message, He never enlarged our store of natural knowledge, physical or historical. If it be true that Christ lived under limitations in respect of the use of his Divinely given knowledge, this is a part of the self-emptying which He undertook for us men and for our salvation (see KENOBIS). J. H. Maude.

KOJAH, KOHATHITES.—Although the origin of the name Levi is doubtful, and scholars are still uncertain whether or not it was the name of a tribe before 'Levite' was a descriptive term denoting one who was trained in priestly duties, there is no doubt that the term 'Levite' had this meaning as early as the period of the Judges (see Jp 17). And in process of time every member of the Levitical or priestly race took his descent through one line or another to Levi. These genealogies must have been in the making before the Exile, but were afterwards stereotyped and reduced to symmetrical form by the priestly school. The name Kohath is found nowhere except in P and Chronicles. The three main divisions of Levites bore the names of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, and these are accordingly given as the names of the 'sons' of Levi (Gen 46:11, Ex 6:18, Nu 3:31, 1 Ch 6:12 239). The second division is described either as the 'Kohathites' (Nu 33:30, 41s, 44, 7, 2 209, Jos 21:3, 1 Ch 23:24, 14), or 'the sons of Kohath' (Ex 6:18, Nu 3:31, 4, 16, 22, 21:29, 33, 1 Ch 5:8, 9, 26, 13, 15:23). These were subdivided into four groups, the Amramites, the Amramites, the Beronites, and the Ezri-dellees (Nu 33:37), each being traced to a son of Kohath (Ex 6:18, Nu 3:1, 1 Ch 6:16 239). From these families fragments of genealogies remain. Amram is of peculiar importance, because his children were Aaron and Moses (Ex 6:20, 1 Ch 23:17); and Kohat, a son of Zahar, was notorious in priestly tradition (Nu 16). See K O F A H, DATARIAH.

The importance of these families after the Exile was small, with the exception of the priests who traced their descent from Aaron. Some Kohathites are named as appointed to humble offices (1 Ch 9:29, Ex 24, Neh 128). But the tendency of the period

KOHELETH.—See Ecclesiastes.

KOLAIH.—1. The father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer 29:9). 2. The name of a Benjamite family which settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11).

KONS (7th 40) — An unknown town of Palestine (AV, following a different reading of the villages).

KOPH. — The nineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 19th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

KORAH, KORAHITES.—1. Korah is the name of a 'duke,' son of Esaú and Absalom, named in Gn 36:14, and therefore an Edomite. 2. A Korah also appears in 1 Ch 29 as a 'son' of Hebron and descendant of Caleb, the Kenizzite, i.e., Edomite. 3. In 1 Ch 23:33 we hear of a ben-Korah and of a Korahite, the Korahites being further designated as doorkeepers.

Combining the various notes, we gather that the sons of Korah were of Edomite extraction, were incorporated among the Levites, and formed a Temple-guild. Moreover, Ex 40-48 and Num 8, 10, 17 bear the superscription 'to the sons of Korah.' They share, therefore, with the sons of Asaph the honour of forming the Temple-choir. But whether they rose (or fell) from being door-keepers to being singers, or vice versa, it is, in our ignorance of most of the details of the worship of the first Temple, impossible to say. Nor can we say how it was that the guilds of Asaph and Korah came to be transformed into the guilds of Hemach, Asaph, and Ethan. See also next article. 5. F. Coz.'

L

LAADAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4:18).

LABAN.—1. Son of Nahor (Gn 24; cf. 24:19, where 'Bethuel, son of,' is apparently an interpolation). He was the brother of Rebekah (24:2), father of Leah and Rachel (29), and through them ancestor to three-fourths of the Jewish nation. He had several sons (30:31), and was father-in-law and uncle of Jacob. He appears first in Scripture as engaged in betrothing his sister Rebekah to Isaac (24:2-9). We meet him next at Haran entertaining Jacob (29:13), who had escaped from his brother Esau. The details of the transaction between Laban and Jacob for the fourteen years while the nephew served the uncle for his two daughters need not be recounted here (see chs. 29 and 30). At the end of the period Jacob was not only husband of Leah and Rachel and father of eleven sons, but also the owner of very many flocks and herds. As Laban was reluctant to part with Jacob, regarding his presence as an assurance of Divine blessing, the departure took place secretly, while Laban was absent Upon his return he retook his property across the Euphrates, while Rachel took with her the teraphim or household gods of the family. When Laban pursued after them and overtook them at Mount Gilead (31:19), he did no more than reproach Jacob for his steal ing flight and for his removal of the teraphim, and finally made a covenant of peace by setting up a calm of stones and a pillar; these served as a boundary-stone between the Arameans and the Hebrews, which neither were to pass with hostile intent to the other.

In character Laban is not pleasing, and seems to reflect in an exaggerated form the more repulsive traits in the character of his nephew Jacob; yet he shows signs of generous impulses on more than one occasion, and especially at the final parting with Jacob.

2. An unknown place mentioned in Dt. 1.

LABANA (1 Es 5:9) = Ezr 2nd and Neh 7th Lebana (h).

LACUUNUS (1 Es 8:9) = Ezr 10th Chelah.

LACE. — The Eng. word 'lace' comes from Lat. lacoaeus, 'a snare,' and is used in that sense in Old Eng. It is then employed for any sort of network, and that is its meaning in Ex 26:17, 39:9, 8, Sir 9:8.

LACEDÆMONIANS. — In 2 Mac 9 we read that Jason feld for refuge to the Lacedemonians 'because they were near of kin.' This claim is further set forth in 1 Mac 12:23; cf. 14:4. 150, where we read of Sparta and an alliance with the Spartans. It was, of course, entitled deceitful, the Hellenes and the Jews belonging respectively to the Indo-European and Semitic branches of the human race.

A. E. HILLARD

LACHISH.—A town in the south country of Judah referred to probably several times in the Tell el-Amarna tablets. In the Biblical records it first appears as joining the coalition headed by the king of Jerusalem against the Gibeonites (Jos 10:3), and as being in consequence reduced by Joshua (v. 19) in spite of the assistance given to it by the king of Gezer (v. 16). It is enumerated among the cities of the tribe of Judah (15:1). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11:8). Lither Amasiah, king of Judah, fled from conspirators, and here he was murdered (2 K 14:8). In the reign of Hezekiah, Sennacherib took Lachish, and while he was quartered there Hezekiah sent messengers to him to make terms (18:17-18). Sennacherib's Lachish campaign is commemorated by a sculptured relief in the British Museum. Lachish and Azekah were the last cities to stand against the king of Babylon (Jer 34:7). Lachish was one of the towns settled by the children of Judah after the Exile (Ezr 4:9). Micah's denunciation of Lachish at the beginning of 511 to the daughter of Zion (11:11) doubtless refers to incidents of which we are quite ignorant.

Lachish was identified by Conder with Tell el-Hesn, an important mound in the Gaza district, which was partially excavated with success by Flinders Petrie and Bliss for the Palestine Exploration Fund (1890-1898). Another site in the neighbourhood, of Roman date, called 'Esim Lakis, probably represents a later dwelling of the representatives of the ancient Lachitites, and preserves the name of the city.

LADAN.—1. A name occurring in the genealogy of Joshua (1 Ch 7:28). 2. A Gershonite family name (1 Ch 23:35). In Judg it appears as Libim (wh. see).

LADANUM.—See Myrrh.

LADDER.—In ancient times ladders were used chiefly for scaling the walls of a besieged city, as frequently shown on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. 1:243; Lyard, Vitrè, ii. 372). Although this use of them is probably implied in Ps 21:30, scaling-ladders are first expressly mentioned in the time of the Maccabees (1 Mac 6:22). See SCAFFOLD, §§ 3, 46. Jacob's 'ladder' (Gn 28:12) seems to have been rather a 'flight of stone steps, rising up to heaven' (Driver, Com. in loc.).

A. R. S. KENNEDY

LAEL.—A Gershonite Levite (Nu 3:43).

LAHA—A Judahite family name (1 Ch 4:19).

LAHAI-ROI.—See Beer-lahai-roi.

LAHMAM (R'vM Lahmas).—A town of Judah (15:19), possibly mod. el-Lahm, near Beit Jibrin.

LAHIMI.—The brother of Goliath the Gittite, slain by Elhanan the son of Jair (1 Ch 20:5). There is a discrepancy between this passage and the parallel passage in 1 Sam 17:44, where we read that 'Elhanan [wh. see] the Bethhelemite slew Goliath the Gittite.' If the text of Chronicles is the more correct, the designation Bethlehem of Samuel is simply a corruption of the name Lahmi, but the converse might also be the case.

T. A. MOXON

LAISH.—1. The original name of the town of Dan (Jg 15:7, 18, 19). The variation Leshem occurs in Jos 19:9, 10, 12, 27. The father of Palti or Paltiel, to whom Michael, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 Sam 25:9, 26, 32).

LAISHAH (Is 10:9).—The name of a place connected with Gath and mentioned in the hill and along with other localities in Benjamin and Judah. If Gathlin be Beit Jaba near Bethlehem, Laishah would also be in that neighbourhood.

LAKKUM.—An unknown town of Naphtali (Jos 19:34).

LAMA.—See Eloi, Eloi, Lama Sabachthani.

LAMB.—See Sheep, and next article.

LAMB OF GOD.—The lamb was the most common victim in the Jewish sacrifices, and the most familiar type to a Jew of an offering to God. The title 'the lamb of God' (i.e. the lamb given or provided by God; cf. Gn 22:8) is applied by John the Baptist to Jesus in Jn 1:29. The symbol of which the Baptist-intended can be inferred from the symbolic allusions to the lamb in the OT. Thus in Jer 11:19 the prophet compares himself to a lamb, as the type of guilelessness and innocence. Again, in Is 53:7 (a passage which exercised great influence on the Messianic hope of the Jews, and is definitely referred to Christ in Ac 8:30) the lamb is used as the type of vicarious suffering. It seems beyond doubt that these two ideas must have been in the Baptist's mind. It is also quite possible to see in the phrase a reference to the Lamb which formed part of the daily sacrifice in the Temple; and also, perhaps, an allusion to the Paschal lamb which would soon be offered at the approaching Passover (Jn 18:28), and which was the symbol of God's deliverance. Certainly this is the idea underlying the expressions in Jn 19:5 and 1 Pt 1:19. Thus all these strata of thought may be traced in the Baptist's title, viz. innocence, vicarious suffering, sacrifice, redemption.

The lamb is used 27 times in the Apocalypse as the symbol of Christ, and on the first introduction of the term in Rev 5 the writer speaks specifically of 'a lamb as though it had been slain.' The term used in the Greek original is not the same as that found in the Baptist's phrase, but the connexion is probably similar. It seems most likely that the sacrificial significance of the lamb is that especially intended by the Apocalyptic author.

The specific title 'the lamb of God' may be an invention of the Baptist's, but which he used to point an aspect of the Messianic mission for his hearers' benefit, or it may have been a well-known phrase currently employed to designate the Messiah; we have no trace of such an earlier use, but it may have existed (see Westcott on Jn 19:5).

LAME, LAMENESS.—See Medicine, p. 509.

LAMECH.—The name apparently of two people in the antediluvian period, the one belonging to the Cainite and the other to the Sethite genealogy. 1. The fifth descendant from Cain (Gen 4:18-19). He seems to have been a man of importance in the early legend, as the name of his two wives (Adah and Zillah), his three sons (Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-cain), and his daughter (Naamah) are all mentioned. Special interest is attached to him on account of his song—

'Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech:
For I have slain a man for wounding me,
And a young man for bruising me;
If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold,
Truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold.'

The meaning of this song has been the subject of much conjecture. The song is clearly one of exultation, and it has not unnaturally been associated with the fact that Tubal-cain is especially mentioned as the 'forgery of every cutting instrument.' Jerome relates the Jewish legend that Lamech accidentally slew Cain, but for this, of course, there is no foundation. It has been suggested (Lightfoot, Deca. Chorog. Marc. praem. 5 iv.) that the reference is to the fact that Lamech, as the first polyglot, introduced greater destruction into the world than Cain. R. H. Kennett sees in the song a degradation of blood-guiltiness incurred by the fact that Lamech, as a tribal chieftain, has avenged an insult of a boy by slaying him.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

A possible variant rendering might be mentioned: 'I would have slain (or 'I will slay') any man who wounds me.' If this is accepted, it materially alters the sense of the verse.

2. The father of Noah (Gn 5:9). It is now commonly believed, owing to the identity of some names and the similarity of others in the two genealogies, that they are merely different versions of one original list.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF.—1. Occasion.—In b.c. 586 Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, put out the eyes of Gedaliah, slew the princes, burned the Temple and palaces, razed the walls, and deported the inhabitants (save some of the poorest sort) to forced labour in Babylon (2 K 25:2). These events and their religious meaning are the theme of the five complete hymns in the Book of Lamentations. The poet looked on these calamities as the death of the Jewish people; and he prepares an elegy for the national funeral.

2. Date.—It need not be supposed that Jeremiah went about composing acrostics while Jerusalem was burning; on the other hand, the language of the poems is not that of some Rabbinical versifier after Nebemiah's time. Between the desolation of b.c. 586 and the restoration of b.c. 536 is the time limit for the production of this better.

3. Form.—The form of these elegies has been recognized to be the type of Hebrew poetry which is peculiar to threnody. Its metrical character depends on the structure of the stanzas of the line. There is the exact measure of a Latin hexameter or pentameter, but consists of five to seven words, making an average eleven syllables. The line is divided by sense and grammar into two unequal parts, as 6:5 or 4:3; the first part being more emphatic in sense, and the second forming an antiphonal supplement to the first. Thus

'Ah woe! she sits alone—the populous city,
Houseless doomed to be—the foremost of peoples,
Once the princes over states—a serf in a gang.'

Such is the ginâh-metre, found also in parts of Amos, Isaiah, and Ezekiel.

4. Arrangement.—These Hebrew elegies may stand singly, as in La 3, or in two-lined stanzas, as in ch. 4, or in three-lined stanzas, as in chs. 1 and 2. But there is also in Lam, a more artificial embellishment. The 2nd stanzas of chs. 1, 2, and 4 are introduced by the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order, except that 2 and 4 place the letter Pe before the letter Ayin. This inexact variation in the order of the letters of the alphabet is to imply a difference in authorship. In ch. 3 has 66 verses, the lines beginning ssa; bbb, etc. Ch. 5 has 22 verses, but no acrostic; and its lines are of a slightly different structure. As this chapter is a prayer, these external marks may have been felt to be inappropriate. The poetic form of Lam. is thus the result of elaborate effort; but this need not imply the absence of genuine feeling. The calmness in remembrance seemed to call for an adequate form of expression, and to invite the resources of technical skill.

5. Contents.—The contents of the five hymns are not pervaded by clear lines of thought; but the nature of the subject forbids us to look for the consistency of a geometrical theorem. They celebrate, the pity and horror they occasioned, the religious perplexity at the course of events, are depicted sometimes by the poet himself, again by Jerusalem, or by the personified community. Ch. 1 describes the ruin of Jerusalem and the humiliation of the exiles—vv. 1-14 in the words of the poet, while the city itself speaks in vv. 15-22. The second hymn finds the sting of their sufferings in the fact that they are inflicted by Jehovah, their ancient defender. Ch. 3, in the midst of some of the most bitter miseries, contains the national misery (vv. 1-18), perceives the purpose of Jehovah in their calamities (vv. 19-47), and calls the people to penitence (vv. 48-66). Ch. 4 contrasts the past history of Zion with its present condition, and ch. 5 is a prayer for mercy and renewal of ancient blessings. The hope for Judah was the compassion of the Lord; therefore let us search for our ways and turn again to the Lord' (36). It forms a curious contrast to the consolation offered to Athens in her decline and fall through the comedies of Aristophanes.

6. Authorship.—No author is named in Lam. itself. In 2 Ch 36:22 we read that 'Jeremiah the Ben-hai, son of Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women spoke of Josiah unto this day; and they made them an ordinance in Israel: and behold they are written in the lamentations.' This statement is 300 years later than the fall of Jerusalem; and Lam. has nothing to do with Josiah. But it ascribes standard elegies to Jeremiah. The LXX, followed by the Vulgate and other versions, names Jeremiah the prophet as the author of Lam.; and this view prevailed universally till recent times. Internal evidence has been considered unfavourable to Jeremiah's authorship. The alphabetic form, a few peculiar words, an affinity in chs. 2 and 4 with Ezekiel, in chs. 1 and 5 with the younger Isaiah, and in ch. 3 with late Psalms, the arrangement of pictorial metaphors, the denial of vision to prophets, the reliance on Egypt ('4\textsuperscript{7}'), are given (Löhr, Com.) as conclusive objections to Jeremiah's being the writer of this poem. The acrostic form would then have the charm of novelty, and would be useful as a mnemonic for professional mourners; and it is not prophecy to which it is here attached. The affinity with later books is not very marked, and may be due to derivation from the elegies. And there is a very wide resemblance in vocabulary and thought between Jeremiah and Lamentations. Both trace the disaster of the nation, both deplore trust in alliances, and both inculcate penitence and hope. Probably the internal evidence originated the traditional view that Jeremiah was the author; and the newer scrutiny of the evidence seems hardly sufficient to disprove the verdict of the ancients.

Again it is asked, Would one author make five independent poems on one and the same subject? If several authors treated the theme independently, it is not likely that their work would bear juxtaposition so well as the collection in Lamentations. Jeremiah's life ended some 6 or 7 years after the Captivity began; and 5th implies a longer interval since the devastation. Rawlinson, who assigns, with Theodotion, chs. 2 and 4 to Jeremiah, and suppose that some disciples of the prophet imitated his model in 1, 3, and 5, and that perhaps the differences and similarities in the several hymns may be accounted for. And when Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus in A.D. 70, there was no new ginâh; the elegies seem to presuppose a personality of Jeremiah's type as their originator.

7. Names.—The Hebrew name of Lam. is 'Ekhâh ('Howl'), the first word in the book. It is also called Ginâh or 'Elegies.' The LXX has Threnoi (Ieremios); Vulg. Threni, id est lamentationes Jeremias prophetae, and this is the source of the English title.

8. Position in the Canon.—In Hebrew Bibles Lam. is placed in the third division of the OT Canon. Its place is generally in the middle of the five Megilloth, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. The Jews recite the book on the Black Fast (9th of Ab)—the anniversary of the destruction of Jerusalem. In the Greek OT and the other versions Lam. is attached to the prophecies of Jeremiah, in accordance with the current belief in his authorship.

LAMP.—1. The earliest illuminant everywhere was supplied by pieces of resinous wood. Such probably were the torches of Gideon's adventure (Jg 7:21-23; RV for AV 'lamps') and other passages. There is no evidence of 'anything of the nature of our candles, which is a frequent AV rendering of the ordinary Heb. word [םיר] for 'torch,' now introduced throughout by RV except in Zeph 1:14 (but Amer. RV here also 'lamp'). The unearthing of thousands of lamps in the course of recent Palestine exploration, sometimes as many as two or three hundred from a single grave, has made it possible to trace the development of the lamp from early Canaanite to Byzantine times. Only the barest outline can be attempted here.

2. Two main stages in this development have to be recognized, the first that of the open, the second that of the closed, lamp. (a) The earlier form found in the Canaanite strata is that of the plain open clay lamp in the shape of a shell, or shallow bowl, with rounded bottom. It is distinguished from the later form of open lamp by having the rim only slightly pinched towards the middle. (b) In the later forms just referred to, which are those of the late Canaanite and early Hebrew periods, the lips are drawn much more closely together, so as to form an elongated spout, as may be seen in the illustration. In Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, 2, 14, fig. 1, Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine (in the sequel cited as BMEexc.), plate 66; Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 87. For types of (a) and (b) side by side, see PEFS, 1904, 327. (c) The next step apparently was to substitute a flat base for the rounded forms of (a) and (b). This type of open lamp has continued in use to the present day in certain parts of Syria.

3. The introduction of the closed lamp cannot be dated with certainty, but is probably due to Western influence. According to Bliss (BMEexc., 130), 'by Seleucid times the open lamp appears largely to have given place to the closed lamp.' (a) The earlier specimens of this type consist of a circular bowl closed at the top, with the exception of a round opening for pouring in the oil, with a flat or concave base. They are further characterized by their long tapering, and sometimes, a straight spout, which 'forms a distinct angle with the bowl.' These lamps are entirely without ornament, and, like all the others, without handles. (b) The later closed lamp has another handle, having their upper surface ornamented with an endless variety of design, ranging from simple lines through chevrons, spirals, etc., to animal forms. Numerous specimens of (a) and (b) are illustrated in BMEexc., pl. 63, 63. For a typical lamp of the Maccabean period, see PEFS, 1904, 345, pl. iii. No. 5. This may be assumed to have been the prevailing type of lamp in NT times.

4. Of the specimens hitherto given as illustrations of the lamps of OT are really of early Christian or even Byzantine date. A typical Byzantine form is given in BMEexc., pl. 66, No. 6. This type is distinguished from the previous types by the fact that the curve of the body is continuous with the top of the spout, giving a generally oval shape.' See the collections illustrated PEFS, 1892, 125; 1904, plate iii; 1905, 150.

5. In addition to the normal lamp with a single wick, the excavations in northern and southern Palestine have brought to light numerous specimens of 'multiple lamps,' a favourite form of which consisted of a bowl, having its rim pinched into three, four, or seven spouts (BMEexc., pl. 66). As in other lands, the Palestinian potter sometimes gave his lamp the shape of an animal, such as the remarkable clay duck from Gezer described and illustrated in PEFS, 1903, 40.

The favourite material in all ages was clay. A good specimen of a bronze lamp with a handle, from the Greek period, is shown in BMEexc., 60. Silver lamps are mentioned in 4th 10th. Those of the Tabernacle and Temple were of gold. The usual foundation oil was the oil of the olive; other oils, including naphtha, are named in the Mishna (Shabbath, ii. 1.), where it may be found, also, a list of the substances for wicks in addition to the ordinary wick of twisted flax (Is 42 Rvm), and other details regarding the lamp.

6. In the poorer houses the lamp was placed, as it still is, in a niche in the wall. It is in the case of a 'great woman' that we first hear of a lampstand in a private house. Lampstands of stone, about 30 inches in height, have been found in the recent excavations in Crete; one of limestone is figured in Bliss, Mound, etc. 104, from Lachish. The candelabrum of AV, which, strangely enough, is retained in RV (except in Mt 5, where 'stand' is substituted), is of course a lampstand. For the elaborate lampstands or 'candelabrics' of the Tabernacle and the Temple see those articles. An interesting specimen of a lamp with seven spouts and standing in a niche is found at Tahasch (illust. in his Eine Nachlese, etc. 22, Benzinger, Heb. Arch., 2 (1907) 99). In ancient times, as at the present day, it was customary to keep the household lamp continually alight, hence the figure in 1 K 11, 2; 2 K 8; conversely, the putting out of the lamp of the wicked (Job 18 AV 'candle'), Pr 13 denotes their utter extinction.

For a recently discovered, and still obscure, early rite in which lamps and bowls played an essential part, see Huesse, § 3; and for a later rite, see Dedication [Feast of Tabernacles].

LAMPASCEUS (1 Mac 15th Rvm).—See SAMARITAN.

LANCE, LANCASTER.—The former only Jer 50th, RV 'spear,' but Heb. is kesib, 'spear,' rather 'javelin'; the latter only 1 K 18th, RV 'lance,' Heb. hesbal. For both these weapons, see ARMOUR AND ARMS, § 1.

LAND WROCRODDLE (LV 11th Rvm).—See CHAMELEON and LIZARD.

LANDMARK.—The word (gebud) so rendered must not be identified off-hand, as is usually done, with the kudawru or boundary-stone of the Babylonians, for the fundamental passage, Dt 19, 'Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set,' should rather be rendered: 'Thou shalt not remove (or 'set back') thy neighbour's boundary, which they have drawn.' Under the old Hebrew system of the cultivation in common of the village land, the boundaries of the plots may have been indicated as at the present day by 'a furrow double in width to the ordinary one,' at each end of which a stone is set up, called the 'boundary-stone' (PEFS, 1894, p. 195 f.). The form of land-grabbing by setting back a neighbour's boundary-line must have been common in OT times, to judge by the frequent references to, and condemnations of, the practice (Dt 23, 5, 5, Hos 5, 429, 23, Job 24).

LANGUAGE OF THE NT.—The object of this article is to give a general non-technical account of the Greek in which the NT is written. It should be stated at the outset that the standpoint of scholarship in regard to this subject has materially altered since Prof. Thayer or boundary-stone of the Babylonians, for the fundamental passage, Dt 19, 'Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set,' should rather be rendered: 'Thou shalt not remove (or 'set back') thy neighbour's boundary, which they have drawn.' Under the old Hebrew system of the cultivation in common of the village land, the boundaries of the plots may have been indicated as at the present day by 'a furrow double in width to the ordinary one,' at each end of which a stone is set up, called the 'boundary-stone' (PEFS, 1894, p. 195 f.). The form of land-grabbing by setting back a neighbour's boundary-line must have been common in OT times, to judge by the frequent references to, and condemnations of, the practice (Dt 23, 5, 5, Hos 5, 429, 23, Job 24).

which largely followed the Hebrew original with slavish literalness. A special religious phraseology was thus created, which not only contributed a large number of forms for direct quotation, but also supplied models for the general style of religious writing, much as the style of modern sermons or prayers modelled upon the English of the Bible. (2) The writers were mostly Jews who used Aramaic (a language closely related to Hebrew) in their daily life. When, therefore, they wrote in Greek, it was done not with the language of daily life, but with the classical language. Thus the NT, on the contrary, is only two or three writers who admit even to a small extent a style differing from that used in common speech. Meanwhile the history of Greek, with its endless political independence and variation of dialect between neighbouring towns, had entered a new phase. The strong hand of Philip of Macedon brought Hellenism under one rule; his son, the great Alexander, set his victorious car-themreek was into the world beyond. Unification of speech was a natural result, when Greeks from different cities became fellow-soldiers in Alexander’s army, or fellow-colonists in his new towns. Within about one generation we suddenly find that a compromise dialect, which was based mainly on Attic, but contained elements from all the old dialects, came to be established as the language of the new Greek world. This ‘Common’ Greek or Hellenistic, once brought into being, remained for centuries a reasonably homogeneous and slowly changing speech over the larger part of the Roman Empire. In Rome itself it was so widely spoken and read that St. Paul’s letter to the Romans was written in this language, and not translated into any other. The Christian, who had previously been following Galatians throughout the Roman world by the same missionary without interpreter or the need of learning foreign tongues. The conditions of Palestine demand a few awkward, it is a victory for the Greek was understood and used there much as English is in Wales to-day. Jesus and the Apostles would use Aramaic among themselves, and in addressing the people in Judaea or Galilee, but Greek would often be needed for conversation with strangers. The Procurator would certainly use Greek (rarely Latin) in his official dealings with the Jews. There is no reason to believe that any NT writer who ever lived in Palestine learned Greek only as a foreign language when he went abroad. The degree of culture in grammar and idiom would vary, but the language itself was always entirely at command.

2. Newer views.—The credit of initiating a most far-reaching change of view, the full consequences of which are only beginning to be realized, belongs to a brilliant German theologian, Adolf Deissmann. His study, which had added nothing to the progress of the text, was immediately struck by frequent points of contact with the vocabulary of NT Greek. He read through several of the inscriptions of papyri, and of contemporary Greek inscriptions, and in 1895 and 1897 published the two volumes of his Bible Studies (Eng. tr. in one volume, 1901). Mainly on the ground of vocabulary, but not without reference to grammar and style, he showed that the isolation of NT Greek could no longer be maintained. Further study of the papyri he used, and of the immense masses of similar documents which have been published since, especially by the explorers of Oxford and Berlin, confirms his thesis and extends it to the whole field of language. To put the new views into two statements—

(1) The NT is written in the spoken ‘Greek of daily life’, which can be proved from inscriptions to have differed but little, as found in nearly every corner of the Roman Empire in the first century. (2) What is peculiar in ‘Biblical Greek’ lies in the presence of boldly literal translations from Hebrew OT or Aramaic ‘sources’; even this, however, seldom goes beyond clumsy and unidiomatic, but perfectly possible, Greek, and is generally restricted to the inordinate use of locutions which were rare in the ordinary spoken dialect. The Egyptian non-literary papyri of the three centuries before and after Christ, with the inscriptions of Asa Minor, the Egean islands and Greece during the same period,—though these must be used with caution because of the literary element which often invades them,—supply us therefore with the long desired parallel for the language of the NT, by which we must continually test an exegesis too much dominated hitherto by the thought of classical Greek or Semitic idiom.

3. History and diffusion of the Greek language.—At this point, then, we should give a history of the world-Greek of NT times. A sister-language of Sanskrit, Latin, Slavonic, German, and English, and most other dialects of modern Europe, Greek comes before us earliest in the Hymnic poems, the oldest parts of which may go back to the 10th cent. B.C. Small though the country was, the language of Greece was divided into more dialects, and dialects perhaps more widely differing, than English in the reign of Alfred. Few of these dialects gave birth to any literature; and the intellectual period begins by the end of the Archaic (4th cent. B.C.) was so far above dispute that its dialect, the Attic, became for all future time the only permitted model for literary prose. When Attic as a spoken language was dead, it was enforced by rigid grammarians as the only ‘correct’ speech for educated people. Post-classical prose accordingly, while varying in the extent to which colloquial elements invaded the purity of its artificial idiom, is always more or less dominated by the effort to avoid the Greek which ordinary people heard in the NT, on the contrary, it is only two or three writers who admit even to a small extent a style differing from that used in common speech. Meanwhile the history of Greek, with its endless political independence and variation of dialect between neighbouring towns, had entered a new phase. The strong hand of Philip of Macedon brought Hellenism under one rule; his son, the great Alexander, set his victorious car-themreek was into the world beyond. Unification of speech was a natural result, when Greeks from different cities became fellow-soldiers in Alexander’s army, or fellow-colonists in his new towns. Within about one generation we suddenly find that a compromise dialect, which was based mainly on Attic, but contained elements from all the old dialects, came to be established as the language of the new Greek world. This ‘Common’ Greek or Hellenistic, once brought into being, remained for centuries a reasonably homogeneous and slowly changing speech over the larger part of the Roman Empire. In Rome itself it was so widely spoken and read that St. Paul’s letter to the Romans was written in this language, and not translated into any other. The Christian, who had previously been following Galatians throughout the Roman world by the same missionary without interpreter or the need of learning foreign tongues. The conditions of Palestine demand a few awkward, it is a victory for the Greek was understood and used there much as English is in Wales to-day. Jesus and the Apostles would use Aramaic among themselves, and in addressing the people in Judaea or Galilee, but Greek would often be needed for conversation with strangers. The Procurator would certainly use Greek (rarely Latin) in his official dealings with the Jews. There is no reason to believe that any NT writer who ever lived in Palestine learned Greek only as a foreign language when he went abroad. The degree of culture in grammar and idiom would vary, but the language itself was always entirely at command.

reason to suspect that in the oldest form of his text this occurred more frequently than in the other main Gospel
'source,' the 'Sayings of Jesus,' shows likewise the traces of processes of translation. Space forbids any attempt to distinguish the position of all the NT writers, but it is clear that the present supply parallels in degrees of culture to compare with them in turn, except so far as sheer translation comes in.

5. Help derived from Modern Greek, and from recent study of the Greek Bible. We must now return to the development-history of Greek to observe that its later stages, even up to the present day, are full of important contributions to our study of the NT. The 'Koine' or vulgar language, which is the direct ancestor of the vernacular of modern Greece and the Greek-speaking districts of Turkey. We are daily learning more of the immense significance of this despised patois for interpreting the sacred language. Here the student must carefully eliminate the artificial 'Modern Greek' of Athenian newspapers and books, which is untrustworthy for this purpose, just as is the Greek of Plutarch or Josephus. The genuine vernacular—with its borrowings from and innovations on the ancient Hellenistic, which may have no small weight elsewhere even in our NT criticism—may be placed by the side of modern gossip, and medieval popular stories and quaint sentimentalization of such back to the Jewish and Samaritan as our latest-found tools for NT study. The literature, classical and post-classical, will of course retain the place it has always held, when modern methods have taken us how to check its testimony. And Comparative Philology, with lights on the meaning of cases and tenses and moods, may be added to the equipment with which purely linguistic science may now help forward the interpretation of Scripture. All this is on the side of the student of Greek itself. But the other side of NT language must naturally not be forgotten.

 Contributions of great value have recently been made to our knowledge of the Aramaic, in which nearly all the sayings of Christ must have been uttered, and in which Papias (as usually understood) shows they were first written down. The possibility of reconstructing to some extent the original of our Greek Gospel sources is drawing nearer; and the co-operation of Greek and Semitic scholars promises marked advances in our knowledge of the very kernel of the NT (cf. next art.).

6. Characteristics of NT Greek. A few concluding words may be given to the general characteristics of the language which had so providentially become the language of the civilized world just at the time when the gospel began its advance. It used to be frequently contrasted unfavourably with the classical Attic, which is undeniably the most perfect language the world has ever eren, for the clearness, subtlety, and beauty with which it can express thought. In Hellenistic Greek the subtlety, the sense of rhythm, and the literary delicacy have largely disappeared. But the old clearness is only enhanced by a greater simplicity; and the boundless resourcefulness of the language imparts to it powerfully when in the NT for the first and (practically) last time the colloquial dialect of the people was enshrined in literature, the authors of which were nearly always unconscious that they were creating literature at all.

The presentation of Christianity to the Western world as a system of thought could never have been completed in Hebrew, even if that language had attained universal currency. In Greek we are always conscious of a wealth of suggestiveness which no translation can convey, an accuracy and precision of thought which repays the utmost exactness of study. This is in no sense lost even when the simpler grammar of the later language becomes the tool of men who had no inheritance of Greek culture. A comparatively elementary knowledge of this simpler Greek, which can be attained without touching the complex structure of the classical language, will constantly reveal important elements in the writer's meaning that are beyond the reach of our language to convey exactly. In our own time at last this language is being studied for its own sake; and even classical scholars are beginning to allow that the renewed youth of Greek, under conditions which make the modern language a living literature, is one of the philologist, and not merely the theologian, can admire.

LANGUAGE OF CHRIST.—The records of our Lord's words and discourse have descended to us in four Greek Gospels. Some early Christian writers assert that St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew; but the Greek St. Matthew has universally, and from the first, been accepted as an authority. The Evangelists' language is not Greek, but Hebrew. It is not improbable that the writer published his book in the two languages, and that the Greek edition alone has survived. Josephus, who wrote in Greek, prepared a Semitic edition of his Works for the benefit of those who understood only their vernacular.

At the present day, perhaps, most scholars would admit that the vernacular of Palestine in the time of our Lord was Semitic, and not Greek; but a difference was observable between their simple vernacular and their more refined and learned speech. This is the language in all kinds of theological writings, critical as well as devotional, the references to the text of the Gospels constantly assume that the Greek words are those commonly spoken in the Holy Land, it is improbable that He who ministered to the common people would ever employed an uncommon tongue. It follows that the Greek words recorded by the Evangelists are not the actual words Christ spoke. We may think we have good grounds for believing that they accurately represent His utterances; but to hear the original sounds we must revert, if that be possible, to the Semitic vernacular which underlies the traditional Greek.

The evidence as to the nature of the Palestinian vernacular may be thus stated. In the first century of the Christian era the Semitic Hebrew was the language of more than one race and nationality, but there is no reason to suppose they had been fused into one people, with Greek for their common tongue. Most of the inhabitants of Judaea were Jews, being descendants of the returned exiles. In Galilee there was a mixture of races; but the name 'Galilee of the Gentiles' was a survival of the description of an earlier condition. The Syrian and the Jacobites of the Northern Kingdom had passed, though leaving their mark, and a period of Jewish ascendency had followed, created by the victories of the Maccabees. The Idumaean princes, though forced to ally with Rome, sought to pose as Judaizers.
Herod the Great, while in sympathy with Hellenism, was famous as the builder of the third Temple. The strict, orthodox Jews, who were opposed to Hellenism, and composed sea and land to make one proselyte, would lose no opportunity of reoccupying their father land, from Jerusalem in the south to the north of Galilee, and would take with them the ancient customs and the ancestral tongue. Samaria, however, preserved its integrity as a foreign colony, with its own Semitic dialect.
Beyond the Jordan, and in the border lands of the south,
there was some mingling with the neighbouring Moabite, Idumean, and Arab tribes, and probably many dialects were spoken, the record of which has perished like any other. Yet the Hebrew of the Jerusalem Pharisees, the language of the Samaritans, the speech of the men of Galilee, and the patois of the borderers, were all Semitic dialects.

No place is specified for the alien speech of Greece. Yet it must not be forgotten that Greek was the language of trade and literature. It would be heard in the seaports, and in the neighbourhood of the great roads by which communication was kept up through Palestine between Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, by many in the Roman garrisons, and was the adopted tongue of the Jews of the Dispersion, who cultivated Hellenism, and brought their foreign customs to Jerusalem, when they came to worship or for temporary residence (see Ac 6:1). But the language of the Palestin- eans was a common language of the Palestinian synagogue of farmers, artisans, and labourers, as well as of educated Jews, who cultivated the ancient ways, was Hebrew, using that term for the moment in a somewhat extended sense. It is very significant, however, that there is no reference to the vernacular in Ac 19, and the obvious inference is confirmed by the description of the title on the cross. Besides the official notice in Latin, which was probably few could read, the accusation was written in Greek and in Hebrew. If the majority of the passers by would understand the former, the latter was superfluous. Even if the Hebrew was added only to please the mob, this fact would prove that the lower classes were partial to their vernacular, and were at least bilinguistic, and not in the habit of using Greek exclusively (cf. Ac 22:2).

The story of Peter's denial incidentally adds another confirmation. He conversed in a language which was understood by the servants and others of the same class assembled round the fire, but he was recognized as a northerner by his accent. There is no evidence that the Galileans pronounced Greek differently from the Judeans, but it is known that their pronunciation of some of the Hebrew letters differed from that of the southerners. Peter and the servants had a Semitic vernacular in common, though with dialectic differences of place, as well as of time, and possibly also of vocabulary.

In the Syrian Church historical documents have been handed down which, whatever he the dates of the existing works, undoubtedly represent very ancient traditions, and depend on documents such as would have been preserved amongst the archives of Edessa. In the Doctrine of Addai (read Addo) this remarkable statement occurs: "His whom God has blessed and adorned by his power to his disciples, whom are Hebrews, and only know the tongue of the Hebrews, in which he employed himself. In the Syrian Church there is a tradition that their national version of the NT was rather a second record than a translation, and dated from Apostolic times. Such a view (whether true or false matters not now) depends on an assumption that some language related to Syriac, if not Syriac itself, was the vernacular of the Apostle. The greater part of the NT consists of writings intended for the benefit of Jews who resided outside Palestine, and of converts from heathenism. For such readers the vernacular of Palestine would have been unsuitable; and those of the writers who were not familiar with Greek could employ a translator. St. Peter is said to have been attended by Mark in this capacity. We have already referred to the tradition that Matthew, who wrote for the benefit of his countrymen, composed a Gospel in Hebrew. That some one such part of the NT of the Holy Land was thus employed is probable; but the circulation would be limited, for the native Jewish Church did not long retain the position of importance held by the Christians in Palestine (Ac 21:24), and the composing of sacred writings into a Canon was the work of Greek-speaking Christians. The Epistle of St. James is one of the earliest books of the NT, but though intended for Jewish Christians it was written in Greek, as a literary vehicle. As it appears that no real, difficulty is possible from the style of certain pieces included in the sacred narratives. The Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and Lord's Prayer, for example, which must be translations, in accordance with our view of the use of a Semitic vernacular, are thought to savour rather of original composition than of translation. But it should be remembered that the ancient idea of a version was different from ours. Literal rendering often (though not always) yielded to the demands of community of style. To take another, and, as some think, crucial instance), the angel could not have saluted Mary in the native dialect with the familiar alliteration- Gadarene, and yet the Evangelist has recorded the 'Hail! highly favoured' in that form, influenced by the style of OT diction, in which play on words is a marked feature.

The majority of the quotations in the Gospels appear to be derived from some form of the Septuagint Greek text of OT. It does not follow that the speakers habitually used Greek. All we can safely infer is that the Evangelists, when writing in Greek, employed a version which had acquired some authority by usage, to express the quotations they recorded.

It has been thought that the conversations between our Lord and the woman of Samaria and the Syrophoenician woman must have been carried on in Greek as a common language. It is forgotten that Syrie, Samaritan, and the so-called Hebrew of Palestine, were nearly related. Many to whom one or other of these was the vernacular, would have some slight acquaint- ance with the other. However, the present writer is of the opinion that this article is not to deny that Christ knew, and sometimes spoke, Greek, to reinforce the arguments by which we conclude that the vernacular of Palestine was Semitic, but that therefore Christ's teachings were, for the most part, delivered in a different tongue from that in which they have come to us in the Greek Gospels.

By far the greater number of personal and place names connected with Palestine in the NT are of Semitic derivation, but few that would be recognized in Hebrew. Ps 119:62; and that therefore Christ's teachings were, for the most part, delivered in a different tongue from that in which they have come to us in the Greek Gospels.

These and other Semitic remains preserved in the pages of the NT, even when account has been taken of all place and personal names and sign words, as well as of the few phrases, afford but limited evidence, and are only a few specimens of the Palestinian vernacular.

Yet they suffice to show that the dialect was neither ancient Hebrew nor the classical Syriac, which, from certain circumstances, is conjectured to have arisen through corruption of the ancestral tongue, under the influence of surrounding languages, especially Aramaic. Probably it varied considerably in different places and eras: it is doubtless an archaic language, that is, superfluous. Very few of the words would be comprehensible to a Semitic scholar.

LANTERN.—Only in 18b, where some form of 'torch' is more probably intended. The Greek is phaxos, a word not found elsewhere in Biblical Greek.

LAODICEA was situated in the valley of the Lyceum, a tributary of the Meander in Asia Minor. It was founded by Antiochus I. about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. It was planted in the lower Lyceum, Bagos being situated in the upper. The Lyceum gey was the most frequent path of trade from the interior of the country to the west, and the great road passed right through Laodicea. The city was nearly square, and strongly fortified. In addition to the aqueduct of 6 miles long. It played a comparatively small part in the dissemination of Greek culture. Its prosperity advanced greatly under the Romans. It was an important manufacturing centre, for instance, for a soft glossy black wool, which was made into garments of various kinds (cf. Rev 3:19). In connection with the temple of the Phrygian god Men Karou (13 miles W. of Laodicea), there grew up a celebrated school of medicine. Its most famous medicines were an ointment made from spice nard, which strengthened the cars, and
LAPPIDOTh

Phrygian powder, obtained by crushing Phrygian stone, which was used for the eyes (Rev 3:19). There were many inhabitants of Laodicea, and the population as a whole was of very mixed race. There is a want of individuality about the life of this city, which has been called 'the city of compromise.' The church there was not ruled by St. Paul, but probably by one of his coadjutors, perhaps Epaphras (Col 4:12). It was no doubt one of the cities which received the 'Epistle to the Ephesians' (Col 4:13), as well as the Epistle to the Colossians (Col 4:16). It was one of the 'seven churches' of the Apocalypse (3:19-20). Its condemnation is perhaps the severest of all.

LAPPIDOTh (‘torches’ or ‘lightning flashes’).—The husband of Deborah the prophetess (Jg 4:11). Some commentators take the term to be descriptive of the character of Deborah, ‘a woman of lightning flashes.’ In favour of this they urge the feminine termination -oth, but the same termination is found elsewhere to men’s names, e.g., Meremoth. T. A. MOXON.

LAWPG.

LASCIVIOUSNESS. — The Greek word so translated in Mk 7:3 etc. is translated ‘wantonness’ in Ro 13:12. This is the translation in the VSS before AV in nearly all the places where AV has ‘lasciviousness.’ The idea of the Gr. word is shameless conduct of any kind.

LASEA is mentioned by St. Luke (Ac 27:6), but by no other ancient author. It was the nearest town to Fair Havens in Crete, but it was 5 miles away, and this, apart from the inconvenience of the roadstead, would explain the reluctance of the captain of St. Paul’s ship to winter there. The ruins of Lasea were examined in 1856,—the site still bears the ancient name. A. E. HILLARD.

LASHA (Gn 10:9) marked the S.E. boundary of the land of the Philistines. Jerome identified it with the hot springs of Callirroê in the Wady Zargh Ma‘tèn. Wehlhausen would identify it with Laish, on the N. frontier. There is nothing to support this but the resemblance in the name. Against it is the order in which the names occur. It cannot now be identified.

W. EWING.

LASSHARON. — A town taken by Joshua (12:4).

LXX B reads here ‘the king of Aphek in Sharon.’ The Onomasticon gives the name of ‘Sharon’ to a second district, viz. that between Mount Tabor and Tiberias. The name Sarraזה attaches to an ancient site on the plateau between S.W. of Tiberias, which may possibly represent Lasharon (Conder). W. EWING.

LASTHENES. — An officer of high rank, ‘kinsman’ (1 Mac 11:1) and ‘father’ (v. 22) of Demetrius II. He raised a body of Cretan mercenaries, and enabled Demetrius to land in Cilicia, and wrest the throne from Syria from Alexander Balas (Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 3; cf. 1 Mac 10:9). When Demetrius was endeavouring to make terms with Jonathan the Maccabean, he wrote to Lasthenes in favour of the Jews, and forwarded a copy of his letter to the Jewish prince (1 Mac 11:6-47).

LATCHEt. — See Dares, § 6.

LATIN. — In such provinces as Judea the Latin language alone had place in official acts and Roman courts. Where Greek was allowed in court pleadings, it was, so to speak, an act of grace on the judge’s part, and there can be little doubt that, e.g., the speech of Tertullian in Ac 24 was in Latin. The Latin words used in a Greek form in the NT are mainly administrative, legal, or military (e.g. census, custodia, praetorium, etc.), but names of Roman coins (denarius, quadrans), but the total number of such Latin words occurring is only about 25. The Gentile names adopted by Jews were generally of Greek form (e.g. Paulus became Saulus) or names like that of St. Paul was an exception (to be expected perhaps with one so proud of Roman citizenship). Throughout Palestine, while Latin was the language of the administration, Greek was the main language of commerce, and Aramaic the language of common intercourse among Jews. Hence we find the three languages used for the superscription on the cross (Lk 23:38).

LATIN VERSIONS. — See Text of OT and NT and Vulgate.

LATTICE. — See House, § 7.

AUD. — In Ro 15:8 the AV has ‘Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.’ The Gr. vss. being different, two different Eng. vss. are used. But the RV turns ‘laud’ into ‘praise.’ In the OT, however, ‘laud’ and ‘praise’ are both used in order to distinguish two Heb. vss., as in Ps 117:145, though not quite consistently. In Ps 147:12 the difference between the verb is ignored.

LAUGHTER. — Laughter is used in the Bible in three ways. (1) It is opposed to weeping, as Ex 33:4, Job 5:21, Ps 132:6, Lk 6:41. (2) It expresses incredulity, as Gn 17:19, Is 25:5. (3) It signifies derision, as Ps 24, Bel 14.

LAYER. — See Tabernacle, § 4, Temple, § 6 (d).

LAW (IN OT).—1. That the law was given by Moses (Ex 19) represents the unique position of the early Christians and of the Chosen Nation. He was their first as well as their greatest law-giver; and in this matter religious tradition is supported by all the historical and chronological probabilities of the case. The Exod. and its sequel wanders constitute the formative epoch of Israel’s career: it was the period of combination and adjustment between the various tribes towards effecting a national unity. The Mosaic Codes (whereas the social experiments, for no society can hold together without some basis of permanent security; no nation could be welded together, least of all a nation in ancient times, without some strong sense of corporate responsibilities and corporate religion. It therefore naturally devolved upon Moses to establish a central authority for the administration of justice, which should be universally accessible and universally recognized. This was only one method by which any such universal recognition could be attained; and that was by placing the legal and judicial system upon the basis of an appeal to that religion, which had already been successful in ruling the twelve tribes to a sense of their unity, and which, moreover, was the one force which could and did effectively prevent the disintegration of the heterogeneous elements of which the nation was composed.

2. We see the beginnings and characteristics of these legislative functions in Ex 18, where Moses explains how the people came unto me to inquire of God: when they have a matter they come unto me; and I judge between a man and his neighbour, and make them know the statutes of God, and his laws (Or. 18). Originally ἐκκλησία (the usual word in the OT for ‘law’) meant, as in this passage, oral instruction or direction. This kind of ἐκκλησία survived for long in Israel. It was a ‘method strictly practical and in precise conformity with the genius and requirements of primitive nations,’ W. R. Smith (OT/FJC 339). Cases of exceptional difficulty were brought to the sanctuary, and the decisions there given were accepted as emanating from the Divine Judge of Israel (cf. 1 S 22; and, for the use of ‘Elohim’ to signify the judge speaking in Jehovah’s name, cf. Ex 21:27). The cases thus brought before the God may be divided into three classes, as they dealt respectively with (1) matters of moral obligation, (2) civil suits, (3) ritual difficulties. We read that Moses found it necessary to devolve some of this administrative work upon various elders, whom he associated with himself in the capacity of law-givers.

In this connexion it is important to remember that—
(a) Both decisions were oral, i.e., not recorded only on the parties concerned, and in their case only so far as they chose to submit to the ruling of the judge, or as the latter could enforce his authority, yet with the increasing power of the executive government, such decisions soon acquired the force of constitutudary law for a wider circle, until they affected the whole nation. (c) Such oral direction in no sense excludes the idea of any previous laws, or even of a written code. The task of the judges was not so much to create as to interpret. The existence and authority of the latter stood still for any doubts as to the sense of individual application. (d) As social life became more complex, the three divisions of law had become more specialised; civil suits were tried by the judge; the prophets almost confined themselves to giving oral direction on moral duties; the priests were concerned mainly with the solution of ritual difficulties. Cf. JUSTICE (II.).
LAW (IN OT)

Here, then, we can trace the character of Hebrew legislation in its earliest stages. Law (torah) means oral direction, gradually crystallising into consuetudinary law, which, so far from excluding, may almost be said to lay hand to, but is, a doctrine, as the basis of its interpretative function. Finally, when these directions were classified and reduced to writing (cf. Hos 5:13), torah came to signify such a collection of the same word was used as a convenient and comprehensive term for the whole Pentateuch, in which all the most important legal collections were carefully included.

3. The Torah of the Prophets was moral, not ceremonial. The priests, while by their office necessarily much engaged in ceremonial and ritual actions, nevertheless had boundless opportunities for giving the worshipers direction, and the principles underlying their religious observances; and it is for their neglect of such opportunities, and not, as is often crudely maintained, on account of any inherently necessary antagonism between the purely ceremonially and prophetically defined, that the prophets so frequently rebuke the priests,—not because of the fulfillment of their priestly (i.e. ceremonial) duties, but because of the non-fulfillment of their prophetical (i.e. moral) opportunities. For the priests claimed Divine sanction for their worship, and tradition ascribed the origin of all priestly institutions to Mosaic (or Aaronic) authorship. This the prophets do not deny; but they do deny that the distinctive feature of the Sinaitic legislation was anything but its moral import.

