4. The Book of James. The Book of James is the only other New Testament book that is named after a person. It is a concise and practical book that focuses on the importance of faith in action. It is often referred to as the "James of Jesus" because it is considered to be written by the brother of Jesus. The Book of James contains many practical and ethical teachings, such as the importance of humility, prayer, and patience. It is considered to be one of the most influential books in the New Testament.
gently, and gives them explanations of difficulties; only when they are obstinate does He denounce them. This shows that it is not in its chronological order, as again, many of the parables in Mt. are grouped together (see ch. 13), but they would not have been spoken all at one time. The Charge to the Twelve (ch. 10) includes much of the Charge to the Seventy and other sayings to the Twelve (Lk. 10-15). The Discourse on the End in Mt. is grouped (see § 5). The groups in Mt. are not often closed with a formula taken from Dt. 31[LXX]; thus—79 (Sermon on the Mount), 11 (Charge to the Twelve). The six whole of the quotations, of which, 136 shows that Mt. is not a predictive character, (the Evangelists see in that the two (Mt 286, Mk 14:24), which is related in close connection with Judas' compact with the chief priests (the Evangelists seem to mean that the 'waste' of the olivet often influenced the traitor's action), whereas Jn. (12) gives the more chronologically correct position of the incident, 'six days before the passover.'

Another feature of Mt. is the frequency of quotations from the OT, and the strong influence of the Apostle.
The interests of the First Evangelist lie largely in the fulfillment of prophecy (57*). The principles of interpretation commonly applied are: a) the literal sense applies to the Exodus, taken to refer to the departure of the Child Jesus from Egypt (28, Hos 11), and Mt. conceives of events as conventionally the fulfillment of prophecy. It may be that the context, (2) is taken from the Petrine tradition, but the second ass of Mt. is an addition to it. So the 'wine mingled with water' (27) is used with a sense of 'myrrh' and not of wine; the 'wine mingled with myrrh' (27) of the Petrine tradition, seems to be due to the influence of the words of the prophecy. Zac 9, then, the narrative is taken closely from the Petrine tradition,

3. Purpose of the Gospels.—That it was written for Jewish Christians appears from the frequency of OT quotations, from the mystical interpretations, and from the absence of explanations of Jewish customs. Yet the author was no Judailer. He alone tells us of the visit of the Magi, with Lk, he relates the healing of the blind (1.7, 8); and the adoption of the Gentiles to the Kingdom and the rejection of some of the Jews is announced in it (mt. 28). The Gospel is to be preached, and baptism and discipleship are to be given, to all nations (28:20).

4. Authorship.—The question of authorship has partly been anticipated in § 1. The earliest MSS give the title simply as 'According to Matthew,' and similar titles to the other Gospels. The titles need not be, if at all, as Mt. certainly are not those of the authors, but they must have been applied at a very early state. What do they imply? It has been thought that they meant merely that the Gospels reflected the preaching of the persons named (so Burrowl in Hastings' DB ii. 297).
But in that case the Second Gospel would be to Peter, a title very close to Justin Tyrany's 'Memoirs of Peter,' which probably refers to (Mt. 24:4, Lk. 21). Thus we must have thought that both events would be synchronous, and therefore must have written his account of the prophecy before the Fall of Jerusalem. That this is so we may see by a contrast.
The Fourth Evangelist gives a prophecy of our Lord which had been fulfilled when he wrote; but he refers to the fulfilment (Jn 21:18, the death of St. Peter). It is, of course, possible that the Discourse was written down after St. Matthew's death, say in the 70's, and that a later writer incorporated it unchanged. But would not the later writer have betrayed some consciousness of the fulfilment of the prophecy? For these reasons a date before A.D. 70 seems probable. This conclusion is much disputed, and in any case we must acknowledge that the authorship and date of the First Gospel are among the most perplexing of all NT problems.

A. J. MACLEAN.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, § 20.

MATTHIAS ('gift of Jehovah').—The disciple who was nominated against Joseph Barsabbas (see Joseph [in NT], No. 6) and chosen to fill the place of Judas. Of his antecedents the NT records nothing beyond the fact that he had been a disciple from the beginning of the Lord's ministry; and of his subsequent career it tells nothing whatever.

Tradition is more lavish of information. Matthias, it is said, had been one of the Seventy (cf. Lk 10), and he justified his election by voting the savages of Ethiopia and writing two books—a Gospel and a work entitled 'Traditions' (Paradosia). From the latter Clement of Alexandria quotes two sayings: (1) 'Wonders at the things before you' ('making this'), he explains, 'the first step to the knowledge beyond'. Cf. Plato's doctrine that wonder is the beginning of philosophy; (2) If an elect man's neighbour sin, the elect man himself shall bear it.

It is thought by some that the election of Matthias was a blunder, due to the impetuosity of St. Peter; and there is reason for the opinion. (1) It was a hasty step. It was taken during the season when the disciples were waiting, according to the Lord's command (Ac 1:4), for 'the promise of the Father,' the Baptism of the Spirit. (2) The method was objectionable. (a) The qualification required in the new Apostle was not a spiritual one; he must be a man who had been with Jesus all along. It was his lack of this qualification that made the Jewish Christians deny St. Paul's Apostleship. (b) They prayed for guidance, and then, instead of trusting to Divine direction, they had recourse to the superstitious practice of casting lots—a practice nowhere else observed in the Apostolic Church. Had they waited until they were endowed with power from on high, they would have acted otherwise. As a matter of fact the election of Matthias was set aside by God. The true successor to the vacant office was St. Paul.

D. W. SMITH.

MATTITHIAH.—1. One of the sons of Neho who had married an Egyptian (Ezr 4:11): called in 1 Es 7:13 Maassitias.
3. A Levite of the guilder of Jeduduth (1 Ch 23:19, n. 259-21).
5. See Mattathias, No. 2.

MATTOCK.—The mallet of Is 7:8 is rather the hoe with which land inaccessible to the plough was hoed—nun and verb being the same here, cf. 5th Rev 'hoed' for AV 'dug.' For descriptions and illustrations of the triangular hoe and the mattock, or pick, of modern Palestine, see PfefSt, 1901, p. 110 f., and Hastings' DB iii. 306. The passage 1 s 12:31 is very corrupt, and in v. 3 at least 'mattock' should probably be 'goad.' The same applies to 2 Ch 3:14, where AV'V is 'goad, and RV 'has ruina.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MAUL.—See ARMOUR AND ARMS, § 1 (f).

MAZZUZIM.—The Heb. phrase 'gôôch md'uzôzim (Dn 11:36) has been very variously understood. We need not discuss the different renderings that have been proposed, as there is now practical agreement to tr. with RV 'god of fortresses,' and 'fortresses' for md'uzôzim again in v. 45. It is not so easy to decide which god is intended. Antiochus Epiphanes is the king referred to. He had begun to build a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in Antioch (Livy, xii. 20). Holtzmann (Guthrie's Biblical Words, a. n.), and others, therefore, conclude that he is the god meant. But Antiochus also sent an 'old man from Athens' to 'propel the people in Jerusalem, n. 70,' and that a later writer incorporated it unchanged. But would not the later writer have betrayed some consciousness of the fulfilment of the prophecy? For these reasons a date before A.D. 70 seems probable. This conclusion is much disputed, and in any case we must acknowledge that the authorship and date of the First Gospel are among the most perplexing of all NT problems.

W. Ewing.

MAW.—This Old Eng. word for the stomach is used by AV in Dt 18:3, and by RV in Jn 6:26. Coverdale tr. 1 K 22:27, 'A certayne man benede hits bowe harde and short the kyngge of Israel betweene the mawe and the lombe.'

MAZITIAS (1 Es 9:8)—Mattithiah, Ezra 10:4.

MAZZALOTH, MAZZAROTH.—See STARS.

MAZZEBAH.—See PILAR.

MAZZOTH.—See LEAVEN, PASSOVER.

MEADOW.—This word disappears from RV in the only two places where it is found in AV (Gn 41:18, Jg 20:4). In the former passages the Heb. reads כִּשׁים, an Egyptian word which probably means 'reed grass,' (RV), and may possibly cover the natural pasture lands of old Egypt. It occurs again in Job 8:1 (EV 'rush,' RVm 'papyrus'). In Jg 20:4, where RV simply transliterates 'march-geba,' it is probably certain that we should read mad'ubab, and translate 'from the west of Gezah.' See Gzeah, No. 2. In RV 'meadow' stands for 'dóth,' (Is 19:1, AV 'paper reeds'), where it is possible that 'dóth may be a misreading for òdôth.' W. Ewing.

MEAL-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 11.

MEALS.—The art. Food attention was confined to the various articles of diet supplied by the vegetable and animal kingdoms. It now remains to study the methods by which these were prepared for the table, the times at which, and the manner in which, they were served.

1. Preparation of food.—The preparation of the food of the household was the task of the women thereof, from the days of Sarah (Gn 18:8) to those of Martha. Only the houses of royalty and the great nobles had apartments specially adapted for use as kitchens, with professional cooks, male (1 S 9:25) and female (8:9). At the chief sanctuaries, also, there must have been some provision for the cooking of the sacrificial meals (1 S 2:31, although Ezekiel (44th RV) is the first to mention 'boiling-houses' in this connexion (cf. Ex 29:38, 42).

The usual method of cooking and serving meat may have differed but little from that most commonly observed at the present day in Syria. The meat is cut into larger or smaller pieces (1 S 4:23, 24:23; cf. Michah's telling metaphor 39), and put into the cooking-pot with water. It is then left to stew, vegetables and rice being added. Such a stew—with perhaps crushed wheat in place of rice—was the 'savory meat' which Rebekah prepared for her husband from 'two kids of the goats' (Gn 27:27). When meat was boiled in a larger quantity of water than was required for the more usual stew, the result was the broth of Jg 6:11, from which we learn that the meat and the broth might be served separately. The cooking-pots were of earthenware and bronze (Lv 6). For an account of cooking utensils generally, with references to illustrations, see House, § 9).

In addition to boiling, or, as in EV more frequently, 'steaming' ('sod,' 'sudden,' Gn 22:5, Ex 12:11 etc.; but Amer. RV has 'boil' throughout), roasting was much in vogue, and is, indeed, the oldest of all methods of preparing meat. Originally the meat was simply laid upon hot stones from which the embers had been removed, as in the parallel case of the 'cake baked on the coals' (1 K 18:24 RVm). The flesh on which the disciples partook by the Sea of Galilee was cooked on the charcoal itself. A more refined mode of roasting was by means of a spit of iron or wood. In NT the Passover lamb had always to be roasted in an oven, suspended by a spit of pomegranate laid across the mouth.

Eggs (Job 69, 1K 119), we read in the Mishna, might be cooked by being boiled in the shell, or broken and fried, or mixed with oil and fried in a saucepan.

As regards the important group of the cereals, wheat and barley were roasted either on an iron plate or in a pan, producing the ‘parched corn’ (Amer. RV ‘parched grain’) of OT. A porridge of coarse wheat or barley meal has also been referred to under Food, 2. The seeds of the leguminous plants were mostly boiled (4 K 258, cf. 2 K 483). The wood sav’ (1 K 119) was imparted to the stew by the addition of other vegetables of a more pungent character, such as onions. In short, it may be affirmed that the Hebrew housewives were in no way behind their modern kinfolk of the desert, of whom Doughty testifies that ‘the Arab housewives make savoury messes of any grain, seething it and putting thereto only a little salt and sam’ [clarified butter].’

The direction in which Hebrew, like most Eastern, cooking diverged most widely from that of our northern climate was in the more extensive use of olive oil, which served many of the purposes of butter and oil among ourselves. Not only was oil mixed with vegetables, but it was largely used in cooking fish, and eggs (as we have just seen), and in the finer sorts of baking. The porridge made from Zarephath’s ‘little oil’ was not intended for her lamps, but to bake her ‘handful of meal’ withal (1 K 1719). The flour was first mixed with oil, then shaped into cakes and afterwards baked in the oven (Lv 20); or a species of thin flat cake might first be baked in the usual way and then smudged with oil.

The latter are the ‘wafers anointed with oil’ of Ex 298 etc. Honey and oil were also used together in the baking of sweet cakes (Exz 108-18). In this connexion it is worth noting that when the sin offerings of the tabernacle were added to the taste of manna to that of ‘wafers made with honey,’ the parallel passage, Nu 114, compares it to ‘the taste of cakes baked with oil’ (RVm).

2. The two chief meals. Among the Hebrews, as among their contemporaries in classical lands, it was usual to have but two meals, properly so called, in the day. Before beginning the work of the day the farmer in the country and the artisan in the city might ‘break their fast’ (Jn 2116, 18 RV) by eating a morsel of bread — the ‘morning morsel’ as it is called in the Talmud — with some simple relish, such as a few olives, but this was in no sense a meal. Indeed, the washing of hands in the morning was a matter for grave reproach (Ex 108).

The first meal-time (Ru 24 RV), speaking generally, was at an hour when the climate demanded a rest from strenuous exertion, namely, about noon: the second and more important meal of the two was taken a little before or after sunset, when the labourers had come in from the field (Lk 177). This was the ‘supper time’ of 148. The former, the ‘feast of the Jews’ — as the Mishna indicates — was a very simple meal. ‘A servant plowing or keeping sheep’ or harvesting would make his midday meal of bread soaked in light wine with a handful of parched corn (Ru 248), or of ‘pottage and bread broken into a bowl’ (Bel 98), or of bread and boiled fish (Jn 2115). All the evidence, including that of Josephus, goes to show that the second or evening meal was the principal meal of the day.

3. Position at meals. Within the period covered by OT the posture of the Hebrews at meals, in so far as the men were concerned, was changed from sitting to reclining. In the earliest period of all, the Hebrews took their meals, probably, sitting on the ground (Gn 3737 etc.), like the Bedouin and fellahin of the present day, among whom squatting ‘with both knees downwards, and with the legs gathered tailor-fashion, alone is the approved fashion when at table’ (PEFSI, 1905, 124). The food was served in a large wooden bowl placed upon a mat of leather or plaited grass, round which the company gathered. The first advance on this primitive practice was to present the food on a wooden or other tray, set upon a low stand raised but a few inches from the ground. The next step was the introduction of seats, which would naturally follow the change from nomadic to agricultural life after the conquest of Canaan. ‘Saukites and messmates sat upon ‘seats’ (1 S 2019), the precise form of which is not specified, as did Solomon and the high officials of his court (1 K 109, where the queen of Sheba sits in the seat of company of his servants; cf. 138 etc.).’

With the growth of wealth and luxury under the monarchy, the Syrian custom of reclining at meals gradually gained ground. In Amos’ time it was still looked upon as an innovation peculiar to the wealthy nobles (Am 32, 6). Two centuries later, Ezekiel is familiar with ‘a stately bed’ or couch (as Est 1 RV) with ‘a table prepared before it’ (Ezk 284). In the post-exilic period the custom must have taken firm root, for by the end of the 3rd cent. n.c. it was probably universal save among the very poor (Jth 129, 20). In NT, accordingly, wherever ‘sitting at meat’ is mentioned, we are to understand ‘reclining,’ as the margin of RV everywhere reminds us. At table, that is to say, the men — for women and children still sat — reclined on couches with wooden frameworks, upholstered with cushions and mattresses, and provided with cushions, on which they leaned the left elbow (see Sir 4119), using only the right hand to eat with (see § 5 below).

4. From the Mishna we learn that in NT times the tables were chiefly of wood and furnished with three or four feet. They were lower and smaller than with us. The couches or divans were as a rule capable of accommodating several people. In the houses of the great the guests reclined on the same couch as the host, whereas in wealthy families by male slaves, the ‘ministers’ of 1 K 109, ‘waiters’ of Jth 13, ‘servants’ of Jn 210, reclining on the left elbow, the person next on his right on the same couch as the host, and the person next to him reclined on the right elbow of his fellow-guest. Such were the relative positions of John and Jesus at the Last Supper (Jn 132 RV).

5. Procedure at meals, etc. In our Lord’s day, as we learn from the Gospels, great importance was attached by the Jewish authorities to the ‘washing of hands’ before meals. This consisted of pouring water (which had been kept from possible defilement in large closed vessels, as on the occasion of our Lord’s Last Supper) over the hands and allowing it to run to the wrist (cf. Mk 71 RV and commentaries).

This washing over, the food was brought in by the women of the household (Mk 10, Lk 109); in wealthy families by male slaves, the ‘ministers’ of 1 K 109, ‘waiters’ of Jth 13, ‘servants’ of Jn 210. At this stage grace was said. The date of the introduction of this custom is unknown, for 1 S 310 is not a case in point. In NT the blessing before a meal has the repeated sanction of our Lord’s example (Mk 1420 etc.; cf. Ac 2728 for Paul).

As to what may be termed, with the Mishna, ‘the vessels for the service’ of the table, these naturally varied with the social position of the household, and more or less with the progress of the centuries. In early times earthenware vessels would be used, for which, as civilization advanced, bronze would be substituted, and even in special cases, silver and gold (see Housen, § 9). Bread, we know, was usually served in shallow wicker baskets (Ex 2539). The main part of the meal in the homes of the people would have been served in one or more large bowls or basins, of earthenware or bronze, according to circumstances. Such was the ‘dish’ into which our Lord dipped the ‘spoon’ (Mt 2629, Mk 1439). A shallower dish is that rendered ‘charger’ in Mt 1411, and ‘platter,’ Lk 11829.
MEARAH

In the case of a typical dish of meat and vegetables, prepared as described above, those partaking of the meal helped themselves with the fingers of the right hand, using the courtesies of the table, being, of course, unknown at table,—while the more liquid parts were secured, as at the present day, by using pieces of thin wafer-like bread as improvised spoons. Usually by dipping a morcel of bread, the sop of John 13:26, into the dish. It was customary, as this passage shows, for the head of the family to hand pieces of food to various members; these are the portions of 1 S. 14.

6. In the event of a Jew of some position wishing to entertain his friends at dinner, it was usual to send the invitations by his servants (Mt 22), and later to send them again with a reminder on the appointed day (v. 3). Arrived at his host's residence, the guest is received with a kiss (Lk 7:43), his feet are washed (v. 41), and his head is anointed with perfumed oil (v. 46; cf. Ps 23). He is dressed in white gala costume ( Ec 9: see Drama, § 7), for to come to such a feast in one's everyday garments would be an insult to one's host (cf. Mt 22:11). After the 'chief places' (Mt 22:9, RV; AV 'uppermost rooms') on the various couches had been assigned to the principal guests, the hands duly washed, and the blessing said, the meal began. This would consist of several courses, beginning with light appetizing dishes, such as salted fish, pickled olives, etc. During the course of the dinner, those whom the host wished to single out for special distinction would receive, as a mark of favour, some dainty portion, such as Samuel had reserved for Saul (1 S. 9:5). These were the 'meat sent by Joseph to his brethren' (Gen 43:13), and the 'bread, and a piece of meat' (Is 58:7), for a list of the parts of an animal in order of merit, so to say, used for this purpose at a feasting banquet to-day, see PEFIS, 1905, 123.

At the close of the dinner the hands were again washed, the waiters bringing round the wherewithal, and tables with all sorts of fruit were brought in, over which a second blessing was said. Although wine was served in the first part of the banquet as well, it was at this second stage that the 'fruit of the vine' was chiefly enjoyed. The wine-cups were filled from the large mixing bowls (Jer 35:9) in which the wine had been diluted with water and perfumed with aromatic herbs. It was usual, also, to appoint a 'ruler of the feast' (Jn 2:9; cf. Sir 52) to regulate the manner and the quantity of the drinking, and to enforce penalties in the case of any breach of etiquette. Music and dancing (Lk 15:25) and similar amusements, such as the game of riddles (Jg 14:19), were features of this part of the banquet. For instruction in the 'minor morals' of the dinner-table, Jesus ben-Sira has provided the classical passage. Sir 22:28-32, expounding the wise counsel of the canonical author of Pr 23:1.

MEAD.—See Sweet Water.

MEASURES.—See Weights and Measures.

MEAT.—This word is used in AV for food in general, as it is in Scotland still. Thus 2 Es 12:9 'I had my meat of the herbs'; cf. Hall, Works, i. 806, 'There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, so deare bought as this brothe of Jacob.'

MESEUNAL.—The name in 2 S. 23:1 of one of David's thirty. It is a scribal error for Sibbeel, the form which has been preserved in the parallel lists, 1 Ch 11:28, 27, and also 2 S. 21:14, 1 Ch 20.

MECHERATHITE.—1 Ch 11:19, prob. for 'Maachathite.'

MECONAH.—See Mekonah.

MEDABA.—See Mekonah.

MEDAN.—One of the sons of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:2—1 Ch 1—). The existence of such a tribe, however, is very doubtful. In Gen 37:2, 3, Medan is miswritten for Midianites (see RVm), and there is every likelihood that in the former passage 'Medan' is a doublet of 'Midian,' the next word in the verse. Medan is unknown elsewhere in the Bible, nor is it referred to by the name of any people in any extra-Biblical document. To connect it with the name of an Arabian god Madan, or with the similar name of a wady in N.W. Arabia, is very hazardous, both because the associations are remote, and because the word-form is common in Semitic, and is liable to occur in various relations.

J. F. M'COWY.

MEDEA (Nu 21:10, Jos. 13:21, 1 Ch 19:2, Is 15:).—A town in the Mishor, or 'plain,' of E. of Jordan, an hour and a half distant from Medeba, where the Jews who came to assist Ammon (1 Ch 19:12) pitched their tents, which was apparently then Ammonite. Later, Moab regained Medeba, for Omri, according to the Moabite Stone, 1, took Mezbona, and is said to have rebuilt it forty years, till Meba recovered it and rebuilt the cities held by Omri and Ahab. Jerom and Jehoshaphat made an unsuccessful attempt to retake these cities (2 K. 3), but the Moabites drove out the Moabites. Moab again held Medeba (Is 15, and probably also Jer 49; but see Middon). In Maccabean times it was the stronghold of a robber clan, Jambri, which killed John, eldest son of Mattathias. John Hyrcanus avenged this (Macr. 4, nos. 2. Jos. Ant. xiii. i. 1). Alexander Jannaeus took it from the Parthians, and Hyrcanus promised to restore it to Aretas (ib. xiii. xiv. 4, xiv. 1, 4). During the Byzantine period Medeba was a flourishing Christian centre, the seat of a bishopric, and represented at the Council of Chalcedon. In 1880 a colony of Christians from Kerak settled there. Many ancients remain have come to light,—a large pool with solid walls, remains of gates, towers, 4 oil-churches, some fine mosaics, especially a deeply interesting and important mosaic map of Christian Palestine and Egypt.

C. H. W. JONES.

MEDES, MEDIA.—A people and country called by the same word, Meda, in Hebrew and Aramaic. The Medes were the first of the Iranian immigrants to form a settled government on the borders of the old Semitic realm. As early as the 9th c. B.C. they began to occupy the mountains south of the Caspian Sea, and by the middle of the 7th century their territory extended southward to the borders of Elam. Their chief city was Ecbatana, the Achmetha of Ezra 6b and the modern Hamadan. The Assyrians opposed them, and finally subdued them under Tiglath-pileser III. and Sargon, and the latter deported (a.c. 721) some of them as captives to Samaria (2 K. 17:28). In the later years of the Assyrian empire they regained their independence, and under their king, Cyaxares, who had formed an alliance with the rising Chaldaean power, they destroyed the city of Nineveh (a.c. 607), and therewith the Assyrian dominion itself. By agreement with the Chaldaans, who restricted themselves to the lowlands, they speedily occupied the northern highlands as far as Cappadoa. Meanwhile the southern immigration from eastern Iran had settled to the east of the Persian Gulf and founded the Persian community. The southern portion of Elam soon fell to them, but they became vassals of their Median kindred. Under Cyrus the Great, Astyages, king of the Medes, yielded to the Persians (a.c. 550), who henceforth held the hegemony of the Iranian race.
MEDICINE

Among the Semitic peoples, however, the name of the Medes continued long to be more familiar than that of the Persians, partly by reason of their greater antiquity, and partly because the Medes formed the principal portion of the Iranian population. Hence the word is more frequent than 'Persia', except in the later books of the O.T.

Medis is mentioned in Gn 10: 3 among the sons of Japheth, with no allusion to the Persians. So the Medes and not the Persians are mentioned in prophecy as the mediators of the new covenant, as in Ps 105: 15; Jer 25: 29; Jer 31: 31 cf. Esdr, p. 2111. In Ac 29 the Medes are vaguely mentioned, where the reference is to Jews or proselytes living in Media and using the language of the country. Media was of great importance in the history of religion, since it was there, not in the land of the 7th cent. b.c., that Zoroaster lived and taught.

MEDICI, MEDIATION.

The word 'mediator' (Gr. messite) occurs in the NT, once of Moses as the mediator of the Law (Gal 3: 19), in the other instances of Christ as the 'one mediator between God and man' (1 Ti 2: 5), and the mediator of a 'better' (He 8: 6) 'new' ('915, in latter passage 'new' in sense of 'recent') covenant. The verbal form occurs in He 6:17 [RV 'interposed' (Gr. mediated) with an oath]. The LXX uses the term once in Job 12: 10, 11. But the idea of mediation, that is, of God dealing with man, or man with God, not directly but through the interposition of another, has a leading place throughout Scripture. Different aspects of the mediation of Jesus need to be distinguished. As regards the fundamental relation of man to God, Jesus, in the NT, is the one and sole Mediator.

1. The most general form of mediation is intercessory prayer. This is the privilege of all (cf. Jn 5: 14). Well-known Scripture examples are the intercession of Abraham for Sodom (Gen 18: 24), of Moses for Israel (Ex 32: 20, 24), of Samuel for Israel (1 Sam 12: 23), Jeremiah (159) singles out Samuel as the mediator of the Covenant. 'He, who is thus the chief representative of this form of prayer. Probably an element of intercession enters into all effective mediation. St. John (ch. 17) preserves the great intercessory prayer of Jesus after the Last Supper, and intercession is declared to be a chief exercise of Christ's mediatorial function in heaven (Ro 8: 34). Intercessory prayer is a duty of the Christian (1 Ti 2: 5), but always and fully in the name of Christ, and in the same context is declared to be the 'one mediator' (v. 5).

2. Mediation has a peculiar place in the formation of the great covenants. It is the singular fact in connexion with the covenant with Abraham of which St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews in different ways take notice, that it involved no mediator (Gen 12: 2-15). It was a covenant of promise absolutely (Gal 3: 15-19). The point of view was that of the covenant with Paul's people, Israel at Sina, where Moses was in thorough (by God's appointment and the people's own desire, Ex 19: 2-24) the mediator between God and the people (Gal 3: 17). The point of contrast between law and promise. Finally, mediation is the law in the 'new' and 'better' covenant, as the passages in Hebrews declare. The reason is that this perfect and eternal covenant, purging away the sin of sins, and removing all sin, all books to access to God, could be formed only on the basis of a reconciling sacrifice; and this Jesus alone, the Son of God, had the qualification to offer. It is noticeable, therefore, that all the passages that speak of Jesus as 'Mediator' do it in direct connexion with His sacrificial death; 1 Ti 2: 5 'one mediator between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus' connects with v. 6 'who gave himself a ransom for all'; He 9: 14 declares: 'For this cause he is the mediator of a new covenant, that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant' (cf. Ro 3: 16; 12: 10, where to come to Jesus the mediator of a new covenant is to come to the throne of sprinkling, that speaketh better than that of Abel': so also 8: 1 (cf. the context, v. 9). It is this fact, that Jesus has made the perfect sacrifice for sin, coupled with His unique dignity, as Son of God, which constitutes in the Mediator and his acts the true Mediator, our 'great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens' (4: 14).

MEDICE—Palestine was probably a comparatively healthy country in Biblical times, as it is now. Its natural features in most localities would protect it from the usual endemic diseases of Oriental lands, and its large population would have had a preventive effect on the spread of disease, the immigration of epidemics (contrast the reputation of Egypt, as attested by Dt 3: 16, 28). Again, the legislation of the Priestly Code, II, was so well observed, the existence of the enforcement of the Decalogue, that the population of cities to area in ancient times is very difficult to estimate; the figures in I Ch 21 and 2 Sam 4 are clearly mistrustworthy.

1. Jews believed in a definite connexion between health and virtue (cf. Is 58: 12, Jer 9: 24). Disease was popularly regarded as penal (Jn 9: 2), and as sent by God either directly (Ex 4: 11, Dt 32: 24) or permissively by means of others (Job 27: 3, Mk 9: 22. Where the need for disease, that is, the sorrow of the sick, was banished by Egyptian physicians (Gn 50), but there may be probably some Jewish practitioners at the time when Ex 21: 11 was compiled. The word in Jer 58 means a ‘bandager.’ The writer of 2 Ch 16:13 seems to take the extreme view that it was a sin to consult physicians, but saner ideas are represented in Sir 38: Still, it may be doubted whether medical duties were not usually performed by priests (as in early Egypt), at any rate in the earlier OT times; certainly the priests had the supervision in the case of certain diseases, e.g. leprosy; and prophets also were applied to for medical advice (cf. 1 K 14: 171", 2 K 4: 20). And even in Sir 38:8 the physician is regarded as having certain priestly duties, and the connexion between religion and medicine is seen in the counsel, given in that same chapter, that repentance and an offering shall precede the visit of the physician. In the NT we have St. Luke described as a physician (Col 4:14), and a somewhat depreciatory remark on physicians in Mt 105, which, however, is much toned down in Lk 5.

It is therefore probable that up till late times medicine was in the charge of the priests, whose knowledge must have been largely traditional and empirical. The sacred diseases are largely a gloss from some knowledge of animal morphology, but human anatomy can scarcely have existed as a science at all, since up to about a.d. 100 the ceremonial objections to touching or disturbing blood and dead prevailed. The facts of anatomy and physiology are very few in number.

Blood was tabooed as food (Gn 9:1, Lv 17:14)—a highly important sanitary precaution, considering the facility with which blood crops up in the OT, and the rudimentary embryology can be traced in Job 10, Ps 130:18 (cf. Ec 119). But most of the physiological theories adverted to in the Bible are expressed in the language of poetry and metaphor. On the whole, however, we may infer that the Jews (like other ancient peoples) regarded the heart as the seat of mental and moral activity (exceptions to this view are 2 Th 2:14, 2 Cor 12:15, the reins or kidneys as the seats of impulse, affection, conscience (Jer 11:12, Ps 74), the bowels as the organs of sympathy (Ps 40:7, Job 30:4). Proverbs about physicians seem to be alluded to in Mt 9:4, Lk 4:36, Sir 28:8. Except in the case of certain diseases, visitation of the sick is enjoined in the Talmud (though not in the OT), and enforced by Christ in Mt 22:59.

2. General terms for disease.—The words 'sick,' 'sickness,' 'sickens,' 'disease,' 'diseased,' 'diseases,' are used with great frequency in the OT, though they are not always used as the tr. of the same words in the original. Sometimes the term is qualified, e.g. 'sickness unto death' (Is 59:17), 'sore sickness' (1 K 17:2), 'evil disease' (Ezr 3:2), 'incurable disease' (2 Ch 30:26). We also have 'infirmitiy' three times in the OT, in Lv 12:12 meaning periodic sickness, in Ps 77:24 as weakness from sickness, in Pr 18:5 as weakness generally. The term 'disease' occurs. The emorbid conditions are used also of other times of sickness in general. There are also various figurative expressions for disease, and in some places it is described as inflicted by the angel of God, e.g. 2 S 24:16. In the NT, again, various Gr. words are translated by 'sickness,' 'disease,' 'infirmitiy'; the allusion in 1 Co 11:6 may be mental weakness, and in Ro 15:23 to weakness of conscience.

Leper is regarded as unclean, and those suffering from them were excluded from cities. But in general the sick were treated at home. As to the treatment we know very little. It is possible that there were times bleeding to be given to sick on blood, though in later times the Jews followed the universal practice. Pr 30:6 has been supposed to show a knowledge of the medicinal use of ichneumon; but this inference can by no means be drawn with any certainty from the context.

3. Specific diseases.—As a rule the Bible references to specific diseases are general and vague; and even where we find concrete mention of particular ailments, it is not always easy to decide what the exact nature of the maladies was. In some cases the symptoms are given, though sometimes very indefinitely.

In Dt 28:6 a group of terms is used for diseases which appear to resemble each other in the fact that they are sudden, severe, epidemic, and fatal. The first is called phthisis, but more probably it means a kind of wasting fever, characterized by weakness and anaemia, often of long duration, and perhaps not unlike Mediterranean or Maltese fever. The second term is used in Lv 26:14. The 'consumption' mentioned in Is 10:22 28:2 AV does not appear to be a specific disease at all. This is followed in Deut. by 'fever;' the same word in Lk 26:23, and the LXX translates it by the Greek word for 'jaundice.' Its symptoms are given in the passage of Lv.; it may be a sort of malarial fever which occurs in certain parts of Palestine, and is occasionally accompanied by jaundice. This disease is called in Jn 4:14 and Lk 4:4, both instances at Capernaum. Then comes inflammation (Dt 28:2 AV, LXX 'ague') This may be afever, or even typhoid, since fever is so common in the Mediterranean region. The same word is used in the same context, in the LXX, of a plague of smallpox in Egypt), in Lk 26:43, of which we have 'extreme burning' (Dt 28:25, RV 'fiery heat,' LXX 'irritation'); either some unspecified kind of irritating disease, or erysipelas; but this latter disease is not of the type described in the OT. The same term is used in Dt 28:25, RV 'drought') may be a form of disease, or more probably, like the next two words, may refer to a destruction of the earth's fruits. The same word occurs in Nu 23:16, e.g. from the word used in the description, to refer to a wasting paralysis. The descriptions given in Ps 30:1, Zec 14:12, Lv 26:6, Ezk 24:23, 33:10, Ps 38:8 are largely figurative; but the imagery may be taken from an attack of confluent smallpox, with its disfiguring and repulsive effects. It seems highly probable that smallpox was a disease of antiquity; perhaps the sixth plague of Egypt was of this character.

Allusions to pestilence or plague are exceedingly common in the OT. Thus at least four outbreaks took place among the Israelites during their wanderings in the wilderness, viz. Nu 11:1 (it has been suggested that the quails here mentioned may have come from a plague-stricken district), Nu 16:2, Nu 17:24, 25 (in this last case it may have been communicated by the Moabites). For other references to plague, cf. 2 S 24:14, 2 Ch 21:12, Ps 84:4, Jer 21:4-25, perhaps 2 K 19:23. The buccine (a bloody flux in Palestine). Next we have 'extreme burning' (Ps 38:8), but this is doubtful. The same word occurs in Dt 28:6.

Of diseases in the digestive organs the case in 2 Ch 21:9 is one of chronic dysentery in its worst form. That in Ac 28:3 (AV bloody flux in Palestine). Next we have 'extreme burning' (Ps 38:8), but this is doubtful. The same word occurs in Dt 28:6.

Of diseases in the digestive organs the case in 2 Ch 21:9 is one of chronic dysentery in its worst form. That in Ac 28:3 (AV bloody flux in Palestine). Next we have 'extreme burning' (Ps 38:8), but this is doubtful. The same word occurs in Dt 28:6.

The liver. The Hebrew physicians regarded many disorders as due to an alteration in the bile (cf. Job 16:14, Pr 22:7, 28:29). The disorders alluded to in 1 T 5:27 were probably some kind of dyspepsia, apparently producing lack of energy (cf. 1 T 4:11-15); the symptoms are often temporarily relieved by the use of alcohol. In Ps 69:8 allusion is made to the dryness of the throat produced by mental emotions of a lowering character; and in Is 16:4, Jer 4:18 to the flatulent distension of the colon due to the same cause.

Heart. There are few references to physical diseases affecting it. Fr 14:2 may be one. Cases of syncope seem to be recorded in Gn 40:5, 1 S 4:13, 26, 38, 1 S 11:2, 24. The allusions to a ‘broken heart’ in Scripture are always metaphorical, but the theory that our Lord’s death was due to rupture of the heart deserves mention. He had fainting or palpitation. This is a disease of the central nervous system, which comes on rapidly as a rule, and disappears slowly, if at all. Such cases are mentioned in the NT, e.g. Mt 9:23, Lk 5:19, perhaps Ac 9:33. The case in Mt 8:15 may have been one of acute spinal meningitis, or some other form of especially painful paralysis. In the case of the withered hand of Mt 12:23, Mk 3:1, Lk 6:6 a complete atrophy of the bones and muscles was probably the cause. The case in Ac 8:2 was probably of the same nature. Such cases are probably intended also in Jn 5:6. The man in Jn 5:6 can hardly have been suffering from loco mot or ataxia, as he could move himself, and his disease had lasted 38 years. Therefore this also was, in all likelihood, a case of withered limbs. The sudden attack mentioned in 1 K 13:2 was probably due to sudden hemorrhage affecting some part of the brain, which may under certain circumstances be too intense. The case of senile epilepsy (Ac 9:7) seems to be recorded in Jn 4 (the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar). In the NT various nervous affections are probably included among the instances of dementiac possession, e.g. Lk 11:14, Mt 12:27. In Lk 12:2, Ac 9:2 are apparently mentioned cases of temporary apophasia due to sudden emotion. (Cf. also Dn 10:6.)

Deafness and dumbness. Many of the NT cases of possession by dumb spirits were probably due to some kind of insanity or nervous disease, e.g. Mt 9:32, Mk 9:28. In Mk 7:13 stammering is joined to deafness. Is 29:24 and 32:11 (cf. 33:6) probably refer to unintelligible rather than stammering speech. Moses’ slowness of speech and tongue (cf. Ex 4:10) was probably only lack of oratorical fluency. Patience with the deaf is recommended in Lk 18:44.