In this connexion the words of Jehovah cannot be quoted too often: 'I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices; but this thing I commanded them, saying—Hear my voice, . . . and walk ye in the way that I command you' (Deut. 30:20). The correct interpretation of such a passage corroborates Jeremiah's contention that it is wholly unwarrantable to say that the prophets condemned the sacrificial system, or denied its worth and Divine sanction; but, on the other hand, we are justified in asserting that the main body of the sacred law of the Lord,' meant to the prophets something wholly different from the punctilious observance of traditional ceremonies; and what is more, they appeal without fear of contradiction to the contents of the Mosaic legislation as completely establishing their conviction that it was in the sphere of morality, rather than in the organizing of worship, that the essence of Jehovah's law was to be found.

4. With this test (as well as with the considerations proposed in § 1) the character of the Decalogue is found to be in complete agreement. Its Mosaic origin has indeed been questioned, on the ground that such an etiology as is here proposed is wholly at variance with the "essentially ritualistic character" of primitive religions. To this it may be replied: we cannot call the prophets as witnesses for the truth of two mutually contradictory propositions. Having already cited the prophets in disproof of the Mosaic authorship of the Levitical legislation, on the ground that the latter is essentially ritualistic (and therefore does not correspond to the prophets' view of the Law of Jehovah), it is monstrously unfair to deny the Sinaitic origin of what is left in conformity with the prophethetical standard, on the ground that it ought to be "essentially ritualistic" also, and is not.

We have rightly had our attention called to the witness of the prophets. But the weight of their evidence against the early elaboration of the ceremonial law is exactly proportioned to the weight attached to their evidence for the existence and authenticity of the moral code.

A. A more serious dilemma has been created by the fact that we have apparently three accounts of the Decalogue, exhibiting positively astounding divergences (Ex 20, Dt 5, and Ex 34). The differences between Ex 20 and Dt 5 are not hard to explain, as the Ten Words themselves are in each case identical, and it is only in the explanatory comments that the differences are marked. Stylistic peculiarities, as well as other considerations, seem to show that these latter are subsequent editorial additions, and that originally the Decalogue contained no more than the actual commandments, without note or explanation. It is, however, most instructive to observe that no theory of inspiration or literary criticism can explain an incorporeal introduction into their account of the Ten Words of God to Moses, the basis of all Hebrew legislation, such commentaries and exhortations as they considered suitable to the needs of their own times. The difficulty with regard to Ex 34, where a wholly different set of laws seems to be called 'The Ten Words,' has not been solved. Hypotheses of textual displacement abound (cf. OTJC 342); and Driver, LOT 39, while some scholars have suggested, with much force and ingenuity, that we have in Ex 20-23 and 34-34 a series of abbreviations, re-arrangements, and expansions of ten groups of ten laws each. No final solution has yet been reached; but we may hold with confidence that the traditional account of the Decalogue is correct, and that the Ten Commandments in their original and shorter form were promulgated by Moses himself. On this basis the law of Israel rests, and in the Pentateuch we can distinguish the attempts made from time to time to apply their principles to the life of the people.

6. The Law of Deuteronomy shows a civilization far in advance of that contemplated in the preceding code. Life is more complex; and religious problems of an earlier generation are not and receive full treatment. It is not difficult to fix its approximate date. In the year a.c. 621, king Josiah inaugurated a national reformation resulting from the discovery of a Book of the Law in the Temple. All the evidence points to this book being, in substance, identical with the book in question; all the reforms which Josiah inaugurated were based upon laws practically indistinguishable from those we now possess in the Deuteronomic Code; in fact, no conclusion of historical or literary criticism has been reached more nearly approaching to absolute certainty than that the Book of the Law brought to light in 621 was none other than the fifth book of the Pentateuch.

But was it written by Moses?—(i.) The book itself nowhere makes such a claim. (ii.) The historical situation (suiting the times of the later monarchy) is not merely anticipated, but actually presupposed. (iii) The linguistic evidence points to a long development of the art of public oratory. (iv) The religious standpoint is that of, e.g., Jeremiah and Ezekiel, looking back to a deuteronomistic past. (v) Some of its chief visions appear to have been entirely unknown before 600; even the most fervid champions of propheticism before that date seem to have accepted the deuteronomistic law and the central teaching of the one sanctuary. (vi) While subsequent writers show abundant traces of Deuteronomistic influence, we search in vain for any such traces earlier in the literature. On the contrary, Deut. is itself seen to be an attempt to realize in a legal code those great principles which had been so emphatically announced by Moses and Israel.

The laws of Deuteronomy are, however, in many instances much earlier than the 7th century. The Book of the Covenant supplies much of the groundwork; and the additional material is independently attested. It is not so much the substance (with perhaps the exception of (a) below) as the expansions and explanations that are new. A law-book must be kept up to date if it is to have any practical value and Deuteronomy have 'a prophetic re-formulation and adaptation to new needs of an older legislation' (LOT 91).

The main characteristics of Deut. are to be found in—
(a) The Law of the one Sanctuary, which aimed at the total extinction of the worship of the high places. By confining the central act of worship, i.e., the rite of sacrifices, to Jerusalem, this law certainly had put an end to the crepidistic tendencies which constituted a perpetual danger to Israel. But while the worship was centralized, it is also somewhat impoverished the free religious life of the common people, who had aforetime lived at all times and in all places to do sacrifice and hold communion with their God.
(b) The wonderful humanity which is so striking a feature of these laws. The religion of Jehovah is not confined to worship, but is to be manifested in daily life, and as God’s love is the great outstanding fact in Israel’s history, so the true Israelite must show love for God, whom he has seen, by loving his neighbour, whom he has sene. Even the animals are to be treated with consideration and kindness.
(c) The evangelical fervour with which the claims of Jehovah upon Israel’s devotion are urged. He is so utterly different from the dead heathen divinities. He is a living, kind, generous, loving God; not being less than the undivided heart-service of His children.

It is not surprising that Deuteronomy should have been especially dear to our Lord (cf. Mt 4), or that He should have proclaimed its highest word as the first law no longer for Judah, but for the world’ (Mt 12:28, Dt 6:4) (Carpenter, quoted by Driver, Deut. p. xxxiv.).

7. The Law of Holiness (Lv 17–26) is a short collection of laws in Leviticus. The precepts of this code deal mainly with moral and ceremonial matters, and harshly touch questions of civil and criminal law. We should notice especially the prominence of agricultural festivals, the multiplication of ritual regulations, the conception of sin as impurity, and, again, the predominance of humanitarian principles.

8. The Priestly Code, comprising the concluding chapters of Exodus, the whole of Leviticus, and other portions of the Hexateuch, probably represents a determined attempt to give practical effect to the teaching of Ezekiel. We may approximately fix its date by observing that some of its fundamental institutions are unknown to, and even contradicted by, the Deuteronomic legislation. On the other hand, the influence of Ezekiel is prominent. The Priestly editor, or school, lays special stress on the ceremonial institutions of Israelite worship, and we must not, however, conclude that they are therefore all post-exilic. On the contrary, the origin of a great number is demonstrably of high antiquity; but their elaboration is of a far more modern date. It is sometimes customary to sneer at the Priestly Code as a mass of ‘Legivtal deterioration.’ It would be as justifiable to quote the rubrics of the Prayer Book as a fair representation of the teaching of the Church of England. As a matter of fact, P does not profess to supplant, or even to supplement, all other laws. The editor has simply collected the details of ceremonial legislation, and the rubrics of Temple worship, with some account of their origin and purpose. In later history, the expression of Israel’s religion through Temple services acquired an increased significance. If the national life and faith were to be preserved, it was absolutely essential that the ceremonial law should be developed in order to mark the distinctive features of the Jewish creed. It is argued that such a policy is in direct contradiction to the universalistic teaching of the earlier prophets. But may be so, but contemporaneously it would have meant not the diffusion but the destruction of Jewish religion. It was only by emphasizing their national peculiarities that they were able to concentrate their attention, and consequently to retain a firm hold, upon their distinctive truths. Ezekiel’s ideal city was named ‘Jehovah is there’ (4829). P seeks to realize this ideal. All the laws, all the ceremonies, are intended to stamp this conviction indelibly upon Israel’s imagination, ‘Jehovah is there.’ Therefore the sense of sin must be deepened, that sin may be removed: therefore the need of purification must be constantly proclaimed, that the corrupting and disintegrating influences of surrounding heathenism may not prevail against the remnant of the holy people: therefore the ideal of national holiness must be sacralomically symbolized, and, through the symbol, actually attained.

It must be plain that such stress on ritual enactments inevitably facilitated the growth of formalism and hypocrisy. We know that in our Lord’s time the weightier matters of the law were systematically neglected, while the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, together with similar subtleties and refinements, occupied the attention of the lawyer and exhausted the energies of the zealous. But our Lord did not abrogate the law in its ceremonial or its moral injunctions. He came to fulfill it, that is, to fill it full, to give the substance, where the law was only a shadow of good things to come. He declared that not one jot or tittle should pass away till all things were accomplished; that is to say, until the end for which the law had been ordained should be reached. It took people some time to see that by His Incarnation and the foundation of the Christian Church that end had been gained; and that by His fulfilment He had made the law of none effect—not merely abrogating distinctions between meats, but transferring man’s whole relation to God into another region than that of law.

10. The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. The law does not destroy the fulfilling its multitudinous requirements had filled the more earnest with despair. There it remained confronting the sinner with his sin; but its pitiless ‘Thou shalt’ and ‘Thou shalt not’ gave him no comfort and no power of resistance. The law was as cold and hard as the tables on which it was inscribed. It taught the meaning of sin, but gave no help as to how sin was to be overcome. The sacrificial system attempted to supply the want; but it was plain that the blood of bulls and goats could never take away sin. In desperation the law-convicted sinner looked for a Saviour to deliver him from this body of death, and that Saviour he found in Christ. The law had been his ‘pedagogue,’ and had brought him to the Master from whom he could receive that help and grace it had been powerless to give. But Christianity not merely gave power; it altered man’s whole outlook on the world. The Jews lived under the law: they were the unwilling subjects of an inexorable despotism; the law was excellent in itself, but to them it remained something external; obedience was not far removed from bondage and fear. The prophets realized the inadequacy of this legalism, and it was no real appeal to man’s highest nature; it did not spring from the man’s own heart; and so they prophesied of the New Covenant, then Jehovah’s laws should be written in the heart, and, His spirit being the law, grace should remove all elements of servile fear (cf. esp. 534)
Law (IN NT)

Jer 31:27; but it was only the hard discipline of the law that made them realize the necessity and superiority of a more spiritual covenant between man and his God.

11. A word may be said about the giving of the law. Whatever physical disturbances may have accompanied the original proclamation, it is not upon such natural phenomena that its claims to the homage of mankind are based. It is, in a manner, more mundane that God should at that early age, among those half-civilized tribes, have written these laws by his spirit on man's conscience and understanding, that he might thunder and shower them on his own fingers upon two tables of stone. The Old Testament itself teaches us that we may look in vain for God among the most orthodox manifestations of a theophany, and yet hear him speaking in the still, small voice. Miracle is not the essence of God's revelation to us, though it may accompany and authenticate his message. The law stands because the Saviour, in laying down for us the correct lines of its interpretation has sealed it with the stamp of Divine approval, but also because the consciousness and reason of mankind have recognised in its simplicity and comprehensiveness a sublime exposition of man's duty to his God and to his neighbour; because 'by manifestation of the truth it has commanded itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God' (cf. 2 Co 4:6).

Law (IN NT).—This subject will be treated as follows: (1) the relation of Jesus Christ to the OT Law; (2) the doctrine of law in St. Paul's Epistles; (3) the compendious teaching of Horace Nice for St. James representing primitive Jewish Christianity.

1. Our Lord stated his position in the saying of Mt 5:17: 'I did not come to destroy the law or the prophets.' This means that Jesus' teaching was in accordance with the contents of Divine Scripture (sometimes, for brevity, spoken of simply as 'the law'; see Jn 10:13, 12:15ff., which does not mean to invalidate in the least the moral and religious precepts and legislation of the Old Testament, but teaches that the law is fulfilled, or vindicated, in Jesus (see 7:11f., which will vindicate and complete. But his 'fulfilment' was that of the Master, who knows the inner mind and real intent of the Scripture He expounds. It was not the fulfilment of one who rehearse a pre-scribed lesson or tracks out a path marked for him by predecessors, but the crowning of an edifice already founded, the carrying forward to its issue of the lines projected in the promise and prophetic revelation of the blade and ear in 'the full corn.' Jesus penetrated the shell to reach the kernel of OT representations; and He regarded himself—his person, sacrifice, salvation, kingdom—as the focus of manifold previous revelations (see Lk 4:16-32, 19:24ff.; Jn 7:19ff., where the warning of Mt 5:17-20 was aimed at the Jewish legislators, who dissolved the authority of the law, while jealously guarding its letter, by casuistical comments and smoothing traditions, who put light and grave on a like footing, and blunted the sharpness of God's commands in favour of man's corrupt inclinations. The Corban formula, exposed in Mk 7:21f., was a notorious instance of the Rabbinical quibbling that Jesus denounced. It was a severer not only in ethics that Jesus introduces, a searching in place of a superficial discipline; 'Your righteousness,' he says, 'must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees.' Our Lord's fulfillment of 'the law'—i.e., in the strictest sense, the body of Mosaic statutes regulating Israelite life and worship—incorporated (a) the personal and free submission to it, due to his birth and circumcision as a son of Israel (Gal 4:4; cf. Mt 1:25, 13:15-17f., Lk 2:41-42); (b) the literal and word-for-word observance of its unrecognised or partially disclosed principles. Thus Jesus asserted, in accordance with views already advanced among the scribes, that 'the whole law and the prophets are bound up in one commandment, namely: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength.' (Mt 22:37-40, Lk 10:27)---the parable of the Good Samaritan gives to the second command an unpreceanted scope. His distinction between a weightier matter of mercy, fidelity, and the lighter of tithes and washings, was calculated to revolutionize current Judaism.

(c) A large part of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:21-48) is devoted to clearing the law from erroneous glosses and false applications: on each point Jesus sets his 'I say unto you' against what was said to the ancients'—mere antiquity goes for nothing; nor is it careful to distinguish between the literal written law and its traditional modifications. With each correction the law in His hands grows morestringent; its observance is made a matter of inner disposition, of intrinsic loyalty, not of formal conduct; the criterion applied to all law-keeping is that it shall 'proceed out of the heart.'

(d) Further, our Lord's fulfillment of the law necessitated the abrogation of temporary and defective statutes. In such instances the legal and the spiritual stood only if it should be translated into a worthier form and raised to a higher potency (Mt 5:17), by the sweeping away of limiting exceptions (as with the compromise in the matter of wedlock allowed to 'the hard-heartedness' of Israelites, Mt 19:3-9), or by the translation of the symbolic into the spiritual, as when cleansing of hands and vessels is displaced by inner purification (Mt 26:26; Lk 11:37-41, cf. Col 2:19, He 9:11). Jesus' reform of the marriage law was also a case for (b) above: He rectifies the law by the aid of the law; in man's creation He finds a principle which nullifies the provisions that facilitated divorce. The abolition of the distinction of 'husband and wife' (Mt 19:4) marks the loss of Jewish daily habits and in the whole Levitical scheme of life, is the one instance in which Jesus laid down what seemed to be a new principle of ethics. The exhortation 'to love thy neighbour' (Lk 10:25), founded on the identifying principle of the law, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' was a new moral; it entered into the heart of the law, and could not defile, but only 'the things that issue out of the man,' was of far-reaching application, and supplied afterwards the charter of Gentile Christianity. Its teaching, however, standing between the law and the gospel, teaching, and belonging to the essence of the doctrine of Jesus, He could not consistently vindicate heart-religion without combating Judaism in the matter of its applications and food-regulations.

(e) Over the last question Jesus came into the severest conflict with Jewish orthodoxy; and in this struggle He revealed the consciousness, latent throughout His dealings with OT legislation, of being the sovereign, and not a subject like others, in this realm. Our Lord 'fulfilled the law,' by 'setting it with His own final authority.' His 'I say unto you,' spoken in a tone never assumed by Moses or the prophets, implied so much and was so understood by His Apostles (cf. Jn 9:31, Gal 6:1, Jn 20:21, etc.). Christ arrogates the role of 'a son over his house,' whereas Moses was 'a servant in the house' (He 13:10), assuming to be 'greater than Solomon,' 'than Abraham,' 'than the temple' (Mt 12:41, Jn 2:49). He acted as one greater than Moses! The Sabbath-law was the chosen battle-ground between Him and the established masters in Israel (Mt 22:31-32; Lk 12:1-11', Jn 2:9-10). In the public Sabbath assemblies Jesus was oftenest confronted with cases of disease and demoniacal possession; He must do His work as God's 'sent' physician. The Sabbath-rules were clear and familiar; His infraction of them in acts of healing was flagrant, repeated, defiant; popular reverence for the day made accusations on this count particularly dangerous. Men were placed in a dilemma: the Sabbath-breaker is 'perpe facinto a sinner,' on the one hand; 'how can a man rest on the Sabbath-day' and to work in the service of God (Mt 12:11, 13). Jesus argues the matter on legal grounds, showing from recognized practice that the 4th Commandment must be construed with common sense, and that 'it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day' and to work in the service of God (Mt 12:11). He goes behind those examples to the governing principle (see (b) above), that 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath' (Mt 23:5); the institution is designed for human benefit, and its usages should be determined by its object. But He is not content with saying this: the war against Him was driven on the Sabbath-question à præteritum; Jesus draws the sword of His reserved authority. He claims, as sovereign in human affairs, to decide what is right in the matter—'The Son of Man is lord of the Sabbath'; more than this, He professes to have wrought His Sabbath work as God the Father does, to whom all days are alike in His beneficence, and through the insight of a Son watching the Father at His labour (Jn 5:19-24)—a pretension no Apostle had a right to make himself equal with God! On this ground Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrin (cf. Jn 197), because He set Himself above the Sabbath, on the strength of His Lord's claim and His own claim to be 'Son of God.' Jesus put Christ to death; it was too small to hold Him; its administrators thought themselves bound to inflict the capital sentence on One who said, 'I am the Son of the Blessed' (Mk 14:62).

(7) At the same time, Caiaphas, the official head of the system, gave another explanation, far deeper than he guessed, of the execution: 'That Jesus should die for the nation, and not for the nation only' (Jn 11:52). Virtually, He was offering Himself for the 'lamb of the Paschal Feast, ready to be slain in sacrifice, that He might take away the sin of the world.' This mysterious relation of the death of Jesus to Divine law He had laid down here and there (Rom 3:10-12; 5:12-15). His exposition was reserved for His Apostles speaking in the light of this grandest of all fulfilments. Jesus made good the implicit promise of the sacrifice of Israel.

2. The word 'law' occurs 118 times in St. Paul's Epistles,—103 times in Romana and Galatians alone. It manifest how absorbing an interest the subject had for Paul, both as an Apostle, and where that interest mainly lay. Ga 2:9 puts us at the centre of St. Paul's position: 'I through law died to law, that I might live to God.' From legalism, as from a house of bondage, he had escaped into freedom (Ga 5-6), which the Apostle, 'died to the law,' as he had understood and served it when a Pharisee, regarding obedience to its precepts as the sole ground of acceptance with God. He had sought there 'a righteousness of his own, even that which is of the law' (Ph 3:9), to be gained by 'works,' by which he strove to merit salvation as a 'debt' due from God for service rendered,—a righteousness such as its possessor could 'boast of' as 'his own' (Ro 4:1-28-10). Pursuing this path, he had failed to win 'the right standing with God, such as is valid before God;' the method was impracticable—justification on the terms of 'the law of Moses' is unattainable (Ac 13:39; Ro 8). Instead of despising sin, the law appears to it, as a new, 'multiplying' where it aimed at suppressing 'the trespasses' (Ro 5:20-7-13, 1 Co 15:19). Not the 'law' in itself, but the 'carnal' sin-bound nature of the man, he had to blame for this; arrayed against 'the law of God,' to which 'reason' bows, is 'another law' successfully oppugning it, that 'of sin' which occupies 'my members' (Ro 7:21-9), and which is, in effect, a 'law of death' (8).

(6) But St. Paul's Judaistic experience had a positive as well as a negative result: if he 'died to law,' it was 'through law'; 'the law has proved our pedagogue for leading us out of Christ' (Gal 3:24). Law awakened conscience and disciplined by moral faculties; the Jewish people were like 'an heifer' placed 'under guardians and stewards until the appointed times,' and trained in bond-service with a view to their 'adoption' (Gal 4:4). Even the aggravations of sin caused by the law had their benefit, as they brought the disease to a head and reduced the patient to a state in which he was ready to accept the proffered remedy (Ro 7).

The Scripture had in this way 'shut up all things under sin,' blocking every door of escape and blighting every hope of a self-earned righteousness (Gal 3:14), that the sinner might accept unconditionally the 'righteousness which is through faith in Christ' (Ph 3:9).

(c) Contact with Gentile life had widened St. Paul's conception of moral law; it was touched by the influences of Greek philosophy and Roman government. He discerned a law established by nature, and 'inscribed in the hearts of men ignorant of the Mosaic Code and counting with Jews as 'lawless.' This Divine jus (and fas) gentium served, in a less distinct but very real sense, the purpose of the written law in Israel; it functioned on the highest moral requirements and the consciousness of sin (Ro 2:16). The rule of right and wrong Paul regards as a universal human institute, operating so as to 'bring the whole world under judgment before God' (Ro 13:11); its action is manifested by the universal incidence of death: in this sense, and in the light of 21:14, should be read the obscure parenthesis of Ro 6:14, as stating that 'law' is concomitant with 'sin;' the existence of sin, followed by death, in the generations between Adam and Moses proves that law was there all along, whether in a less or a more explicit form; the connexion of sin and death in humanity is, in fact, a fundamental legal principle (Ro 8, 15).

(7) Having 'died to law' by renouncing the futile salvation it appeared to offer, the Apostle had learned to live to it again in a better way and under a nobler form, since he had begun to 'live to God' in Christ. The law of Moses has been removed from Abraham (15:23, 28), and the charge made against him on this score was wholly mistaken. While no longer 'under law,' he is 'not lawless toward God, but in law toward Christ!' (Ro 6:14, 1 Co 9:1). He, the old ego, 'the flesh with its passions and lusts, has been crucified with Christ' (Gal 2:20-9-23). God's law ceases to press on him as an external power counteracted by 'the law of sin in the members;' the latter has been expelled by 'the Spirit of God's Son,' which 'forms Christ' in him; the new, Christian man is 'in Christ' as he is 'in Christ'—he sees the law now from the inside, in its unity and charm, and it constrains him with the regard of a father, and the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus' possessing his nature. He 'serves' indeed, but it is 'in the new' life wrought 'of the Spirit, and not in the old' servitude to 'the letter' (Ro 7). Conceiving now 'one new man,' believers of every race and rank 'through love serve one another,' as the hand serves the eye or the head, the feet; for them 'the whole law is fulfilled in one word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Ro 13:9, 1 Co 13:14, Gal 5:14; Eph 2:18). The Christian's 'in the law of Christ,' as the limb of the law of the head. Thus St. Paul's doctrine of the law joins hands with that of Jesus (see 1 above). Thus also, in his system of thought, the law of God is revealed in the O.T., Man received from on High, and spiritualized, and planted by 'faith' along with Him in the believer's heart (cf. Jer 31:31-38), becomes for the first time really valid and effective: 'Do we nullify law through faith? God forbid; nay,' he cries, 'we establish law!' (Ro 3:38).

(e) Neither Jesus nor Paul forms a formal distinction between the moral and the ceremonial law (see, however, Ro 9), St. Paul's teaching bears mainly on the former: as a Pharisee he had no ritualistic bent, and his ambition was for ethical perfection. 'Circumcision' has lost in his eyes all religious value, and remains a mere national custom, now that it ceases to be the covenant-sign and is replaced in this setting by 'a circumcision' (Col 2:11, Gal 6:14; Col 2:13). It becomes a snare to Gentiles when imposed on them as necessary to salvation, or even to advancement in the favour of God; for it binds them 'to keep the whole law' of Moses, and leads into the fatal path of 'justification by law' (Gal 2:1-3, 14). St. Paul's contention with the legalists of Jerusalem on this question was a life and death struggle, touching the very 'truth of the gospel' and 'the freedom of the Church' (Ac 13:58, Gal 2:14-18). The same interests were threatened, more insidiously, by the subsequent attempt, countenanced by Peter and Barnabas at Antioch, to separate Jewish from Gentile Christians at 536

Table through the re-assertion of the Mosaic distinction of 'meats' which had been expressly discarded by Jesus. The assumption of a privileged legal status within the Church meant the surrender of the whole principle of salvation by faith and of Christian saintship (Gal 2:4; Ro 14:14, 1 Co 8:8; cf. Mk 7:10-15). In some Churches Paul had to deal with the inculation of Jewish ritual from within. It has been the point of view of C. H. Colosses that the divine and sacred seasons of Mosaicism were imposed on grounds of ascetic discipline, and of reverence towards angelic (act. astral) powers; he pronounces them useless in the form, and in the faster irreligious towards Christ, who supplies 'the body of' which those prescriptions were but a 'shadow' (Col 2:16).

3. Col 2 forms a link between the doctrine of St. Paul of the law and the complementary teaching of the writer of Hebrews. A Jew of very different temperament and antecedents from Saul of Tarsus. This author emphasizes the ceremonial, as Paul the moral, factors of the OT; the Temple, not the synagogue; for him it is the Jewish fu (He 9:6 etc.); for St. Paul, it consisted chiefly of commandments expressed in ordinances (Eph 2:19), which prescribes the path of righteousness in daily life. The 'law' means for this great Christian thinker the institutions of the Israelite priesthood, sanctuary, sacrifices—all consummated in Christ and His 'once offering,' by which man has perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (He 10:10). In his view, the law is superseded as the imperfection, provisional, and ineffective, by the perfect, permanent, and satisfying as the shadowy outline by the image of things Divine (7:4-8:1:14-5); 'the sanctuary of this world' gives place to 'heaven itself,' revealed as the temple where the 'great high priest'—Divine human, perfect in the sense, perfect in the presence, and incommunicably superior to the Aaronic order (4:11f, 7:2f)—appears before the face of God for us, 'having entered through the virtue of his own blood' as the 'sacrifice' and the 'mediator of our covenant,' who has won mankind an 'eternal redemption' (25 2:28 9:4-90). Jesus thus 'inaugurated a new and living way into the holy place' (in contrast with the old and dead way of the law); as experience proves, he has cleansed the conscience from dead works to serve the living God,' while the law with its repealed animal sacrifices served to remind men of their sins rather than to remove them (7:9 10.1). Equally well it implies the author of Hebrews regards the remission of sins as the initial blessing of the Christian state, which had been unattainable under law, and the blood of Christ as the means of procuring this immense boon. In Paul's interpretation, this offering 'justifies' the unrighteous 'before God' and restores them to the forfeited status of sonship; in the interpretation of Hebrews, it 'cleanses' worshippers and brings them 'nigh to God' within. His sanctuary; on either view, the sacrifice of Calvary removes the barriers set up by man's sin 'under the law,' between humanity and God.

4. For St. James also the OT law was transformed. He conceives the change in a less radical fashion than Paul or the writer of Hebrews; James stands sturdily on the platform of the Sermon on the Mount. Re-cast by 'the Lord of glory' and charged with 'the wisdom that cometh from above,' the law is new and glorified in his eyes, like Paul, he knew it, he knew it; but, unlike Paul, he knew it, he knew it; they make it 'perfect,' and guarantee the believer's justification' (ch. 2). When he describes this law as 'a perfect law, the law of liberty,' James' idea is substantially that of Paul in 1 Co 2:3 and Ro 5:19, viz. that the law of God is no yoke compelling the Christian man from without, but a life actuating him from within; the believer 'bends over it' in contemplation, till he grows one with it (14; cf. 2 Co 3:9). 'The tongue' is the index of the heart, and St. James regards its control as a sure sign of perfection in law-keeping (3:3f). James treats of the law, not, like Paul, as it affects the sinner's standing before God, but, like the author of Hebrews, as it regulates his approach in worship—but as it governs the walk before God of the profession believer. His Epistle is, in effect, a comment on the last clause of Ro 8, 'that the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us.'

5. The word 'law' is entirely wanting in the Epistles of St. Peter and of St. John; 1 P 1:10, 11 2:11, 12 manifests the influence of Paul's doctrine of salvation on the writer; while 1 Jn 1:4 indicates a leaning to the mode of representation characteristic of Hebrews, and 1 Jn 2:25 and 4:16 virtually sustain the doctrine of St. Paul on law, sin, and sacrifice.

LAWGIVER.—The word is found six times in the AV of the OT (Gen 48:14, Nu 21:11,Dt 33:9, Ps 60:109, Is 33:19). The Heb., 'mishpat, which it translates, is from a root meaning 'cut' or 'engrave,' and hence to 'mark' a law, afterwards to be engraved on the public archives. The Heb. word appears to have two meanings: (1) 'law'; 'the law's Christ and His 'once offering,' by which man has perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (He 10:10). In his view, the law is superseded as the imperfection, provisional, and ineffective, by the perfect, permanent, and satisfying as the shadowy outline by the image of things Divine (7:4f, 8:1-4, 10-5); 'the sanctuary of this world' gives place to 'heaven itself,' revealed as the temple where the 'great high priest'—Divine human, perfect in the sense, perfect in the presence, and incommunicably superior to the Aaronic order (4:11f, 7:2f)—appears before the face of God for us, 'having entered through the virtue of his own blood' as the 'sacrifice' and the 'mediator of our covenant,' who has won mankind an 'eternal redemption' (25 2:28 9:4-90). Jesus thus 'inaugurated a new and living way into the holy place' (in contrast with the old and dead way of the law); as experience proves, he has cleansed the conscience from dead works to serve the living God,' while the law with its repealed animal sacrifices served to remind men of their sins rather than to remove them (7:9 10). Equally well it implies the author of Hebrews regards the remission of sins as the initial blessing of the Christian state, which had been unattainable under law, and the blood of Christ as the means of procuring this immense boon. In Paul's interpretation, this offering 'justifies' the unrighteous 'before God' and restores them to the forfeited status of sonship; in the interpretation of Hebrews, it 'cleanses' worshippers and brings them 'nigh to God' within. His sanctuary; on either view, the sacrifice of Calvary removes the barriers set up by man's sin 'under the law,' between humanity and God.

LAWYER.—This term in Scripture does not belong so much to the legal as to the religious sphere. The 'lawyers' banded themselves with the study and exposition of the Written and the Oral Law of Israel, and were practically identical with the scribes (wh. see).

LAYING ON OF HANDS.—This ceremony, of frequent occurrence in both OT and NT, is a piece of natural symbolism with the central idea that through physical contact the person performing it identifies himself with the other in the presence of God. In OT this is done with a view to the transformation (2) of a Divine blessing (Gen 48:14; cf. Nu 27:18, 8, Dt 34); (b) of a burden of guilt (Ly 14:33, 16f, etc.). In NT, whilst it is variously employed, the general idea is always that of blessing.

1. The simplest case is when Jesus lays hands on the little children (Mt 19:13-15). The fact that the mothers desired Him to do so shows that this was a custom of the time and people. The narrative in Mt. shows further that, as used by Jesus, it was no magical form, but the symbolic expression of what was essentially an act of prayer (195).

2. In St. Luke's account of healing Jesus constantly made use of this symbol (Mk 6:5, Lk 4:13; cf. Mt 9:1, Mk 7:31)—an example which was followed by the Apostle Church (Ac 9:17, 28). In these cases, however, besides its religious symbolism, the act may further denote the act of baptism (Ac 9:7, 8; 10:4); cf. He 6:2, which, however, may include the various kinds of laying on of hands), but sometimes quite apart from it (Ac 8:17, 19), as an accompanying of prayer that believers might receive a special endowment of the Holy Ghost in charismatic forms. That this endowment does not mean the essential gift of spiritual life, but some kind of ‘manifestation’ (1 Co 12), is proved when Ac 9th (‘filled with the Holy Ghost’), is compared with Ac 12 and when 8th. 17 is read in the light of the request of Simon Magus (v.18), and 19 in the light of 19. The case of Ananias and Saul (97) further proves that the laying on of hands for this purpose was not a peculiar Apostolic prerogative.

4. In four passages the laying on of hands is referred to in connection with an act that corresponds to ordination (the word in its ecclesiastical sense does not occur in NT). ‘Ordained’ in Ac 14th should be ‘elected’ or ‘appointed’; see RV. The Seven, after being chosen by the multitude, were appointed to office by the Apostles, with prayer and the laying on of hands (Ac 6). The ‘prophets and teachers’ of the Church at Antioch ‘separated’ Barnabas and Saul for their missionary work by laying their hands on them with fasting and prayer (Ac 13). The ‘laying on of hands’ which was in him with the laying on of the hands of a body of elders (see art. PRESBYTERY), with which St. Paul himself was associated (cf. 1 Ti 4th with 2 Ti 1st). To modern readers’ eyes, the practice of prayer and the laying on of hands (Ac 9) is seen in the ‘gracious gift’ probably given to St. Paul’s companion in the work of a missionary evangelist (see Hort, CHR. ECCLE. p. 184 ff.).

5. Of the manner in which deacons and elders or bishops were selected apart from official ministrations is given in Ac 6. The injunction, ‘Lay hands suddenly on no man’ (1 Ti 5), has often been supposed to refer to the act of ordination; but the fact that the whole passage (1 Ti 5) was written with opposing points rather than the imposition of hands in the restoration of the penitent (cf. 2 Co 7, Gal 6), a custom that certainly prevailed in the early Church at a later time. The fact, however, that Jewish Rabbis employed this rite when a disciple was authorized to teach, favours the view that this was commonly practised in the Apostolic Church, as it was almost universally in the post-Apostolic period, in consecration to ministerial office. But the silence of the NT at this point is against the supposition that the rite was regarded as an essential channel of ministerial grace, or anything more than the outward and appropriate symbol of an act of intercessory prayer (see Ac 15, 18; Ac 6: 28; and Aug. de Rep. 16, 11. ‘What else is the laying on of hands a prayer over one?’). See further, art. BISHOP. J. C. LAMBERT.

LAZARUS.—A common Jewish name, a colloquial abbreviation of Eliazer.

1. The brother of Martha and Mary, the friend of Jesus (Jn 11-14, 5, where ‘love’ and ‘friend’ represent the same thought); the name is not in the family of Bethany; the family lived at Bethany, a village within two miles of Jerusalem just over the brow of Olivet. Lazarus was the subject of the greatest miracle of the Gospel story (Jn 11-16). In the last year of His ministry Jesus bade farewell to Jerusalem from the Feast of Tabernacles in October to that of the Dedication in December; and, on being driven out by the violence of the rulers (Jn 10), He retired to Bethany beyond Jordan (v.1), at first part of the house, with the visit there of His friends. But the disciples at Bethany, including John, were present. When Lazarus was dead, Jesus stayed two days, and setting out early would arrive on the evening of the fourth day. Thus on His arrival Lazarus had been dead four days (v.10). In that short period the nature of the miracle was to be the soul hovered over the sepulchre for three days, to re-animate Its clay. On the fourth day decomposition set in, and hope was then abandoned. Jesus arrived on the fourth day, and there was no doubt of the reality of Lazarus’ death and of the ensuing miracle. It was not a recovery from a trance, but a veritable resurrection. He went to the rock-hewn sepulchre, and in presence of the sisters and a large company of mourners, including many of the rulers who had come from Jerusalem, summoned the dead man forth and restored him, alive and well, to his home. It was a parabolic miracle. It treated of the reality of the resurrection, but it only exasperated the rulers. They convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin and determined to put Jesus to death (v.14).

2. The beggar in our Lord’s parable (Lk 16,1).—This is the only instance where Jesus gives a name to a parabolic character, and there was an idea in early times that it was not a parable but a story from real life. The name was found also for the rich man—Ninives or Pithnes. He is often styled Dives, but this is merely Latin for ‘the Rich Man.’ In fact, however, Lazarus is used throughout the parable and is clearly identified. It means ‘God that helped’; and Jesus calls the beggar Lazarus by way of indicating what commended him to God. He was not only poor but also diseased. It is, however, a mistaken notion that he was a leper (hence lazeretto, lazor-house), for then he must have kept afar off and durst not have lain at the rich man’s gateway. The parable is a drama with two scenes: (1) The conditions of the Rich Man and the Beggar here—the former with his mansion, his fine clothing, his sumptuous table; and the latter lying at his gateway, full of sores, with none to tend him, hungrily eyeing the feast, and grip of any scraps that were flung to him. (2) Their conditions hereafter—a striking contrast. In Abraham’s bosom, i.e. the place of honour (cf. Jn 13,9), at the heavenly feast; the Rich Man in Hades, thirsting for a drop of water. The parable is clothed with Jewish imagery. ‘Hell’ in v.23 is Hades, the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Sheol, the unseeable world, where, according to Jewish theology, all souls, good and bad alike, lived their abode and received their due reward. It was an aggravation of the misery of the wicked that they had the felicity of the righteous continuously in view (cf. Rev 14,1). A reference to Abraham, the father of the faithful presiding, was the Jewish idea of the felicity of the Messianic Kingdom (cf. Mt 8:2). Jesus, ever anxious to appeal to His hearers, has clothed His parable with this familiar imagery.

The purpose of the parable is not to condemn riches and exalt poverty in the spirit of Ebionitic asceticism. It is an enlargement of the Lord's admonition in v. 2: 'Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when it shall fail, they may receive you into eternal tabernacles' (REV). The reason Lazarus was not that he was poor, but that he had found his help in God; the offence of the Rich Man was not that he was rich, but that he lived a self-indulgent and luxurious life, regardless of the misery around him. Had he made friends to himself of Lazarus and others like him by means of his mammon of unrighteousness, he would have had a place and a welcome among them when he entered the unseen world. David Smrtn.

LEAD.—See MINING AND METALS.

LEAH.—The elder daughter of Laban, married to Jacob by stratagem (Gn 29:27). Jacob's love for her was less for than Rachel (v. 30); sometimes she is said to be hated (v. 30). She was the mother of Reuben, Simon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, and a daughter Dinah (29:28-30; 30:25). She was buried in the cave of Machpelah before Jacob went to Egypt (49:30). She is mentioned in Ru 4:11. Her name probably means 'milking,' equivalent to Assyrian or (Haupt, 228, 1883). P. 100, and others). This is preferential to the view that it means 'wild cow,' from the Arabic, chiefly because the correspondence in form of the words is more close. The noun is Eluah.

LEASING.—A 'leasing' is a lie. Yeluff uses the word often. Thus Jn 8:2 'Whanne he speketh a leasinge, he spekith of his owne thinge; for he is a lyerie, and fadeth of it.' The word occurs in AV in Ps 46:9 and 2 Es 14:1.

LEATHER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 5.

LEAVEN.—The leaven both of OT and of NT may be assumed to have always consisted of a piece of fermented dough from a previous baking. There is no clear trace, even in the Mishna, of other sorts of leaven, such as the lees of wine or those enumerated by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xviii. 26). In ordinary cases, in the preparation of the household bread, the lump of dough, above referred to, was either broken down into the water in the kneading-trough (see BREAD) before the fresh flour was added, or it might be 'hid' in the latter and kneaded along with it, as in the parable, Mt 13:4. The bread made from dough thus prepared was 'leavened bread' (Ex 12:16 and oft.); could not be kneaded after the addition of the flour, and received the special name maazloth, 'unleavened cakes,' which gave their name to 'the feast of unleavened cakes' (Ex 23:16 etc., LEV 'unleavened bread').

The prohibition of leavened bread during the continuance of this Feast, including the Passover, is probably another illustration of conservatism in ritual, the nomadic ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Bedouin of the present day, having made their bread without leaven. The further exclusion of leaven from the offerings placed upon the altar of J—although admitted when the bread was to be eaten by the priests (Lv 7:3) is to be explained, like the similar exclusion of leaven from the standpoint that fermentation implied a process of corruption in the bread. The antiquity of this prohibition is attested by its occurrence in the earliest legislation (Ex 34:32-39). It does not seem to have been observed, however, in Amos' day in the Northern Kingdom (see the Qumrn. on Am 4:1).

This antique view of leaven as (in Plutarch's words) 'itself the offspring of corruption, and corrupting the mass of dough with which it has been mixed,' is reflected in the figurative use of 'leaven' in such passages as 2 Cor. 5:15. The word, as generally used in the LXX, quoted by St. Paul, 'a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump' (1 Co 5:8, Gal 5; cf. 1 Co 6:7). In Mt 13:4, however, it is the silent but all-pervading action of leaven in the mass of the dough that is the point of comparison.

LEBANON (Neh 7:47) or LEBANAH (Ezr 2:29).—The head of a family of returning exiles; called in 1 Es 5:20 Lebana.

LEBANON, now Jebel Liban, is mentioned more than sixty times in the OT. The name, from the root libăn (white), was probably given on account of the mountain's covering of snow. The snow of Lebanon is mentioned in Jer 18:14. Many passages refer to its beauty, particularly in relation to its cedars and other trees (see Ps 72:5, Ca 4, Hos 14:7). From Lebanon was obtained wood for building the first (2 Ch 29) and the second (Ezr 3) Temple. Lebanon was famous for its fruitfulness (Ps 72:5) and its wine (Hos 14:7).

The term 'Lebanon' may be considered in most places as referring to the whole mountain mass, more correctly distinguished as Lebanon Libanus (Libanus and Antilibanus of Jth 1). The two ranges traverse N. Syria, running roughly parallel, from S.W. to N.E., and are separated by a deep valley—the bigah of Jos 11:17-12:—a deep and narrow gorge, known as *d-*Buqa. The western range, Lebanon proper, is nearly 100 miles long, but the eastern, if Hermon is deducted as a separate entity, is only 65 miles long. The former range is divided from the mountains of Galilee by the deep chasm made by the Lisân river in its passage seawards. In the N. a somewhat shallow gorge formed by the Nahar el-Kebir, the ancient Eleutherus, divides it from the Jebel Qbur. The mountain group, named the 'Cedar group,' on account of the famous group of these trees in their midst, where the highest point, Jebel Makmal, reaches 10,207 feet, and several other points are almost as lofty. Geologically the Lebanon is built of three main groups of strata. Lowest comes a thick layer of yellow limestone, named—after its most characteristic fossil (Cidariscus glandarius)—Glandaria limestone; above this are strata of Nubian sandstone, yellow and red in colour, and in places 1500 feet thick, overlaid and interlaced with strata of limestone containing fossil echinoderms and ammonites; and thirdly, above this group, and forming the bulk of the highest peaks, is another layer, many thousand feet thick in places, of a limestone containing countless fossils known as hippurites, radiolites, and such like. The sandstone strata, the most important part for where the Lebanon, now to the surface is the richest soil and the most plentiful water, and here flourish most luxuriantly the pines which are such a characteristic feature of W. Lebanon scenery. A great contrast exists between the W. and the E. The former are fertile and picturesque, while down their immeasurable valleys course numberless mountain streams to feed the many rivers flowing seawards. The E. slopes are comparatively barren, and, except at one point, near Zahleh, there is no stream of importance. Of the Lebanon rivers besides the Nahar Lisân (Leontes) and the Nahar el-Kebir (Eleutherus), the following may be enumerated from S. to N. as the more important: Nahar ez-Zahara (Karkhun), Nahar Birût (Maqora), Nahar el-Kebir (Lycus), Nahar Ibrahim (Adonis), and the Nahar Qadisha or 'holy river,' near Tripoli.

The Lebanon is still fairly wooded in a few places, though very scantily compared with ancient times, when Hiram, king of Tyre, supplied Solomon with 'cedar trees, fir trees, and algum trees out of Lebanon' (1 K 7, 2 Ch 29). In regard to cultivation there has been a very great improvement in recent years, and the terraced lower slopes of the mountain are now covered with mulberry, walnut, and olive trees as well.
as vines. Many of the views in the Lebanon are of most romantic beauty, and the climate of many parts is superb. Wild animals are certainly scarcer than in olden days. In the time of Tiglath-pileser r. the elephant was hunted here, but it has long been extinct. Jackals, gazelles, hyenas, wolves, bears, and panthers (in order of commonness) are found and, inland from Sidon, the coney (Hyrax) abounds.

Politically the Lebanon rejoices in a freer and better government than any other part of Syria, as, since the massacres of 1860, a Christian governor, appointed with the approval of the European Powers, rules on behalf of the Sultan. The district, except in the N., is now extensively supplied with excellent carriage roads, and the range is crossed by the French railway from Beirut to Damascus, the highest point traversed being 4880 feet above sea-level.

The Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is the great hollow known to the Greeks as Oenie-Syria, and to-day called Buga'a el-'Asfa. Considered geologically, this wide valley is a product of the same great 'fault' as produced the deep Jordan valley. It is now a great, fertile, but little cultivated, plain, from 3 to 6 miles wide, and in its rise, not far from Baalbek, two famous rivers, the Liban (Leontes), which flows S., and the Nahr Barada, which flows N., and enters the sea near Antioch. This hollow plain, besides being crossed transversely by the Damascus railway and road, is traversed over more than half its length by the new Beirut, Damascus, and Hamah to Aleppo. Some part of this plain, the valley of the Lebanon, would appear to have been conquered by the Israelites (Jos 11:9).

The Anti-Lebanon is to-day known as Jebel esh-Serk or the east-mountain, the equivalent of Lebanon towards the rising-sun of Jos 13:1. In Ca 74 it is referred to as the tower of Lebanon that looketh towards Damascus. In Dt 4:3 1149, Jos 14:9, the Heb. Lebanon is in the LXX tr. 'Anti-Lebanon.' Anti-Lebanon is somewhat arbitrarily divided from Hermon, which is structurally its S. extremity, by a pass (along which the French diligence road runs), and especially by the Wady Barada. In the N. it terminates in the plain around Homs. Its highest point is Taza at Musa (8755 feet), but several other peaks are almost as lofty. A valley, like the Buga'a in miniature, traverses the S. part of the range from N. to S., and in this rises the Nahr Yafitah, which empties its waters down the Wady Yafitah to join the Libtan; and the Nahr Barada, which, after rising in a beautiful pool at the S.W. extremity of this plain, runs down the Wady Barada to Damascus. The N. part of this range is very bare and wild.

LEBAOTH.—See BETH-HILL.

LEBBAES.—See THADDÆUS.

LEB-KAMI.—In Jer 51:3 is a phrase 'in the midst of them which rise up against me' (Heb. leb-qamai). This is generally recognized as being an example of the Rabbinistic rule of hermeneutics whereby a cipher word was obtained by taking the letters of the alphabet in the reverse order, the last for the first, the last but one for the second, and so on. By this process (known as Albash, leb-qamai gives us Kaadim (the Chaldeans).

F. W. CAMP.

LEBONAH.—A place near Shiloh on the way to Shechem (Jg 21:19). It is prob. the ruin Khan el-Lubban, about 3 miles W.N.W. of Seilân (Shiloh).

LEOH.—The 'son' of Er (1 Ch 4:2).

LEEKs.—The Heb. word chatear, which is elsewhere tr. 'grass' or 'herb,' is rendered 'leek' in Nu 11:5, and in this usage, owing to the association with onions and garlic, the tr. is probably correct. Leeks being the herb par excellence. The leek (Allium porrum) is much grown in Palestine, where it is a general favourite.

LEES.—The sediment which settled at the bottom of the wine-jars, composed of morsels of husks, stalks, etc.; in O.T. only in figures. See Wine and Strong Drink. § 3.

LEG.—1. kerd' ayam, a fem. dual, in which form alone it appears (Ex 12:8 et al. It denotes the legs from knee to ankle (Genesius). 2. ragnel (E 171), lit. 'foot.' 3. shafóh, the leg, apparently including the thigh, for which it stands in Ex 23:25, 1 Sa 21:1. Nu 3:18, 1 Sa 21:1, in all of which AV tr. 'shoulder,' but RV, correctly, 'thigh.' In Ps 147:4 shaphóh hó'ah may mean 'foot-soldiers.' The proverbial phrase 'bip leg,' or 'thigh,' is literally 'leg upon thigh' (Jg 15:4) descriptive of the confusion of severed limbs. 4. sbóth (Is 47:8) means 'train' (RV, correctly, 'strip off the train'). 5. skelos (Jn 19:12). To hasten the death of the crucified, it was customary to break their legs. W. Ewing.

LEGION.—This term, which means literally 'a gathering,' looks back to the early days of the Roman citizen army. In the time of the Empire it indicated a force of about 6000 infantry, together with complements of other arms. The infantry proper were divided into ten cohorts (the word is tr. band [wh. see] Mt 27:38; Mk 15:28; Lk 23:43. In Jn 18:28 the cohorts of the temple; this word contains about 600 men, and each commanded on occasion by a military tribune. Of these tribunes there were six to a legion. A cohort was itself subdivided intoten centuries, each commanded by a centurion. It is not necessary to remember all these facts in studying the NT use of the word 'legion' (Mt 26:53, Mk 5:11, Lk 8:31). What chiefly impressed Semites was apparently the size of the legion, and 'legion' appears to have become a proverb among them for a large number of persons in orderly combination. A. SouTHER.

LEHABIM, occurring only in Gn 10:14 (= 1 Ch 1:14), are descendants of Mizraim, the Egyptian eponym. The general opinion is that they are the same as the Lubim (wh. see), whether the word is an alternative traditional pronunciation of the name of this people, or whether, as is more probable, the form here given is due to textual corruption. The fact that Lubim or Libyans is a fairly common word, and that it is not found in the ethnological list of Gn 10, where it would naturally appear in the place of Lehabim, adds something to the evidence of identity. Perhaps Lubim (wh. see) in the same verse is another variant.

LEHI ('Jawbone').—The scene of Samson's well-known adventure with the jawbone of an ass (Jg 15:14-16). The site has been placed in Judah, between the Cliff of Etam and the country of the Philistines.

LEMUEL.—The name of a king, otherwise unknown, to whom Pr 31:10 is addressed by his mother. His identity has been much discussed, but it is now generally identified (by the Rabbinical commentators) with Solomon, (by Grotius) with Hezekiah. Of the mass. It is possible that the name is a fanciful title to represent any virtuous king, invented for the purpose of conveying certain maxims.

LENDING.—See DEBT.