Epilepsy. The case in Mt 17:19, Mk 9:27, Lk 9:43 is of genuine epileptic fits; the usual symptoms are graphically described. Like many epileptics, the patient ‘had been subject to the devil from childhood’. The ‘pitching away’ mentioned in the Markan account is characteristic of a form of the disease in which the fits recur frequently and cause progressive exhaustion. The word used in Mt. to describe the attack means literally ‘to be moon-struck’; the same word is found in Mt 4:23, and an epileptic moon-struck attack occurs in Ps 121:6. It was a very general belief that epilepsy was in some way connected with the phases of the moon. Such a theory is put forward by Vicary, the physician. Henry vm., at some date as 1577: ‘Epilepsita. This is mentioned in Ps 121:6, Is 43:10, and cases of apparently genuine sestrasis are described in 2 K 4:4 and Jth 9. This seizure is very rapid and painful, accompanied by a great rise in temperature, passage speedily into coma, and resulting as a rule in death within a very short space of time. The cure effected in 2 K 4 was plainly miraculous. Heat syncope, rather than sunstroke, seems to have been the seizure in Jonah’s case (Jon 4:1). He fainted from the heat, and on recovery was conscious of a severe headache and a feeling of intense prostration.

Pulmonary disease as such finds no mention in Scripture. The phrase used in 1 K 17:11, ‘there was no breath left in him’, is merely the ordinary way of stating that he had died.

Gout. This disease is very uncommon among the people of Palestine; and it is not, as a rule, fatal. The disease in his feet from which Asa suffered (1 K 15:20, 2 Ch 15:14) has usually been supposed to be a but, though one authority suggests that it was articular leprosy, and another that it was senile gangrene. The passages quoted give no clue to the nature of the disease in question, nor do they state that it caused his death. Josephus describes Asa as dying happily in a good old age. The OT records remark only that he suffered from a disease in the feet, which began when he was advanced in years.

Under the heading surgical diseases may be classed the spirit of infirmity, affecting the woman mentioned in Lk 13:14, who, though she could attend the synagogue meetings, was bowed together and unable to lift her head. This was probably a case of senile epilepsy, as not infrequently occurs with aged women, and sometimes with men, who have spent their lives in agricultural or horticultural labour, which necessitates constant care of the body.

Crock-backness (Lk 21:20) disqualified a man for the priesthood. This disease is one which can occur in youth, and is due to cartes of the vertebrae. The collections of bones found in Egypt justify the inference that such curvatures must have been fairly common in Egypt.

Fracture of the skull. A case is recorded in Jg 9:59, where insensibility did not immediately supervene, showing the absence of compression. The case of Mephibosheth’s lameness (2 S 5:4) is a case of hemiplegia; it is one of the diseases that should have been classified as such.

Lameness. Mephibosheth’s lameness was due to an accident in infancy (2 S 4:4), which apparently produced some sort of bone disease, necessitating constant dressing, unless the phrase in 2 S 16:2 refers merely to washing. Lameness was a disqualification for the priesthood (Lk 21:20); Christ healed many lame people in the Temple (Mt 14:1) as well as elsewhere. Jacob’s lameness (Gn 32:33) may also be mentioned.

Congenital malformations. Cf. 2 S 21:18, 1 Ch 20:27. The monstrous parts were held to disqualify a man for the priesthood (Lk 21:20), as did also dwarfishness (Lk 21:20), unless the reference there is to emaciation from disease. The word in Lw 21:20, which is translated ‘that hath a flat nose,’ may refer to the deformity of a hare-lip.

Skin diseases are of common occurrence in the East. The most important of them was leprosy (thick skin). But there are many minor diseases of the skin recognized in Bible texts, all of which are considered under various terms.

Baldness (Lw 13:40-41) was not looked upon as causing ceremonial uncleanness, nor apparently was it common; it seems to have been regarded not as a sign of old age, but as the result of a life spent in excessive labour with exposure to the sun (cf. Ezk 29:14), and so in Is 3:4 it is threatened as a mark of degradation and servitude.

Itch (Dt 28:27) is probably the parasitic disease due to a small mite which burrows under the skin, and, if neglected, sometimes spreads all over the body: this disease is very easily communicated, and is not uncommon in Syria at the present time. It was a disqualification for the priesthood (Lw 21:20), if scurvy (Lw 21:20) is a kindred disease in which a crust forms on the skin; it is most common on the head, but sometimes spreads all over the body, and is most difficult to cure. ‘Scab’ in Lw 21:20 is the
The conception, which Job's 14 days affected especially the knees and legs. Job's asease model of a serpent. Dl 328, Job 204, b, 11 1429 30, 59, Jer 8, Mt 3 metaphorically, as also in Mt 129 23, Lk 31, Mk 164, Lk 104, Ac 28. There are several poisonous serpents in the desert of the Israelites. The bloody sweat of our Lord (Lk 224) is difficult to explain. Some regard the passage as meaning merely that His sweat dropped, as blood drops from a wound. In some thesauri, bloody sweat has been quoted in comparison, but it seems that none is satisfactorily authenticated. Poisonous serpents are mentioned in Nu 21 (where they are miraculously healed by a brass serpent). The worm. It is not uncommon in the desert region. Scorpion bites are common and often fatal to children in Egypt, but not in Palestine. Worms (Ac 123) is the description of the disease of which Herod died. One authority suggests that it was caused by an obstruction set up by vermin in the region of the bowels by an intestinal worm which in a few days proved fatal. Thus it cannot have been a case of paralysis. The death of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 9 9) is described as preceded by a violent pain of the bowels; then he was injured by a violent fall, and "worms rose up out of his body"—in all probability a case of compound fractures, in which blood-shot, lying on the earth, and Elizabeth (Lk 19) are instances of unipara at a late period. Barrenness was regarded as a Divine judgment (Gn 204 30), and the fornication of the mainbrace was used as a charm against it (Gn 306); barrenness was correspondingly regarded as a proof of Divine favour (1 S 29, Ps 119), and miscarriage is invoked as a token of God's displeasure in Hos 94. The attendants at birth were women (Gn 353, Ex 14, midwives). The mother was placed in a kneeling posture, leaning on something's knees (Gn 354) or on a stool, if such be the meaning of the difficult passage in Ex 14. After child-birth the mother was unclean for 7 days in the case of a male, for 4 days in the case of a female, child. After she continued in a state of modified uncleanness for 33 or 66 days, according as the child was boy or girl, during which period she was not allowed to enter the Temple. The reason for the different lengths of the two periods was that the lochia was supposed to last longer in the case of a female child. Nursing continued for 2 or 3 years (2 Mac 27), and in 1 K 113 a child is taken by a relative to wean.

The legislation for the menstrual period and for menstruation is given in Lv 15-29. A rigid purification was prescribed, including everything which the woman had touched, and everyone who touched her or any of those things (see Clean and Unclean). Menorrhagia (EV issue of blood) was considered peculiarly improper and subjected to a special form of treatment (Mi 6: 5, Mk 5: 28, Lk 8: 44), and magical means were resorted to for its cure. In Ezk 16 it is a description of an infant with undivided umbilical cord, neither washed nor dressed. The skin of infants was usually dried with wine salt and clothes (Ph 9: 1), and the apothecary's use of terms derived from child-labour is exceedingly common in the Bible.

Infantile diseases seem to have been very severe in Palestine in Bible times, as at the present day. We hear of sick children in 2 S 12: 4, 1 K 17: 3, and Christ healed many children.

Among cases of unspecified diseases may be mentioned those of Ahab (1 K 14), Benhadad (2 K 8: 7), Elissa (2 K 13: 4), Joash (2 Ch 24: 25), Lazarus (Jn 11: 11), Dorcas (Ac 9: 36), Epaphroditus (Ph 2: 26), and Trophimus (2 Tl 4: 12).

4. Methods of treatment.—The Bible gives us very few references on this point. We hear of washing (2 K 5: 8); diet perhaps (Lk 22: 38); the application of salvia (Jn 9: 14);unction (Ja 3: 9); the binding of wounds and the application of soothing ointment (Is 1: 4); the use of oil and wine for wounds (Lk 10: 17); a plaster of figs for a boil (Is 38: 23); animal heat by contact (1 K 21: 12; 2 K 4: 36).

Balm of Gilead or balm is mentioned in Gn 37: 26; 43: 22; 47: 11, 12; 51: 5; Ecc 27, 1. It appears to be regarded as a sedative application, and was probably an aromatic gum or spice (see art. Balm).

Mandrakes (Mandragora officinalis) were used as a so-called plant of conception (Gen 38: 24; 2 Sa 14: 4); their fruit was considered a medicine. Mint (Mentha silvestris), anise (Anethum graveolens), cummin (Cuminum sativum) were used as carminatives; salt for hardening the skin, nitre (Jer 2: 26) to cleanse it. The caper-berry (Capparis spinosa), is mentioned in Ec 12: 3; it was regarded as aphrodisiac.

The wine offered to Christ at His crucifixion was probably intended as a narcotic (Mt 27: 35, 45, Mk 15: 39, 42, Lk 23: 39, 49). Most of the remedies were dietary in the Jewish as in the Egyptian pharmacopoeia, e.g. milk, milk, vinegar, wine, water, almonds, figs, raisins, pomegranates, honey, etc. The practice of anointment in Is 29 and perhaps Gn 33: 18. The apothecary's art is mentioned in Ex 30: 25-37; Ec 10, 2 Ch 16: 4, Neh 3: 4, Str 38: 49. But in all these passages the reference is to makers of perfumes rather than compounders of medicines. It is probable that medicines were compounded by those who prescribed them.

Hygienic enactments dealing with food, sanitation, and infectious diseases are common in the Levitical Code. With regard to food, herbivorous ruminant animals were permitted to be eaten; all true fishes also were allowed; but birds which lived on animal food were forbidden, and all invertebrates except locusts. The fat and the blood of animals were prohibited as food, and regulations were given for the inspection of animals slaughtered for eating. The origin, however, of many of these regulations probably lies in primitive taboo laws (see Clean and Unclean). Fruits could not be used for food until the tree had been planted for four years (Lv 19: 25). The provisions repeated in Ex 12: 3, Dt 16 for the periodic destruction of leaven, whatever their historical origin, must have been of service for the maintenance of pure bread-stuffs.

The agricultural sanitary laws are directed chiefly to prohibit the mixing of different species, e.g. the sowing of different seeds in a field at the same time, the cross-grafting of fruit-trees, the cross-breeding or yoking together of dissimilar cattle. And periodic rest for man and beast was prescribed. No mixture of linen and woolen materials in garments was permitted (Lv 19: 2, Dt 22), as such garments cannot be so easily or thoroughly cleansed as those of one material. There were also various regulations as to domestic sanitation; thus the covering with earth of excreta and of blood was ordered; possibly the fires of the Valley of Hinnom were intended to consume the offal of the city. Houses were to be built with parapets to prevent accident (Dt 22: 9). Isolation in suspected cases of Infectious disease was prescribed (Lv 13), and the washing of the garments and clothes (Nu 19: 6) obligatory on those who had touched unclean things.

Uncleanness was in many cases merely ceremonial in nature. But the regulations must often have served to diminish the chances of propagating real infection. Various grades of uncleanness are recognized in the Talmud, and different periods of lustration and isolation were ordained, in accordance with the different grade of uncleanness contracted.

5. Surgical instruments. A flint knife was used for circumcision (Jos 5: 2), but in later times steel knives were employed. An awl for boring the ear is mentioned in Ex 21: 21.

The most important surgical operation was the performance of circumcision. Its original idea may have been that of imposing a tribal mark on the infant (unless it was at first performed in early manhood and subsequently transferred to the time of infancy); but it came to be regarded as an operation of purification. The exclusion of eunuchs from the service of God (Dt 23: 3) may have been due to the dread of importing heathen rites into Israel. But they were important officials in the time of the kingdom, as in Oriental courts generally (1 K 22, 2 K 8° 9° 24°, Jer 29: 34° 38° 41°), and there were eunuchs at the court of the Herods, as body men (cf. Acts 8: 9). The passage in Is 56: 4 implies that eunuchs were then under no special religious disability; cf. also our Lord's reference in Mt 19: 5.

Of course we must admit that in many cases the use of remedies, the sanitary laws, the prescriptions about food, the laws as to uncleanness, and so forth, did not necessarily originate in any theory as to their value for the preservation of public health. Primitive taboos, folk-lore, magic, superstition, are no doubt responsible for the existence of much that has been here placed under the heading of medicine. And it is quite likely, too, that up to a late period the popular view of most of these rules of religion might yet be preserved, and valued as important precautions for the prevention of disease and its cure. But it may be doubted whether, even in late times, the vulgar opinion about them was at all scientific. At the same time, it is necessary to recognize that many of the laws, begotten, perhaps, of primitive superstition, did nevertheless serve a medical purpose, and so may without untruthfulness be included in a treatment of Bible medicine.

MEEKNESS.—In the earlier literature of revelation meekness is simply an excellent virtue. Moses is described as 'very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth' (Nu 12), and his character illustrates the Hebrew ideal of meekness in those days. There was no weakness or cowardice in him, but strong man, patient and pitiful. Subsequently the word acquired a peculiar significance. In the days of Israel's conflict the men of pride and violence came to the front, while the godly were thrust into the background, confronted and oppressed (cf. Ps 105: 3-4). Thus 'rich' and 'wicked' came to be synonymous (Is 53:12), and corresponding to these there was a group of terms: 'meek', 'humble' (or 'lowly'), 'poor', 'needy'. In our Lord's time these terms denoted the godly remnant in Israel, those who, despoiled by the rulers, lived devout lives in obscure corners, nourishing their faith on the Scriptures, and waiting for the consolation of Israel (Lk 1:78). A new post of the Messiah. Just as the Psalms and Prophets had sympathized with the Lord's hidden ones and promised them deliverance (Ps 9: 14; 91: 1-2; 119: 57; 119: 1-9), so Jesus was their chosen servant. He called 'Governors' (Mt 5: 45.), and He took His place by their side, Himself 'meek and lowly' (Mt 11: 25), the homeless Son of Man, despised and rejected of men. He shared their humiliation that they might share His glory.

MEGIDDO (in Zec 12: 9 Megiddon).—One of the most important of the fortress cities of ancient Canaan. It was captured by Thothmes III in the 23rd year of his reign, the spoils being magnificent; and it is mentioned several times in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. Though nominally belonging to Manasseh (Jos 17: 18; Jg 11: 23), the Canaanites remained in possession. Near the 'waters of Megiddo' the God-savenger Cherub was worshipped by Barak and Deborah (Jg 5: 20-22). Solomon restored its fortifications (1 K 9: 15). Here king Ahaziah (2 K 9: 23) died; and the good king Josiah, interfering in a quarrel between Pharaoh-necho and the king of Assyria, and opposing the former's progress in the dangerous passage of Megiddo, was also slain (2 K 24: 18, 2 Ch 35:22), to the grief of all Israel (Zec 12: 11). Finally, it was at Armageddon (Rv 16: 13-16, 'the mountains of Megiddo') that the mysterious conflict of Rev 16: 16 was to take place.

The site of Megiddo may now be considered as proved to be the exact place of the Governor's great mound about 4 miles N.W. of Tell Ta'annak (Tell el-an-Nokh), the cemetery. The importance of the site can be seen at a glance, for it guards the great pass from the plain of Sharon to that of Edraeon, which in all history, from Thothmes III. to Napoleon I., has been a route of armies. The hill has recently been excavated by the German Palestine Society, and fortifications going back before a.c. 2200 have been uncovered, as Lord's excavations have shown. The remains of numerous cities which have occupied this site for many centuries. Here was found the seal of Shama', 'the servant of Jeroboam'—probably Jeroboam II. To the south of the tell is an abundant stream, and in Roman times a fortified post—the Legio of Eusebius, the modern el-Leshun—was established there. The stream may have been the 'waters of Megiddo' of Jg 5: 23; it is one of the most important of the tributaries of the Kishon.

MEHITABEL.—1. The grandfather of Shemiah (Neh 6: 18). 2. The wife of Hadar or Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36: 1, Ch 1: 18).

MEHIDDA.—The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned from exile (Ezr 8: 23; Neh 7: 41), called in 1 Es 5: 16 Meedda.

MELOLATHITE (1 S 18: 26; 2 S 21).— Probably an inhabitant of Abel-meholah (wh. see).

MEHUJAEL.—A Caine (Gn 41: 17), corresponding to Mahalalel of P's genealogy (Gn 5: 33).

MEHUMAN.—One of the seven eunuchs in attendance upon king Absalom (Est 1: 10).

ME-JARKON (Jos 15: 38).—The Heb. text seems to be in error. The LXX read 'me' instead of 'me'; but this, apparently, is not the right reading, and does not make sense. Jarkon and the boundary near Joppa,' sufficiently MEKONAH (AV; RV needlessly changes to Meconah).—A town inhabited after the Captivity (Neh 11: 8). The site has not been identified.

MELATIA.—A Gibeonite (Neh 7: 37).

MECHIEL.—1. 2. Two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3: 26, 27).

MECHIHEL.—The father of Charmis (1 Ths 6: 19).

MECHIZADEK.—Described as the king of Salem and priest of God Most High ('El Elyon'), who met Abraham on his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and his allies, refreshed him and his servants with bread and wine, blessed him, and received from him a tenth of the spoil he had taken (Gn 14: 18-20). Salem has been variously identified: (1) with the Shalem of Gn 33: 18 (AV and RV), a place a little to the E. of Mt. Gerizim and not far from Shechem; (2) with the Salem of Js 19: 5 in the Jordan Valley S. of Seirropolis; and (2) with Jerusalem, which is called Salem in Ps 76: 6. The last identification is the most probable; though it is implied in Jos 15: 9, Jg 9: 17 that Jerusalem was called Jebus so long as it was inhabited by the Jebusites (i.e. before the time of David), the name Jerusalem really goes back to the 14th cent. b.c., since it appears in the Tell el-Amarna tablets as Uri-zum. This view has the support of Josephus (Ant. 1. x. 2), and further obtains some slight confirmation from the resemblance of the name of Melchizedek to that of Adonizedek, who was king of Jerusalem in the time of Joshua (Jos 19: 1), the element zedek in each name being probably that of a Canaanite deity.

The historical character of the narrative in which Melchizedek is mentioned has been questioned on the grounds of certain improbabilities which it contains; but though the events related have received no corroboration from other sources, the names of two of the kings who fought against Abraham, viz. Abraham and Arnoch, have some plausibility been identified with those of Hammurabi and Rimah, contemporary kings of Babylon and Larsa about 2250, so that, if the identification is correct, it confirms the setting of the story, though not its incidents. For the name and personality of Melchizedek no independent confirmatory evidence has yet been obtained.

In Ps 110, to the ideal king of Jewish hopes, the Messiah, there is promised an endless priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek'. This ascription of priestly functions to a sovereign who was expected to be of the house of David and the tribe of Judah is evidently meant as an exceptional distinction, and implies that the writer lived at a time when priests in Israel were taken exclusively from the tribe of Levi, as was the case after the promulgation of the Deuteronomical law (probably in the 7th cent.). At an earlier date persons belonging to other tribes than that of Levi were sometimes priests: David's sons (2 S 8: 19), and the prophet Jeremiah (20: 20), who belonged to Manasseh (Nu 32: 34); but the author of Ps 110, in seeking a type for the combination in the same person of both the regal and priestly offices, had to go outside the limits of Israel, and found what he wanted in the priest-king of Salem, who was therefore adapted for the purpose by reason of the deference paid to him by so illustrious a personage as Abraham.

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, identifying Jesus with the Messiah, and asserting His high priesthood, cites the words of Ps 110, and declares that He was 'named of God a high priest after the order of Melchizedek' (He 5: 5). He then proceeds to show the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of the Jewish priests, the descendants of Aaron, and seeks to illustrate it by the superiority of Melchizedek over Abraham, as he gathers it from Gn 14. He explains Melchizedek's name 'to mean 'king of righteousness'; and his title of 'king of Salem' to mean 'king of peace'; and then, arguing from the silence of the record respecting his parentage, birth, and death, describes him as 'without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God,' and affirms him to have been greater than Abraham, since he blessed him ('for without any dispute the less is blessed of the better') and received from him (and through him from his unborn descendants the Levitical priests) a tithe of his spoils (He 7:9).

In this passage much of the writer's argument is fanciful, the narrative in Genesis being handled after a Rabbinc fashion, and the parallel drawn between our Lord and Melchizedek being largely based on the mere omission, in the OT record, of certain particulars about the latter, which, for the historian's purpose, were obviously irrelevant. At the same time it may perhaps be said that, as contrasted with the Levitical priest who succeeded to their priestly offices by reason of their descent, an ancient priest-king is really typical of our Lord, inasmuch as it is likely that, in a primitive age, such a one would owe his position to his natural endowments and force of character. It was in virtue of His personality that our Lord made, and makes, His appeal to the world; and to the authoritativeness of His attitude in regard to the current teaching of the Jewish religious teachers of His day (Mt 5:48, Mk 7:29) a distant analogy is provided by the superior position which in Genesis seems to be ascribed to Melchizedek in respect of Abraham, the ancestor of the Jewish race. See also Art. Priest (in NT).

MELECH.—1. A grandson of Merib-baal (1 Ch 5:9). 2. See Melchshabad.

MELETA.—An island about sixty miles S. of Sicily, with an area of about ninety-five square miles. Its excellent position as a commercial station led to its early colonization by Phenicians and Greeks. It became subject to Carthage, but was conquered by the Romans in A.D. 218, and became part of the province of Sicily. But the Carthaginian and Libyan element predominated, hence St. Luke's use of the phrase 'the barbarous people' (Ac 28:9). There can be no doubt that this Melita was the scene of St. Paul's shipwreck. The use of the name Adria (Ac 27:1) led to an attempt to identify it with Melita in the Adriatic, but the term 'Adria' was freely applied to the sea E. and S.E. of Sicily, and the wind 'Euraquilo' (Ac 27:12) would drive them from Crete to Malta if the captain, realizing that his chief danger was the Syrtis quicksands (27:20), took the natural precaution of bearing up into the wind as much as the weather permitted. The description is precise. On the 14th night of their drifting, by sounding they found they were getting into shallower water, and cast out anchors; but when day dawned they saw before them a bay with a shelving beach, on which they determined to run the vessel. Therefore they hastily cast off the anchors, unfastened the rudders, which had been lashed during their drifting, and with the aid of these and the foresail tried to steer the ship to the beach. But before they reached it they ran on a shoal 'where two seas met,' and reached the shore only by swimming or floating on spars. Every detail of the narrative is satisfied by assuming that they landed on the W. side of St. Paul's Bay, eight miles from Valetta, five miles from the old capital Citta Vecchia. According to the Chronicle of Malta, as this was the scene already old when our earliest map of Malta (a Venetian one) was made about A.D. 1530. As it is scarcely likely that the spot was identified by succeeding generations in the Middle Ages, this is a remarkable instance of the permanence and correctness of some early traditions. Incidentally, it is also a proof of the remarkable impression made on the inhabitants by the three months St. Paul was compelled to spend in the island. St. Luke relates only two incidents. As they made a fire for the shipwrecked men, a snake, accused from the wood by the heat, fastened on St. Paul's hand, and, to the surprise of the onlookers, did him no harm. The word 'venomous' (28:9) is not found in the text, and St. Luke does not state that it was a miraculous deliverance. But the natives thought it was, and therefore there probably were venomous snakes in Malta the whole time. There are not more than 2000 inhabitants to the square mile they would be likely to become extinct. The other incident was the curing of the enemy of the father of Publius (wh. see). Naturally there are local traditions of St. Paul's residence, and the map referred to above has a church of St. Paul's near the bay, but on its E. side. The first known bishop of Malta was at the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Malta has had a varied history since. Vandals, Normans, Turks all left their mark on it. In 1530, Charles V. gave it to the Knights of St. John, who defendedit three times against the desperate attacks of the Turks. In 1798, Napoleon seized it, but the English took it from him in 1800, and it has remained in English hands since. But the population remains very mixed,—the race and the native language retaining much of the Arabic element.

MELONS ('Aboua'them, the same word as the Arab. 'Abudah, which includes the water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris) as well as other kinds).—In the water-melon is specially referred to, as it was common in Egypt in ancient times, and the fruit is much prized in the arid wilderness. Melons flourishes in Palestine, especially on the sands S. of Jaffa, and are eaten all over the land, being carried to the towns all through the summer by long strings of camels.

E. W. G. MARTERMAN.

MELZAR.—A proper name (AV), or official title (RV 'steward') in Dt 10:10, 11, in both cases with the article. It is generally agreed that the word is a loan-word from the Assyri. massaaru, 'guardian,' and stands for one who was teacher and warden of the royal wards. Cheyne, however, is led by the LXX to conclude for Belshazzar as the true rendering, and to read in Deut. 11:4, 'And Daniel said to Belshazzar, prince of the eunuchs,' etc.

W. F. COTT.

MEM.—The thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalms to designate the 12th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

MEMEROTH (1 Es 8:1) = Mereoth, an ancestor of Ezra (Eer 79); called Marimuth in 2 Es 1.

MEMMIAUS, QUINTUS.—Named along with Manlius (wh. see) as a Roman legate (2 Mac 11).

MEMPHIS.—The famous ancient capital of Egypt, a few miles south of Cairo, the present capital. According to tradition, Memphis was built by Menes, who first united the two kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt. Kings and dynasties might make their principal residences in the cities from which they sprang, but until Alexandria was founded as the capital of the Greek dynasty, no Egyptian city, except Thebes, under the New Kingdom equalled Memphis in size and importance. The palaces of most of the early kings (Dyns. 5–12) were at or near Memphis, their positions being now marked by the pyramids in which the same kings were buried. The pyramid-field extends on the edge of the desert about 30 miles, from Dahshur on the south to Abu Roash on the north, the Great Pyramids of Chephren and Mycerinus were the last of the central pyramids of Egypt. The Egyptian name Menfi (in Hebrew Noph, Is 19:14, Jer 2:15 44:14, 19, Ezek 30:18; once Moph, Hos 9:), was apparently taken from that of the palace and pyramid of Pepy i. of the 6th Dynasty, which were built close to the city. At a later period, Taharka (Tirhakah) ruled at Memphis; Necho, Hophra, and the other kings of the 26th Dynasty were buried at their ancestral city Sais, although their ancestor was centred only two indents within the pyramids. The foundation of Alexandria the old capital fell to the second place, MEMUCAN.—One of the seven princes of Persia who had access to the royal presence (Est 1:14, 16, 31).

MENAHEM, one of the latest kings of Israel, was a usurper, like so many other monarchs in this period. He and Shallum planned to seize the throne about the same time (2 K 15:15), Shallum having possession of Samaria, while Menahem commanded the ancient fortress and former capital, Tirzah. War raged for a brief time with unusual ferocity, resulting in the defeat of Shallum. Menahem seems not to have felt secure on the throne, and to have purchased the help of Assyria by paying a heavy tribute to Tiglath-Pileser (called Pul in 2 K 15:19). Or we may suppose the Assyrians to have invaded the country because it was so weakened by civil war that it could no longer make effective resistance. The tribute was a thousand talents of silver, and it was a direct tax on the holders of royal property. The assessment of sixty shekels each shows that there were sixty thousand proprietors in Israel at this time. From the Assyrian sources we learn that this tribute was paid in the year 738 B.C.

It is interesting to note that in the literature of Judaism Menahem ("Comforter") is a title of the Messiah.

MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSAIN.—The words of the handwriting on the wall, which, according to Dn 5:28, appeared mysteriously at Belshazzar’s feast, and was successfully deciphered by Daniel alone (vv. 27-29). In v.5 the words of the inscription ("the writing... inscribed, RV) are given as above, but in the explanation (vv. 27-28) are quoted in a different form, and no account is taken of the repetition of the first word. This discrepancy can best be accounted for by assuming that the words of the inscription as given in v.5 already lay in their present form before the author, and are not the product of his free invention; while vv.27-28 are the result of an attempt to extract from the words, in spite of grammar, a meaning suitable to the occasion.

Is this the real significance of the words "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin"? As has been shown by M. Clermont-Ganneau in the Journal Asiatique for 1886, they are really names of weights. "Mene" is the Aram. equivalent of the Heb. manah (Est 4:21, Ezr 2:69) and means "teded" or "shaked"; and pharsin is a plural, and probably represents a word (peras" lit. "division") which means half-mina. Thus the four words read consecutively: A mina, a mina, a shaked, and half-mina. The enigmatic character of the combination apparently consisted partly in the manner in which the words were supposed to have been written—perhaps in some unfamiliar form of Aramaic cursive or with some curious inversion in arrangement—and partly in determining their import even when read. The apposition of a list of three weights in such a connexion is not obvious. In deducing a meaning fitted to the occasion Daniel’s skill as an interpreter of riddles is strikingly set forth. Each of the mysterious words is invested with a meaning suggested by etymological affinities. The term for "mina" is connected with a root meaning ‘to number’, hence it signifies ‘God has numbered...’ and brought it to an end’; ‘shaked’ is connected with a root meaning ‘to weigh’; and hence one has been weighed in the balance and found wanting’; ‘half-mina’ (peras) suggests a double play: ‘thy kingdom is divided (peras) and given to the Persians (Aram. pâras = ‘Persian’).

It should be noticed that a double interpretation is apparently given throughout, each of the words having perhaps been read in two ways, and the meanings combined (see art. ‘Mene Mene Tekel Upharsin’ in Hastings’ DB for details). Another possible rendering is, ‘He has counted, counted, weighed, and they answer’ (7a commercial formula). Possibly an actual inscription found on the walls of the palace at Babylon, or at any rate, found somewhere, was worked by the author of Daniel into this dramatic scene and arbitrarily explained’ (D. S. Margoliouth, ib.).

MENELAUS.—Brother of Simon the Benjamite (2 Mac 30), or, according to Josephus (Ant. xii. 1), a younger brother of Jason and Onias. He purchased the office of high priest from Antiochus Epiphanes for the sum of 660 talents (c. n. c. 172), thereby causing the deposition of Jason, who had obtained the office by popular consent, and filling it with the sons of Simon. Menelaus aptly carried on the work of Jason, and although he was able to use it to his own advantage, he was not able to make it work to the advantage of Israel as a nation. When the temple had been destroyed, he was the one who was able to gather together a large amount of money and to have it converted into a new temple.

Another version of the story is that Menelaus was the son of Simon and was therefore the brother of Jason. He purchased the office of high priest from Antiochus Epiphanes for the sum of 660 talents (c. n. c. 172), thereby causing the deposition of Jason, who had obtained the office by popular consent, and filling it with the sons of Simon. Menelaus was able to carry on the work of Jason, but he was not able to make it work to the advantage of Israel as a nation. When the temple had been destroyed, he was the one who was able to gather together a large amount of money and to have it converted into a new temple.

MENESTHEUS.—The father of Apollonius (2 Mac 43).

MEN.—A deity named with Gad in Is 65:1, ‘Ye that iniquity, prepare a table for God, and that fill mingled wine for Men,’ Gad is Fortune, and Men Destiny. The name has been correlated with the Arab. Manat, and with a supposed Bab. god Menu, manah in Heb. means ‘to number,’ and so to ‘apportion.’ The name of this god of Destiny has been seen in Manasses and in the name of one of the sons of Anak, Ahi (Is 135). See Gad.

MENNA.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:34).

MENÚHÁH (Jg 20:46).—We should perhaps read Manahath (wh. see), or, better, ‘from Nohah.’ In 1 Ch 8:29 Nohah is a clan of Benjamin.

MENÚOTH.—See Manahathites.

MEONÉNIM, OAK OF.—A place mentioned only in Jg 9:7, as being near Shechem. It is agreed that the rendering should be ‘oak of the diviners,’ but the derivation of the word is uncertain. There is a cognate Arabic word, however, which is used in the horn of insects and the whispering of leaves, and it is tempting, therefore, to connect meonemim with such a phenomenon as the ‘sound of a marching in the tops of the balsams’ (2 S 5:23), where the rustling of the leaves is the sign of the presence of Jahweh, as the rustling of the leaves of the oaks of Dodom proclaimed the will of Zeus.

MEPHATÁH.—A city of Reuben (Jos 13:5); assigned to the Levites (21st, 1 Ch 6:7); a Moabite city in Jer 49:4.

In the 4th cent. A.D. it is said to have been the station of a Roman garrison.

MÉPHIBÓSETH.—A son of Jonathan (2 S 4), called also in 1 Ch 3:6. 9 Meribbaal, really the original form of the name ‘Baal contended’ or ‘Baal’s warrior.’ David, on succeeding to the throne, instead of destroying all the family of Saul, as was usual on such occasions, spared Mephibosheth out of regard for his father Jonathan (2 S 9). Mephibosheth was five years old when Saul fell on Mt. Gilboa, and in the flight of the royal household after the battle he was so seriously injured by a fall as to become lame in both his feet (2 S 4). In that warlike age much bodily weakness prevented him from becoming a rival of David, and no doubt inclined the latter to mercy. David was informed of his place of concealment in Lo-debar, on the east of the Jordan, by Ziba, who had been stewart of Saul (2 S 9:8). The king restored to Mephibosheth all the estates of Saul, Ziba became his stewart, and Mephibosheth himself was maintained as a permanent guest at David’s table (2 S 9:14). At the flight of David from Jerusalem after Absalom’s rebellion, Ziba met him on the Mount of Olives with provender. He also stated that his master had remained in Jerusalem, in hope of obtaining the kingdom of Saul. Notwithstanding the doubtful nature of the story, David said, ‘Behold, thine is all that pertaineth to Mephibosheth’ (2 S 19). On David’s return, Mephibosheth came out to meet him, and declared that Ziba had accused him falsely, taking advantage of his lameness. David seems to have doubted the truth of what Mephibosheth did not wish to alienate Ziba, who had also been faithful, and divided the land of Saul between the two. Mephibosheth expressed his willingness that Ziba should have all, ‘forasmuch as my lord the king is come in peace unto his own house.’ Further it is thought that Mephibosheth was the heir of Mica, who was regarded as the founder of a well-known family of warriors (1 Ch 8:9). 2. One of the sons of Saul’s concubine Rizpah, slain by the Gibonites (2 S 21). MERAB.—The elder daughter of Saul, promised to the slayer of Goliath (1 S 17:29), and then to David personally as a reward for prowess against the Philistines (1 S 18:19), but given as wife to Adriel the Meholathite. In 2 S 21 Michal, whose sons are said to have been given over to satisfy the Gibonites, is probably a serial error for Merab. W. F. Boyd.

MEROVAH.—1. Son of Ahibuth and father of Zadok (1 Ch 9:4, Neh 11:11). 2. A Levite (1 Ch 6:9, Ex 26:1), called in 1 Es 8:5 Memeroth and in 2 Es 17 Marimoth. 3. A priestly house in the days of Jokiah (Neh 12:9—Meremoth of v. 7). MERRAI, MERRARITES.—1. The third son of Levi, to whom a division of the Levites traced their descent (Gn 46:14, Ex 6:19, Nu 3:1, 1 Ch 6:18-29). The title ‘Merrais’ is found only in Nu 26:7; elsewhere they are called ‘sons of Merrai’ (Ex 6:19, Nu 3:1, 1 Ch 6:18-29). Joseph, 1st Books of Kings, 1 Ch 6:9-21, 17, 23-24, 24:1-25:1, 2 Ch 29:14, Ezr 8:18) They were subdivided into two groups, the Mahlites and the Mushites (Nu 3:30), each being traced to a ‘son’ of Merrai (1 Ch 8:27, 1 Ch 23:19, but 2 Ch 29:14). From these families fragment of genealogies remain, some branches being traced through the daughters of Mahli (see 1 Ch 25:23).

Merry little is related of the Merrais after the Exile. Certain Merrais are mentioned in 1 Ch 9:4, 16-18 as Neh 11:16-18 as dwelling in Jerusalem immediately after the Return, and certain others as accompanying Ezra to the temple by 454 B.C. (Ezr 8:11). But P and the Chronicler introduce the family into the earlier history. (1) During the desert wanderings the Merrais were on the north side of the Tent (Nu 2:4); their duty was to carry the less sacred parts of it, the ‘boards’ (or rather ‘staves’), poles and cords (4:4-8, 10-13) for which they were given four wagons and eight oxen (7:10), and they were superintended by Ittamar, the youngest son of Aaron (4:9). (2) After the settlement in Palestine, twelve cities were assigned to them (Jos 21:12-14, 1 Ch 6:8a-8c). (3) In David’s reign the Chronicler relates that the Temple music was superintended partly by Ethan, or Jeduthun, a Merrai, and his family, of whom David speaks (29:17-20) and sees 15:17-19. David divided the Levites into courses according to the sons of Levi (23:6), Merrais, vv. 22-23, 24-26, and particular offices of certain Merrais are detailed in 10:19-14:11. (4) They took part in the cleansing of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29:13). Cf. also 18:1. MERCIAH.—1. This Eng. word is now used only as of a trading vessel. In AV it means ‘merchant, tradesman’; it occurs in Gn 37:25, 10:1, Mt 13:10. In each case the earliest editions of AV have two separate words.

MERCURY stands in the AV for the Gr. Hermes in Ac 14:14. Hermes, as the spokesman of the gods, was regarded by the Greeks as the god of the arts and commerce, and was worshipped as a god of fortune men. Mercury was the Roman god of commerce (cf. merc, mercant, mercenary, commerce. In the OT, noun and adjective render two quite different Semitic words. Merc is the (1) meaning ‘primarily beast’ (see Gn 43:10, 1 K 2:20), then ‘compassion or yearning, occurs as noun, adjective, or verb (‘have mercy,’ ‘show mercy’), with the trif. ‘mercy’ over 80 times (Gn 43:4, Ex 5:9, Hab 2, are typical examples),—often ‘mercy’ or ‘render mercies’ for the noun, imitating the Hebrew plural. In 5 instances the EV translates by ‘pity,’ ‘pituful’ (see Ps 103:4, La 4:15), in 17 by ‘compassion.’ In Gr 196 ‘merciful’ renders a synonym of the above, which appears elsewhere (2 S 13:19). Is 53:3 etc.) as ‘pity.’ (2) is a familiar OT word, occurring passim in the Psalms, denoting kindness or benignity, almost confined to the noun form in this sense. It is rendered 43 times in the LXX. ‘Loyingkindness’ (often ‘love’) 43-399 times, by ‘lovingkindness’ (always of God, and mostly in Ps.), by mercy some 150 times in AV; other renderings—goodness, ’favour, and ‘pity’—are occasional. The American Revisers uniformly substitute ‘lovingkindness’ (wh. see) for ‘mercy’ where God is the subject. This attribute of J the sees nearer to the ‘grace’ (wh. see) than the ‘mercy’ of the NT, without implying necessarily, like the former, ill-desert in the object. J is associated frequently with ‘truth’ (wh. see) in J—lovingkindness (mercy) and truth being the regnant qualities of His dealings with Israel—and with ‘covenant’ (Dt 7 7, 1 K 8:6, Neh 9 9, Ps 89, Is 55, Dn 9). As well as with ‘goodness’ and ‘compassion,’ while it is contrasted with ‘anger,’ ‘judgment,’ and ‘sacrifice’ (Mic 7:8, Ps 101, Hos 9). The word describes what one may call the characteristic temper of J, His gracious disposition towards His chosen regarded in their dependence and necessities, His readiness to help, bless, relieve, forgive them—15’s ‘real love’ (G. A. Smith). (3) A third root, the noun of which is translated ‘grace’ (wh. see) 14-17, (21-22, 26; and see 15:17-19). David divided the Levites into courses according to the sons of Levi (23:6), Merrais, vv. 22-23, 24-26, and particular offices of certain Merrais are detailed in 10:19-14:11. MEROACH.—The name of the city-god of Babylon, worshipped, after the establishment of Babylon as capital of the Babylonian Empire, as chief god of Babylonia. The Babylonian name was Marduk, elder form Merodach. He gradually absorbed the attributes of other gods once supreme through the influence of their city seats of worship, particularly Eilil the old Bel, or lord supreme of Nippur. Hence he was in later times the Bel of Babylonia. Merodach is a Hebraized form occurring only in Jer 50, but the Bel of the Apocalyptic Bel and the Dragon (Is 46, Jer 51) is the same deity. Nebuchadnezzar was specially devoted to his worship, but the Assyrians revered him no less; and even Cyrus, on his conquest of Babylon, treated him with the deepest respect. The name occurs in many Babylonian proper names, and appears in the Bible in Merodach-baladan and Evil-merodach, and probably in Mardassat.

MEROACH-BALADAN (Is 39); misspell [in MT, not in LXX] Berodach-b. in 2 K 20:25.—In Assy., the name is written Marduk-bal-udina, and means 'Merodach has given a son.' For his history see p. 68 f. Mesha by Luke Heuleh in the Upper Jordan Valley (Jos 11:7). This identification is accepted by Robinson (J.R.S. 440, G. A. Smith (R.C.H. 45), and others. It is questioned by Soem (Baderker's Palastina), Buli (G.A.P.), and Gutehe (Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.), the last suggesting an impossible position near Mebron, at the base of Jebel Jericho. Joshua's crowning victory would not be located by such 'waters' as to be found there. The kings were encamped at Bethhoron west from Kadesh (Jos. Ant. v. i. 18), but probably they descended, as did Demetrius at a later date (Ant. xiv. v. 7), to battle in the plain, better suited than the rough uplands for the chariots on which they depended. There is nothing to wonder at the disappearance of the ancient name, in a land where so many names have perished. It is almost certainly the lake Semchonitis of Ant. v. v. 1; the district to the N. was known as Ulathe (Ant. xiv. v. 3; J.R. x. x. 4). This is the first appearance of the modern name—Ulathe = Huleh—which covers both the lake and the district. The water is supplied by the fountains of the Jordan at Hasheb Yiiel, Baniia, and Tell el-Kadi, by the springs at 'Alin el-Balka and 'Alin el-Melaha on the western side of the valley; Mt. Hermon and the neighbouring slopes also drain into the basin. In shape Bheeret el-Huleh is almost triangular. It lies 7 ft. above sea-level. The open water is about four miles in length by about three miles at the broadest part. It is from 10 to 16 ft. in depth. To the N. stretch great breadths of marsh land, with dense thickets of papyrus through which, in various channels, the stream find their way to the lake's upper fowl of all kinds abound, and the place is a sort of fisherman's paradise. The Gadarnish Arabs occupy the valley, till the soil, tend the buffaloes, hunt, and fish. The ha'tent is seldom seen: their 'houses' are 'built' of the papyrus reed.

MERONOTHITE.—A designation applied in the OT to two men. 1. Jehdeha (1 Ch 27:29). 2. Jaden (Neh 3). From the context of Neh 3 Meronoth would appear to have been in the neighbourhood of Girion and Mizpah.

MEROZ.—A place which the angel of Jahweh bids men curse, together with its inhabitants, because they did not come to fight Jahweh's battle against Sisera. It is mentioned only in Jg 5:20, and probably owes its mention merely to the fact that it 'lay in the line of Sisera's flight' (Moore).

MESHA.—1. Son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8:9). 2. Firstborn of Caleb (1 Ch 24).

MESHA.—A king of Moab in the 9th cent. B.C. According to an inscription (on the 'Moabite Stone' discovered at Dibon in 1868) describing his deeds, he expelled the Israelitish inhabitants from northern Moab, or from a portion of the debatable land between the two monarchies east of the northern third of the Dead Sea. Under Omri, the builder of Samaria, the border of Israel had been extended southwards to near its ancient limits (Nu 21:18); and Mesha redeemed it by vindictive warfare, from Kiriathaim as far as Nebo. 2 K 3 also deals with the relation between northern Israel and Mesha, and it is difficult to reconcile two accounts in every detail. The matter can best be dealt with here by giving the most probable order of the events: (1) the conquest by Omri [Inscription, lines 4, 5] about B.C. 880; (2) the expulsion of the Hebrews by Mesha in the time of Ahab [Insc. 1, 8 fl.]; about B.C. 865. Mesha's 'forty years' being, as also often in Hebrew narrative, a round number; (3) the refusal of Mesha to again submit, which is all that the Hebrew of 2 K 5 1? 3 (E.V. 'rebelled') necessarily implies; (4) the unsuccessful expedition by Joram and his allies to reduce Mesha to submission, recorded in 2 K 3. The

MESSIAH

In Gn 10:4, its position has not yet been satisfactorily identified. The proposed identification with the late territory of Messene at the head of the Persian Gulf is improbable. A better case can be made out for identifying it with Mosh or Mashh, a general term in the Assyrian inscriptions for the Syro-Arabian desert; though the passage suggests that a single place, or tribe, rather than so vast a region, is referred to. If the word 'Mash' be expanded, the word may be read as Massa, the name of a son of Ishmael in Gn 25:14 and 1 Ch 1:32. Traces of this latter tribe have been sought in place names in central Arabia, but no identification yet suggested can be regarded as certain.

MESSACH.—The name Michael, by which one of Daniel's three companions, of the children of Judah, was originally called, was changed by the prince of the eunuchs into Messach (Da 1:7 and ch. 3). Such changes of name were not uncommon; they marked the fact that a new state of life had now begun. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain.

MESSIACH.—The name of a people of Asia Minor mentioned in Ezra Tubal; called also the son of Japheth (Gn 10). These two peoples, possibly kindred, appear almost always in conjunction in OT; so even in Is 66:2, where read 'Messhech' instead of 'that draw the bow' (the word for 'bow' being a supplementary gloss). In Ps 120 Messhech and Kedar appear as types of barbarous and warlike people, just as Messach and Tubal are represented in Ezekiel 32:38, 39. In the Assyrian annals the Tubals and Massekh, who are undoubtedly the same as Tubal and Messach, are found again together (as fierce opponents of Assyria in the 12th cent., n.c.), the former lying to the north-east of Cilicia and the latter eastward between them and the Euphrates. The Tibareni and Mocchi of the classical writers must stand for the same two peoples. Ezekiel 27 names them as trading in slaves and articles of bronze.

MESHEOBAR.—A Simeonite (1 Ch 4:39).

MESSELLEMI.—The 'one anointed' (Gr. Christos), i.e. appointed and empowered by God through the impartation of His own spirit, to become the Saviour of His people. The conception of the Messiah is logically implicit in all the expectations of the Hebrew people that Jehovah would deliver Israel and turn it into a glorious empire to which all the heathen would be subjected. But it is not always explicit. The expectation of the coming Kingdom is more in evidence than the expectation of the coming King. But in the same proportion as the conception of the personal Messiah emerges from the general Messianic hope these elements appear within it: (1) The Deliverer; (2) the presence of God's Spirit in His own personality as the source of His power; (3) His work as the salvation of God's people, at first the Jewish nation, but ultimately all those who join themselves to Him.

1. The Messiah of the OT.

In any historical study of the OT it is necessary to distinguish sharply between the Messianic interpretation given to certain passages by later writers, notably Christian and Rabbinic, and the expectation which, so far as it is recoverable, the writers of the OT actually possessed. A disregard of this distinction has been common from the point of view of theological statement, but is fatal to a proper understanding of that progress in the religious apprehension of Israel and the clarification of His religious expectations which constitutes so large a factor in the Biblical revelation of God. It is always easier to discover tendencies as one looks back over a historical course of events than as one looks forward into the future which these events determine. The proper method in the study of the Messianic hope is not to mass the sentences of the OT to which a Messianic interpretation is given by later Biblical or extra-Biblical writers, but to study them in their context both literary and historical. The historian, then, should try to understand the historical development of the historical Messianic hope and to recognize critical results as far as they are reasonably fixed, and thus avoid reading back into the original hopes of the Hebrews those interpretations and implications which were given to the early history by various redactors. These latter, however, constitute data for the understanding of the Messianic ideal in the age of the editors.

Unfortunately, in the present state of criticism it is not possible to arrange the material of the OT in a strict logical order. This is particularly true in the case of that reflecting the Messianic hope. The following classification of OT references is, therefore, not to be taken as a chronological exposition of a developing hope so much as a grouping of material of similar character.

2. The national tendency of Messianic prophecy.—In the case of prophets like Elijah and Elisha the hope is hardly more distinct than a belief that the nation which worshipped Jehovah would be triumphant over its enemies. So far as the records of their teaching show, however, there was no expectation of any superhuman deliverer, or, in fact, any future contemplated other than one which presupposed a conquering Israel with an equally triumphant Jehovah. Eschatological conceptions were absent, and the new Kingdom was to be political in the truest sense. With the approach of the more tragic days of the fall of the Northern Kingdom, the threatened calamities served as a text for the foretelling of Amos, Hosea, and Micah of the hopes which would come to the nation when it turned from idols and alliances with heathen nations to the forgetting of Jehovah may, as current criticism insists, belong to a later period than that usually assigned to them. n of the prophets of the kingdom when the word turned to the lot of the people. In the promised visitation of the seed of the woman over the serpent (Gn 3:15). It is rather a hope of national glory, such as appears in the promise made to Shem (97), to Abraham (12), to Jacob (277-29), and, in particular, to Judah (404-19). The basis of this great expectation is the faith in Jehovah as interpreted by the prophets. Whether or not the Messianic nation was necessarily to be seen throughout the Messianic hope of the OT, although occasional exceptions are to be found, as in Gn 33:4, 15, and in some passages of Ezekiel.

2. The Messianic hope through the great prophets.—With Isaiah began a new development of the Messianic hope, primarily through the teaching of deliverance from the inevitable catastrophe of the Assyrian conquest. Out of the sorrows of the time, born, largely, as Isaiah believed, from the sins of Jehovah's people, was to arise deliverance. This seems to be the central teaching of the great passage, Is 21:1-7. Deliverance was to come before the expected child could choose between good and evil, but by the time he reached maturity the greater misery of Assyrian invasion should break forth. But in the name of the child, Immanuel, was the pledge that Jehovah would ever be with His people and would uphold them; not like a child himself, although nothing is said of Immanuel's share in the accomplishment of the deliverance. Whether or not the reference in Is 9:6, which is to Immanuel, is unequivocal, there is no question of that it is to the offspring of David, who should deliver Israel and reign with Jehovah's assistance for ever triumpantly. In that glorious time, which was to be inaugurated by the Messianic child, there would be prosperity hitherto unthought of (Is 11:2). The 'eternity' of his reign is undoubtedly to be interpreted dynastically rather than personally, but the king himself clearly is a person, and Jehovah's Spirit, which is to be with him, is just as plain the source of his great success (cf. Is 33:14-18). In a similar spirit Micah localizes the new Kingdom established through Divine guidance in Zion (Mic 4:1-4), and declares that the King is to come from Bethlehem, that is to say, shall be Davidic (5:2).

Primarily national as these expectations are, the keynote is the deliverance wrought by Jehovah through a particular royal person, in whose days righteousness and peace are to be supreme in the world because of the Hebrew empire. This picture of the royal king became one controlling element in the later Messianic hope. In this literature, whether or not the date may be, there appears also the new note of universal peace to be wrought by Jehovah. In large measure this peace was conceived of as due to the completeness of Jehovah's conquest of the nations in the interests of His people (cf. Is 2:3-4). But beyond this there can also be seen the hope that the very nature of the reign of the new king would conduct to an end of war. In such a passage as Is 11:1-10 there is struck the keynote of a nobler Messianic reign than that possible to the mere conqueror. The peace then promised was to come from a knowledge of Jehovah as well as from the glories of the Davidic ruler.

The reformation of Josiah finds an echo in the equally exultant expectation of Jeremiah—that Jehovah would surely place a descendant of David upon the throne, a 'righteous branch,' and one who would deliver Israel (Jer 23:5-6). The glory of the restored kingdom was to be enhanced by a New Covenant to replace the broken covenant of Sinai. This covenant would be spiritual, and the relations which it would establish between Israel and Jehovah would be profoundly religious. Israel would be a servant of Jehovah, who would, on His part, forgive His people's sins (Jer 31:31-34, cf. 33:18-22). The restoration of Israel, which was thus to be accomplished by Jehovah, involved not only new beginnings, but also a new prosperity for the priesthood, and new immortality on the part of the individual and the nation. There is no reference, however, to a personal Messiah. Yet if such a passage as Dt 18:15 belongs to this period, it is evident that the hope included the expectation of some great person, who would be even more than a mere man. This great personage, whom the prophets foretold, was the Messiah. As such he would be the Son of God (Is 53:11-12), the Son of man (Dan 7:13-14), the Servant of Jehovah (Is 42:1-9, 49:6-7), and the King of Israel (Is 9:6). Yet if he was none other than the Messiah, he must be seen also as someone of immeasurably exalted status who would be able to govern the nations. This is the understanding of the expectations of the prophets. The kingdom of the Messiah was not to be the restoration of the Davidic kingdom, though the change would probably be in part of the latter (cf. Ps 2:8-9). No, it was to be greater than the kingdom of the Old Testament, and quite distinct from it. It is, therefore, not surprising to find the expectations of the Great Prophet manifest in the pious aspirations of the pious, who see a future Messiah who will reign over the nations and who will usher in a new era of righteousness and peace on earth. This is the essence of the Messianic hope of the prophets, and it is this hope that is the basis of the Christian faith.

re-building of the Temple and the Maccabean outbreak was, however, if current critical views be correct, full of idealistic elements. These expressed themselves in a re-working of the older codes and prophecies of the Hebrews, under the influence of the faith in the coming triumph Jehovah would give His people. The personal Deliverer is not described, but the deliverance was assured. This genuinely Messianic hope was not killed even by other tendencies to replace prophecy by the philosophy of experience. Through all these years it is certain that the fundamental elements of the Messianic hope remained fixed; namely, the inerradicable belief that Jehovah would (a) make of the Jewish nation a world empire; (b) establish the house of David; (c) punish the enemies of His chosen people, whether Gentiles or Jews; and (d) that this glorious future would be established by the expression of the Divine power in the resurrection, not of the individual from Sheol, but of the nation from its miseries. These elements were subsequently to develop into the dominant characteristic of the later Messianic hope—the Kingdom of God, the Davidic king, the Day of Judgment, and the Resurrection of the Righteous.

II. The Messiah of the Jewish literature. 1. The rise of apocalyptic. The attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to Judaize led to a Jewish literature of the type of religious literature—the apocalypse. The origin of this literature is a matter of dispute. The influence of the Babylonian myth cycles is certainly manifest in the apocalypses, whether they stand, however, in a precise analogy in other literature of the period. For our present purpose, however, the importance of the apocalypse lies in the fact that it contributed to the development of a new Messianic conception. In the very nature of apocalyptic, the Messianic 'son of man' is forced to a new life with symbol. The pseudonymous literature, which thus arose in the course of time, however, came to be taken not simply as figures of speech, but as possessing an ill-defined literal character (see Apocalypptic Literature).

2. The Messiah of the later canonical books is not well defined. The apocalyptic sections of Daniel contain a pervasiveness of Messiah. But in the portrayal of this hope we find the first thoroughly elaborated apocalypse of Judaism. The international relations of Israel are traced, but the historical horizon is bounded by Antiochus Epiphanes. A most important element of the future as set forth in Daniel is to be seen in the triumph of the kingdom of the saints, whose symbol is a 'son of man,' over the oppressing kingdoms of Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Syria, symbolized by the four beasts. This is, however, no sharply distinct personal Messiah in these visions, and the expectation is primarily that of a genuinely political State established by Jehovah in Palestine. The 'day of Jehovah' (see Day of the Lord) is, however, now elaborately developed into a world-judgment, and the lines of future apocalyptic Messiahism are clearly drawn. But it is now to some extent expanded by the belief that the righteous, both Hebrews and others, would be raised from the dead to join in the Kingdom (Dan 12:2). In this union of the idea of the resurrection of the nation with that of the individual we find material which was ready to grow into the pictures of the later apocalypses.

3. In the Seven-Oracles the figure of the Messiah again is not distinct, but there is a picture (III. 61a 71b) of a glorious time when under a Divinely supported king (doubtless a member of the Haemanaean house), peace should be to cease and God would punish wickedness. But there was then to come under the law of Jehovah, and Jerusalem would be the capital of the world-wide empire to be established miraculously. The other literature of the inter-Biblical period is not so hopeful, although ben-Sira foresees an everlasting Jewish empire under a Davidic dynasty (Sir 48:1 38:6 47:2 49:9).

4. In the different strata of the Enoch literature the hope of a personal Messiah is presented in somewhat different degrees of distinctness. In the older sections (1-38) of the original groundwork (chs. 1-36, 50:4), the hope, through apocalyptic, is still present. Here, however, as in the later literature, attention is centered rather on the punishment of the wicked than on the development of the new Kingdom. Very noteworthy is the fact that both the punishment of the wicked and the rewards of the righteous were to be eschatological. But eschatology, though involving the resurrection, is still somewhat naive. The righteous are to live 500 years, beget 1000 children, and die in peace (ch. 10). Still, the punishment of the wicked is to be in Sheol, which has been divided into four sections with varying conditions (ch. 22; see Sheol). It is obvious, however, that in this entry Enoch literature the thought was more rather than precise, and in a way it marks the transition from the political religious hope of the prophets to the transcendent expectations of the later apocalypses.

In Jewish eschatological literature, the New Jerusalem is not, however, to be identified with the traditions of the Babylonian apocalyptic. Jehovah is not to return to Jerusalem from Babylon, but to appear in His long-expected kingdom, 'at the end of days,' to judge between the living and the dead. The limitation of the Messianic kingdom is thus removed, and the Messianic age is to be the Kingdom of God. For this new age, however, the Messianic hope is reflected in the literature of the later apocrypha (4 Ezra, 2 Esdras, Sirach, 1-2 Maccabees). In the case of the apocalyptic, the Messianic 'son of man' is recorded merely, and a reconstruction of the kingdom is made by the prophet. In the later apocalyptic, the Messianic age is the Kingdom of God, the Messianic king (Messiah) is the representative of God, and the day of redemption is the day of God, the Day of Judgment, the Kingdom of God, and the Resurrection of the Righteous. (See Apocalyptic Literature.)

In the later apocryphal literature the Messianic age is the Kingdom of God, the Messianic king (Messiah) is the representative of God, and the day of redemption is the day of God, the Day of Judgment, the Kingdom of God, and the Resurrection of the Righteous. (See Apocalyptic Literature.)

i.e. miraculously. The capital would be at Jerusalem, which would be purged from all heathen, and his subjects would be righteous Jews, "sons of God."

7. The literature of later Pharisaism became very strongly apocalyptic, but the figure of a personal Messiah is not always present. In the Assumption of Moses there is no personal Messiah mentioned, and God is still described as the punisher of the Gentiles. The settings of the faithful are treated as an incentive to faith in the Kingdom of God. The concrete king of the hostile kingdom should be overthrown. The enemies of God were to be punished in Gehenna, and a glorious dispensation for united Israel was to dawn.

In Slavonic Enoch, likewise, there is no mention of the Messiah or of the resurrection, although the latter is doubtless involved in the doctrine of the millennium, which is looked for. Furthermore, in the Assumption of Moses and in Slavonic Enoch the central figure is God, the deliverer of His people and judge of His enemies, rather than the Messiah.

In the Apocalypse of Baruch and in Second Esdras, however, transcendentanism reaches its final form under the influence of the tragedy of the fall of Jerusalem. These two books are very probably the different forms of what was an apocalyptic hope that prevailed among the pious Jews. In one cycle a Messiah would stay those who had in any way injured the Jewish people, and make a Jerusalem already prepared in heaven for its occupation. In another cycle there is no such thing as a store for Israel, but there will be an end of corruptible things, and the establishment of a new world-age in which the dead shall be raised under the control of the Messiah. In Second Esdras, 29.200, the Messiah of as pre-existent, raised from the sea in company with Enoch, Moses, and Elijah; and is addressed by God as 'my Son. He destroys the enemies of Israel without war, for that proceeds from his mouth. The ten tribes of Israel return with their brethren to live in the New Jerusalem which had come down from heaven. Then the Messiah and all mankind die, remaining dead for an entire 'week'; after that comes a general resurrection and judgment, and the fixing of the destinies of eternity. God, however, rather than the Messiah, is to be judge.

In these later apocalypses the Christ plays a large role, but is manifestly to be subordinated to God.

111. The Messiah of popular expectation in NT times.—Over against this Messiah of Pharisaic literature, so clearly increasingly superhuman in character, must be placed the popular Messiah hope of the NT. It is difficult to discover this in detail, for the reason that it found its way into literature only as a hope that had been rejected by the writers. Yet it is possible in some passages of Josephus to get a glimpse of the expectation of a Messiah, as it is manifest among the Jews.

The Messianic spirit is undoubtedly to be seen in the succession of so-called 'robbers' that disturbed the reigns of Herod 1, and his successors; as well as in the conspiracies under 'the ten men' (Ant. xv. viii. 3. 4) and the Rabbis Judas and Matthaius (Ant. xvi. vi. 2. 4). With the death of Herod, however, the Messianic movement among the masses gathered headway, particularly after the erection of Judea into a procuratorial province (a.d. 6). Judas of Gamala and a Pharisee named Zaduc organized a fourth sect coordinate with the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, and insisted on the people to revolt, because of the census then established. There is no evidence, however, that this new sect, which is clearly that of the Zealots, had any distinct hope of a superhuman Messiah. According to Josephus (Ant. xviii. i. 1. 6), they said God was to be their other ruler and lord. To this new party Josephus attributes in large degree the fall of the Jewish State. Messianic movements are also to be seen in the attempted revolt of the prophet Theudas, in robbers like Eleazar, in the Sicarii (or Assassins), and in 'the Egyptian' with whom St. Paul was momentarily identified by the chief captain (Ac 21:38). Besides these were bands of fanatics like those mysterious men mentioned by Josephus (B.J. iii. 1. 2. 3). All these movements co-operated to bring about the destruction of the Jewish State, for the revolt of 66 must be regarded as distinctly Messianic—a fact perceived by Josephus in the important passage B.J. vi. v. 4, where it is said: 'What most naturally the ambitious Messiah. The destruction was also found in their sacred writings [doubtless Daniel; cf. Ant. x. x. 4] that about that time one from their country should become ruler of the world.

It is greatly to be regretted that the Messianic hope of the people has not left larger traces of itself. It is, however, not difficult to see in it the more political and concrete hopes which the Pharisees expressed in terms of the apocalypse. The Zealots, like the Pharisees, expected the new Kingdom to be established by God or His representative the Messiah, but, unlike the Pharisees, they were not content to await the Divine action. They preferred rather to precipitate deliverance.

The fact that the Messiah is not prominent in such hopes does not imply that such a person was unexpected. A leader would certainly be involved in any revolt, but such a leader would not necessarily be superhuman. Yet it would be unfair to say that the Messiah whom the people expected, any more than he whom the Pharisees awaited, would be without Divine appointment and inspiration. He might just as well be, strictly speaking, a human, with a certain being given the Divine Spirit and power to bring deliverance which, without the aid of God, would be clearly impossible. The chief difference between the Messianic hope of the Hebrew State and the Messiah and people was probably the lack in the latter of the eschatological, transcendent element, such as the resurrection from the dead and the heavenly Jerusalem, which was so important in the hopes of the Pharisees. How thoroughly social and political this folk-Messianism became is to be seen in the various abortive attempts to establish, during the revolt of 66, a peasant republic, as well as in the destruction of evidence of indebtedness and the massacre of the aristocrats. The Pharisaic expectation would never have led to violence, but rather involved the patient waiting of the faithful for the time set by Jehovah.

IV. The Messiah of the Samaritans.—It would be exceedingly helpful, particularly for an understanding of Jn 4:25, if we knew the Samaritan Messianic hope with some precision. Unfortunately, there is no literature of Christ with the Samaritans, as there is with the Pharisees, nor will we look for any. Indeed, there is no evidence of any Samaritan apocalyptic writings dating from the time of our Lord, or at any rate after the destruction of the Jewish State.

So far, however, as it can be recovered from later sources, and particularly from the present high priest of the Samaritans, it would seem that the expectation did not include the Davidic King of Judaism, but centred rather about the prophecy of Dt 18:5 of the prophet God was to be raise up like unto Moses. This prophet, according to the Samaritan belief, was to be 'the Conqueror,' who would bring moral and religious truth to light. At the same time, they believed that the Gentiles would be subjected to him, would believe in him and the holy Law, and in the sanctuary of Mt. Gerizim. There seems to have been no expectation of miraculous powers to be exercised by the prophet; but concerning this, as in fact about other particulars of the Samaritan hope, no statement can be made with absolute certainty.

The Messiah of Rabbinism.—Subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem, Pharisaism developed rapidly into its final stage of Rabbinism. The two tendencies which are so marked in Pharisaism—one towards strict legalism, the other towards Messianic idealism—were then codified and systematically elaborated. The development of the Messianic expectation, however, was to some extent shaped by the need of combating the Messianic interpretations of Christianity. Traces of this influence are undoubtedly to be found in the Targum on Dt 59.
and in 2 Esdras, but they are also to appear in literature that was clearly subjected to Christian redaction. The Messiah was generally regarded as a descendant of David. He was to free Israel from the power of the heathen world, kill its emperor of the kingdom of evil, and set up his own Kingdom. He was regarded also as pre-existent, not merely ideally, but actually. For a merely ideal pre-existence is not to be argued from the well-known saying including the seven things before the world was made. The name here undoubtedly implies personality, and in some of the later Jewish writings this pre-existent state is somewhat minutely described. He is to hidden until He appears, but the obvious inconsistencies of view were never fully systematized.

Doubtless because of the Messianic arguments of Christians, based upon such passages as Is 53, the Rabbis were forced to the recogition of the idea of the suffering Messiah. In this recognition, however, no change was made in the conception of the Messiah the son of David, but the belief came to involve a second Messiah the son of Joseph. His office and person are not described in detail, but later Rabbinical teaching held that He would appear before the coming of the Messiah the son of David, would gather faithful Jews to him, defeat His enemies, and establish a great kingdom, with its capital and temple at Jerusalem. Thereafter some of the various transcendental enemies of Israel, like Gog and Magog, would defeat and slay him. Then the Messianic son of Joseph would come and rescue the Messiah son of Joseph, and establish the great and more permanent Messianic Kingdom. This conception of the Messiah son of Joseph, however, has never played a very large role in Rabbinical Messianism, and must be regarded in the light of a concession to Christian expectations rather than as a really formative influence. The older hope of the Messiah son of David is that dominant among Jews, who still await his coming, which is to follow the appearance of Elijah (Mal 3:1-4, 6).

VI. THE MESSIAH OF THE NT.—As its very name indicates, Christianity centres about the belief that Jesus was the Messiah. The definition of that word as applied to Jesus is not at all which there is some difference of opinion. Conceivably it might be (a) that of Pharisaic Messianism; (b) something altogether new; or, more probably, (c) the old conception modified by certain new elements.

In discovering what the Messianic conceptions of the NT are, it is necessary to avoid a dogmatic attitude of mind, and to come to the discussion from the historical-exegetical point of view. In such a method the point of departure is the presupposition that current beliefs and definitions were used by Jesus and His disciples wherever such thoughts and definitions were changed or abrogated. A disregard of this primary principle in historical method has too frequently been the cause of false perspective and anachronistic conclusions as regards NT thought.

1. Jesus' conception of Messiahship.—That Jesus conceived of Himself as a Messiah seems to be beyond question, if the saying of Mk 14:27-28 is regarded as historical. But such a conclusion does not rest wholly upon a single saying. His words concerning His conquest of Satan (Mk 3:23-29) are altogether consonant with the conception of Himself as Christ; and His asent to the confession of the Apostles at Caesarea Philippi is a practical acceptance of the title (Mt 8:27-30, which has been made more explicit in Mt 16:14, Lk 9:18-20). His answer to the inquiry of John the Baptist as to whether He were the Coming One (Mt 11:2-3, Lk 7:19-20) can be interpreted only as affirmative. The question was genuinely Messianic, and the Scripture which He used (Is 53:4-9) was given a Messianic interpretation by the Rabbis. To give it any other than a Messianic implication is to render the language epical unintelligible. It is to be noticed further that this saying is not exposed to the difficulties which inhere in some of the apocalyptic sayings attributed to Jesus, or in the repeated Messianic designations of the Fourth Gospel.

It is easy by a process of subjective criticism to remove such sayings from the field of discussion, but such procedure is arbitrary in view of the facts already adduced. It is true that in the Synoptic Gospels as Jesus does not at the beginning of the Galilean ministry go about the country announcing that He is the Christ, but the more He undertakes this sort of propaganda according to the John miniature, it should not be overlooked that in any case His words in the synoptics of Nazareth (Mk 4:25, Mt 12:38), which can best be interpreted as an exposition of His conception of His Messiahship, were uttered in the early part of His ministry. While these allowances may be made for the Johannine accounts of the early acceptance of Jesus as Christ, there is no reason why the ascription of the title to Him by the disciples might not have been made at the beginning of the ministry in the same futurist sense as is involved in the obvious Messianic definition implied in the questions of the sons of Zebedee in the Synoptic cycle (Mk 10:40-45). The fact that Jesus accepted such interpretations of His future makes it plain that He regarded Himself as Christ, at least in the sense that He was to do Messiah work in the future.

This, however, brings us face to face with the question as to how far Jesus applied to Himself the eschatological Messianic hopes of His people, and how far He developed an original Messianic ideal. As yet no consensus of scholars has been reached on this very difficult point.

Certain things, however, seem to be established. (a) Jesus was not regarded generally as the Christ, but as merely a prophet and miracle-worker. He certainly refused to commit Himself to the Messianic programme of the Zealots. He rejected the title 'Son of David' (Mt 12:38), and refused to be made a king, or to use physical force in bringing the Kingdom of God (Jn 6:32; cf. Mt 4:1-10, Lk 4:3, Mt 14:28, 41). (b) Unless all reference by Jesus to the future in terms of eschatology is to be denied (a decision impossible for reasonable criticism), He certainly foresees in the near future to establish a Kingdom that was eschatological.

Although it is probable that the writers of the Gospels have imported eschatological references into the sayings of Jesus, it is impossible to remove them altogether. If, as is probable, Jesus conceived of the Kingdom as the gift of God, for whose coming men were to prepare, it is inevitable that His Messianic career would have been regarded as future as truly as the Kingdom itself (cf. Mt 6:31, Mt 15, 1 Th 4:16, 5:14, Lk 22:29).

(c) But although the coming of the Kingdom, with the attendant Judgment, was still in the future, Jesus cannot be said to have conceived of His mission wholly in terms of eschatology. He had broken with Pharisaicism too completely to warrant our attributing to Him a priori complete subjection to any Pharisaic conception. If there is anything that stands out in the expression of Jesus' self-consciousness, it is that He regarded God was superior to that of a prophet. While in the Synoptic Gospels He does not use explicitly the terms 'Christ' or 'Son of God' of Himself, His reference in the use of terms is balanced by His conception of His own relation to the Kingdom of God. He was the 'Son of Man,' i.e., in accordance with Dn 7:13, He was the type of the coming Kingdom. If, as is undoubtedly the case, He maintained reserve in His preaching in making explicit claims concerning Messiahship, such reserve is easily explained as a preventive against those misapprehensions with which people would have been sure to regard His work. The spirit of the Lord was upon Him to enable Him to do certain deeds, which only He expected the Christ would perform. He was gathering disciples who, as His followers, were to share in the coming Kingdom. In a word, because of the Divine Spirit He was not at the age occupied with the already engaged in the work of saving God's people.

(d) The connecting link between the Messianic career of service and the Messianic career of glory was His death.
No fair criticism can doubt that Jesus saw in these two supreme experience elements of His work as Saviour. Only thus can we interpret His saying at the Last Supper and His repeated prophecies to His followers (Mk 14:25-26; Mt 26; Lk 22:14-16). Thus He fulfilled in Himself the Messianic picture of the Suffering Servant of Is 53. (e) In conclusion, it appears that Jesus' conception of Himself as Messiah was that He was the One in whom God Himself was revealing Himself as the Saviour of those who would accept Him as the Father. The teaching of Jesus from this point of view becomes something more than theoretical ethics and religion, and is seen to be an exposition of His own Messianic self-consciousness. Even in His humiliation and in His sufferings He was the Divinely empowered Saviour. If His faith in the ultimate triumph of that salvation took the form of the eschatology of His messianic deliverance, it was not that He, by His sufferings God's righteous Servant did justify many, and by His death on the cross He did draw men to Himself. With His resurrection began a new era in religious experience, which revealed the realities of those pictures of that transcendental 'age to come' in which current Messianism clothed the glories of the Divine deliverance.

The early Christians modified the conception of the Messiah fundamentally: (1) by recognizing in His own experience vicarious suffering as a part of the Divine deliverance, but even more (2) by His insistence on the universal for-rough-God, which transformed salvation from something ethnic and national into a salvation from sin and death (see Ac 13:32-34, 40-41).

2. The conception of the Messiah among the Apostles. In general the Apostles may be said to have believed Jesus to be the Messiah in the sense that (a) in His earthly career, in His conceptions of the Divine Spirit; (b) that He had not done the strictly Messianic work during His earthly career; (c) that He had been declared the Christ by His resurrection; and (d) that their faith in Him as the Christ was responsible for their belief in the Divinity and the kingdom, and held the world-judgment which was to be preceded by the resurrection of believers, if not of all men.

In the primitive Church of Jerusalem expectation centered about the eschatological concept of judgment and deliverance. As appears from the speech of St. Peter at Pentecost (Ac 2:41-42), as well as from other accounts, the early Church, which had believed that the new age was about to dawn, were living in 'the last days' of the pre-Messianic age. The Christ had appeared, but had been killed, and had been raised from death (Ac 2:22-33). The Resurrection had not made Him the Christ, but had decisively shown that He was the One whose religion was planned by God to be the means of salvation and the Messiah. The Gentiles were to share in the Messianic deliverance, but they had need to be circumcised and join the Jewish community (Ac 15).

Just how far disciples like St. Peter and St. John were committed to this strick Jewish type of Messianic expectation it is difficult to say. It would be unfair to hold that they represented the so-called 'party of the circumcision' which combated St. Paul in his removal of all conditions of salvation beyond faith in Jesus as Christ. It should not be overlooked, moreover, that even in the primitive Church the doctrine of Jesus' resurrection was regarded as a part of the Messianic programme of deliverance, though there is no distinct theory of the Atonement formulated.

2. St. Paul's conception of the Messiah. (I.) This is in marked advance upon that of the primitive Church. He was at one with the Jerusalem community in holding that the Kingdom had not yet come, and that Jesus would soon return from heaven to establish it. He built into his Messianic conception, however, a number of important elements, some of which were Johannine in origin. These elements were (a) the vicarious nature of the death of Christ; (b) the pre-existence of Jesus as Christ; (c) the doctrine of the second Adam, i.e. that Jesus in His resurrection was the type of the new humanity as Adam was the type of physical humanity; (d) the more or less complete identification of Jesus with the Spirit who came to the disciples, as distinct from having been sent by Jesus to the disciples.