LENTILS ('Edashtim, Gu 25:4, 2 S 17:4 2312, Ezk 4:1).—These are without doubt the Arab. 'adas—a kind of small redish bean, the product of Erum lens, a small alienous plant 6 or 8 inches high. The name means 'red' or 'pottage' of Easu (Gu 25:4). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LEOPARD (nimbr).—This animal ('Féle pardus, Arab. nimr) is still found at times in the wilder parts of Palestine. Its beautiful spotted skin (Jer 5:7) is the envy of collectors, for its time to time brought into the towns for sale. Some savages clothe themselves in a leopard's skin. Its feroceness (Hos 13:7), its agility (Hab 1), and untamableness (Is 11:10) are all mentioned. The name Nirim is a favourite one with the Arabs, who admire these qualities. In the names 'waters of Nirim' ('leopards', Is 15:6, Jer 49:9), and 'Beth-nirim' ('the leopard', Nu 23:23) references to the leopard also occur; cf. the 'mountains of Nimrim' (i.e. the leopards), Ca 4). The ceheetah (Felis jubata) is found also in Galilee, and it too may have been included under the word name as E. W. G. Masterman.

LEPROSY.—This term, as used in Scripture, seems to include not only true leprosy (elephantiasis)—probably the disease of Job—but also such skin diseases as psoriasis, ring-worm, and tinea. For the priestly regulations as to the diagnosis of the disease and the treatment of lepers, see art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 5. The 'leprosy' in garments (Lv 13:24) seems to be an effect of fungus or mildew, while that in houses (14:10) is probably dry-rot.

LESHEM.—A form, occurring only in Jos 19:18, of the name Laish (see DAN).

LESSUA.—A village where an encounter took place between the Jews and Nicanor (2 Mac 14:1). The site is unknown, and the text is uncertain.

LET.—In Anglo-Saxon later meant 'to permit' and leten, 'to hinder'. In course of time both words were spelled 'let'. Consequently in AV, besides its modern meaning of 'permit', the vb. 'let' sometimes has the opposite meaning of 'hinder.' Thus 2 Th 2' only he who now letteth will, until he be taken out of the way.' The other places are Ex 5', Nu 22:23m, Is 49:1, Wis 7:2, Ro 14.

LETHECH, LETHEK.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

LETUSHEM.—One of the Dedanite tribes in N. Arabia (Gb 29:1), the others being Leummim and Assirum (wh. see). In this verse LXX adds two other tribes; but their parallel position in AV seems to indicate that they are omitted altogether both in MT and in most MSS of LXX. None of the three tribes has been identified. J. F. P. CURDIE.

LEUMMIM.—A tribe of the Dedanites (Gb 29:1). Cf. LETUSHIM.

LEV.—1. The third son of Jacob by Leah (Gb 20:14 [J]). The genealogical story connects the name with the verb lidadh, 'to be joined,' and P (Nu 18:1) plays upon the same word, saying to Aaron: 'Bring the tribe of Levi, that it may be joined (yildad') unto thee.' Many modern scholars hold to this improbable etymology of the name—improbable, among other reasons, because, unlike other tribal names, it is not nominal, but adjectival. It is said to signify 'the one who attaches himself.' Accordingly 'the Levites are those who attached themselves to the Semites who migrated back from the Delta, therefore, Egyptians' (LAGARDE, OR. ii. 20, MAST. i. 54). Others say 'those who were attached to the ark' as priestly attendants. Still others makes it a gentilic noun, and connect it with the South-Abrahami lawv' (L. lawv'), 'priest.' Against this is the primitive use of 'Levite' as one of the tribe of Levi. The word is probably a gentilic from Leav ('wild-cow') as well. (Prolegg. 146) suggests, and as Stade (G VI 152) asserts. If this be correct, and it has the greater probability in its favour, it points to early totem worship. In the Blessing of Jacob (Gb 49:7) we have one of the most important passages bearing upon the early history of this tribe and that of Simeon:

'Simeon and Levi are brethren; Weapons of violence are their swords.

Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; And their wrath, for it was cruel.

The Jeb. divined them in Jacob; And scatter them in Israel.'

LEVIATHAN

From this passage it is abundantly evident that Levi was, like all the other Israelite tribes, a purely secular organization. Simeon and Levi are both set forth as bloodthirsty characters, and there is not the slightest hint of Levi being a priestly caste. The treacherous act referred to, which was so serious a violation of tribal morals that it cost them the sympathy of the other tribes, is probably recorded in Gn 34 in two different versions, the oldest of which is J's. The other now interwoven with it is probably an arrangement of the original. According to the story, Shechem, the son of Hamor, became enamoured of Dinah, the sister of Simeon and Levi, and seduced her. He made an honourable arrangement to marry the girl and to discharge whatever obstacle might be interposed against him. Simeon and Levi took advantage of the Shechemite's disability and slew them. Like other stories, though related in personal form, it is tribal in intention. It portrays early relations between the Israelites and the original inhabitants. The love of the Shechemite for the daughter of Jacob points to some sort of an alliance in which the right of consubium was acknowledged, and the act of Simeon and Levi was, therefore, a barbarous repudiation of the rights of their native allies. From Jg 9 it is clear that the sons of Hamor re-possessed themselves of the city, the other tribes having withheld their assistance, probably more from fear of Canaanite revenue than from overwhelming moral detestation of the act. The result was fatal for the future of the tribes, at first more particularly for Levi, but later also for Simeon. So complete were the disastrous consequences to Levi that the tribal independence was lost, and the members became absorbed by the other tribes, especially by Judah. There is no mention of Levi and Simeon in Jg 5.

Some early connexion with Moses may have aided them in finding recognition about the sanctuaries in the early days. Then the altar did not call for a consecrated servitor; but, as we see in the case of Midian upon whom they had a private sanctuary in Ephram, there existed apparently a preference for a Levite (Jg 17). It is not absolutely clear from the reference here that 'Levite' is equal to 'priest,' as is commonly held. This would imply that by this time all Levites were priests. 'Filling up of the hand' (translated 'consecrated' in vv.4, 12) may refer to a ceremony of induction into the priestly office, the principal act of which was the solemn blessing of the god (or other religious person) in the hands of the of the officiant at the shrine. It is the phrase used by the Assyrian kings when they speak of the gods bestowing upon them the kingship. It is the phrase which became the termimus technicus for consecration to the priesthood, and there is no reason for giving a different meaning to it here. In Jg 8–16 there is no mention of a priest. For the altar-service alone priests were not necessary, as we see in the case of Gideon and Manoah. The fact that the word 'levite' became synonymous with 'priest' indicates that the priesthood drew heavily from the tribe. It is not the only time that worldly misfortune has contributed to religion. See also PRIESTS AND LEVITES, TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

LEVIAHAN.—In four of the five passages where this word appears, the LXX have dragon, and their belief that a creature of serpentine form was meant is confirmed by the derivation of Heb. israel, which signifies 'twist or wind.' The leviathan of Jb 41:1–24 is the crocodile, with added traits drawn from the ancient creation myths. On the assumption that Ps 74:14–17 refers to the Exodus, we should again find the crocodile (v 14). But it is at least equally probable that the allusion is to the creation of the world (vv.16–17), and it is well to mention equally probably that the allusion is to the crocodile (v 14). But it is at least equally probable that the allusion is to the creation of the world (vv.16–17), and it
LEVIRATE LAW.

Leviticus here has several heads; the great serpent of Ex. 2.1-2.4, which had seven heads, is 27 distinguish between two leviathians, the flying serpent, and the crooked or coiled serpent—symbols of two heathen kingdoms. The identification of the kingdom depends on the date of the prophecy; Assyria and Babylon, Persia and Greece, Syria and Parthia, are rival suggestions. The species of sea-monster pointed to in Ps. 104.28 is last definite. The leviratic (RV; AV 'their mourning') around by magicians (Job 41.20), most likely a demon of the abyss which threatens the world with destruction. Many, however, take him to be the mythical sky-dragon which was supposed to cause eclipses. It will be noted that there is a close connexion between levithian and the water serpent. Robberson Smith held that it is a personification of the water-spirit (RSV, p. 176). The Apocalyptic and Rabbinical writers gave full scope to their fancy in dealing with this theme. LEVTICAL CITIES.—See Priests and Levites, § D.

LEVITICUS.—I. Scope. The book has received its title from the name 'the Levitical book,' which was prefixed to it in the LXX. Since, however, the special functions of the Levites are not referred to, the scope of the book is better brought out in the title 'Law of the Priests,' which is given to it in the Talmud. As such, Leviticus practically confines itself to legislation, and, except in the section chs. 17-26, to priestly legislation. Even the few passages, such as chs. 8 and 10, which are cast in the form of narrative, do not aim at denouncing what is wrong, but use this form in order to prescribe what is to continue. The JE narrative, which was a history, does not appear to have been drawn upon; and Leviticus, unlike Exodus and Numbers, offers no exact dates of month and year. The book does not give a history of Israel's past, but chiefly embodies some of the rules of the one living institution which persisted in Israel from its formation as a nation to the destruction of the Temple. Since, however, this institution was mounted to meet the nation's changing circumstances, the praxis which regulated its services required and received constant modification. Some of these changes can be traced in Leviticus; but it is impossible to detail them here in the form of a brief sketch like the present. Readers who wish more details on the ritual can find them and their justification in the art. in Hastings' DB, or in Driver's LOT.

2. Sources. The general editor is the same as the editor who arranged Exodus in its present form, though a little has been added by later hands. (1) He took from P that history of the sacred institutions which appears to be the same in Ex 25-29 (see Exegesis): chs. 8. 9 with 105-18 (which supplements 96), 107-3 (or 4b) 16b-4. 6. 21. 24b-4. 5-9. These sections are not all of the same period.

Thus ch. 8, which relates the appointment of the priests, is the fulfilment of Ex 29 and 40.15-16. It formed part of that expansion of Ex 25-29 which now occupies Ex 35-40, and to which also belong 24-29 on the Tabernacle lamps, 5v. 4-5 on the hebrew—sections which in some inexplicable way have been strayed into their present position. Ex 9 with 105-18, which reconnects the sacrifices at the inauguration of the Tabernacle, originally formed the sequel of Ex 25-29, and was inserted at the end of ch. 9 (the story of Nadab and Abihu offering strange fire), and was closed by 16. 4. 12. (the rule as to the time and way for Aaron to approach the Shechinah. Place which had thus been restored to him). 105-18 (on the goat of the sin-offering) is a later addition, and gives an interesting illustration of the way in which a text was sought to reconcile differences in the older laws (cf. it with 9b and 6b-29).

(2) Chs. 1-6. Into this framework the editor has fitted laws from other sources. Thus he seems to have separated ch. 8 from its original position after Ex 40, because he counted it suitable, after the Tabernacle was set up and before the priests were anointed or the Tabernacle inaugurated, to insert the laws prescribing the sacrifices which the priests when anointed were to offer in the Tabernacle.

This law-book has its own history, and in particular once existed in two sections. Thus 6-7, with its subscription 724, was originally a code addressed to the priests, dealing with matters ancillary to the sacrifices, and especially concerned with the priestly duties. Because of this character of the little code, 6b-2 (on the priests' meal-offering) was inserted. With the exception of that section, all the regulations of the priests are introduced by the formula, 'This is the law of', and this formula appears in the subscription. It represents the early rules on this subject.

Again, 1-6b is a book addressing the people, defining their sacrifices, but it has received large modification. From a comparison of 1b with 3b it is evident that ch. 3 (the law of the peace-offering) was followed by ch. 1 (the burnt-offering). These are probably very old. The different formulae used in ch. 2 (3rd person in vv. 1. 2, 2nd person in vv. 3-5) and its intrusive position means that the law of the meal-offering has been developed. A comparison between the law of the sin-offering in ch. 4 and similar laws elsewhere proves how largely this part of the ritual has been elaborated. Thus the sin-offering for the congregation is a bull in vv. 1-3 instead of the goat of 9b and Nu 155; the high priest's in-offering is more elaborate than that in Nu 4b-14, 8b-20; examples of unintentional sins which require a sin-offering, and mitigations for the case of those who cannot afford a lamb or a goat, has suffered change, since vv. 2-5 evidently break the connexion between v. 1 and v. 4. It is, however, older than ch. 4, though the relation is specially difficult to define. 5b-c defines the cases which require a guilt-offering, and makes it clear that originally this sacrifice was a supplication for fraud practised upon God (5b-3b) or man (6-7). When he united these codes on the sacrifices, the editor added a number of rules (7b-14) forbidding leaven, more elaborate than those in Nu 15c, and a rule (7b-14) giving heave leg and wave breast to the priest, and a subscription (v. 30).}

(3) Chs. 11-15. The priests, however, had other functions in the life of the people and were immediately connected with the sacrifices. It was their business to determine on all questions connected with uncleanness. As soon, therefore, as the editor had described the inauguration of the Tabernacle and the priesthood, he grouped together a series of regulations bearing on this side of the priestly duties.

Chs. 11-15 deal with this more civil yet priestly function. The rules in ch. 11 on clean and unclean animals (vv. 1-30) with their subscription v. 31 (which also appears in a more primitive form in Dt. 14b-21, and have probably been taken from the law of holiness (see below). The law of leprosy, with touchingclean animals and all carcasses (vv. 34-46), which is also the purification required in case of neglect of the regulations, is ignored in the subscription, and must have been inserted. Chs. 12, 15 prescribe the forms of purification after childbirth and after certain physical secretions. In both these rules these were. both at the end or in the very introduction. priest and the serious issues involved made it even probable that the directions were not left to the discretion of individuals, but were early committed to writing.

(4) The ritual culminates in the Day of Atonement. This embodies very old elements (see Azazel), but has been so altered that its original character is no longer to be distinguished. The chapters in this group are: 17-26.

(5) Law of Holiness or H.—Chs. 17-26 form an independent body of laws, which have had their own history, and which, after receiving something of their peculiar form from an earlier collector, have been incorporated, after considerable modifications, by the general law-book. The general law-book was one independent is proved by: (a) the long hortatory conclusion in ch. 26 and the opening instructions as to the place of sacrifice; (b) the presence in them of material which has already been dealt with (cf. 17-21 with 7-11; 19-4 with 7:11-18, 20:5 with ch. 11); (c) the fact that they have a much wider scope than those of chs. 1-16. But this early code has not survived in its integrity, for (I) certain subjects are broken off before completion (19:4-5 20:3-5); and (II) the arrangement of subjects shows a considerable confusion (cf. 19:4-5 32-24 20:7).

Ch. 17 prescribes that all animals suitable for sacrifice must be slain at the sanctuary, that such animals, when sacrificed, must be offered to Jehovah alone, that blood and the flesh of carcasses must not be eaten. If vv.14-15 were ever in force while the Israelites inhabited Palestine, the order requiring every goat, sheep, or ox which was slaughtered to be brought to the Jerusalem Temple practically made it illegal to kill these animals. F, which required all sacrifices to be brought to the Jerusalem Temple as the only sanctuary, prevented all animals to be freely slaughtered, but forbade the eating of fat and blood. Probably the code, in its early form, recognized the local sanctuaries, and required the slaughter of animals suitable for sacrifice to take place before the Lord, i.e. at one of these accessible shrines. The change due to this theorem is that ch. 18 is a series of laws onclean (and Molech-worship), with admonitory introduction and conclusion. Ch. 19 contains a number of miscellaneous laws, with introduction and conclusion. These laws, which are curt and direct, give an interesting view of the morals of early Israel, and should be compared and contrasted with the relative sections in Ex 20-23. Dt 22-25. Ch. 20, which is different in character from the preceding chapters, prescribes in general for certain sacrilege offences already specified in it. In vv.16-20 (with the penalties for incest) may be the conclusion of ch. 18. The fact, however, that it is followed by a conclusion (v.20-24), while ch. 18 is provided with its own, has led some to count the two sections independent again. Vv.21-31 show where laws corresponding with ch. 11, if that collection itself, originally stood in F; vv.14-18 (against Molech-worship), vv.27 (against traffic with familiar spirits), v.21 (against cursing father or mother) may have been brought together here, because, like most of the laws in vv.13-23, they prescribe the death-penalty.

Chs. 21, 22 deal with priests and offerings. They state the ceremonial restraints required of the priests in the domestic life (21:13-26), demand bodily perfection in every officiating priest (v.4-6), ordain that sacrificial food may be eaten by priests, and that priests are to be ceremonially clean and not come in contact with the dead, which can claim membership in a priestly family (22:9-12), and require the sacrificial animals to be perfect (v.17-25). Three requirements of the sacrifices (v.24-25) are followed by a hortatory exhortation (v.26-30). Not only the recurrent formula, 'and the priest', but the insistence on a ceremonial holiness which characterizes the early code, prove that the basis of these chapters is old. The material has been largely revised by F, but the elaborate analysis cannot be entered into here.

Ch. 23 is a calendar of the sacred seasons, which has necessarily received much change. In general, it may be said that vv.1-23. (23:31-36), though not left without major modifications, belong to the early code. Here the festivals still represent the religious life of a people which is settled on the land and engaged in agriculture. No more precise data than, e.g., when the harvest was gathered, is laid down for a festival, because no other was practicable. The people celebrate after the harvest when the harvest was gathered. The other sections (vv.1-18. 23-43) give rigid dates and betray the change which became necessary, as soon as many of the worshipers were no longer agriculturists and were scattered beyond the limits of Palestine. The definite dates prescribed by a centralized priesthood became a necessary theological and religious idea. These later sections come from F.

Ch. 24 (on vv.1-23 see above) deals with blasphemy (v.9) and injuries to men and cattle (v.17-20). These early sections closely resemble ch. 20, and may once have stood in closer connection with it. The penalty pronounced on blasphemy shows that it is accompanied by a collection of laws on cleanliness, and that the editor of Leviticus added it when he inserted the collection in its present position. The resemblances between v.21-24 and the Book of Ezekiel are too numerous to be catalogued here, but they deserve special attention.

As H is evidently incomplete and its character is strongly marked, efforts have been made to detect fragments of its legislation in other parts of the Pentateuch. In particular, Ex 34:14f. Nu 15:7-31 have been assigned to it. It is necessary, however, to remember that undue stress should not be laid on the appearance of such characteristic formula as 'I am the Lord,' 'I am the Lord which sanctify you,' since, when once some laws had been countersigns by these formulae, it was natural to introduce them into others. Even in the case of Lv 11-20, all that can be said is that similar legislation must have been in H; it is unwise to suppose that this section belonged to H; for laws of this type must have appeared in several of the codes, and in the nature of the case the language used could not greatly vary.

The law-book which is assigned to after the exodus of the later elements is a valuable survival of one of the codes which represented and guided the life of early Israel under the monarchy. To estimate it, both in its uniqueness and in its combinations with the other codes, it is useful briefly to compare H with the other codes which have come down. Thus it agrees with Deut. and the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23) in the prominence given to the social as well as to the ceremonial life of the people, and in the recognition that this life is still largely an agricultural life. Its closer affinity to the Book of the Covenant is found in the concise formula into which its laws are cast, as though they were meant for direct LEWD.—In the AV 'lewd' does not always mean 'lustful,' as it does now. That meaning, indeed, is not found in the Apoc. or NT. There the meaning is simply 'wicked,' as 17° certain lewd fellows of the base sort.' So 'lowness' is usually simply 'wickedness.'

LIBERTINES.—Ac 7° brings the Libertines forward as a group or synique amongst the Jew, and concerned in the prosecution of Stephen. There is no sufficient reason for emending the text. And, the text standing as it is, the conclusion at once follows that the men in question came from Rome. The 'Libertines,' or 'Freedmen' of Rome.

Among the vast bodies of slaves composing the imperial and aristocratic households, emancipation was a common occurrence. The Freedmen frequently held positions of great influence, and sometimes played a noble, oftener an ignoble, part. Amongst the Libertines were found many Jews, not a few of them being the descendants of the Jerusalemites carried away by Pompey. Some of these latter, having bought their freedom and returned to the Holy City, would probably be men of more than average force and earnestness. Hence they were natural leaders in the opposition to Stephen's destructive criticism of Jewish Institutionalism.

LIBERTY.—Moralists are accustomed to distinguish between formal freedom, or man's natural power of choice, and real freedom, or power to act habitually in accordance with the true and good. Scripture has little to say on the mere power of choice, while everywhere recognizing this power as the condition of moral life, and sees real liberty only in the possession and exercise of wisdom, goodness, and virtue. There there is ignorance and error, especially when this arises from moral causes (Ro 1: 21, Eph 4: 17, 1 Jn 2: 19, etc.)— subjection to sinful lusts (Ro 7: 14-15, Eph 2: 1, 1 P 1: 14, etc.; 1 Jn 2: 19, etc.), fear and trembling (1 Jn 4: 18, etc.), bondage to the letter of the law (Gal 5: 1, 2, 6),—there cannot be liberty. Sin, in its nature, is a state of servitude (Jn 8: 35). Spiritual liberty is the removal of sin from the soul, the deliverance from sin's tyranny, the possession of a new life in the Spirit, etc. Even under the Law, saints could boast of a measure of liberty; God's commandment was found by them to be exceeding broad (Ps 119: 16, cf. Ps 51: 12, 13).

But the gospel gives liberty in a degree, and with a completeness, unknown under the Law and unthought of in any other religion. It does this by bearing a new religion of reconciliation, of the Spirit, of sonship, of love. Jesus already teaches that His yoke is easy and His burden light; this because He inculcates meekness and lowliness of heart—a spirit like His own (Mt 11: 28, 29). His religion is to St. James 'the perfect law, the law of liberty' (1: 25). The instrument in freeing from bondage is 'the truth' (Jn 8: 32); the agent is the Spirit of God. 'Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty' (2 Co 3: 7). As the result of the reception of the truth of the gospel, the believer knows himself justified and saved (Ro 8: 1), knows God as Father, and is assured of His love (1 Jn 4: 18); receives the spirit of adoption, in which is liberty (Ro 8: 14, 15); experiences deliverance from the dominion of sin (6: 14, 18-29); is set free from the yoke of outward observances (Gal 4: 1, 5); with freedom did Christ set us free; stand fast, therefore, etc. (1 P 2: 20): has victory over the world (Gal 5: 1, 1 Jn 5: 5); lives in the power of the Spirit (Gal 5: 16-24); has release from fear of death (He 2: 18, etc.). LICE (κρυτζέ, Ex 8:14, Ps 105:19; cf. קדז, Is 51:14, see GNAAT).—RVm suggests 'sandflies or fleas' instead of 'lice.' All the insects named are only too common in Palestine and Egypt. The three well-known varieties psicciot, lice, or lice are perpetually prevalent among the distant, and a plague of them would certainly be much more terrible than one of the harmless, though irritating 'sandfly' (Sistalium), and far more disgusting than one of the Psers. LIDEBER.—See DEDAH, No. 3, and LODEBAR.

LIE, LYING.—I. In the OT.—The simple lie, which is a deliberate suppression of the truth in conversation, was condemned by the Levitical code as contrary to the character of holiness demanded by, and coming to, the people of Israel's holy God (Lv 19:11, cf. 6:5). Perjury, as an aggravation of the ordinary sin, was emphatically condemned, and stringently punished in the legislative enactments of Israel (Ex 22, Dt 19:19-20). There can be no doubt that the moral consciousness of the Hebrews was alive to the sinfulness of deceit (Pr 10:20 21:24 22:25 28:33; cf. Is 5:21 Lvm). The lying selfishness of Cain, and the reprehensible deception practised by Abraham, are recorded by the historian in a tone which reveals his attitude towards such acts (Gen 4:19-20 12:20-21; cf. 2 K 5:10-11 where Gehazi's punishment is the reward of his thoughts levity at a time of national gloom, as well as of his deceitful conduct and words). The moral reprobation of falsehood reaches its climax in the utterances of the prophets. According to the teachers, it is at the foundation of all human depravity (Hos 7:12, Mic 6:11). Truth can be arrived at and spoken only by those who are in personal touch with the sacred Fountain of truth (cf. Is 9:5). Indeed, some of the most emphatic declarations as to the moral attributes of Jehovah are based on the belief that He is above all else the God of truth (Nu 23:18, 15:19; cf. Ps 89:11, Ec 24:4, Mat 19:4; see 2 Ti 2:2, Tit 1:9). Hence the enormity of the guilt of those teachers who had not Jehovah as the source of their inspiration, though they might speak in His name, who pandered to the prevailing moral degeneracy (Jer 2:8, 9:23, 13:12, 14:9; cf. Wis 14:21, etc.), or who encouraged their hearers in idolatry with its debasing ritual (Jer 16:10, Jon 2:10; cf. Ps 31:8).

A curious phenomenon in the OT is the bold speculation which sought to explain the authorship of the lying instruction by which Jehovah's enemies were seduced to their own destruction. The fatuity of Ahab's conduct, and its fatal consequences, are detailed in the light of this conception (1 Ki 21:2, 19:1-28), while Isaiah's more unequivocal directness, Samuel is said to have been counselled by God to deceive Saul (1 S 16:14). In both instances the historian is evidently interpreting events by the ideas current in his day.

2. In the NT.—Falsehood is here traced back to its source in the principle of evil. Jesus attributes its origin to Satan (Jn 8:44; cf. Ac 5:1, Rev 12:9). Membership in the Christian body postulated a new creation 2M 545

'In righteousness and holiness of truth' (Eph 4:12) and forbade one member to lie to another (Col 3:9).

The denial of the Messiahship of Jesus is characterized by the Johannine author as a lie (1 Jn 2:29), while the same writer makes self-deceit the cause of that Pharisaic complacency which he so unsparring condemns (1 Jn 4:6). The Pauline representation of paganism bases its degrading moral influence on the fact that it is founded essentially on a lie (Rom 1:25). The awful fatal which awaits 'all liars' (Rev 21:8) is the outcome and direct development of the OT judgment of this sin, for it fundamentally estranges the guilt from Him whose 'word is truth' (Jn 17:7; cf. Rev 21:22, and see Ps 34:23 119:49). Cf. also Jer 5:13.

LIFE.—I. In the OT.—The term 'life' in EV is used, with a few unimportant exceptions, as the equivalent of one or other of two Hebrew expressions: (1) ἔσχας, or mostly in plur. changyrim; (2) nephesh. The LXX makes a general distinction between these two, it generally rendering the former as αἷμα and the latter as ψυχή. The former term occurs more frequently than the latter. The notion underlying the term is, not 'the expression of life,' but 'the primitive elements in human thought and speech. Roughly speaking, we may explain (1) primarily as what is fresh, new, in active existence; and (2) as primarily as breath.'

1. Self-originated movement, especially as seen in locomotion and breathing, were naturally the earliest criteria of life. So still, scientists are inclined to regard life as merely a 'mode of motion.' Life, however, has not yet yielded up its secret to human inquiry; not yet has life, by any experiment, been produced from purely inorganic origins. Meantime those who do not stumble at a thetic view of creation hold an entirely satisfactory position in following the Genesis Creation narratives, and ascribing the origin of all life to God, who 'giveth to all life and breath and all things' (Ac 14:14). The mystery of life abides, but it is not, in the least, likely that any results of scientific investigation will ever really conflict with this position.

Life as a physical phenomenon is pre-eminently associated with animate—the living creatures of the sea, the land, and the air (Gn 1:21). Plant-life is hardly recognized as such. OT writers do not go so far as to predicate life of trees in much the same way as of animals, as is the case with some of the early Greek philosophers (e.g. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1. 7, 12). Still 'green' and 'dry,' as applied to plants, correspond to 'living' and 'dead. There is the feeling that trees possess 'a sort of' life; and such a reference to 'the fresh sprouting of a stock or root' (Job 14:5, Is 11) are very significant. Notice also the way in which the prosperity of man is likened to that of a flourishing tree (Ps 1 Pet.), and other frequent illustrative uses.

Physical life is not only primitively connected with the breath, but also with the blood. The effect of the draining away of the blood (as from a wound) in the lessening vitality of the body and finally death—a matter of early observation naturally explains this. A certain sacredness thus attaches to the blood (1 S 14:13, and definite prohibitive legislation relating to the eating of flesh with the blood began early in the laws of Israel (Lv 17:17, etc.). This primitive conception of blood as the seat of life lies at the root of the whole OT system of sacrifices and of all the Scripture laws and teachings based thereon.

The sacredness of life as such is strongly emphasized. The great value ascribed to human life is indicated by the numerous laws relating to manslaughter and to offences which interfere in any way with human life and with his reasonable use and enjoyment of life. The feeling extends to other creatures. See the suggestive words 'and also much cattle' in Jon 4:4. The beasts are associated with man's humiliations and privations (Jon 3:10; Jl 1:12, 20); their life is a thing to be considered. We find the ground of this feeling in the view that God is not only the original Creator or Source of life, but directly its Sustainer in all its forms (Ps 30:5, Ps 104:145 passim). This seems also to be the fundamental significance of the very common expression ‘the living God’ (lit. ‘God of life’).

2. Life is predominantly set forth as man’s summa bonum because it is ‘significantly’ (or respectively ‘the blessedness of life, and the curse,’ and that uniquely (Dt 30:4). ‘Choose life’ is the appeal pointing to the one desirable boat. Every man should answer to the description in Ps 34:13.

The language which directs (e.g. Job 7:14, Ec 4:14, etc.) is the expression of an abnormal state of feeling, the outcome of man’s experience of misery in one form and another. But it is not mere existence that is in itself desirable. As Jer 17:13 points out, ‘Use life’ in sense and spiritual connotation (Christian View [1893], p. 393); and it is only the godly and righteous life that is a boon from the Scripture point of view. Such is the burden of the Wisdom books, when they speak of ‘finding life,’ and describe wisdom as a ‘tree of life’ (Pr 10:15).

3. The idea of a life to come is in many portions of the Christian dispensation by its absence. There is nothing anywhere that will compare with the NT conception of ‘eternal life.’ The latter expression, it is true, is found in the OT, but only once, and that in the later Hebrew form of Daniel (12:2). It is to be remembered that, though this book is in EV numbered among the Major Prophets, its affinities are not with that group but rather with later post-Biblical Jewish writings. In these writings the concept of death and resurrection is best illustrated. Enoch, Ps.,-Sol., 4 Mac. furnish examples. See also in Apocrypha, 2 Mac 7:14. ‘Life’ alone in this later use comes to be used as ‘eternal life.’ (See, e.g., 2 Mac 7:14; cf. 14:11, 19, 115, 116). Later Jewish use, lastly, prefers the clearer phrase, ‘life of the age to come;’ and along this line the genesis of the term ‘eternal life’ must be explained. (Cf. the last clause in the Nicene Creed; ‘the life of the world to come’). In the OT, the word ‘life’ is used as a way of speaking of the present’s state of life, of a superabundance of the ‘goods’ of life at the expense of others’ deprivation and want is in direct opposition to the spirit of HIs teaching. The deep, paradoxical saying (Mt 16:24) about losing and finding one’s life is of significance here—a saying found not only in the three Synoptics (see Mk 8:35, Lk 9:19), but also in its substance in Jn 12:24.

An impressive presentation of a foolish appreciation of life, see also 15:22. In Sir 15:17 ‘Before man is life and death,’ we have an echo of Dt 30:4. The conception of life as inheritance, as the land of the living, as the land of the dead, is, as the very asking of the question in Job 14:14 is significant, and the language of Ps 16 concerning ‘the path of life’ lends itself readily to an interpretation looking to life beyond death.

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—Chs. 1–5 of Wis. yield much that is of interest relating to contemporary Jewish thought: e.g. God is the author of life but not of death (3:1–2). The wicked live in harmony with the saying, ‘Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die’ (ch. 3). The righteous have immortality as their inheritance, whilst the wicked shall be brought to judgment and shall be destroyed (chs. 3–5). For an impressive presentation of a foolish appreciation of life, see also 15:22. In Sir 15:18 ‘Before man is life and death,’ we have an echo of Dt 30:4. The conception of life as inheritance, as the land of the living, as the land of the dead, is, as the very asking of the question in Job 14:14 is significant, and the language of Ps 16 concerning ‘the path of life’ lends itself readily to an interpretation looking to life beyond death.

The term ‘life’ is the Eng. equivalent of three terms used in the original—(1) slain; (2) life; (3) soul. The first generally corresponds to chayyim in OT, —life in the absolute: vitality: full, actual existence. It is the term capable of embodying all progressive conceptions of life, from the mere presence of life to the idea of some life that constitutes life, filling and so regularly occurring in the phrase ‘eternal life.’ (2) Napheth, generally — OT nephesh, but the fluctuation between ‘life’ and ‘soul’ (see, e.g., the well-known passage Mt 10:28) as its rendering in English is significant.

For special significance in the NT, the phrase ‘the present’s state of life’ is used. The word ‘life’ is of all men’s experience. It is the personal experience of the individual, arising from the consciousness of their existence as a separate individual. It is that consciousness which is the beginning of the desire for existence. It is the desire for existence, the consciousness of their existence as separate from others.

1. The teaching of Jesus.—As regards the present use of the term ‘life’ we gather from the teachings of Jesus that life never baffled its brevity and vanity. The mournful notes of some of the OT Scriptures, the pensive commonplaces of so much of man’s thoughts and musings, find no echo here. On the contrary, in His own life He so vividly exemplifies the joye de vie. This in one respect was made even a ground of complaint against Him (Mt 11:19). The Sacredness of life is insisted on, and the Sixth Commandment is accentuated (Mt 5:19). The preciousness even of the humblest forms of life: Mt 10:29; Lk 12:6. The presence of a superabundance of the ‘goods’ of life at the expense of others’ deprivation and want is in direct opposition to the spirit of His teaching. The deep, paradoxical saying (Mt 16:24) about losing and finding one’s life is of significance here—a saying found not only in the three Synoptics (see Mk 8:34, Lk 9:24), but also in its substance in Jn 12:24.

Eternal life is first of all that which is to be possessed in the teaching of Jesus. He did not originate the expression; it was already established in the Rabbinic vocabulary. The subject was, and continued to be, one greatly discussed among the Jews. The phrase of a life is— as when He spoke of ‘inheriting the kingdom of heaven,’ ‘having’ (Jn. 6:27), ‘receiving’ (Mt 10:30), ‘entering into,’ or ‘attaining’ (Mt 19:16), eternal life, or life simply— is also that of the Jewish teachers of His own and a later day. (Note even the significance of the word ‘life’ in the Synoptics ‘the kingdom of God’ holds the corresponding place. The connexion between the two conceptions is intimate and vital. The primary characteristic of eternal life is that it is life lived under the rule of God. The definition found in Jn 17:2 (with which Wis 15:18-22 invites comparison) shows how essentially it is a matter of moral and spiritual interests. The notion of everlasting suffering never follows from this: the feeling that death cannot destroy what is precious in God’s sight. Cf. Tennison: ‘Transplanted human worth.

Shall bloom to profit otherwise.’

But the life is a precious gift, as seen, e.g., by its own actual fact of experience (Jn 3:16, 18, 6:60). We have, however, the indication of a special association of eternal life with the hereafter in Mt 10:39 (‘in the world to come’) Mt 20:34. Cf. also p. 480.)
LIGHT

It is the teaching of Christ that has caused the words 'eternal life' to be written, as it were, across the face of the NT. Still more are we to notice the unique claim made as to His relation to that life. The keynote of the Johannine presentation is 'in Him was life' (Jn 1), and throughout He is consistently represented as giving and imparting this life to His people. Not also in eternal life as in good life.' principally, if not exclusively, in view in the Evangelical teaching there is little or nothing on human immortality in the widest sense.

2. THE REST OF THE NT.—The leading theme of J. Jn is 'eternal life,' and it is handled in complete accord with the Fourth Gospel.—St. Paul, in agreement with the Johannine teaching on the cardinal topic of eternal life, is the continuator with this theme, and distinctly presents Christ as the source of this life in its fullest conception, or the One through whom it is mediated. See Ro 6, and note his strong way of identifying Christ with this life, as in Gal 2, Ph 1, Col 3, 4. Christ is also presented as author or mediator of life in the widest sense, the life that moves in all created things (Col 1, 14; cf. Jn 1). St. Paul, again, uses 'life' alone as containing all the implications of 'eternal life' (Ro 5, 2, Col 3, Ph 2, 4). The supreme ethical value associated with life is seen in the definition given in Ro 8, with which cf. Jn 17. The new life of man is to move as a dynamic in the present and as having the promise of full fruition in eternity, is central in the Apostle's exposition of Christianity.—For the rest, the Apocalypse should be noticed for its use of such images as 'the crown of life,' 'book of life,' 'fountain,' 'tree of life,' or 'tree of life' (which we also meet with elsewhere)—all embodying the Christian hope of immortality.

J. S. CLEMENS

LIGHT.—To the ancient mind light was a holy thing, and the Scriptures associate it with God. He dwells in light (Ex 24, 1; Ti 6, 2). He is clothed with light (Ps 104, 4). He is light, and if Hymn rendered by Keble: 'Hail, gladdening Light, of His pure glory poured,' etc. Hence Jesus, God Incarnate, is called 'the Light of the world' (Jn 1, 4, 9). 'The grace of the glory of God' (He 1); and salvation is defined as walking in His light and being enlightened by it (Jn 3, 12, 39, 1. Jn 17, 2, Co 4, Eph 5, 8, 1 T 3, J 1, 17). And Christians as representatives of God and His light are the light of the world (Mt 5, 14, 18, Ph 2, 16). On the contrary, a godless life is darkness (Jn 3, 12, 1 Jn 2, 1.

LIGHTNING.—Our colloquial use of 'fire' for lightning had its counterpart in Heb., e.g. in such a phrase as fire 'Tah' and hall' (Ex 9, 9). Cf. Gn 10, 1 K 18, etc. The Heb. 'ar (Job 37) is lit. 'light.' b'dq (Ezk 19) should probably read b'dq; lappid, lit. 'torch,' is used in the plnr. for lightnings (Ex 20). There is a case of uncertain meaning, chads (Job 38, 34, Zec 10), is evidently related to thunder, and should probably in each case be tr. 'thunder-cloud.' The usual Heb. word is b'dq, Gr. astragal (2 S 22, etc., Mt 24, etc.). It is used fig. for the glitter of iron metal (Dt 22, lit. 'the lightning of my sword'; cf. Ezek 21, Nah 3, Hab 3, 4), and for the glittering weapon itself (Job 20, 12). It is suggested, either by the flash of polished metal, or by the speed of the chariot (Nah 20, 1). Lightning is associated with the appearance of God (Ex 19, etc.), and He alone can control it (Job 38, Ps 184). With lightnings as with arrows, God scatters His enemies (Ps 144. etc.). A radiant face (Dan 10), and gleaming garments (Mt 28), are like lightnings. There is vivid suggestiveness in the comparison of Satan's overthrow with the descent of lightning (Lk 10). Cf. the name Barak (Jg 4), with the Carthaginian Barca.

LIGN ALOES.—See aloes.

LIGURE.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

LIKHI.—The eponym of a Manassite family (1 Ch 7).

LIKING.—In older English 'liking' was used for the outward appearance, qualified by good or ill. So Job 38, 'their young ones of good liking.'

LILITH.—The word occurs only in Is 34, and is rendered in AV by 'screech-owl' and in RV by 'night-monster.' Belonging to the post-exilic time, it is connected with Jewish ideas on demons which, as foreign influence became felt, were developed on the lines of Babylonian and Persian myths. The Lilith is mentioned in connexion with the desolation which would haunt Edom; it was a hairy monster, and specially dangerous to infants (cf. Lam). Strange stories are told about Lilith by the Rabbins. It was a nocturnal spectre who assumed the form of a beautiful woman in order to beguile and destroy young children. In the Talmud she is associated with the legends of Adam, whose wife she was before Eve was created, and so became the mother of the demons.

LILY (sh'dhan, 1 K 7, sh'dhanannah, 2 Ch 4, Ca 2, Hos 14).—The Heb. word is probably a loan word from the Egyptian for the 'lily.' In Ar. it is dhs, which includes a great number of allied words—lilies, irises, gladdiol, etc. No doubt the Heb. word was equally comprehensive. Flowers of this group are very plentiful in Palestine, the irises being pre-eminent for their handsome appearance. The 'hzy work' (1 K 7, 2, 9) is likely to have been modelled after the latos (Nymphean lotus) itself: lotus-like flowers appear on some Jewish coins. The Gr. lillnon of Mt 6, Lk 12 probably had as wide a significance as sh'dhan, and included more than much alike.

E. W. G. Masterman.

LIME (sh'dh, LXX konies) is mentioned by name in RV only in Is 33, Am 2. Is 33 is 'the peoples shall be as the burnings of lime,' i.e. they shall be so utterly consumed as to be comparable to the heap of quicklime that is left after lime-stone has been burned in a furnace. In Am 2 the prophet denounces Moab because they 'burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime'-phosphat of lime being the chief ingredient of the ash of well-burned bones. In Dt 27, 'sh'dh occurs both as vb. and noun, but is rendered 'plaster.' For Is 27 see CHALK-STONES. InJer 23, 27 and the 'whited wall' of Ac 23 are allusions to the whitewashing of tombs with diluted quicklime so as to render them conspicuous, and of walls for purposes of embellishment.

LINE.—1. gen., which is of most frequent occurrence, is properly a measuring line (e.g. Jer 31, 47, Zee 14). Figuratively it denotes a rule of life (cf. 'precept upon precept, line upon line' of Isaiah's teaching, Is 28, Ps 19, 'their line is gone out through all the earth' has been variously interpreted. The LXX, taking the line to be a resonant cord, rendered by pthongos—a musical sound,' and St. Paul quotes that version in Ro 10 (Ev 'sound'). Most, perhaps, however, the idea is still that of a measuring line. Cf. Perowne (Psalms, in loc.), who gives 'line or boundary' —'as the heavens seems to measure and mark out the earth (whence the term horizon or boundary).'

2. Hebrew, a rope or cord, esp. a measuring cord used in measuring and dividing land (cf. Ps 78, Am 7, Zee 2). 'The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places' (Ps 16, 5) alludes to the marking out of plots of land with a measuring cord. 3. liquo (fr. root same as qaw) is used of the cord of scarlet thread that Rahab bound in the window (Jos 2, 1). 4. chul, properly a sewing-thread, only in J K 14, 5. phulit, a string or cord, only in Ezk 40, 6, cereb in LXX is rendered 'line,' for which RV gives 'pencil,' RVm
Linen

't red ochre.' 7 In NT 'lino' occurs only in AV of 2 Co 10:8. The Gr. word is κανάν, a measuring rod (AV 'vain,' RV 'precise,' RVam 'limit'), and so figuratively, a rule. Probably the Apostle's idea is that of a measuring line, as defining the boundary between his own province and another's.

LINEN is cloth made from the prepared fibre of flax. Ancient Egyptian proficiency in its manufacture (Piny Hh vii. 56; Strabo, xvii. 41; Herod. ii. 182), and a flourishing trade was carried on (Pr 7:17, Ezk 27:17). As material of wearing apparel it has always been esteemed in the East. In hot climates it tends to greater freshness and cleanliness than cotton or wool. The Egyptian priests were obliged to wear linen (Herod. ii. 37; Wk. Anc. Egyp. iii. 117). The 'cotton garments' mentioned on the Rosetta stone were probably worn over the linen, and left outside when the priests entered a temple. The embalmed bodies of men and animals were wrapped in strips of linen. No other material was used for this purpose (Wilk. ch. ii. 115, 116, 484). Perhaps we may trace Egyptian influence in the place given to linen in the hangings, etc., of the Tabernacle, and in the garments of the priests (Ex 25:28 etc., 26:1 etc.). It formed part of the usual clothing of royalty, and of the wealthy classes (Gn 41:48, Est 8:4, Lk 16:13). It is the dress worn by persons engaged in religious service. The priests are described as wearing a linen ephod (1 S 18:4). The child Samuel in Shiloh (1 S 2:20), and David, bringing back the ark (2 S 6:4 etc.), also wear the linen ephod; cf. Ezk 9:10, Dn 10. It formed the garment of the Levite singers (2 Ch 23:2). It was the fitting garment of the Lamb's wife, 'the righteousness of the saints' (Rev 19:8); presumptuously assumed by 'the great city Babylon' (18:1); in it are also arrayed 'the armies that are in heaven' (19:11).

A linen thread can be drawn between several Heb. words tr. 'linen.' bad appears to be always used of garments (Gn 41:48 etc.), while shek appears perhaps mean the thread, as in the phrase bad of fine twined shek (Ex 39:31), the cloth made from it (Ex 25:26, Ezk 27 etc.), and also garments (Ex 26:2, etc.). We cannot, indeed, be certain that 'linen' is always intended (Guth, Bk. W. Strick- buch, s. a.). The modern Arab, shek means 'cotton gauze.' bâlē is a word of Arabian origin, occurring only in later books (Ex 27:21, 1 Ch 4:24, etc.), whence comes the Gr. bysos, which covered both bad and shekēs (Jos. Anti. ii. 117). Byssos (a translation) was the name of a country (Liddell and Scott, s. a.). phishim is a common generic, denoting the flax, or anything made from it (Jos 2:9, Jg 16:16, Jr 13:18 etc.). sshēb was a sheath, sometimes in which the whole body might be wound (Jg 14:19, Pr 31:28 etc.). It probably corresponded to the smūth, 'linen cloth' of Mx 14:14, and the shroud of Mt 27:26 etc. (Pr 7:9) is probably fine Egyptian thread, with which cloths and hangings were ornamented. orkē (Ac 14:18) is a large sheet; orkēs (Jn 19:22 etc.) are strips for bandages, samphion (Sir 40:4) was cloth of unbleached flax. shātanē (Lv 19:37) was probably cloth composed of linen and cotton.

Cotton yarn (Gk 10:8, 2 Ch 1:14, mēyēth) should almost certainly be rendered with RV 'drove.' W. EWING.

Lintel.—See House, § 6.

Linus.—One of the Christians at Rome from whom St. Paul sends greetings at the end of the Second Epistle to Timothy (4:1). All writers agree that he is identical with the first Bishop of Rome. Thus Irenæus: 'Peter and Paul, when they founded and built up the Church of Rome, committed the office of its episcopate to Linus and Eusebius.' Of the Church of the Romans after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, the first to be appointed to the office of Bishop was Linus, of whom Paul makes mention at the end of his letter to Timothy. His episcopate lasted about twelve years, but there is considerable difference of opinion as to its date.

Lion.

(1) lērē, 'argyrē, full-grown lion (Gn 49:9, Jg 14:6 etc.).

(2) kaphir, a young strong lion (Jg 14:6, Job 49, Ezk 19:8 etc.).

(3) lēvī (cf. Arab. lamābok), specially lions of (Gn 49, Nu 23:7, Job 4:1 etc.), and Giwāndūq, or (Job 4:22, Ps 40:6).

(4) layisṭ, particularly in poetry (Job 4:23, Pr 30:9, Is 30:6 etc.).

shākal, potently, lit. 'the roarer' (Job 4:23, 38:28, Hos 6:4, Ps 93:15).

benē-shāmāchāt is tr. 'in AV of Job 28:9 lion's whelps,' but ought to be, as in RV, 'sons of pride.'

Lions have been extinct in Palestine since the time of the Crusades, but evidently were once plentiful, especially in the thickets along the Jordan (Jer 49:19, Zec 11). They were a source of danger to men (1 K 13:23, 20:9, 2 K 17:23), and especially to shepherds' flocks (1 S 17:40, 31:4, 31:3, Mic 5:6). The terrifying roar of the lion is referred to in Pr 19:1b etc., and it is compared to the voice of God (Jer 25:32, Jl 3:16, Am 3:9). Metaphorically, Judah is described as a lion in Gn 49, Dan in Dt 33:22, and Israel in Nu 23:22; but in the NT the lion is usually typical of Satan (1 P 5:8; cf. 'Lion of the tribe of Judah,' Rev 5:5).

Lip (Heb. sāpākh, sā image, Gr. cheilos.—1. sāpākh, the usual OT word, and of very frequent occurrence. Only rarely are the lips referred to from the point of view of description of physical beauty and charm (Ct 4:2). Once they refer to the lips as the opening (Pr 24:7), once with drinking (Ca 7:1), with which cf. Ps 45:1, once (anthropomorphically of J) as the source from which the breath issues (Is 11); once the expression of the lips occurs as a gesture of mocking contempt (Ps 22:7). Twice (2 K 19:9, Is 30:9) we have an allusion to the cruel Assyrian custom of passing a ring through the lips of captives and leading them about with a rope or thong. But in the great majority of cases the lips are referred to as organs of speech (Job 27:1, Ps 110:19, Pr 15:24). Hence, according to the kind of words they utter and the quality of the heart from which the words come, they are described figuratively as uncircumcised (Ex 40:10), flattering (Ps 12:3), fawning (17), lying (319), joyful (69), perverse (Pr 4:21), righteous (163), false (178), burning (26), unclean (Is 6). By an intensification or extension of this figurative use, words are said to be in the lips (Ps 59:6, adders' poison to be under them (140), or in them a burning fire (Pr 16:26). In Is 57:18 the fruit of the lips '—praise. For Hos 14 see Calves of the Liar. 2. sāphēd (Ezk 24:21, Is 43:2, Mic 3:3, only in the phrase 'cover the lips'), whose equivalent is 'moustache,' it being the Eastern custom to cover this as a sign of stricken sorrow. 3. cheillos occurs 6 times in NT, always in quotations from LXX: Mt 1:21 and Mic 7:4—Is 57:19; 1 Co 14:10 = Is 8:11; He 3:13= Hos 14:4; 1 P 3:20 = Ps 34:320. List.—The Old Eng. vb. 'to list' occurs in Mt 17:17, Mk 9:4, Jn 7, Jl 3, 3. It means 'to desire or choose.'

Little owl.—See Owl.

Lively.—In AV 'lively' sometimes means 'living.' Thus in 1 P 2:9 Christians are 'living stones,' while in the previous verse Christ is a 'living stone,' though the Gr. word is the same in both verses. The other passages are Ac 7:24 'lively oracles' and 1 P 1:4 'lively hope.'

Liver (kēphēth).—1. In the great majority of cases where the liver is mentioned, it is in connexion with the law of sacrifice as prescribed in P (Ex 29:22, Lv 7:14, 18 etc.), and always in association with the seed (mēkereh). The LXX, followed by Josephus (Ant. iii. 1x. 2), takes kēfereth to be a bobe of the liver; but it is now agreed that it denotes the fatty mass at the opening of that organ. According to Semitic ideas, a particular endowment belonged to the liver and kidneys (wh. see), together with the fat attached to them; the reason being that they were regarded as the special seats not only of emotion but of life itself. Because of this, if a man were to sacrifice the liver with its fat not be eaten, but was to be thrown in sacrifice to J. 2. Pr 7:12 'till a dart strike through his liver,'

Ls. 213. my liver is poured upon the earth’ (cf. Job 169 'be poured out my gall upon the ground') are further illustrations of the physiological ideas referred to above. Either they are strong expressions for a deadly disease, or they denote sorrowful emotion of the most poignant kind.

3. In Ezk 212 the king of Babylon, at the parting of the way, ‘looked in the liver’ as one of the three forms of divination he employed. 4. In To 6-8 the liver of a fish is used for the purpose of exorcism. See, further, art. MAGIC DIVINATION and SOURCES p. 568ff.