(II.) It is not difficult to see, therefore, why it was that St. Paul's chief interest did not lie in the career of the historical Jesus as a teacher and miracle-worker, but rather in the Divine, risen Christ who maintained spiritual contact with the disciples. To have made the teaching of Jesus the centre of his thought would have been to replace the legalism of the Law by the legalism of a new authority. St. Paul was evidently acquainted with the teaching of Jesus, but his message was not that of a completed ethical philosophy, but a gospel of good news of a salvation possible to all mankind, through faith in Jesus as the Messiah. The Pauline gospel to the unconverted (see Ac 13:47-48, 15:15-16, 20:21-23) strove to present the expectation of Messianic judgment, presented the crucified Jesus as declared the Christ by His resurrection, proved it by the use of OT prophecy, and closed with the exhortation to be heirs to the promise to God, who was ready to forgive and save them. In his thought salvation consisted in the possession, through the indwelling Holy Spirit of God, of the sort of life which the risen Jesus already possessed. Morality was the expression in conduct of this regenerated life.

(iii.) The Pauline Christ is Divine, and His work is twofold. First, it is to be that of the Messiah of Jewish eschatology. The Apostle utilizes many of the elements of the Messianism of the pre-Messianic Jew, but he clings to the dead, the sorrows of 'the last days.' But he also made a distinct addition to Messianic thought (a) by his emphasis upon the relation of death of Jesus to the acquittal of the believer in the eschatological judgment, and (b) in his formulation of a doctrine of the resurrection by the use of the historical resurrection of Jesus as a foundation (see Ac 10:40, 11:30-31, 13:32-34, 14:9-10, 20:26-27).

The Christology of St. Paul is not derived from the Pauline Christology is essentially soteriological. The early Christians contributed to the eschatology of the Messiah the teaching of the Church that Jesus was the Messiah who had not come, but He would be King. His supremacy over the Church consisted not merely in that its original nucleus was composed of His disciples, but also in that He had instituted its simple rites, established the details of its organization by giving to its members varying gifts of the Spirit, which oversees its affairs, and is present within it. In fact, so intimate is its relation with the Church, that Christianity may be said to be in Him, and He in them.

From this union of the believer with His Lord (generally mediated in the Pauline thought by the presence of the Holy Spirit) comes the consummation of the salvation of the individual. So long as He had a temple in the body of believers, the believer in whom the Holy Spirit lived might also expect the gift of that spiritual body which was the salvation to be received in the case of the individual.

Yet St. Paul would not say that the Church was to reign eternally. After He had accomplished His work of Messianic deliverance, had finally conquered sin and death, and had established His glorious age, He was to give up the Kingdom to the Father that God might be all and in all (1 Co 15:28).

Thus, while the Pauline soteriological thought is Christo-centric, His theology is Theocentric. Jesus is Christ in the sense that through Him God accomplished salvation and glorified Him with the glory of His salvation. As with St. Paul no longer the Jewish nation, but individuals who, because of their relations with the Deliverer, have been wrought into a unity on earth and await an eternal order in heaven.

In the (Is be Christo-centric, Ch the Church of Christ's 'duke' David's One 23^ Ch of the Messiah himself. A post-Pauline Pauline theology is Christo-centric, His theology is Theocentric. Jesus is Christ in the sense that through Him God accomplished salvation and glorified Him with the glory of His salvation. This is the soteriological Pauline thought as developed, this tendency to find Messianic references in the OT set practically no limits to itself. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the essential features of the entire Hebrew cult are viewed as foreshadowings of the coming and the glory of the Messiah. In the prophetical fulfillments noticed by the writer of the First Gospel, the prophecies of the birth of a son to 'the virgin' (Is 7:14) and the call of Israel from Egypt (Ex 12) are also seen to be prophetic of the experience of Jesus (Mt 1:25). The same is true of more incidental matters, such as His name and His description as the Nazarene (Mt 2:22), while the story of the boy Jesus in the Temple is regarded as a type of His and resurrection (Lk 19:12). Particularly was it seen that His vicarious character was foretold. In the Book of Revelation the Messianic future of Jesus and His Kingdom were still further elaborated by the apocalyptic utilization of apocalyptic thought. In the Apostolic Fathers the use of the OT as the basis for Christological thought involved an arbitrary excess which extended far beyond the limits of proper methodology; and events in the life of Jesus were found predicted in sayings and events quite unused by the Apostles.

(b) The second tendency in post-Pauline Christological thought is to regard the Messianic signification of Jesus in terms of current philosophy. The most pronounced illustration of this is to be seen in the Johannine literature. Here the Christ is identified with the Logos, and His exaltation is viewed as an illustration of the great conflict between light and darkness, life and death, the powers of Satan and the powers of God. In the Epistle to the Hebrews a tendency is to be seen towards the metaphysical conception of Jesus as the Son of God—a tendency which was to find its outcome in the theological formulations of the 3rd and 4th centuries.

But in both these tendencies the fundamental conception of Messiahship is maintained. God is in Jesus reconciling the world to Himself, not imputing their trespasses to those who accept Him, and already engaged in the work of their salvation. The elemental conception of Messiahship thus passed over into Christian thought. It carried with it, it is true, the figures of that interpretation which was born of the development of the Hebrew and Jewish thought. But these figures are not part of the essential element of Christianity. That is the message which the prophets themselves had applied exclusively to Israel, viz. that God would save His people through some personality in whom His spirit was particularly resident to empower Him for the work of salvation. Thus in the history of Jesus and in Christian experience this Divine salvation is set forth, not as ab extra, but as the result of the co-working of God in human lives, to which He comes through the mediation of faith in Jesus, His supreme revelation. To formulate and vindicate the message of this salvation is to exhibit the content of the gospel.

METEB.—'To mete' is 'to measure,' and a 'measuring-stick' (Lev 19:19) is a merchant's measuring-stick.

METHEH-AMMAH.—David took Methheh-ammah out of the hand of the Philistines (2 S 5:19 AV and RVm). Methheh-ammah is from the word synonymous tr. 'the bride of the nation.' Christianity has interpreted this to mean authority over the metropolis, or the suzerainty exercised by the Philistines—it being assumed that Gath was the leading city. In all probability the text is corrupt beyond restoration. See further, Ezp 777, Oct. 1896, p. 45, and Feb. 1900, p. 215.

METHESELEH.—A Sethite, the father of Lamech, Gn 5:26; (P), 1 Ch 1:3, 1k 4:3—Melesiah in J's genealogy, 4:16. The name is interpreted by Holzinger as 'man of the javelin'—a fitting name for a time when the earth was full of violence.

METHUSELEH.—A Cainite, the father of Lamech, Gn 4:20 (J); Melesiah in P's genealogy (5:25). The interpretations of the name are various.

MEZUBEH.—Ezek 27:5 AVm. See Mezol.

ME-ZAHAB ('waters of gold').—Father of Matred and grandfather of Mehetabel the wife of Hadar (Hidad), one of the kings of Edom (Gn 36:9). The name Mezahlah is much more like that of a place than of a person. Holzinger suggests that it is the same name as appears in a corrupted form in Dt 1:11 as Dizahab (wh. see).

MEZOBITE.—One of David's heroes is called in 1 Ch 11:17 'Jasuel the Mezobite.' The text is doubtful.

MIBHAR.—In 1 Ch 11:17 one of David's heroes appears as 'Mibhar the son of Haggri.' The parallel passage 2 S 23:13 reads, 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadiite,' which is probably the correct text.

MIBSAM.—1. A son of Ishmael (Gn 25:15—1 Ch 1:37, 2. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4:5).

MIBZAR ('fortification').—A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36:16—1 Ch 1:49).

MICA.—1. Son of Merib-baal (Mephibosheth), 2 S 9:2; called in 1 Ch 8:36, 9:17, Micah. See Micah, No. 3; 2. Son of Zichri (1 Ch 9:4, Nub 11)—Micah of Neh 12:3. 3. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:4).

MICAH, MICAIAM ('Who is like Jehovah').—This name, which occurs at least twelve times in the OT, and is a woman's name as well as a man's, is spelt in three different ways; the full name is Micajamah, a partially shortened form is Micah, while a still shorter form is Micah. The more important of those who bore this

He was a native of Moresheth (1, Jer 26:4), a place which, if we identify it, as we probably should, with Moresheth-gath (Mic 1:14), lay in the Shephelah of Judah, a fertile country with views over the Philistine country, and backed by the loftier hills which rise to the plateau on which Jerusalem is placed. The home of Micah thus lay a good day's journey from the capital, which, if we may judge from the prophecies on his descriptions, he must frequently have visited.

How Micah worked we are not told; that he spoke in public, and that perhaps both at home and in Jerusalem, is probable in the light of what is known of Amos and Isaiah; and, guided by the same analogy, we may suppose that he himself summarized his teaching in writing (Mic 1-3 in the main).

Of the call of Micah we have no details, but he undertook his duty as in 'declaring to Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin' (39), and the doom which these involved. This transgression is centralized in the capitals—Samaria and Jerusalem (1) 'What is the sin (2 LXX) of Judah? Is it not Jerusalem?' (cf. 310-33). The rising buildings and the growing magnificence of Jerusalem in Hezekiah's day spoke to him of the grinding down of the poor by which his once much needed home was forced, and he bade the prophet prophesy to the house of Micah's battle. The parable which the prophet then utters is a terrible indictment against the 'lying prophets' of Israel; the blow which one of them thereupon gives him is answered by a further prophecy, this time directed against the false prophet who gave the blow. Micah then commanded to be imprisoned until the king returns in peace; but, undaunted, the prophet replies, 'If thou return at all in peace, Jehovah hath not spoken by me.' The sequel showed Micah to have prophesied truly (1 K 22).

3. Micah, the son of Mephibosheth (1 Ch 8:36, 9:41, 2 S 9:1 Mica). 4. Micah, one of the teachers sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the children of Israel and Judah in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17). 5. Micah, the son of Gemariah, and a contemporary of Jeremiah, who heard Baruch reading out the prophecies of Jeremiah, and then be drawn of them to prophesy, who were assembled in the scribe's chamber (Jer 36:17-19), perhaps identical with the Micaiah of 2 K 22 and the Micaiah of 2 Ch 34:19. 6. One of the priests who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12:4). Of less important bearers of the name are mentioned in 1 Ch 5:25 (cf. 24:40), 2 Ch 13:18 (see Maacah, 4), Neh 10:11-25 (1 Ch 9:1 Mica) 6, 9th 4. For the prophet Micah see the following article. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

MICAH. — The Morashite, one of the four prophets of the 8th century B.C. whose writings have survived. Probably his prophecy does not extend beyond the first three chapters of the Book of Micah (see next art.).

According to the general interpretation of 1, Micah prophesied, at least in part, before the destruction of Samaria, which took place in B.C. 722; though some place his prophetic activity entirely in the year 705-711. In any case, he prophesied a generation or so later than Amos, later also than Hosea; but he was contemporary with Isaiah, and his activity coincides with the midcareer of Isaiah, or his close, according as we accept the one or the other of the two views just mentioned.
MICAH, BOOK OF

struction of Jerusalem; but certain elders cited against the priests and prophets the precedent of Micah the Morasthite, who had made a similar prediction in the days of Hezekiah, and yet, so far from being put to death, he led his people to repentance; in citing this case the speakers quote the words with which Mic 3 closes (see Jer 26, esp. vv. 17-19). Of course, the citation of this single verse does not prove that even the first three chapters of the Book of Micah were then in circulation in their present form; but the narrative in Jeremiah shows that Micah, a century after he prophesied, ranked as a prophet of judgment, and Micah 1-3 is pre-eminently prophecy of judgment. The two verses (2:4-5) which interrupt the general tenor of chs. 1-3 with a promise, represent Israel as scattered, and appear to pre-suppose the Exile; they are certainly not part of the preceding prophecy, and probably are an insertion in the book after the time of Jeremiah. It is held by some that the Book of Micah known to Jeremiah's contemporaries also lacked the following portions of chs. 1-3: 10-12. Note, for example, that if 17 stands most awkwardly before 11, which may give the reason for 19, but certainly not for 17. Yet the grounds given for deleting these passages in order to recover the earliest form of the Book of Micah are by no means equally conclusive. For the teaching of Micah, see preceding article.

Two not quite identical questions now naturally arise: Did the Book of Micah in the time of Jeremiah contain chs. 4-7? Do these contain any prophecies of Micah? The answers, so far as they can be given, must rest mainly on internal evidence. What suggestion the narrative of Jer 26 offers in this connexion must first be put in the form of a question: did the elders have cited (Jer 26:6) the words of Mic 3:8 if those words were then, as now, immediately followed (Mic 4:1) by a glowing description of the future glory of Jerusalem? Would they not thereby have given the priests an opening to say that Micah's life was spared because he repented of his blasphemy against their city and spoke of its glory?

CHS. 4, 5 appear to be a canto of brief prophecies, some strophes being fragments as follows: 4:4-5, 6-8, 9, 10, 11. 12. 13, 14, 15. The first of these (4:4-5) stands also in the Book of Isaiah (27:1ff). Neither in Isaiah nor in Micah is the passage connected either with what precedes or with what follows; owing to mistranslation, RV indeed suggests that 4:4 is the contrast to 3:12, but for 'but in 4:5 must be substituted 'and' as in RV itself in Is 2:5. The verses contain a prophetic poem of two strophes (two of which were omitted in Isaiah); the same Psalm (14 = 53) was included in two separate collections of Psalms, so this poem was not unreasonably thought worthy by two editors of prophetic literature to be included in their collections. It is impossible to examine here in detail the remaining sections of these chapters; some seem, if naturally interpreted, to presuppose the dispersion of Israel at the Exile; see e.g.
4:15, where promises of a bright future are made to Israel, who has already been reduced to a remnant;
some passages contain the expectation of a judgment on the nations in general (4:4ff), which is certainly more conspicuous in the later prophets than in those of the age of Micah; in 4:8-12 Zech 8 seems to be regarded as inavolable—a point of view strikingly different from that with which Micah was popularly identified (Mic 3:1, Jer 26:4). In 5:6-14 there is little or nothing consistent with an eighth century origin; read by themselves, without v. 15, they are not necessarily a prophecy of promise, but rather of judgment. Here (and perhaps in 4:5), if anywhere in chs. 4, 5, we may look for Micah's work; for though so early in origin of these verses is not certain, neither is it certain that they are a piece of late reprophecy.

Turning next to chs. 6, 7, we remark first that since Ewald the allusion to sacrificing the firstborn, and certain other features, have been commonly considered to point to the period of Manasseh as that in which cha. 6, 7 were written—a date which would not quite necessarily exclude Micah's authorship, for Manasseh began to reign about 834 B.C.

In 6:4 some points, such as the use of 'burnt-offering' (not 'sin-offering') and the nature of the allusion to Balaam, may be more easily explained if the passage be at least pre-exilic. Nevertheless, the prophetic definition of religion with which this section closes (6:9), though it embraces and summarizes the fundamental teaching of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, does not pass beyond it—a fact which is thoroughly compatible with Ewald's theory, though not, of course, in itself a proof of its

But it is more than doubtful whether chs. 6, 7 should be -treated as a single prophecy; 6:4-10 and 7:1-4, though scarce a continuation of 6:4-10, are not obviously separated from it at all widely in situation or time.
On the other hand, as compared with 7:1-4, 7:5 show a marked difference. Wellhausen (cited by Driver, LOT 632 f.) has tersely summed this up.

'7:1-4 consists of a bitter lamentation uttered by Zion over the corruption of her children: and the day of retribution, though ready, is yet future, 7:5.' In 7:5-9 Zion, indeed, is still the speaker; but she has already been overpowered by her foe, the heathen world, which is persuaded that by its victory over Israel it has at the same time vainly dispelled Jehovah (7:6). The city has fallen, its walls are destroyed, its inhabitants pine away in darkness, i.e. in the darkness of captivity (7:10). Nevertheless, Zion is not overconfident, and though her doom is secure, she does not question her final triumph over the foe (7:11, 12, 13).
She endures patiently the punishment merited by her past sin, assured that when she has atoned for it, God will take up her cause and lead her to victory (7:14). What was expected in 7:1-4, viz., moral disorder and confusion in the existing Jewish State, is in 7:5-9 past: what is there future, viz., the retribution of 7:6, has here come to pass, and has been continuing for some time. Between 7:1 and 7:16 a century.'

Briefly, then, the history of the Book of Micah seems to have been this: a summary of the teaching of the prophet Micah, not improbably prepared and written by himself, was well known in Jerusalem at the end of the seventh century—a century after the lifetime of the prophet. This small book was re-edited and provided with its present expanded title, enlarged by the addition of a collection of prophetic pieces, some apocalyptic, and several of post-exilic origin, not necessary to suppose that this added matter was original attributed to Micah, though subsequently it came to be regarded as his work in the same way as Isaiah 40-66 and Zec 9-14 can be regarded as writings of Isaiah and Zechariah respectively.
The final stage in the history of the book was its incorporation, probably towards the close of the 3rd century, n.c., in the great prophetic work 'The Book of the Twelve.' It is impossible to determine through how many stages of editorial treatment the book passed, but some of these stages certainly fell within the post-exilic period.

The most convenient English commentaries are those

MICHAEL ('the archangel').—Although reference to angels and their visitations is common in the OT, especially during transition periods (e.g. the period of the Judges and that of the Captivity are specially noticeable for angelic appearances), the name Michael is not found until the later period, when the angelic office was divided into two parts, which were assigned to individual angels. In the Rabbinical traditions Michael figures considerably. He is connected with many incidents in the history of Moses, especially his burial (cf. Dt 344), when he disputed with Satan, who claimed the body by reason of the murder of the Egyptian (Ex 2). In the OT he is alluded to several times in the Book of Daniel (10«, 12) as 'one of the chief princes,' 'the prince,' and 'the prince which standeth for the people,' and he is opposed to the prince-angels of Persia and of Greece. He is here regarded as the guardian of the Israelites in their opposition to polytheism and foreign innovations.

In the NT Michael is found fighting in heaven (Rev 12) against the dragon, 'him that is called the devil and Satan,' and is typical of the warfare which is the special work of the Church on earth. In the passage in Jude (v) a definite reference is made to the tradition already mentioned, 'Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring him against a ruling accusation, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee."' T. A. MOXON.

MICH. —Younger daughter of Saul, offered to David, as a snare, on condition that he would slay one hundred Philistines. The popularity of David led Saul to seek his life. He had David's house surrounded, but Michael deceived the messengers, and contrived David's escape by the window (1 S 1913). Saul then gave Michael to Paltiel. When Abner negotiated with David to deliver the city of Ziklag to David, Paltiel was appointed for Michael's return. This was accomplished, though the record does not make it clear whether directly from Ishbaal (Isbaah) at the instance of David, or through Abner (2 S 314). Paltiel followed weeping, but was rudely dismissed by Abner. The closing scene between Michael and David is pathetic. David's dance before the ark was unseemly in the eyes of Michael, and she rebuked him. His answer was equally curt. The statement that Michael died childless is etymologically mean that she was divorced (2 S 314). The estrangement was probably due to the numerous wives that now shared David's prosperity and Michael's authority.

MICHAAS (2 Es 13)—the prophet Mich.

MICHAED—See next article.

MICHAED—place (not enumerated as a town) in the territory of Benjamin, and in the mountains of Bethel. It comes into prominence in connexion with the daring raid made by Jonathan and his armour-bearer upon the Philistines there encamped (1 S 13. 14). It was one of the smaller places to which the returning exiles belonged, contributing only 122 men to the enumeration of Ezra (Ezra 27) and Nembah (72) [in both these last two passages Mich.], Nehemiah further alludes to it as a border city of Benjamin (11). Indications of its position may be obtained from the Jonathan story and also from Isaiah's picture of the course of an Assyrian raid (Is 106). These indications permit an identification of the site with the modern village of Mikmaas, situated in a wild and desolate region near the head of the Wady Kelt. In I K 4 for Mcak the LXX erroneously reads Michmas. For a time it was the chief of the government of Jonathan Macebas (1 Mac 97). B. A. S. MACALISTER.

MICHEMETHAIH.—The word occurs only in Jos 1617, in each case with the article, therefore probably not a proper name. Of the meaning of the word we are entirely ignorant. It indicated a place or some natural feature on the boundary of Manassah. An echo of the old name may perhaps be heard in el-Mukeibeh, which lies to the east of NABLUS. W. EWING.

MIDDIN.—A town in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 156). The site has not been recovered.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES.—A nomadic tribe or group of tribes, said by an early genealogy (Gn 259) to be descended from Abraham by Keturah, of whom the Kenites (wh. see) were a part. They lived in ancient times in northern Arabia, but vanished at an early date from history.

According to E they were traders, who sold Joseph into Egypt (Gn 374, 5). They roamed about Sinai (Ex 3, 4), Hab 37. Jethro (E) or Hobab (J), Moses' father-in-law, was their priest. As Jethro is also said to be a Midianite, the Kenites were a part of the Midianites. They were afterwards absorbed by the tribe of Judah (Jg 154, 1 S 159). The Prophetic source (J) also shows that in an early form of the narrative it was Midian, not Moab, that was said to have hired Balaam to curse Israel (cf. Nu 227). If this is so, it was a different branch of Midianites from the Kenites. The same source informs us (Gn 368) that a king of Edom in the Midianites' field of Moab. The references point to an activity of Midian in this region of which we have no other trace.

The next we hear of the Midianites is in the period of the Judges, when they invaded the territory of central Palestine in hordes, and were put to rout by Gideon and his three hundred men (Jg 68). These Midianites seem to have lived to the east of Palestine, and to have gained access to the west Jordan lands through the valley of the Jabbok. This corresponds with the statement in Gn 297 (J), the sons of Abraham by Keturah, of whom Midian was one, lived to the eastward. At the time of Gideon the Midianites were led by two chiefs, whose names J preserves as Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 84), while E calls them Oreb and Zeeb (Jg 79). Gideon so completely subdued the Midianites that his victory was long remembered (cf. Is 98 109, Ps 839). From this blow the tribe never recovered, and disappears from history.

According to a late Priestly passage (Nu 3114), Moses is said to have gained a great victory over the Midianites. Perhaps, as some scholars think, this is a later version of the victory of Gideon. Post-Gideon is another version of the victory of the king of Edom.

The genealogy given in Gn 254 calls Ephah a son of Midian. Is 609 mentions both Midian and Ephah in connexion with Kedar. Tiglath-pileser III. (A.M. ii. 21) mentions a Khayaera in connexion with Taima, which Dlittisch (Parades, 304) identifies with Ephah. This would correspond with the location given in the genealogy.

Ptolemy (Geo. vi. 7) mentions a place, Mediana, on the coast of Arabia, which is probably the same as Melkiona on the Ha road to Mecca. Noldeke (EB viii. col. 3638) thinks that the name has survived from an old habitat of the Midianites.

MIGDAL-EL.—A town of Naphtali (Jos 1919) between Iron and Horem. The site is uncertain.

MIGDAG-GAD.—A town in the Shephelah, in the territory of Judah (Jos 1918). It appears on the map, but is not marked with any certainty. Guthe suggests Khirbet el-Meydolah, about 5 miles S. of Bet Jibrin, with remains of buildings, cisterns, and rock-hewn tombs; or Khirbet el-Meydel, about 14 miles S. of Bet Jibrin, with extensive ruins, etc. Warren (Hastings' DB) suggests...

el-Migdol, a thriving village 23 miles N.E. of Ashkelon. The name ‘Tower of Gad’ probably points to its having been a seat of idolatry, where the Canaanites worshipped Gad—‘Good Luck’ or ‘Fortune.’ W. Ewing.

MIGDOL.—A Semitic word meaning ‘tower,’ borrowed by the Egyptians of the New Kingdom, and common as a word and in place-names. 1. Ex 14:4, Nu 33:12, on the border of Egypt, near the spot where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea: probably a mere guardhouse on the road. 2. Ezk 28:29, where ‘from Migdol to Syene’ is the true reading, instead of ‘from the tower of Seveneh.’ Here Migdol is the N.E. extremity of Egypt, as Seveneh is the S. It may be identical with Magoilo in a Roman itinerary, perhaps at the now deserted site of Tell el-Her, 12 miles south of Pelusium. 3. In Jer 44:4, migdol is mentioned with Taaphanah and Noph (Memphis) as a habitation of the Jews, and is probably the same as No. 2. F. L. Griffith.

MIGRON.—One of the places mentioned in Isaiah’s description of the march of the Assyrians on Jerusalem. The direction of the march is from north to south: hence Migron (Is 10:24) lay north of Michmas (wh. see), and north of the Wady es-Suwtén, which is the ‘pass’ of Jg 10:19. The name perhaps survives in Malek, a ruined site situated a mile or two N.W. of Mekkabas (Michmas). In 1 S 14:2 Saul, whose army was encamped south of the Wady es-Suwtén, is said to have dwelt in ‘the uttermost part of Geba’ (so read) under the pomegranate tree which is in Migron.’ Probably ‘in Migron’ should rather be translated ‘in the threshing-floor;’ if not, we must infer that there were two places not many miles apart, one north and the other south of the Wady es-Suwtén, bearing the same name. This southern Migron has not been identified.

G. B. Gray.

MILJAMN.—1. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ez 22:17); called in 1 Es 9:9, Macus. 2. Eponym of the 6th of the priestly courses (1 Ch 24:24). This family returned with Zerub. (Neh 12:19), and was represented at the sealing of the covenant (10:37) as Miniamin of Neh 12:13.

MILKIAL.—A gate-keeper of the ark (1 Ch 15:14).

MILCOM.—The national deity of Ammon. Solomon established a sanctuary for him on the Mount of Olives, where an image to him continued till it was carried away by Josiah (1 K 11:7, 9, 2 K 23:12). In 2 S 12:24, 1 Ch 20, Jer 49, and Zeph 1:12, Malcam (‘their king’) is probably an incorrect vocalization of Milcom. The name is from the common Semitic root mal, melak (‘king’ or ‘prince’), probably with an indeclensional termination. The traditional identification of Milcom with Molech is based only upon 1 K 11:7, a verse which is probably corrupt. See Molech. W. M. Neubn.

MILEW (mīla‘ēn, D 32:1, 1 K 8:5, 2 Ch 6:1, Am 4:9). Haq (259) is a disease of grain due to various fungi: it is produced by damp, and is in the above passages associated with shiddap, ‘blasting,’ the opposite condition produced by excessive drought. E. W. G. Masterman.

MILE—See Weights and Measures.

MILETUS.—The southernmost of the twelve colonies forming the Ionian confederacy of Asia Minor. It lay on the S. coast of the Latonian Gulf, which penetrated Caria S. of the peninsula of Mycale, and received the waters of the Meander. The silt of this river filled up the gulf, and Miletus is now 5 miles from the sea, while the former island of Latos, which helped to make its harbour, is now a hill rising in the alluvial plain.

Two visits of St. Paul to Miletus are mentioned. The first (Ac 20:14) took place when he was returning to Jerusalem at the end of the Third Missionary Journey. He stayed long enough to send for the elders of Ephesus, and give them the farewell charge recorded in Ac 20. The second probably needed two days. The place is first mentioned in 2 Ti 4:11 'Trophimus I left at Miletus sick.' This must have been between St. Paul’s first and second imprisonment at Rome. In neither case are we told of any attempt to found any Christian church: the name was already unimportant by comparison with Ephesus, which now received the trade of the Meander valley, and shared with Smyrna the trade that came along the great road through the centres of Asia Minor. Ephesus was recognized by the Romans as the southern capital of the province of Asia. Formerly Miletus had led Ionia. Its trade was mainly in wool, and it had founded numerous colonies on the Black Sea and Propontis (Sinope, Trapezus, Abydos, Cyzicus), besides Naupactus in Egypt. It had led the Ionian revolt, the fate of which was determined by the battle of Lade and the capture of Miletus, a. c. 494. It had defended itself on behalf of the Persian power (Darius). Its ruin is now called Palaias. They seem to include few Christian remains, but Miletus was a bishoipric, and from the 5th cent. an archbishopric.

MILK.—Milk was at all times an important article of diet among the Hebrews, and by ben-Sira is rightly assigned a prominent place among the principal things necessary for man’s life (Sth 30:9). It was supplied by the females of the ‘herd’ and of the ‘flock,’ the latter term including both sheep and goats (Dt 32:14, where render ‘sour milk’ [chem ‘ah] of the herd, and milk [chem ‘ah] of the flock’), probably also by the maima camels (Gn 32:4). At the present day goats milk is preferred to every other.

In Bible times, as now, milk slightly soured or fermented was a favourite beverage. The Modern Bedouin prepares this sour milk, or leben, as it is called, by pouring the fresh milk into a skin (cf. Jg 4:18) she opened the milk-skin (EV ‘a bottle of milk’), and gave him drink’), to the sides of which clots of sour milk from a previous milking still adhere. The skin is shaken for a little, when the process of fermentation speedily commences, and the milk is served with that now gathered sourness of which they think the more refreshing. (Dph 1:17, 18). Such was the refreshment with which Jeel supplied Siessa. ‘He asked water, she gave him milk: she brought him sour milk (chem ‘ah) in a lordly dish’ (Is 65:1; where EV has ‘butter,’ but one does not drink butter; cf. 413 cited above).

In several OT passages, however, this word, chem ‘ah, does evidently signify butter, as in Pr 30:6 ‘the churning (lit. as rv ‘pressing’) of milk bringeth forth butter.’ So Ps 55:9 RV, ‘his mouth was smooth as butter,’ where ‘sour milk’ is clearly out of place. The former passage suggests the procedure of the Arab housewife whom Doughty describes (op. cit. ii 67) as ‘rocking her blown-up milk-skin upon her knuckles till the butter came; they find it in a clot at the mouth of the skin.’ Butter cannot be kept sweet under the climatic conditions of Palestine, but must be boiled, producing the churned or clarified butter universally prised throughout the East.

Cheese is mentioned three times in our AV (1 S 17:5, 2 S 17:5, 19:10); in each case the original has a different word. The clearest case is the last cited: text of 2 S 17:5, on the other hand, is admittedly in disorder, and we should perhaps read, by a slight change of consonants, ‘dried curds’; these, when rubbed down and mixed with water, yield a refreshing drink much esteemed at the present day. From the Mishna we learn that rennet and the acid juices of various trees and plants were used to curdle (Job 10:9) milk. After being drained of the whey—the water of milk—the curds were salted, shaped into round discs, and dried in the sun. The Tyropoön valley in Jerusalem received its name, 'the valley of the cheesemakers,' from the industry there carried on.

There has been much discussion of late as to the origin of the popular expression 'dowing with milk and honey,' so frequently used in OT to describe Palestine as an ideal land abounding in the necessaries and delicacies of life. Many recent scholars demur to the traditional view that this is expressed by the words 'milk and honey,' on the principle of the part for the whole, and favour a more recondite origin in a forgotten Palestinian mythology. Thus explanation would bring this:—

Even more obscure is the significance of the thrice-repeated command: 'Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk' (Ex 23:19) and (Deut 14:19). It is still divided as to whether we have here a piece of purely humanitarian—some would say sentimental—legislation, or the prohibition of a magical rite connected with the religious ceremony of the exposition of the Passover. For the latter view of the significance of this see, J. G. Frazer, 'Folk-lore in the OT,' in Anthropological Essays, etc. (1907), 151 ff.

MILL, MILLSTONE. — 1. The methods of preparing meal flour were in use in Palestine in Bible times, associated with the mortar and pestle (see MORTAR and PESTLE), the rubbing-stone, and the quern or handmill. The most ancient apparatus was the rubbing-stone or corn-rubber, which consisted really of two stones. The one on which the corn was ground was a substantial slab, often 2½ feet long, and about a foot wide, slightly concave and curving upwards, like a saddle, at both ends (Illustr. in Macalister, Bible Side-light, etc., fig. 28). The other, the rubbing-stone proper, was a narrow stone from 12 to 18 inches long, pointed at both ends and also slightly curved, one side being plain and the other smooth. In manipulating the rubber, the woman grasped it by both ends and ground the grains of wheat or barley with the convex side. Cf. Macalister's description in PEPSI, 1903, p. 118, with Schumacher's photograph reproduced by Benzinger, Heb. Arch. (1907) 63, and the Egyptian statuette in Ehrman's Ancient Egypt, 190.

2. The more familiar apparatus for the same purpose was the handmill or quern. As in so many instances (see, e.g., Laker), the recent excavations enable us to see in detail the stages of the evolution of the Palestinian handmill. The Gezer specimens described in detail in PEPSI, 1903, 119, belong to the earlier type, which is distinguished from the later form by the absence of a handle for rotating the upper stone. The quern-stones are 'always small, rarely being much as a foot across.' The lower stone, the 'nether millstone' of Job 41:19, was always more massive than the 'upper millstone' (Deut. 24:2), and was grooved with 'a narrow spindle' sunk into the stone. The upper stone was pierced right through, and by this hole the mill was fed. According to Mr. Macalister, 'the upper stone was grasped with both hands (the fingers clapping the edge, the thumbs being between the spindle and the stone), and worked through about one-third of a rotation, backward and forward.' For varieties of this type, see PEPSI, 1903, p. 119. Ray.

In the later and more effective type of handmill, which was that in use in NT times, the stones were larger, although the lower stone was still considerably wider than the upper (Baba bathra, l. 1). As in the querns of the present day, the latter was fitted with a wooden handle (yad in the Mishna) in the shape of an upright peg inserted near the outer edge. The mill was fed, as before, through a funnel-shaped cavity pierced through the upper stone, which was rotated by the handle through a complete circle. So from Mt 24, two women worked the mill, seated opposite each other, and each turning the upper stone through half a revolution, as may still be seen in the East.

By the second century of the Christian era a larger form of mill had been introduced, apparently, to judge by the names of the various parts in the Mishna (see art. 'Mill' in EBT iii. 3098), under Greco-Roman influence. In the larger specimen of this type, the upper millstone, in the shape of two hollow cones, as described in detail, loc. cit., was turned by an ass, and is the 'great millstone' of Mt 18:26 (lit. as RV 'a millstone turned by an ass').

The finer varieties of meal, the 'fine flour' of OT, were got by repetitious grinding, or by sifting with sieves, or by a combination of both processes.

The term 'rubbing-stone' came into use for the daily life of the family may be seen from the provision of the Deuteronomical legislation forbidding the creditor to take in pledge the household mill (so rightly interpreted, or even the upper millstone, for it takes a man's life to pledge') (Deut 24).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MILLENNIUM. — A period of a thousand years, during which, according to Rev 20:3, the Devil (i.e., the devil) is to become confined in the abyss, while the martyrs, having been raised from the dead, are to reign with Christ. The period begins with the first resurrection, and at its end, Satan, together with his angels and hosts, is cast into the abyss, which shall be in the 7th day. A similar expectation is to be found in the Talmud (Sanh. 97a), and it is not impossible that this conception can be traced back to Babylonia or Persia.

In the history of the Christian Church the doctrine of the Millennium has played a considerable role, but Chiliasm (wh. see) has been opposed by most of the great Protestant reformers from Augustine down. In the Epistle of Barabbas (ch. 16) we have a view very similar to that of the Slavonic Enoch, while Justin Martyr (Dial. 80) regards a chiliastic view of the future as an essential part of Christian faith, although he knows that it is not held by the orthodox. At the present time, in addition to the Second Adventists, millennial views are held strongly by a number of earnest Christians commonly called premillenarians because of their belief that Christ will return before the period of a thousand years begins and establish an earthly reign. In accordance with this theory (see CHILIASM, PAROUSIA), the resurrection is to be limited to martyrs but to all Christians. Such an interpretation obviously does violence to the connexion between the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation, and gives undue prominence to an expectation which was held by neither Jesus nor St. Paul, nor, in fact, by any writer of the NT except the author of Revelation. At the same time, there is little question that this pre-millennial view is germane to the literalistic Messianic hope which controlled the NT Church, and not beyond a possible harmonization with 1 Co 15-2
The fundamental difficulty in erecting it into a doctrine of essential Christianity is that it presupposes conditions and expectations, carried over from Judaism, which the course of history has shown to be without foundation.

S. H. TALMOUTH.

MILLET (probably Panicum miliaceum or perhaps Vulpia argentea.) is mentioned in Ezek 4:14 (only) as an ingredient in bread. See Foood, § 2.

MILLO.—A place near Shechem (the name of which would be better rendered Beth-millo, without translating the first element 'house of Millo,' AV and RV.), quite unknown, the inhabitants of which were associated in the coronation of Abimelech (Judg. 9:24). Josiah was slain at a 'Beth-millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla' (2 K. 20:4). Whether this be the same place, or whether, in the absence of any certain information on this point, the two names may be identical, is a question to which no answer can be given. See Jerusalem, II. § 2.

R. A. MACLELLAN.

MINES.—The name of a S.W. Arabian people dwelling north of the Sabeans (Sheba), who in the 9th and 8th centuries B.C. became a powerful nation with a dominion stretching north to the peninsula of Sinai. It is supposed by recent scholars that they are meant by the Meunim of the E. of Judah, who were driven from their place, as dwelling in the Negeb, in 2 Ch 26:6 along with Arabsians, and in 2 Ch 20 (by correction) along with the Ammonites. In all these passages the LXX renders Minaeans.

J. F. M'Curdy.

MIND.—See Psychology.

MINING AND METALS.—Though Palestine proper is deficient in mineral resources, yet these were present to some extent on its borders, and were not only abundantly found, but even largely developed, in other parts of the ancient East. The Scripture references to mining, accordingly, though not very numerous, are sufficiently definite. Such a passage as Dt 8:9 (cf. 32:18), though inapplicable to Palestine proper, may hold good of the Lebanon district (as has been suggested by some) of the Sinaitic region. The classical description of the miner's life in Job 28 is evidently based on observation. It depicts the adventurous and toilsome character of the quest, the shafts sunk and the galleries tunnelled in the rock, the darkness, the waters that have to be drained away, the hidden treasures of precious stones and metals that reward the effort and the ingenuity of man.

The list of metals in Nu 31:12 includes all those that are mentioned in Scripture, viz. gold, silver, 'brass,' iron, tin, and lead. All these are again enumerated in Ezek 27:12, 13 as articles of Tyrian commerce.

BRASS.—This English word, as late as 1611, denoted copper or bronze (an alloy of copper and tin) rather than the modern brass (an alloy of copper and zinc). Hence, where 'brass' occurs in EV, copper or bronze is to be understood (see RVm on Gn 46, and art. Brass).

COPPER occurs once in AV (Ezr 8:27, RV 'bright brass'). But see on 'Brass' above and 'Steel' below.

Steel, the use of which can be traced back to the earliest times of civilization. As a medium of currency it was reckoned by weight, in shekels and talents, coinage being unknown among the Jews before the Exile. While it figured in the history of Israel from the beginning (see the spoils of Egypt [Ex 12:31], Midian [Nu 31:18; Jg 7:1], and Jericho [Judg. 7:21]), it became specially plentiful in Palestine in the time of Solomon (1 K. 10:21), the main sources of it being Ophir (1 K. 10:20, 30; 2 Ch 9:22), Gezara (1 K. 10:20), and Sheba (1 K. 10:3, 11, Ps 72:15). Another gold-producing country was Havilah (Gen 2:12). Of these localities Havilah and Sheba were Arabian.

Ophir (wh. see) may have been the same, though its situation has also been sought in India and Africa.

For golden smiths see Neh 3:13, 22, Is 44:17; 44, also (RV) Jer 10:9, 11:51 (the products of their art commanded work [Ex 25:17], Nu 3:27, 1 K 10:21, 2 Ch 6:41), plating (Ex 25:7, 10, 25:30), and wire or thread for embroidery (Ex 39:25).

Iron appears to have come into use later than copper or bronze. Its ores are found in the Lebanon district, in the region of Sinal, and in Egypt, and in the famous ancient seat of its manufacture was among the Chaldeans in the Highlands of Assyria. Mining for it is mentioned in Job 28, the 'iron furnace' in Dt 4:20, 1 K 8:4, Jer 11:4, and the forge in Jer 17:18. In modern times iron is separated from its ores as cast iron, from which wrought iron and steel are subsequently prepared. But in ancient times the temperature necessary to melt iron was unavailable, and it must have been produced as wrought iron, which is still obtained by primitive smelting processes in various parts of the world. The use of iron alluded to in Scripture is very varied, but call for no special comment. Dt 12:4 and possibly in Am 1:5; 'iron' means black basalt.

Lead is mentioned in Jer 22:21, Ezk 22:22 in connexion with the smelting of silver (see Silver). Its use is referred to in Ex 16:31. 'The ephah' of Zec 5:5 has a leaden covering. Rock-cut inscriptions were made more durable by having the chiselled letters filled up with lead (Job 19:16).

Mineral silver, like gold, was a very early medium of exchange (Gen 23:18). The Heb. and Gr. words for silver are often rendered 'money' in EV. There are frequent references in OT to the use of this metal for vessels and ornamental work. In NT there is special mention of the gilding of silversmiths at Ephesus, and of the 'shining' or models of the temple of Diana which were their most profitable article of trade (Acts 19:44). Among the sources of the metal, Arabia (2 Ch 9:20 and Tarshish (2 Ch 9:20, Jer 10:9, Ezk 27:21) are named. The commonest ore of silver is argentiferous galena, which contains a large quantity of lead, and in which other metals may also be present. In the course of smelting the lead combines with the other impurities to form a heavy 'slag,' which separates by its weight from the molten silver, leaving the latter pure. This process is referred to, usually in a figurative moral sense, in Ps 66:17 (cf. Is 48:12), Pr 17:20; 22:27, Zec 12:18, Mal 3:13, and especially in Jer 6:18 and Ezek 22:17-22. In the last two passages lead is the most prominent impurity, the others being 'brass,' iron, and tin. The mixture of these was the refuse or 'dross' of silver (see also Is 1:18-23).

STEEL (2 S 22:20, Job 20:16, Ps 15:6, Jer 15:19) is a mistaken translation in AV of the words elsewhere rendered 'brass.' RV has 'brass' in these passages, and copper or bronze is to be understood. Only in Neh 2:19 (RV) is 'steel' possibly a correct rendering. Steel is a form of iron containing more carbon than wrought iron. It is capable not only of being welded but also cast, and tempered to various degrees of hardness and plasticity.

Iron derived its importance from its use as a constituent of bronze (an alloy of copper and tin). It is mentioned as an article of Tyrian commerce in Ezk 27:27, and as an impurity in silver in Ezk 22:20 (cf. Is 19, RVm 'molded silver'). Its sources are uncertain, and it appears to have come to the East from the West. It is known that the Phoenicians obtained it from the Scilly Isles and Cornwall.

Flint is a form of silica, and occurs abundantly, in the form of nodules, in many of the limestone rocks of Palestine. It is exceedingly hard, and its property of sparkling when struck on steel or on another flint provided a very ancient and common means of obtaining a fire. (2 Mac 10:12, Ps 72:15) Flint has a sharp edge when broken or chipped, and was used for primitive weapons and instruments of many kinds—arrow-heads, knives, 619.
MINISH

e tc. For the latter see Ex 4:8 RV, Jos 5:6 RV. In other Scripture references to flint its hardness is chiefly in view (Dt 32:3, Job 28:5 RV, Is 5:19 Jf, Ezk 3:9).

Marble is limestone (carbonate of lime), hard and close-grained enough to be polished. The purest forms are white, but many coloured varieties are highly valued. Marble was among the materials prepared by David for the Temple (1 Ch 28:19). Josephus (Ant. vn. iii. 2, 6) says the stone was brought from Lebanon, but the stones exposed in the West Walling Place appear to be from the neighborhood of Jerusalem, probably from the quarries under Bezetha. Marble supplies a suitable stone for the merchandise of 'Babylon' in Rev 18:19.

JAMES PATRICK.

MINISH—The mod. form is 'diminish,' 'Minish,' occurs in AV in Ex 5:9, Ps 107:29, and RV introduces it at Is 19:6, Hos 8:6; but Amer. RV prefers 'diminish' everywhere.

MINISTER.—The word 'minister' comes from the Lat. minister—'servant,' and generally it may be said that wherever it is found in the Bible, whether in OT or in NT, its original meaning is its primary one, service being the idea it is specially meant to convey.

The word was used (corresponding to the same Heb. word in each case) of Joshua as the personal attendant of Moses (Ex 24:13, Jos 1), of the servants in the court of Solomon (1 K 10:9), of angels and the elemental forces of nature as 'ministers of the grace of God' (Heb 1:14), but, above all, of the priests and Levites as the servants of Jehovah in Tabernacle and Temple (Ex 28:4, 1 K 8, Ezr 9, and constantly). The secular uses of the Heb. word standing side by side with the sacred, show that it was not in itself a priestly term. Ministry was not necessarily a priestly thing, though priesthood was one form of ministry.

2. In NT several Gr. words are tr. 'minister,' three of which call for notice. (1) hypéreutos is found in Lk 1:54, Ac 13:26, 1 Co 4:1. In two of these cases RV has properly substituted 'attendant' for 'minister' to avoid misconception. The 'minister' (Lk 4:48) to whom Jesus handed the roll in the synagogue at Nazareth was the hazazon, corresponding to the English verger or Scotch beadle. John Mark (Ac 13:13) was the minister of Barnabas and Saul in the same sense as Joshua was of Moses,—he was their attendant and not assistant. In the other cases hypéreutos is used of the minister of Christ or of the word in a sense that is hardly distinguishable from that of diákonos as under.

(2) diakonos.—In classical Greek this word with its cognates is applied to one who renders special services to the commonwealth, without any suggestion of a priestly ministry. But in the LXX it was regularly applied, especially in its verbal form, to the ritual ministry of priests and Levites in the sanctuary, and so by NT times had come to connotate the idea of a priestly function. What we have to notice, however, is that no NT writer uses it so as to suggest the discharge of special priestly functions on the part of an official Christian ministry. Either the reference is to the old Jewish ritual (Lk 1:52, He 9:10-11), or the word is employed in a sense that is purely figurative (Ro 15:8, Ph 2:23); or, again, it is used in the service of the ministry of Christian charity (2 Co 9:10, Ph 2:7-9) or of prayer (Ac 13:2; v. 5), from which all ideas of priestly ritual are clearly absent.

(3) diákonos.—Even more significant than the uses to which diákonos and its cognates are put in the NT is the fact that they are used so seldom, and that diákonos and diákonía are found instead when the idea of minister and ministry are to be expressed. This corresponds with the other fact that the priesthood of a selected class has been superseded by a universal Christian priesthood, and that a ministry of lowliness and serviceableness (which diákonos specially implies) has taken the place of the old ministry of exclusive privilege and ritual performance. diákonía is the distinctive Christian word for 'ministry,' and diákonos for 'minister.' But these nouns and the related verb are used in the NT with a wide range of application. While every true Christian is a minister of Christ and of the brethren, there is a ministry of particular service out of which there gradually emerges the idea of a special Christian ministry. We may find the roots of the idea in our Lord's words to his disciples, 'Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister... even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20:28). The minister at first was one who was distinguished from others by his larger services. He did not hold an office, but discharged a function. There were differences of function, indeed, but these, as far as above all, the distinction between the ordinary ministers of the word (Ac 6:1, 2 Co 3, Eph 3:7) and those who ministered by gracious deed (Ac 6:6). But whatever might be the diversities of ministrations (1 Co 12:28), the word diákonos covered the entire stage when differences of function have begun to harden into distinctions of office, the name diákonos is specially appropriated to the deacon (wh. see) as distinguished from the prebyster or bishop (1 Th 5:12, 1 Ti 3:1). But the word still continues to be used in its wider sense, for Timothy, who was much more a priest than a deacon, is exhorted to be 'a good minister (diakonos) of Jesus Christ' (1 Ti 4:7). See following article.

MINISTRY.—The foregoing art. has sufficiently dealt with the general idea of ministry, but something remains to be said more particularly of the foreshadowings and beginnings of an official Christian ministry as these are found in the NT. The earliest historical datum is the distinction drawn by the Twelve between the diákonía of the word and the diákonía of tables (Ac 6:2), a distinction that constantly reappears in the writings of St. Paul (e.g. Ro 12:4, 1 Co 12:1, 12:28, Eph 4:7), though by and by the latter of these two ministries widens out so as to include many other matters besides the care of the poor. These two forms may be broadly distinguished as a general and prophetic ministry on the one hand, and a local and practical on the other.

1. General and prophetic.—Ac 6:1-6 shows that from the first the Twelve recognized that they were Divinely called to be ministers of the word, i.e. preachers of the gospel; and St. Paul repeatedly affirms the same thing regarding himself (1 Co 12:3, 2 Co 3:4, Col 1:12). But it was not the Apostles only who discharged this high spiritual function. Besides Apostles, a word which is used in a wider as well as a narrower sense (see Ac 14:14, Ro 16; cf. Didache, xi. 4 ff.), the Church had also prophets and evangelists and teachers, all of them, in somewhat different ways, able, fulfilling this same task of preaching the word (1 Co 12:28, 20; Eph 4:11; for prophets, see also Ac 11:17, 15:21; for evangelists, Ac 21:2, 2 Ti 4; for teachers, Ac 13, 1 Ti 3, 2 Ti 19), and moving about from place to place in order to do so. That the prophetic activity in the NT with a wide range of application, was a ministry of function and not of stated office, is shown by the fact that the same person might be at once apostle, prophet, and teacher (cf. Ac 13:14, 15, 20, 2 Ti 1), and was described as forming ministry.

2. Local and practical.—Of this the Seven of Jerusalem furnish the earliest examples. Their special duties, when we first meet them, are restricted to the care of the poor, and in particular to the charge of the 'daily ministration.' But, as the local Churches grew in size and Church life became more complex, other needs arose. There was the need of government and discipline, of pastoral counsel and comfort, of stated instruction by regular teachers as well as occasional visits from wandering apostles and prophets. In the 'helps' and 'governments' of 1 Co 12 we have a reference to some of these needs. And by and by we find that much of the life of the Church, the life of the local ministry, has blossomed out into two separate forms. (a) First there is the presbyter or elder, otherwise known as the bishop or overseer (for the substantial identity between the presbyter and the bishop, see art. Bishop), whose duties are to feed the flock and help the weak (Ac 20:28, 20, 1 P 5), to visit and pray for the sick (Ja 5:14), to rule and teach (1 T 3:2). (b) Next there are the deacon, and his companion the deaconess (Ph 1, 1 T 3:12), whose duties are not clearly defined, but the description of whose qualifications suggests that their work lay largely in visitation from house to house and ministration to the poor (1 T 5:12). The local ministry, then, is made to identify itself more exactly, but as the had originally belonged to the general ministry of Apostles and prophets. The latter, however, was still recognized to be the higher of the two. St. Paul sends presbyter-bishops upon the Church at Ephesus to meet him at Miletus, and addresses them in a tone of high spiritual authority (Ac 20:17-38). And even in the Didache, which belongs probably 'about the end of the 1st century,' we find that when a wandering prophet visits a Church, and is recognized as a true prophet, precedence is given him over the resident bishops and deacons (Did. x. 7, xiii. 3). See, further, Apostle, Bishop, Deacon; Evangelist, Laying on of Hands, Prophecy in NT.

MINN—A people named in Jer 511 along with the Armenians ('Arrat') and Scythians ('Ashkenaz') as coming assailants of Babylon. They are the Manni of the Assyrian inscriptions, who dwelt between the lakes Van and Urmi.

MINNETH marks the direction in which Jophthah pursued the defeated Ammonites from Aroer (Jer 11:13), i.e. 'Arer which is in front of Rabhab' (Jos 13:15). The site has not been recovered. That indicated in the Onomasticon, 4 miles from Heshbon on the way to Philadelphia, seems too far to the south. The place appears to have been famous for the high quality of its wheat (Ezk 27:17, cf 2 Ch 27:9). It must be added that in both passages there are strong reasons for suspecting the correctness of the identification of Minnith with this site, if the identification is correct.

MINE (Gr. mégyenom, Mt 23:3, Lk 11:5).—One of the trifles which were tithed; primarily, perhaps, peppermint (Mentha piperita), but including also allied plants, such as the horse mint (M. arvensis), which grows wild all over Palestine.

MIRACLES.—1. The narratives.—(a) In the Gospels Jesus is recorded to have cast out devils (Mt 8:15-17, Mk 1:24, Lk 4:33, Acts 19:13), healed paralytics (Mt 9:2, Lk 5:19, Jn 5), raised the widow's son (Lk 7:12), relieved the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13:13), cleansed the leper (Lk 17:14), freed the demoniac (Lk 8:27), healed a woman troubled with an issue of blood (Mt 9:20, Mk 5:34, Lk 8:43, Acts 5:16), cured a touch to the deaf (Mt 9:1-8), given sight to the blind (Mt 9:25, Mk 10:46, Lk 18:38), cleansed leprosy (Mt 8:2, Lk 17:14), and even raised from the dead (Mt 9:24, Lk 7:14, Jn 11:11). Besides these miracles of healing there are ascribed to Him other extraordinary acts, such as the Stilling of the Storm (Mt 8:23), the Feeding of Five Thousand (Mt 14:15) and Four Thousand (15:9), the Walking on the Sea (14:1-20), the Change of Water into Wine (Jn 2:1-11), the Blasting of the Fig Tree (Mt 21:19), and the Cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21:13), and possibly be figurative sayings misunderstood. The Two Drifters of Fishes (Lk 5:4 and Jn 21) may be variant traditions of one occurrence, and, like the recovery of the Nobleman's Son of Capernaum (Jn 4:48), may be regarded as proof of display and not of supernatural power. These miracles are presented to us as the acts of a Person supernatural both in the moral character as sinless and perfect, and in the religious consciousness as alone knowing and revealing the Father. It was the universal conviction of the early Christian Church that after three days He rose from the dead (1 Co 15, and was universally present in supreme power (Mt 28:18-20).

Regarding the miracles of Jesus the following general considerations should be kept in view. (a) It is impossible to remove the records of miracles from the Gospels without tearing them in pieces, as these miracles are so wrought into the very texture of His ministry. (b) The character of the miracles is absolutely harmonious with the power of Jesus; with only two apparent exceptions. The healing of the fig tree (Mt 21:19), even if the record is taken literally, may be explained as a symbolic prophetic act, a solemn warning to His disciples of the doom of impious Israel. The finding of the coin in the fish's mouth (Mt 17:27) would be an exception to the rule of Jesus never to use His supernatural power on His own behalf, and the narrative itself allows us to explain it as a misunderstanding of figurative language. (c) The miracles are not for wrought for display, or to promote the fame of Jesus rejected such use as a temptation (Mt 4:1-7), and always refused to work a sign to meet the demands of unbelievers (Mt 16:4). He did not highest esteem the faith that was produced by His miracles (Jn 4:48); the cure of the paralytic, which He wrought to confirm His claim to forgive sins, was necessary to assure the sufferer of the reality of His forgiveness (Mt 9). The miracles are not evidential accessories, but essential constituents of Jesus' ministry of grace. (d) While faith in the petitioner for, or recipient of, the act of healing was a condition Jesus seemingly required in all cases, while He was wonted doing His works as a witness to the faith of His unbelievers (Mt 13:39), while the exercise of His power was accompanied by prayer to God (Jn 11:4), His healing acts were never tentative; there is in the records no trace of a failure. (e) In view of one of the explanations offered, attention must be called to the variety of the diseases cured; nervous disorders and their consequences did not limit the range of His activity. (f) In the Acts the record of miracles is continued. The promise of Jesus to His Apostles (Mt 15:18, cf. Mk 16:15-18) is represented as abundantly fulfilled. In addition to the charisms of tongues and prophesy (see), there were signs and wonders wrought by the Apostles and others (Ac 2:4, 10, 16, 37, 43, 44). Miracles of which further details are given are the restoration of the lame man at the gate Beautiful (3:7), and of the cripple at Lystra (14), the cure of the paralytic, Eneas (9:4), the raising of the spirit of diviner at Thule (17:18), the healing of the father of Publius in Malta (28:7), the restoration of life to Dorcas (9:39) Eutychus (20:9), the narrative does not distinctly affirm death). This supernatural power is exercised in magnificent and miraculous fashion as an issue of the divine act of the Father in the life of the Son, the soul of the dead He was called, and the atrocities of the apostles (3:16, 130) —the moral justification of which must be sought in the estimate formed of the danger threatening the Church and the gospel, but which do present an undoubted difficulty. One may hesitate about accepting the statement about the miracles wrought by Peter's shadow (59) or Paul's aprons (192). What are represented as miraculous deliverances from imprisonment are reported both of Peter (129) and of Paul (169). Paul's escape from the viper (28) does not necessarily involve a miracle. These miracles, which, taken by themselves as reported in Acts, there might be some hesitation in believing, become more credible when viewed as the continuation of the supernatural power of Christ in His Church for the confirmation of the faith of those to whom the gospel was entrusted, and also to those to whom its appeal was first addressed. In this matter the Epistles of Paul confirm the record of Acts (1 Co 126, 30, 2 Co 129). Paul claims this supernatural power for himself, and recognizes its presence in the Church.

(c) We cannot claim to have contemporary evidence of the miracles of the OT, as we have of those of the NT. The miracles are almost entirely connected either with God, and in the authoritative interpretation of God's works and ways by the prophets, and in it, miracle, in the strict sense of the word, has a small place. While the moral and religious worth of the OT, as the literature of its revelation comes close, a respectful treatment of the narratives of miracles, we are bound to apply two tests: the sufficiency of the evidence, and the congruity of the miracle in character with the historical revelation.

2. The evidence. In dealing with the evidence for the miracles the starting-point should be the Resurrection. It is admitted that the belief that Jesus had risen prevailed in the Christian Church from the very beginning of its history; that without this belief the Church would never have come into existence. Harnack seeks to distinguish the Easter message about the empty grave and the appearance of Jesus from the Easter faith that Jesus lives: but he is not successful in showing how the former could have come to be, apart from the latter. No attempt to explain the conversion of the two dozen without admitting the objective manifestation of Christ as risen can be regarded as satisfactory. It may not be possible absolutely to harmonize in every detail the records of the appearances, but before these narratives were written it was the common belief of the Christian Church, as Paul testifies, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the Scriptures (1 Co 15: 7-9). If the Resurrection of Christ is proved, this fact, combined with His absolutely unique moral character and religious consciousness, invests the Person of Jesus with a supernatural power which forbids our limiting the actions possible to Him by the normal human tests. His miracles are not wonders, for it is no wonder that He should so act, but signs, proofs of what He is, and works, congruous with His character as 'ever doing good,' and His purpose to reveal the grace of the Father. Harnack will not 'reject' as illusion that lame walked, blind saw, and deaf heard, but he will not believe that 'a stormy sea was stilled by a word.' The miracles of healing are not all explicable, as he says they were called moral therapeutics—the influence of a strong personality over those suffering from nerve disorders, as they embrace diseases of which the cure by any such means is quite incredible; and the evidence for the miraculous power over nature apart from man have been called, is quite as good as for the healing miracles. If the Synoptic Gospels can be dated between A.D. 60 and 90, as is generally admitted by scholars generally, the evidence for the miracles of Jesus is thoroughly satisfactory; the mythical theory of Strauss must assume a much longer interval. Harnack regards as 'a demonstrated fact' that the last Supper was the origin in travel and associate in evangelistic work of Paul, is the author of the Third Gospel and the Acts; nevertheless he does not consider Luke's history as true; but Ramsay makes the hypothesis carry with it substantial accuracy. In his various writings he has endeavoured to show how careful a historian Luke is, and if Luke's excellence in this respect is established, then we can place reliance on the pictures of the miracles in the early Church, as well as in the ministry of Jesus. Harnack lays great stress on the credulity of the age in which the Gospels were written; but this credulity was not universal. The Matthew criticism of the Synoptics are sceptical; and, to judge Luke from the preface to his Gospel, he appears as one who recognized the duty of careful inquiry, and of testing evidence. The miracles of the Gospels and the Acts are closely connected with the Person of Jesus, as the showing Incarnation and the risen Lord, and the credulity of the age does not come into consideration unless it can be shown that among either the Jews or the Gentiles there was a prejudice favourable to belief in the Incarnation and the Resurrection. The character of the miracles, so harmonious with the Person, forbids our ascribing them to the wonder-loving, and therefore wondering, tendencies of the age.

Some indications have already been given in regard to the evidence for the miracles of the OT. The frequent references to the deliverance from Egypt are not the subsequent literature of that series of events; and it cannot be said to be improbable that signs should have accompanied such a Divine intervention in human history. Some of the miracles ascribed to Elisha are not on a level, congruous with the function of prophecy; but it may be that we should very cautiously apply our sense of fitness as a test of truth to these ancient narratives. In the OT history, Prophecy (wh. see) was the supernatural feature of deepest significance and highest value.

3. Explanations. Admitting that the evidence is satisfactory, and the miracles are real, what explanations can be offered of them? (a) One suggestion that has already been considered; it is favoured by Harnack and Matthew Arnold: it is that one person may exercise over another so strong an influence as to cure nervous disorders. The inadequacy of this explanation has been shown; but even were it admissible, a reason would need to be given why Jesus used a means not known in His age, and thus anticipated modern developments of medical skill. It is certain that Jesus worked His miracles relying on the Divine powers in Himself; whether in any cases this obscure psychic force was an unknown condition of His miracles is a matter of secondary importance.

(b) A second suggestion, made by the late Duke of Argyll (Reign of Law, p. 10), is that God chooses and uses laws unknown to man, or laws which, even if He knew, He could not use. He thinks that this would meet the prejudice of scientific thought against effects without causes. This explanation recognizes that miracles are not explicable by the laws of nature as known to man, and that it is of God's free choice that for certain ends He uses means otherwise unknown. As these laws are quite hypothetical, and as this use of them only occasionally is not at all probable, this explanation does not appear to make miracles any more credible.

c) We may now attempt to define more closely what we mean by a miracle. It does seem, on the whole, desirable to restrict the term 'miracle' to an external event of which there is sensible evidence. Inward changes, such as in the prophetic inspiration, or the religious conversion of an individual, however manifest the Divine presence and action may be for the person having the experience, should not be described as miracles, unless with some qualification such as spiritual or mental. The negative form of the external event which justifies our describing it as a miracle is that it is inexplicable by the natural forces and laws as known to us. The will of man is a force in nature with which we are familiar, and therefore the movements of the body under the control of the will is not to be described as miraculous. We say more than we are justified in saying if we describe a miracle as an interference with the laws and forces of nature, or a breach in the order of nature; for just as physical forces and laws allow the exercise of human will in the movements of the body, so the power that produces the miracle may, must, be conceived as so closely conjoined to nature that no disturbance or disorder in nature. The miracle need not interfere with the continuity of nature at all.

The modern theory of Evolution is not less, but more, favourable to the belief in miracles. It is not a finished machine, but a growing organism, that the world appears. Life transcends, and yet combines and controls physical forces (Lodge's Life and Matter, p. 198). Mind is not explicable by the brain, and yet the will directs the movements of the body. There is a creative action of God in the stages of the evolution, which attaches itself to the conserving activity. Applying the argument from analogy, we may regard the Person of Christ and the miracles that cluster round His Person as such a creative action of God. If we adequately estimate the significance of the Exodus in the history of mankind, the providential events connected with it will assume greater credibility. But there is a final consideration. The purpose of God in Christ is not only perfective—the completion of the world's evolution; it is also redemptive—the correction of the evil sin had brought on the human race. It was fitting that the redemption of man from sin should be accompanied by outward remedial signs, the relief of his need and removal of his sufferings. God is without variation and shadow that is cast by turning in His purpose, but His action in the end must necessarily be conditioned by the results of man's use of the freedom which for His wise and holy ends He bestowed. He may in His action transcend His normal activity by a more direct manifestation of Himself than the natural processes of the world afford. The consistency of character of a human personality is not disproved by an exceptional act when a crisis arises; and so, to deal effectively with sin for man's salvation, and in the process of the world, this difficulty is not explicable by the natural processes of the world. The possibility of God's doing this is not at all out of the question. If, for instance, pronounces such denial unjustifiable. Two reasons against the possibility of miracles may be advanced from a scientific standpoint. In the interests of science it may be maintained that the uniformity of nature excludes miracle; but, as has just been shown, the theory of Evolution has so modified the conception of uniformity that this argument has lost its force. Life and mind, when first appearing in the processes of evolution, were breaches in the uniformity. The uniformity of nature is consistent with fresh stages of development, inexplicable by their antecedents; and only when science has resolved life and mind into matter will the argument regain any validity.

(d) For materialism, which recognizes only physical forces; and pantheism, which identifies God and nature; that the order of nature is fixed by the necessity of the laws of God, denies the direct Divine activity to the beginning, and excludes it from the course of the world, miracles are impossible. Agnosticism, which regards the ultimate reality as an inscrutable mystery, is under no logical compulsion to deny the possibility of miracles; but, for instance, pronounces such denial unjustifiable. Two reasons against the possibility of miracles may be advanced from a scientific standpoint. In the interests of science it may be maintained that the uniformity of nature excludes miracle; but, as has just been shown, the theory of Evolution has so modified the conception of uniformity that this argument has lost its force. Life and mind, when first appearing in the processes of evolution, were breaches in the uniformity. The uniformity of nature is consistent with fresh stages of development, inexplicable by their antecedents; and only when science has resolved life and mind into matter will the argument regain any validity.

(e) The more usual phrase is to exclaim the insufficiency of the evidence. Hume laid down this criterion: 'No testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavours to establish. Or briefly, it is contrary to experience that a miracle should be true, but not contrary to experience that testimony should be false.' But to this statement it may protest, it cannot be proved; for, while it may be contrary to ordinary experience that miracles happen, what the defenders of miracles maintain is that there have been exceptional experiences of miracles. If miracles were common, they would cease to be so described; the uncommonness does not prove their inactivity. Although the test is one that has no warrant, yet it may be argued that Christ's character and resurrection would stand it. It is less credible that the Apostolic faith in the risen Lord, and all it accomplished, should have its origin in illusion, than that He rose from the dead. The improbability of miracle is usually the tacit assumption when the sufficiency of the evidence is denied.

5. Value.—A few words may be concluding added regarding the value of the miracles. The old apologetic view of miracles as the credentials of the doctrines of Christianity is altogether discredited. It is the truth of the doctrines that makes the fact of the miracles
MIRIAM

The sister of Moses and Aaron, probably older than either. She was the one who watched Moses in the ark of bulrushes (Ex 2:2). She is described as 'the prophetess,' and led the women in the song of victory at the Red Sea (Ex 15:21). In the course of the wilderness wanderings she combined with Aaron against Moses, who was punished by leprosy, which was healed in answer to the prayer of Moses (Nu 12:14). She died in Kadesh towards the end of the wilderness journey (Nu 20:1). Her story is continued in Dt 34:10 in connexion with the ceremonial law of leprosy, and in Mic 6:8 she is spoken of alone with Moses and Aaron as a leader of the people.

The name Miriam becomes in Greek Mariam and Mariamana, and in Latin Maria and is probably of Egyptian derivation (see Amon, 'beloved of Amon').

2. A man (or woman) of the family of Caleb (1 Ch 4:7).

MIRMAH.—Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8:34).

MIRROR.—See Glass.

MISAEL.—1. 1 Es 9:4 = Michael, Neh 8:1. 2. Three = Michael, No. 3.

MISGB.—Menionced along with Nebo and Kirjathaim in the oracle against Moab (Jer 48:1). Perhaps it is not intended as a proper name. The same Heb. term occurs in Is 29:18 where both AV and RV take 'high fort' (cf. 2 S 22:29, Ps 9:9: Ps 69:18; 43:5; Ps 118:5; Is 29:4). It seems to be a town.

MISHAEL.1. A Kohathite (Ex 6:19, Lv 10:1). 2. One of Ezra's supporters (Neh 8:1); called in 1 Es 9:4 Misael. 3. See MISHACH.

MISHAL.—A town of Asher (Jos 19:28), given to the Gershonite Levites (21:1) = 1 Ch 6:14 Mishal. The site is unknown.

MISHMAH.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 12:19).

MISHNA.—See TALMUD.

MISHRAITES.—A family of Kirjath-jeearim (1 Ch 2:24).

MISPAR.—One of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:27—Neh 7:56 Mispereth). 1 Es 6:7 Misperoth, MISPERETH.—See preceding article.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM.—From the Waters of Merom the defeated Canaanites fled to Great Zidon, and unto Mirephoth-maim (Jos 11:3). It marks the S. boundary of the Zidonians, who had not been driven out by Joshua (12:19). The Ladder of Tyre formed a natural post to the territory of the Zidonians. On the slope of Ras-en-Naqib, the most southerly of the promontories forming the 'ladder,' is found a site called Msheshafok, which Thomson (ed.) with great probability identifies with Mirephoth-maim. W. EWING.

MITHRAH.—One of the 12 'stations' (Nu 33:2). "A Gentile name applied to one of David's officers in 1 Ch 11:5. The text is doubtful.

MITHREDATH (Pers. = given by Mithra, or the sun).—1. The Persian treasurer, whom Cyrus commanded to deliver to Sheshbazzar the sacred vessels (Ezr 1:1 = Es 2:1 Mithredath). 2. A Persian officer stationed in Samaria. Together with his colleagues he wrote to Artaxerxes (Longinunus) to hinder the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezr 4:7, 1 Es 2:12 Mithredath).

MIRTE.—With the exception of Zec 3:3 which represents the Heb. tsaphth or turban (for which see DRESS, § 5), and Eze 21:21 EV (see before), the use of EV is exclusively of the characteristic headdress of the Jewish high priest. The 'mitre' (Heb. mitsepheth, from the root, signifying 'wind round,' as tsapheth) was an elaborate headdress of tumbled felt, which the high priest wore on his head as a crown. The length of the motte, according to the Talmud. Its precise form, however, is uncertain; the descriptions given by Josephus of the high-priestly mitre of his day, besides being obscure in themselves, ago not agree with one another nor with the OT text.

On the common assumption that the Priests' Code originated in Babylonia, it is probable that the mitre was intended to have the conical form characteristic of the tiara of the Babylonian kings. For ornament it had a 'plate of gold,' on which were engraved two Hebrew words signifying 'holiness to the Lord' (Ex 28:30). It consists of a golden fillet, and with the ends hanging down, as in the case of the Jewelled diadem or fillet worn by the Assyrian kings. Hence the fillet could be described as 'the holy crown' (Lv 8:3), and ben-Sira as 'a diadem (EV 'crown') of gold upon the mitre' (Ezr 2:21). The royal crown of Judah, according to Ezekiel (21:11), consisted of the same two parts (see Heb. text in each case): 'remove the mitre (RV), and take off the diadem (EV 'crown'). This passage is our warrant for saying that the headdress prescribed for the high priest in the Priest's Code, consisting of mitre and diadem, is intended to signify that the high priest shall unite in his person the highest office in both Church and State.

The headdress of the high priest is always distinguished from that of his subordinates, for which see bonnet.

MITYLENE was the chief town of Lesbos on its E. coast, subsequently giving its name to the whole island. It was one of the early Ionian colonies, and one of the earliest homes of Greek lyric poetry—the birthplace of Sappho and Alceus. It attained great naval power, and founded colonies such as Sigeum and Assos. It took a prominent part in the Ionian revolt, but helped Xerxes against Greece. It joined the Athenian alliance, but revolted in a.c. 428, and was nearly annihilated. After opposing Rome in the Mithradatic War, it was made a free city. It has belonged to the Turks since a.d. 1462. Its position in Ac 20:16 is merely incident; St. Paul's ship spent a night there.

MIXED MULTITUDE

MIXED MULTITUDE.—A description given (1) to certain persons who joined Israel in the Exodus from Egypt (Ex 12:38), and who fell a lust by Kibroth-hattaavah (Nu 11:1); (2) to those who were separated from the Israelites after the return from the Captivity (Ne 13).

In Ex 12:38 those referred to are probably strangers of non-Israelitic or half-Israelitic origin. The Hebrew consonants (differently pointed) mean either 'mixed' or 'half.' These descriptions have sometimes been interpreted to mean 'Arabians.' In Jer 25:28, Ezk 30, the same Hebrew word is translated the expression 'mingled people,' where it has been supposed by some to refer to foreign mercenaries. In Ezk 30 at least 'Arabians' gives a better meaning. The Hebrew word in Nu 11 is a different one, and is probably a contemptuous term signifying the mob, the rabble.

The context in Neh 13 leaves no doubt as to the meaning. The reference is to the strangers with whom the Israelites had intermarried and the children of such alliances.

W. F. BOYD.

MIZAR.—Ps 42:6 runs: 'I remember thee from the land of Jordan and the Hermons, from the hill Mizar.' In the latter the Hebrew word isMasarah'a, a proper name, or attributive—'the little' (?). If the former, Mizar must be a peak of the Hermons, and is otherwise unknown. If the latter, the text must in some way be corrected. The simplest and most satisfactory expedient is to remove the initial m from masar in the phrase am zamar, and render 'O, thou little hill.' The reference will then be to Zion. As the whole Psalm reads like the cry of an exile from Zion, expressive of his home-sickness, this rendering makes admirable sense. 'O, my God, my soul is cast down within me; for I remember thee from the land of Jordan and of the Hermons, O, thou little hill (of Zion). The initial m in məšara would well have crept in from the final m of the preceding word, heremon. W. F. COX.

MIZPAH, MISPZEH.—These words (from Masrah, to 'look out, esp. as a watchman' mean 'outlook-point'); and they are the names of several places and towns in Palestine, all presumably situated on elevated spots, and all probably ancient sacred places. The sites of several are, however, uncertain. As both names are significant, they nearly always in the Heb. have the article.

1. Mizpah in Gn 31:21, where Jacob and Laban made their compact together, and where the name is explained, by a popular etymology, from the words used by Laban, '3° wdbch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another' (and interpose, it is implied, if either attempts to take advantage of the other). The name has not been preserved, and hence the site cannot be fixed, except conjecturally. Improbable sites have been suggested; to judge from the general line of Jacob's route from Haran, the 'Mizpah' here referred to will have been some eminence on the N.E. of the Jebel Ajlun, some 40 miles S.E. of the Lake of Gennesaret (cf. Driver, Genesis, pp. 288, 301 f.).

2. The 'land of Mizpah,' at the foot of Hermon, in Jos 11, probably the same as the 'left (or plain between mountains) of Mizpah' in v.8. This 'Mizpah,' or 'Mispzeh,' has been identified with the Druse village 'Muzzah,' on the 200 ft. high, at the S. end of the broad and fertile plain called the Merj 'Ayûn (the 'meadow of Ayûn'), overlooking the basin of the Huleh sea, a little N. of Aidi, and 8 m. N.W. of Banias (Rob. iii. 272 f.). This, however, is thought by some to be not enough to the E. (notice 'under Hermon,' v.5, and 'eastward' v.9); and Buhl (GAP 340) conjectures that it may have been the height of the town now the ruins of the Saracenic castle Kâl'at es-Subbeh, 2 m. above Bâniass, on the E. In the former case the 'land of M.' would be the Merj 'Ayûn itself, between the rivers Litani and Hasbân; in the latter it would be the plain stretching down from Bâniass towards Lake Huleh.

3. Mizpah in Jos 15, in the Shephelah, or 'lowland' of Judah, mentioned in the same group of cities as Lachish (Tell el-Hayy, 34 miles S.W. of Jerusalem). According to Eusebius for this Jos 19:7; the identification of the town in the district of Eleutheropolis (Bait-Jibrîn, 23 m. S.W. of Jer.,) on the N., and another on the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem. The former of these was called Tell Zefren, was a city of 7 m., and only 75 ft. 7 m. N.W. of Beit-Jibrîn, with a commanding view, which, however, is now identified by many with Gath; the latter is too indefinite to permit of any identification being made with confidence.