LIZARD.—

(1) *lēdēḇā, a generic name for ‘lizard.’
(2) *kalb (cf. Arab. ḏabb), tr. AV ‘tortoise,’ RV ‘great lizard.
(3) *ḥāndāḇ, tr. AV ‘terret,’ RV ‘gecko.
(4) *šāmāḇ, tr. AV ‘chameleon,’ RV ‘land crocodile.’
(5) *ḥōmēṯ, tr. AV ‘snail,’ RV ‘sand lizard.’
(6) *ṭināḇeṯ, tr. AV ‘mole,’ RV ‘chameleon’ (wh. sense.

All these names occur in Lv 119-20, as ‘unclean’ animals; most of them are very uncertain.

Lizards are ubiquitous and exceedingly plentiful in Palestine; over 40 species have been identified. The most common is the green lizard (Lacerta viridis). The Palaestinensis (Podarcis Messoria) is common in all native houses; it is able to walk up the walls and along the ceilings by means of the disc-like suckers at the ends of its toes. If šāmāḇ was, as many scholars claim, a lizard, then probably the gecko is the special species indicated. The dabb is a large lizard (Uromastix spinipes), with a long spiny tail. The sandlizards or skinks are common on soft, sandy soil; seven species are found in Palestine. The land crocodile, known to the Arabs as the *wārā‘, is a large lizard, sometimes five feet long; two species have been found in the Jordan valley—the Psammosaurus aeneus and the Monitor niflciosus. The chameleon is dealt with in a separate article.

LOCOUS.—

(1) ‘yabo (root—‘to multiply’) occurs more than 20 times; in Jg 675, Job 398, and Jer 466 it is, tr. ‘grasshopper’ in AV.

(2) kalb (tr. AV and RV ‘locust’ in 2 Ch 74, elsewhere ‘grasshopper’), possibly a small locust: see Lv 112, Nu 153, Ec 12, Is 406.

(3) *qōḏim (pl.), Am 7, AV ‘grasshoppers,’ RV ‘locusts,’ AV ‘green worms;’ *gōbāt, Nah 3, AV ‘great grasshoppers,’ RV ‘swarms of grasshoppers.’

The remaining words are very uncertain. (4) *qōḏāḇ, tr. ‘palmer worm’ (i.e. caterpillar). (5) *qalāq, tr. (RV) ‘cankerworm.’ (6) *qalāḏ, tr. ‘caterpillar.’ These three (Jl 12, 111) may all be stages in the development of the locust, or they may, more probably, be some varieties of grasshoppers. (7) *ḥāndāḇ, Lv 1111 (misprinted in AV ‘beetle,’ RV ‘cricket’), and *ḥāndāḇ, Lv 112 (tr. AV and RV ‘bald locust’), are also some varieties of locust or grasshopper (it is impossible to be certain of the varieties specified). (8) *ṣāḏāḇ, Dt 289, from a root meaning ‘to reduce’ or ‘to abbreviate,’ which fills the countryside with its strident noise all through the hot summer.

Locusts and grasshoppers are included in the family Acrididae. The latter are always plentiful, but the locusts fortunately do not appear in swarms, except at intervals of years. The most destructive kinds are Acridium and aepaciscus migratoria. When they arrive in their countless millions, they darken the sky (Ex 104). The poetical description in Jl 21, 11 is full of faithful touches, particularly the extraordinary noise they make (v.4) when they are all feeding together. Their voracious onslaught is referred to in Is 30, and their sudden disappearance when they rise in clouds to seek new fields for destruction is mentioned in Nah 31.

They clear every green thing in their path (Ex 109). No more suitable figure can be conceived for an invading army (Jg 672, Jer 469). When, some forty years ago, the Amea Bedouin from E. of the Jordan swarmed on to the Plain of Esdraelon, an eye-witness looking from Nazareth described the plain as stripped utterly bare, ‘just as if the locusts had been over it.’ When locusts are blown seaward, they fall into the water in vast numbers (Ex 109). The present writer has seen along the N. shore of the Dead Sea a continuous ridge of dead locusts washed up. The smell of piles of rotting locusts is intolerable. The feehlessness and insignificance of these little insects, as viewed individually, are referred to in Nu 199, Ps 1059, Is 496. Locusts are still eaten (cf. Mt 30). See FOOD, 8. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

LOD, LYDDA.—A town in the territory of Benjamin, not apparently of pre-Israelite origin, but built (1 Ch 89), along with Ono, by the Benjaminite Shemed (but Luthen has Azuwm occur as the name of a town in the lists of Thothmes III.). Elsewhere it is mentioned only in the post-Captivity lists (Exr 2m, Neh 7118; and in connexion with the healing of Zenas at this place (Ac 96). Its inhabitants were enslaved by Cæcilius, and freed by Antony (Jos. Ant. xiv. xi. 2, xii. 2). Cestius Gallus burned it, and it afterwards surrendered to Vespasian (Joseph. xiii. 1, xviii. 1). In the Middle Ages it was the seat of a bishopric. It is a centre of the cultus of that strange being called by the Christians Saint George (to whom the church is dedicated), and by the Muslims el-Khadr—probably an ancient spirit of vegetation. It was known as Diopolis in the Byzantine period, but the dirty modern town which represents the ancient site retains the old name Ludd. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

LODDEUS (1 Es 84. 46).—The ‘captain of the place of the treasury’ (or ‘at the place Caasphila, Exr 8)’ to whom Ezra sent for Levites; called Kiddo in Exr 8.

LO-DEBAR.—A place in Gilead, near to, and apparently east from, Mahanaim. It was the residence of Mephibosheth till he was summoned to court by David (2 S9). It is mentioned also upon the occasion of David’s flight to the east of the Jordan (174). The site has not been recovered. It is perhaps the same as Lidebir of Jos 13.

LOG.—See Weights and Measures.

LOGIA.—See Gospels, § 2 (c).

LOGOS.—In classical Greek logos signifies both ‘word’ and ‘reason,’ but in the LXX and the NT it is used, with few exceptions, in the former sense only. When it is God’s word that is spoken of, it denotes the declaration or revelation of the Divine will, and specifically the Christian gospel as the utterance of the Divine plan of salvation (e.g. Mt 133-28, Ph 14). But in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel (13 [3 times] 11, with which cf. 1 Jn 11 [87 of AV is spurious; see RV] and Rev 1910) ‘Logos’ (EV Word) is applied to Jesus Christ, and is used to set forth His peculiar glory as the only-begotten Son of God, who also is the Life and the Light of men. It is with this Johannine Logos that we have now to deal, and in doing so it seems necessary to consider (1) the content of John’s Logos doctrine; (2) its sources; (3) its place in the Fourth Gospel; (4) its theological significance.

1. Content.—Three stages appear in the exposition of the Logos doctrine given in the Prologue. (a) First it is the Logos Who was with God and was the Logos, and who was in the beginning, i.e. He eternally held a...
LOGOS

relation of communion with Him as a separate personality—a personality itself Divine, for 'the word was God.' As to the world, it was made by Him (v.3, cf. v.14), perhaps with the further suggestion that from Him it has been and continues the life by which it is sustained (v.9). But from Him there flows also the higher life of man as a spiritual being possessed of reason and conscience, for His life becomes the universal light of human souls (v.4, cf. v.9).

(b) The second stage of the exposition (v.10-16) is a contrast of the Logos with the word of God that came by John the Baptist. John was not the Light; he came only to bear witness of it.

The Logos is the true Light, and the mediator of Divine life to all who believe in Him. (c) Finally (v.17), the author describes the incarnation of the Logos in the flesh, and declares His identity with the historical Jesus Christ, the bringer of grace and truth. In v.18 the whole Prologue is summed up: Here begins the to the point from which he set out (cf. v.1), but his readers now understand that the eternal Logos is one with Jesus Christ, the Son of God.
2. Sources.—(1) For these some have been content to refer to the OT and the post-canonical Jewish writings.

And it is true that a connexion is clearly to be traced.
We can hardly mistake a reference in the Prologue (v.1) to the creative word of God in Gen.1.1 in the Psalms and Prophets, again, a personification of the word of Jehovah is common (e.g. Ps 33, Is 55). And in the Wisdom literature, both canonical and apocryphal, his personifying tendency is carried further (Pr 8.22-31, Sir 24), though it is God's Wisdom, not His Word, that becomes His representative, and a full personification of the Word does not meet us till we have reached a point in Jewish history where Greek influences have begun to make themselves felt (Wis 9.105). All this, however, is very far from explaining the Johannine Logos doctrine. The most that can be said is that the doctrine of the Prologue reflects a stage in Jewish religious thought, the Synagogue, OT, to conceive of the Divine self-revelation as mediated by the personified Wisdom or Word of Jehovah.

(2) Some have held that John's Logos doctrine was derived entirely from the Judaism of Alexandria or Assyria, and specifically from the teaching of Philo. From early times there had grown up among the Greeks a conception of the Logos as the Divine Reason manifested in the universe, and explaining how themselves felt into relation with it. To this Logos philosophy Plato's doctrine of ideas had contributed, and afterwards the Stoic view of the Logos as the rational principle of the universe. In his efforts to blend Judaism with Platonism, Philo adopted the term as one familiar alike to Jews and to Greeks, and sought to show by means of allegorical interpretations that the true philosophy of God's world was revealed in the Logos. But St. John, it is supposed, simply appropriated this teaching, and by means of an idealizing treatment of Christ's life constructed in his Greek a philosophical treatise on the doctrine of the Logos. The theory breaks down on any examination. To Philo the Logos was the principle of Reason; to St. John He was the Divine revealing Word. Philo's Logos is not really personal; St. John's certainly is. Philo does not identify the Logos with the Messiah; to St. John He is no other than the Christ, the Saviour of the world. Philo sees in the flesh a principle opposed to the Godhead; St. John glories in the fact of the Incarnation. With Philo the antithesis between God and the world is a metaphysical one; with St. John it is ethical and religious. St. John cannot,

then, have derived his doctrine of the Logos from Philo.
But he undoubtedly used the term because Philo had made it familiar in the universe, and expressing how mean of expressing the idea of a mediation between God and the universe, and also because he himself had received certain formal influences from the Philonic philosophy (see, e.g., the value he assigns to knowledge; his crystalization of the gospel into such general terms as light,' 'truth,' 'life'; his constant antithesis of light and darkness). Apart, however, from such formal influences and the convenience of a familiar and suggestive term,
the real source of the Johannine Logos doctrine is still

4. Theological significance.—From the time of Justin, and ever since, the Logos doctrine of St. John's Prologue has been seen as a metaphysical one; with St. John it is ethical and religious. St. John cannot,
then, have derived his doctrine of the Logos from Philo.
But he undoubtedly used the term because Philo had made it familiar in the universe, and expressing how mean of expressing the idea of a mediation between God and the universe, and also because he himself had received certain formal influences from the Philonic philosophy (see, e.g., the value he assigns to knowledge; his crystalization of the gospel into such general terms as light,' 'truth,' 'life'; his constant antithesis of light and darkness). Apart, however, from such formal influences and the convenience of a familiar and suggestive term,
the real source of the Johannine Logos doctrine is still to be sought.
(3) That source is assuredly to be found in the actual historical personality of Jesus Himself as we find it set forth in the rest of this Gospel. More and more the book is to be treated as a philosophical romance in which a purely idealizing treatment is given to the figure of Jesus; more and more the substantial historical truth of the presentation becomes the dominant idea, assuming the substantial truth of the narrative, it seems clear that St. John uses his Logos conception, not 'to manu-ufacture the Light of the World out of the Messiah of the religious world, but to set forth, in a way that would appeal to the men of his own place and time, Christ's real relations to God and the universe as these had been attested by His words and deeds, by His dying and rising from the dead, and by all the facts of His self-revelation. We must bear in mind, moreover, that while the term 'Logos' was a new one to be applied to Christ, the place of dignity and power assigned to Him by the Gentile world, both St. John and the author of Hebrews had taught the doctrine of Christ's eternal Sonship, and of His functions as the creator of the universe and the revealer of the Father (Ph 2.6-9, Col 1.15-20, Col 2.6-7, and the teaching of Plato, already familiar and widely accepted in the Church, is subsumed in the Johannine doctrine of the Logos.

3. Place in the Fourth Gospel.—The attempt has been made to distinguish between the Logos doctrine in the Prologue and the real St. John of the Hellenic, and the Gospel for the critical student of whatever school. It is true that when we pass beyond the Prologue the word 'Logos' is not repeated. The author nowhere puts it into the mouth of Jesus—"one evidence surely of his historical fidelity to his material. The Logos, then, is not a mere catchword, put forth in order to seize the eye and arouse the interest of the Greek reader. The Logos idea underlies the whole Gospel, and must do with the author's selection of materials. In the Prologue, as in any other well-written introduction, the plan of the work is set out, and the Logos doctrine is stated there because it supplies the key to a right understanding of the history that follows.

DIVINE nature or a philosophy of the Incarnation. It is plain, on the contrary, that in all that he says it is the religious and ethical interests that are paramount. He uses the Logos conception for two great purposes,—to think of Jesus (1) as the Reconciler of God, and the Saviour of men. The first of these ideas, as has been said, is one that we find already in the Pauline Epistles and in Hebrews; but by his emphasis on the relations of Fatherhood and Sonship St. John imparted a peculiarly moral meaning to the essential nature of the God who is revealed in Christ. But it is above all for a soteriological purpose that he seems to employ the Logos idea. The Logos, who is identified with Jesus Christ, comes forth from the bosom of the Father, bringing life and light to men. He comes with a gospel that supersedes the Law of Moses, for it is a gospel of grace as well as of truth. Himself the Son of God, He offers to all who will believe on His name the right to become the children of God. And so, while the Logos is undoubtedly the agent of God's creative will, He is still more distinctively the mediator of God's redeeming purpose. It is therefore as a religious power, not as a metaphorical, that St. John brings Him before us. The Evangelist shows, it is true, as Kirs points out, that the absoluteness of Christ's historical manifestation, His exclusive Saving of the Life of grace are guaranteed by the fact that the roots of His personal life reach back into the eternal Life of God. His Logos doctrine thus wards off every Christology which would see in Jesus the Reconciler of God, and as the personality of the highest originality. But, while the Logos idea illuminate the history with the light of eternity, it can reveal eternity only to us in the light of history, not in its own supernatural light."

LOIS.—The grandmother of Timothy (2 Ti 1), and probably the mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother. The name is Greek. The family lived at Lystra (Ac 16:1), where St. Paul first made their acquaintance. Lois was a devout Jewess by conviction, who instructed her family diligently in the Holy Scriptures.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

LONGSUFFERING.—In the OT the RV uses this word only in Jer 15:6, where it is the translation of a phrase usually rendered 'slow to anger' (cf. Ex 34:4, Nu 14:18, Ps 86:5, in which passages AV has 'longsuffering').

In the NT 'longsuffering' is the usual tr. of makrothumia and the corresponding verb. (The only exceptions are Luke 1:70; Acts 22:16; and Matt. in Mt 18:21, 25:14; and Acts 26:2.) The RV improves on AV by using 'longsuffering' in Lk 18:1, 1 Th 5:14. The Gr. word means 'a long holding out of the mind before it gives up', and indeed 'patience—generally to passion.' (Trench, Synonyms of NT, § lii.); it implies the opposite of short temer; cf. Old Eng, 'longanimity.'

In the NT the longsuffering of God is regarded as a proof of His 'goodness' (Ro 2:4; here and elsewhere 'longsuffering', 'forbearance' (Lk 1:70); and of His faithfulness (2 P 3:9); it is manifested in the gracious restraint which characterizes His attitude towards those who deserve His wrath (Ro 9:22, 1 P 3:3). The Divine longsuffering is perfectly exemplified in Christ's dealings with sinners (1 Th 1:10). Longsuffering is, however, a conspicuous grace in the ideal Christian character (2 Co 6, Eph 4, Col 3, 1 Th 5, 2 Th 3, 1 Th 3); it is viewed as an evidence of Divine strengthening (Col 3), as a manifestation of love (1 Co 13), and as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5).

LORD.—The Heb. O.T. has three leading names for God: (1) 'the name of four letters' (tetragrammaton) JHWH (familiar to us in the incorrect form 'Jehovah'; the real vocalization is almost certainly 'Jahweh' [see Gn, p. 209]); (2) Adonai; (3) Elohim. By a misinterpretation of Lv 24:8 the Jews shrank from uttering the first of these, and added to its four consonants, in their reading of the OT, the vowels of either Adonai or Elohim. When the vowels of the former were added, the AV and RV generally translate the word by 'Lord'; when those of the latter, by 'God'; using small capitals in each case. If, however, Adonai is originally in the text, they represent it by 'Lord,' using an initial capital only. Thus in the OT 'Lord' represents Jahweh when it was read as Adonai, and 'Lord' represents Adonai when it stands in the original text. This distinctive printing is not observed in the NT. There are several other Hebrew words in the OT expressing the general idea of lordship, which are rendered by 'Lord' (Gen 45:12, Job 19, Ezr 8:21 et seq.).

In the NT 'Lord' is used once as tr. of Rabboni (Mt 20:15), and five times of despots (Lk 22:1, Ac 4:6, 8, 2 P 2, Jude 1, Rev 6:1); in all the latter cases the RV has 'the conqueror' or 'the conqueror of God,' and (2) as personality of the highest originality. But, while the Logos idea illuminates the history with the light of eternity, it can reveal eternity only to us in the light of history, not in its own supernatural light. (Ps 80:36.)

LORD OF HOSTS (Jahweh 'ladidim') appears in the OT as a title of God 282 times, of which all but 36 are found in the Prophetical writings. There is considerable uncertainty as to what the term 'hosts' signifies, and it seems best to suppose that its meaning underwent modifications in the course of time. We can, perhaps, distinguish three stages.

1. It is possible that at one time the title suggested the idea of Jahweh as the leader of the Israelite forces. In favour of this view is the fact that the word ladidim outside this phrase always refers to bodies of men, and usually to Israelite forces. There is no doubt that in the early stages of the history of the nation the popular view of the functions of Jahweh was concentrated to a large extent on this point that He was the general and leader of the armies in warfare; and the same idea lingered late, and lies at the bottom of the objection to the institution of the monarchy, which is put in Samuel's mouth (cf. 1 S 28:1 with 1 S 12:24). In the same way, David, as he taunts Goliath, says to him, 'I come in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of armies of Israel' (1 S 17:45). And one more than this was a special connexion between the title 'Lord of hosts' and the Ark which is regarded as the habitation of Jahweh in His capacity as War-God (cf. 1 S 4:18). But this explanation of the meaning of the title, as Delitzsch pointed out, is greatly invalidated by the fact that we do not find it in the period in which we should expect it to be most common, that is, in the wars of the Wandering in the Wilderness.

2. We are brought to another view, which may merely mark a later stage: the 'hosts' are the spiritual forces which stand at God's disposal. So in Jos 5:13, when Joshua asks the unknown warrior whether he is on their side or on that of their enemies, the implied answer of the Divine stranger is that he belongs to neither side, but is come as captain of the Lord's host to succour His people. For the idea of the angelic host engaged in the service of God, cf. 2 S 24:16, 1 K 22:15, 2 K 6:17; and in the NT Mt 26:36, Lk 22:44, He 14.

3. The third stage is reached in the prophets, esp. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Malachi, where the title assumes a far wider meaning and embraces all the forces of the universe. The term 'host of heaven' is commonly used of the heavenly bodies to which the later kings paid idolatrous worship (cf. also Gn 8, Ps 33:5). As the idea of the omnipotence of God grew
LORD'S DAY

Loftier and wider, the elemental forces of nature were regarded as performing service to their Creator. So the sun is God's minister (Ps 19:3-4), and even so early as the Song of Deborah the stars are represented as gathering around the sun as its vassals; then the president in the face of the lion (Jg 5:20). Hence the term 'Lord of hosts' becomes with the prophets the highest and most transcendent title of God, and is even rendered by the LXX as simply 'Lord of the hosts.'

It serves as a constant reminder of the immittent width of God's sway, and as such it acquires a close connection with the other great attribute of God, his holiness. Hence we get the summit of the Hebrew prophet.

LORD'S DAY.—1. Name and origin.—The title used by St. John (Rev 1:10), probably to describe the day upon which the early Christian Church in Apostolic days assembled for worship. The Acts of the Apostles shows us the disciples of Christ immediately after Pentecost as a closely united body, 'of one heart and soul,' supported by daily gifts from the Gentile and the Ephesians (Acts 2:44).

Their new faith did not at first lead them to cut themselves off from their old Jewish worship, for their belief in Jesus as Messiah seemed to them to add to, and fulfill, rather than to abolish, the religion of their childhood. This worship of Christians with their Jewish fellow-countrymen secured the continuance of the Church of God from one dispensation to another; while their exclusively Christian festivals consolidated the Church and enabled it to discover itself.

The daily worship of the Christian Church would no doubt soon prove impracticable, and a weekly gathering become customary. For this weekly gathering the Sabbath was unsuitable, as being then observed in a spirit radically different from the joy and liberty of the new faith; doubtless also the restrictions as to length of a Sabbath day's journey would prove a bar to the gathering together of the little body. Of the other six days none so naturally suggested itself as the first. To it our Lord had granted a certain approval; for on it He rose from the dead and appeared to His disciples, and on the following Sunday repeated this visitation; while Pentecost that year fell on the first day of the week (which it did if the chronology of St. John be followed), it received a final seal as the special day of grace.

That this day was actually chosen is seen in the NT (Ac 20:7 1 Co 16). Mention of it is found in the literature immediately following the Apostolic writings. Not the least interesting evidence is found in a report to the Emperor Trajan, written by Pliny, a heathen magistrate, not long after the death of St. John, which mentions that the custom of the Christians was to meet together early in the morning on a certain 'fixed day' and sing hymns to Christ as a god, and bind themselves by a sacramentum to commit no crime. Ignatius, the earliest post-Apostolic Christian writer, also speaks of it, telling theMagnesians to lead a life conformable to 'the Lord's Day.'

And from this now a continuous stream of evidence shows that the Church has faithfully observed the custom ever since.

The title by which early Christian writers usually called the festival was the 'Lord's Day' but long before the Church felt no difficulty in adopting the Hebrew title of 'Sunday,' realizing that as on that day light was created, and the Sun of Righteousness arose on it, there was upon them a peculiar fitness in the name. The first evidence as to the method by which the early Church observed the day is found in Justin Martyr's Apology ('I. 7. 4. 120), where we read that on the day called Sunday the Christians met together, out of both city and country, and held a religious service at which first the writings of Apostles and Prophets were read; and after which common prayers were said; and when these were ended, bread and wine were brought to the president, who uttered prayers and thanksgivings, to which the people said, 'Amen'; and then they reclined to the table on which they had given a new cup, to the accompaniment of one of the decrees carrying it to the absent. Thus it is clear that the early Church continued the Apostolic custom (Ac 20:7) of celebrating the Lord's Supper every Lord's Day—a custom so well-stated as to enable Cheyne to call Sunday dies pars, or 'the day of bread.'

2. Relation of the Lord's Day to the Sabbath.—The relation of the Lord's Day to the Sabbath is best defined as one of close affinity observed by its identity. The Sabbath was originally instituted as a provision for deep physical and spiritual needs of human nature. It sprang from the love of God for man, providing by religious sanction for the definite setting apart of the seventh day as a time for rest from labour and for communion with God. Our Lord found the original institution almost hidden beneath a mass of traditional regulations. Thus his action towards the Sabbath as He found it, was to bring it back to its first ideal. This He did by showing that their tradition told that David broke the letter of its regulation and yet was guiltless (Lk 6:1); how charity and common sense led men to break their own rules (13:19); how the Sabbath was granted to man as a blessing and not laid on him as a burden (Mk 2:27); and how He as Son of Man, fulfilling ideal mankind, was its Lord (20:9); but while our Lord thus purified the Sabbath, there is no proof that He abrogated it. He emphasized its unchangeable, as He foreknew the ultimate destruction of the Temple; and He cleansed it as He cleansed the Temple.

We can best see Christ's will regarding the Sabbath and the Lord's Day in what he said as to the substratum of their observance.

For what happened had its rise in Apostolic times, and has been adopted by the Church universal ever since, and is thus assuredly His will as wrought by the Spirit. The Acts shows us that the Christians who were originally Jews observed both the Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day (Ac 21:11); and this double observance lasted among them at least until the destruction of the Temple. The Jewish members of the Church were soon outnumbered by the Gentile, and these latter would feel in no way drawn to continuing the observance of the Jewish Sabbath as well as their own Lord's Day; and this the more so that they had received under the wider teaching of St. Paul, who had emphasized the danger of an undue observance of days, and had spoken of the Sabbath as 'a shadow of the things to come' (i.e. the Christian Dispensation). Col 2:16 4a 1 Ro 14:2).

But if the Gentile Christian did not observe the Jewish Sabbath, yet he could not be ignorant of its deeper meaning, for he saw the Sabbath observed by his Jewish neighbours, and read in the OT of its institution and uses; and thus imperceptibly the essential principles of the Sabbath would pass into the Christian idea of their own sacred day of rest and worship. Christ's intention, then, seems to have been to allow the Sabbath to die slowly, but by His Spirit to teach the Church to perpetuate for mankind in her Lord's Day all that was of eternal moment in the Sabbath. Thus was avoided the danger of pouring the new wine of Christian truth and life into the old bottles of Jewish traditional observances.

v.17 (7) And bring us not into temptation;

(8) But deliver us from the evil (one ?).

Lk. 11:4.

v.2 Whosoever ye pray, say,

(1) Our Father (which art in the heavens);

(2) Hallowed be thy name.

(3) Thy kingdom come.

(4) Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on the earth.

v.3 (5) Our daily (7) bread give us day by day.

v.4 (6) And forgive us our sins, for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us.

(7) And bring us not into temptation;

(8) But deliver us from the evil (one ?).

The request of one of the disciples—Lord, teach us to pray—(Lk. 11)—expresses a desire which doubles found a place in the hearts of all. Great teachers were expected to give their disciples a form of prayer. Because John had taught his disciples to pray, Christ was petitioned to do the same for His followers.

The Lord's Prayer has been used by us imperfectly in two forms, one by Mt., another by Lk.; in each case in a different context. The forms are set out above for comparison, in a literal translation, as a preliminary to the presentation of questions connected with the text and the contexts. The places in which there is a difference of reading, or where words are omitted by some authorities, are enclosed in brackets. The form in Mt. contains of clauses which correspond, clause by clause, to an equal number in Lk. according to the longer text. The shorter Lukan text omits clauses 4 and 8. The Doxology is found only in MSS of Mt., and not in the oldest of these.

'Thus,' after this manner' (Mt. 6') introduces the prayer as a model of acceptable devotion. 'Whenceever' (Lk. 11) enjoys the use of the words which follow, and those that the prayers of Christ's disciples should be conceived in the spirit of the form He was giving them.

In clause 4 (Mt.) the article before 'earth' is omitted in some MSS; but as, by a well-known rule, the article in Greek is often implied, but not expressed, after a preposition, the omission does not demand a change in the translation.

In clause 6 (Mt.) a few old authorities read the perfect—

'has been engaged.'

In Lk., clause 1, the words 'Our' and 'which art in the heavens,' and the whole of clauses 4 and 8, are omitted by a few ancient authorities; and, in consequence, have been rejected by the RV. Yet the TR of Lk. is attested by the majority of the MSS. If we go behind these witnesses, and, in spite of their evidence, accept the shorter Lukan form, it will perhaps follow that the rejected clauses were never parts of the Prayer, as taught by Christ, but are later amplifications, which obtained a place in Mt., and thence were copied into the Lukan text.

Clause 6 in Lk. explains the corresponding words in Mt. In the latter 'us' is not of strict proportion, but of general condition. It cannot be, as is sometimes stated in devotional exegesis, that we are to pray God to measure His boundless gifts to forgive; but we plead that we have endeavoured to remove what would be a bar to His grant of pardon; and this is expressed clearly in Lk., 'for we ourselves also forgive.'

The Doxology, which is not found in the oldest MSS, is contained in the majority of copies. The evidence of the ancient versions is divided. Some of the Fathers, in commenting on the Lord's Prayer, take no account of the Doxology; but Chrysostom and others recognize it, and note its connexion with the preceding petitions. If the Doxology be not an integral part of the Matthean text, it is certainly of very great antiquity. It may have been interpolated from a Liturgy; for it is now admitted that liturgical forms existed in the earliest days of Christianity, although perhaps at first they were unwritten, and were transmitted orally.

The word in clause 8 which we have provisionally rendered 'daily' was of doubtful import in early times, for different interpretations have been given by the ancients.

Origin (3rd cent.), the greatest textual critic of primitive days says that the word επιπλούσιον (epiploúson) was coined by Chrysostom, and is not found in earlier Greek writers. Among the Syrians, one Version (Curetonian) has in Mt. 'bread constant of the day,' in Lk. 'bread constant of every day;' in Lk. the Lewis Version (not extant in Mt.) has the same as the Curetonian; in Mt. the Pesh. has 'bread of our need to-day,' in Lk. 'bread of our need daily.' The ancient Latin rendering of επιπλούσιον was 'daily.' This is read now in the Vulgate in Lk., but in Mt. was altered by Jerome to 'super-substantial.' The term is derived either from επί and τελείων, to 'come upon,' i.e. 'succeed,' 'be continual'; or from επί and τελείων, upon substance,' i.e. 'added to, or adapted to, substance.' The Syriac rendering, 'the Bread,' comes from the first derivation; these second derivation permits their other rendering of 'our need; bread adapted to our human substance.' Jerome renders επιπλούσιον in a spiritual sense, something added to natural substance.' In either case 'bread' may be taken in an earthly or a heavenly sense. The function of Scripture assigns the widest application of the term. If we adopt the derivation from επί and τελείων, the word 'epiploúson' may be—(1) whatsoever is needed for the coming day, to be sought in daily morning prayer—'give us to-day'; (2) whatsoever is needed for the coming days of life. The petition becomes a prayer for the presence of Him who has revealed Himself as 'the Bread.' Another application, the coming feast in the Kingdom of God (cf. Lk. 14), seems excluded by the reference to the present time in both Evangelists.

In clause 8 the Greek may be the genitive case of ho ψεύτων, 'the evil one,' or of το προδότης, where the article to is generic, 'the evil,' whatsoever is evil.' The Greek is indefinite, and commentators have taken the words in both applications.

We have already observed that the longer readings in the Lukan form of the Prayer may be due to the attempts of copyists to harmonise the text with the form found in their days in Mt. Some may further argue that the two forms are different reminiscences of the same instruction. If it be held that the Evangelists are late compositions, in which, long after the events recorded, certain unknown writers gathered together, without method, or accurate knowledge, such traditions as had reached them, it will be as justifiable to us to be indifferent to what is related to treat what we have learned of the ancient versions of the same original. But if it be admitted that the Evangelists were accurate and well-informed historians, there is no ground for identifying the Lukan with that in Mt. They occupy different places in the history. Mt. records the Prayer as part of a discourse. It was delivered unasked, and as transient, in contrast to the hypothetical and superstitious habit which the Master condemned; and it is followed by an instruction on the subject of prayer. The occurrence of the word in Lk. is altogether unexpected; it is as if Christ had been engaged in prayer; then, in response to a request, He delivered a form for the use of His disciples, and enforced the instruction by a parable and exhortations teaching the power of earnestness in prayer. The differences of text, especially if the shorter readings in Lk. be adopted, distinguish the one form from the other; and it is unreasonable to deny that the Master would, if necessary, repeat instructions on an important subject.

The Prayer is rightly named 'the Lord's,' because it owes to the Master its form and arrangement; but many of the sentiments may be paralleled in Jewish writings, and are ultimately based on the teachings of the OT.

In a work accessible to the ordinary reader, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers (ed. C. Taylor), we read (ch. v. 30): 'R. Jehuda ben Thema said, Be strong as a lion, to do the will of thy Father which is in heaven.' In ch. iv. 7 (p. 8) examples are given of the use of 'the Name' as a substitute for titles of the Almighty, and including all that they imply. The Rabbinical doctrine of the cultus of the lower world is exemplified by Taylor, ch. iii. 15 n. Hillel said of a skull floating on the water (ll. 7), 'Because thou

Once (1 S 13:20) the word for 'prince' is applied to them. Probably the peculiar word is, a native Philistine title. Their functions, so far as can be gathered from the OT, were the same as those of petty kings.

LO-RUHAMAH.—See Hosea, Lo-ammì.

LOT—The son of Haran, brother of Abraham. His name seems clearly derived from a root meaning to wrap closely. The account of his life is contained in Gn 11:31—14:19. He was born in Ur, and went with Abraham to Haran, and thence to Canaan. He accompanied Abraham in much of his wandering. The separation between them (ch. 13) was due to a quarrel between their herdsmen, each having great possessions of cattle. A result, that Lot dwelt in the city Zoar, plain, making his home in Sodom. During the execution of Chedorlaomer (ch. 14) he was carried away captive, and rescued by Abraham. In ch. 19 is narrated the story of Lot and his daughter from Sodom, with the subsequent incidents. The city of Zoar, where they dwelt for a time, is possibly the Zoara or Zöor of Josephus, at the S.E. extremity of the Dead Sea, in the modern Gerasa-Saltich, a well-watered region. The mountain to which he finally went is doubtless the mountains region later known as Moab. The story of the daughters of Lot (19:30—38) is now usually considered to be not history, but a traditional account of the origin of the two nations, Moab and Ammon. The basis of the story is partly popular etymology of the two names; while it is prompted chiefly by national rivalry and bodega. The story of Lot's wife and her transformation into a pillar of salt is doubtful: it may have arisen from the peculiarities of the cliffs in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. At its S.W. extremity is a range of cliffs 6 miles long and 600 feet high, called Jobel Usabim, 'the mount of Usabim', the mount of Usabim. These consist of crumbled rock salt, covered with chalky limestone and gypsum, and curiously furrowed and worn, so as sometimes to resemble a human figure.

LORDS OF THE PHILISTINES.—The chieftains of the Philistine cities, Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, and Gath. Wherever they are mentioned (Jos 13, 13, 14; 19, 2, 11, 11, 12, 12, 17, 19, 5, 30, 2, 30, 5, 12, 4:10, 4:12, 5:19) the word translated 'lord' is a peculiar one, being identical with the Heb. word for 'prince'. Once (1 S 13:20) the word for 'prince' is applied to them. Probably the peculiar word is, a native Philistine title. Their functions, so far as can be gathered from the OT, were the same as those of petty kings.

LOT.—The son of Haran, brother of Abraham. His name seems clearly derived from a root meaning to wrap closely. The account of his life is contained in Gn 11:31—14:19. He was born in Ur, and went with Abraham to Haran, and thence to Canaan. He accompanied Abraham in much of his wandering. The separation between them (ch. 13) was due to a quarrel between their herdsmen, each having great possessions of cattle. A result, that Lot dwelt in the city Zoar, plain, making his home in Sodom. During the execution of Chedorlaomer (ch. 14) he was carried away captive, and rescued by Abraham. In ch. 19 is narrated the story of Lot and his daughter from Sodom, with the subsequent incidents. The city of Zoar, where they dwelt for a time, is possibly the Zoara or Zöor of Josephus, at the S.E. extremity of the Dead Sea, in the modern Gerasa-Saltich, a well-watered region. The mountain to which he finally went is doubtless the mountains region later known as Moab. The story of the daughters of Lot (19:30—38) is now usually considered to be not history, but a traditional account of the origin of the two nations, Moab and Ammon. The basis of the story is partly popular etymology of the two names; while it is prompted chiefly by national rivalry and bodega. The story of Lot's wife and her transformation into a pillar of salt is doubtful: it may have arisen from the peculiarities of the cliffs in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. At its S.W. extremity is a range of cliffs 6 miles long and 600 feet high, called Jobel Usabim, 'the mount of Usabim', the mount of Usabim. These consist of crumbled rock salt, covered with chalky limestone and gypsum, and curiously furrowed and worn, so as sometimes to resemble a human figure.

LOTAN.—A Horite clan (Gn 36:22, 29 = 1 Ch 1:42).
LOVE, LOVER, LOVELY, BELOVED

the Psalms). Israel's sin is the base requisit it has rendered; see Dt 29:4, Is 5:4 63-10, Mic 6:7, Jer 21:11, Mal 1:6, Neh 9:17. God's love is kindness, loving-kindness (see artt.: very frequent); to those in any degree worthy and approved, becoming delight, joy, in especial cases, bliss (Job 15:17). See also the 'abundant mercy' is more conspicuous than 'love' in the OT, and looks beyond the covenant-bound. God's love breaks into grief, anger, wrath, threatening (the reaction of affection) against the faithless and wanton (Ps 17:7-11, Ps 78:18, Is 63:9, Am 3:1, etc.); it burns with jealousy, when its chosen are seduced into idolatry and vice—'a loathing of Israel's corruption reveals at once the purity of His nature and the zeal of His affection (Ex 20, Nu 26:1, Dt 29:18, Zep 1:4, Jer 4:14, etc.). For the same reason, there is in Him a 'jealousy over Zion,' etc., when His 'beloved' is injured or wronged (Zac 1:12, Jer 19:14, etc.). Adumbrate the inclusion of 'the nations' in the covenant; and Ps 100, 103(11-12) 145-15, Jon 4(1) reveal a universal and truly human love in J (cf. Lk 23:28, Tit 3:4).

2. The Greek language discriminated in expressing love: it was not a word, as in English; (1) sexual love (eros); (2) family or natural affection (storge); (3) social love, friendship, philia; (4) sometimes, in a broader ethical sense, philanthropy, benevolence. The LXX translators, therefore, consistent in their usage, enlisted (5) agape to denote religious love, the love of God to man or man to God, or of man under God's covenant (Lk 14:26, 'suffused with religion'. The lower kinds of love, (1) and (2), they express by philia—'grace is avoided; agape, however, excludes the very verum philia (a noun agape rare outside of Scripture) was used in all periods of Greek synonymously with philia, implying in Hebrew literature, as described above, and practical affection, love shown by signs, rather than sentiment. Thus, after the Latin caritas (charity), rendered agape in NT 30 times by 'charity,' which IV has corrected to 'love.' Being a term of the heart, free from deception and narrow associations, agape was suitable for Biblical use. In the NT vocabulary of love, (1) never occurs — 'lust' represents the evil er do; agape and philia are the prevailing synonyms (verbs agapao and philao), the latter sometimes replacing the former in application to the higher love, with the connotation of endearment or intimacy; see 1 Jn 5:20 and 16:14 (a quasi-family affection), 11:2, spoken about Jesus (agapao in v. 20), agapeo, in paradigms, 21:29 (no idle variation); and in 1 Co 16:16, where the negative coalesces with the verb 'If any one is no friend of the Lord', storge (2) is found in its negative in Ro 1:20, 2 Th 3:6; and in the peculiar compound of two constituents, storge (3) is called 'affection', storge. Philo speaks of the 'philanthropy' of God. 'Beloved' (well-born, lovely) represents a derivative of agapeo, used of Christ for beloved by God; and of Chaldee, as dear to fellow-believers. It is synonymous with 'brehren'; this usage is frequent in sayings and salutations. In the NT, 'love' introduces an adjective akin to philia (3) — amiable' or 'affectionate.' There are several NT Gr., compounds of philo, rendered 'love' and 'loved' (6).—

agape (agapao), signifying primarily a voluntary, active affection, has brought from the LXX into the NT the deeper sense of spiritual affection, the love that links God and man and unites soul and soul in the Divine communion. Like philia, it implies reciprocity, fellowship,—if not existing, then desired and sought.

The Apostle John gives the final and complete NT doctrine of love. (a) The love of God John sees 'perfect' only in those who 'love one another' (1 John 4:12), the love of God's commands, from whose souls accordingly 'fear' is cast out, who 'abide' wholly in the realm of love that is constituted by the one Spirit dwelling in their hearts (1 Jn 2:27, 4:14-21); by such love men are to 'walk one' even as the Son is 'one' with the Father by virtue of the love subsisting eternally between them (Jn 17:21-23; cf. Mt 3:17-17)—there is love's prime fountain. Gradually, almost limply, OT saints had learned to speak of 'agape' against the faithless and wanton. Turning from His 'bosom' (Jn 11:16), He knows the Father's love, and seeks to convey it to and share it with His brethren. His mission is to 'show the Father,'—to declare how much, and to what effect, 'God loves the world' (Jn 3:16, 17, 18-26). 'Thankless and evil' though it is (Lk 6:35), in love which heeds kindness on the worst and seeks out the most alienated, lies toward the mark, full, needy—'mercy' is more conspicuous than 'love' in the OT, and looks beyond the covenant-bound. God's love breaks into grief, anger, wrath, threatening (the reaction of affection) against the faithless and wanton (Ps 17:7-11, Ps 78:18, Is 63:9, Am 3:1, etc.), it burns with jealousy, when its chosen are seduced into idolatry and vice—'a loathing of Israel's corruption reveals at once the purity of His nature and the zeal of His affection (Ex 20, Nu 26:1, Dt 29:18, Zep 1:4, Jer 4:14, etc.). For the same reason, there is in Him a 'jealousy over Zion,' etc., when His 'beloved' is injured or wronged (Zac 1:12, Jer 19:14, etc.). Adumbrate the inclusion of 'the nations' in the covenant; and Ps 100, 103(11-12) 145-15, Jon 4(1) reveal a universal and truly human love in J (cf. Lk 23:28, Tit 3:4).

(b) The love of Christians towards God and Christ is the heart's response to the Father's love exhibited in Christ (1 Jn 4:7). This is not spontaneous on man's part, but comes by knowing 'the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge' (Eph 3:16, Ro 15:6, Eph 2:19, 19:14-15, 15:17-19). Grateful and obedient love to God results from faith (wh. see: 'faith and love,' also faith, hope, love, are companions; 1 Co 13:1, 1 Th 1:3, Phil 3:1, etc.): in Jesus Christ, His Son, His Person recognized as the full representation of the mind of God (2 Co 4:4, Gal 5:6, Eph 5:1, Gal 2:20, Eph 2:19, 1:19, 1 Jn 4:14, 15:17-19). It is the 'fruit' and evidence of the Holy Spirit's indwelling, who is the Father's gift of love to His reconciled children (Gal 2:20, 1 Co 2:9, Ro 5, 1 Jn 4:14). 'Abba, Father!' was the cry of this new-born filial love (Ro 8:14, Gal 4:5), its antithesis is found in the 'love of the world,' of 'self,' 'pleasure,' 'money' (1 Jn 2:16, Ja 4:4, 2 Ti 3:2, Lk 16:14, Jn 13:35). Love towards God is the fundamental law of man's nature, broken by his transgression—a law proclaimed in compreheensive terms in the OT, recalled by Jesus and recognized by the true Israelites (Mt 22:37): the false professors of Judaism 'had not the love of God in them,' for indeed they 'had not known Him' or they would have received' His messenger, they would have 'loved' His Son (Lk 11:4, Jn 3:16-18). The world's radical hostility towards God shows itself in unbelief towards Christ, and consequent persecution of Christians (Jn 15:12-16, Ro 8:9, Gal 4:1, Jn 3:19). Love towards God (and Christ) renovates and purifies the heart, inspires a constant self-devotion, and makes the perfect vision of God the object of fervent anticipation (1 P 5:5, 8, 12, Eph 4:5, Col 3:12, 1 Jn 3:4, Rev 21 19, 1 Jn 4:12). To cherish this love to the Father is to live in the Son who has the same love, and to follow in His steps, with the certainty of arriving where He is (Jn 17:21, 15:13, 14, Eph 4:2-3). Thus one wins 'the crown of life' (Jas 1:12, Rev 2:10, Ro 5:13-21); hence the coupling of 'love and hope' (wh. see).

(c) If love to God is rekindled by the knowledge of God's love to man in Christ, this holds no less of man's love to man, to which most NT instances of the word refer. This was the matter of 'the second commandment' of Jesus, which is 'like unto the first and great commandment,' and is grounded equally with it upon creation and the true order of the world (Mt 22:31f.). Sin, brought in by 'the wicked one,' confounded this order, planting hate, lust, deceit, the destroyers of love and life, in human nature (Jn 8:44, 1 Jn 3:10); this whole evil brood Paul traces to wilful ignorance of God (Ro 1:21, Eph 4:18). In 'living down his life for us' Jesus Christ has laid the foundation of a new empire of love, a régime and fashion of life the opposite of that inaugurated by Cain (1 Jn 3:11f.; cf. 1 P 2:19f., 2 Co 5:17f., Eph 4:25f., Col 3:9f., Tit 3:5). The 'new commandment' is, after all, 'the old commandment which men had from the beginning' (1 Jn 2:7f.); God's Fatherly love manifest in the unstinted bounties of nature, which visit 'just and unjust' every day, dictates to His children love to 'enemies' and kindness to 'the evil' (Mt 5:44f.). 'The love of Christ,' reaffirming and immensely reinforcing the primal law, 'constrains us' to 'live no longer to ourselves but to the living God' (Ro 13:11-14); in living love for the Church and for humanity (Eph 5:25f., Mt 25:35-42, 1 Co 8:13f., Ro 13:1f., 1 Jn 3:18, Eph 3:15f., Col 1:12ff.). 'If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar' (1 Jn 2:22f.; cf. Tit 1:16); true love ever speaks in beneficent deed (Jas 1:27f., 1 Jn 3:17f.).

The terms of Christ's redemption bind Himself to human service; they have become both witnesses and engaged parties to God's covenant of grace in Christ made with mankind (Jn 1:16f., Mt 10:28f., Mk 16:15, Lk 24:47, Ac 1, Ro 5:2f., Col 1:1, 1 Jn 2:2, Rev 5f. etc.).

The gift of the Spirit is bestowed expressly with this world's aim in view; to 'sanctify', i.e. to make each sinner a sharer and an earnest of the world's salvation (Mt 22:13, 1 Jn 1:5, 1 P 2:11, Eph 3:18, Col 3:4).

The love of God must reach the world and rule the world through those who know it in 'knowing the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

G. C. Finlay.

LOVE FEAST (Agape).—The Love Feast of the Christian Church in Apostolic times was a common meal of which all the brethren partook, and was still connected with the Eucharist. The 'breaking of bread from the house' (Ac 2:46f.) was the love feast, and the love feast was the institution of the Eucharist. The scandalous behaviour, which St. Paul was constrained to rebuke at Corinth in a.d. 57-58 (1 Co 11:17-24), shows that not all who came to the Love Feast were in a fit condition to communicate. More serious evils still were introduced by false teachers described by Jude 8: 'they who are hidden rocks at your love feasts when they feast with you, shepherds who without fear feed themselves.' The writer is dependent upon 2 P 2:1: 'spots are they and blemishes, revelling in their love feasts while they feast with you.'

In spite of the disorders, which marred the religious value of these social club-feasts and led in the end to their suppression, they lasted for a considerable period. Ignatius of Antioch wrote to the Smyrneans (c. 8): 'It is not lawful apart from the bishop either to baptize or to hold a love feast,' in a context which proves that the Agape included the Eucharist. Tertullian (Ad Apoll. xxi, 36f.) gives a vivid description of the feast explained by its own name.

'The participants, before reclining, taste first of prayer to God. As much is eaten as satisfies the cravings of hunger: as much is drunk before the oblation. They say it is good to those who remember that even during the night they have to worship God; they talk as those who know that the Lord is one of their auditors. After manual ablution and the bringing in of lights, each is asked to stand forth and sing, as he can, a hymn to God, either one from the Holy Scriptures or of his own composing. This is a proof of our drinking. As the feast commenced with prayer, so it is closed with prayer.'

The food consists of bread, fish, and vegetables. The pictures of the Love Feasts in the catacombs give a prominent place. Interesting specimens of prayers used at them are found in the Didache. The direction to give to the 'beloved one,' 'after ye are satisfied,' plainly associates the prayer with the Love Feast rather than the Eucharist (c. 10):

'We give thee thanks, Holy Father, for Thy Holy Name which Thou hast made to be manifest in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality, which Thou hast made known unto us through Thy Servant Jesus; this is the reason why we say thanks to Thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through Thy Servant...' etc.

The separation of the Love Feast from the Eucharist seems to have been due, in the first instance, to the action of the Roman Government, always jealous of secret societies. Pliny's letter to Trajan speaks of the celebration of the Eucharist in the early morning as followed by a simple meal, which had been left off. On the other hand, fear of calumnies regarding any more or less secret feast, and experience of disorders like those which prevailed at Corinth, were motives which from time to time hindered the practice in certain districts, and finally extinguished it.

LOVINGKINDNESS.—Two ideas are blended in this expressive word; it denotes kindness which springs from the loyalty of love. It is the frequent tr. (30 times in AV, 42 times in the RV) of the Heb. word chesed, which M. A. Smith renders 'loving-kindness' (Book of the Twelve Prophets, 1, 243 n). The RV most frequently tr. cheseth 'mercy,' and not seldom 'kindness.' The Amer. RV gives 'loving-kindness' uniformly when the reference is to God's love to man. The adoption of this helpful suggestion would bring out the connexion between 'loving-kindness' as a fundamental attribute of the Divine nature (Ex 34:6 etc.), its poetic personification (Ps 42:7 89:4), and the appeal to God to be true to Himself,—to save and to redeem 'for His loving-kindness' sake' (Ps 6 44:115f.). For the combination of 'loving-kindness' with 'faithfulness' see Ps 58, where each word occurs seven times. La 2:31, is 55. Cf. also LOVE.

LUBIM.—The name of a people, standing in EV for the Libyans in Nah 3:9, 2 Ch 12:16, and replaced by the word 'Libyans' itself in Dn 11:44. These were a very ancient people living west of Egypt, who were subdued by the Egyptians at an early date and long furnished mercenaries soldiers to their armies. At length they invaded Egypt, subdued it in the 10th cent. n.c., and established a powerful dynasty, of which the Biblical Sihak was the founder. Probably Lubit should be read for Lubim (wh. see) in certain passages. Cf. LEMHIM.

LUCIFER.—In Is 14:12 occurs the phrase 'hēlēth (hēlāth) ben shachar,' commonly but incorrectly rendered 'Lucifer son of the morning,' as if the expression hēlēth (hēlāth) must mean 'the morning-star' (cf. RV and RV 'day-star'). In this connexion, hēlēth (hēlāth) can denote only the waning of some luminary, as it is forcibly compared with the impending fate of the then king of Babylon, whose utter destruction the writer foretells in foretelling. The waning luminary intended by the author may probably have been only the old moon crescent seen at dawn, just about to disappear. It

LUKE. LUCIUS. — 1. A consul of the Romans (1 Mac 15:28), who transmitted the decree of the senate in favour of the Jews. Probably the reference is to Lucius Calpurnius Piso, consul in B.C. 139. 2. Of Cyrene, one of certain prophets and teachers at Antioch in Syria, mentioned in Acts 13:1, to whom it was revealed that Paul and Barnabas should be separated for the work to which they had been called. The suggestion that he was the same person as St. Luke, the Evangelist, has nothing to support it. 3. Mentioned in Ro 16:22, as sending greetings to the brethren at Rome. Possibly the same person as 2, but of this there is no certain proof.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

LUKE.—The Eng. word ‘luke’ is in AV always qualified by the adj. ‘filthy,’ because the word itself had not then the offensive meaning it has now. Erasmus says of the word: ‘Glopp may have been a corruption into the Latin, and encrease of godlymess.’ It simply meant gain. Filthy luke means sordid gain.