4. The Mizpah of Jg 10:7, 11:14, Jephthah's home,—apparently, to judge from the narrative, not very far from the Ammonite territory, and (11:19) the Aror in front of Rabbath-ammon (Jos 13:18). The site can only be fixed conjecturally. It is probably a site near the modern Misrâm, 16 m. N.W. of Rabbath-ammon, the highest point of the mountains S. of the Jabsh (3597 ft.), commanding a view of almost the whole Jordan Valley, as well as much of the country opposite, on the W. of Jordan (Conder, Heth and Moab, 186 f.). Whether the 'Mizpah of Gilgal' of Jg 11 is the same site is uncertain; from the difference of name, it would rather seem that it is not. The Mizpah of Jg 5 is probably the same as Jephthah's Mizpah. The Ramath-mizpâh ('height of the outlook-point') of Jos 13, on the N. border of Gad, has also been supposed to be probably the same as Jephthah's Mizpah; a point further to the N. seems to be required.

5. The Mizpah, on the W. of Jordan, mentioned in Jg 20:1 211, £ 1, § 1 7^2. 101 as a meeting-place of the tribes on important occasions; and Jg 20:16 as fortified by Asa; in R 232. 2. Jer 40 6, 3, and several times besides in Jer 40, 41, as the residence of Gedaliah, the governor appointed by Nebuchadnezzar after the capture of Jerusalem in 586; and in Neh 3 1 11 15. The same place appears to be intended by the 'Mizpah' of 1 Mac 3 (Gr. Massapha, as often in LXX for 'Mispzah,' e.g. Jg 20:1), 'over against Jerusalem,' a former 'place of prayer' (i.e. sanctuary) for Israel, at which the faithful Israelites assembled after Antiochus Epiphanes had desecrated the Temple and stopped all worship in it. This Mizpah was identified with much probability by Robinson (i. 460) with Nebi Samwil, a height 44 m. N.W. of Jerusalem, 2 m. above the sea, and some 500 ft. above the surrounding plain (notice 'gone or came up' in Jg 20 21 4 3, with a commanding view of the country round (36. 457 f.). Nebi Samwil is 3 m. W.W. of Gibeah (cf. Jg 20 2 3'), 2 m. S. of Gibeon (cf. Neh 3'), and a little N. of the present road from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is the actual point from which travellers ascending by the ancient route through the plain of Bethoron caught their first glimpse of the interior of the hills of Palestine. 'It is a very fair and delicious place, and it is called Mount Joy, because it gives joy to pilgrims' hearts; for from that place men first see Jerusalem' (Maundeville, cited in SP, p. 214). Its present name, Nebi Samwil (the 'Prophet Samuel'), is due to the Moslem tradition that it was Samuel's burial-place (cf. i S 7 13, where Mizpah is mentioned as one of Samuel's residences); and the mosque Here—once a Crusaders' church—contains a cenotaph revered by the Moslems as his tomb.

6. Mizpah of Moab (1 S 22.—'Mizpah' is perhaps also to be read in v.4 for 'the hold'), the residence of the king of Moab when David consigned his parents to his care. It must have been situated on some eminence in Moab; but we have no further clue to its site.

MIZRAIM.—The name of Egypt (wh. see), and especially of Lower Egypt. Mizraim was son of Ham and father of Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim MOAB, MOABITES.

Moab occupied the lofty table-land to the east of the Dead Sea. It was bounded on the S. by the land of Reuben and Edom, on the W. by the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley. Its N. boundary fluctuated at different periods between the Arnon and an indistinct line some distance north of Heshbon. The table-land is elevated some 3000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and 4000 feet above the Dead Sea. It is traversed by three deep valleys, the middle one of which, the Arnon, is the deepest, and is often mentioned in the Bible. The northern portion consists of broad stretches of rolling country, the reddish soil of which is fertile, while in the southern portion more hills are found, and the deep wrinkles interfere more with agriculture. In the winter months the rainfall is sufficient to irrigate the sea of grass that is desirable in comparison with the deserts on its border.

In the earliest times known to us this land was called Lotan (Egypt, Ruth), or Lot. The narrative of Gn. 19, which makes Lot (wh. see the father of Moab, apparently means that the Moabites settled in this land of Lot. The meaning of Moab is undetermined. The etymology of Gn 19th (LXX) is not philological, and modern guesses are unfruitful.

The narrative of Gn 19 shows that the Israelites recognized the Moabites as their kinmena. That they really were such, their language, religion, and customs, so far as known to us, also testify. Probably, then, the Moabites came with the wave of Arabian migration which brought the Israelites, secured a foothold in the land of Lotan while the Israelites were still nomads, and adopted the Canaanitic speech of the people among whom they settled. Saxe believes they were settled in this territory by c. B.C. 1300, for Rameses II., he thinks, alludes to the country Moab (cf. Patriarchal Palestine, p. 22), but this lacks confirmation.

At the time of the approach of the Hebrews to Palestine the Moabites were so strongly intrenched in their land that the invaders avoided all conflict with them (Dt 29, Jg 11, 2 Ch 20), although they conquered King Sihon, who had subdued all of Moab north of the Arnon (Nu 21, 22, 24, 29, Jg 11). According to the Priestly narratives, the Israelites secured at this time the territory north of the Arnon; but the narratives differ as to whether its cities were all assigned to Reuben (so Jos 13), or whether some of them (City of Sihon, Dibon, Arath, and Aroer) were assigned to Gad (Nu 32). Perhaps the latter view represents the fact. The Gadites obtained some of the southern cities, and the Reubenites some of the northern. Probably the conquest was not very complete.

Early in the period of the Judges, the Moabites not only had regained control of all this territory, but had extended their power into western Palestine so as to oppose the Benjaminite (Jg 3). This led to the assassination of Edom, king of Moab, by Elurid. In course of time the Moabites absorbed the tribe of Reuben, though the latter maintained their identity for a considerable period.

According to the Book of Ruth, friendly intercourse existed between Moab and Israel at this period. Saul fought with the Moabites (1 S 14), but with what result we do not know. Towards the end of his reign they aided David against him (1 S 22). David subjugated Moab, and reconquered the country tributary to Israel (2 S 8, 11). This subjugation apparently continued during the reign of Solomon, for he had Moabish women in his harem, and built a shrine for Chemosh, the god of Moab, in the Louvre. After the reign of Solomon, Moab apparently gained its independence. Our next information comes from the so-called 'Moabite Stone,' an inscription of Mesha, king of Moab, found at the ancient Dibon, and now preserved in the Louvre. Mesha states that Omri, king of Israel, conquered Moab, and that Moab continued subject to Israel till the middle of the reign of Ahab, when Chemosh enabled him (Mesha) to win victories over Israel, which secured Moabish independence, and which he describes in detail. A somewhat confused allusion to this is found in 2 K 3. Jehoram, Ahab's successor, undertook, with the aid of Jehoshaphat, and the king of Edom, to reduce Moab once more, and almost succeeded in the country was overrun, the capital besieged and reduced to great extremity, when the king of Moab sacrificed to Chemosh his firstborn son on the city wall in sight of both armies. This courage was rewarded by the surrender of the city and country (cf. Mesha's inscription). This is found in the Moabites, and the superstitious dread which it excited in the besieging army, secured a victory for the former. It appears from 2 K 10 that after this, Moabites frequently invaded Israel.

Amos (2-3) in the next century reproved Moab for barbarities to Edom, and Tliglath-pileser III. of Assyria enumerates the king of Moab among his tribute-payers (K B II. 20). Solomon, 2V. 11, b.c. 70, received tribute from Chemosh-nabat, king of Moab (K B II. 91), and the country remained vassal to Assyria during the following reigns of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal (K B II. 148, 235).

Moabites aided Nebuchadnezzar against Jehoiakim at the very end of the same century (2 K 24). In 15, 16, Zeph 2-5, Jer 4, and Ezk 25-26 contain prophecies against Moab, but do not add to our knowledge of the history. Jer 49 indicates that a great calamity was impending over them. In Neh 4, 5, 6, 19, 10, 11, and 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, contain prophecies against Moab. In the same period, the divine grace was shown to the Moabites, as it was to the Philistines, in the Book of Ruth, as we have seen (Ruth 1-4). We know that the Nabataeans were in possession of this country some time later, and it is probable that by the time of Nehemiah they had ever before brought the Moabite power to an end. Some infer from Jeremiah's prophecy that Moab rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar as Israel and Ammon did, and that he carried enough of them captive to weaken them and render them an easy prey to the Nabataeans. Possibly this is true, but we know nothing of it.

The language of the Moabites was, as the Moabite Stone shows, identical with that of Israel. That peculiar construction known as Waw Consecutive is found, outside of Biblical Hebrew, only in the Moabite Stone and one or two Phoenician inscriptions.

The religion of the Moabites was very similar to that of early Israel. The references to Chemosh in Mesha's inscription are very similar to references to Jehovah in Israelite writings of the same period. The name Ashtar-Chemosh indicates that the worship of the feminine divinity known to the Babylonians as Ishtar, and to the Phoenicians as Astart, was also mingled with the worship of Chemosh. Traces of the repulsive nature of this worship appear in the Onomasticon of Jos. 22, Ps 106). No great ethical prophets, such as elevated the religion of Israel, rescued the religion of Moab from the level of its barbaric Semitic origin.

MOADIAH.—See Maadiah.

MOCHMUR.—A wady apparently S.E. of Dothan (1K 13:18).

MODIN.—A village in the Shebelah, never mentioned in the OT, but of great importance as the home of the Maccabees. Here Mattathias, by slaying a Jew who conformed to the paganizing commands of Antiochus, struck the first blow for Jewish religious freedom (1 Mac 2:1–38). He was buried at Modin (2K 4:4), as were his illustrious sons Judas (9:4) and Jonathan (13:4).

Simon here built an elaborate monument with seven pyramids, commemorative of his father, mother, and four brethren, with great pillars around, and bas-reliefs of military and naval triumphs. This splendid monument could be seen at sea. It stood for about 500 years, after which it seems to have disappeared; and with it was lost all recollection of the site of Modin. This has been recovered in recent years in a small village of el-Mefyeh, near Lydda. There are numerous rock-tombs about, some of them traditionally known as Qobur el-Fellow, or 'the Jews' tombs,' but nothing is to be seen in any way suggestive of the Maccabean mausoleum.

MOETh (1 Es 8:46) = Noadiah of Ezra 8:27.

MOELAD.—A city reckoned to Judah in Jos 18:9, and now in Neh 11:22. It is in a connexion related to Tell el-Meh, 'hill of salt,' with which Robinson and others have identified it. Probably it lay near Beerseba, but the site has not been recovered.

E. W. EWING.

MOLE.—1. tosepheth. Ly 11:9 (AV 'mole,' RV 'chameleum,' but same word is in Ly 11:4 and Dt 14:2 tr. AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl'). See CHAMELEON.

2. chappar-perdah ('burrowing animals'), is 2:8, may apply to rats, mice, jerboas, etc., as well as 'moles.' The mole does not occur in Palestine but the rodent Spalax typhlus, the mole rat, is very common. It lives entirely underground, has most rudimentary eyes, and makes very long burrows. It is gregarious, and large areas are sometimes covered thick with its hillocks.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MOLECH, MOLOCH.—A deity worshipped by the Israelites, especially by the people of Judah, towards the close of the monarchy. Molech ('king') was evidently the title of this god; and the present form is due to the combination of the personal connotation with the vowels of bosheth ('shame'). The passages in which reference to this divinity is probably found are Ly 18:16–20:2, 1 K 11:7, 2 K 18:2. In 50:9, 59, Jer 32:28. The chief feature of the worship seems to have been the sacrifice of children. Its special centre was just outside Jerusalem, at a place in the Valley of Hinom called the Topheh (which see). The cult was introduced, according to 1 K 11:7, by Solomon. If the reference here is an error (see below). Ahaz may have been the innovator (2 K 16:3). At any rate, it flourished in the 7th cent. B.C., as we gather from prophetic denunciation and the legislation of Deuteronomy. Manasseh sacrificed his son (2 K 21:2). Josiah suppressed the worship and defiled Topheh. But under Jehoakim this worship revived, and continued till the Captivity.

As to the identity of Molech, there is an interesting question. Very ancient tradition identifies him with Melcchim (oth. see), the name of Ammon. But the only basis for this view which the Heb. text of the OT furnishes is 1 K 11:7, and the Gr. VSS offer evidence that the original reading to this passage may have been 'Melchom,' as in v. 2 v. 2. On the other hand, we are told that, while Molech was worshipped at Topheh, the sanctuary of Melcchim was on the Mount of Olives (2 K 23:10). Moreover, this cult seems to have been regarded as Canaanitic in origin (Dt 12:31–2 18:14). Again, we learn from the OT that the most atrocious child-sacrifices in the Arameans were common in the public religious life of the Phoenicians, both in their Palestinian homeland and in Carthage; and in the period preceding the conquest to the period of which the victims were cast (see TOPHEH). Among other Semitic peoples also there are occasional instances of the offering of children, but not as a regular practice, to which we are considering.

Molech is a title of many Semitic deities, and in the OT is frequently applied to Jehovah. We find that the object of this worship is also called Baal ('master') (Jer 19:6 32). Molech is likewise a title of numerous Semitic divinities, and is sometimes used of Jehovah (see BAAL). Where the name Baal is used in the OT with specific reference to a particular god, it is first, Bethel, of Tyre (1 K 18:9; 2 K 13:12, 20), 1 K 15:7 11:19). The prophets undoubtedly regarded the cult as foreign, and as an apostasy to heathenism. But does this necessarily prove that Molech was a false god? Jeremiah's protest that Jehovah had not required these sacrifices (7:3 10:32) would seem to imply that the people did not regard this as the worship of another god. Indeed, Ezekiel goes further, and claims that Jehovah Himself gave these 'statutes that are not good,' and sacrifices of the firstborn, because they had rejected purer worship (Ezk 20:21 28). On the whole, the evidence seems to indicate that this cultus was due to Phoenician influence, and was introduced because of popular misunderstanding of the laws relating to the firstborn to Jehovah. The origin of such a cult, together with a possible more or less complete identification with Melkarch, would explain the constant use of the titles Molech and 'Baal' rather than the name Jehovah.'

MONEY.—1. Antiquity of a metallic currency: weights and values.—That the precious metals, gold and silver, were extended to a less exent copper, as the ordinary metal coinage in Palestine from a time long prior to the appearance there of the Hebrews, is now abundantly attested by evidence from Egypt and Babylonia, and even from the soil of Palestine itself. The prevalence of silver as the metal currency for everyday transactions is further shown by the constant use in Hebrew literature of the word for 'silver' (keseph) in the sense of 'money.'

As there can be no question of the existence of coined money in Palestine until the Persian period, the first step in the study of weights adopted for the weighing of the precious metals. Money might indeed be 'told' or 'counted,' but the accuracy of the 'tale' had to be tested by means of the balance; or, rather, as we see from such passages as 2 K 12:8 v. (RV), money was told by being weighed. Now, all the weight-systems of Western Asia, and even of Europe, have their origin in Babylonia (for details see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). There, as required by the sexagesimal system of reckoning, the ancient unit of weight, the mana (Heb. manath as in Ezk 45:13—elsewhere 'girdle' or 'apron' or doma, which weighed 7680 grains on the light, and 15,160 on the heavy standard, was divided into 60 shekels, while 60 minas went to the higher denomination, the talent. It will thus be seen that the light Babylonian shekel weighed, neglecting fractions, 129 grains Troy, and the heavy shekel 232. The former, it will be useful to remember, was but three grains heavier than a British gold sovereign.

As this weight-system spread westwards with the march of Babylonian civilization and commerce, it came into conflict with the decimal system of calculation, and a compromise was effected, which resulted in the mina being reduced to 60 shekels, while the talent remained at 60 minas, although reduced in weight to 3000 shekels. That the Hebrew talent by which the precious metals were weighed contained 3000, not 3600, shekels may be seen by the comparison of the data of Ex 25:26. Further, the heavy Babylonian shekel of 222 grains remained in use among the Hebrews for the weighing of gold until N.T. times. For this we have the express testimony of Josephus, who tells us (Ant. xiv. v. 11) that the Hebrew shekel of 222 grains was 2½ Roman pounds. On the basis of 5053 grains to the libra or pound, this gives a shekel of 2523 grains, the

For the weighing of silver, on the other hand, this shekel was discarded for practical reasons. Throughout the East in ancient times the ratio of gold to silver was 131:1, which means that a shekel of gold could buy 131 times the same weight of silver.

The latest explanation of this invariable ratio, it may be added in passing, is that advocated by Winckler and his followers. On this, the so-called 'astral mythology' theory of the origin of Babylonian culture, gold, the yellow metal, was specially associated with the sun, while the paler silver was identified with the moon. Accordingly it was 252:15 to fix the ratio between them as that which existed between the year and the month, viz. 360: 27 or 40:3.

In ordinary commerce, however, this ratio between the two chief media of exchange was extremely inconvenient, and to obviate this inconvenience, the weight of the shekel for weighing silver was altered so that a gold shekel might be exchanged for a whole number of silver shekels. This alteration was effected in two ways. On the one hand, along the Babylonian trade-routes into Asia Minor the light Babylonian shekel of 126 grains was raised to 168 grains, so that 10 such shekels of gold now represented a single gold shekel, since 126×131=168×10. On the other hand, the great commercial cities of Phoenicia introduced a silver shekel of 224 grains, 15 of which were equivalent to one heavy Babylonian gold shekel of 252 grains, since 224×131=252×15. This 224-grain shekel is accordingly known as the Phoenician standard. It was on this standard that the sacred dues of the Hebrews were calculated (see §3); on it also the famous silver shekels and half-shekels were struck at a later period (§5).

With regard, now, to the intrinsic value of the above gold and silver shekels, all calculations must start from the mint price of gold, which in Great Britain is £2, 13s. 11d. per ounce of 320 grains. This gives 252:15 as the value of the Hebrew gold shekel of 252 grs., and since the latter was the equivalent of 15 heavy Phoenician shekels, 2s. 9d. represents the value as bullion of the Hebrew silver shekel. Of course the purchasing power of both in Bible times, which is the real test of the value of money, was many times greater than their equivalents in sterling money at the present day.

Since the effective weight of the extant shekels is somewhat under the theoretical weight above given, the intrinsic value of any number of shekels of silver may be found with sufficient accuracy by equating the shekel roughly with our half-crown (£2 6d.).

Although we have literary and numismatic evidence for the gold and silver shekels of these tables only, it may now be regarded as certain that other standards were in use in Palestine in historic times for weighing the precious metals. The best attested is that which the present writer, in his article 'Weights and Measures' in Hastings' DB lv. 904 f., termed the 'Syrian 320-grain unit,' a shekel which is 4th of a heavy Babylonian mina of 16,000 grains. That the light shekel of this standard, represented by the now familiar weights of 160 grains or thereby, inscribed nesep, was used for weighing silver or gold or both is evident from the small denominations which have been recovered, such as the quarter nesep of 40 grs., known as the Chaplin weight (see op. cit. and PEFSa, 1903, p. 197, 1904, p. 209 ff., and later years).

2. Money in the pre-critic period.—Throughout the whole of this period, as has already been emphasized, in every transaction involving the payment of sums of considerable value, the money was reckoned by weight. Accordingly, when Abraham bought the field and gave Machpelah to be weighed to Ephron the silver . . . four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant' (Gen 23: 14). In view of what has just been said regarding the variety of standards in use in Palestine in early times, it would be unwise, in the present state of our knowledge, to pronounce as to the value of the price paid in this transaction. On the Phoenician standard it would be approximately £55 sterling; on the nesep standard, which stands to the Phoenician in the ratio of 5:7, it would be under £40. Similarly, the price which David paid for the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, 50 shekels of silver (2 S 24: 16), would vary from £2 to £7 according to the standard above quoted. On the other hand, where gold is concerned, as in the case of the 30 talents which Sennacherib 'appointed unto Hezekiah' (2 K 18: 12), we may with some confidence assume that the gold standard common to Palestine and Assyria, to which the Hezekiah's tribute will represent the acceptable sum of £184,500.

A noteworthy feature of the entries of prices in the papyrus writings of the Hebrews is the disappearance of the mina, the sums being stated in terms of shekels and talents exclusively. Thus Abraham, as we have seen, paid 400 shekels, not 8 minas, to the children of Heth; the weight, and therefore the value of Achan's 'wedge of gold' (see next paragraph) is given as 50 shekels, not as 1 mina, and so throughout.

In this period the precious metals circulated in three forms. The shekel, its subdivisions (cf. the quarter-shekel of 1 S 9th) and smaller multiples, had the form of ingots of metal, without any stamp or other mark, so far as our evidence goes, as a guarantee of their purity and weight. Larger values were made up in the shape of bars, such as Schleicher discovered at Tell Nisibe and Macallister found at Gezer (illus. Bible Sidelights, etc., fig. 36). The 'wedge' (lit. 'tongue') of gold which Achan appropriated from the loot of Jericho (Jos 7th) would probably such a thin bar of gold. Pursuing the same line, a half-shekel of gold, and her bracelet of ten shekels (Gn 242), represent a third form which the metal currency of the early period might assume. The vase and other vessels of gold and silver which are so frequently mentioned in ancient tribute lists also, in all probability, represented definite weights and values.

To such an extent was the shekel the exclusive unit in all ordinary transactions, that the Hebrew writers frequently omit it in their statements of prices. This applies to gold as well as to silver, e.g. 2 K 5: 5 'six thousand' of gold, where AV and RV supply 'pieces,' but RV has the correct 'shekels' (cf. silvering [wh. see in Is 7]).

3. Money in the Persian period: introduction of coins.—In this period the money of the small Jewish community was still, as before the Exile, chiefly ingots and bars of the precious metals, without official mark of any kind. The addition of such a mark by the issuing authority serves as a public guarantee of the purity of the metal and the weight of the ingot, and transforms the latter into a coin. Coined money is usually regarded as the invention of the Lydians early in the 7th cen. B.C., but it is very improbable that any 'coins' reached Palestine before the fall of the Jewish State in B.C. 587. The first actual coins to reach Jerusalem were more probably those of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 522-485), who struck two coins, the daric in gold, and the siglos or sklos (from skelos) in silver. The daric was a light shekel of 150 grains—7 grains heavier than our 'sovereign'—worth twenty-one shillings sterling. The siglos was really a half-shekel of 80 grains, equal therefore to 4th of the daric, on the ten-shekel basis set forth in § 1, or a fraction more than a shekel.

In several passages of Chron., Ezr., and Neh. the RV has substituted 'darics' for AV 'drams' (1 Ch 29, Ezr 2, Neh 7, etc.). But there are valid reasons (see 'Money' in Hastings' DB iii. 421) for retaining the older rendering in the case of Neh 5th may be Persian siglost, although they may have with equal probability be regarded as shekels of the usual Phcenian standard. There is, of course, no question of the Jewish community striking silver coins of their own, this jealously guarded right being then, as always, 'the touchstone of sovereignty'.

In this period, however, the wealthy commercial cities on the Phcenian seaboard—Aradus, Sidon, Tyre, and others—acquired the right of issuing silver coins, which were naturally did on the native standard, with the effective weight of these shekels or tetradrachms, as they are usually termed, averages about 220 grains, a few grains short of the normal 224. These coins have a special interest for the Bible student, from the fact that they are the numismatic representatives of 'the shekel of the sanctuary,' which is prescribed in the Jewish Code as the monetary unit of the post-exilic community (see Lv 27th all the estimations shall be made according to the shekel of the sanctuary). In Ezr 20th, and also in Neh 10th, this shekel is said to consist of 20 gerahs, which the Greek translators identified with the small silver obol of the Gr. coinage, 20 of which yield a shekel of 220 grains. Moreover, it is both historically and historically stated in the Talmud that 'all payments according to the shekel of the sanctuary are to be made in Phcenian currency' (Mishna, Bekhoroth, vili. 7). For the mode of payment of the half-shekel tax for the Temple services see § 7.

Alexander's conquest of Syria was naturally followed by the introduction of his coinage in gold, silver, and bronze. On his death, Ptolemy I established himself in Egypt, to which he soon added Palestine. During the following century (B.C. 301-198) the Jews had at their command the coins of the Ptolemaic dynasty, struck at Alexandria on the Phcenian standard, as well as those of the flourishing cities on the Mediterranean. The tribute paid by the Jews to the Third Ptolemy did not exceed the modest sum of 20 talents of silver, or circa £4300.

In B.C. 198 Antiochus I. wrested Palestine from the Ptolemies. Now the Seleucids had continued Alexander's silver coinage on the Attic standard, the basis of which was the drachm of, originally, 67 grs., but the effective weight of the Syrian drachms and tetradrachms of this period is slightly below this standard, and may be valued at 11d. and 3s. 8d. respectively. The drachmas (To 5th, 2 Mac 4th 12th) and talents (6000 drachmas) of the Books of Maccabees are to be regarded as on this Syrian-Attic standard.

5. The first native coinage: the problem of the 'shekel of Israel'.—In B.C. 139-138 Antiochus Sidetes granted the Jews the coinage on their own coin money (1 Mac 15th). 'The thorniest question of all Jewish numismatics,' as it has been called, is the question whether and to what extent Simon Maccabaeus availed himself of this privilege. A series of silver shekels and half-shekels on the Phcenian standard, dating from B.C. 135 and long been known to students. They show on the obverse and reverse respectively a cup or chalice and a spike of a lily with three flowers. The legends in old Hebrew letters on the shekels are: obv. 'Shekel of Israel'; rev. 'Jerusalem the holy' (see illus. in plate accompanying art. 'Money' in Hastings' DB iii. No. 14, 15; Reinach, Jewish Coins, pl. ii.; and more fully in Madden's Coins of the Jews—the standard work on Jewish numismatics, 67 ff.). Only two alternatives are possible regarding the date of these famous coins. Either they belong to the governors' of Simon Maccabaeus who died a.c. 155, or to the period of the great revolt against Rome, A.D. 66-70. The latest presentation of the arguments for the earlier date will be found in M. Theodore Reinach's book cited above. It is not a point in his favour, however, that he is compelled to assign the shekels of the year 5 to John Hycanus, Simon's son and successor.

The present writer is of opinion that the arguments he has advanced elsewhere in favour of the later date (DB iii. 424 f., 429 f.) still hold good. In this case the earliest Jewish coins will be certain small bronze coins struck by the above-mentioned Hycanus (a.c. 135-104), with the legend in minute old Hebrew characters: 'John, the high priest, and the commonwealth (or the executive) of the Jews.' The title of 'king' first appears on bronze coins of Alexander Jannaeus—'Jonathan the king'—who also first introduced a Greek, in addition to a Hebrew, standard. No silver coins, it may be added, were struck by any of Simon's successors, or even by the more powerful and wealthy Herod. The bronzes of the latter present no new feature of interest.

Money in Palestine under the Romans.—From a numismatic point of view Judea may be said to have formed a part of the Roman dominions from a.c. 53, from which date the Roman monetary unit, the silver denarius, followed in copper, as quadrans, etc., was legal tender in Jerusalem. Since the denarius was almost equal in weight to the Syrian-Attic drachm (§ 4)—the silver unit throughout the Seleucid empire (of the two coins were struck about the same time)—it was possible to divide the value of the gold aureus by 25, which gives 429, say nine pence halfpenny for convenience, or a French franc.

In addition to these two imperial coins, the system based on the Greek drachm was continued in the East, and both drachms and tetradrachms were issued from the imperial mint at Antioch. In our Lord's day Tyre still continued to issue silver and bronze coins, the former mainly tetradrachms or shekels on the old Phcenian standard (220-224 grs.). As the nearest equivalent of the Heb. shekel these Tyrian coins were much in demand for the payment of the Temple tax of one half-shekel (see next §). Besides all these, the procurators issued small bronze coins, probably the quadrans (1 of an as), from their mint at Caesarea, not to mention the numerous cities, such as Samaria-Sebaste, which had similar rights.

The money of NT.—This article may fitly close with a few notes on each of the various denominations mentioned in NT. The currency was in three metals: 'get you no gold nor silver nor brass (copper) in your purses' (Mt 6th RV). Following this order the gold aureus is referred to only indirectly. Its value was £1 (see § 6). (b) The silver coin most frequently mentioned is the Roman denarius (AV and RV 'penny,' Amer. RV, more correctly, 'shilling').
MONEY

In value equal to a franc or 9d., it was the day's wage of a Jewish labourer (Mt 20). A typical denarius of our Lord's day, with which the Roman dues were paid (22d), would have on its obverse the head of the Emperor Tiberius, and for 'supercence' the following legend in Latin: 'Tiberius Cesar, the son of the deified Augustus, (himself) Augustus' (Illust. No. 13 of plate in 'Money,' DB iii.). (c) The drachm on the Attic standard (§ 5) is named only Lk 153; what woman having ten drachmas (EV 'pieces of silver') if she lose one drachm, etc. In ordinary usage, as we have seen, it was the equivalent of the denarius, but for Government purposes it was tariffed at only 5/12 of the denarius. The 30,000 'pieces of silver' (lit. 'silverlings') of Ac 19th were denarius-drachms.

(d) Once there is mention of a didrachm (Mt 17th AV 'tribute money,' RV 'the half-shekel'), but this was a two-drachm piece on the Phoenician standard, and was now very rare. Accordingly it was usual for two persons to join forces in paying the Temple tax of a half-shekel by presenting a Phoenician tetradrachm. This is a piece of money of 4.54, which RV has properly rendered by 'shekel,' with the word of the original, stater, in the margin. The thirty 'pieces of silver' for which Judas betrayed his Lord were probably Tyrian tetradrachms (§ 13). These by Government tariff would be equal to only 90 denarii, their ordinary purchasing power was then equal to 120 denarii or francs, say £4, 16s. of our money.

Passing to the copper coins of the Gospels, we find three denominations in the original, the leptóon, the kodrantes, and the aorson, rendered in Amer. RV by 'mite,' 'farthing,' and 'penny' respectively. EV, unfortunately, renders both the last by 'farthing,' having used 'penny' for the denarius. There are great difficulties in the way of identifying these among the copper coins that have come down to us (for details see Hastings' DB iii. 425 f., EBS iii. 3647). (f) The leptóon, the widow's mite (Mk 12th, Lk 21st), was the smallest coin in circulation, probably one of the minute Macedonian bronzes. Its value was between 1/4 and 1/3 of an English farthing. (g) Two mites made a kodrantes (Lat. quadrans), the 'utmost farthing' of Mt 5th, which was either the actual Roman quadrans or its equivalent among the local bronze coins. Any of the denarius, it was worth a trifle more than half a farthing. (h) The aorson is the 'farthing' (Amer. RV 'penny') associated with the price of sparrows (Mt 10th, Lk 12th), and was a copper coin on the Attic system, probably the dichalkus, of which in ordinary business 24 went to the denarius-drachm. Its value would thus be about 1/5 of a penny. The relative values of the three coins may be represented by a triangle of a penny in area. If we have in Dt 39th the precious fruits of the sun, we have there 'the precious things of the growth of the moon.' As a consequence of this, the re-appearance of the new moon was eagerly looked for, and trumpets were blown and sacrifices offered on the day of the new moon. We gather also from Ps 81st (RV) that something of a similar kind took place at the full moon. The moon took its part with the sun in one of Joseph's dreams when it 'made obedience' to him (Gen 37th); and it stood still, 'in the valley of Aijalon,' at the command of Joshua, at the battle of Gibeon (Jos 10th 12; cf. Hab 3st). Language which must have been derived from the appearance of the moon during eclipses is used by the prophets. The moon is to be darkened or turned into blood (Jl 22st 11) before 'the day of the Lord;' and similar language is used by our Lord (e.g. Mk 12th). We are told of the redeemed Zion that the light of the moon is to be as the light of the sun (Is 35th), and that there is to be no need of the moon, because the glory of God is to be the light of His people (Is 60th; cf. Rev 21st). Cautions against the worship of the moon, and punishment by death for the convicted worshippers, are to be found in Dt 4th 17th; whilst a superstitious salutation of the moon by kissing the hand, not quite unheard of even in our own day, is mentioned in Job 31:26. Moon-worship by the bunching of incense was offered in Jerusalem, and put down by Josiah (2 K 23).

Mount Sinai is supposed to have derived its name from the moon-god Sin, to whom worship was paid there.

1. For the worship of the 'queen of heaven,' see under Stars.

In the OT we meet more than once with crescent-shaped ornaments (Jg 8:20, Is 30:9); whether these are an indication of the worship of the moon is uncertain.

It has been always considered baneful in the bright clear atmosphere of the warmer regions of the earth to sleep exposed to the rays of the moon (Ps 121:2). The influence of the earth's satellite has long been considered hurtful. Our word 'lunatic' reproduces the idea of the Western world of our Lord's time, that lunacy was due to the influence of the moon; the Greek word used in Mt. 26:17 refers to this. In the RV the word is translated 'epileptic.' There are many still to be found who believe that the violence and recurrence of epileptic fits vary with the phases of the moon.

NORAH.—See Memphis.

MORALITY.—See Ethics.

MORASHTITE.—A gentile adjective used to designate the prophet Micah (Mic 1:1, Jer 26:15), probably from Marashtu (wh. see).

MORDECAI.—1. A cousin (?) of queen Esther, who thwarted Haman's plot against the Jews. See Esther and Esther [Book of].

2. One of those who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2:2, Neh 7:2); called in 1 Es 5:1 Marashtus.

MOREH, the Hiphil participle from mtrkh, means 'teacher' or 'one who gives direction' (2 K 17:24, Is 30:34 etc.), and so is applied to a prophet (Is 9:16). Sitting in the shelter of a sacred tree, the priest or seer delivered his direction or 'oracles.'

1. The terebinth (AV, wrongly, 'plain') of Moreh (Dt 11:36), mentioned as indicating the position of Ebal and Gerizim. These two mountains, from their conjunction with Gilgal, have been recognized as the Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal. The Mt. of Moreh was a part of the same sanctuary. There may be a reference to this place in Gn 33, in Jos 24, possibly also in Jg 9. Gilgal (Dt 11:33) and Bethel (Jos 8:32) may be identified.

From the constant occurrence of these articles in the remains of places recently excavated in Palestine, the mortars found at Gezer, as elsewhere, 'are simply heavy stones, a foot or two across, in whose upper surface a hemispherical hollow is cut. The pestles are cylindrical with [convex] bases, which, not infrequently display marks of rough treatment,' (PeFSa, 1903. 118; Illus. in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 85; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, Plates 72, 73.)

The macon is expressly said to have been eaten in mortars as well as ground in mills (Nu 11:11). Their use is implied for pounding certain spices (Ex 30:23) and for the 'bruised corn' for the meal-offering of the first-fruits (Lv 23:14). Copper mortars are also mentioned in later literature, and in Herod's Temple the incense was pounded in mortars of gold. From the Mishna (Baba bathra, iv. 3) we learn that it was customary to have larger mortars fixed into the floor of the house.

In Babylon, when a house was built, the seller handed the pestle of the house-mortar to the purchaser, in token of the conveyance of the house to its new owner. Hence the frequent occurrence in the deed of sale, of the words 'the pestle has been handed over.' Cf. art. Shoe.

MORTIFY.—'To mortify' is in AV metaphorically 'to put to death.' Early writers could use it literally also, as Erasmus, Commune Ovide, 81, 'Christ was mortified, and killed in dolo, as touchynge to his delesse; but was quiekened in spirite.'

MOSETH-GATH.—Mic 1:4 only. It was probably the birth-place of the prophet Micah (Mic 1:1, Jer 26:15, and must have been in the Shephelah. The Onomasticon locates it east of, and near to, Eleutheropolis.

MORIAH.—1. The name. In Gn 22 Abraham was commanded to go 'into the land of the Moriah;' and to sacrifice Isaac upon 'one of the mountains' which God would tell him of. The derivation of the name is obscure. The Peabody (Syriac) version reads 'of the Amorites,' which may possibly be the true reading. The narrator (E), however, in v.14 appears to connect it with the verb 'to see' (which is etymologically impossible), and some of the early translators do the same in their rendering of the name in v.2. The Targumists emphasized the worship of Abraham at the spot, perhaps connecting the name with the verb 'to fear'—which is equally impossible.

2. The place.—The proverb recorded in v.14 clearly implies that the writer thought that Isaac was offered on the Temple mount at Jerusalem. And hence the Chronicler (2 Ch 31) names the Temple hill 'Mount Moriah.' From a spiritual point of view, the hill was often drawn between the offering of Isaac and the death of Christ makes the identification very suggestive. But Gn 22 certainly contemplates a mountain at a much greater distance from the Philistine country, and much more conspicuous, than the Jerusalem hill. There is some similarity between the names Moriah and Moreh, the latter of which was at Shechem (Gn 12:7, Dt 11:7), close to the hills Gerizim and Ebal. And it may have been owing to this that the Septuagint adopted the locality of Gerizim as Abraham's mountain (cf. Jn 4:20). Geographically, it would suit the description in Gn 22; but there is no real evidence for the identification. If the Syriac reading 'Amorites' was adopted, the locality of the mountain is entirely unknown, since the name is a general term employed by E to denote the Canaanite natives of Palestine.

MORNING.—See Time.

MORTAR (AV 'mortal').—See House, §§ 1, 4, and cf. Butrum.

MORTAR AND PESTLE.—The use, from the earliest times, of the mortar and pestle for crushing the grains of the cultivated cereals, for the preparation of spices, and probably, as at the present day, for pounding meat and vegetables (see the Comm., or Tr 278); it is attested by the constant occurrence of these articles in the remains of places recently excavated in Palestine.

The mortars found at Gezer, as elsewhere, 'are simply heavy stones, a foot or two across, in whose upper surface a hemispherical hollow is cut. The pestles are cylindrical with [convex] bases, which, not infrequently display marks of rough treatment,' (PeFSa, 1903. 118; Illus. in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 85; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, Plates 72, 73.)

The many are expressly said to have been eaten in mortars as well as ground in mills (Nu 11:11). Their use is implied for pounding certain spices (Ex 30:23) and for the 'bruised corn' for the meal-offering of the first-fruits (Lv 23:14). Copper mortars are also mentioned in later literature, and in Herod's Temple the incense was pounded in mortars of gold. From the Mishna (Baba bathra, iv. 3) we learn that it was customary to have larger mortars fixed into the floor of the house.

In Babylon, when a house was built, the seller handed the pestle of the house-mortar to the purchaser, in token of the conveyance of the house to its new owner. Hence the frequent occurrence in the deed of sale, of the words 'the pestle has been handed over.' Cf. art. Shoe.

MOSERAH, MOSEROTH.—Moseh is named in Dt 10:9 as the place where Aaron died and was buried; Moseroth in Nu 33:39 as a 'station' on the route to Mt. Hor. Its location is quite uncertain.

1. Name.—The Hebrew narrator regards מֹשֶה as a participle from the vb. מָשָׁה, 'to draw' (Ex 2:2), and Philo derive it from the Cypriote term μέθος, 'water,' and ὑδας 'served'; this is implied in their spelling מֹשֶה, also found in LXX and NT. It is more plausible to connect the name with the Egyptian mess, mes, which perhaps was originally coupled with the name of an Egyptian deity—cf. Ῥα-μεσ, Θαθ-μις, and others—which was omitted under the influence of Israelite monotheism.

2. History.—The narrative of J.—Moses killed an Egyptian, and rebuked one of two Israelites who were striving together, and then he fled to Midian. There he helped seven daughters of the priest of Midian to water their flocks, dwelt with Jethro, married Zipporah, and had one son by her, named Gershon (Ex 2:1-25). The king of Egypt died (2:24), and at J’s bidding Moses returned. On the way, J smote him because he had not been circumcised before marriage; but, the death of the firstborn and the killing the child, and thus circumcising Moses by proxy (4:19-20). These verses must be put back to this point. J appeared in the burning bush and spoke to Moses. Moses was to gather the elders of Israel, give them J’s message, and demand permission from Pharaoh to sacrifice in the wilderness. Moses was given two signs to persuade the Israelites, and yet a third if the two were insufficient (3:1-10). J was angry at hiscorrespondence, Moses spoke to the elders and they believed; and then they made their demand to Pharaoh, which led to his increased severity (4:1-31). Pharaoh sent, the death of the firstborn, and killing the child (7:14-19). frogs (8:1-9:16), flies (8:22-9:23), murrain (9:7), hail (10:8-11), locusts (10:12-20). See PLAGUES. J sent Balaam back to Israel go with his familiar, but forbidden to allow them animals for sacrifice; so Moses announced the death of the firstborn (11:1-30, 12:1-51). At a later time Israelites thought connected with the Exodus certain existing institutions, after ordinances relating to them were preserved by J, but their present position is due to redaction, and the result is a tangled combination in chs. 12. of ordinance and narrative; the ritual of the Passover (12:1-31), the crossing of the Red Sea (13:18-21), and the passage of the Jordan (14:21-31), commands concerning the Feast of Unleavened Cakes (13:4, 6:10), and the offering of firstlings (14:20). J went before the people the pillar of cloud and the cloud of bread (13:21-24). Firstlings of the herd were consecrated (13:10-13, 19-20). Moses and his slave (15:20-21), and parts of the account of the visit of J’s father-in-law, which it is difficult to separate from E (18:1-25). The narratives attached to the delivery of the laws of Sinai are in an extraordinarily confused state, but with a few exceptions the parts which are due to J can be recognized with some confidence. The theophany occurred (18:18), and Moses was bidden to ascend the mountain, where J gave him directions respecting precautions to be taken (19:21-22, 21:5-15). In this section on the gold of the Israelites (16:23). Then the people sinned (17:1-7), and the sin was accepted (17:9-36), and the people were smitten with leprosy (14:30-35). The consecration of Aaron and his sons (19:11-21). Then the two spies were sent (13:23-24). The Ten Commandments (10:10-20, 12-15). Moses was allowed to see the Mount (19:11-13). The inscriptions of the tablets were given to Moses (19:15-20). Then Moses went down (19:21-25). The law was received (20:1-17). The people required a king (19:24-32). The name of J’s father (21:1-2). The people collected their sheaves (21:16-30). Moses journeyed to the mount (24:1-18). Something then occurred which roused the wrath of J; it is doubtful if the original narrative has been preserved; but J has inserted a narrative which apparently explains the story of the Levites for Divine service (23:20-41). Moses interceded for the people (the vv. to be read in the following order, 21:1-45, 46-49, 5-14, 15-22, 23-24, 25-35, 36-38, 39-43, 44-46, 47-48, 49). J’s having been propitiated, Israel left the mount, and Moses left and accompanied them (Nu 10:29-32). Being weary of many, they were given quails, which caused a plague (11:3). Moses sent spies through the S. of Palestine as far as Hebron. Caleb alone encouraged the people, and he alone was allowed to enter Canaan (13:17-19, 20:1-2, 26-32, 35, 36, 37-39). The Amorites and Moabites prevailed against the Israelites (13:1-22). Moab was captured by the Moabites, and Moses cursed the land of Moab (25:19). The story of Balaam (parts of 22-24). Israel smitten with pestilence, and Moses bade the heathen to go to the top of Pisgah, and was buried in Moab (part of De 34:4).

(i.) The narrative of E.—The midwives rescued Israelite infants (Ex 2:2-10). Moses’ birth; his discovery and adoption by Pharaoh’s daughter; his feeding Jethro’s sheep in Midian, when God called to him from a bush at Horab, and told him to deliver Israel. He revealed his name ‘Ehyeh,’ and promised that Israel should triumphantly leave Egypt (3:1-10). Moses returned to Egypt, meeting Aaron on the way; they made their demand to Pharaoh, and were refused (4:1-23). Moses, by means of his Divine power, brought plagues—rushing of the river to blood (7:18, 17b. 29), the hail (9:1-2), the locusts (10:1-20, 26-28, 29), the darkness (10:21-30). Moses was bidden to advise the Israelites to obtain gold, etc., from the Egyptians (11:1-12), which they did (12:31). They departed, taking with them Joseph’s mummy (13:17). They crossed the water (fragments are preserved from E’s account, 13:15), and Miriam sang praise (15:20). On emerging into the desert, they were given manna; it is possible this event connected with the name massheh, ‘proving’ (15:35-39). Then follows E’s Merihah narrative, combined with J’s Massah narrative (17:1-7), and the fire of God (17:1-7). Moses was gathered to his people (17:1-8). E then added a narrative of Balaam and his wife (19:2-3), with Amalek under Joshua’s leadership, while Aaron and Hur held up Moses’ hands with the sacred staff (17:10-12). Jethro visited the Israelites with Moses’ wife and two sons; he arranged sacrifices, and a sacrificial feast, in which the elders of Israel took part (18:1-14). Seeing Moses overburdened with the duty of giving decisions, he advised him to delegate smaller matters to inferior officers; and Moses followed his advice. Jethro departed to his own home (18:22-24). Preparations were made for the theophany (18:21, 31, 32-33), which then took place (31:1-2, 20-25). Laws preserved by E and later members of his school of thought are grouped together in chs. 20-23. The theophany (33:1-4). In the narratives in which the laws are set, two stratas, E and Eb, are perceptible, the latter supplying the narrative portions connected with the Ten Words of 20:17-21. E relates as follows: Moses told the people the Ten Words, and they promised obedience (19:17); this must follow 29:17. Moses ascended the mountain to write the words, leaving the people in the charge of Aaron and Hur (24:12-18, 31:18). During his absence, Aaron and the people sinned by fashioning a golden calf (24:12-18, 31:18). During his absence, Aaron and the people sinned by fashioning a golden calf (24:12-18, 31:18).
golden bull, and Moses, when he saw it, brake the tablets of stone and destroyed the image; Aaron offered a fastian excuse, and J* smote the people (32:28-29). Moses' interest in the matter was not lost on E, but it is supplied by a late hand in 32:30-34. We here resume the narrative of E. After the departure from Horeb a fire from J* punished the people for murmurings (33:1-5). The Tabernacle was then set up again at Etham, and thus the Book of Moses' spirit and put it upon 70 elders who prophesied, including Eldad and Medad, who did not leave the camp; Joshua objected to the two being thus favoured, but was rebuked by Moses (31:26-28). Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses for having married a foreign woman and then for claiming to have received Divine revelations; Miriam became leprous, but was healed at Moses' Intercession (12). On Dathan and Abiram (16) see above, under J. Miriam died at Kadesh (20). Twelve spies were sent, who brought back a large cluster of grapes, but said that the natives were numerous and powerful (13:1-21. c. 14. 26. 30. 32. 36. 37. 38). The people determined to return to Egypt under another captain (14:1-14). [Here occurs a lacuna, which is partially supplied by Dt 11:24-32, probably based on E.] Against Moses' wish the people advanced towards Canaan, but were routed by the Amalekites and other natives (14:39-40). Edom refused passage through their territory (20:1-11). Aaron died at Mount Hor and was succeeded by Eleazar (Dt 10:8). Amalek, in disgust, despaired of the people prevailing with Jehovah (25:17-19). Moses made the serpent of bronze (Nu 21:6-9). Israel marched by Edom to Moab, and vanquished Sihon (21:12-21; 22:2-3). The story of Balaam (part 22-24). Phinehas was promised _an everlasting priesthood_ for his zeal in putting an Israelite who had married a Moabitess and a Canaanite woman into the camp (25:10). All the last generation having died except Joshua and Caleb, a second census was taken by Moses and Eleazar (26). Moses appointed Joshua to succeed him (Dt 31:22). Moses died in Moab, and was buried without a tombstone. He was the greatest prophet in Israel (Dt 34:1-6. 12). (iii.) The narrative of D is based upon the earlier sources, which it treats in a hortatory manner, dwelling upon the religious meaning of history, and its bearing upon life and morals, and Israel's attitude to God. There are a few additional details, such as are suitable to a retrospect (e.g. 14:1. 16:1. 20:17. 21:14-16; 23:1. 26:1, 2), and there are certain points on which the tradition differs more or less widely from those of JE; see Driver, _Deut._ p. xxxvi f. But D supplies nothing of importance to our knowledge of Moses' life and character. (iv.) The narrative of P.—Israel was made to serve the 'moral purpose' (Ex 17:18. 160). When the king died, J* heard their sighing, and remembered His covenant (20:24-28). He revealed to Moses His name Jehovah, and bade him tell the Israelites that they were to be delivered (6:2-3). Moses being diffident, Aaron his brother was given to be his 'prophet' (6:10-12 7:17). [The genealogy of Moses and Aaron is given in a later stratum of P, 6:14-16.] Aaron turned his staff into a 'reptile' before Pharaoh (7:12-19). By Aaron's instrumentality with Moses plagues were sent—all the waters are turned into blood (7:11. 12. 13. 20.) frogs (8:1-7. 16b); gnats or mosquitoes (10:14-19); boils (10:12-18). As in J, commands respecting religious institutions are inserted in connexion with the Exodus: Passover (12:1-20. 23. 27. 43-50), Unleavened cakes (12:20), Dedication of firstborn (13:1-17).] The Israelites went to Etham (13:20) and thence to the Red Sea. The marvel of the crossing is heightened, the waters standing up in a double wall (14:14. 21. 14. 15). In the wilderness of Sin the people murmured, and manna was sent; embodied in the narrative are fragments of P's story of the quails (16, exc. xxviv. 4-13). They marched by way of Rephidim (17:1-7), and thence to Sinai (19:1-24). After seven days J* called Moses into the cloud (24:1-18) and gave him instructions with regard to the Tabernacle and its worship (25-31), and also gave him the Tablets of the Testimony (31:18a). (Other laws ascribed to Divine communication with Moses are collected in Lev. and parts of Num.) When Moses descended, his face shone, so that he veiled it when he was not alone in J's presence (34:4-5). A census was taken of the fighting men preparatory to the march, and the writer takes occasion to enlarge upon the organization of the priestly and Levitical families (Nu 1-4). The cloud which descended upon the Tabernacle was for roosting and for storming (9:2-4), and the journey began (10:20-23). With the story of Dathan and Abiram (see above) there are entwined two versions of a priestly story of rebellion—(1) Korah and 260 princes, all of them laymen, spoke against Moses and Aaron for claiming, in their capacity of Levites, a sanctity superior to that of the rest of the congregation. (2) Korah and the princes were Levites, and they attacked Aaron for exalting princes above Levites (parts of 16). Aaron and Korah were rebuked for lack of faith [the fragments of the story do not make it clear wherein this consisted], and they were forbidden to enter Canaan (parts of 16). And ten of Korah's apostate band were sent from the wilderness of Paran; the two former alone brought a good account of the land, and they alone were permitted to enter Canaan; the other ten died by a Consumption [see above under E]. Aaron died at Mt. Hor (20:22-29). Israel marched by Edom to Moab (20:20 21a. 10. 11). Phinehas promised 'an everlasting priesthood' for his zeal in putting an Israelite who had married a Moabitess and a Canaanite woman into the camp (25:10). All the last generation having died except Joshua and Caleb, a second census was taken by Moses and Eleazar (26). Moses appointed Joshua to succeed him (27). TheMidianitee were defeated and Balaam was slain (31). Moses died on Mt. Nebo, aged 120 (Dt 34:5 7-9). 3. Historicity.—In the OT, there are presented to us the varying fortunes of a Semitic people who found their way into Palestine, and were strong enough to settle in the country in defiance of the native population. Although the invaders were greatly in the minority as regards numbers, they were knit together by an _esprit de corps_ which made them formidable. And this was the outcome of a strong religious belief which was common to all the branches of the tribe—the belief that every member of the tribe was under the protection of the same God, Jehovah. And when in any clan or tribe what source they gained this united belief, the analogy of other religions suggests that it probably resulted from the influence of some strong personality. _The existence of such a personality is required by the law of the tribe, as Moses to account for them_. But while the denial that Moses was a real person is scarcely within the bounds of sober criticism, it does not follow that all the details related of him are literally true to history. What Prof. Driver says of the patriarchs in Genesis is equally true of Moses in Ex., Nu.: 'The basis of the narratives in Genesis is in fact popular oral tradition; and that being so, we may expect them to be exaggerated or transformed, and the characters which popular oral tradition does in other cases. They may well include a substantial historical nucleus; but details may be due to the involuntary action of popular invention or imagination, operating during a long period of time; other characters, as in the case of Mifaleh, are possible, and explaining the relations, of a later age may thus have become attached to the patriarchs; phraseology and expression will nearly always be ascribed rightly to the tribe from which they came, and the narratives are only changed to their present literary shape' (art. 'Jacob' in _DB_ II. 534). MOSES is portrayed under three chief aspects—(i.) a Leader, (ii.) the Promoter of the religion of J* (iii.) Lawgiver, and 'Prophecy' or moral teacher. (1.) Moses as Leader.—Some writers think that there is evidence which shows that the Israelites who went to Egypt at the time of the famine did not comprise the whole nation. Whether this be so or not, however, there is no sufficient reason for doubting the Hebrew tradition of an emigration to Egypt. Again, if Israelites obtained permission—as foreign tribes are known to have done—to occupy pasture land within the Egyptian frontier, there could be nothing surprising if some of them were pressed into compulsory building labour; for it was a common practice to employ foreigners and prisoners in this manner. But in order to rescue them, and, if need be, to take them together, and persuade them to escape, a leader was necessary. If, therefore, it is an historical fact that they were in Egypt, and partially enslaved, it is more likely than not that the account of their deliverance by Moses also has an historical basis. It is impossible, in a short article, to discuss the evidence in detail. It is in the last degree unsafe to dogmatize on the extent to which the different elements in the history of Moses' life are historically accurate. In each particular the decision resolves itself into a balance of probabilities. But that Moses was not an individual, but stands for a tribe or group of tribes, for the narrative of his life, it is evident that the historical data are to be attributed to the teaching of Moses. It is to be noticed that the earliest writer (J) uses the name 'Jahweh' from his very first sentence (Gen 2:4) and onwards, and assumes that J was known and worshipped by the ancestors of the race; and in Ex. he frequently employs the expression 'J' the God of the Hebrews’ (3:15 5:7 9:4 10:6). But, in agreement with E and P, he ascribes to Moses a new departure in the worship inaugurated at Sinai. E and P relate that the Name was a new revelation to Moses when he was exiled in Midian, and that he taught it to the Israelites in Egypt. And yet in 3:15 J represents J as saying to Moses, 'I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'; unless this clause is a later insertion, as in 11:43. And in 6:2 P states categorically that God appeared unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but He was not known to them by this name 'Jahweh.' All the sources, therefore, imply that Moses did not teach a totally new religion; but he put before the Israelites a new aspect of their religion; he deepened the religious relationships to God: they were to think of Him in a particular sense as their God. When we go further and inquire whence Moses derived the name ‘Jahweh,’ we are landed in the region of conjectures. Two points, however, are clear: (1) that the God whose name was 'Jahweh' had, before Moses' time, been conceived of as dwelling on the sacred mountain Horeb or Sinai (3:1-4). It is assumed that he was worshipped by a branch of the Midianites named Kenites (Jg 1:14 4:18), of whom Jethro was a priest (Ex 3:18). From these facts two conjectures have been made. Some have supposed that Moses learned the name Jahweh from the Midianites; that he was therefore a foreign God as far as the Israelites were concerned; and that, after hearing His name for the first time from Moses in Egypt, they journeyed to the sacred mountain and were there admitted by Jethro into the Kenite worship by a sacrificial feast at which Jethro officiated. But it is hardly likely that the Israelites, enslaved in Egypt, could have been so rapidly roused and convinced by Moses' proclamation of an entirely new and foreign deity. The action taken by Jethro in organizing the sacrifice might easily arise from the fact that he was in his own territory, and naturally acted as host towards the strangers. The other conjecture, which can claim a certain plausibility, is that J was a God recognized by Moses' father-in-law Levi. From Ex 4:3, 5 it is possible to suppose that Aaron was not in Egypt, but in the vicinity of Horeb, which he already knew as the 'mountain of God.' If Moses' family, or the tribe of Levi, and perhaps (in the region of conjecture) the Rachel tribes, together with the Midianite branch of Semites, were already worshippers of J, Moses' work would consist in proclaiming as the God of the whole body of Israelites the name which guidance a small portion of them had already experienced. If either of these conjectures is valid, it only puts back a stage the question as to the ultimate origin of the name: 'Jahweh.' But whatever the origin may have been, it is difficult to deny Moses the glory of having united the whole body of Israelites in the single cult which excluded all other deities.

(ii.) Moses as the Promoter of the religion of Jahweh.—Throughout the OT, with the exception of Ex 40:46, these two great events in the early career of Jahweh's worshipers, the exodus and the conquest of Canaan, are the events which most men recognize as outstanding in the story of the nation. But what the event of the conquest and the exodus depending, is essentially a religious event, a change in the religious consciousness of a people. It is an event, therefore, which may be considered to have been in the hands of a prophet who was a speaker of the future, a man who was able to present the people with a clear picture of their position. This is the office Moses had to perform. It is too much to suppose, of course, that during his life-time the people were able to accept and to follow his counsel. He had to present his counsels as such to the people; and during his time there were always the elements of resistance against his leadership. A prophet is a man who speaks to his people of a future which is realized by the people and lived as a whole; it is an impossible task to present prophetic counsels during a lifetime. But what matters is in the course of an event, that the counsels are presented and played such a part in the issue. It is the function of a prophet to be a speaker of the future, to indicate to his people the future, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance. It is the function of a prophet to be a learner of the future, to present it as a whole, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance. It is the function of a prophet to be an organizer of the people for the future, to present it as a whole, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance. It is the function of a prophet to be an organizer of the people for the future, to present it as a whole, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance. It is the function of a prophet to be an organizer of the people for the future, to present it as a whole, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance. It is the function of a prophet to be an organizer of the people for the future, to present it as a whole, and to organize the people so far as possible for its acceptance.
MOSOULLAMUS

Old Dispensation, Jesus and the NT writers thought of him as something more. He was a historical personage of such unique prominence in Israel's history, that he appeared to them as the fulfillment of spiritual factors in the New Covenant. The following form an interesting study, as illustrating points which cover a wide range of Christian truth: The 'glory' on Mount Sinai (2 Co 3:14-18), the brazen serpent (Jn 3:14-15), the Passover sacrifice at Horeb (Mt 26:28, Mk 14:14, Lk 22:19, 1 Co 11:25; see also He 9:11, 1 P 1:12 with Hort's note), the terrains of the Sinal covenant (He 12:18, the crossing of the sea (1 Co 10:1), the manna (Jn 6:31-35, 38-39), the water from the rock (1 Co 10:4), Moses as a prophet (Ac 3:22, 7, Jn 1:17-22; and see Jn 1:17-22 [Lk 7:2]), the magicians of Egypt (2 Ti 3:8), the plagues (Rev 8:7, 9:14-16, 19:14-15, 19:18-21), and 'the song of Moses the servant of God' (Rev 15:1).

MOUSOULLAMUS.—I. 1 Es 8:4.—Meshullam, Ezr 8:4.

MOUNT HIGH (Eluyon) occurs as an epithet of El, 'God' (Gn 14:18, 26, Ps 78:70), or Jahweh (Ps 78:75); or it stands by itself as a title of God (Nu 24:16, Dt 32:3, Ps 21a etc.). We find it first in a somewhat mysterious chapter (Gn 14) which cannot be traced to any identified source; the date is also uncertain. In this chapter Melchizedek is described as 'priest to the Most High God' (El Elyon), and since in later times the Salem where he lived was generally identified with Jerusalem, the double function of priest and king ascribed to him caused him to be regarded by the Jews as a type of the sacerdotal and kingly powers in the Messiah, and by the Christians as the forebear of the True Messianic Christ. Hence the name of the God whom he worshipped (El Elyon), which may possibly, in the first instance, have had reference merely to the lofty situation of Jerusalem, became in later generations a mysterious and exalted title of Jehovah. At the same time there is the possibility that the title Elyon came originally from the Phoenician—Philus of Byblos (quoted by Driver, Genesis, p. 163) mentions a deity of this name in the Phoenician theology, and the corresponding Greek word is frequent in inscriptions of the Greco-Roman period, especially in the neighbourhood of the Bosporus. Whatever the origin of the title Elyon, it never occurs in strictly prose passages of the OT, though it is found in the Songs of Balaam (Nu 24:16), Moses (Dt 32:9), and David (2 S 22:4). The Aramaic equivalents are fairly frequent in Daniel.

The uses of the Greek rendering in the NT are instructive. In the story of the Annunciation it is ordained that the child whom Mary is to bear shall be called Son of the Most High (Lk 1:35); and a little later, in Ac 7:42, John the Baptist is described as the prophet of the Most High. The contrast is completed in the Ep. to the Hebrews, where Melchizedek is brought forward as priest of the Most High (cf. 7 with v. 26). It is worth noting, too, that the title is twice found in the mouth of demons (Mt 5:5—Lk 8:42, Ac 16:14). The word, then, does not belong to the language of everyday life: it is reserved for poetry and elevated style, and seems by its origin to have suggested something archaic and mysterious, whether it referred to the lofty dwelling-place or to the majestic nature and attributes of God.

MOUNT. The word chosen by Wyclif and Tindal, and accepted by all the subsequent versions as the tr. of Gr. karphe in Mt 7:1, 2, Lk 6:34. karphe. The root of karphe is karphe 'to dry up,' and it signifies a bit of dried stick, straw, or wood, as, in the illustration, might be lying about and enter the eye. In its minute-ness it is contrasted by our Lord with dokos, the beam that supports (dechomai) the roof of a building.

The root of karphe is karphe 'to dry up,' and it signifies a bit of dried stick, straw, or wood, as, in the illustration, might be lying about and enter the eye. MOTHER.—See FAMILY, 3.

MOUNT.—An earthwork in connexion with siegecraft (Jer 6:4 and of.), also rendered 'bank' (2 S 20:17 RV). In 1 Mac 12:10 RV has the modern form 'mound,' which Amer. RV has substituted throughout. See, further, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 6.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN.—Although on the whole a mountainous country, Palestine has few striking or commanding peaks to show; consequently, though we find frequent mention of mountains in the Bible, there are comparatively few names of individual summits. 'Mountain,' as well as its cognate 'mount,' is used both of isolated elevations and of extensive districts of lofty ground—such as Sinal, Horeb, Carmel on the one hand, Mount Seir or the Mount of Gilead on the other.

Mountains served various functions to the ancient inhabitants of the land. (1) They were dwelling-places, for which the numerous caves, natural and artificial, excavated in their soft limestone sides, were fitted; thus Eshan dwelt in Mount Seir (Ch 30:15). (2) They served the purpose of landmarks; thus Mount Hor was indicated (Nu 33:20) as a boundary of the Promised Land. (3) They were used as platforms, for addressing large crowds of people, as in the famous ceremony at Ebal and Gerizim (Jos 8:24-26), in the address of Jotham to the Shechemites (Jg 8:3), and that of Abijah to the Ephraimites (2 Ch 13:8). (4) They were burial-places ('sepulchres that were in the mount,' 2 K 23:24). (5) They served as refuge (Gn 14:23, Mt 24:16); (6) as military camps (1 S 17:7); (7) as sources of wood and plants (2 Ch 2:8, Neh 5:14, Hag 1:8); (8) as watch-towers and lookout stations (Ezek 40, Mt 4:19); (9) as outpost (Ps 50:14, Lk 3:1); (10) as fortresses (Ps 129:2). Their obvious fitness for typifying strength and endurance gives rise to metaphors and comparisons to be found in almost every book of both Testaments.

But it is in their aspect as holy places that mountains are of the deepest interest to the student of the Scriptures or of Palestine. In modern Palestine almost every hill a little loftier or more striking than its fellows is adorned by a domed shrine, and, however modest, is regarded as the habitation of a sacred precinct that goes back to the earliest Semitic inhabitants of the land. Sinal, Horeb, Carmel occur to the memory at once as mountains consecrated by a theophany. The worship at 'high places' was so deeply engrained in the Hebrews that no amount of legislation could eradicate it; the severe discipline of the Exile was needed for its destruction.

MOUNT OF THE CONGREGATION.—See CONGREGATION.

MOURNING CUSTOMS.—The Oriental expression of grief has a twofold relationship. Towards God it is marked by silent and reverent submission symbolized by placing the hand on the mouth. 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away' (Job 1:21); 'I was dumb ... because thou didst it' (Ps 59:8). But towards the relatives and neighbours the case is altogether different. It is now an event that has to be announced as quickly and publicly as possible, and a loss which love has to deplore with passionate abandonment and an accumulation of conventional ceremony. At the moment of death a loud shrill wail is raised by those present. Its meaning is understood only too well. As the piercing, tremulous shrieks are repeated, a few inquiries are made as to the locality and circumstances, and the rapidly increasing cry is accepted as an invitation and claim to proceed to the house of mourning. Immediately after death the body is washed and robed for the burial, which usually takes place within twenty-four hours. In addition to the immediate or nearest relatives and friends, even the poorest have a right to be present. In the case of the Arab they are accompanied by members of their family, who have to be comforted and pleased with and led away from the prostrate figure of the dead, the sustained ceremony of mourning is attended to by the neighbors. These usually assist by hired mourners, arrange themselves around the bed, or on opposite sides of the room, and keep up the lamentation without intermission. In this way they afford the preoccupation of a recognized routine, and give the rest of physical outlet to feelings that either are, or are considered to be, beyond control. At times one of the chief mourners leans over the body, wringing her hands or wiping away the tears, and to whose voice the sorrowful is addressed by asking who he has left them, and who will discharge the duties that belonged to him alone, pleading for love’s sake to hear only once more the music of the voice now silent, or begging forgiveness on account of selfishness and imperfect service in the days that will never return. Meanwhile the band of mourners redouble their wailing, with beating of the breast and frantic clutching at their hair and clothes. As such paroxysms cannot last, the skilled mourners, understanding the moderate and sustained character of the sorrow, are held to moderate and sustaine the feeling of desolation by a plaintively descending chant. Among the singers there are usually one or two who are specially skilled in leading off with metrical phrases and rhymes of sympathetic appeal, which the others take up and repeat in concert. The invariable subject is the good qualities of the departed, and the extent of the love which the family has been called upon to bear. In addition to the above allusions, new springs of tenderness are opened by referring to other members of the same family recently departed, and the loved one whose death they are lamenting is asked to bear messages of grief and sorrow to those who have preceded them. As the procession of the body reaches more distant parts of the town, or is carried to the neighboring villages, companies of sympathizing friends come to show their regard for the dead. They accompany the bier by loud weeping and expressions of grief; and as they enter the house the lamentation of the mourners in the room breaks out afresh. To the Western visitor unacquainted with the temperament and traditions of Oriental people, the whole scene is deeply distressing, and he has to check the feeling of repugnance by remembering himself that they would be equally shocked by the apparent cultivation and ordered formality of religious procedure on similar occasions.

MOURNING CUSTOMS

MULE

MOUTH.—Several Heb. words are so tr. 1. gârûn (Ps 149:4) lit. ‘throat.’ 2. châk (Job 12:19 etc.) is the inward part of the mouth, the palate, or ‘roof of the mouth’ (Job 29:6 etc.). 3. Mi, twice in AV (Ps 32:10 RV ‘trappings,’ 103 ‘RVm ‘years’ or ‘prime’), signifies properly ‘ornament.’ 4. peh, the most usual word for ‘mouth,’ meaning also ‘edge,’ e.g., of the sword (Gn 34:3 etc.), or ‘border,’ e.g., of a garment (Ps 133:5). 5. pâm, Aram.—Heb. peh (Dn 7:5 etc.), the most usual word for ‘mouth,’ meaning also ‘edge,’ e.g., of the sword (Gn 34:3 etc.), or ‘border,’ e.g., of a garment (Ps 133:5). 6. pa‘atm (Fr 135) lit. ‘face,’ ‘head,’ Aram. lit. ‘door’ (Dn 3:6). In the NT the Gr. word stoma, frequently in Scripture ‘mouth’ is used for ‘speech,’ of which it is the organ. Hence the MSS. have been in W. EVANS.

MUFFLERS.—The word so rendered occurs only in Is 34:4, as an article of female attire. The cognate verb, in the sense of ‘velled,’ is applied in the Mishna (Shabbath, vi. 6) to Jewesses from Arabia. A close vell of some sort, therefore, is evidently intended by Isaiah.

MULBERRY TREES (šekâ’tm, 2 S 2:5, 1 Ch 14:18, Ps 84:13).—These trees have on philological grounds been supposed to be a variety of balsam, and on grounds of appropriateness to the story (2 S 2:5) to be poplars, whose leaves readily quiver with the slightest breath of air. Their identity is, however, quite uncertain. Mulberries they cannot be; for though plentiful to-day in Palestine, and still more so in the Lebanon, these trees were introduced to the land later than OT times. See, however, SYCAMORE.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MULE

(1) pered (m.) and pîrdâh (f.).—In all passages except three.

(2) rekeb, RV ‘swift steeds’ (Est 8:14). The tr. ‘swifts’ is purely conjectural.
MUNITION

(3) pīmēn, Gn 36:42, where 'mules' is certainly a mistranslation; RV 'riot springs.'

The breeding of mules was forbidden to the Israelites (Lv 19:19), but from David's time (2 S 13:9 13) onwards (1 K 12:3 18) they appear to have been incessantly reproduced to the returning Israelites brought 2400 mules with them (Ezr 2:6). Mules were preferred in Palestine to-day as pack animals (cf. 1 Ch 12:4, 2 K 5:7), they are hardly, subsist on less food, and travel better on rough roads. A well-trained mule is a favourite riding animal with the highest officials in the land.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

MUNITION occurs in a few passages of AV in the sense of a fortified place, e.g., Is 29:1, where RV 'stronghold.' The word is retained in Nah 2:19, where, however, Amer. RV has the more literal rendering 'a city of refuge.' In either case the 'mansion of munition' is literally 'with implements of defence' (cf. RV 'fortress') as the same original is rendered in 1 K 12:4.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MUPPIM.—A son of Benjamin (Gn 46:24); called in 1 Ch 8:23, 24, Shuppim, in Nu 26:48 Shephuphan, and in 1 Ch 18:6 Shephuphan.

MURDER.—See Crimes, § 7; Refuge [Critics 20]; MURRAIN.—See Plagues of Egypt.

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—I. Probable character of early Hebrew music.—Since the Dispersion the music of the Jews was always borne the impress of the peoples among whom they have settled. Synagogue ritual thus affords us no clue to the music of early times, and we must accordingly fall back on Scripture and tradition. From these we gather that Hebrew music was of a loud and piercing nature, far removed from the sweetness which modern taste demands. There is no real evidence that the players ever advanced beyond unison in their combinations of notes, apparently reproducing the air on successively rising or falling octaves of the scale. We may suppose, however, that they would hardly fail to discover that certain combinations were pleasing to the ear, and would thus learn to strike them either simultaneously or successively (arpeggio). How far, however, they grasped the nature of a chord or of harmony must remain obscure, in spite of the attempts to solve this question, some of them altogether useless guesses. For example, the Hebrew accents, though of comparatively late origin, and always confined in Jewish use to acting as guides in the proper recitation of the text, have been pressed into the service, as though employed for the purpose of a kind of 'figured base,' and thus indicating an acquaintance with musical harmony. Unfortunately, even those who have maintained this theory differ considerably as to the details of its application.

2. Rendering of Hebrew music.—It seems clear at any rate that an antiphonal setting was in use for many of the Psalms (e.g., 13. 20, 38, 68, 89); but the chanting must not be taken as resembling what we now understand by that term. The account we have in 1 Ch 15:28 of the elaborate arrangements for conducting the musical services of the Temple, appears to indicate a somewhat complicated system, and to suggest that there entered a considerable element of flexibility into the constitution. It is, for instance, quite possible that the long reciting note which with us may do duty on occasion for as many as twenty, thirty, or even more syllables, played no such monotonous part, but was broken up and varied to an extent suggested by the length of the verse as well as by the character of the sentiment to be conveyed.

3. Occasions on which music was used.—Hebrew religious melody had a popular origin, and was thus closely connected with the religious life of the na. on.

Apart from such references to song as those in Gn 31:27 and Job 31:28, we find in the headings of certain Psalms (e.g., 22, 'Aydeeth hash-shahar, 'the kind of the morning') traces of what are in all probability in some, if not in all, cases secular songs. So Al Tashbeth, 'Destroy not,' mentioned to Ps 67:35, 36, 75, may well be the first words of a vintage song. The song of Manasseh (2 Chr 29:30) is found in directions prefixed to Gabriol's hymns and those of other celebrated Jewish poets, when these compositions were adapted to music in the Spanish (Sefardic) ritual (see D. J. Sola, Ancient Melodies, etc., London, 1857, Pref. p. 13). Amos (6) speaks of music performed at feasts, and in 1 S 18, 2 we read of its use in Saul's time in connexion with processions. As in this last case, so in general it may be supposed that music and dancing were closely connected, and had a parallel development. David's careful elaboration of the Levitical music, vocal and instrumental, was employed, according to 2 Ch 30:21, with impressive effect at the dedication of Solomon's Temple. The reforms under both Hezekiah and Josiah included the restoring of the musical ritual belonging to David's time (2 Ch 30:21, 25). Later, the descendants of Heman and other Levitical leaders of music were among the exiles of the Return from Babylon, and under them the services were reconstituted as of old (Neh 12:24).

4. Hebrew musical instruments.—Here our information is somewhat fuller, though not without a good deal of certainty in details. We may for clearness sake divide under three heads, viz., strung, wind, and percussion instruments.

(a) Strung instruments.—Chief among these are the kinnor and the nēbel (RV 'harp' and 'psaltery'), which were evidently favourites among the Jews. It is plain, in spite of doubts which have been expressed upon the point, that the two names were used indiscriminately for the same instrument. The LXX in nearly all cases is careful to distinguish them (κithara or κιννυρα, and psalterion, nēbel, or naban, respectively). Both, however, were used in the main, and perhaps exclusively, to accompany songs, and those of a joyous nature. They were unsuitable for times of mourning; see Ps 137, a passage which further shows that the instrument must have been, unlike a modern harp, easily portable. They were doubtless the chief, if not the sole, instruments employed in the Temple services. In Solomon's time they were made from alnug (alnug) trees, doubtfully identified with sandal wood. The strings, originally of twisted grass or filaments, were afterwards formed of gut, and subsequently from silk or metal.

Thus the kinnor (an onomatopoetic word, derived from the sound of the strings) is the only stringed instrument mentioned in the Hexateuch, where Genesis (where its name is attributed to Jubal, son of Lamech. The nēbel is first mentioned in 1 S 10:6, as used by the prophets who went to meet Saul. The kinnor (κithara or lyre) [in 1 Mac 4:4 the AV rendering 'sithern, RV 'harp'] consists of a sound-box at the base, with wooden side-arms and a crossbar connected by the strings with the box below. It was originally an Asiatic instrument, and the earliest known representation is pre-historic, in the form of a rude model found at Tell el in southern Babylon. There is also a very ancient one shown on a tomb in Egypt, dating from about the 30th cent. B.C. (12th dynasty). A tomb at Thebes in the same country dating between the 18th and 19th dynasties furnished us with a similar form, which was sometimes modified later in the direction of more artistic construction and sloping of the crossbar downwards, so as to vary the pitch of the strings. Jewish coins of Macracean date furnish us with a close resemblance to the Greek kithara. Josephus (Ant. vii. xii. 3) distinguishes the kinnor as a ten-stringed instrument struck by a plectrum; the nēbel, on the other hand, using, he says, played with the fingers. This need not necessarily conflict, but has been thought by some with the statement (1 S 16:1) that David played the...