LUD, LUDM. — Usually supposed to stand for the country and people of Lydia (wh. see). In Gn 10:7 (1 Ch 1:11) Lud is named as one of the ‘sons’ of Cush, along with the well-known Elam, Asshur, and Aram, and the uncertain Arphaxad. In this list the Elamites at least are not Semitic, but are regarded as such by reason of association with the Babylonians. In a similar way the Lydians may be associated here with the Semitic Assyrians, whose rule once extended to the borders of the Lydian empire. No better explanation has been given, and they are at any rate an Asiatic people.

On the other hand, Ludim is given as the name of one of the descendants of Mizraim (Egypt) in Gn 10:7 (1 Ch 1:11) in a list of peoples all undoubtedly African. Here there can be no question of Asiatic Lydians, and experts are divided as to whether an unknown African people is referred to, or whether we are to read Lubim (wh. see). This reading would suit equally well Jer 46:9, and even the singular form Luid might with advantage be emended into Luid in Ezk 27:20; 20:6; 16:16; 36:14; 40:13; 41:14; 44:14; 55:7; 56:10; 60:12; 64:12; 65:12; 66:12.

LUBITH.—The ascent of ‘Lubith’ (Is 19:20) is probably the path called the ‘descent or going down of Pekah,’ and the latter lying, probably, higher than Lubith (cf. Jer 46:9). The way leading through Wady Bene Hammâd, from the district of Zoar to the eastern plateau, may be intended. The Onomasticon places Lubith between Areopollis and Zoar. It is not now known.

W. EWING.

LUKE (EVANGELIST).—Luke, a companion of St. Paul, is mentioned in Col 4:10, Philem 24, 2 Tim 4:21, in all three places in connexion with Mark. He is generally believed to be the author of the Third Gospel and Acts, and therefore a frequent fellow-traveller with the Apostle of the Gentiles. (See Acts. A. T. OF THE APOSTLES for proofs, and for his place of origin.) He has been identified, but without probability, with Lucius of Cyrene (Ac 13:19). He may have been a companion of St. Paul, possibly at Tarsus, where he could have studied medicine. Tertullian calls St. Paul his ‘illuminator’ and ‘master’ (adv. Marc. iv. 2), which perhaps has this meaning; but it may be a mere conjecture. Luke joined St. Paul on his Second Missionary Journey, apparently for the first time, at Troas. He was not an eye-witness of the Gospel events (Lk 10:1), but had ample means of getting information from those who were present (cf. Col 4:10, and v. 9). Thus he could not have been of the Seventy, or the companion of Cleophas (Lk 24:13), as some have thought. He was a doctor (Col 4:10), and perhaps had attended to St. Paul in his illnesses. A tradition, perhaps of the 6th cent., makes him a painter, who had made a picture of the Virgin. He was possibly of servile origin; his name, which seems to be an abbreviation of Lucanus, Lucius, Lucullus, or Lucilus, may well have been a slave's name; and physicians were often slaves. Chrysostom and Jerome take him for ‘the brother whose praise in the gospel’ is spread abroad (2 Co 8:9; see art. Gospel). Other traditions connect him with Achaeus, Barnabas, or Alexander, who assigns to him a martyr’s crown.

A. J. MACLEAN.

LUKE. GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—1. The Third Gospel in the Early Church. — Of 2nd cent. writers the following can without doubt be said of Luke: Gospel or to imply its previous composition: Justin Martyr (c. 160 A.D.), who gives particulars found in Lk. only; Tatian, his pupil, who included it in his harmony (the so-called ‘Catholic’); as against the hypothesis that Lk. is later than, and an expansion of, Marcion, as the Tubingen school maintained—from the evidence of Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius; from the exact similarity of style between the passages in the Gospels in Marcion and those which are; and for other reasons; the Valentinians; and Heracleon, who wrote a commentary upon it. The first writers who name Luke in connexion with it are Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria—all at the end of the 2nd century.

If we go back earlier than any of the writers named above, we note that Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and the Didache writer place Lk. but we cannot be certain if their quotations are from Mt. or from Lk. or from some third document now lost, or even from oral tradition. Yet Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Tertullian, and Polycarp probably know Lk. and the title of the Didache seems to come from Ac 2:20, and this presupposes the circulation of Luke. It will be observed that the ecclesiastical testimony shows the existence of Lk. before the second quarter of the century, and we have not, as in the case of Mt. and Mk., any guidance from that early period as to the method of its composition or as to its author.

2. Contents of the Gospel. — The preface (1:1) and the Birth and Childhood narratives (1:5—2:21) are peculiar to the Luke. The Evangelist then follows Mk. (up to 6:4) as to the Baptist’s teaching and the early ministry, inserting, however, sections common to him and Mt. on the Baptist and on the Temptation, and also the genealogy, the miraculous draught of fishes, the anointing by the sinful woman, and some sayings (especially these at Nazareth) peculiar to himself. From 6:6 to 9:1 he entirely neglects Mk. The intervening portion contains part of the Sermon on the Mount (not in the order of Mt.), the message of the Baptist, and the healing of the centurion’s servant (so Mt.) and some fragments peculiar to himself, especially the raising of the widow’s son (so Mt.), but practically omits the section Mk 6:4—8:26 = Mt. 14:13—16:9. The Markan narrative, containing the rest of the Galilean ministry, the charge to the Twelve, the Transfiguration, etc., is in general repeated, nearly in the same order as Mk., but with some omissions, to 9:9 (Mt. 9:9), where a long insertion occurs (9:9—18:14). After this Luke takes up Mk. almost where he left it (Lk 18:10—

The intention deals largely with the Palestinian ministry and the journeys towards Jerusalem, and contains many parables peculiar to Lk (the Good Samaritan, the Unfortuniate Friend, the Rich Fool, the Lost Son, Lost Sheep, and Lost Piece of Silver, the Prodigal Son, the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Ten Lepers, the Unjust Judge, the Pharisee and the Publican), and also several incidents and sayings peculiar to Lk., e.g., the Mission of the Seventy; this section also has portions of the Sermon on the Mount and some parables and sayings common to Mt. and Lk., a few also which are found in other parts of Mk. From 18:1 to the end the Markan narrative is followed (from 18:1 to 22:11 very closely) with few omissions, but with some insertions, e.g., the parable of the Pounds, the narrative of Zachaeus, of the Penitent Robber, of the two disciples on the Emmaus road, and other incidents peculiar to Lk. In the Passion and Resurrection narrative Luke has treated Mk. very freely, adding to it largely, and in several cases following other sources in preference.

3. The Sources.—The preface (1–4), the only counterpart of the introduction in the other Evangelists, was written, tells us that the Evangelist knew of written Evangelistic narratives, and had access to eye-witnesses, though he himself had not seen the events which he describes. The sources (documents) which were the preceding section will lead us to name two (see also art. Gospels), namely the 'PETRINE TRADITION' (see art. Mark [Gospel acc. ro]), which is our Mk. or else something on which it is, and which the First Evangelist also used; and another, which is often called the 'Logia,’ but which is safer to call the 'non-Markan document,' which is a common source of Mt. and Lk., but which is now lost (see art. Matthew [Gospel acc. ro]). In the use of the latter the order of Lk. differs greatly from that of Mt., and the question arises which of the two Evangelists has followed this source the more closely. Now we have seen (§ 2) that Luke has followed the order of his Markan source very closely; it is therefore probable that he did the same with the 'non-Markan document.' We may then presume that the order of the latter is more faithfully represented in Lk. than in Mt. With regard to the sections peculiar to Lk. we must probably separate 19:2–24 from the rest. This section has a strong Aramaic tinge; it is an 'episode of family history of the most private character' (Ramsay); it is told from the viewpoint of a woman, and is full of womanly touches; it represents the Mary side of the story, while the narrative in Mt. represents the Joseph side. It is therefore highly probable that the ultimate, and not the immediate, source was the Virgin Mother, and that the story had not passed through many hands. Some postulate an Aramaic written source for this section (Plummer). But it is by no means certain that Luke the Gentile understood Aramaic; and the character of the narrative rather points to an oral source (Ramsay). The introduction of the Aramaic style (which begins abruptly at 18:6 after the very Greek preface) may probably be ascribed to the author’s part, due to a diligent study of the LXX. For the rest of the matter peculiar to Lk., it is usual, perhaps rightly, to assume a special source, oral or written; but it must be observed that the silence of Mt. does not negative this supposition that much or most of this matter was contained in the ‘non-Markan document.’ Silence does not necessarily mean ignorance.

Assuming now (see § 2) that the author was Luke, Paul’s companion, we can see at once that he was in a position to gather together not only written materials, but also first-hand oral reports. The two years at Caesarea (Ac 24:1) would give him good opportunities for collecting materials both for the Gospel and for Acts. Mary may well have been alive at the time (e.g., 57: 1–34); or at least Luke may have met several of the women best known to her. And both in Palestine at this time and later at Rome, he would have direct access to Apostolic information; in the former case, of several of the Twelve; in the latter, of St. Peter. At Rome he would probably read the written ‘PETRINE tradition,’ his Markan source.

We must notice that Lk. is not the Pauline Gospel in the same sense that Mk. is the Petrine and St. Paul’s ‘source’ as St. Peter was; and indeed the preface to Lk. contradicts such an idea. Yet the Pauline influence on Lk. is very great, not only in his language. Many words and phrases are peculiar in NT to Luke and Paul. Among other topics insisted on by both may be mentioned the universality of the Gospel (Lk. 39: 1–4; p. 583: 13: 26 et al.).

As a detail in the consideration of the treatment of his sources by Lk., we may notice the Lord’s Prayer, which is much shorter in Lk. than in Mt. (see RV). Does this mean that the Prayer was delivered twice, in two different forms, while Luke abbreviated the original, or that Matthew enlarged it? The first hypothesis is a priori quite probable, but if we have to choose between the two, the presence of the Lukan phrase ‘by day’ (11: 2–4, not elsewhere in NT), and of others which seem to be simplifications (as ‘we forgive,’ for ‘have forgiven,’ or ‘sins’ for ‘debts,’ points to the Matthew prayer being the original. But it is difficult to believe that either Evangelist would deliberately alter the Lord’s Prayer for the sake of brevity and of employing transcriptions which are not found in his sources; the case is not parallel with other alterations. If we hold the Prayer to have been given only once, the most probable explanation of the differences seem to be, that our Lord not having laid down fixed rules for worship, but only general principles, the first Christians did not feel bound to use it, or did not know. His spoken words; hence the liturgical usage with regard to the Prayer would vary. The first and Third Evangelists might well incorporate in their Gospels forms to which they were accustomed in worship. We must not forget also that as originally delivered the Prayer was, doubtless, in Aramaic, and so in any case we have not Jesus’ prayer.

4. The writer’s style and interests.—The Third Evangelist is at once the most literary and the most versatile of the four. The sudden change from a classical to an Aramaic style at 18:6 has been noticed in § 3; when the writer is working on the ‘PETRINE tradition,’ and the ‘non-Markan document,’ the Aramaic tinge is much less marked. The same thing is seen in Acts, where the writer is working on the Lord’s Prayer, and the ‘non-Markan document,’ the Aramaic tinge is much less marked. The same thing is seen in Acts, where the writer is working on the Lord’s Prayer, and the ‘non-Markan document,’ the Aramaic tinge is much less marked. The same thing is seen in Acts, where the writer is working on the Lord’s Prayer, and the ‘non-Markan document,’ the Aramaic tinge is much less marked.

5. Authorship and date.—(a) The Third Gospel and Acts have the same author. Both books are addressed to the same person, Theophilus; the style of both is identical, not only in broad features, but in detail
LUKE, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

(see § 4), and Ac 11 refers to a "former" (or 'first') treatise. Thus, if the author is not the same in both cases, the later writer has deliberately interwoven into his book the whole style of his predecessor, in a manner that absolutely defies detection. That this should have happened is a gross improbability. (5) We have no evidence that Luke was a Christian before Irenæus, who names Luke (§ 1). But the internal evidence of Acts is very strong that the writer was Luke, the companion of St. Paul (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES). We must therefore conclude either that the author was Luke, or that he wished to pass for him. The latter hypothesis is maintained by some on the ground that the writer is indebted to Josephus, who wrote his Antiquitates a.d. 94. It may be that this is an active, but it is extremely improbable that he had ever read Josephus. The crucial cases are those of the taxing in Lk 2 and of Theudas in Ac 5, discussed in § 7 below, and in art. Taxeins, where dependence is shown to be most unlikely (see also art. EGYPTIAN TRADITION). Other things point to an absence of literal connexion: e.g., Acts describes Agrippa's death quite independently of Josephus. The argument from language, on the other hand, sorely deserves serious results, as the common use of the LXX among most of the resemblances (see, further, Plummer, St. Luke, p. xxx); the connexion between Lk. and Josephus is denied by Schürer, Harnack, Zahn, and by most English writers, on the reasons, then, which are stated. Acts of the APOSTLES, we conclude that Luke was the author. It may be added that it is difficult to conceive any reason which the author, if not Luke, could have to adopt this procedure. Luke was not sufficiently well known for a forger to use his name.

(b) Date.—For the reasons just stated we must probably choose a date immediately after Ac 28 (Blass, Headlam, Salmon, etc.), or else between a.c. 7 and 80 (Sanday, Plummer, Ramsay, etc.). To the present writer the earlier date for Acts, and therefore for Lk., seems on the whole more likely (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, and this problem). Probably it is not disturbed by Lk. 11, where the chief passages added for the later date. Sanday and Plummer think that the earlier date does not allow enough time for drawing up the narrative spoken of in 11; but it is not obvious why written Gospels should not have been composed at an earlier stage. The passage in 21, where 'Jerusalem compassed with armies' replaces 'the abomination of desolation' of Mk 13, is said to betoken a date later than the destruction of Jerusalem, and to describe what had actually happened. But if the change be due to Luke, it is just what we should expect—a Hebraism interpreted for Gentile readers (see § 6); in any case it scarcely goes further than Dn 9. Sir J. Hawkins (Horae Synoptica) thinks that there must have been a considerable interval between Lk. and Acts. The whole question of date is far from certain.

6. Purpose of the Gospel.—St. Luke clearly writes for the Gentiles, being a Gentile himself (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 2), and undertakes his task because the works of his predecessors were incomplete,—probably as not beginning with our Lord's birth,—and because he was in possession of good information. He writes to Theophilus, by Origae and Ambrose to be an imaginary Christian, but more probably a real person, perhaps, as Ramsay deduces from the epitome 'most excellent' (Lk 1), a Roman citizen of rank (this is denied by Blass and Plummer). He has also in view, however, other Gentile converts. He explains Jewish customs (22), substitutes Greek names for Hebrew ('Zeolea' for 'Onanassæus' 64, Ac 11, 'the Skull' for God's 'Mastery' for 'hostile fifteen'), is sparing of OT quotations and of references to prophecy, uses 'Judaea' for the whole of Palestine (1 72 23, Ac 2 108 118; but in Lk 4th RVm and Ac 11 the more restricted sense is probable), and insists on the universality of the Gospel (see § 3). An interesting detail which shows the readers to whom the book is addressed is pointed out by Sir Wm. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 63). In 5 Luke leaves the description of the breaking up of the mud roof of the house in which the paralytic was let down (Mk 2)—a description which would be unintelligible to a Western—and speaks of the man being let down through the 'tiles'.

7. Accuracy of Luke.—Very different estimates have been made as to the trustworthiness of Luke as a historian. He is the only Evangelist who connects his narrative with contemporary events in the world at large (21), 98, 118, 124, 234, etc., and as strongly defended by others. The former fix especially on two points: (a) Gamaliel's speech about the ephodus (Ac 5 41) is said to be absolutely unhistorical, and to be an invention of the writer, who had read and misread Josephus (see § 5 and art. THEODORUS). (b) The reference to the enrolment (LV telling) in Lk 2 4 is said to be also unhistorical. It is objected that Augustus did not order a general enrolment, that he did, the order did not apply to Herod's kingdom, and that, even if it did so, there was no reason why Joseph and Mary should have been in Bethlehem, of which it is supposed that Augustus had made Judea till a.d. 6-7, when Quirinius was governor of Syria ('the census' Ac 5 9, Josephus); and that Quirinius was never governor of Syria in Herod's lifetime. Against this it is argued that Quirinius was a disappointed candidate for the command in Syria, and that Augustus used to be urged that Luke was accurate in particular, but that he made a mistake about Quirinius only. Now Luke does not say that a Roman census was in effect when Jesus was born; the enrolment is said by him to have been tribal and according to lineage, not according to the place where persons happened to be at the time, as was the Roman census. He says that his first information about the facts is given by the author of Romans, and that Augustus instituted the rule of enrolments for the Roman world—this is the force of the Greek phrase used. A remarkable confirmation of Lk. has recently been given by a discovery in Egypt of some papyri which show that periodic enrolments by households in a cycle of 14 years did as a matter of fact take place in that country. Many actual census papers, beginning a.d. 20, have been found. This fact is of great interest; in support of the view of Ramsay, in his fascinating work (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 1st ed. 1898), argues with much probability that the first enrolment in Syria was in B.C. 8, and that the 14 years' cycle was used. The second enrolment would be that of Ac 25, which led to great riots in Palestine, because the Roman system, so offensive to Jewish patriotism, was then first introduced. No such riots are said by Luke to have occurred at the census when Jesus was born. Ramsay gives reasons for thinking that this was because Herod, ruling a semi-independent kingdom, though he could not form fear of losing Augustus' favour for the census (this agrees with Josephus' account of his relations with Rome), yet conducted it in Jewish fashion, and postponed it for a year or two. This would give b.c. 6 (summer) for our Lord's birth. All this fits in well with Luke. The difficulty is that Quirinius alone remains. An inscription found at Thibilis makes it probable that he was for the second time governor of Syria a.d. 6-9. He was consul a.d. 12; and his former governorship must therefore have fallen between these dates. In a technical argument Ramsay urges that Quirinius, during a time of war, held in b.c. 6 a special office in Syria as the Emperor's deputy, with command of the forces, while another was civil governor; and that Luke's phrase (lit. 'while Quirinius was riving Syria') suits this state of affairs. This would completely vindicate Luke's accuracy. Cf. QUIRINIUS.

LYCIA was a mountainous country in the S.W. of Asia Minor, which played very little part in the early history of Christianity. In it were not many great cities, such as Patara (Ac 21:1) and Myra (Ac 27:1). The former was a celebrated seat of the worship of Apollo, the latter an important harbour, between which and Alexandria there was constant traffic in ancient times. Lycia was ruled by the Persians, and conquered by Alexander the Great. After his death it belonged to the Seleucid Empire, was then taken from Antiochus by the Romans in B.C. 188, and given to Rhodes at first, but afterwards freed in B.C. 168. It was one of the self-governing states, to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jews in B.C. 38–71 (Mac 15:29). See Galia, Delos. This proves that there were Jews there. Lycia was made a Roman province by Claudius in A.D. 45 on account of dissensions between its cities, and in A.D. 74 was formed into a double province along with Pamphylia.

LYCIA was the name for the central part of the coastland on the west of Asia Minor in ancient times, having been so called from the race which inhabited it, the Lydians. At the earliest time of which we have any knowledge it was a prosperous kingdom, and the name of the last king, Croesus, has become proverbial for wealth. The Persians seized the kingdom from him about B.C. 546 ('Lydia' in Ezek 30:7 AV is corrected to 'Lydia' in RV). Alexander the Great conquered it in B.C. 334. The possession of it was disputed by the Pergamenes and Selenici till B.C. 190, in which year it became definitely Pergamene (cf. 1 Mac 8:9). In B.C. 153 it passed by will with the rest of the Pergamene kingdom into the Roman Empire, and the whole kingdom was henceforth known as the province Asia, by which name alone it is indicated in the NT (see Asia). After the formation of this province, the term 'Lydia' had only an ethnological significance. The chief interest of Lydia for us is that it contained several very ancient and important great cities of the Ionian branch, Smyrna, Ephesus, Sardis, Colophon, etc., some of which were among the 'churches of Asia.' The evangelization of the country is connected with St. Paul's long residence in Ephesus (Ac 18:2). A. SOUTER.

LYDIA.—A seller of purple-dyed garments at Philippi, probably a widow and a 'proselyte of the Law' (Ac 16:14). When Paul made his first visit to that city, together with her household, and with whom he and his companions lodged (Ac 16:14, 15), she was of Thyatira in the district of Lydia, the w.central province of the province Asia, a district famed for its purple dyes; but was double-staying at Philippi for the purpose of her trade. She was apparently MAASEAS.—1. The translator of the Greek edition of Esther into Greek (Ad. Esai. Gxxv. 1), brother of the high priest Menelaus. He excited the hatred of the populace by his systematic plundering of the Temple treasures, and was finally killed in a riot (2 Mac. 45). —E. J. MACLEAN.

LYE.—See Nitre and Soap.

LYRE.—See Musical instruments, 4 (1). (2).

LYSANIAS.—This tetrarch of Abilene is mentioned only in Lk 3. St. Luke has been accused of gross inaccuracy here, and is said to be referring to a Lysanias who died n.c. 36. But that Lysanias was king (not tetrarch) of Chalcis (not Abilene). Josephus speaks of 'Abila of Lysanias' and of a tetrarchy of Lysanias; he is confirmed on the latter point by a medal and an inscription. Thus Luke's statement is made at least quite probable. Perhaps Lysanias was a dynastic name of the rulers of Abilene. Abila was the capital of Abilene, and lay on the N. side of Mount Hermon. See also ABILENE. —A. J. MACLEAN.

LYSIA.—1. A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, charged with a war of extermination against the Jews (1 Mac. 31.), cf. 2 Mac. 15); defeated at Bethana (1 Mac. 4.), after the death of Epiphanes he championed the cause of Eupator, and finally suffered death along with the latter at the hands of Demetrius (6). († 7, 2 Mac. 14), Cf. art. MACCABEES, § 2.

2. See next article.

LYSIA, CLAUDIUS.—A chilarch of a cohort in Jerusalem who rescued St. Paul from the Jews in the Temple and took him to the 'Castle,' the fortress Antonia which commanded the Temple. His second name shows him to have been a Greek, but he had bought the Roman citizenship (Ac 22) and taken the name Claudius. On account of a plot he sent St. Paul guarded to Felix at Caesarea, and wrote a letter of which the version in Ac 23, although doubtless only a paraphrase, yet clearly represents the true sense. It is just what we should expect from Lysias, being much more favourable to his course of action than the real facts warranted. (See art. Egyptian [Thee]). —A. J. MACLEAN.

LYTHIA.—1. The translator of the Greek edition of Esther into Greek (Ad. Esai. Gxxv. 1), brother of the high priest Menelaus. He excited the hatred of the populace by his systematic plundering of the Temple treasures, and was finally killed in a riot (2 Mac. 45). —E. J. MACLEAN.

LYSCIAS, CLAUDIUS.—A chilarch of a cohort in Jerusalem who rescued St. Paul from the Jews in the Temple and took him to the 'Castle,' the fortress Antonia which commanded the Temple. His second name shows him to have been a Greek, but he had bought the Roman citizenship (Ac 22) and taken the name Claudius. On account of a plot he sent St. Paul guarded to Felix at Caesarea, and wrote a letter of which the version in Ac 23, although doubtless only a paraphrase, yet clearly represents the true sense. It is just what we should expect from Lysias, being much more favourable to his course of action than the real facts warranted. (See art. Egyptian [Thee]). —A. J. MACLEAN.

LYSTRAS (modern Khotyn Sera).—A city situated about 13 miles S.S.W. of Iconium in the south of the Roman province Galatia and in the Lycaonian part of that province, connected with Ptolemaic Antioch by the direct military 'Imperial road,' which did not pass through Iconium (Ramsay in Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire, p. 241). Both Ptolemaic Antioch and Lystra were 'colonies' (see Colony) established by the Emperor Augustus in a.d. 6 to make the Roman occupation more effective, and the official language of these was Latin. Hardly any remains of the city exist above ground. No trace of the temple of Zeus-otherwise-known as the Temple of Zeus (Ac 14), has been found, but it is probable that a college of priests was attached to it. The sacrifice to Darnabas and Paul as Zeus and Hermes (or rather the national Lycaonian gods corresponding to these) took place at the entrance to it. The town appears not to have been much Grecized, and the uncultivated populace expressed themselves in Lycaonian.

There were two Lystra (Ac 16), but there was evidently no synagogue. Timothy was a native of Lystra, which was visited by St. Paul four times in all (Ac 14, 16, 18), and addressed by him in the Epistle to the Galatians. —A. SOUTHERN.

MAACA—1. A son of Nahor (Gen. 22). 2. The daughter of Talmai, wife of David, and mother of Absalom (2 S. 3, etc.). 3. The father of Achish, king of Gath (1 K. 2), possibly the same as MAACHO (1 S. 27). 4. Wife of Rebohoam, and mother of Abijah (2 Ch. 11). When she is called 'daughter' of Absalom (1 K. 15, 11), 'granddaughter' may be intended, as Absalom had but one daughter, Tamar, who may have married Uriel of Gibeah (2 Ch. 13, where the name is given as Micaiah; cf. Jos. Ant. vii. 1. 1). Maacah fell under the spell of loathsome idolatries, for which Asa deposed her from the position of queen-mother, which she appears to have held till then (1 K. 15, 2 Ch. 15). 5. A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch. 24). 6. Wife of Machir (1 Ch. 711). 7. Wife of Jedid, the father of Gideon (1 Ch. 89). 8. One of David's warriors, father of Hanan (1 Ch. 11). 9. Father of Shephatiah, the captain of the Simeonites (1 Ch. 27). —W. EWING.

MAACA.—A small kingdom out of which the Aramean (1 Ch. 19) inhabitants were not driven (Jos. 13). It probably lay in what is now known as the Jaud, E. of the Sea of Galilee and the Upper Jordan (Dt. 24, Jos. 12, 13), but its borders cannot now be determined. Its king and army were hired against David by the Ammonites, and shared their overthrow in the battle fought near Medeba (2 S. 10, 1 Ch. 19). The inhabitants were called Massathites (2 S. 23 etc.).

MAADAI.—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. 10), 1 Es. 9. Momidis.

MAADAH.—A priestly family which returned with Zerubabel (Neh 12); called in v. 17 Moadiah.

MAAL.—One of the sons of Asaph who took part in the dedication of the walls (Neh 12).

MAANI (1 Es. 5) = Mounin, Ezr. 24, Neh. 7.

MAARATH.—A town of Judah (Jos. 15). Possibly the name survives in Beit 'Ummar, west of Tekoa.

MAARGAEGEBA (AV 'the meadows of Gibeah,' RV 'the meadow of Geba').—The place from which the men placed in ambush rushed forth to attack the Benjamites (Jos. 20). There can be little doubt that it is the town mentioned in Ezech. 7 that is so named. (See also Gezher, Geba.)

MAASAI.—The name of a priestly family (1 Ch. 9).

MAASEAS.—The grandfather of Baruch (Bar. 1) = Mahseiah of Jer. 33, 51.
MAASEIAH.—1. A priest, of the sons of Jeshua, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:8 [1 Es 9th Mathæiæs]).
2. The son of Haman (Est 10:10); the text of Est 10:10 is confused. He committed the same offence (Est 10:10 [1 Es 9th Mænas]). Foreign wives had been taken also by 3, and 4.—A priest, of the sons of Pashhur (Ezr 10:9 [1 Es 9th Macæiæ]). And a layman, of the sons of Pahath-moab (v. 9 [1 Es 9th Mæoosias]).
5. A wall-builder (Neh 3:17). 6. One of those who stood upon the right hand of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8:1); called in 1 Es 9th Baasæamus.
7. One of those who expounded the Law to the people (Neh 8:1); called in 1 Es 9th Maaæamias. He is perhaps the same as the preceding.
8. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:9). A Judæite (Neh 11:1); in 1 Ch 9th Asaiah.
9. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 9th).
10. A priest in the time of Zedekiah (2 K. 21:26)
11. Three priests (2 K. 21:3).
13. Governor of Jerusalem under Josiah (2 Ch 34:20). In the ambassadours to Rome asking for assistance, which was granted to the extent that the Senate sent word to Demetrius I. to desist from fighting the Jews, the allies of the Romans. This international policy of Judas displeased the 'Pious,' who deserted him; and before the message of the Senate could reach Demetrius, Judas had been defeated by the Syrian general Baccicides, at Eliasa, and killed (1 Mac 3:49).
14. Demetrius I. (B.C. 164–143) undertook the leadership of the revolt, only to suffer serious defeat east of the Jordan, where he had gone to avenge the killing of his brother John by the 'sons of Jambrit.' For a time it seemed as if Syria would establish control over the country. The high priest Alcimus died, and Baccicides, believing the subjection of Judæa complete, returned to Syria (n.c. 160). The land, however, was not at peace, and in the interest of Baccicides gave Jonathan the right to maintain an armed force at Michmas. The fortunes of the Macabeean house now rose steadily. As a sort of licensed revolutionist, Jonathan was sought as an ally by the two rivals for the Syrian throne, Alexander Balas and Demetrius I. Each made him extravagant offers, but Jonathan preferred Alexander Balas; and when the latter defeated his rival, Jonathan found himself a high priest, a prince of Syria, and military and civil governor of Judæa (n.c. 150). When Alexander Balas was conquered by Demetrius II., Jonathan laid siege to the little rebel fortress held by him in the interest of Baccicides, which was still in the hands of the Syrenians. Demetrius II. did not find himself strong enough to punish the Jews, but apparently bought off the siege by adding to Judæa three sections of Samaria, and granting remission of tribute. Jonathan thereupon became a supporter of Demetrius II., and furnished him auxiliary troops at critical times. Thanks to the disturbance in the Syrian Empire, Jonathan conquered various cities in the Maritime Plain and to the south of Judæa, re-established treaties with Rome and Sparta, and strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, cutting off the Syrian garrison with a high wall. Joppa was garrisoned and various strategic points throughout Judæa fortified. This steady advance towards independence was checked, however, by the treacherous seizure of Jonathan by Trypho, the guardian and commanding general of the young Antiochus v., whom he had previously driven into exile (1 Mac 135).
15. Simon (n.c. 143–135), another son of Mattathias, succeeded Jonathan when the affairs of the State were in a critical position. A man of extraordinary ability, he was so successful in diplomacy as seldom to be compelled to carry on war. It was greatly to his advantage that the Syrian State was torn by the struggles between the aspirants to the throne. Simon's first step was to make the recognition of the independence of Judea a condition of an alliance with Demetrius II. The need of that was too great to warrant a refusal. Simon’s hard terms, and the political independence of Judea was achieved (c. 142–141). In May 142 Simon was able to seize the citadel, and in September the assembly of priests and people, and prince of the people, and elders of the land, he was elected to be high priest and military commander and civil governor of the Jews, ‘for ever until there should arise a faithful prophet.’ That is to say, the high-priestly office became hereditary in Simon’s family. Following the policy of his house, Simon re-established the treaty with Rome, although he became involved in a strenuous struggle with Syria, in which the Syrian general was defeated by his son, John Hyrcanus. Like his brothers, however, Simon met a violent death, being killed by his son-in-law at a banquet (1 Mac 13–16). 6. John Hyrcanus (c. 158–105). Under this son of high priest, Alexander the Great reached its greatest prosperity. Josephus describes him as high priest, king, and prophet, but strangely enough the records of his reign are scanty. At the opening of his reign, John was in his thirties, he was of his father and uncle, was critical. Antiochus v. (Sidetes), the large and zealous king of Syria, for a short time threatened to reduce and to impose political control on him, and he marched against Jerusalem and starved it into surrender. For some reason, however, the king was probably because of theconference of the Romans he did not destroy the city, but, exacting severe terms, he left it under the control of Hyrcanus. Antiochus was presently known as a friend of the Pharisees, and was succeeded by the weak Demetrius ii., who had been released from imprisonment by the same nation. John Hyrcanus feared this time onwards paid small attention to political power, and began a career of conquest of the territory on both sides of the Jordan and in Samaria. The affairs of Syria going ever more desperate under the succession of feeble kings, John ceased payment of the tribute which had been exacted by Antiochus, and established a brilliant court, issuing coins as high priest and head of the Congregation of the Jews. He did not, however, take the title of ‘king.’ His long reign was marked by a break with the Pharisees, and the successions of all the priests, traditional party of the government, and the establishment of friendship with the Sadducees, thereby fixing the high priestly office of all the perquisites of that party. ‘He died in peace, bequeathing to his family a well-rounded out territory and an independent government (Jos. Ant. xiii. viii.). 7. Aristobulus i. (c. 105–104). According to the will of John Hyrcanus, the government was placed in his widow’s hands, while the high priestship was given to the eldest of his five sons, Aristobulus. The latter, however, put his mother in prison, where she starved to death, establish himself as high priest and as joint-regent with his three brothers into prison. In a short time, urged on by popular feeling, his brother Aristobulus killed, and he himself took the title of ‘king.’ Of his short reign we know little except that he was regarded as a friend of the Greeks, and crowned and circumcised the Hasmonean, who probably lived in Galilea. At this time the final Judaizing of Galilee began (Jos. Ant. xiii. xi.; B. j. i. iii.). 7. Alexander Janneus (c. 104–78). After the death of Aristobulus, his widow Alexandra (Salome) released the three brothers from prison, and married the oldest of them, Alexander Janneus (or Jonathan), making him king and high priest. He was a great warrior, but in his early campaigns was defeated by the Egyptians. Judea might then have become a province of Egypt had not the Jewess counsellors of Cheopis advised against the subjection of the land. The Egyptian army was driven out, and in Alexander Janneus was left in control of the country. His monarchical ambitions, however, aroused the hostility of the Pharisees, and Janneus was rent by the war. After six years the war was ended by a treaty that 50,000 Jews perished. The Pharisees asked aid from Demetrius iii., and succeeded in defeating Alexander. However, feeling that the time was ripe again for annexation to Syria, many of the Jews went over to Alexander and assisted him in putting down the rebellion. In 75 Alexander Janneus was killed, and it is marked by a series of terrible punishments inflicted upon those who had rebelled against him. During the latter part of his reign he was engaged in a struggle with the cities of Palestine, in the siege of one of which he died, besieging his kingdom to his wife Alexandra, with the advice that she should make friends with the Pharisees (Jos. Ant. xiii. xi.; B. j. i. iv.). 8. Alexandra (c. 78–69) was a woman of extraordinary ability and personal propriety, according to the Pharisees, whose leaders were her chief advisers. She maintained the general foreign policy of her husband, surrendering her kingdom again to Rome, but particularly devoted herself, under the guidance of her brother Simon ben-Shetach, to the inner development of her nation. She was an Idumean of boundless ambition and much experience. She undertook to replace Hyrcanus on the throne, with the consent of Alexandria. With the aid of her friends, she organized an army and besieged Aristobulus in the Temple Mount. As the war was proceeding, Pompey sent Scourers to Syria (c. 69). Scourers promised her advantage of the struggle between the two brothers. But when she reached Judaea, however, both Aristobulus and Hyrcanus referred their quarrel to him. Scourers favored Aristobulus, and ordered Arctas to return to Arabia. This decision, however, did not end the controversy between the brothers, and they appealed to Pompey himself, who sometime had arrived at Damascus. The two brothers pleader their cause, as did also an emissary of the Jewish people which asked that the monarchy be abolished, and the government by the high priest re-established. Pompey deferred his decision, and ordered the brothers to return to Judea. After this Pompey proceeded to Syria. Alexandria, a fortress on the Samaritan hills, above the Jordan Valley. At the command of Pompey he surrendered the fortress, but fled to Jerusalem, where he prepared to stand a siege. Pompey followed him, and Aristobulus promised to surrender. In fact, however, Gabinius, the Roman general, went to take possession of the city, he found the gates closed against him. Thereupon Pompey proceeded to besiege the city. The various divisions of Jerusalem surrendered to him except the Temple Mount. This was captured after a long siege, and at terrible cost (c. 63). Pompey went through the town, and burned many of the buildings, but did not touch the Temple treasures. He did, however, make Judea tributary to Rome and greatly reduced its territory. Aristobulus was taken prisoner, and Hyrcanus was re-established as high priest, but without the title of ‘king.’ Great numbers of Judea were taken by Pompey to Rome at this time, together with Aristobulus, and became the nucleus of the Jewish community in the capital. With this conquest of Pompey, the Maccabean State really came to an end; and Judaea became tributary to Rome (Jos. Ant. xiv. i.–iv.)....

tetrarchs of the country of the Jews. Antigonus, however, the second son of Aristobulus, with the assistance of the Parthians and the Phœnicians, compelled Herod to flee, and seized the State. Hyrcanus was carried away prisoner by the Parthians, and his ears were cut off, so that he could no longer act as high priest.

After Herod had been made king, Hyrcanus was brought before him, but died a short time after of the various intrigues against Herod, who had married Hyrcanus' grand-daughter Mariamme. As a result, Herod had him executed (Jos. Antiq., 9. v. xii., 11; B. J. i. vii. xiii.).

11. Alexander, the elder son of Aristobulus II., who escaped from Pompey on the journey to Rome, collected an army and headed an insurrection in Judea (b.c. 37). He was finally defeated, and later during the civil wars was beheaded by order of Pompey as a friend of Caesar.

12. Antigonus, with his father Aristobulus, escaped from Rome, returned to Judea, and continued to live at Machærus, but after two years' siege was compelled to surrender, and went again as prisoner to Rome, where he was poisoned (b.c. 40), just as he was setting out to the East to assist Caesar. Antigonus in b.c. 47 attempted unsuccessfully to induce Cæsar to establish him as king of Judea in place of Hyrcanus and Antipater. After the death of Cæsar and during the second triumvirate, Antigonus attempted to gain the throne of Judea with the support of the Parthians in 40-37, maintained Judea with the title of 'king and high priest.' At the end of that period, however, Herod I., who had been appointed king by the Parthians, conquered Antigonus with the assistance of Rome. Antigonus was beheaded (b.c. 37) by Antony at the request of Herod (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 167; B. J. iv. xviii. 3).

13. Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus II., married her cousin Alexander, son of Aristobulus II. She was a woman of great ability, and as the mother of Mariamme, wife of Herod I., was an object of bitter hatred on the part of Herod's sister Salome. She was executed by Herod in b.c. 28.

14. Aristobulus III., son of Alexander and Alexandra, became a member of the household of Herod after the latter's marriage with Mariamme. Like all Hasmoneans, he was possessed of great personal beauty, and was a favourite with the people. At the request of his sister he was made high priest by Herod (b.c. 35). On account of his popularity, Herod had him drowned while he was bathing at Jericho, in the same year, when he had reached the age of seventeen.

15. Mariamme, daughter of Alexander and Alexandra, was reputed to be one of the most beautiful women of the time. She became the wife of Herod, who loved her so greatly, even to madness, however, by the annals and reports of his sister Salome, Herod had her executed in b.c. 29.

Although the direct line of Hasmoneans was thus wiped out by Herod, the family was perpetuated in the sons of Herod himself—Mariamme—Alexander and Aristobulus. Both these sons, indeed, Herod caused to be executed because of alleged conspiracies against him, but the Maccabees lived in the person of Hyrcanus and Agrippa I. and II. (see Herod). MACEDONIA.—The Macedonians were a part of the Hellenic race who settled early in history in the region round the river Axios at the N.W. corner of the Aegean. When they first came into Greek politics they had dominion from the mountains N. of Thessaly to the river Strymon, except where the Greek colonies of the peninsula of Chalcidice kept them back. Their race was probably much mixed with Illyrian and Thracian elements; they did not advance in culture with Southern Greece, but kept their primitive government under a king, and were regarded by the Greeks as aliens. Down to the time of Philip (b.c. 359) they played a minor part as allies of various Greek cities having interests in the N. Aegean. Under Philip, through his organization of an army and his diplomatic skill, they became masters of Greece, and under his son Alexander conquered the East. The dynasties which they established in Syria and Egypt were Macedonian, but in the subsequent Hellenization of the East they took no larger part than other Greek races, and their original dominions remained a hardy and vigorous race. After several wars with Rome, Macedonia was divided into four separate districts with republican government, but it received the regular organization of a province in b.c. 146.

MACHPELAH

MACEDONIA was the scene of St. Paul's first work in Europe. See PHILIPPI, THERSSALONICA, BEREA. The province at that time included Thessaly, and stretched across to the Adriatic; but Philip, being governor of the province, and Thessalonica was also a "free city," with the right of appointing its own magistrates. The Via Egnatia ran across the province from Dyrrhachium to Neapolis, and St. Paul's journey was along this from Neapolis through Philippoi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, to Thessalonica. A further visit is recorded in Ac 20:4, and the Pastoral Epistles imply another after his first imprisonment (I Th 19).

MACHÆRUS.—A place E. of the Dead Sea, fortified by Alexander Janneus, and greatly enlarged and strengthened by Herod the Great (Jos. B. J. vii. 1). According to Josephus, the daughter of Aretas retired to this place when she left the bigamous Antipas. He describes it as 'in the borders of the dominions of Aretas and Herod,' and then 'subject to her father' (Ant. xvii. v. 1). He goes on to say that here John was imprisoned and beheaded (Mt 14:12, etc.). If it was then subject to Aretas, this is at least curious. The fortress was one of the last taken by the Romans in the war of Independence (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 9, 56). It is identified with the ruin of Makhdeir, on the height about half-way between Wady Zerka Mâ'tân and Wady el-Mûdîb. W. EWING.

MACBANNAI.—A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:21).

MACBENA.—Named in the genealogical list of Judah (1 Ch 3:24). Machbena is probably the same as Gabban of Jos 15:20, which may perhaps be identified with Kubbeth, situated about 3 miles south of Beit Jórin.

MACFI.—The father of Geuel, the Gadite spy (Nu 13:28).

MACHIR.—1. The eldest son of Manasseh (Jos 17), the only son (Nu 26:29). Machir was also the 'father of the Gilead.' These names are ethnographic, and their use suggests that the Machirites were either conterminous with the tribe of Manasseh (ib. see) or were its most warlike part. Settled on the W. of Jordan, they invaded N. Gilead some time after the days of Deborah, and so became the 'father of the Gilead.' 2. Son of Ammuel of Lo-debar on the E. of Jordan. He clung to the house of Saul and longed for the venerated David's men when that king was fleeing from Absalom (2 S 9:1777). W. F. COX.

MACNADÉBAI.—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Eer 10).

MACHPELAH.—The name of a locality in which, according to the Frethei narrative of the Hexateuch, were situated a field and a cave purchased by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, to serve as a burial-place for himself and his family (Ga 23:18). Here Sarah was buried by her husband; and subsequently Abraham himself, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were laid to rest in the same spot (Ga 49). The appellation 'Machpelah,' which seems in strictness to designate the site comprehensively, is also applied to the actual field and the cave within it, which are respectively called 'the field of Machpelah' (Ga 23:19 20 30 50), and the 'cave of Machpelah' (Ga 23:25). The place is described as being 'before Mamre' (Ga 23:1), 'before' usually meaning 'east of' (see Ga 23, Jos 19, 1 K 11), just as behind signifies west of (Nu 34). Mamre in Ga 23 is identified with Hebron, which is the modern el-Khalil ('the Friend,' i.e. Abraham, cf. Je 41, Ja 29), a town built on the sides of a narrow valley, the main portion of which lies on the face of the E. slope. The traditional site of the cave of Machpelah is on the E. hill, so that it would appear that ancient Hebron was built MACRON—Surname of Ptolemy (1 Mac 3:1, 2 Mac 4:1), who was governor of Cyprus (2 Mac 10:8) and subsequently of Cilicia-Syria and Phoenicia (2 Mac 8:2).

MADAI (Gn 10:21=1 Ch 1:1).—See MEDES.

MADMANNAH.—A town in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15:23), named with Hormah and Ziklag. Its place is taken in Jos 10:16 etc., by Beth-marcaboth. No satisfactory identification has been suggested. Conder mentions Umm Damneh N. of Beersheba, but does not think it suitable. W. EWING.

MADMEN.—A place in Moab, which, if the MT be correct, has not been identified. The name occurs only in Jer 48 [Gr. 31]F, where there is a characteristic word-play: gam Madmēn tidiṯmē, also, O Madmen, thou shalt be brought to silence’ (LXX καὶ πασίν παυσατεῖτε). It is a very natural suggestion that the initial m of Madmen has arisen by dittography from the final m of the preceding word, and that for Madmen we should read Dimon (cf. Is 15:5), i.e. Dibon (cf. Jer 49:8). Cf. art. MADAB.

MADMENAH.—A place apparently north of Jerusalem, named only in the ideal description of the Assyrian invasion, Is 10:1. The name has not been recovered.

MADON.—A royal city of the Canaanites in the north (Jos 11:12.ForeignKey), Keriah Madin near Hazor might suit. If, however, Madon be a scribal error for Maron, then Meron, at the foot of Jebel Jerim, may be the place intended.

MAGadan.—See DÂLMANUHAH.

MAGBISH.—An unknown town, presumably in Benjamin, whose ‘children’ to the number of 156 are said to have returned from the Exile (Ezr 2:26); omitted in the parallel passage Neh 7:20, perhaps identical with Magphiash of Neh 10:24.

MAGdala, MAGdalenE.—See MARY, No. 3.

MAGDIEL.—A ‘duke’ of Edom (Gen 36:14=1 Ch 1:14).

MAGI.—The plural of magus, which occurs in Ac 13:1 (Gr. ‘sorcerer’—see RVm). Used as a plural word it denotes men of Magi (Mt 2:1; see the RVm at v.1). The subject of this article is twofold: (1) the elucidation of that narrative, and of one or two other Biblical references to the Magi; (2) the brief delineation of the religion connected with the Magi, in relation to the religious history of Israel. These two points need not be kept apart.

Herodotus tells us that the Magi formed one of six tribes or castes of the Medes. Since another of the six is expressly named as Assyrian, it seems as if the five named casting their eyes to the other five did not belong to the conquering race; and the Magi would accordingly be an aboriginal sacred caste, like the Brahmans in India. When Cambyses, the son of the great Cyrus, died, the Magi seem to have made an attempt to regain civil power, of which Cyrus and his Aryans had deprived them; and a Magian pretender Gaumata held the throne of Persia for some months, until dispossessed and slain by Darius in B.C. 522. There is reason to believe that the Magi, in the course of a generation or two, made a bid for spiritual power: they conformed to the religion of the conquerors, profoundly altering its character as they did so, and thus gained possession of their own sacred functions among their fellow-countrymen, who were predisposed to accept their re-introduction of the old beliefs under the forms of the new. We have but little evidence to guide us in re-constructing this primitive Median religion. The sacred caste itself appears to be mentioned in Jer 39:11 (see R.A.-MAG); and a ritual observance, preserved still in Parsi worship, figures in Ezk 8:17, from which we gather that this worship, accompanied with the holding of the barasom (‘bunch of five tamarisk boughs,’ as the geographer Strabo defines it) to the face, was a characteristic of Magian ritual before it was grafted on to Persian.

There are three special characteristics of Magianism proper which never obtained any real hold upon the religion with which the Magi subsequently identified themselves: (1) astralism, (2) necromancy, or divination by dreams, and (3) magia, which was traditionally associated with their name, but was expressly forbidden by the religion of the Persians. The first two of these features appear in the narrative of the Nativity. We have evidence that the Magi connected with the stars the fravashti or ‘double’ which Parsi psychology assigned to every good man—a part of his personality dwelling in heaven, sharing his developmental and united with his soul; and that this brilliant new star would thus be regarded by them as the heavenly counterpart of a great man newly born. That dreams guided the Magi at one point of their journey is expressly stated (Mt 2:12); and the postulate similar direction in the initial interpretation of the star.

There is, of course, nothing in this to convince those who have decided that the narrative of the Magi is legendary; nor is this the place to examine difficulties that remain (see STARS OF THE MAGI). But it may at least be asserted that the story has curiously subtle points of contact with what we can re-construct of the history of Magian religion; and the invention of all this perhaps involves as many difficulties as can be recognized in the acceptance of the narrative as it stands.

The doctrine of the fravashti, just now referred to, may be paralleled rather closely in the Bible; and it is at least possible that the knowledge of this dogma, as prevailing in Media, may have stimulated the growth of the corresponding idea among post-exilic Jews. When in Mt 19:1 Jesus declares that the angels of the little ones are in heaven dwelling in the midst of the Father, it is clear that this interpretation is that which recognizes these angels as a part of the personality, dwelling in heaven, but sharing the fortunes of the counterpart on earth. This gives a clear reason why the angels of the captivity should be perpetually in the Presence—they represent those who have not yet attained. So again in Ac 12:14 Peter’s ‘angel’ is presumably his heavenly ‘double.’ The concept was apparently extended to the heavenly representatives of communities, as the ‘princes’ of Israel, Greece, and Persia in Dn 10 and 12, and the 'angels' of the churches of Asia in Rev 2 and 3. If this doctrine really owed anything to the stimulus of Maimanism, it is in line with other features of later Jewish angelology. It is only the naming and ranking of angels, and the symmetrical framing of corresponding 'harmings' De, art. 'Immortal angels.' Maimanism, therefore, the Jews always had both angels and demons, and all that is claimed is a possible encouragement from Parsi theology, which developed what was latent already. A more recent debt of Judaism to Persian divination was alleged to be found in the doctrine of the Future Life. From the beginning Zoroastrianism (see below) had included immortality and the resurrection of the body as integral parts of its creed. It is therefore at least a remarkable coincidence that the Jews did not arrive at these doctrines till the period immediately following their contact with the Persians, who, under Cyrus had been their deliverers from Babylonian tyranny. But the incidence of this has drawn some even to the linguistically impossible notion that the very name of the Pharisees was due to their 'Parsi' leanings, a coincidence it remains for the most part. The two peoples may have merged to the great idea of the Persians apparently developed it partly from the annals of Nature, and partly from the instinctive craving for a theology. The Jews conceived the hope through the ever-increasing sense of communion with the present God, through which their most spiritual men realized the impossibility of death's severing God from His people. But we may well assume that the growth of that belief was hastened by the knowledge that the doctrine was already held by another nation.

How well the religion of the Magi deserved the double honour thus assigned to it—that of stimulating the growth of the greatest of sects within Israel and that of offering the first homage of the Gentile world to the infant Redeemer—may be seen best by giving in a few words a description of the faith in general.

Its pre-historic basis was a relatively pure Nature-worship, followed by the common ancestors of the Aryans in India and Persia, and still visible to us in the numerous elements which appear in both Veda and Avesta—the most sacred books of India and Iran respectively. To Iranian tribes belong the 'Aryan,' the 'Iranian,' or, earlier, the prophet Zarathushtra, called by the Greeks Zoroaster. He endeavoured to supersede Nature-worship by the preaching of a highly abstract monotheism. The Wise Lord, Ahura Maza (later Ormuzd), reigned alone without equal over all creation. Beside Him with personal attributes, six in number, called Ameesen Spenta (Amahaspand), 'Immortal Holy Ones,' who were the archangels of the Vedic Mazda. The problem of Evil he solved by positing a 'Hurtful Spirit,' Angra Mainyu (later Ahuriman), with his retinue of inferior demons (see Asmance), who is a power without beginning, like Ormuzd, creator of all things evil, and perpetual enemy of God and of good men. In the end, however, he is to be destroyed by his followers, and Good is to triumph for ever. Truth and Industry, especially in agriculture, are the practical virtues by which the righteous advance the kingdom of Ahura Maza. The eschatology is strikingly lofty in its conception, and the doctrine of God singularly pure. Unhappily, with the prophet's death the old polytheism returned, under the guise of angel-worship, and the Magi were ere long enslaving the religion to a dull and mechanical ritual. Many of these degenerate elements have, however, been incorporated in the modern Parsee. The small community, mostly concentrated round Bombay, which to-day bears this name, 'The Bahais,' a religious sect, is assuredly not the only non-Christian religion in the world to match either its creed or its works.

MAGIC, DIVINATION, AND SORCERY.—Magic, divination, sorcery, and witchcraft are all connected with belief in superhuman powers, and are methods whereby men endeavour to obtain from these powers knowledge of the future, or assistance in the conduct of life. Belief in magic and divination is most prevalent in the lower stages of civilization and religion. The arts of the magician and the diviner were founded upon the same logical processes as have issued in the development of modern science; but the limits within which deduction would be valid, and the data were frequently imperfect. Accidental coincidence was often confused with causal sequence. (See divination.) Magic, and the beliefs and practices associated with it, were derived from attempts at reasoning which were very often erroneous; but from such crude beginnings science has slowly grown. Many of those arts were associated with religion; and diviners and magicians were those thought to be most intimately connected with the Deity, and, owing to their superior knowledge of Him and His ways, best able to learn the secrets of evil spirits. When the Arab the priest was originally also the soothsayer; the Heb. kohen, 'priest,' is cognate with the Arab. kaban, 'soothsayet'; the primitive priest had charge of the shrine of the god, and both offered sacrifices and gave responses. In this manner classes of professional diviners and magicians arose, as in Egypt (Ga 41, Ex 7.), in Babylon (Dn 2, in connexion with Baal (1 K 18), and even among the Israelites in the lower rank of professional prophets (Mic 5:1; see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, Introd.). Such officials were set apart for their office by some rite specially connecting them with the god, as the eating of the consecrated bread and cruel sacrifices. When that distinction had been attained, the art of the magician and diviner also became subject to moral distinctions, according to the character of the spirit with whom they were connected. The variety of magicians found in the moral characteristics of magic and divination is illustrated in the history of Israel; for divination is akin to some of the institutions sanctioned by God, such as the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28, 1 K 8), and it includes, at the other extreme, such asceticism as that of the witch of Endor. Among Semitic races and by the Egyptians, magic and divination were associated with the worship of various gods and the focus in the existence of a vast number of demons. With the gradual rise of religion in Israel under the teaching of God, early modes of prying into the future, and magical methods of seeking superhuman help, were usually abandoned, and the revelatory spirit of the prophets was forbidden. The teaching of the inspired prophets of Jehovah was very different from that of the merely professional prophets and from the religion of the common people. Throughout pre-exilic times there was a struggle in Israel between the true worship of Jehovah alone as incarnate by the great prophets, and the worship of 'other gods,' such as the local Canaanish Baalim and Idols in the homes of the people. In process of time magic and divination became closely linked with these illicit cults, and were consequently denounced by the great prophets; but at the same time the desire of the human heart to learn the future and to secure Divine help (which lies at the root of magic and divination) was met by God, purified, elevated, and satisfied by the revelation of His will through the prophets. God's revelation was suited to the stage of spiritual development for which the people had attained, hence His prophets sometimes employed methods similar to those of divination; consequently some forms of divination are allowed to pass without censure in many passages of the Bible, but these were gradually put aside as the people were educated to a more spiritual conception of religion. On the other hand, as men sought to prognosticate the future, the commerce with false gods and spirits, magic and divination became generally degraded and divorced from all that is right and good. This explains the increasing severity with which magic and divination are regarded in Scripture; nevertheless we find it recorded, without any adverse comment, that Daniel was made head of the 'wise men' of Babylon—although they included magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, and 'Chaldeans'—(Da 2; 44); and that the wise men (Mt 2) were magi. (See Grimm-Thayer's Lex. p. 385.) In explanation it may be said that reliance upon divination is a moral evil in proportion to the religious obligations vouchsafed to the individuals concerned, and God accommodated the methods of His teaching to the condition of those to whom He revealed Himself.

General course of the history of magic and divination in Israel. Several sources can be traced from which the Israelites derived their magical arts, and different periods are apparent at which these influences were felt. (a) From patriarchal times up to Israel's contact with Assyria, most of their occult arts were the outcome of the beliefs common to Semitic peoples. Although their sojourn in Egypt brought them into contact with a civilized nation which greatly practised divination and sorcery, we cannot trace any sign that they were influenced by Egyptian magical arts.

In this early period of Israelitish history we find divination by teraphim, the interpretation of dreams, and necromancy, besides the authorized means of inquiry, the oracles of God. The very earliest legislation that witchcraft shall be punished by death (Ex 22:18 (JE)); and we read that Saul put to death 'those that had familiar spirits and the wizards' (1 Sa 28).

Under the influence of the Assyrian advance southward, the small States of Palestine were driven into closer relations with one another, owing to the necessity of united opposition to the common foe. This was prejudicial to religion, through its rendering Israel more and more to the practices of the gods of the Philistines. In this sense, the oracles of the god of the Philistines, Baal, was vouchedsafed to them. By and by, the influence of the Assyrian was felt more strongly through the introduction of methods of magic and divination in use among their neighbours (cf. Is 2; Jer 10).

This evil tendency was opposed by Manasseh (2 K 21), but in the reformation of Josiah, idolatry, witchcraft, and the use of teraphim were suppressed (2 K 23:20) in accordance with Dt 18:10-12 (D).

(c) The Captivity brought Israel into contact with a much more fully developed system of magic and divination than they had known before. In Babylon, not only were all magical practices widely indulged in, but the use of such arts was recognized by their being entrusted to a privileged class (Da 2). The officials are here denominated 'magicians' (charmmuthim, scriveners who were acquainted with occult arts, 'enchanters' ('ashkheshaphim, prob. a Bab. word meaning 'those who used conjurations,' but its derivation is uncertain), 'sorcerers' (mekachshaphim, in its root-meaning perhaps indicating those who mixed ingredients for magical purposes (LXX pharmakés), but this is not certain), and 'Chaldeans' (kasdaim, a name which, from being a national designation, had come to mean those who were skilled in the occult lore of Babylonia and could interpret dreams). Recent discoveries have revealed that the Babylonians believed in a vast number of demons who could be compelled by proper spells; also they practised astrology (Is 44:14; 47:11), augury from the inspections of victims (Ezk 21:19), the tying of magic knots, and the designation of fortunate and unfavourable days.

(d) Egyptian influences were strongly felt in the century before, and the one following, the Christian era. The Mishna shows the presence of a very strong tendency to occult sciences, and in the NT we find examples of Jews who practised them in Simon Magnus (Ac 8:9) and Elymas (Acts 13:7). Among the Alexandrian Jews who followed the Gnostic sects, magic was much used, and the name of Jehovah in various forms entered into their spells and the inscriptions upon their amulets. Books of 'incantations', reputed to have been the work of Solomon, were extant, and the Babylonian Talmaid is full of superstition (Schürer, HJP ii. 152). Such books and charms were burnt at Ephesus when their owners became Christians (Ac 19:19). So celebrated was Ephesus for its magic, that 'Ephesian letters' was a common name for the headpieces made of leather, wood, or metal on which a magic spell was written (Farrar, St. Paul, ii. 26).

A. Distinguishing divination, in which prominence is given to the desire to know the future, from magic, which has for its object power to do something by supernatural aid, we have now to inquire into the modes of divination and magic which appear in the Scriptures.

Forms of divination mentioned in the Bible. (a) The casting of lots. The casting of lots was a custom among the Chaldeans (Ac 1:26), and was ordained on the belief that God would so direct the result as to indicate His will (Pr 16:33). It was employed: (1) in crises in national history and in individual lives. Most scholars consider that the phrase 'oracle of God' refers to the use of Urnim and Thummim, which seems to have been the nature of the drawing lots. This occurs in the arrangements for the conquest of Canaan (Jg 1); in the campaign against the Chaldeans (20); in David's uncertainty after the death of Saul (2 S 21); for war (21); the Phoenicians cast lots to discover the cause of the tempest (Jon 1).—(2) In criminal investigation. It was employed to discover the wrongdoer in the cases of Achan (Jos 7:21) and Jonathan (1 S 14:4).—(3) In ritual. Lots were cast in reference to the scapegoat (Lv 16). Two goats were brought, and lots were cast; one goat was offered as a sin-offering, and the other was sent away into the wilderness. (4) In dividing the land of Canaan (Nu 26:53-34; 34; Jos 21:4-6).—(4) In selecting men for special duties: the election of Saul (1 S 10), the choice of the men to attack Gibeath (22), and the division of duties among the priests (1 Ch 24).

In most cases the method of casting the lot is not stated. Several ways were in use among the Israelites, some of which were directly religious, and were sanctioned by Scripture: (1) the lots were drawn out; (2) lot was cast before God (see Hastings' DB s.v. 'Urim and Thummim'). In connection with this the term 'lot' is mentioned, in that it evidently means a priestly dress (e.g. 1 S 21:23), but in other references it is considered by some to have been an image of gold representing Jehovah (Ex 18:19 [see Harper, Amos and Hosea, p. 221]) or the gold plate. The word 'oracle' in its use among the Hebrews, means so some understand it as a garment. The use of the ephod in connexion with the Urim and Thummim is not known.

The employment of the Urim and Thummim for consulting God disappeared before the clearer guidance received through the inspired prophet. Apparently it had ceased by the time of Israel's return from the Captivity (Ezr 2:6). Inquiry respecting the future was also made of heathen deities (2 K 13), and their responses were probably given by the drawing of lots after some method was prescribed.

(ii) By divination and in other ways. The word 'divination' (which is specially applied to the drawing of lots as with headless arrows) is used of divination generally and frequently translated 'to divine.' It is generally referred to unfavourably (except Pr 16:34). Arrows are once specified (Ec 12:10) as the means by which the lot was thrown, this practice is found among the Arabs, and was also used in Babylonia. Arrows with the alternatives written upon them were shaken in a quiver at a sanctuary, and the first to fall out was taken as conveying the decision of the god. Nebuchadnezzar is represented as deciding in this manner his line of march (Ezk 21:19), and the lot, holding in his hand 'the divination Jerusalem,' i.e. the arrow with 'Jerusalem' written upon it (see Driver, Harper's Bible, p. 221).

Without any indication of the method of divination, various techniques were employed, such as the use of the figures Moabites (Balaam, Nu 25:25; the image of the service, 22), among the Philistines (1 S 6), and among the Babylonians (Is 44:5). It also appears as a method of the lower rank of prophets in Israel (Mic 3:9; Ezk 13:9).

Dreams are named in the Egyptian (qebatm, Jer 27:20). The word is used in relation to necromancy and the consultation of teraphim (1 S 15:28; 2 K 17:17, Zec 10:1). The practice is forbidden in Dt 18:10.

(b) By divination. This is alluded to in Hos 4:12. Probably pieces of stick were used for drawing lots, as in the case of divination by arrows.

7. Dreams and visions.—Numerous instances occur in the Old Testament intimating a communication from God by dreams and visions. (1) In so far as these were spontaneous and unsought, they do not properly belong to the domain of divination. Such occur in Gn 20:1 (highest), 27:1; in the gnostic predictions of false prophets. Instances of its highest signification occur in Is 1:2, Am 1:2, Mic 1:2. The word is used respecting the deception practised by lower prophets, as in Nu 24:14, where reference is apparently made to the seer receiving the intimation in a trance, but the interpretation is not quite certain (see Gray, Numbers, p. 361); other physical phenomena appear in connexion with prophesying (1 S 10:10-11); see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, p. 1. The word also appears in connexion with false prophets (Is 28:9, Lk 2:24, Ezk 12:13. 18. 21; 22:20, Zec 10:1).

(c) Observation of omens (augury).—nachash, tr. 'to divine' or 'to use enchantments'; the agent being called 'an enchanter' (Dt 18:10), 'means to learn by means of omens.' Very probably the expression is derived from nachash, 'a serpent,' with the underlying idea that the intuition was obtained by the worshipper through the assistance of the serpent-god; another, but less likely, derivation is from the 'hissing' or 'whispering' tones of the diviner. The word is very frequently used with a bad sense attaching to it.

Words were sometimes taken as omens of the future (1 K 20:20 RVm 'took it as an omen,' also 1 S 14:9). The movements of animals also constituted omens. It was considered by the Arabs that some animals, under the influence of a higher power, could see what was invisible to men, and consequently their action became an omen. It would be quite in accordance with this that Balaam's ass should see what was hidden from her master (Nu 22:22); a similar belief in the significance of the movements of animals is shown in the lords of the Philistines watching the way the kite took with the ark of God (1 S 6:6).

The practice of divination by omens are often unexpressed, as Gn 30:2, Lv 19:2, 2 K 17:21, 2 Ch 33. The following practices in divination by omens appear:—(1) By hydrodivine the future by the appearance of the liquid in a goblet or dish.—(2) By the observation of the clouds. The clouds were carefully studied in divination, and the word "nim" seems to indicate this practice as existing among the Hebrews and Phalartines (Is 2:2; see Cheyne, Lexicon, vol. i. p. 17) (Deut. 27:19). The practice of divination undecided, and suggests a derivation from an Arabic root meaning 'to murmur' or 'whisper,' the reference being to the muttering of the medium (Deut. p. 224). Perhaps it meant the bringing of clouds by magic arts, as in Jer 14:1 (see Delitzsch on Is 29). It has also been suggested that the word is a denominate form of nim 'whispers,' and means 'to glance with an evil eye.' This form of augury was forbidden (Lv 19:29, Dt 18:10), and those practising it were denounced (Mic 5:2, Jer 26:23, Manasseh fostered it (2 K 21:2, 2 Ch 33:23).—(3) By astrology. The stars were very early believed to have an influence on the fortunes of men (Jg 9:5, Job 38). Professional astrologers were prominent among the Assyrians and Babylonians, among whom a standard astrology work was constructed as early as the 16th century B.C. (Cheyne, Isaiah, vol. i. p. 310). Babylonian astrology, with its announcement of coming events and notification of favourable and unpromising days (such as are now extant on Babylonian clay tablets), is mentioned in Is 47:12; but astrology does not seem to have been practised by Israel in early times; Jeremiah spoke of it as 'the way of the nations,' and warns the people against it. In later times astrology was regarded by the Jews as a less unfavourable kind of divination. In the time of the Egyptians, it was made chief of ten wise men who included astrologers (cf. Mt 2, where the wise men, who appear to have been astrologers, were sent to Herod, and 'the places of Babylon' (Is 41:21, 22), to the infant Saviour (Edersheim, LT i. 202).—(4) By inspecting victims. Forecasting the future from the appearance of the organs of the victims was common in Babylon (Diod. Sic. ii. 29) and also among the Romans (Cic. de Divin. ii. 12). It does not appear to have been in use among the Israelites; the sacrifices of Balaam (Nu 23:10) were not for this purpose, but to propitiate the deity consulted.

Connected with the use of omens is the appointment of 'signs' by prophets to assist their consultants in believing what they predicted. Signs were given by God and His prophets as signs of the misprediction of false prophets. These were exhibitions of Divine power in smaller matters by which men might be enabled to trust God in things of greater moment (Jg 6:36); or they were instances of truth in small predictions, to awaken confidence in greater promises or threatenings (Ex 4:10, Is 7:1); or they were simply the attachment of particular meaning to ordinary facts to remind men of God's promises or threats (Gn 9:17, Is 9:4, Ezk 12:3, Zec 3:9). In the time of Christ, similar signs were demanded by the Jews (Mt 12:16, Lk 11:14, Jn 4:4, 1 Co 12:1), cf. art. Six. 9. Necromancy and familiar spirits.—Of these there were two kinds:—(1) A spirit (primarily 1 K 22:20; 'Naklah' RVm 'necromancy,' 'voodoo') was conceived as dwelling in a human being (Lv 20:27), most commonly in a woman. Those thus possessed were sometimes called '666' (Is 8:19), or the woman was denominated 'bo'alah' (1 K 22:20). An explanation (H. P. Smith, Samuel, p. 239) makes the '666' a sort of idol, on the ground that Manasseh 'made' an '666' (2 K 21:4) and that it is clasped with teraphim (2 K 23). These necromancers professed to have the power of calling up the dead (1 S 28:3, Is 8:19). Of their method of procedure we know nothing. In the interview with the witch of Endor, it appears that Saul was told by the witch what she saw, but the king himself entered into the conversation. No further particulars seem to be given. Their inquirers by speaking in a thin weak voice to make it appear that it was the spirit speaking through them (Is 8:19). The LXX generally renders them as sorceries, exegisis (cf. Acts 16:18), with a similar belief that a spirit might dwell in a human being and give responses appears in Ac 16:16; this opinion was common in heathendom. The Jews had similar views respecting the indwelling of demons in cases of demoniacal possession.

(2) Other diviners represented themselves as having fellowship with a spirit from whom they could receive intimations. These spirits were called pâthôn, the meaning being either that the spirits were wise and acquainted with the future, or that they were known to the wizards and had become 'familiar spirits' to them. The word occurs only in conjunction with 'b', as in Lu 19:30, Dt 18:11.

(c) Divination by teraphim.—The teraphim were images in human form (cf. Michal's statuette, 1 S 19:19), and they were worshipped as gods (Gs 31:16, Jg 18:9), but in later times they were held to be the products of Egyptian divination.

Some suppose them to have been the remains of a primitive ancestor-worship, and connect the word with rep'AQH which means 'ghosts' (root rāpāh, 'to sink down'; see nāqāh). Some Jewish commentators (cf. Moore, Judges, p. 382) have suggested that they were originally the mummi-}

Tera-pim were used for divination by Israelites and Arameans (Gs 31:18), and Nebuchadnezzar is represented as consulting them (Ezek 21). Josiah abolished the teraphim as well as other methods of idol divination (2 K 23:4), but they subsequently reappeared (Zec 10). The use of the teraphim in divination is not stated, but it was probably somewhat similar to the consultation of familiar spirits, namely, the diviner or soothsayer's response which he represented himself to have received from the teraphim.

B. Magic, like divination, had both legitimate and illegitimate forms, some sorcerers of the ancient world being called 'the wise men' in modern times. The moral character of the attempt to obtain supernatural aid was determined by the purpose in view and the means used to attain it. Witchcraft, which sought to injure others by magical arts, has always been regarded as evil and worthy of punishment among all nations. Invo-} cation of aid from false gods (who were still regarded as having real existence and power) and from evil spirits has been generally denounced. But there was also a magic, which has been denominated 'white magic,' for its object was the defeat of hostile witchcraft and the protection of individuals from evil influences.

1. Magic employed to counteract the work of evil spirits or the arts of malicious magicians.—This kind of magic was extensively practised among the Assyrians and Babylonians, and was the kind professed by the wise men who were under the patronage of Nebuchadnezzar (Da 2). It also appears in the ceremony of exorcism. In Babylonia illness was traced to possession by evil spirits, and exorcism was employed to expel them (see Sayce, Hibbert Lectures). Exorcism was practised by Jews also (Ac 16:5, 19:18).

The method of a Jewish exorcist, Eleazar, in the time of Vespasian is described by Josephus (Ant. xii 7. 5). He placed a ring containing a magical root in the nostrils of the exorcist, using incantations, said to have been composed by Solomon, adjured the demon to return no more.

In close connexion with magic was the use of amulets and charms, intended to defend the wearer from evil influences. These derived their power from the spells which had been pronounced over them (thus lākiphāsh, which began with the meaning of serpent-charming, came to mean the muttering of a spell, and from that passed to the meaning of an amulet which had received its power through the spell pronounced over it), or from the words which were inscribed upon them, or the symbolic character of their form. They were used by all ancient peoples, and were opposed by the prophets only when they involved trust in other gods than Jehovah. Probably the earrings of Gn 35:1 and Hos 2:1 were amulets; so also were the moon-shaped ornaments of Jg 8:10 and Is 3:8; their shape was that of the crescent moon which symbolized to the Arabs growing good fortune, and formed a protection against the evil eye (see Deltarchos on Is 3:8). Perhaps the 'whore'some' and 'adulteries' of Hos 2 were nose-jewels and necklaces which were heathen charms. Written words were often employed to keep away evil. The later Jew, understanding Dv 6:4 in a literal sense, used phyllacteand emerods in the ark by the Philistines when they sent it back to Israel (1 S 6:9); by this means they believed that they would rid themselves of the troubles which the ark had brought to them.

F. E. ROBINSON.

MAGNIFICATE.—This word is used in the AV to represent either 'judge' or 'ruler'—'authority' in the most general sense. The latter is its meaning in Jg 18 (RV none in the land, possessing authority)—implying independence of Zidon and Phoenicia. 'The former is its meaning in Ezr 7, where it stands for shophetim (the same word as scribes, by which the Romans designated the Carthaginian magistrates). In Lk 19, 45, Tit 3 it stands for derivatives of the general word archo, 'to rule,' but in the passages from Lk with a special reference to judges. In Ac 16 the word is used to translate the Gr. sarkologos. This is often used as the equivalent of the Lat. pretorii, and in the older Roman colonies the two supreme magistrates were often known by this name. But we have no evidence that the magistrates at Philippi were called pretors, and it probably represents the more usual duumviri. A. E. HILL.

MAGNIFICAT.—Obsol. for 'magnificent'; retained by EV in 1 Ch 22 from the Geneva version— the house must be exceeding magnificent.' The adv. occurs in Rhem. NT, Lk 16. He fared every day magnifically.'

MAGNIFICAT.—The hymn Magnificat (Lk 1:46) has been described as 'something more than a prayer, and something less than a complete Christian hymn' (Liddon). It is the poem of one who felt nearer to the fulfillment of the promises than any writer of the OT. But no Evangelist of the NT could have faced the prospect of Christ by His human name, writing after His death and Resurrection.

In the TR the hymn is ascribed to the Virgin Mary, but there is a variant reading 'Elizabeth' which demands some explanation. Mary' is the reading of all the Greek MSS, of the great majority of Latin MSS, and of many Early Fathers as far back as Tertullian (2nd cent.). On the other hand, three Old Latin MSS (cod. Vercellensis, cod. Veneroni, cod. Exhdistanus-Vatichaviensis) have 'Elizabeth.' This reading was known to Origen (Hom. 5 on Lk 5), unless his translator Jerome interpolated the reference. Nicola of Remesiana (fl. c. 400) quoted it in his treatise 'On the Good of Psalmody.' We can trace it back to the 3rd cent. in the translation of Irenaeus. There is fairly general agreement among critics that the original text must have been simply 'and something less than a complete Christian hymn' (Liddon).

We can trace it back to the 3rd cent. in the translation of Irenaeus. There is fairly general agreement among critics that the original text must have been simply 'and something less than a complete Christian hymn' (Liddon).

On the question which is the right gloss, opinions are divided. In favour of Elizabeth it has been suggested that the designation v. 45 is not the name of all that is implied in v. 44, 'and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost.' Such words when used of Zacharias in v. 47 are followed by the Benedictus. Are we to look on the Magnificat as a corresponding prophecy on the lips of Elizabeth? On the other hand, the glowing words of Elizabeth (vv. 45-49) need a reply. She who had answered the angel so humbly and bravely (v. 38) would surely speak when thus addressed by a near relation. Indeed, v. 44, 'all generations shall call me blessed,' sounds like a reply to Elizabeth's 'Blessed is she that believed' in v. 49. In the OT the formula of reply is frequently without a proper name, and the first chapters of Lk have 'a special OT colouring.'

Another argument has been founded on the reading of v. 48: 'Mary abode with her,' where the Pesh. and the Sinaitic Palimpsest reader with Elizabeth.' It is suggested that the second 'her' of the Greek text preserves the hymn as ascribed to Elisabeth. But in the OT the personality of the singer is, as a rule, sunk in the song, and the name is mentioned at the end as if to pick up the theme (Ps. 46:13, Nu. 24:22, Mic. 3:1). On the whole, the external evidence is in favour of the gloss 'Mary.' The question remains whether the hymn is more suitable on the lips of Elisabeth as expressing the feeling of a mother from whom the reproach of childlessness has been removed. Such an application seems to express very inadequately the fullness of meaning packed into these few verses. The first words remind us of the song of Hannah as a happy mother (1 S 2:1), but the hymn is founded to a much greater extent on the Psalms, and the glowing anticipation of the Messianic time to come befits the Lord's mother. It is characteristic that she should keep herself in the background. No personal fear of the reproach of shame, which might be, and indeed was, levelled against her, no personal pride in the destiny vouchsafed to her, mar our impression of a soul accustomed to commune with God, and therefore never lacking words of praise.

The hymn has been called a Magnificat. In the Greek word meaning with God, and therefore never lacking words of praise.

In v. 46 she prays God with all the powers of soul and spirit. In iv. (vv. 48-49) she speaks of living in the memory of men, not as something deserved but because it is the will of the holy Lord. In iii. (vv. 45-47) she rises to a large view of the working out of God's purposes in human history, in the humbling of proud dynasties, and the triumph of the meek. In iv. (vv. 48-49) she backs up the fulfilment of the promises in the Messianic time, beginning with the Incarnation, which is the crowning proof of God's mercy and love.

MAGOG.—The name of a people, among the ''sons' of Japheth, between Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes), and mentioned in Ezk 38 (cf. 30) as under the rule of Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal, who is to lead in the future a great expedition against the restored Israel, from the uttermost parts of the north, and who has among his allies Gomer and Tagarim,—the nations whose names are italicized being also mentioned in Gn 10 as closely connected with Magog. It is obvious from these notices it is evident that Magog must have been the name of a people living far N. of Palestine, not far from Meshech and Tubal, whose home is shown by Assyrian notices to have been N. E. of Gilea. Following Josephus, Magog has commonly been understood of the Scythians,—a wild and rough people, whose proper home (Hdt. iv. 17-20, 47-58) was on the N. of the Orimes, but who often organized predatory incursions into Asia and elsewhere: about n.c. 650 there was in particular a great irruption of Scythians into Asia (Hdt. i. 104-6), which seems to have supplied Ezekiel with the model for his double attack on the N. upon the restored Israel (chs. 38. 39). Why, however, supposing this identity to be correct, the Scythians should be called 'Magog' is still unexplained. The name does not cover all that is found in the Assyrian inscriptions. In Rev 20 'Gog and Magog' are applied figuratively to denote the nations who are pictured as brought by Satan, at the end of the millennium, to attack Jerusalem, and as destroyed before it (see, further, Gog).

S. R. DRIVER.

MAGOR-MISSABIB.—A nickname given (Jer 20) by Jeremiah to Pashhur, chief officer in the Temple, who had caused Jeremiah to be beaten and put in the stocks as a false prophet. The name is an etymological play on the word Pashhur, and denotes 'fear-round-about'; but whether Pashhur (wh. see) was to be that to his surroundings, or vice versa, does not appear.

MAGPIASH.—See MAGPIE.

MAGUS.—See BAR-JEHUD, MAGI, MAGIC, and SIMON MAGUS.

MAHALALEEL.—See MAHALALEEL.

MAHALALEEL.—1. Son of Kenan and great-grandson of Seth (Gen 5. 18. 19. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28) (P) 1 Ch 1. 7. 2. Son of Perez, who dwelt at Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11).
MALALATH.—1. See Basemath, No. 1. —2. Wife of Rebosam, 2 Ch 111. 3. See Psalms, p. 772.

MALALATH LEANNOTh.—See Salm. p. 772.

MAHANAIM ('two camps' or 'two hosts') if the Heb. word is really a dual, which is very doubtful).—An important city E. of Jordan on the frontier of the ancient and Mannaseh (Jos 13:25; 20:8); it was a Levitical city within the territory of Gad (Jos 12:43). It was clearly N. of the Jabok, as Jacob travelling S. reached it first (Gen 32:21). Here Abner made Ish-bosheth, son of Saul, king (2 S 24), and here David took refuge from his rebel son Absalom (2 S 17:24-19): Solomon put Abinadab in authority in this city (1 K 4:1). There is apparently a reference to Mahanaim in Ca 18 (see RV and A.V.). The site of Mahanaim is quite uncertain. A trace of the name appears to linger in Mahneh, the name of a mass of ruins in the Jebel Asfan N.W. of the village Asefan. Merrill suggests a ruin called Suleikhat in the Wadi Asfan. Others consider the site of Jerash which is first mentioned, as Gerasa, in the time of Alexander Janneus, as a likely spot for so prominent and apparently, so attractive a city. E. W. G. Masterman.

MAHANEH-DAN (Jg 13:18).—The locality of this spot is given in these two passages as 'behind Kirjath-jearim,' and as 'between Zorah and Eshtaol.' In the former passage we are told that 'the Spirit of Jehovah began to move Samson in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol'; in the latter passage the derivation of the name is given as the place where the last portion of the band of 600 Danite warriors took place, before they set out on their expedition to Laish. The exact position of the spot has not been identified, as the site of Eshtaol (wh. see) is not known with certainty. T. A. Moxon.

MAHARAI.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:9, 1 Ch 11:18); according to 1 Ch 27:5, of the family of Zerah, and captain of the Temple guard for the tenth monthly course.

MAHATH.—1. The eponym of a Kohathite family (1 Ch 6:6, 2 Ch 29:29); perhaps to be identified with Mahath of 1 Ch 6:2, 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31:19).

MAHAVITE, THE.—The EV designation in 1 Ch 11:4 of Eliel, one of David's heroes. The MT should probably be emended to read 'the Mahanaimite.'

MAHATZIOTh.—The Hemanite chief of the 23rd course of singers (1 Ch 25:4).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ ('spoil speedeth, prey hasteeth'), is 8+1.—A symbolical name given to one of Isaiah's sons to signify the speedy destruction of the power of the allied kings Rezin and Pekah by the king of Assyria.

MAHLEH.—1. One of the daughters of Zelophehad (wh. see), Nu 26:10, 27:5, 36:17. 2. One of the sons of Hamath (wh. see), 1 Ch 7:14.

MAHLEH.—1. In Ex 6:1, Nu 26:10, 27:5, 36:17. 2. In 1 Ch 26:9, 24:28. 3. It is the name of a son of Mera'ei, Levi's youngest son. In 1 Ch 26:9, 24:28 a son of Mushi, Mahli's brother, bears the same name. Ezr 8:4 speaks of 'a man of discretion (see Isth-shecha), of the sons of Mahli ... and Sherebiah,' etc. 1 Es 9:2 (Mochl) 'drops' and, thus identifying this son of Mahli with Sherebiah. In Nu 26:9, 24:28 Mahli's descendants are called 'the family of the Mahlites.' According to 1 Ch 26:9, these Mahlites were descended from the descendants of Eleazar, the elder son of the Mahli mentioned in Ex 6:1. Eleazar left no male offspring. Their cousins, the sons of Kish, therefore took them in marriage, and prevented the extinction of their father's name.

MAHLON.—See Chilion.

MAHOL.—The father of Ishan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda (1 K 4:2), who are mentioned as famous for their wisdom, though surpassed in this respect by Solomon. Apparently, then, Mahol is a proper name, but it is also found in Ps 139:190 (EV tr. 'dancing') amongst instruments of music, so that the four wise men mentioned above may really be described as 'sons of music,' in which case their wisdom may have consisted chiefly in their skill in the composition of hymns.

T. A. Moxon.

MAHSEOH.—Grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer 32:16; 52:4): called in Bar 1 Masseah.

MIAUNAS (1 Es 9:11).—Masseiah, Neh 8:17.

MAIL.—See Armour, 2 (c).

MAINSAJL.—See Ships and Boats.

MAKAZ.—A town on the W. slopes of Judah (1 K 4:4). The LXX. reading, Michmas, is impossible. The site has not been recovered. W. EWING.

MAKED.—In Jg 19:4 to make means to do.—What maketh thou in this place? In Jos 8:11 Whom maketh thou thyself? and Jn 10:1 He made himself the Son of God, 'make' means 'pretend to be'; cf. Jos 8:15 'Joshua and all Israel made for them to be eaten.' This is the meaning also in 2 S 18.'Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick.' In Ezek 17:4 'Neither shall Pharoah with his mighty host or company make for him in the war,' and make for means assist.

MAKED.—A strong and great city in Gilead (1 Mac 5:29). The site is unknown.

MAKHELOTH (Nu 33:26).—One of the twelve 'stations' of the children of Israel (Nu 32:42); unknown.

Makkedah.—A Canaanite royal city in the Shephelah, where the five kings of the Canaanites, defeated by Joshua at Gibeon, and chased by Israel down the valley by way of Beth-horon and Azekah, took refuge in a cave (Jos 10:14, 16), whence, later, by Joshua's orders, they were brought forth and slain. The city was taken and the inhabitants put to the sword. Azekah has not been identified, but in Jos 18:16 it is named with Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Nezemath, which may be identified with the modern Kfarat, Dajah, and Na'anech. In this district the name Makkedah has not been found, but Warren and Conder agree in suggesting Ḡā Mundo, 'the cave,' as the most likely spot. The rock-quarrying and tombs mark an ancient site, and caves are found in the sites where Makkedah might be located. It lies on the N. of Wady Surd, about 15 miles S. of Jaffa. The Onomasticon places it about 7 miles E. of Elieutheropolis (Beth Jafar), a position hardly to be reckoned within the Shephelah.

W. EWING.

MARTHES.—The name of a locality mentioned only in Zeph 1:11 as 'the Phrenician quarter (?) of Jerusalem. The word denotes a mortar, and presumably was given to the place because it was basil-shaped. If so, a part of the Tyropeon valley has as good a claim as any other locality to be regarded as what is referred to. Certainly the Mt. of Olives is but a precarious conjecture.

W. F. C. W.

MALACHI.—1. Author.—The Book of Malachi raises a question of authorship which cannot be answered with certainty. Who was the author? Was his name Malachi? A priori, it might be supposed that the author of the last book of prophecy in the OT Canon would be sufficiently well known to have his name attached to his work. If the name appeared with the book (especially if the name was Ezra, as the Targum asserts), it could scarcely have been lost or forgotten before the 'Minor Prophets' were collected, and the Canon of the Prophets was closed.

It is, however, doubtful whether Malachi is the personal name of the prophet. The word, as it appears in the superscription, means 'my messenger,' and in this sense it is used in 3'. It is argued that the word ought to have the same significance in both places. But, while in 3' it can scarcely mean anything else than 'my messenger,' of this meaning does not suit the superscription, which would run, 'Oracle of the word of Jehovah through my messenger.' The oblique case of Jehovah with the direct reference of the suffix in 'my messenger,' symbolically appeared more than awkwardly. The LXX was content to alter the superscription 'by the hand of his messenger.' The change of text is very slight. Whether there was MS authority for it cannot be determined.

The termination of the word Malachi may be adjectival. It would thus be equivalent to the Latin Angelicus, and would signify 'one charged with a message or mission' (a missionary). The term would thus be an official title, and the thought is not unsuitable to one whose message closed the Prophetical Canon of the OT, and whose mission in behalf of the Church was of so sacred a character. If this were the explanation, it is probable that greater definiteness would be attached to the words. It should be noted that, while the LXX render the word Malachi by 'his messenger' in the superscription, they prefix, as the title of the book, Malachias, as if the Hebrew should read Malachiyah, i.e. 'messenger of Jehovah.' Some such form must be adopted if the Malachi of the superscription is taken as a proper noun. The form would thus correspond to Zacharias, and many other proper names (en) both in the OT and in the superscription. This is a possible grammatical explanation, and the name 'messenger of Jehovah' is suitable to the condition of Judah at the time. The Jews had little experience of prophets when the message of this book was delivered. It is significant that Haggai, the earliest prophet of the post-exilic period, is expressly designated 'messenger of Jehovah' (Hag 1st). He had already received the direct (Hag 1st) (v. 4). But there were prophets and prophets. False prophets had done much to bring about the Exile. If there were to be prophets after the Exile, it was important that the new community should be in no doubt as to their character. This was secured in the case of the first of the post-exilic prophets by the express statement that he was the messenger of Jehovah, and that what he spoke was the word of Jehovah. In the case of the last of the prophets of the OT Canon, an assurance of a similar character would be furnished symbolically by the name Malachiyah ('messenger of Jehovah'). This, pro tanto, favors the interpretation as it appears in the title of the LXX and the Vulgate.

But 3' remains. If Malachi is a proper noun—the name of the author—in 1st, should the word not have the same significance in 3'? The answer is, that there is no insuperable objection to the twofold explanation. The form admits of the twofold reference. The question is one of probability. At this point, however, reference should be made to the Targum, according to which Ezra was the author of the Book of Malachi; and this opinion continued to prevail among the Jews. Jerome accepted it, and it was favourably regarded by Calvin and others. No doubt the Targum expressed the Jewish opinion of the time. But that does not settle the question. In the four or five centuries between the appearance of the Book of Malachi and the birth of Christ, the life of the OT Church centred in the Law of Moses. That law was given, mainly, by Ezra to the post-exilic Church. As years passed, and the traditions of the scribes began to gather about the Law, the figure of Ezra stood out as the prominent one in post-exilic times. Everything of importance connected with the Law was doubtless assigned to him. Take along with that the fact that Malachi occurs as a common noun in 3', and the additional fact that the prophecy closes with a solemn warning to remember the Law of Moses, and it may appear not improbable that Ezra should have been claimed as the author of this closing passage, and of the prophecy in which it is found.

In these circumstances the authority of the Targum is not of very great weight. But in one respect the Targum is of importance. If the name of Ezra was the only one associated with the Book of Malachi when the Targum was prepared, it is probable that the book was not given anonymously—at least, if it is no name when the volume of the Minor Prophets was made up, and that the compiler either regarded the term Malachi in 3' as the name of the author, or attached the name to the book in the superscription as a fictitious title. It is scarcely necessary to observe that the name of the author is not required for the authentication of the message. The terms of the superscription are amply sufficient for the purpose of authentication. It is the 'Oracle of the Word of Jehovah' that the prophet delivers. This is equivalent to 'The word of Jehovah came—or was—to ... (so and so)' in other books of prophecy, and implies the familiar 'Thus saith Jehovah' of prophetic address.

2. Date.—Opinion is greatly divided regarding the date of the book. That it belonged to the Persian period appears from a comparison (a parallel) given to the governor (cf. Hag 1st, 11, etc., Neh 5th, etc.). It is evident that the date of the Book of Malachi was after the return of the exiles, and that the Book of Malachi was not written by Malachi. The date of the Book of Malachi is determined by two or three passages, Nehemiah's references to Malachi and the prophecy of Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem

Certain expressions occurring in the book are held to favour the former (cf. 2nd. 4th. 3rd. 10th. 22 [EV 41]). These, breathing the spirit of Deut., are supposed to show that the author was under the influence of the Deuteronomic Code. If its activity was later than 445, the influence of P would have been expected to show itself. But the expression 'the law of Moses' (39 [EV 41]) finds a natural explanation in connexion with the whole Pentateuchal legislation read before the people in 445 (Neh 8th). The covenant with Levi (2nd. 4th) seems to presuppose Nu 23rd. (P). And the reference to the book of Psalms (39) appears to rest on the form of the superscription, as it appears in the title of the LXX and the Vulgate. Deuteronomic expressions of an ethical character are suitable to any earnest prophet after Amos, and are not determinative of date as are the passages which presuppose P,—on the assumption that P was first promulgated in 445 (both belonging to P). The language, upon the whole, favours a date later than the appearance of P.

The contents of the book point in the same direction. Ezra's reformation appears to have been limited to the banishing of the foreign wives, and the effort to effect a complete separation of the Chosen People from the idolatrous tribes round about. The author of Malachi brings three main charges against the Church of his day: (1) against the priests for the profanation of the services of the Temple; (2) against the community (priests included) for marrying heathen wives; (3) against the people generally for immorality, idleness, and infidelity. All this agrees very closely with the state of affairs with which Nehemiah had to deal on his second visit to Jerusalem (Neh 13th.). And upon the whole (the conclusion can only be a matter of comparative probability), the period of that visit and the prophetic activity of the author of Malachi. The date would be somewhere about 430.

3. Contents.—The book may be divided into the following sections:

572
MALACHI

MALCHIJAH. —1. A descendant of Gershon (1 Ch 6:14 [Heb. 23]). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (1 Ch 9:19, Neh 11:12), same as Malchijah of Jer 21:35.

MALLUCH.

MALCHIJAH. —1. A descendant of Gershon (1 Ch 6:14 [Heb. 23]). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (1 Ch 9:19, Neh 11:12), same as Malchijah of Jer 21:35.

3. Head of the 5th course of priests (1 Ch 24), perhaps the same as the preceding. 4. Two of the sons of Pashur, who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:19); one in 1 Es 6:9 Malchijah and Ashibah respectively.

5. One of the sons of Hartim who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:19). 6. One of the guild of the goldsmiths who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3:4). 7. One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand at the reading of the Law (Neh 8:19). 8. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10), probably the same as No. 2. 11. A priest who took part in the ceremony of dedicating the wall (Neh 12:25).

MALCHIRAM. —Son of Jehoniah (1 Ch 3:4).

MALCHI-SHA. —The third son of Saul (1 S 14:24); slain by the Philistines at Mt. Gilboa (1 S 31, 1 Ch 10).

MALCHUS. —The name of the high priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off in the Garden of Gethsemane at the arrest of our Lord. St. John is the only Evangelist who mentions his name (Jn 18:10), thereby substantiating the fact that he was intimately acquainted with the high priest and his household (Jn 18:27). The incident is related in the other three Gospels (Mt 26:51, Mk 14:47, Lk 22:51). On a comparison of the four accounts, it seems that Malchus pressed forward eagerly to seize Jesus, whereupon Peter struck at him with his sword, the blow, missing its main object, almost severed the ear, but not quite, as Jesus touched it and healed it.

Luke, the physician, is the only Evangelist who mentions the healing of the ear.

2. One of the sons of Barzani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:2); called in 1 Es 9:9 Mammochus.
3. One of the sons of Haman who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:2).
4. Two of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:27). No. 4 is probably identical with Malchiu of 1 Es 12:2, called in 1 Es 12:3 Malclusi.

MALCHU.—The eponym of a priestly family who returned with Zerub. (Neh 12:23); probably the same as Malch in Neh 10:12.

MALLUS.—A city of Cilicia which joined Tarsus in a rebellion against Antiocchus Epiphanes about B.C. 171 (2 Mac 4:28). Tradition said that it was founded at the time of the Israelites' return from Babylon, which was an important town. Its site is doubtful, but as ancient statements make it near the river Pyramus, near the sea, and also on a hill, Professor Ramsay identifies it with Kora-Tash, on a coast line of hills E. of Magara, which served as its port. The W. branch of the Pyramus has become almost completely dried up. A. E. Hillard.

MAMOTHETRON.—R.V. of Ca 27b for EV Bether (wch. see). It is argued by Post, against this rendering, that the malabathron plant (Laurus malabatarum) did not grow in any of the mountains of Palestine. Others would render (by a slight textual emendation) 'mountains of cypresses.'

MALTANUS (1 Es 9:8) = Mattenai, Ezr 10:2.

MAMMON.—This is a Semitic word, but of doubtful derivation. It has been referred to Heb. amen, 'a reliable (store), and to tamar (t being elided), 'hidden treasure.' Augustine (Serm. on Mount) says it was the name for 'riches' among the Hebrews, and that the Phenician agrees, for 'gain' in Phenician is called mamon. Phenician and Hebrew were near akin, and the ancients often included Aramaic in Hebrew. 'Mamon' is not found in OT Targum, but, occurs in Rabbinical, in Syriac (Western Aramaic), and is used in the Aramaic Targums as the equivalent of Heb. terms for 'gain' or 'wealth.' Being a well-known Greek trade word, it is introduced without translation (unlike corban, etc.) into NT Greek, where the right spelling is mamonas (Mt 6:24, Lk 16:11, 18); with this agrees the Syriac form mominna. A Phoen. deity, Mammon, has been supposed. Though not improbable, the idea due to Milton (P. L. 570 it.), "Mammon is God and mammon" suggests personification, but compare the phraseology of Ph 3:5. G. H. Gwilliam.

MAMNITANUS (1 Es 9:4) corresponds to the two names Mattathiah, Mattenai in Ezr 10:6, of which it is a corruption.

MAMRE.—A name found several times in connection with the history of Abraham. It occurs (a) in the expression 'terebinhths of Mamre' in Gn 13:18 (both J.), and 14:13 (from an independent source) with the addition of 'the Amorite'; (b) in the expression 'which is before Mamre,' in descriptions of the cave of Machpelah, or of the field in which it was (Gn 23:18; 25:9; 49:20; 50:4), and in 35:7, where Mamre is mentioned as the place of Isaac's death; (c) in Gn 14:2 as the name of one of Abraham's allies, in his expedition for the recovery of Lot. In (b) Mamre is an old name, either of Hebron or of a part of Hebron (cf. 35:20; 35:7); in Gn 14:14 it is the name of a local shelter or chiet (cf. v.8), the owner of the terebinth called after him; in Gn 15:1 and 18:8 it is not clear whether it is the name of a person or of a place. The 'terebinths of Mamre' are the spot at which Abraham pitched his tent in Hebron. The site is uncertain, though, if the present mosque, on the N.E. edge of Hebron, is really built over the cave of Machpelah, and if 'before' has its usual topographical sense of 'east of,' it will have been to the W. of this, and at no great distance from it (for the terebinths are described as being 'in' Hebron, Gn 13:18). From Josephus' time (Ant. v.7) to the present day, terebinths or oaks called by the name of Abraham have been shown at different spots near Hebron; but none has any real claim to mark the authentic site of the ancient 'Mamre.' The oak mentioned by Josephus was 6 stanpies on the O. of the city; but he does not indicate in which direction it lay. (2) In speaking of the 'Abraham's Oak' of Constantine's day (2 miles N. of Hebron), states that it was regarded as sacred, and that its matuality and feast was held beside it, at which sacrifices were offered, and libations and other offerings cast into a well close by. Cf. Oak. S. R. Driver.

MAN.—The Bible is concerned with man only from the religious standpoint, with his relation to God. This article will deal only with the religious estimate of man, as other matters which might have been included will be found in other articles (Creation, Eschatology, Fall, Sin, Psychology). Man's dignity, as made by special resolve and distinct act of God in his image and likeness (synonymous with dominion over other creatures, and for communion with God, as asserted in the double account of his Creation in Gn 1 and 2, and man's degradation by his own choice of evil, as presented figuratively in the story of the Fall), are the two aspects of man that are everywhere met with. The first is explicitly affirmed in Ps 8, an echo of Gn 1; the second, without any explicit reference to the story in Gn 3, is taken for granted in the OT (see esp. Ps 51), and is still more emphasized in the NT, with distinct allusion to the Fall and its consequences (see esp. Ro 5:12 and 7-25). While the OT recognizes man's fall and sin through death, as the condition of all, or at least all who have been or are to be (2 Thess. 2:13), and other creatures, and for communion with God (Gn 2:31), yet as made in God's image it endows him with reason, conscience, affection, free will. Adam is capable of recognizing the qualities of, and so of naming, the living creatures (2:24), cannot find a help meet among them (v.18), is innocent (v.21), and capable of moral obedience (v.18-19) and religious communion (2:22). The Spirit of God is in man not only as life, but also as wisdom and understanding, counsel and might, and skill and courage (see Inspiration). The Divine Immanence in man as the Divine providence for man is affirmed (1 Pet 3:18).

In the NT man's dignity is represented as Divine sonship. In St. Luke's Gospel Adam is described as son of God' (39). St. Paul speaks of man as 'the image and glory of God' (1 Co 11:7), approves the poet's words, 'we also are his offspring,' asserts the unity of the race, and God's guidance in its history (Ac 17:28). In his argument in Romans regarding universal sinfulness, he assures that even the Gentiles have the light of God written in their hearts, and thus can exercise moral judgment on themselves and others (28). Jesus' testimony to the Fatherhood of God, including the care and bounty in Providence as well as the grace in Redemption, has as its counterpart His estimate of the absolute worth of the human soul (see Mt 10:16, Lk 10:15). While God's care and bounty are unlimited, yet Jesus does seem to limit the title 'child of son of God' to those who have religious fellowship and seek moral kinship with God (see Mt 5:46; cf. Jn 14:14, 15:28). St. Paul's doctrine of man's adoption by faith in God's grace does not contradict the teaching of Jesus. The writer of Hebrews sees the promises of man's dominion in Ps 8 fulfilled only in Christ (2:6). Man's history, according to the Fourth Evangelist, is consummated in the Incarnation (Jn 1:14).

The Bible estimate of man's value is shown in its anticipation of his destiny—not merely continued existence, but a future life of well or woe according to the moral quality, the relation to God, of the present
MAN OF SIN

MAN OF SIN (or 'lawlessness').—Probably the equivalent in 2 Th 2:10 of Antichrist (wh. see). According to the Pauline view, the Parousia would be preceded by an apostasy of believers and the appearance of the 'man of lawlessness,' who opposes and exalts himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God' (v.4). The appearance of this evil one and his control of the believers were prevented by some force or person. In course of time, however, this restraint was to be removed. The wicked one would exercise his power until the Christ should come to destroy him (vv.5-6).

The precise references of this statement are beyond final discovery. It is, however, commonly believed that the reference is to some historical person, possibly the god-emperor of Rome. Such a reference is, however, very difficult if 2 Thess. was written by St. Paul, for at the time of its composition the Roman State had not become a persecutor. The one who restrains is also difficult to identify if the 'man of lawlessness' be the Roman emperor. But that reason it may be best to refer the 'man of lawlessness' to the Jewish people or their expected Messiah, and 'he that restraineth' to the Roman power. This interpretation is supported by the fact that in the letter to the Thessalonians, St. Paul regards the Jews as persecutors, while throughout Acts the Roman State is presented as a protector of the Christians. This identification, however, does not satisfactorily explain the reference to 'sitting in the temple.' It is, therefore, probably better not to attempt a precise historical interpretation of either the 'man of lawlessness' or 'him that restraineth,' but to regard this evil one as a symbol of the belief of the people and the latter to some unidentified personal influence that led to the postponement of his appearance.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

MANAEN (Menahem).—One of the Christian prophets and teachers at Antiocch, and 'foster-brother' of Herod Antipas (Ac 13:13). Although individual non-official Christians prophesied (Ac 21:1, 1 Co 14:27), yet there was in NT a class of official prophets (Eph 2:28, Rev 19:21, perhaps 1 Th 2:20); and so in the Didache (c. A.D. 120?) the prophets formed an official class above the local ministry. Manaen was clearly an official at Antioch. The phrase 'foster-brother of Herod' is translated variously as 'a mere title of honor'; 'the king's friend' in 1 Ch 27:28, but more probably represents a literal fact. An older Manaen had been befriended by Herod the Great as having foretold his advancement; this one might be his grandson, brought up with Antipas. Another instance of the circle of Herod being reached by Christianity is Joanna, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk 8:3); and Antipas himself was touched by the Baptist's preaching (Mk 6:20).

A. J. MACLEAN.

MANAHATH.—1. Mentioned only in 1 Ch 28 as the place to which certain Benjamite clans were carried captive. The town is probably identical with that implied in Manahath, a town with the Manahath of the Gr. text of Jos 15:49, and if the text in Jgs, is correct, with the Menaah in Jg 20:15 R.V. 2. Gn 36:28 (P), 1 Ch 1:25 'son of Shobal, son of Sh Actors.' the Horite,' i.e. eponymous ancestor of a clan of Edom, 62 of the earlier population conquered and absorbed by Edom. MANAHATHITES (RV Menaahoth) in 1 Ch 29:24, 1 Ch 29:24.—The genealogy in these two passages is to be interpreted as meaning that the city Manahath, occupied by portions of two sections of the Edomite clan Caleb, came to be reckoned toJudah.

MANASSEH.—1. In MT and AV of Jg 15:20 Manassæs is a scribal change for dogmatic purposes, the original being Moses (see Genesis, 1). 2. A son of Pharaoh's architect (Ezr 10:9); 3. Son of Hashum (Ezr 10:9).

MANASSEH.—The firstborn of Joseph, and full brother of Ephraim (Gn 41:1 [E]), by Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On (v.4 [J]).

The popular etymology makes the name a Pēlē ptp. of the verb năḏāḵ, 'to forget,' if Josephus (Ant. 13.7.2, 7.209) adopted this without criticism, as do our Hebrew Lexicons. In the Assyrian inscriptions the name appears as Menâš̄, Menâsē, or Menâš̄ē, from c. 700 B.C. to 612 B.C., and in the Babylonian form Yâqūb-šulû found in the contract tablets of the time of Hammurabi (23rd cent. B.C.) and Jacob-êl (or -her) found on one of the scarabs of an Egyptian king of the Hyksos period, is not to be translated 'Yakub is god.' As forms like Yâakub-tû, Yāmēk-tû, etc., render probable, šulû is subject. Nevertheless, there may have been a certain amount of confusion between Manasseh and Jacob. Jacob's name, we are told, was afterwards changed to Israel, and Manasseh is said to have been the elder brother of Ephraim, the name which later became almost synonymous with Israel, and, finally, in Jg 13:23 Manasseh and Israel appear to be used as synonymous. But where no distinction is made it appears that ignorance was so great as to believe that the etymology tales of our sources.

In our oldest source bearing upon the early tribal settlement (Jg 6) the name of Manasseh does not appear, though that of Ephraim does. Machir there (v.14) seems to take the place of Manasseh. In Gn 50:21 (E) he is the only son of Manasseh; so also Nu 26:28 (P), but in Jgs 17:6 (ver. 7) he is the firstborn of Manasseh. In Nu 32:18, 11 (v.16 is not original) we have an excerpt from Je added to P's story of Reuben's and Gad's settlement on the East Jordan, which tells us that the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, went to Gilead and took it. Jair, it is said, and Nobah, two other descendants of Manasseh, also took towns in Gilead, to which they gave their own names. But, according to Dt 34, Moses, after conducting the Israelites across the Jordan, went up to Mount Hor in the land of Edom, and there waited for the tribe being associated with them. The whole story is told before the Manassites are brought in in v.9 (cf. Jos 13:27 and ch. 17). The story of their early settlement on the East side is dissected by many scholars, who hold that the East was later conquered from the West. As we have seen in Jg 5, where Machir takes the place of Manasseh, he appears to be in possession on the West; and Machir, the son of Manasseh, is said to have gone to Gilead and taken it (Nu 32:18, etc), and if so, he must have operated from his original seat. In Jos 17:12-18 we read of the complaint of the 'children of Joseph' to Joshua that he had given them 'humble' only one lot, despite the fact that they were a quarter of the tribe. Nothing is said about any previous allotment by Moses on the East. Further, in Nu 32:9 Bashan is conquered by Jair, who, according to Jg 10, was a judge of Israel. The argument is strong; if we have already seen, the tribe on the West was represented by Machir (Jg 5) J, the next oldest docu-
Manna—Includes Ephraim and Manasseh in the phrase 'sons of Joseph' (Jos 16:4), 'house of Joseph' (17:5) ('Ephr. and Man.' is a gloss) 189, Jg 12: 13, 20. One lot only is consequently assigned to them, the limits of which are roughly sketched in Jos 16-2. Jos 17 gives Gibeath and Bethan to Machir (in place of Jair and Nobah), and v.2 begins to tell of the assignments to the remainder of the Manasite clans, but fails to do so. But the 'clan' names, Abiezer, Shechem, and the names of the cities appended show that they were on the West. It is clear from what is said of the cities which were in Issachar and Asher (v.18f.) that they were only ideally in Manassas's territory, and that the latter was confined on the north to the hill-country. Like the rest of the tribes, they 'were not able to drive out the Canaanites.' When they made their complaint to Joshua (vv.14-15) that they were too cramped in their abode to better themselves, he seniortiy raised the religious disrepute against the newcomers which they could clear out the mountain forests and develop in that way, and so ultimately got the upper hand of the Canaanites in the plains. It should be said that the names of the rest of the sons of Manasseh, Asshur, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Hepher, Shemida, as well as the five daughters of Zelophehad, the great-grandson of Machir, are probably all place-names, as some of them are related by sound, and not personal names.

Whether Joseph was a tribe has been doubted, because there is no mention of it in Jg 5, and the fact that the name Machir appears to be from the root mchdr, 'to sell,' has raised the question whether the story of Joseph's sale into Egypt did not arise in connexion with it.

For the clans see Jos 17:1-2 (J), Nu 26:34-36 (P), 1 Ch 7:14-19 (P).

The tribe, owing to its situation, had much to endure during the Syrian wars (Am 1:2 K 10:9), and, according to 1 Ch 5:26, the eastern half was deported (n.c. 743) by Tiglath-pileser III. (see GAD). See also Thomas of Israel.

James A. Craig.

MAnna,—Son of Hezekiah, reigned longer than any king of his line—fifty-five years, according to our sources (2 K 21). His reign was remarkable for the religious reaction against the reforms which had been made by Hezekiah. The record (vv.2-3) is that he built again the altars which Hezekiah had destroyed, and erected altars for Baal, and made an askrh, as Ahab had done, and that he worked in the house of the host and served them. In restoring the old altars he doubtless thought he was returning to the early religion of the nation, and the Baal whom he worshipped was probably identified in the minds of these people with the national God Jahweh. The askrh was a well-known accomplishment of the altars of Jahweh down to the time of Hezekiah. In all this Manasseh's measures may be called conservative, while his worship of the 'host of heaven' was no doubt a State necessity owing to the Assyrian rule. The sacrifice of his son and the practice of witchcraft and magic, of which he boasted, were also sanctioned by ancient Israelite custom. The reaction was accompanied by active persecution of the prophet party, which can hardly surprise us, toleration being an unknown word. On account of these sins, Manasseh was represented by later writers as the man who filled the cup of Judah's iniquity to overflowing, and who thus made the final catastrophe of the nation inevitable.

Manasseh.—1. 1 Es 9:9 = Manasseh, No. 3 (Est 10:10).
2. Judith's husband (Jth 8).
3. An unknown person mentioned in the dying words of Tobit (To 14:9).
4. For 'Prayer of Manasseh' see APOCRYPHIA, § 11.

Mandrake (d'ad'âm, Gn 30:14, Ca 7:1; RVm 'love apples', cf. root dodim, 'love').—Although other plants have been suggested, the mandrake (Mandravious officinarum), of the Solanaceae or Potato order, is most probable. It is a common plant in S. Palestine. Its long and branched root is very deeply imbedded in the earth, and an old superstition survives to-day that he who digs it up will be childless—so at the same time the effort of pulling it up will cure a bad humpago. When the last fibres give way and the root comes up, a semi-human scream is supposed to be emitted (cf. also Jos. BJ vii. 6). Occasionally the root resembles a human figure, but most of those which have been 'detected' to heighten the resemblance. The leaves are dark green, arranged in a rosette, and the flowers dark purple. The fruit, which ripens about May, about the time of the wheat harvest, is large and poisonous, especially the seeds. The mandrake was known to the ancients as an aphrodisiac (see p. 569). E. W. G. Masterman.

MENEH.—See Weights and Measures, 111.

Manes.—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives (1 Es 9:9 [Est 10:2 Manasseh]).

Manger.—The LXX, equates the LXX, equates the place where cattle are fastened' (Job 39: etc.). It also represents 'urwâd (2 Ch 20:9), and repheth (Hab 3:1), EV stall. In Job 36, Pr 14: 806a may mean the stall or shelter: in 15 1 the bullock in which the food was placed. A like ambiguity attaches to 'urwâd or 'urwâd (2 Ch 35:2), lit. 'collecting place' or 'collected herd.' It probably came to mean a certain number of animals, as a 'pair' or 'team' (1 K 4: 2, Ch 5: 2). (See Genesis). The Heb. repheth (Hab 3:1) clearly means 'stall'; marbajq is the place where the cattle are tied up' (1 S 28:9 'fatted calf' = 'calf of the stall,' Jer 46: 20, Am 5: 4; phlae may therefore denote small < from the 'mane or radd.'

If kotatuma (Lk 2) means 'guest chamber' (see art. HOSPITALITY, ad fin.). Joseph and Mary may have moved into the side of the house occupied by the cattle, from which the living-common distinguished by a high door, with a little hollow in the edge, out of which the cattle eat. The present writer has seen a child laid in such a manger. Or, in the crowded khân, only the animals' quarters may have been provided shelter. We do not now know. Ancient tradition places Jesus' birth in a cave near Bethlehem. Gaves under the houses are extensively used in Palestine as stables. The midhâwâ, 'manger,' cut in the side, is an excellent curb for a baby.

Mani (1 Es 9:9) = Bani of Ezr 10:9 and 1 Es 5:4.

Manius.—According to 2 Mac 11:4, Titus Manius was one of two Roman legates who, being on their way to Antioch after the campaign of Lysias against Judas in the year B.C. 163, sent a letter to the Jews confirming the concessions of Lysias, and offering to undertake the charge of their interests at Antioch in concert with their own envoy. This action would be in accord with the policy the Romans were following towards the Syrian kingdom, and is probable enough. But we have no knowledge from any other source of the presence in the East of any legate called Titus Manius.

A. E. HILLARD.

Manna.—The food of the Israelites during the wanderings (Ex 16: 3, Jos 5:4), but not the only food available. Documents of various dates speak of (a) cattle (Ex 17:10; 34; Nu 7:4), especially in connection with sacrifice (Ex 24:32; Lv 5:10; Nu 9:10; Nu 7:5); (b) flour (Nu 27:1.2. 3. etc., Lk 10:24); (c) food in general (Dt 2, Jos 1:11).

The origin of the word is uncertain. In Ex 16:18 the exclamation might be rendered, 'It is manna!' (note
MANOAH

RVm. If so, the Israelites were reminded (but only vaguely, see v. 14) of some known substance. The similar Arabic word means 'gift.' More probably the words are a question—'What is it?' Unaware of the proper term, they thus spoke of manna as 'the-what-it-is.'

2. The manna was flaky, small, and white (Ex 16:4). It resembled the 'seed' ('better fruit') of the coriander plant (Ex 16:2, Nu 11:7), and suggested bdellium (Nu 11:7 [see § 3]). It could be ground, and was stewed or baked (Ex 16:4, Nu 11:10). The taste is compared to that of honey-wafers (Ex 16:3), or oil (Nu 11:5). It was gathered fresh every morning early (but see § 4), if exposed to the sun, it melted (Ex 16:4; cf. Wis 19:17); if kept overnight (see § 4), it went bad (Ex 16:14). Each person was entitled to a measured 'omer of manna (Ex 16:13).

3. Many would identify manna with the juice of certain trees. The flowering ash (S. Europe) exudes a 'manna' (used in medicine); and a species of tamarisk found in the Sinai peninsula yields a substance containing sugar. The description of manna would not in every point support such an identification, but it is worth noting that manna is likened (see § 2) to bdellium, which is a resinous exudation. A more recent theory is that manna was an edible lichen like that found in Arabia, etc.

4. Manna would thus come under the category of 'spontaneous, not miraculous.' The latter, however, be no doubt that the Biblical writers regarded it as miraculous. (a) There is enough for a host of '600,000 footmen.' (b) The quantity gathered proves exactly suited to the consumer's appetite (Ex 16:18).

(c) The Sabbath supply (gathered the previous day) retains its freshness (Ex 16:23). (d) An 'omer of it is kept as a sacred object near (Ex 16:18) but not within (1 K 8:1; cf. He 9, Rev 19:3) the ark. (e) Allusions to it suggest the supernatural (Neh 8:10, Ps 79:2). 10% of 2 Es 11, Wis 16:9 (169).

5. All this must lend significance to NT mention. Christ as the living bread is typified by manna (Jn 6:31, 58; etc.) and sacred spiritual sustenance is the reward for 'him that overcometh' (Rev 2:7).

MANOAH.—The father of Samson, of the town of Zorah, and of the family of the Danites (Jg 13:25). 142, 2. 1. 8. 10 (169). We learn but little of his character and occupation from the Biblical narrative. He was a worshipper of Jehovah, and a man of reverent piety; he was hospitable, like his ancestor Abraham; he showed no dislike of his people for the alien surrounding tribes, and strongly deprecated an alliance between his son and the Philistines. The second narrative gives us the following information about him. His wife was barren, but she was warned by a Divine messenger that she was destined to bear a son who was to be a Nazirite and dedicated to Jehovah. The messenger appeared again when Manoah also was present, and repeated his prophecy (Jg 13:5). We hear of Manoah on four more occasions: we find him remonstrating with his son about the proposed Philistine marriage (14:4); he accompanied his son on the preliminary visit to Timnah (vv. 7-9), and again to the marriage itself (vv. 14, 15). He did not survive his son, who was buried by his side (16:1). Cf. art. SAMSON.

These scanty details are somewhat amplified by Josephus (Ant. v. viii. 2, 3), who was apparently following some ancient Jewish tradition: T. A. MOXON.

MANSION.—The English word occurs in Scripture only in Jn 14:21. In "My Father's house are many mansions' (RVm 'Or, abiding places'). Its retention is an archaism, for the modern connotation of a house of some dignity is quite lacking in the word as used by the LXX. (255), apparently from the Vulg. mansio (abiding places'). The Gr. word (monas), like the Latin, measures (1) the act of abiding, (2) a place of abode. In the NT it occurs also in Jn 14:2, where 'make our abode' is Greek idiom for 'abide.' Hence the thought in Jn 14:2 is simply that there is a home room for the disciples in the Father's house. In the LXX the Gr. word occurs only once, viz. 1 Mac 7:28, 'give them no abiding place' (RV 'suffer them not to live any longer').

MAOCH.—The father of Achish king of Gath (1 S 27:7). He is probably to be identified with Maacah No. 3.

MAON, MAONITES.—In Jg 10:22 the Maonites are mentioned together with the Zidonians and Amalekites as having oppressed Israel. They dwelt in Mt. Seir, south of the Dead Sea. According to 1 Ch 4:11, the Maonites (called Meunim in this passage) were, in the reign of Hezekiah, driven out of their pasture land by the Simeonites. The passage is interesting as showing how long the original Canaanites held their own in the land after the Israelite invasion. In 2 Ch 20' they are mentioned as having been overcome by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20, where 'Ammonites' should probably be 'Meunim').

2. A different place of the name of Maon is mentioned in 1 Es 16:56, this was a small town in the hill-country of Judaea. It was in the 'wilderness' of Maon that Nabal dwelt (1 S 25), and in this district David sojourned on two occasions during the period of his outlaw life (2 S 23:1, 27).

MARA.—The name which Naomi claimed for herself: 'Call me not Naomi (pleasant), call me Mara (i.e. 'bitter'); for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me' (Ru 14:16).

MARAH.—The first 'station' of the Israelites after crossing the sea (Ex 15:22, Nu 33:16). If the passage was in the neighbourhood of Sus, Wady Hawarah, about 15 to 16 hours' camel-ride from the Wells of Moses (nearly opposite Sus on the E. side of the Gulf of Suez) on the route to the convent of St. Katherine (the traditional Sinai), is a suitable identification.

MARALAH.—A place on the west border of Zebulun (Jos 19:11). The site is quite uncertain.

MARANATHA.—An Aram. expression which occurs in 1 Co 16:22 in juxtaposition with 'anathema' ('If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema. Maran atha' [so RV]).

1. Meaning of the term.—The original meaning of the term has been disputed, but it is now generally agreed that it is a component of two distinct words (cf. RV above). Most moderns follow Bickell in holding that the two parts of which the expression is composed mean 'Our Lord, come!' (= Aram. maran atha). This seems preferable to the elder view, according to which the meaning would be 'Our Lord has come!' (= Aram. mahan ath). The imperative sense is made probable by Rev 22:20 ('Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!'), from which it may perhaps be inferred that some such formula as 'O our Lord, or O Lord, come!' was in use in early Christian circles. A very early instance of the use of the term occurs in the Didache at the end of the Eucharistic prayer (ch. 10).

The passage runs as follows:

'Let grace come, and this world pass away. Hosanna to the God of David.

If any is holy, let him come: if any is not, let him repent. Maranatha. Amen.'

Here the combination maranatha. Amen (= 'O our Lord, come! Amen') is strikingly parallel with the remarkable phrase in Rev 22:16 ('Amen. Come, Lord') It is noticeable also that in both passages the expression is used as a concluding formula. Whether any such formula was in use among the Jews is disputed. An old Jewish acrostic hymn, still extant in all types of the Jewish liturgy, the initial letters of the lines of which may be read 'Amen Come' (Heb. גֶּה פֹּּתֶן בַּיָּם) at least suggests the possibility of such a usage.
MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

2. Original significance of the expression.—It is clear from the passage in the Didache cited above that 'maranatha' cannot be referred as a formula of excommunication synonymous with 'anathema' (so Calvin, comparing 'Abba, Father'). It was rather a watchword of the earliest Christian community, embodying the thought in the form of a prayer that the 'Parousia,' or Second Advent of the Lord, might soon be consummated, in accordance with the ardent expectations current in the first generation.

It is, however, under the influence of false exegesis, the term acquired an imprecatory sense. It thus occurs in an early sepulchral inscription (4th or 5th cent.) from the island of Salamis. Its supposed correspondence with the Jewish shammashim (the 3rd or highest degree of excommunication) has, of course, nothing to substantiate it. Further details of this development will be found in Hastings' DB, s.v.

MARCUS.—AV of Col 4th, Phil. 8, 1 P 1.3.—Mark (wh. see).

MARCUSHEVAN.—See Time.

MARDOCHEUS.—I. The name of Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, appears in this form in Ad. Est 10.11. 15 1 Es 4.28—Mordecai, Est 2.1, Neh 6.14. Later on, under the name Maris, Josephus describes (Ant. xiv. viii. 6 etc.) its extremely chequered history. The site of Maresah has now with certainty been identified as Tell Sanda-kalneh. This gulf was partially excavated by Bliss and Macalister, but the identity of the site was finally demonstrated by the finding, in 1902, of a tomb by Messrs. Peters and Tiersch, adorned with a number of interesting painted animals, etc., and with 200 inscriptions recording the names of many Phoenician inhabitants of Maris, about a.c. 200. The hill on which the ruins of Maresah stand is riddled with the most extraordinary caves, once human dwellings. The old name Marisah still lingers in Khurbet Mersah, the name of some ruins about half a mile off. See also Marisa.

M ARIMOTH (2 Es 15)—Meraloth (Ezr 7)—also called Memreloth, Is 8.8.

MARISA.—The Gr. form of the name Maresah. It occurs only in 2 Mac 1.25, but should be read also in 1 Mac 5.8, where all Greek MSS wrongly have 'Samaria.'

MARK (JOHN).—There are three groups of NT passages which have the name Mark occurs.

(1) John Mark was a Jew and son of Mary, who was a leading Christian woman at Jerusalem. At her house the faithful assembled for prayer, and thither Peter went on his release from imprisonment, having perhaps previously lodged there (Ac 12:12). An improbable conjecture makes Mark the son of the 'goodman of the house' in Mk 14:14, and another, not so unlikely, identifies Mark himself with the 'young man' of Mk 14:51; but the Muratorian Fragment (see next art. §1) apparently denied that Mark had ever seen our Lord. Probably Mary was a widow. 'Mark' would be an added name such as the Jews often took, in Roman fashion; it was a Roman praenomen, much used among Greek-speaking people, but not common among the Jews. John Mark was chosen as companion of Barnabas and Saul when they left Jerusalem for Antioch (Ac 13:12—the reading of RV is hardly possible), and taken with them on their Second Journey (13:19), not as chosen expressly by the Holy Ghost (ct. v.1), and not as an equal; 'they had also John as their attendant (AV minister').

It has been suggested that Mark was a Levite (see below), and that the designation here used means 'a synagogue minister,' as in Lk 4:1 (Chase). But this would make the words 'they had' intolerably harsh. Probably Mark's work was to arrange the Apostles' journeys, perhaps also to baptize—a work not usually performed by St. Paul himself (1 Co 1:14). Mark remained with the Apostles on their journey through Cyprus, but left them at Perga in Pamphylia (Ac 13:3) either from cowardice, or more probably, because the journey to Pisidian Antioch and beyond, involving work among distant Gentiles, was a change of plan which he did not approve (Ramsay). He had not yet grasped the idea of a worldwide Christianity, as St. Paul had. His departure to Jerusalem led later to the estrangement of Paul and Barnabas; the latter wished to take Mark with them on the Second Journey (15:29-30), but Paul refused, and separated from Barnabas, who then took Mark to Cyprus.

(2) The Mark of the Pauline Epistles was cousin of Barnabas (Col 4th RV), probably of the Jewish colony of Cyprus, and a Levite (Ac 4:6). It is therefore generally agreed that he was the same as John Mark. If so, he became reconciled to St. Paul, and was his 'fellow-worker' and a 'comfort' to him (Col 4:6; Philem 24), and useful to him in ministering (2 Cor 8:19). Paul's reference to Mark's special office, not to be an original organization but a useful assistant (Swete). We learn that Mark was contemplating a visit to Colosse, and perhaps that the Colossians had hesitated to receive him (Col 4:19).

(3) The Petrine Mark.—St. Peter speaks of a Mark as his 'son' (1 P 5:19), and as being with him at 'Babylon' when he wrote the First Epistle. It is usually held that 'Babylon' means Rome, as there seems not to have been a Jewish colony in the real Babylon at the time, and as all ecclesiastical tradition connects St. Peter's work with Rome. If this be so, we may safely identify the Mark of the Second Epistle as St. Mark's special office, not to be an original organization but a useful assistant (Swete). We learn that Mark was contemplating a visit to Colosse, and perhaps that the Colossians had hesitated to receive him (Col 4:19).

(4) The Petrine Mark.—St. Peter speaks of a Mark as his 'son' (1 P 5:19), and as being with him at 'Babylon' when he wrote the First Epistle. It is usually held that 'Babylon' means Rome, as there seems not to have been a Jewish colony in the real Babylon at the time, and as all ecclesiastical tradition connects St. Peter's work with Rome. If this be so, we may safely identify the Mark of the Second Epistle as St. Mark's special office, not to be an original organization but a useful assistant (Swete). We learn that Mark was contemplating a visit to Colosse, and perhaps that the Colossians had hesitated to receive him (Col 4:19).

MARK, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. —1. External testimony.—It is possible that the first reference to Mk. is the preface to Lk. (1:1), which implies that the narratives spoken of were, in St. Luke's opinion, incomplete and not in the best order. Mk. is certainly incomplete from the date of the Fragment (see next art. §1) apparently denied that Mark had ever seen our Lord. Probably Mary was a widow. 'Mark' would be an added name such as the Jews often took, account (c. a.d. 140 or earlier), as derived from 'the Elder' from whom he gleaned traditions: 'Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately everything that he remembered, without however recording in order what was either said or done by Christ (cf. the Lukan prefase). For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow Him, but afterwards, as I said, (attended) Peter, who adapted his instructions to the needs (of his hearers), but had no design of giving a connected account of the Lord's oracles [or words]. So then Mark made no mistake while he thus wrote down some things as he remembered them; for he made it his business to omit anything that he heard, nor to set down any false statement therein.'

Here Papias vindicates Mark from inaccuracy and from errors of omission as far as his knowledge went, but finds fault with him for not having preserved the order, which was due to his being dependent only on Peter's oral teaching. He was Peter's 'interpreter'—a phrase which may mean that he translated Peter's words into a foreign tongue during the Apostle's lifetime, as a dragoman, or that he had the making of teaching widely known through his written Gospel. Justin Martyr (c. a.d. 150) says (Dial. 106) that Christ changed Simon's name to Peter, and that this is written 'in his Memoirs,' and also that he 'hanged the name of the sons of Zebedee to Bonnerges, which is Sons of Thunder.' But the last words occur only in Mk 3°, where also we read of Simon's new name. It is reasonable, therefore, to infer that of Harman's of Eusebius for Mark's. Justin is here quoting the apocryphal Gospel of pseudo-Peter, which, as far as we know, did not contain these words—it is only a fragment) to suppose that Justin by 'his Memoirs' means the tradition elsewhere speaks of 'Memoirs'—the Memoirs composed by [the Apostles] which are called Gospels' (Apol. 1. 66, cf. also Dial. 103, where he uses the same name for the writer of these narrative writings by approves of the Apostles).—Tatian included Mark in his Didascalien, or Harmony of the four Gospels.—Irenæus (Har. il. 1. 1 and 10. 6) speaks of Mark as 'Peter's interpreter and disciple,' and says that he handed over the things he was writing the things preached by Peter after the departure of Peter and Paul (note the indication of date).—Tertullian calls Mark 'Peter's interpreter.'—The Muratorian Fragment (c. 170-2007) begins in the midst of a sentence which has made the believers to refer to Mk., and which may mean that the Evangelist was present at some of Peter's discourses only, or perhaps that he heard some of our Lord's discourses, but the 'translation in order' is what he followed, which says of Luke: 'Neither did he himself see the Lord in the flesh.' The writer probably therefore had said that Mark had never seen our Lord.—Clement of Alexandria (c. a.d. 200) says that while Peter was preaching the Gospel at Rome (ct. Irenæus above), Mark wrote down what he said at the request of the hearers, Peter neither forbidding it nor urging it.—Origen seems to bear this out, but in the Muratorian Fragment there is a similar story about John,—of later writers only Augustine need be quoted. He calls Mark 'Matthew's follower and abbreviator.' This saying, which is probably widely removed from the truth, has had great influence on ecclesiastical opinion, and to a great extent brought about the comparative neglect into which the Second Gospel fell for many centuries, there are probable allusions to Matthew in Peter's (c. a.d. 111) and pseudo-Clement of Rome ('Clem. ad Cor.' and Hermas, all early in the 2nd cent.; it was used by Heracleon, the Valentinians, and the authors of the Gospel of (pseudo-) Peter and the Clementine Homilies, and is found in all the old versions. We conclude that there is valid evidence that Mk. was in circulation before the middle of the 2nd century. By ecclesiastical writers Mark is connected almost uniformly with Peter, but (see above) there is a difference of tradition as to whether he wrote before or after Peter's death. Some make him go from Rome to Alexandria and take his Gospel there; but it is remarkable that the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen do not mention this.

2. The Second Gospel and the 'Petrine tradition.'—Internal evidence to a considerable extent confirms, however indirectly, the Patriarch evidence (§ 1) that Mark wrote down the preaching of Peter. If we accept the facts of which Peter was an eye-witness. The vividness of description (especially in Mk.) in the scenes common to the Synoptics where only Peter, John, and James were present, suggests that one of them was the authority on which the common source is built—such as the raising of Jairus' daughter (9°-10), the Transfiguration (9°-12); the story in Mk. is told from the point of view of one of the three; cf. 9° 'they saw'), and Gethsemane, and on the final pronouncement from Jerusalem, that be James, who was martyred early (Ac 12°), or John, whom another account depends (even if he were not the author of the Fourth Gospel, we might probably by this time). But we may make the well-known assumption that Peter was likely to remember the confused words which he spoke on awakening at the Transfiguration (9°; cf. Lk 9°11), Other passages suggesting a Petrine source are: Mk 1° 12° (in the Middle Ages they were found only in Mk.); and the accounts of Peter's denial (1414-17). As Eusebius noticed, Mk. is silent on matters which reflect credit on Peter. These facts and the autographic character of the Gospels (6) lead us to the conclusion that we have in Mk. the 'Petrine tradition' in a far more exact form than in the other Synoptics.

3. Presentation of Christ's Person and work.—The Second Gospel describes especially the Baptism, the Transfiguration, and the baptism of our Lord, and then records at length the Galilean ministry. It is noteworthy that in this account the proclamation of Jesus' Messiahship in Galilee is very gradual (see art. Gospels, § 2). Even in the discourses to the Apostles there is great reserve. After the Transfiguration, the future glory and the Passion of our Lord are unfolded (9°, 10°, 12° etc.), but it is only there a short account (ch. 10) of the journeys in Judea and Perea. If the Galilean ministry, this reserve passes away. In describing our Lord's Person, the Evangelist lays great emphasis on His Divinity, but still more on His true humanity. (a) For the former we note how in Mk. Jesus claims supernatural authority, especially to forgive sins (2° 10° 12° 129° 140°); He is described as a Supernatural Person (11°, 12°, 13° 15° 16°); He knows the thoughts of man (2° 12° 13°, and what is to happen in the future (2° 14° 13° 14° 147°); His death has an atoning efficacy (10° 14°). (b) For the latter we note not only (as with the other Evangelists) the references to Jesus' human body—weariness and sleep of God; fatigue and drudgery; etc.—but especially the description of His human soul and spirit (2° 14° 15°), His human compassion (14°) and love (10°), and the more painful emotions which Mk. has in a pre-eminent degree, while in the parallels in Mt. and Lk. the phrases are almost uniformly altered or omitted. Instances are 1° RvM (the word denotes sternness, not necessarily anger but deep feeling), 3° 10°; note especially 14° where St. Mark alone speaks of the surprise, added to the distraction from grief, of Jesus' human soul in the Agony, St. Mark also refers to the sinless limitations of Jesus' human nature. Questions are asked, apparently to inform (3° 14°). St. Mark relates the one perfectly certain experience of Jesus' human ignorance, as to the Day of Judgment (13°, so [Mt.]). It is because so much stress is laid in Mk. on the true humanity of our Lord that Augustine assigns to the Second Evangelist the symbol of the man; by other Fathers the other Evangelic symbols are assigned to him. The Second Gospel represents an early stage of the Gospel narrative; it shows an almost childlike Peter, in speaking of our Lord, without regard to possible misconceptions. An example of this is seen in passages where Mark tells us that Jesus

'could not' do a thing (1156 6575). The inability is described, positive and conditional. Jesus 'could not' do that which was inconsistent with HIS plan of salvation. Yet here the other Synoptists, feeling that the phrase might be misunderstood as taking from the Master's glory, have sometimes inserted or omitted it. Therefore, we cannot say which is the better rendering.

4. An autopic character.—Whereas Mk. was for centuries depreciated as telling us little that is not found in the other Gospels, we have now learned to see in it a priceless presentation of the story of our Lord's life, inasmuch as, while it has no historical narrative in the Bible, except Jn., gives such clear signs of first-hand knowledge. Many of the instances lose much point in a translation, but even in English the fact that Mk. is invested with all the detail and in many cases the narrative has been preserved, is an important evidence. However, it is clear that Mk. was not written down by later scribes of Mk. and in Mk., the breaking up of the mud roof in 24 (see art. LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 6), the single pillow, probably a wooden head-rest, in the boat (484 RV), the fact that Mk. does not say the literal translation; the coloured dresses on the 'green grass'—another autopic touch—had to the eye-witness the appearance of flowers), the taking of the children by Jesus (980 Lk.), His 'front braid' (104; this is the force of the Greek), the searching glance of love cast by Jesus on the rich young man, and the cloudburst over the young man's brow (1254 Lk.), is a warning of the seriousness of the case. Many of the signs of an eye-witness throughout the Gospel are removed by the alterations introduced in Mt. and Lk. For the vividness of the scenes at the Transfiguration, the raising of Lazarus, and the Agony, see § 5. Notice also the evidence of exceptional knowledge of facts in 14 (Andrew and Peter living together, though the latter was married; Andrew omitted in || Mt. Lk.) and the mention of unessential matters is not found elsewhere (24 108 1524). We have then an eye-witness here; in this case we need not look for him in the writer, but the facts show that the latter was in the closest touch with one who had seen what is described.

5. Comparison with the other Synoptics.—The facts which follow appear to prove that Mk., either in the form in which we have it, or in at least a form very closely resembling our present Gospel, was before the other Synoptists when they wrote. (a) Scope.—Except about 30 verses, all the narrative of Mk. is found in either Mt. or Lk. In both, and specially as regards the former, in nearly the same order; though the other Synoptists interpolate matter from other sources. (b) Parallel passages.—If we compare these, we see that though Mk. is as a whole shorter than Mt. and Lk., yet in some portion, and in longer, St. Mark's style is diffuse, and it was necessary for the other Synoptists, in order to make room for the matter which they were to introduce from other sources, to prune Mk. considerably. (c) Correction of Markan details in Mt. and Lk.—As we have seen, Mark describes our Lord's painful emotions; these passages are softened down in Mt. and Lk. Similarly a slip of the pen is corrected; e.g. Mk. 14 RV quotes as from Mt. (for which it was) a passage which is 405, but the others silently avoid this by omitting the Malachi passage here, though they give it elsewhere (Mt 1184, Lk 2215); the words in Mk 24 RV, 'when Abbaath was high priest,' are omitted in Mt. and Lk., for Abbaith was not yet high priest at the time in question. The alteration of 'abomination of desolation' (134 so Mt 24s) into 'Jerusalem compassed with armies' (Lk 2120) is commonly a substitution of a word which is more naturally addressed to the reader, and so the change from 'Son of God' (154, so Mt 274) to 'a righteous man' (Lk 2319). In some cases, by the turn of a phrase the accuracy of Mk. in minute points is lost by the other Synoptists. Thus cf. Mk. 44 or our Lord was already in the boat (41); in || Mt. Lk. He is described by an oversight as embarking here. In Mk 10 Jesus comes 'into the borders of Judea and beyond Jordan'; the parallel Mt 19 omits 'and,' but doubtless Mk. is right here, and Jesus went both to Judea and into Perea. But the most striking corrections of Mk. in Mt. Lk. are found in the phraseology. The Markian style is rough and unpolished, reflecting the Greek commonly spoken by the Jews of the 1st cent.; many diminutives and colloquialisms are used, but are usually corrected in Mt. or in Lk. or in both. In Mk. there are many awkward and difficult phrases—sometimes smoothed over in a translation like ours, and usually corrected in Mt. or Lk. (see Lk. 8i 9i the 'yet' of RV is 'and' in Gr. 714; grammatical but harsh) 8i 13i 14i (note RV in these cases). These facts are most significant, and appear to be conclusive as to the priority of Mk. For no writer having before him a smooth text would gratuitously introduce harsh or difficult phraseology, whereas the converse change is natural and common.

There are also a few phrases made for greater precision, especially in Lk.; thus in Mk. (e.g. 34 and Mt. we read of the 'sea' of Galilee, but St. Luke with his superior nautical knowledge calls it a 'lake'. However, Mk. would call a king 'king,' but in Mt. Lk. more commonly 'tetrarch' (but 'king') is retained in Mt 14; in Mk 159 (so Mt.) we read that they were crucified with Him (145), but in Mt. Lk. they were crucified with Him (145). Many of the narratives are not only more concise in Lk., but also more accurate; Lk. has, without independent knowledge of this incident, for only he relates the patience of the robber, emphasizing correctly that it was to 'one of the malefactors' that He spoke, whereas Mt. (Lk 2399), in point of fact, does not make any reference to the malefactor at all; and in two or three cases it is possible that the priority lies the other way. Thus in Mk 84 the 'carpenter' in Mt 1454 the son of 'Joseph,' the correction may come from Lk. Mt. Lk., the giving of the name 'the carpenter' to Jesus not being liked; or it may be In Mt. Lk. the phrase 'of Joseph' being added, because it is not likely that Jesus would have been called by the same name; or it may be that Mt. Lk. retained the Birth story before them. But as the phrases in Mt. and Lk. are not the same, the priority probably lies with Mk. Also the Second Evangelist alone relates the two cockcrowings (1414 225), though the state of the text suggests perhaps originally in Mt. Lk. the cockcrowings as a unit, in a different place from that of Mt. Lk. It is hard to see why a later writer should have united one cock-crowing and it is suggested that therefore our Mk. is later than Mt. Lk. in this respect. It is, however, equally hard to see why St. Mark, if he wrote after the others, should have added a cock-crowing. If in two or three such cases the priority be decided to lie with Mt. and Lk., the meaning would be that our Mk. had received some editorial additions (see § 9). But this does not seem to be very likely.

The general conclusion is that Mk. as we have it now, or at least a Gospel which differs from our Mk. only in unessential particulars, lay before the First and Third Evangelists when they composed their own narratives. The matter peculiar to Mk. is small:—the parable of the seed growing silently (408), the healing of the deaf armourer (797), of the blind man at Bethsaida (829), are the only questions about the genuineness of the phrase, and they forgot to take bread (811), about the dispute of the disciples (944), the incidents of the young man with the linen cloth (1441), of the amending of Jesus by the servants of the high priest (1448), of Pilate's wonder, and of his question put to the centurion (1545).

6. Authorship, purpose, date, and place of writing.—There is no reason to dispute the Patristic statements (§ 1) that John Mark was the author of the Second Gospel. Clement of Alexandria states that he wrote in Rome; Chrysostom (two centuries later) that he wrote in Egypt. The former statement, both as being earlier and as agreeing with the negative testimony of the Alexandrian Fathers, is probably more probable. Many moderns have supposed a double publication, one in Rome and one in Alexandria. In either case it is probable that, as in the case of the Third Gospel, Gentiles were directly or indirectly taught by St. Mark, as a Jew writing (unless St. Luke) from a Jewish point of view. There is a general absence of OT quotations except when our Lord's words are cited (119 is an exception; 169 must almost certainly be expunged, with RV, from the text).

The Aramaic translatations like Talsiva cum(it) are interpreted, and Jewish customs and geography are explained, the 'mite' was a Jewish coin, and 13° 15′. The absence of mention of the Jewish Law points in the same direction.

The date is probably before the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. (For the argument from the Discourse on the Mount; Mkt 7:1-21). In addition, especially Mk 13:32. 33, 34, which point to the fulfilment of the prophecy being, at the time of writing, only in prospect.) The reference to the shewbread (29) it is not lawful to suggest that the Temple still stood when Mark wrote. The characteristics already mentioned, the description of Jesus' inner feelings, the style and details of the Gospel, give the same indications. If the early date of Acts be adopted (see art. Acts or (13. Acts of the Apostles) art. § 9), Mk, and therefore Mk, must be earlier still.

The external testimony, however, raises some difficulty when we consider the date of 1 Peter. For by this time Aramaic and Talmudic is no longer the mother tongue. But it is not easy to explain a very curious feature in it (e.g. 1 Pet 4:14 'suffer as a Christian'; though Dr. Biggs disputes this inference and thinks that 1 Peter was written before the Neronic persecution in A.D. 64). There is no need to dispute the authenticity of 1 Peter because of supposed references to late persecutions, for there is no good reason for saying that St. Peter died in the same year as St. Paul, and it is quite possible that he wrote at a time when suffering was. a less frequent occurrence. During this period, Mark wrote as his 'interlocutor.' If, then, we are led by internal evidence so strongly to prefer an early date for Mk., we must either choose an early date for 1 Peter, or the explanation of the Alexandrian and the Galilean, which Mark wrote after Peter's death, by Clement of Alexandria and Origen say that he wrote in Peter's lifetime (see § 1). If the former statement be correct, and if Peter be authentic, the Epistle must have pre-ceded Mk. But it is not easy to explain a very curious feature in it (e.g. 1 Pet 4:14 'suffer as a Christian'; though Dr. Biggs disputes this inference and thinks that 1 Peter was written before the Neronic persecution in A.D. 64). MARKET, MARKETPLACE

This reste on the unproved assumption that Matthew's original work consisted of Jesus' sayings only, which is very improbable, and as a matter of fact there is a time for the process imagined by Renan to have taken place, and the result, moreover, would have been a large number of variant Gospels—a given passage appearing in some MSS, in one Gospel, in others in another. In the case with the story of the woman taken in adultery. [For a more probable interpretation of Papias' words, see § 1.]—(6) It is sometimes argued that our present Mk. is an "edited" form of the original Mk., being very like it, but differing from it by the insertion of some editorial touches and additions. (For Salmon's form of this theory, see above, § 8; but the theory is held by many (e.g. Schmiedel) who reject the last twelve verses as Marcan.)

The only argument of real importance urged by those who hold this theory is that Mt. and Lk., occasionally agree together against Mk. To take one example only, Mk. 1:11 has 'the Holy Ghost' where Mt. 3:11 and Lk. 3:17 have "with the Holy Ghost and fire". If Mt. and Lk. are later than Mk.,—unless the First Evangelist knew the Third Gospel or the Third Evangelist the First, both of which suppositions are confessedly improbable,—then, it is said, explain their agreement against Mk. Therefore we must suppose, it is urged, that these phrases where they agree were in the original of Mk. and have been altered in our Mk. This theory in itself is grossly improbable, for it seems in some cases that a later editor (our Mark) altered a smooth construction into a difficult one, and this cannot have been done in Mt. or Lk. (see § 5.) which is hardly to be conceived. But this difficulty rests on the unproved assumption noticed just now, that the 'non-Markan' disjunctives have not found their way into Mt. or Lk. (see § 5.) which is exactly what we should expect. Mt. and Lk. sometimes follow Mk., other times none of them; sometimes one follows the one and the other the other, and sometimes both follow the non-Markan source. This fully accounts for their agreement against Mk.

It is indeed possible, as many think, that a very few phrases in our Mk. are later editorial additions; but even this hypothesis is unnecessary, and it seems on the whole most probable that our Mk. is the original Mk., and that it was used by the First and Third Evangelists.

MARKET, MARKETPLACE.—The former is found in OT in Ezk. 27:17 etc. as the rendering of a collective noun signifying "articles of exchange," hence RV throughout being AV rendering of another word for which RV gives "mart." In NT 'market' has disappeared from RV in favour of the uniform "marketplace." (Gr. agora). Here we may notice the distinction between the 'market' of Jerusalem (Mt. 11:14, Mk 7:2) etc., which were simply streets of shops—the "bazaars" of a modern Eastern city—and the 'market' (AV) or "marketplace" (RV) of a Greek city (Ac. 10:19, 17). The latter was the centre of the public life of the city, and was a large open space adorned with colonnades and statues, and surrounded by temples and other public buildings.

MARKS.—I. The mark of circumcision.—This is an instance (among many) of the taking-over of a pre-existing rite, and adapting it to Jahweh-worship; whatever it may have meant in its origin—and opinions differ very widely on this point—it became among the Israelites, the mark per diem oure of a Jahweh-worshipper (cf. Gn. 17:11), the symbol of the covenant between Him and His people (see, further, CIRCUMCISION). 2. The mark of Cain (Gen. 4:15).—In seeking to discover the purpose of this sign or omission that obviously suggests itself, is why should there be any protective efficacy in such a sign? On the assumption of its being a tribal mark (so Robertson Smith, Other Races), men would now that it was done to its bearer would be avenged by the other members of the tribe (see art. CAIN). But this answer is unsatisfactory, because, if it was a tribal mark, it would be common to all the members of the tribe, whereas this one is spoken of as being specifically given to Cain in order to protect him qua manslaughterer; a tribal mark would have been on him before the murder of Abel. But then again, any mark designed to protect him on account of being a murderer, would, according to the custom, rather have the opposite effect. Another point to be borne in mind is that from the writer's point of view (if the narrative is a unity) there really was nobody to hurt Cain except his parents. It is clear, therefore, that the contradictory elements in the narrative show that it has no basis in fact; it is more reasonable to regard it as one of the 'antiquarian' stories with which the Book of Genesis is filled, and which purport to echo the customs and beliefs of some custom the real reason for which had long been forgotten. One can, of course, only conjecture what custom it was of which this story gave the supposed origin; but, taking all its elements into consideration, it was very probably the answer to the inquiry: Why do man-slayers within the tribe bear a special mark, even after the blood-wit has been furnished?—The response given was quite wrong, but it was accounted satisfactorily for a custom of which the origin had been forgotten, and that was sufficient.

3. The mark of the prophet.—In 1 K 20:20 there is the story of how one man, with a headband over his eyes, the king does not recognize the man as a prophet until the latter takes away this covering from his face, whereupon the king 'discovered' the mark as one of his, and thereby recognized himself as belonging to the prophetic order. This conclusion is strengthened by several other considerations. (1) It is a fact that among the other Israelites the mark corresponding to the prophetic order of the Israelites are distinguished by incisions made on their persons. (2) There is the analogy of circumcision; just as among the Israelites this was, in spirit, the distinguishing mark of the people of Jahweh, so those who, like the prophets, were more especially His close followers also had a special mark, a distinctive sign, which differentiated them from other men. (3) The custom of putting a mark upon cattle to denote ownership, and for the purpose of differentiating from other herds, was evidently well known in early Israel. When one remembers how the anthropomorphisms were among the Israelites, it is perhaps not fanciful to see here an analogy: just as the owners of herds marked their own property, so Jahweh marked His own people; and as the prophet would differentiate from the ordinary class, so the mark would have their special mark. (4) There is the passage Zec. 13:4. These considerations point distinctly to marks of some kind or other which, either on the forehead or on the hand—possibly on both—gave distinctive characteristics of a prophet among the Israelites.

4. Cuttings for the dead.—The custom of making cuttings in the flesh and other marks upon the body for the dead (Lv. 19:28; cf. 21:21, Dt 14:19) was practised by the Israelites, but forbidden on account of its being a heathen rite. This was not a sign of mourning, as is often, but erroneously, supposed; it was an act of homage done to the departed, with the object of inducing the spirit not to molest those left behind. In Dt. 14:19 the prohibition runs, 'Ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness (the cognate Arabic root means 'wound') between your eyes for the dead.' This was done in order to be more easily to be seen by the prophet, taken over by the Israelites from non-Jahweh-worshipping ancestors, and was regarded as effectual against demoniacal onslaughts; hence in later days the use and name of polygamy would be in the same direction, subdividing the family into smaller groups connected with each wife.

(2) The normal type is where the wife becomes the property of her husband, who is her Baal or possessor (Hos 2:2), she herself being 'Beulah' (Is 62:1). She and her children belong to his tribe, and he alone has right of divorce. (a) in unsettled times the wife will be acquired by her (Jg 5:27). She is not merely a temporary means of pleasure or even a future wife and an addition to a man's wealth. Dt 21:10-14 regulates the procedure in cases of capture; in Jg 19-21 we have an instance of the custom. Traces may remain in later marriage names, e.g. in the band of the bridegroom's friends escorting, i.e. 'capturing,' the bride, and in her flogged resistance, as among the Bedouin (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 81). (b) Capture gives place to purchase and ultimately to contract. The daughter is valuable to the clan as a possible mother of warriors, and cannot be parted with except for a consideration. Hence the 'dowry' (see below, § 5) paid to the bride's tribe.

2. Polygamy among the Hebrews was confined to a plurality of wives (polygyny). There is no certain trace in OT of a plurality of husbands (polyandry), though the Levirate marriage is sometimes supposed to be a survival. The chief causes of polygyny were (a) the desire for a numerous offspring, or the barrenness of first wife (Abraham's case is directly ascribed to this, and among many peoples it is permitted on this ground alone); (b) the poverty or unfitness for marriage of numbers of non-Jews, e.g. by numerous alliances (e.g. Solomon); (c) the existence of slavery, which almost implies it. It can obviously be prevalent only where there is a disproportionate number of females, and, except in a state of war where it is possible only to those wealthy enough to provide the necessary 'dowry.' A further limitation is implied in the fact that in more advanced stages, when the state is established and war is rare, when secured is a source, not of wealth, but of expense.

Polygamy meets us as a fact: e.g. Abraham, Jacob, the Judges, David, Solomon; 1 Ch 7 is evidence of its prevalence in Issachar. Elkanah (1 S 1:1) is significant as belonging to the middle class; Jeholada (2 Ch 24:2) as a priest. But it is always treated with suspicion; it is incompatible with the ideal of Gn 25, and its origin is ascribed to Lamech, the Cubite (4:19). In Dt 17:17 the king is warned not to multiply wives; later regulations fixed the number at eighteen for a king and four for an ordinary man. The quarrels and jealousies of such a narrative as Gn 29-50 are clearly intended to illustrate its evil, and it is in part the cause of the troubles of the reigns of David and Solomon. Legislation (see below, § 6) safeguarded the rights of various wives, slave or free; and according to the Rabbinic interpretation of Lv 21:13 the high priest was not allowed to be a bigamist. Noah, Isaac, and Joseph had only one wife, and domestic happiness in the Bible is always connected with monogamy (2 K 4, Ps 128, Pr 31, Sir 26:8). The marriage figure applied to the union of God and Israel (§ 10) implied monogamy as the ideal state. Polygamy is, in fact, always an unnatural development from the point of view both of religion and of anthropology; monogamy is far more the most common form of human marriage; it was so also amongst the ancient peoples of whom we have any direct knowledge (Westermark, Hum. Marr. p. 459). Being, however, apparently legalised, and having the advantage of precedent, it was long before polygamy was formally forbidden in Hebrew society, though practically it fell into disuse; the feeling of the Rabbs was strongly against it. Herod had nine wives at once (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1, cf. 2). Its possibility is implied by the technical continuance of the Levirate law, and is proved by the early interpretation of 1 Ti 3, whether correct or not (§ 8). Justin (Dial. 134, 141) reproaches the Jews of his day with having

'phylacteries,' which took the place of the actual cuttings in hand and forehead (Dt 6:4-11 etc.). Reference to an early custom is perhaps (but cf. RV) contained in the words: 'Lo, here is my mark, let the Almighty answer me'; the word used for 'mark' comes from a root meaning 'to wound,' and it is the same as that used in Ezk 9:6; the reference is to those who are true to God.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

6. 'Stigmata.'—The rendering of St. Paul's strongly figurative words in Gal 6:17 adopted by RV reads thus: 'them. From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear branded on my body the marks (stigmata) of Jesus.' This rendering accords with the interpretation of this difficult passage given by Herodotus. The Apostle warns his Galatian converts against further attempts to 'trouble' him, for he is under the special protection of Jesus, whose 'marks' he bears in the scars and other evidence of the scourgings and other ills he has borne for His sake (see 2 Co 11:23). St. Paul here emphasizes his consecration of himself to His Lord by using a figure, familiar to his readers, taken from the practice of branding animals with the name or symbol of the deity to whose service he was devoted. Thus Herodotus (ii. 113) tells of a temple of Hercules, ' in which if any man's slave take refuge and have the sacred marks (stigmata) as here! set upon him, giving himself over to the gods (the esto) it is not lawful to lay hand upon him. A still more appropriate illustration is afforded by the branding of certain Jews of Alexandria with an ivy leaf—the symbol of Dionysus—by Ptolemy II Philopator (3 32-28). A. R. K. Kessennyn.

MARMOTH (1 Es 8:3)—Mermoth, Ezr 8:3.

MAROTH.—An unknown town (Mic 1:9 only). There is a play upon the name, which means 'bitternesses.'

MARRIAGE.—I. Forms of Marriage.—There are two forms of marriage among primitive races: (1) where the husband becomes part of his wife's tribe, (2) where the wife is taken into the husband's tribe. (1) W. R. Smith (Kinsship and Marriage in Early Arabia) gives to this form the name sadika, from the sadac or 'gift' given to the wife. (a) The union may be confined to an occasional visit to the wife in her home (meta marriage). This is distinguished from mere prostitution, in that no disgrace is attached, and the children are recognized by the tribe; cf. Samson's marriage. (b) The husband may be definitely incorporated into his wife's tribe (beoms marriage). The wife meets her husband on equal terms; children belong to her tribe, and descent is reckoned on the mother's side. Women could inherit in Arabia under this system (op. cit. p. 94). Possible traces in OT are the marriage of Jacob (Laban claims wives and children as his own, Gn 31:2-4), Moses (Ex 22:18), Samson (Jg 14. 15, 16); there is no hint that he meant to take his wife home; his kid seems to be the sadac or customary present. So the Shechemites must be circumcised (Gn 34:1); Joseph's sons born in Egypt are adopted by Jacob (48); Abimelech, the son of Gideon's Shechemite concubine (Jg 8:1), is a Shechemite (9:14). The words of Gn 24:1 may have originally referred to this custom, though they are evidently not intended to do so by the narrator, since beoms marriages were already out of date when they were written. Many of the instances quoted can be explained as due to special circumstances, but the admitted existence of such marriages in Arabia makes it probable that we should find traces of them among the Semites in general. They make it easier to understand the existence of the primitive custom of the 'matriarchate,' or reckoning of descent through females. In addition to the cases already quoted, we may add the closeness of maternal and paternal names, when compared with paternal names; evidenced in bars of marriage (see below, § 3), and the special responsibility of the maternal uncle or brother (Gn 24:9-30, 2 S 13:28). It is evident that the influence of

'four or even five wives,' and marrying 'as they wish, or as many as they wish.' The evidence of the Talmud shows that in this case at least the reproach had some foundation. Polygamy was not definitely forbidden among the Jews till the time of R. Gershom (c. a.d. 1000), and then at first only for France and Germany. In Spain, Italy, and the East it persisted for some time longer, as it does still among the Jews in Mohammedan countries.

3. Marriages.—(1) Prohibited degrees.—Their range varies extraordinarily among different peoples, but on the whole it is wider among uncivilized than among civilized races (Westermann, op. cit. p. 207), often embracing the whole tribe. The instinctive impulse was not against marriage with a near relative qua relative, but against marriage where there was blood relationship among those whose marriages being on the whole unfavourable to the species, in man as among animals. This, of course, was not consciously realized; the instinct took the form of a repugnation to unite with these among whom such marriages were lived; as these would usually be blood relations, that which we recognize as horror of incest was naturally developed (Westermann, p. 353). We find in OT no trace of discreetness about a marriage within the tribe (i.e. endogamy), though, judging by Arab anologies, it may have originally existed; on the contrary, the Hebrews were strongly endogamous, marrying within the nation. The objection, however, to incestuous marriages was strong, though in early times there was laxity with regard to intermarriage with relatives on the father's side, a natural result of the `matriarchate' and of polygyny, where each wife had her own property and was a separate group in her own right. Abram married his half-sister (Gen 20:1); 2 S 13:1, Ezek 22:16 improperly the continuance of the practice. Nahor married his niece (Gen 11:29), and Amram his paternal aunt (Ex 6:20). On marriage with a stepmother see below, § 6. Jacob married two sisters (cf. Jg 13:2). Legislation is found in Lv 18:17-20 (cf. Dt 27:3, 12, 21); for details see the commentaries. We note the omission of prohibition of marriage with a niece, and with any woman of married uncle. Lv 18 forbids marriage not with a deceived but with a living wife's sister, i.e. a special form of polygyny. The 'bastard' of Dt 23:3 is probably the offspring of the marriage. An address was not at least to marry outside her tribe (Nu 36:6; cf. 27:1, To 6437). For restrictions on priests see Lv 21:10-17. There were no caste restrictions, though difference in rank would have been an objection (Gen 22:24). Outside the prohibited degrees consanguineous marriages were common (Gen 24, To 413); in Jg 14:2 the best marriage is 'from thy brethren.' Jubilees 4 maintains that all the patriarchs from Adam to Noah married near relatives. Cousin marriages among the Jews are said to occur now three times more often than among other civilized peoples (Westermann, p. 481).

Racial bars arise from religious and historical causes. Gen 24, 28, 34, Nu 12:14, Jg 14:2 illustrate the objection to foreign marriages; Esau's Hittite wife are a grief to his parents (Gen 26:34?); cf. Lv 24:5. The marriage of Joseph (Gen 41:46) is due to stress of circumstances, but David (2 S 2) and Solomon (1 K 2:11) set a deliberate example which was readily imitated (184). Among the common people there must have been other cases similar to Naomi's (Ru 1); Bathsheba (2 S 11). Miriam (1 K 7:30), Amasa (1 Ch 2:17), Jehozabad (2 Ch 24) are the children of mixed marriages. They are forbidden with the inhabitants of Canaan (Ex 34:18, Dt 7), but tolerated with Moabites and Egyptians (2 Ch 24). Their prevalence was a trouble to Ezra (9, 10) and to Nehemiah (10:12). To 46, 55,

1 Mac 14 renew the protest against them. In the Diaspora they were permitted on condition of proselytism, but Jubilees 30 forbids them absolutely; they are 'strictness in the law.' This was notorious (Tac. Hist. v. 5; cf. Ac 16:3). The case of Timothy's parents (Ac 16:4) is an example of the greater laxity which prevailed in central Asia Minor. It is said that now the proportion of Jewish marriages among the Jews is about 1 to 500 (Westermann, p. 375), though it varies greatly in different countries. 1 Qv 14 probably discourages marriage with a heathen (cf. v. 12). Josephus, Mt 22:19, his brother, if he lives on the same estate, is to take his widow, and the eldest child is to succeed to the property and inheritance of the deceased (cf. Gn 38). If the survivor refuses, a formal declaration is to be made before the elders of the city, and the widow is to express her contempt by loosing her sandal and spitting in her face. The law is a compromise, possibly a restriction, of an existing custom. (a) It is presupposed for the patriarchal age in Gn 38, the object of this narrative being to insist on the duty of the survivor; (b) Heb. has a special word—`to perform the duty of a husband' (i.e. endogamy); (c) the custom is found with variations in different parts of the world—India, Tibet, Madagascar, etc. In India it is confined to the case where there is no child, and lasts only till an heir is born. Sometimes it is only temporary. In other cases it operates without restriction, and may be connected with the form of polyandry where the wife is the common property of all the brothers. But it does not appear really in the OT, and there is no trace in OT. Among the Indians, Persians, and Afghans it is connected with ancestor worship, the object being to ensure that there shall be some one to perform the sacrificial rites; the supposed indications of this among the Hebrews are very doubtful. In OT it is more probably connected with the desire to preserve the family name (a man lived through his children), and to prevent a division or alienation of property. On the other hand, the story of Ru 4 seems to belong to the circle of ideas according to which the wife is inherited as part of a man's property. Boaz marries Ruth as goel, not as levir, and the marriage is legally only a subordinate one. It is a reflection of the fact that no stigma was attached to the refusal of the nearer kinsman, and the son ranks as belonging to Boaz. The prohibited degrees in Lv 18 (P) make no exception in favour of the Levirate marriage; whether repelling or presupposing it is uncertain. In later times we have the Sadducees' question in Mk 12:19. It does not imply the continuance of the practice. It had fallen into disuse, and the Maimonides many limitations to avoid the necessity of compliance. It was agreed that the woman must have no child (Dt. 'son'), and the school both of Shammai and of the Sadducees apparently confined the law to the case of a betrothed, not a wedded, wife. If so, the difficulty was two-fold, striking at the Levirate custom as well as at the belief in the Resurrection (Edersheim, LT II, 400).

Marriage Customs.—(1) The arrangement of a marriage was normally in the hands of the parents (Gn 21:24, 24:34, Jg 14:2, 2 Es 9): there are, in fact, few nations or periods where the children have a free choice. But (a) infant or child marriages were unknown; (b) the consent of the parties was, somewhere at least, sought (Gn 24:5); (c) the rule was not absolute; it might be broken wilfully (29), or under stress of circumstances (Ex 2:20); (d) natural feeling would always make itself felt in spite of the restrictions of custom; the sexes met freely, and romantic attachments were not unknown (Gn 29, 34; Jg 14, 1; S 18); in these cases the initiative was taken by the parties. One view of Canaanites is that it is a drama celebrating the victory of a village maiden's faithfulness to her shepherd lover, in face of the attractions of a royal rival. It was a disgrace if a daughter remained unmarried (Sir 42): this fact is the key to 1 Co 7:36.

(2) The betrothal was of a more formal and binding nature than our 'engagement'; see the Arab. procedure and the custom linked with a marriage. Gn 24:46 may preserve an ancient formula and blessing. Its central feature was the dowry (mohar) paid to the parents or representatives of the bride, the daughter being a valuable possession. Dt 22:13 (cf. Ex 22:13) orders its payment in a case of seduction, and 50 shekels is named as the average. In Gn 34:18 Hamor offers 'never so much dowry'; cf. the presents of ch. 24. It might take the form of service (Gn 29, 20; Jc 18, 11). Solomon's princess brings a dowry of a city (1 K 9:4); Raged gives his daughter half his goods (To 8:31 10:4).

This dowry was retained by the wife if divorced, except in the case of a Levite. (b) The form in which this generosity and affection by gifts to his bride (Gn 24:34 34:30 where gift is distinct from 'dowry', Est 2:9). According to the Mishna, the later ceremony of betrothal consisted of paying a piece of money, or a wedding vow, the conveyance of a writing, in the presence of two witnesses. A third method (by cohabitation) was strongly disconntenanced. After betrothal the parties were legally in the position of a married couple. Unfaithfulness was adultery (Dt 22:28, Mt 19). The betrothal was exempt from military service (Dt 20:10). Non-fulfilment of the marriage was a serious slight (1 S 18:5, Jg 14:1), but conceivable under certain circumstances (Gn 29:23).

—a universal feature. The first ceremony was the wedding procession (Ps 45:5, 1 Mac 9:1), which may be a relic of 'marriage by capture', the bridegroom's friends (Est 2:9). In 29:30 of '60 mighty men of Ca. 30 going, often by night, to fetch the bride and her attendants; in J 14:15, 16, 26 Samson’s comrades are necessarily taken from the bride’s people. The rejoicings are evidenced by the proverbial 'voice of the bridegroom' (Jer 7:5, etc., Rev 19:1). Gn 29:24; Ps 45:12, Jer 29, Rev 19:11 speak of the magnificence of the bridal attire: 16:11, of the garland of the bridegroom and jewels of the bride (cf. 4:10); the veil is mentioned in Gn 4:210; the supposed allusions to the lustral bath of the Greeks (Ru 38, Ezk 23:14, Eph 5:28) are very doubtful. The situation in Mt 25 is not clear. Are the 'virgins' friends of the bridegroom waiting for his return with his bride, or friends of the bride waiting with her for him? All that it is possible to say is that the general conception is that of the wedding procession by night in which lights and torches have always played a large part; another feature was the scattering of flowers and nuts; all who met the procession were expected to join in it or to salute it.

The marriage supper followed, usually in the home of the bridegroom (2 Es 5:9); Gn 29:24; Jg 14:5, To 8:9, and 45:14; the festival was a sacred duty; he who does not invite me to his marriage will not have me to his funeral. To refuse the invitation was a grave insult (Mt 22). Nothing is known of the custom, apparently implied in this passage, of providing a wedding garment for guests. Jn 2 gives us a picture of the feast in a middle-class home, where the resources are strained to the uttermost. It is doubtful whether the 'master of the feast' (cf. Sir 23:9, 10 'the best man' (39, Jg 14:10), the office being unusual in the simple life of Galilee (Edersheim, 'Lev'. 356). There is nowhere any hint of a religious ceremony, though marriage was ever regarded with great respect by the people of God with Israel (Dt. 22:31). The feast was no doubt quasi-sacramental (cf. the Latin 'confarrearidio'), and the marriage was consummated by the entry into the 'chamber' (kuppah). W. R. Smith (op. cit. p. 168) finds in this a relic of 'banquet' (§ 1), the huppah or canopy (J 24:2) being originally the wife’s tent (Gn 24:3, Jg 47); cf. the tent pitched for Absalom (2 S 16:20). In Arab., Syr., and Heb., the bridegroom is said to 'go in' to the bride. Ps 19 speaks of his exultant 'coming forth' on the following morning; the 'chamber' can hardly refer to the 'canopy' under which in modern weddings the pair stand during the ceremony, though this has no doubt evolved from the old tent.

The wedding festivities were not confined to the 'supper' of the first night, at any rate in OT times. As now, seven days (Gn 29, 20; Ps 128:6) were not infrequently observed, and possibly the feast lasted even longer (cf. Mic 2:11). The best picture is in Jg 14, with its eating and drinking, the dance and music, and the gifts of wine, meat, and money, exchanged between the bride and groom. In the OT the dance and the feast were symbols of the coming peace and bliss of the newly married pair. (It is possible that in Syria they were exchanged between the bride and the father of her brother, or between the bride and the guardian of her dowry.)

6. Position of the wife.—The practically universal form of marriage was the Baal type, where the wife passed under the dominion of her 'lord' (Gn 3, Tenth Com.). Side by side with this was the ideal principle, according to which she was a 'help meet for him' (Gn 2:18), and the legal theory was always modified in practice by the affection of the husband or the strong personality of the wife; cf. the position of the patriarchs, the wives, of women in Jg, or in Fr. (esp. 31); cf. 1 S 25:3, 2 K 4. But her value was largely that of a mother of children, and the position of a childless wife was unknown. If a wife was childless, the position was taken by the woman of the household or by the mother of the family (Gn 16:1, 2). The legal theory was of course insufficient, and as the number of divorces grew, the position of the wife tended to fall. The position of the wife was in the hands of the law, and it is possible that the legal process was used to the detriment of the wife. As part of a man’s chattels his wives were in certain cases inherited by his heir, with the limitation that a man could not take his own mother. The custom lasted in Arabia till forbidden by the Koran (ch. iv.). In OT there is the case of Reuben and Bilhah (Gn 35:20), perhaps implying the continuance of the custom in the past (Gn 20:12), and perhaps after it had been proscribed elsewhere (Driver, op. loc.). It is presupposed in 2 S 3, where Ishbosheth reproves Abner for encroaching on his birthright, and in 16, where Absalom thus publishes his claim to the kingdom.

The marriage of the qobah (2 K 24:5) and the qobah of the elder brother’s inheritance. Est 2:24 finds it still necessary to condemn the practice; cf. Dt 22:24, Lv 18. Ru 4 shows how the wife is regarded as part of the inheritance. A widow normally remained unmarried. If poor, her position was bad; cf. the injunctions in Dt, the prophets, and the Pastoral letters. In royal houses her influence might be greater than that of the wife; e.g., in the attitude of Bathsheba in 1 K 15:12 and in 29, and the power of the queen-mother (1 K 10, 2 K 11). There was a strong prejudice in later times against her re-marriage (Lk 29, Jos. Ant. xv. xiii. 4, xviii. vi. 6). There is no instance of a coronel to the marriage of a widow, but the wife was regarded as a man's property even after his death.

St. Paul, however, permits re-marriage (1 Co 7), and even postulates it in younger widows (1 Tm 5).

7. Adultery.—If a bride was found not to be a virgin, she was to be stoned (Dt 22:24). A man who violated an unmarried girl was compelled to marry her with payment to the father of the girl (Lv 20:10). If committed with a married woman, the adultery was virtual if forced (Dt 22:23, Lv 20:10, Ezk 16:31, 34). The earlier penalty was burning, as in Egypt (Gn 38:4; Tamar is virtually burnt). If committed with a married woman in an offence against a neighbour's property: the adultery of a wife is an offence against her husband, but she has no concern with his fidelity. It is not probable that the extreme penalty was ever carried out (2 S 11, Hos 5). The frequent denunciations in the prophets and Pr. (2:4 5 6a) show the prevalence of the crime; the usual penalty was divorce with loss of dowry (cf. Mt 5:32). In the 'pericope' of Jn 8, part of the general point of view is that adultery with a married woman is an offence against a neighbour's property; the adultery of a wife is an offence against her husband, but she has no concern with his fidelity. It is not probable that the extreme penalty was ever carried out (2 S 11, Hos 5). The frequent denunciations in the prophets and Pr. (2:4 5 6a) show the prevalence of the crime; the usual penalty was divorce with loss of dowry (cf. Mt 5:32). In the 'pericope' of Jn 8, part of the general point of view is that adultery with a married woman is an offence against a neighbour's property; the adultery of a wife is an offence against her husband, but she has no concern with his fidelity. It is not probable that the extreme penalty was ever carried out (2 S 11, Hos 5).

The NT uncompromising in its attitude towards this sin, inculcating in its vision all acts of unchastity as offences against God and the true self, as sacrified by His indwelling, no less than against one's neighbour (Mt 5:3, Ac 15:10, 1 Co 6:9-11, 1 Cor. 7:1). The blessings of Mt 21:12-13, which are definitely 18th century in bias, probably refers to chastity, not celibacy; cf. 'the bed undefiled' of He 13.1. The laxity of the age made it necessary to insist on purity as a primary God-given promise (see Swete, loc. cit.).

8. Divorce is taken for granted in OT (Lv 21:14 22:24, Nu 30), being the traditional right of the husband, as in Arabia, to 'put away his wife' (Gn 24:2).

The story of Hosea probably embodies the older A priestly procedure, which is regulated by the law of Dt 24.

To be a bill of divorcement (Is 50:7, Jer 39), prepared on a definite charge, and therefore presumably before some pronounced, and formally given to the woman. (But cf. Mt 19, where it is possible that divorce is contemplated (or repudiation of betrothal?), the time and expense thus involved would act as a check. Further, if the divorcée re-marries, she may not return to her former husband—a deterrent on hasty divorce, also on re-marriage—if there is any prospect of reconciliation. The right of divorce is withheld in two cases (Dt 22:28). There was great divergence of opinion as regards the pronouncement of divorce without his notice; because, as he had found in her the nakedness of a thing.' The school of Hillel emphasized the first clause, and interpreted it of the most trivial things, practically 'for any cause' (Mt 19); that of Shammai laid stress on the second clause, and confined it to unchastity.

But the vague nature of the expression (cf. Dt 23:3), and the fact that 22 enacts death for unchastity, show that something wider must be meant, probably 'immoral or intolerable behaviour' (Driver, ad loc.). In spite of the prohibition of Mal 2:14-16 and the stern attitude of many Rabbis, divorce continued to be frequent; Ezr 9. 10 encouraged it. The Mishna allows it for violation of the Law of or Jewish custom, e.g., breaking a vow, the marrying in public of a woman divorced by a man indiscriminately with men. Practically the freedom was almost unlimited; the question was not what was lawful, but on what grounds a man ought to exercise the right the Law gave him. It is, of course, restricted to the husband (1 S 25:4 is simply an outrage on the part of Saul). Women of rank such as Salome (Jos. Ant. xv. vii. 10) or Herodias (xviii. v. 4) might arouse it, but it is condemned as a breach of Jewish law. Christ contemplates its possibility in Mk 10, perhaps having in view the Greek and Roman world, where it was legal. But the words caused a difficulty to the early versions, which substitute desertion for divorce and may be a later insertion, added for the sake of completeness.

In a later period the Talmud allowed a wife to claim a divorce in certain cases, e.g., if her husband had a leprous disease.

In the NT divorce seems to be forbidden absolutely (Mk 10, Lk 16, 1 Co 7:1-3). Our Lord teaches that the OT permission was a concession to a low moral standard, and was abolished in the ideal of marriage where a Christian partner is consented to by a heathen woman. (2) For a woman cannot be here sin before marriage; the sense of the passage demands that the word shall be taken in its wider sense (cf. Hos 2, Am 7, 1 Co 7); it defines the 'unleaquestion of Mk 10, adding the qualification 'for every cause,' which thus prepares the way for the qualified answer of v.9. This answer really admits the validity of the law of Dt 24, with its stricter interpretation (see p. 380B), whilst the language of v.9 lends us to expect its abrogation. The introduction of the exception upsets the argument, which in Mk. is clear and logical. Again, is it not contrary to Christ's method that He should legislate in detail? He rather lays down universal principles, the practical application of which He left to His Church (see below, § 11).

(f) The requirement in 1 Ti 3.3, 1 Ti 1.1, that the 'bishop' and 'deacon' shall be the 'husband of one wife,' is probably to be understood as a prohibition of divorce and other sins against the chastity of marriage (cf. He 13), made necessary by the low standard of the age. Of course, no greater laxity is allowed to the layman, any more than he is allowed to be 'a brawler or striker'; but sins of this type are mentioned as particularly inconsistent with the ministry. Other views of the passage are that it forbids polygamy (a prohibition which could hardly be necessary in Christian circles) or a second marriage. But there was no feeling against the remarriage of men (see above, § 6), and St. Paul himself saw in a second marriage nothing per se inconsistent with Christ's ideal (1 Th 5.28), so that it is hard to see on what grounds the supposed prohibition could rest.

9. The Teaching of NT.—(1) Marriage and celibacy. The Jewish conception was that marriage was the proper and honourable estate for all men. 'Any Jew who has not a wife is no man' (Talmud). The Essene, on the other hand, avoided it as unclean and a degradation. Of this view there is no sign in NT (1 Ti 4). Christ does, however, emphasise the possibility of the unmarried state in certain circumstances (Mt 19 [cf. Rev 145]). The views of St. Paul undoubtedly changed. In 1 Th 4.1 he regards marriage merely as a safeguard against licentiousness. Of course, it is connected with the view be afterwards abandoned, of the nearness of the Parousia (v.11); there would be no need to provide for the continuance of the race. (b) It was a time of distress, 'a hard ship and persecution' (v.9). (c) Marriage brings distractions and cares (v.12). The oneness of the view may be corrected by his later teaching as to (2) the sanctity of the marriage state. The viewpoint is struck by one of the most significant passages of the Cana miracle can hardly be exaggerated (Jn 2). It corresponds with His teaching that marriage is a Divine institution (Mt 19). So Eph 5, Col 3, and the Pastoral Epp, assume the married state as normal in the Christian Church. It is raised to the highest pinnacle as the type of 'the union between Christ and His Church.' This conception emphasizes both the honourableness of the estate and the oneness of all sins against it; husband and wife are one flesh (Eph 5; cf. He 13). (3) As regards relations between husband and wife, it cannot be said that St. Paul has entirely shaken himself free from the influence of his Jewish training (§ 6). The duty of the husband is love (Eph 5), of the wife obedience and fear, or reverence (v.8, Col 3), the husband being the head of the wife (v.8, Col 3). She is saved 'through her marriage' (1 Ti 2.11). The view of 1 P. 3 is similar. It adds the idea that each must help the other as 'joint heirs of the grace of life,' their common prayers being hindered by any misunderstanding. Whether the subordination of the wife can be maintained as ultimate may be questioned in view of such passages as Gal 3.8.

10. Spiritual applications of the Marriage Figure.—In OT the god was regarded as bad, 'husband' or 'owner,' of his land, which was the 'mother' of its inhabitants. Hence 'it lay very near to think of the god as the husband of the worshipping nationality, or mother land' (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 171); the idea was probably not peculiar to Israel. Its most striking development is found in Hosea. Led, as it seems, by the experience of his own married life, he emphasizes the following points. (1) Israel's idolatry is whoredom, adultery, the following of strange lovers (note the connexion of idolatry with literal fornication). (2) J's. He loves her, and redeems her from slavery. (3) Hosea's own unquenchable love is but a faint shadow of J's. A similar idea is found in Is 54:4 in spite of her unfaithfulness, Israel has not been defiled, only disfigured. Cf. Jer 3.14, Ezk 16, Mal 2.1. The direct spiritual or mystical application of Ca. is now generally abandoned.

In NT, Christ is the bridegroom (Mk 2.19, 22), the Church His bride. His love is emphasized, as in OT (Eph 5), and His bride too must be holy and without blemish (v.7, 2 Co 11). In OT the stress is laid on the ingratitute and misery of sin as 'adultery,' in NT on the need of positive holiness and purity. Rev 19 develops the figure, the dazzling white of the bride's array being contrasted with the harlot's scarlet. In 21.2 she is further identified with the New Jerusalem, two OT themes being combined in 2 Es 74. For her Bridegroom she is now waiting (Rev 22.6, cf. Mt 25), and the final joy is represented under the symbol of the marriage feast (22.19).

11. A general survey of the marriage laws and customs of the Jews shows that they cannot be regarded as a pecuniary creation, apart from those of other nations. As already appears, they possess a remarkable affinity to those of other branches of the Semitic race; we may add the striking parallelism found in the Code of Hammurabi, e.g. with regard to betrothal, dowry, and divorce. Anthropological researches have disclosed a wide general resemblance to the customs of more distant races. They have also emphasized the purity of OT sexual morality; in this, as in the other respects, the Jews had their message for the world. But, of course, we shall not expect to find there the Christian standard. In the beginning represent not the historical fact, but the ideal purpose. On 2 is an allegory of what marriage was intended to be, and of what it was understood to be in the best thought of the nation. This ideal was, however, seldom realised. Hence we cannot apply the letter of the Bible, or go to it for detailed rules. Where its rules are not obviously unsuited to modern conditions, or below the Christian level, a strange uncertainty obliterates the moral exact interpretation, e.g. with regard the prohibited degrees, divorce, or 'the husband of one wife'; there is even no direct condemnation of polygamy. On the other hand, the principle as expanded in NT is clear. It is the duty of the Christian to keep it steadily before himself as the ideal of his own life. How far that ideal can be embodied in legislation and applied to the community as a whole must depend upon social conditions, and the general moral environment.

C. W. EMMER.
MARY

1. Mary, the sister of Martha, is first mentioned (Lk 10:38-42) as living in 'a certain village' with her sister, Mary, and as receiving Our Lord as He passed on His way. We know from Jn 11:1 and 12:1 that they afterwards lived with Lazarus, their brother, in Bethany; the village, however, may be either Bethany or where they lived before moving there. The characters of the two sisters are strongly marked and rendered vivid by their contrast; we shall therefore deal with the characteristics of both in this article.

Mary is over-anxious, and distracted with household duties; while Mary, as a disciple, sits 'at the feet' (Ac 2:42) of Jesus. Martha complains to Our Lord of Mary's inactivity, and showed some temper, perhaps jealousy, by speaking of the matter to Him rather than to her. Jesus commenced His reply with 'Martha,' extolling the name as He did on another occasion of loving correction ('Simon,' Simon, Lk 22:28), and blamed her for her outward agitation ('troubled') and inward anxiety ('careful,' RV 'anxious'), telling her that she lacked 'the one thing needful.' (For various reading see RVm.) He then praised Mary for having 'chosen that good part' which from its nature was everlastimg, and so would 'not be taken from her.' He praised Martha, not for her attentive service but for allowing His service to agitate, and absorb her. Martha's character here is loving, active, self-reliant, practical, hasty; Mary's also loving, but thoughtful, humble, receptive, dependent, devoted. We find the same distinguishing marks in Jn 11, where the two sisters again appear in the narrative of the raising of Lazarus. When Jesus, after delaying for four days (v. 21) to come in response to their joint request (v. 23), arrived, Martha was the first to hear of His arrival, and at once went to meet Him. Mary, on the other hand, removed by her grief from the activities of life engaged in by her sister, was unaware of His coming, and was in her room at the moment that Our Lord for Him (v. 36) hurried to His presence, and fell down at His feet. The contrast of character seen in Lk 10 is here markedly present.

'Martha holds a conversation, argues with Him, renounces her other duties, and in the very crisis of their grief shows her practical common sense in depreciating the removal of the stone. It is Mary who goes forth silently to meet Him, silently and tearfully, so that the bystanders suppose her to be going to weep at her brother's tomb; who, when she sees Jesus dabs at His feet, who, unuttering the same words of faith in His power as Martha (vv. 22, 25), does not qualify them with the same reservation; who infects all the bystanders with the tide of her sorrow, and crushes the human spirit of our Lord Himself with sympathetic grief' (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 37).

The sisters appear again, and finally, in Jn 12, at the Supper given to Our Lord at Bethany (see art. MARY, No. 2); and again their contrast of disposition is seen. Martha, as presumably the elder sister, 'served,' while Mary poured the precious ointment on the Saviour's head and feet. A comparison between this passage and Lk 10:38-42 shows, indeed, the same Martha, but now there is no record of her over-anxiety or distraction, or of any complaint of her sister's absorption in devotion to the Saviour; for doubtless she had herself now chosen that good part which would not be taken from her.

MARY—See Witness.

1. The mother of James and Joses, was one of the company of women who followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto Him, and who beheld from afar the crucification (Mt 27:56); she is spoken of as 'the other Mary' (27:56), as 'the mother of James the little and Joses' (Mk 15:40), as 'Mary the [mother of] Joses' (Mk 15:40), and as 'Mary the [mother of] James' (Mk 16:1; Lk 24:9). That she is identical with 'Mary the [wife of] Clopas.' (Jn 19:25) is almost, though not absolutely, certain; the uncertainty arising from the fact that...
MARY

This act of Mary bears a strong resemblance to that recorded in Lk 10:38, and so similar is the general picture presented by the two narratives that many have thought them different accounts of the same event. The agreement between the narratives is striking; in both are presented the case of a woman, on the part of devout worship, who loved the house is said to belong to Simon; in both the devotion is shown by the feet being anointed, and laying waded with the seasoned hair. On the other hand, however, many differences are to be noted. The hosts, though both named Simon, are distinct, the one being described as a Pharisee, the other as a leper; the scene is different, for in one case it is laid in Galilee, in the other in Judea; the women are different, for one is Mary 'whom Jesus loved,' the other is an unnamed notorious sinner, such as we cannot suppose Mary ever to have been. The lessons drawn from the incidents by our Lord are different; in the one case He teaches love to God based on His forgiving mercy, in the other He foretells that the deed which Judea had described as 'waste' would for all time be an object of universal praise.

It must further be borne in mind that anointing was a usual courtesy, and that not unnaturally two deep loving women would very probably at different times be impelled to show their devotion by humbly outpouring their precious gifts upon His sacred feet. Very possibly Mary never had heard of the poor sinful woman's act, occurring as it did probably two years previously and many miles away in Galilee. She had not seen Simon, nor Mary heard of him; when she heart impelled her to a like act of devotion?

3. Mary Magdalene, probably so called as belonging to Magdala (possibly el-Magdil, 3 miles north-west of Tiberias), a place not mentioned in NT, as Magadan in the Greek rendering of Mt 27:66. She is first mentioned in Lk 8:1 as one of the women who, having been 'healed of evil spirits and infirmities, . . . ministered unto them (i.e. Jesus and the Apostles) of their sub stance'—a fact showing her affluence to be of more than ordinary malignity (cf. Mt 12:4, Mk 5).

An unfortunate tradition identifies her with the unnamed sinful woman who anointed our Lord (Lk 7:37); and she has been thus regarded as the typical reformed 'fallen woman.' But St. Luke, though he placed them consecutively in his narrative, did not identify them; and as possession did not necessarily pre-suppose moral failing in the victim's character, we need not do so.

With the other women she accompanied Jesus on His last journey to Jerusalem; with them she beheld the crucifixion, at first from afar, but afterwards standing by the Cross itself (Mt 27:44, Jn 19); she followed the body to the burial (Mk 15:47), and then returned to prepare spices, resting on the Sabbath. On the Friday of Holy Week, while it was yet dark, Virgin Mary was traced among a sepulchre (Jn 20:15). Finding the grave empty, she assumed that the body had been removed, and that she was thus deprived of the opportunity of paying her last homages of love. She ran to Peter and John, and said, 'They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him.' They all three returned to the tomb, she remaining after they had left. Weeping she looked into the sepulchre, and saw two angels guarding the spot where Jesus had lain. To their question, 'Why weepest thou?' she repeated the words she had said to Peter and John. Apparently feeling that someone was standing behind her, she turned, and saw Jesus, and mistook Him for the gardener. The utterance of her name from His lips awoke her to the truth. She cried, 'Rabboni!' ('my Master!')—and would have clasped His feet. But Jesus forbade her, saying, 'Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended unto the Father.' She must no longer know Him 'after the flesh' (2 Co 5:14), but possess Him in spiritual communion. This, the first appearance of our Lord after His resurrection, conferred a special honour on one whose life of loving ministry had proved the reality and depth of her devotion. She has been identified with Mary the sister of Lazarus, but without any grounds.

4. Mary the Virgin.—(1) Scripture data.—The NT gives but little information regarding her. In the Gospels she is directly mentioned only three times during Christ's ministry (Jn 2, Mk 3:20, Jn 9:47), and indirectly twice (Mt 11:2), and outside the Gospels she is mentioned only once (Ac 19).

The Apocryphal Gospels are full of legendary stories connected with her childhood and after-life. In them we are told that she was miraculously granted to her aged and childless parents, Joachim and Anna; that at the age of three she was dedicated to God at the Temple, where she remained until she was twelve; that during these years she increased in virtue, angels ministering unto her; that at twelve she was betrothed to Joseph, an aged widower, who was selected for her by a miraculous sign. The visit of Gabriel, the journey to Bethlehem, and the Saviour's birth in a cave are mentioned. It is added that at the moment of the birth of Jesus all nature was stirred; the fowl of the air stopped in their flight, and with open arms drew them not down, dispersing sheep stood still, and kids with their lips to the water refrained from drinking.

The legendary character of the apocryphal records them worthy information. Indeed, the wide-spread belief of the early Church in the Virgin-birth can be reasonably accounted for only by the occurrence of the fact itself. The date of St. Luke's Gospel is too early to have derived its view of a Virgin-birth to pass from Gentile Christians; while to Jewish Christians the whole idea would be alien. To the Jew, motherhood, not virginity, was praiseworthy, and to him the term 'woman' (to be mistrusted) needed to be given an incredible; in fact, the Virgin-birth, so far from being an invention of Jewish Christians, must have been a severe stumbling-block to them in accepting their faith.

The angel Gabriel, when sent to announce to Mary that she was to be the mother of our Lord, greeted her with the words, 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' or 'thou that art endued with grace' (Lk 1:26). The Rheims Version, following the Vulgate, renders 'full of grace'; a translation correct enough if meaning 'fully endowed with grace,' but incorrect if meaning 'fully bestowing grace'—rendering the Gr. word more properly 'incredible.' With absolute submission she received the announcement, merely replying, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word' (Lk 1:40). Soon she hastened to her 'kinsman' (v. 40) Elisabeth, who, in the inspired utterance (vv. 44-45), the Virgin then in reply uttered her noble hymn of exultation. The Magnificat is largely based on the song of Hannah (1 S 2). Naturally at such a time of deep spiritual emotion she felt back on the OT Scriptures, which she had known since childhood. She remained with Elisabeth until the birth of the Baptist, and then returned to Nazareth. Having accompanied Joseph on his journey to be enrolled at Bethlehem, she was there delivered of her Son. When the forty days of purification were ended, they brought the Child to Jerusalem ‘to present him to the Lord,’ and to offer the necessary sacrifice. Being poor, they offered ‘a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons’ (Ex 12). Then waft that Simeon took the Child in his arms, and, blessing God, uttered his Nunc Dimittis, and foretold to Mary that a sword would yet pierce through her soul: a prophecy ever present during the period of her Son’s ministry, and specially by His death. From the Temple they returned to Bethlehem, whence they fled to Egypt from the cruelty of Herod, on whose death they returned. We next find the Virgin in Jerusalem, whither she had gone with Jesus, now aged twelve. When she discovered Him in the Temple she reassured, sought the reply, ‘I must be in my Father’s house’ (Lk 2), shows that He had been to feel, and expected His mother to realize, the gulf of Divine parentage that separated Her and others. If, then, the first time, that her Son felt to be in an especial sense His Father.

For the next eighteen years our Lord was subject to the authority at Nazareth. During this time His mother lost the protection of Joseph; for, if he were alive, he certainly would have been mentioned in Jn 2, Mk 3, Jn 19. Doubtless Joseph’s place in the home was filled in a measure by our Lord; these must have been years of wonderful peace to the Virgin.

When, however, Jesus once entered upon His ministry, a time of real difficulty to her began. She, who until then had never pressed for Him a career of Messianic success; whereas He, with the knowledge of His Divine Sonship, was compelled to sever Himself once and for all from her influence, and the two failed. We are not, therefore, surprised to find that each of the three recorded incidents which bring our Lord and the Virgin together during the years of ministry centre round the question of His absolute independence of her authority. Thus His first miracles (Jn 2) gave Him an occasion for definitely teaching that she must no longer impress her will upon Him. His reply, ‘Woman, what have I to do with thee?’, seems to recognize the roughness in His fact that He does not address her as ‘mother’ can have but one meaning. Again, when the pressure of His ministry leads to His neglect of food, His friends say, ‘He is beside Himself’ (Mt 9). ‘His family’ were His mother and brethren (v. 24); and when their message reached Him through the crowd He stretched forth His hand (Mt 12), and said, ‘Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother’—words which amount to, ‘I, in working out the world’s redemption, can acknowledge only spiritual relationships.’ Similarly, as He hung on the Cross, and looked down upon His broken-hearted mother, He tenderly provided for her future, and entrusted her to the care of the Apostle of love. Still, even then He was unable to name her as His own mother, but gave her, in the person of St. John, the protection of a son. ‘Woman (not mother!), behold thy son,’ ‘Son, behold thy mother’ (Jn 19* 27). Exactly parallel to these is His answer to the explanation of the unknown woman, ‘Blessed is the woman that bare thee.’ Ye rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it’ (Lk 11:28).

It is, we think, impossible to exaggerate the bitter trial of these years to the Virgin Mary; but God’s grace kept her through her subservient, patient, and trustful.

And it is a happy thing that the last mention we have of her in the NT is when she is gathered with the infant Church after the Ascension praying in the upper room.

(2) Place of the Virgin in the Christian Church—The position she ought to hold is clear from the NT, and has been well described as follows: ‘So far as St. Mary is portrayed to us in the Scripture she is, as we could but gladly see, the most tender, the most faithful, the most humble, patient, and loving woman, but a woman still.’ Certain sections of the Church, however, have not grasped with her this limited reverence, but have done her the questionable honour of claiming for her the worship of the Church. Epiphanius (c. c. 400, n. 1. 95), called Collyridians, who worshipped the Virgin, and he strongly reproves them. But before long the error found too ready a welcome within the Church; and a considerable impulse was given to it at the time of the Nestorian Controversy (A.D. 431). In meeting the error of Nestorius the Church insisted that our Lord had, with His human and Divine natures, but one personality, and that Divine; and therefore it emphasized the fact that He who was born of the Virgin was very God. It thus became customary to give the Virgin the title Theotokos. This title seems to have been specially chosen to emphasize the fact that, by the birth of the mother of our Lord, God was brought into the world, and, at the same time, to avoid calling her ‘mother of God.’ This latter title would convey ideas of authority and right of control on the part of the parent, and of duty and obedience on the part of the child—ideas which rightly felt to have no place in the position between Christ and His mother; therefore it was avoided. It would have been easy for the Church then to call her ‘Mother of God,’ but it did not. Notwithstanding this cautious treatment, undue reverence towards her rapidly increased, and ‘mother of God’ became largely applied to her, and her worship gained much ground. With the worship of the Virgin there gradually arose a belief in her sinlessness. The early Fathers, while claiming for her the perfection of spiritual state, held that belief that she shared in man’s fallen nature and that she had committed actual sin. But Augustine, though not denying her original sin, suggested the belief that she passed through grace from actual transgression. Ultimately her freedom from all taint of sin, whether original or actual, was officially declared. The Roman Church by the dogma of the Immaculate Conception decreed by Pius IX. (1854). Similar to this erroneous development was the growth of the belief in the miraculous translation of her body after death. The fanciful legends found in the Apocryphal Gospels regarding her death were readily seized upon as supplying the requisite evidence; and in due course it became the authoritative doctrine of both the Roman and Greek Churches. The Festival of her Assumption is held on the 15th of August.

(3) The perpetual Virginity of Mary is a matter incapable of proof with the evidence available. With the Church of Rome and the Greek Church it is an essential dogma; but with the Church of Christendom it is left undefined. In forming a decision on the point many feel the great weight of the undeniable sentiment of the Church for centuries, while others see in this very sentiment an inexplicable misapprehension. Some have overestimated the sanctity of virginity, and depreciated the sanctity of matrimony. From the NT we receive no certain guidance; for the ‘III’ of Mt 1* is indecisive, as its use shows (e.g., Gn 29* Dt 34, I S 15* 2 S 6*), while ‘the brethren’ of our Lord may mean either the children of Joseph and Mary, or the children of Joseph by a former marriage, or even the cousins of Jesus. The first night the virgin is specially associated with the name of Helvidius, the second with that of Epiphanius, the third with that of Jerome. See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

MASCHEL.—See PSALMS, p. 772*.

MASH.—One of the sons of Aram, Gn 10*.

The parallel passage, 1 Ch 1* gives Meshech (wh. see), as also does LXX in both passages. But this is wrong, as Meshech was Japhetic. Neither this name is meant, or a region and people in the Syro-Arabian desert corresponding to the 'desert of Mashal' of the Assyrian inscriptions.

MASHAL (1 Ch 6:9).—See MISHAL.

MASSIAS.—One of 'Solomon's servants' (1 Es 6:6); is absent from the parallel list in Ezra.

MASON.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3.

MASEKEH.—Mentioned as the home of an Edomite king, Samiiah (Gn 36:24—1 Ch 1:14). The locality has never been identified.

MASSA.—A son of Ishmael (Gn 25:14—1 Ch 1:19), representing a North Arabian tribe. Its exact location is unknown, but it seems to be mentioned in an inscription containing a report to king Ashurbanipal of Assyria (a.c. 668-626) of an attack made by the Massorites upon the people of Neboisoth (wh. see). The tribe of Massa would therefore seem to have lived not very far east of Palestine. This view is confirmed by the fact that Pr 31:18 is addressed to 'Leuel, king of Massa' (see RVm), since Pr 30 and 31 belong to the border-land wisdom of Israel. It is probably not to be read in Pr 30, where the word 'Masa' (RVm) is presumably a gloss. Cf. MISHA, p. 607 a. J. F. M'CONNELL.

MASSAH AND MERIBAH.—Ex 17:1-7 (JE) tells of a miraculous gift of water at a spot near Horeb, which was called Massah and Meribah ('testing' and 'contention') because the people tested Jehovah by doubting His provision and contend with Moses (Ps 106:14). It is implied that this occurred about a year after the Exodus. Nu 20:1-12, a later narrative (P), gives a similar account, but puts it thirty-seven years later, and with important variations. The scene is now laid at Kadesh, which receives the name Meribah from the contention of Israel) with Jehovah. Moses and Aaron also sin against Him. There are references to the first passage in Dt 6:9, 9:2, Fs 65:1; and to the second in Dt 32:26, Fs 106:26; in Fs 81:2. The two are apparently confused. Dt 33:1 regards the events at Kadesh in a peculiar light: here Jehovah provokes Levi at Massah and strives with (or for) him at Meribah. The tendency of recent criticism is to consider Ex 17 and Nu 20 as duplicate records of the same event, the locality of which must be fixed at Kadesh, where the spring 'Ain Kadis creates a fertile oasis. There the tribes were blended into a strong unity. Meribah, on this interpretation, originally signified 'the place of judgment,' because Moses delivered there his oracular sentences; cf. 'waters of Meribah' and 'En-mishpat' (Gn 14:6).

Mashal never stands alone, save at Dt 6:14, 9:2. As variants of 'Meribah,' we find 'waters of Meribah,' 'waters of Meribah-kadesh,' and, at Ezk 47:18, 'waters of Meriboth-kadesh,' if the reading be correct. Ezk 47:18-48:10 place Meribah on the southern border of the restored nation. It has been plausibly suggested that Meriboth-kadesh is the correct reading instead of 'ten thousands of holy ones' in Dt 33:3. J. TAYLOR.

MASTER.—The Greek word for teacher is τρ., 'master,' in 2 Mac 1:11, 3:1, and in all its occurrences in the Gospel except Lk 22:5, where it is 'doctor,' and Js 1:2, 'teacher.' See LORD AND SLAVE.

MASTIC (toot, Gn 27:4 RVm, EV 'balm' (wh. see), thornos, Sus 42.)—A diceros shrub (the pistacia lentiscus L.), found in thickets on the Mediterranean seacoast. The gum obtained through cuttings in the bark is chewed as a dentifrice, and also for its pleasant taste and perfume. It is sometimes used as a flavouring by confectioners.

MATRED.—The mother-in-law (?) of Hadar (Gn.) or Hadad (Ch.), one of the kings of Edom, Gn 36:35—1 Ch 1:13. In Gn, the LXX and Pesh. make Matred the son not the daughter of Me-zahab (wh. see).

MATTHEW (APOSTLE)—Two sets of parallel passages, both from the Petrine tradition, tell us of this chosen companion of our Lord. The first (Mt 9, Mk 2, Lk 5) narrates his call. He was named both 'Matthew' (Mt.) and 'Levi' (Mk. [where some Western MSS read 'James'] and Lk.), and was the son of Alphaeus (Mk.). He was a publican (Lk.), and was 'sitting at the place of toll' (Mt., Mk., Lk.) near Capernaum, which lay on the road from Damascus to the Mediterranean; here he collected dues for Herod the tetrarch. No doubt he was only an agent, not one of the wealthy farmers of the taxes. Nevertheless he must have been fairly rich, and had much to give up in following Jesus. The call is followed by a meal (Mt., Mk.), a great feast given to Jesus by Matthew himself (Lk.), which roused the anger of the 'scribes of the Pharisees. The name 'Matthew' probably means 'Gift of Jehovah,' or 'God's gift,' and is another form of 'Matthias'; though some take it as meaning 'strong,' 'manly.' It was doubtless given to Levi as an additional name, perhaps (like 'Peter') by our Lord Himself.

The second set of passages gives the list of the Twelve (Mt 10, Mk 3:14, Lk 6:14, Ac 1:13). In all these the surname 'Matthew' is given, not 'Levi,' just as 'Bartolomew' and 'Thomas' are surnames; and in all four Bartholomew, Matthew, Thomas, and James (the son) of Alphaeus are mentioned together, though not always in the same order. In two lists (Mt., Ac.) Matthew comes MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO
next to James (though they are not joined together as a pair); in the other two, next but one. If then we take the view that this James is neither the brother of our Lord, nor yet the same as James the Little (Mt. 15:26), and if we negative the idea that ‘Alpheus’ (Aram. Khabaph) and ‘Goras’ are one name, there is perhaps something to be said for the opinion that Matthew and James were brothers. But they are not mentioned together elsewhere. Only in the Mt. list is the designation ‘the publican’ added. For Matthew’s connexion with the First Gospel, see the next article. We have no trustworthy information as to his later career.

A. J. MACLEAN.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—1. The First Gospel in the Early Church.—Papias (c. A.D. 140 or earlier), as quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 21. 13) says that the first Gospel was written by Matthew, and reports that he himself had heard 15 sayings of Jesus. But this is a tradition of uncertain value. Another tradition is that the original Aramaic Gospels of both Matthew and Mark were translated into Greek by the apostle and the evangelist, respectively, in the presence of James the son of Zebedee. This tradition is also remarkable for its uncertainty. However, it is likely that the translation from the Aramaic to the Greek was not completed until later. The Gospel of Matthew was likely written in Aramaic and then translated into Greek by the apostle Matthew himself.

2. Contents, sources, and characteristics of the Gospel. The Birth narrative (chs. 1, 2) rests on an unknown source (see Luke [Gospel Acc. To], § 3), and is independent of the other Synoptics. The Baptism of Jesus and His temptation are not described in the Synoptic Gospels, but are found in Matthew's Gospel. The Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 5-7), which is the most important part of the Gospel, is unique to Matthew. It is divided into three sections: (1) the Beatitudes (Mt. 5:1-12), (2) the� anxiety of the author, and the interpretation of the Marcan source. Matthew's Gospel contains a large amount of material that is not found in the other Synoptics, such as the Sermon on the Mount, the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and the Miracles of Jesus. Matthew's Gospel also contains many additions that are not found in the other Synoptics, such as the story of the Feeding of the Five Thousand, the Transfiguration, and the Resurrection of Jesus. These additions were made by Matthew to emphasize the importance of the themes of repentance and grace in the Christian message.

3. Greek version. The Greek version of Matthew's Gospel is the most important manuscript tradition. It is the patristic text, and is the basis for the Textus Receptus and the Nestle-Aland manuscripts. The Greek version of Matthew's Gospel contains many differences from the Hebrew text, such as the addition of the word 'then' in the opening words of Matthew's Gospel. These differences are due to the influence of the Syriac and Latin translations, which were based on the Greek version. The Greek version of Matthew's Gospel also contains many omissions, such as the story of the Birth of Jesus. These omissions are due to the influence of the Jewish scribal tradition, which excluded the story of the Birth of Jesus from the Hebrew text of Matthew's Gospel.