(b) The nebel. It has been sought to identify this with various instruments; among them, the lute (so Rev in Is 43:14; ‘'lute'’ is also RV tr. of Gr. κιννάρι in 1 Mac 4:25, guitar, and dulcimer. In support of the last it is urged that the Arabic name for that instrument, santir, is a corruption of the Greek παιλέττρον, by which, as has been said, the LXX sometimes render nebel. Having regard, however, to the testimony of Josephus (see above) that the nebel had twelve strings, and was played by the hand without a plectrum, we are safe in taking it to be a kind of harp, an instrument of larger size than the κιννάρι, and used (Am 6:4, Is 52:14) at the feasts of the rich. We find, on the other hand, that it was not too large to be played by one who was walking (see 1 S 10:5, 2 S 6:5). The above article discusses the possibility of it being a variant form of the more usual instrument, santir—παιλέττρον. It is weakened by the fact that the Greek word was used generically for stringed instruments played with one or both hands without a plectrum. We may note further that the nebel (see above for this as a LXX rendering of nebel), known to the Greeks as of Sidonian origin, was played according to Ovid (Ars Amat. iii. 327) with both hands.

Egyptian monuments show us portable harps, varying in form, but generally, in rectangular, angular, and bow-like forms, constructed on the same general principle, and having the sound-box above, not, as the κιννάρι, below. Seven of these harps, already found used by a Semite in Assyr.ia, are to be seen on a bas-relief found at Kounyunik. We may add that several early Church writers (Augustine on Ps 42:1, Jerome on Is 14:19; Isidore, Etym. iii. 22: 20) support the above identification of nebel with a harp.

(c) There is little that can be asserted with confidence as to the nature of other instruments of this class mentioned in the Bible. In Dn 3:9, besides the παιλέττρον (Gr. παιλέττρον) and κιθάρα (Gr. κιθάρα) with which we have already dealt, we have the σαββίκα (Ev saubik). This is evidently the Greek σομβύκα, but the latter has been variously described as a large harp of many strings and rich tone, similar to the grand Egyptian harp, and as a very small one of high pitch. After all, both descriptions may be true, if referring to different periods of its existence.

Napythth has sometimes been taken as the name of an instrument, but is much more probably a general term for stringed music. So in Ps 68:3 (Heb. נפת), we have a contrast between the singers (כדרים) and the players on strings (נפבת).

Gittith, the heading of Ps 8, 81, 84, has also, but somewhat doubtfully, been referred to instruments mentioned in Gath; so the early Jewish paraphrase of (Targum), ‘the harp which David brought from Gath.’

(2) Wind Instriments.—(a) The chali (EV pipe) seems to have been the instrument of this class in most common use in the Old Testament and going to the New Testament (1 S 10:5, 1 K 1:9). It accompanied festal processions of pilgrims (Is 30:2). It was used in mourning (Jer 48:9, cf. Mi 9:9), and in the ritual of twelve solemn national occasions. According to Is 55, the feasts of the drunkenards were celebrated by it. It may have been a simple flute, i.e. a mere tube with holes, played by blowing into one end or into a hole in the side. It is possible, on the other hand, that it may have been a reed instrument, either, as the modern oboe, with a double and vibrating tongue, or, as the clarinet, with a single tongue. Neighbouring nations were, we know, familiar with reed pipes, as also were with double flutes, which, for anything we know to the contrary, the chali may have been. On the other hand, the keyed flute is of decidedly later origin, and in the times with which we are dealing the fingers must have done all the work.

(b) The ʿqāl (qolah, rendered uniformly in the AV as 'organ,' an instrument which was not known even in rudimentary form in OT days, seems to have become an obsolescent word even in LXX times, as shown by the variety of renderings which it has there received. The instrument meant known as 'Pan's pipes' (Gr. συριν, Lat. fistula) is perhaps the best conjecture that can be offered.

The mazālēkha (EV flutes) may have been similar; while (d) the sampūm (cf. the Hallicare, sumporn, or sampoyna for 'bagpipes') may well have corresponded to the modern bagpipes, as developed from the double flute. In the modern Levant, the 'chembār' (1 Ct 15:19, 2 Ct 19:2, Ps 58, Ps 98, Ps 44, Ps 114, Ps 115, Ps 55, EV cornet; or, 'the instruments of one man' mentioned in Rev 14:19) are probably best represented by RVm 'sūtra'; see (c) below) was a curved horn of a cow or ram, usually, and till later OT times exclusively, for secular purposes, such as giving signals in war (e.g. Jg 5:29) or to announce important events (e.g. 1 K 14:15). It is still employed by the Jews at solemn festivals. The ḫaṭṣā̀sṭāṭā (see above), the one instrument of which we have an undoubtedly authentic representation, viz. on the Arch of Titus at Rome in front of the table of shewbread—was a long, straight, metal trumpet, used mainly for religious purposes, especially in later times (2 K 12:9, 1 Ch 13:9).

(3) Percussion Instruments.—(a) The ṭ̄aḥērīm, or ṭēmārīm, was a small hand-drum, represented on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. In these instruments, unlike the modern drum, the parchment was probably rigid and thus incased in a tightened or loosened so as to regulate the pitch. (b) ṭōsēlibōn and ʾṭēsēlibōn were cymbals. Two shapes are found in Egypt and Assyria, the one consisting of two plates, placed by being clashed together sideways, the other of two cones with handles at the peak, one cone being brought down on top of the other. (c) ʾmā̀ntim (EV 'castanets', marg. sistrum; 2 S 6:5) were formed of two thin metal plates with holes, through which were passed rods with loose metallic rings at their ends. (d) ṣhālitim in 1 S 18:7 (RVM 'triangles, or three-stringed instruments') has been thought, from the apparent purpose, such as giving signals in war, to be a triangle, but this is quite uncertain. It is more probable that it was a particular kind of sistrum.

MYRA

Gr. sinapi).—The seed of this plant is used proverbially for anything exceedingly small. In this sense it occurs in the Gospels (Mt 17:26 etc.), and in the Talmud (Buxtorf, Lex. s. v. 'Chardal'). Jesus compares the Kingdom of heaven to the mustard seed (Mt 13:31 etc.). The plant intended is the Sinapis nigra (Arab. kharadl), which grows wild in Palestine, and is a familiar sight on the shores of Gennesaret. It is also found under cultivation, and in the gardens it reaches a great size, being often from 10 to 12 feet in height. An annual, growing from seed, it is naturally supplied with other garden herbs. It is an herb from which new shoots spring from the smallest seed, it quite outgrows. It bears a profusion of minute seeds, of which the birds are very fond, setting ('lodging') on the branches as they eat. Although it is not properly a 'tree' (Lk 13:19), it quite accords with Oriental use to describe as such a great plant like this.

MYNDUS was a city in Caria at the extremity of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus lay. It was strong enough to resist an assault of Alexander, but played no great part in history. It is mentioned separately in 1 Mac 15:28 as one of the places to which, in n.c. 139, the Romans sent messages on behalf of the Jews. Hence it is assumed that it was independent of the Carian confederacy; and its native population seems to have descended from one race of the ancient Carians, and to have always maintained its independence against the Cariani.

MYRA was a city of Lycia situated 23 miles from the coast, but the same name is often applied to its harbour of Andirica. In Greek times Paphus surpassed it, but

Constantine consisted a myrrh, "the mysterious" in Christian Latin became mystery, and thus passed into modern languages. The kindred mystic and mystagogue, imported directly from the Greek, point to the primary significance of this word. In 6 NT passages the Latin Vulgate replaced mystery with the alien rendering sacramentum (the soldier's oath of allegiance), which has taken on, with modifications, the meaning of the original.

In common parlance, 'mystery' has become synonymous with 'secret' (a usage peculiar to the LXX in extant Greek; see Sir 22:22, 1 Mc 18:3 etc.), signifying a baffling, recondite secret. Divine doctrines or dealings of Providence are said to be 'mysterious' when we fail to reconcile them with accepted principles, though presuming the reconciliation abstractly possible. Primarily, however, the NT mystery is not something dark and difficult in its nature, but something reserved and hidden of set purpose,—as in Ro 10:6 'the mystery held in silence for eternal ages.' It connotes that which 'we cannot only be impeded by some one already in possession of it, but by mere reason and research which are common to all.'

In its familiar classical use the word amounted almost to a proper name. The Mysteries were representations of sacred observances connected with the worship of certain Hellenic deities (chiefly those representing the primitive nature-powers), which were practised in retreat, and which bound their initiates into a religious confraternity. The higher of these Mysteries conveyed, under their symbolic dress, a connected esoteric doctrine—vague, it may have been, but impressively—bearing on the origin of life, on sin and atonement, and the bliss or woe of man's future state, the basis of the empire. In the course of the seasons, in the conflict of light and darkness, and the yearly parables of the seed-corn and the vine-fruits. The Elean Mysteries, annually celebrated in Attica, attracted visitors from all civilized world, and appear to have exerted a salutary influence on Pagan society. The distinctions of country, rank, or sex were no bar to participation; only slaves and criminals were excluded.

It is not clear when the use of the word was first recognized as a name of a host of Mysteries, many of them of a passionate and even frantic, some of a disgraceful character, which were rife in the Greco-Roman world at the Christian era; they formed, in the words of St. Renan, 'the serious part of Pagan religion.' The Greek Mysteries were already rivalled in popularity by the Egyptian cults of Isis and Serapis, and subsequently by the Persian Mithraism, which spread in the 3rd cent. to the bounds of the Empire. These associations supplied what was lacking in the civic and family worship of ancient mystery,—viz. emotion, edification, and moral fellowship.

The term 'mystery,' with its allied expressions in the NT, must be read in the light of these institutions, which preoccupied the ground and were known wherever the Greek language was current. Christianity found its closest points of contact with Paganism, and the competition most dangerous to it, in 'the Mysteries'; its phraseology and customs—in the case of the Sacraments, possibly, its doctrinal conceptions as these took shape during the first five centuries—bear the mark of their influence. This influence betrays itself first in the Apocrypha, when the writer of Wisdom speaks in 22:2 of 'mysteries of God' hidden from the unwise, and which are victorious; and, like the Apostle Paul, promises to disclose the 'mysteries' of Divine wisdom (6:9) to his readers; in 14:10, the Gentile 'mysteries and initiatory rites' are mentioned with abhorrence. The NT affords 27 (or including the dubious readings of 1 Co 12) 27 examples of the word, 3 of these in Mt 13:3 and the Synoptic parallels, 4 in Rev. 19:10 17:7, the other 18 (or 21) in Paul; of the latter, 10 belong to Eph. and Col., (5 or 6) to 1 Cor.

The NT usages are distinguished as they are wider or narrower in application: (1) In Rev 10, 'the mystery of God' covers the entire process of revelation; in 1 Ti 3:16 'the mystery of godliness,' and 1 Co 12:1 'the wisdom of God' in an ambiguous sense. (2) Infernal manifestation hidden up to this epoch in the womb of time (Ro 16:19), which is summed up by Col 2:2 as 'the mystery of God, even Christ.' 'The mystery of lawlessness' (2 Th 2), culminating in the 'coronation' of Antichrist, presents the counterpart of the Divine mystery in the realm of evil.

Or (2) 'the mystery' consists in some specific revelation, some previously veiled design of God—as in the Synoptic parallels (or 1 Cor. 12:2).
befallen Israel.' The Institution of marriage viewed as prophetic of the union between Christ and the Church (Eph 5:22), and the bodily transformation of the saints at the Second Advent (1 Co 15:51), are Divine secrets now disclosed; they mark respectively the beginning and the end of revelation. These and such matters constitute the 'mysteries' of which the Apostle is 'steward' (1 Co 4:1), which enlightened Christians 'know' (1 Co 13) and dwell upon in hours of rapture (14). According to the Synoptics, our Lord speaks of His parables as containing, in a similar sense, "the mysteries of the kingdom" (Mt 13 etc.).

(3) Rev 1st and 17. A few examples of a narrower reference in the term: 'the seven stars' and 'the harlot woman' are mystical symbols, patent to those who are "in the Spirit," of great realities operative in the kingdom of God and of Satan.

This analysis brings out certain essential differences between the Christian and non-Christian employment of the word in question. In the first place, the new 'mysteries' are no human performances, ritual or doctrinal; they are 'Divine communications' embodied in Christ and His redemption, which God's stewards are commissioned to impart. In the second place, they need no comment—"revelation" becomes correlative terms. These are not secrets reserved for and guarded in silence by the few; 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' long concealed from all, is now thrown open to all—'hidden from the ages and generations,' but to-day 'preached to the nations.'

Most emphatic is St. Paul's insistence on the frankness of the gospel revelation; most earnest his denunciation of any sectarian doctrine, such as the vendors of foreign 'mysteries' commonly professed. Nothing but moral insensibility or the false pride of the world's wisdom, he asserts, bars any man from receiving his gospel—it is 'hid amongst the perishing, those whose thoughts the god of this world blinded' (2 Co 4:4; cf. 1 Co 2, Lk 10). The communication of the gospel mystery is limited by the receptivity of the hearer, not the reserve of the speaker: addressed to all men, it is 'worthy of all acceptance' (1 Ti 15 2; cf. Ro 1, Ac 2, Col 1). 'The mystery of iniquity' (2 Th 2) and that of Israel's 'hardening' (Ro 11), however, still await solution; these will be disclosed before 'the mystery of God is finished' (Rev 10).

Several other NT words had been associated in Greek usage, more or less definitely, with the Mysteries: illumination (2 Co 4, Eph 1, He 6 etc.); seal (2 Co 1, Eph 11, Rev 7 etc.); perfect (soil, initiated; 1 Co 2, Ph 3 etc.); 'I have learnt the secret' ('have been initiated,' Ph 4); and the original (cognate) words for 'behold' and 'eye-witnesses' in 1 P 2, 2 P 14. The association is unmistakable, and the allusion highly probable, in the last two, as well as in the other instances. In these Petrine passages the thought of the spectators being favoured with the sight of a holy secret was, seemingly, in the writer's mind.

G. G. FINDLAY.

NAAMAH.—1. Sister of Tubal-cain (Gn 4:21). 2. Mother of Rehoobam (1 K 14:17, 2 Ch 12:15). 3. A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15:7-8). There is no notice of it elsewhere. Zophar the Naamathite is mentioned in Job (23 etc.), but there is nothing to connect him with this town. Possibly we may identify Naamah with Naueh, a small mud village on low ground 6 miles south of Ludd (Lydda).

NAAMAN (the word means 'pleasantness,' or, as an epithet, as is probable, of Adonias or Tammuz, 'darling'; cf. the Syrian plantations referred to in 17th etc.). The Arabs of the present day still call the red anemone, which blooms in the spring, at the time at which one of the Adonis festivals used to be held, the 'wounds of the darling; the name of the flower probably comes from 'Naaman'; see W. R. Smith in the English Historical Review, April 1887.—1. One of the sons of Benjamin (Gn 46:21), though in Nu 26:1 and 1 Ch 8:4 he is referred to as Benjamin's grandson; in Nu 26 the 'family of the Naamites' is spoken of, they therefore probably formed a clan belonging to the tribe of Benjamin.

2. A Syrian general who came to Elisha to be healed of leprosy. The story is told in 2 K 5, where it appears in entire independence of the context. Through an Israelite slave-girl Naaman hears of the man of God who works miracles, and in the hope of being cured of his leprosy he comes to Elisha; it is, however, noteworthy that he comes to Elisha's request (v.4) in order that he may learn that 'there is a prophet in Israel.' On his arrival Naaman receives a message to the effect that he is to wash in the river Jordan seven times, and his objection that the prophet ought to work the miracle in the name of the Lord his God seems very justifiable; upon the advice, however, of his servants he dips himself seven times in the Jordan, and is healed. His first words to the prophet, thereupon, are, 'Behold now, I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel.' On Elisha's refusing the gift offered to him, Naaman asks for two mules' burden of Israelish soil upon which to worship the God of Israel; this in entire accordance with the ideas of the time that a god of a country cannot be worshipped properly excepting upon his own soil (cf. 1 S 26:29). Quite natural, too, according to the beliefs of the time, is his wish to bow down in the house of Rimmon for apart from the necessity of this on account of his attendance on the king, there is the fact that religious syncretism was considered not only permissible, but, under various circumstances, commendable. [For the unworthy conduct of the prophet's servant Gehazi, and the punishment inflicted on him, see Gehazi.] W. E. ODEBERY.

NAAMITITES.—See Naaman, 1.

NAARAH ('girl').—1. One of the wives of Ashshur the 'father' of Tekoa (1 Ch 4:14). 2. A town his possession (Jos 16:7; called in 1 Ch 7:21 Naaran). It is perhaps the ruin el-'Aueh, 6 miles N. of Jericho.

NAARAL.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11). In the parallel passage, 2 S 23, the name is Paarali, who is called 'the Arbile.' It is impossible to decide with any certainty between the rival readings.

NAATHUS (1 Es 9:2) = Ezr 10:6 Adna.

NABAL.—A wealthy but churlish sheep-owner 'in Maon, whose business was in Carmel' (1 S 25:5 RVm). David, while living as an outlaw and freebooter, demanded at Nabal's sheep-parching his reward for defending his flocks (1 S 25:5). Nabal, inflamed with wine, returned an insolent answer, and David was prevented from wreaking terrible vengeance only by the timely arrival of Abigail, Nabal's wife, with large gifts and abundant flattery. The word Nabal means 'fool' and Abigail, with wisely candour, says to David, 'Your soul his name and fool is he.' The next day Nabal was informed of all that had happened, and the shock of discovery brought on an apoplectic seizure, which caused his death. Abigail then became David's wife.

NAHAR.—1. A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36:20, 1 Ch 19:1). 2. Grandson of the preceding and brother of Abraham and Haran (Gn 11:28-31, cf. verse 24). In Gn 24:10 we read of 'the city of Nahor i.e., Haran, where Rebekah was found.' Laban, making a covenant with Jacob, swears, 'by the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor' (Gn 31:42). The sons ascribed to Nahor (Ruz, Us, Aram, etc.) are for the most part names of tribes. It has been questioned if Nahor is a historical character at all. Some think we have, instead, the name of a lost tribe once resident in the neighbourhood of Haran, from which the Aramean tribes were descended. While Abraham appears as the common ancestor of the Israelites and Edomites, Nahor is represented as the father of the Arameans.

W. F. BOYD.

NAHASHON. — Brother-in-law of Aaron (Ex 6:22) descendant in the 8th generation from Judah (1 Ch 2:24) and prince of the tribe of Judah (Nu 1:47). He is mentioned as one of the ancestors of David (Ru 4:20, 1 Ch 2:24), and of Christ (Mt 1:14, Lk 3:32).

NAHUM. — 1. The Man. — The word Nahum means 'full of comfort' and is probably a contraction of a longer Heb. term meaning 'God is a comforter.' Or the man so named nothing is certainly known. He is called 'the Elkoshite,' but the exact meaning of the term cannot at present be determined. It is made in the Targum a kind of patronymic, recording the assumed descent of the prophet from an unknown ancestor Koashi. It is more likely to preserve the name of the prophet's birthplace or place of residence, of which the identification is still lacking. Three or four conjectures have been made.

(1) The prophet's tomb is shown at Elkosh, 24 miles to the N. of Nineveh; and accordingly he is said to have lived there, a descendant of a member of the ten tribes who were deported in n.c. 721. But the tradition that buries Nahum there is not met with before the 16th cent., and is sufficiently accounted for by the interest in the city shown by the prophet.

(2) Copernamum is really a transliteration of Heb. words which mean 'village of Nahum.' But a Gallican origin for our prophet is unlikely (Jn 17:2), and is not supported by any allusions in the prophecy.

(3) The same objection appears to Jerome's Identification of Elkosh with a village Elkosh in N. Galilee, which on other grounds is precarious.

(4) The most probable tradition associates Nahum with Elkosh 'of the tribe of Simeon,' and locates the hamlet near Beth-Gabro, the modern Beth-Harim, about half-way between Jerusalem and Gaza. The transliteration 'can' is a Syriac version of the biographies of the prophets, ascribed to Ephraimias, bishop of Palmyra in Syria towards the end of the 4th cent., but probably of much earlier date.

II. THE BOOK. — 1. Analysis of contents. — In the analysis of the book, a line of division can be best drawn at the close of 28. The latter section is the actual prophecy or oracle. It is preceded by a psalm or psalm consisting of two parts, of which the one is general in its assertion of God's universal judgment, the other particular in its specific messages to Judah and to Assyria. Jehovah as the jealous Avenger is the opening theme. This fact holds good of His administration (1); and as He passes on to the overthrow of the wicked, physical proofs of His power become evident everywhere (1). Tendencies towards those who wait upon Him, but an overwhelming flood upon His enemies (1'-10), are the two great characteristics of His rule. 'What think ye of Jehovah?' (1, where R.V. does not preserve the sequence of thought) is the point of passage to the section dealing with His particular acts, in which section either the text is corrupt through the displacement of some of the verses, or the two messages, of deliverance to Judah (12, 14 20) and of vengeance upon Israel (111, 14 29), were meant to be entangled in repeated antitheses. Already the bearer of the good news is speeding over the hills (11, cf. Is 59, Ro 94).

The oracle proper consists also of two sections, corresponding with the division into chapters. The second chapter is a swift and vivid description of the siege of Nineveh, its capture and sack, with the complete desolation that accompanied it. A second oracle is contained in the third chapter, which there is no need to regard as composed of several prophecies, but of which the unity in theme and sequence of thought is most conspicuous. The mention of the city of blood, full of lies and rapine, is followed by one of the most vivid battle-pictures in Heb. literature (31). The cause of destruction is to be found in the diplomatic betrayal of the enemy nations and races had been fixed and sold; and so richly merited will be the woe, that none will be left or disposed to pity or remorse Nineveh (37). The analogy of No-amon (Thebes) makes it certain that a similar fate is awaiting Assyrian city (38). Her outposts and defences are already falling before the invader, just as the first-rife figs fall at the mere shaking of a fig-tree; and her people have become women (39). The time to prepare for the siege is past, adds the prophet, with his sarcastic appeal, 'Tread the mortar, lay hold of the brick-mould.' The swelling merchants, the 'crowned ones' (floating foreign population, according to Wellhausen; more probably the princes and prosperous men, cf. Is 10), the 'maraeals' or high officials, are like locusts or grasshoppers, that camp in the hedges and walls, but vanish with the sunshine. Finally, the prophet addresses the king himself; and in the view of the destruction of the city proclaims her disappearance from history amidst the joy of all who had suffered under her tyranny: 'There is no assuaging of thy hurt ... all that the fruit of thy clap the hands over their heads."

2. Authenticity of the first chapter.—That Nahum was the author of the two oracles is hardly open to question, but of late years some doubt has been thrown upon the authenticity of the prophecy. Against Nahum's authorship the plea is of a technical character, that the first chapter is really, in Heb., an alphabetic poem, and that its right metrical division yields, with a few alterations and transpositions, a series of stanzas, of which the first words commence with the letters of the Heb. alphabet in order. This plea is followed by the statement that such a literary form points to a late origin; and consequently the prophecy is held to have been composed or constructed in the post-exilic period, and prefixed as an appropriate introduction to the oracle of Nahum on account of its expression of the general principle of God's avenging justice, of which the drama of Nineveh was supposed to afford a striking illustration.

On the other side, the re-arrangements necessary to restore an alphabetical form are difficult, though perhaps not impossible as far as II, after which resort has to be had to processes that are scientifically indefensible. The order of the verses and of the words within the verses has to be altered, words are omitted or intro-duced with freedom, and on the whole A. B. Davidson's verdict stands—that the attempt to restore the alphabetical form 'can never be more than an academical exercise.' Even if an alphabetical form be conceded, a necessary element of date cannot be successfully inferred. Instances of the use of the same form occur, e.g., in Ps 90, where the tone and teaching are distinctly pre-exilic; and history would allow of the appearance of such a form, or at least of tentative efforts at its construction, in a comparatively early period in the development of a literature. The language and atmosphere of the prologue are those of the succeeding oracles. Alleged parallels with the post-exilic psalms are in reality parasitic on earlier writings, and grossly possible in both Nahum and the writers of the psalms in question with their common phrases. Vividness and force, severity towards sin, fervent confidence in God, are features of all three chapters, which are further knotted together by their theme, the first setting up God's throne of judgment and announcing His sentence on Nineveh, the others portraying the execution of that sentence. And the attempts to destroy the unity which they have been and full of valuable contributions to its exegesis and to Biblical science generally, must be regarded as having so far failed.

3. Date.—The question of the authenticity of the first chapter does not seriously affect the further question of the date at which Nahum composed the two oracles by general consent ascribed to him. Two signs by general consent ascribed to him. Two signs of Assyrian weakness were multiplying, and the outlying parts of the empire had already recovered their independence or been appropriated by other powers. At a later date the language of a prophet in Judah would be likely to be affected by the Deuteronomistic style, of which there are no traces in Nahum; an earlier date would fail to supply the historical conditions, which are always an essential feature of Jewish prophecy. About 622 or 624 Nahum would need no great discernment to see the approaching fall of Assyria, and in the equipment and quick movements of the Medes and Scythians he would find the imagery which he used to so good effect in his oracles.

4. Literary character and religious value.—Picturesqueness and force have been described as the most prominent characteristics of Nahum's poetry. Compact thought, vivid description (3, 4, 38), effective imagery (21, 31) separate him sufficiently from the prophets of the Chaldean period, and give him a position not far behind that of Isaiah. Obscurity is sometimes met with (e.g. 11, 28), but the cause is probably quite often the high specific gravity of the sentence as an error in transcription. Findlay says (Books of the Prophets, II. 101) that Nahum is neglected by the Bible-reader, as though the story of Nineveh had little connexion with the progress of the Kingdom of God, and were merely a complete and isolated fact of the past with no relation to present needs. Yet if Nahum is such a pious teacher like Micaiah or Isaiah, he reveals the truth of God's moral government of the world, concentrating the light upon a single typical instance; and he does not fail to detect confidence in God as the Avenger of wrongs and the protector of the right, and to deduce the defence of those who love Him. Where he differs chiefly from the other prophets is in the complete outwardness of his gaze. He has no eye for the shortcoming or sin of Judah, and no revelation to make of the inner history or moral character of the generation. In this respect he contrasts especially with his contemporary Zephaniah, who also looked for the collapse of the Assyrian kingdom, but saw chiefly the contrast with modern Gentile conditions, and clearly recognized the truth of God's moral government of the world.

NAME, NAMES

The word 'name' is properly a noun, i.e., as Jg 4:6 R.V. and as 1690 'The name' of the prophets, Her David lived after Samuel had attacked him with a javelin; hither Saul pursued him, and was seized with an ecstatic fit of some kind (1 S 19:3-8). Nothing is known of the situation of the place. It is not even absolutely certain that Naioth is a proper name; but opinions differ respecting its possible meaning.

NAME, NAMES.—I. The names of God.—See God, p. 250 ff.

1. Personal names.—From the earliest times the names given to a child was supposed to indicate some characteristic of the person; of the circumstances, trivial or momentous, connected with his or her birth; of the hopes, beliefs, or feelings of the parents, This is evident from the etymologies (e.g. Gn 21:6, 27a, Ex 21:1, 1 S 2:29, etc.), never always reliable, but testifying to the impression that name and facts should correspond. There are many instances of the persons of the present day taking as their name that of their ancestor. Thus the idea. For instance, there is the frequency of names denoting personal qualities, Adin, Amos, Jaddus, Korah, Solomon, etc.; or pointing to occupations, Ass, Bethserah, etc. Again, an Ishmael (2 G. 2:8) is quite ready to bestow symbolic names on his children; a Jeremiah (39:3) predicts the change from Pashhur to Magor-missabib, because the latter will more accurately correspond to the surrounding; and the same prophet sums up all his hopes for the future in the title which he bestows on the Mesolithic King and the holy city (39:33); cf. Rev 2:12). The new name promised to the faithful (Rev 2:22) corresponds to the fresh glory bestowed on him, which covers each recipient and is known only to himself (Rev 14:1).

Analogous convulsions prevailed among other Eastern nations. Nomen et omen was an influential conception. When a name was wanted to mark a change, Mohammed disqualified one applicant after another till a man came whose name meant 'Long Life'; if one of his converts was called Ro'ah, he called him 'Smooth'; he was even guided in his choice by the names of the places en route (Marjolich, Mohammd, p. 61 ff.).

Generally the name was fixed immediately after birth, as it still is with the Arabs. The mother usually exercised this privilege (Gn 4:19, 29; 30:1, 1 M 1:14, 19; 7:1), sometimes the father (Gn 4:16, 1 S 21:1, 1 Ex 2:2, 2:2), Occasionally other interested persons (Rv 4, 1 K 1:7). Some names were bestowed indiscreetly on men and women: Abihah, (1 K 24, 1 Ch 24); Abibbath (Nu 3, 1 Ch 24); Zibib (2 K 12, 1 Ch 8).

Beginning at a fairly early date, there are a moderate number of names derived from the vegetable world: Blah ('terebinth'), Zaph ('cedar'), Tamar ('palm-tree'), etc. The majority, however, belong to more recent documents: Asnah ('bramble'), Coz ('thorn'), Hadassah ('myrtle'), Susannah ('lily'), Shamir ('thorn'), etc. Other natural objects are also drawn upon: Goshen ('rain'), Barak ('lightning'), etc.; curiously enough, Jerah ('autumn-rain'), Ez (35) is identical with Hariph ('autumn'. Neh 7:4). A few, of peculiar difficulty, point to family relationships: Abah = 'father's brother,' but the question is whether it signifies 'uncle' or whether it is an indication that the child closely resembles his father, in which case it is to be as a brother to him. Abihan = 'brother is son.' Ahiam = 'a maternal uncle,' belong to this class. But Moses, if, as is most probable, of Egyptian origin and signifying 'son,' is a shortened form of a theophoric name: cf. Moses, ad innit. acertistic of the Semite races than of ours, and this is especially true of the Israelites all through their national life, though many of their names found in the OT are old heathen associations: Anath (transferred to a man from a well-known goddess worshipped in Syria, etc.), Abisha kar (a. i. 'Dawn') is brother'), Boaz (1 Ch 3:2) Balak (Balah), Balak-dor (Balak's son, of [the god] Edom), Reu and Reuel (Gen 11:24, Ex 28:19). Among the earliest clan names are those of animals: Rachel (ewe'), Haran (ass'), Caleb (dog'), etc. This may well be a survival from a prehistoric age of totemism. In David's day we find individuals, possibly members of such clans, called Eglah ('calf'), Laieth ('lion'), Bechi (from heher, 'a young camel'). And the first record of such words of clan origin is about the reign of Josiah (Huldah, 'weasel'), Shephaniah, 'rock-badger', etc., might be accounted for on the supposition that animal-worship had considerable vogue during that age of religious syncretism (cf. Ezk 8:16). Names like Hezir ('swine'), Abchar ('monse'), Parosh ('lion') favour this explanation. At the same time, it must be admitted that animal-names were in many instances bestowed as terms of endearment, or as expressions of a wish that the child might have swiftness, strength, gracefulness, or whatever might be the creature's peculiar quality.

There is an important class of compounds in which relationship—originally conceived as physical—with the god of the nation or clan is asserted: Amminadab ('idumian is El'), Abijah ('father is Jah'), Ahijah ('brother is Jah'). These compounds ceased to be formed long before the Exile, owing, no doubt, to the sense that they infringed on the Divine dignity. Others now appear, containing an element which referred to the Divine sovereignty: Adonijah ('Jah is lord, like the Most High'), Adonathathmehun, ('Jah is king'), Baaleth ('Jah is baal' or 'lord'). Turning now to the two great groups in which El or Jehovah forms part of the name, it is to be noted that the former has been in the run of popularity, but in the Exile, Jah, Je, or Jeho is more common. From the 7th cent. B.C. onwards El is seen to be recovering its ground. Altogether there are 153 names in El, and, according to Gray (JPN, p. 368), 157 in one of the N.T. The nations which were related to the Hebrews acknowledged or invoked their gods in the same fashion: Babylonian and Assyrian proper names containing the element Baal, Assur, Nebo, Merodach, etc.; Phoenician having Ashorth, Bel, Asshur, Neb, Merodach, etc.; Aramic Hadad, Rimmon, etc.; Palmyrene, Sabean, and Nabataean exhibit the same features.

Special mention ought perhaps to be made of the curious words found in the Books of Chronicles. Ewald observes that they remind us of the nomenclature affected by the English Puritans of the 17th century. They were meant to express the religious sentiments of the Chronicler and those like-minded. Thus we have Jashub-jebed ('kindness is required'), Tob-adorjam ('good is the Lord Jahweh'), Elozonat ('to Jahweh are mine eyes'), Hazzelepin ('Give shade, Thou who turnest to me'; cf. the Assyr., Pâne-asar, i. 'I look to Bel') and Pân-Asiah-tâmrû ('I will look to Asshur'). But the climax is reached in 1 Ch 25, where, with very slight alteration, the list which begins with Hananath reda, 'A crown of grace unto me, Jahweh!' Be gracious unto me! Thou art my God! Thou hast given me and exhorted him to who to sit in hardship. Thou hast given judgments in multitudes and abundance.' These phrases differ from the Shem-jashub and Mahesh- shalat-hash-baz of Isaiah, in that the latter were formed for the express purpose of symbolic prediction. We have, however, something resembling them in other late documents. P gives us Bezold ('in the shadow of God'); cf. Heb. Ina-sîli-Bîl, 'under the protection of Bel', i.e., Baal; I. and LXX, 'in the presence of God'; cf. Heb. Sha-baz ('thou Belongest to Bel'), Nu 33, And Neh 3 'has Bezalel (in the counsel of God').

From about the close of the 4th cent. B.C. it was a common practice to add children after their relatives (Lk 1:14). When we read such a list as this: Hêlel, Simon, Gamaliel, Simon, Gamaliel, Simon, Judah, Gamaliel, Judah, we get the impression that the grandfather's name was more often adopted than the father's (cf. To 1, Lk 1:14; Jos. Ant. xiv. i. 8, B. v. xii. 21). To the same period belong the Aramaic names Martha, Tabitha, Meshesabt (Bab. Mushebût-bibh), and those with the prefixed same signs. These names are accounted for as derived either from Hebrew or Aramaic, or from some other unknown source. There is no evidence to prove that they were in any way used in the NT.

Foreign names abound in Josephus, the Apocrypha, and the NT. In some instances a person has two separate designations: Alcimus, Jacimus; John, Gaddas; Diadotus, Tryphon, etc. Skal, who is said in -ai (Ac 13:1), is a typical case. In some, of the Hebrews, the prefixed same signs obscure the second choice; in others there is an obvious similarity of sound or meaning. Double names were now frequent: Judas Maccanabas, Simon Zeodes, etc. Non-Hebrew names were substituted for Jewish: Jason for Jesus; Simon for Simon (Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 315, note).

After the birth of a son an Arab father will adopt an honorific name (kunya). If he had been called aldallah, he is henceforth Abu Omar, or the like. There is no trace of this custom in Heb. family life, but the idea of a distinguishing and honourable surname is not altogether a late invention. Selah is 44th, Job 32:23, and some of the local double names. It is also possible that the Heb. original of Sir 47:1 signifies I gave him the surname Birthright. And the sense of Sir 47:1 is They gave him the lord...', which is the general view in the T. O. and T. N.

3. Place Names.—The majority of these were doubtless fixed by the tribes whom the Hebrews dispossessed. From their great antiquity and the alterations to which they have been subjected, not from David until the time of the Exile, it is difficult to determine the meaning. Many places, however, got their designation from a salient natural feature, a well (beer), a fountain (en, in En-gedi), a meadow (ebel), a vineyard (karmel), woods (jearim), in Kirath-jearim, a hill (Gibeon, Gibea, Ramah), etc. Of the fifty-three names of animals in Gray's list (pp. 88-96), twenty-four are applied to towns or districts. On the toponymy theory this would mean that the clan bestowed the name of its totem-animal on the place of its abode. Other names evidently imply the existence of local sanctuaries, some of which must have been pre-Israelite: Beth-anath, Anathoth, Bethel, Gilgal, Kedesh-naphthali, Migdal-d, Migdal-padd, Nedd, Penue, Beth-sheanuch, Alcimus, Ammian, Caesarea, Capernaum, Capernaum, B-hez, B-hazor, B-meon, B-paruzal, B-sha teha, B-tamar. One, Baal-judah (the correct reading of 2 S 6:1; cf. 1 Ch 13:18), is clearly of Heb. origin. Baal here being a name for Jahweh. Special interest attaches to the names of two clans in the S. and centre of Palestine, Jacob-d, and Joseph-d, mentioned by Thothmes iii. (c. 1500 n.c.) in his inscriptions at Thebes. Corresponding with these forms are Israel, Jeshua-Sim, Jeshua, Japheth, Japheth, Jokhaz, Jokhaz, in the OT. The naming of the local deity, Invoked (Gray, p. 214 ff.), or declared to have conferred some boon on his worshippers (Meyer, LATW, 1886, p. 5).
NARCISSUS

Syria, Persia, Armenia, and other parts of Asia. By the Greeks this goddess was identified sometimes with Artemis, sometimes with Aphrodite. She seems to have represented the productive powers of nature. In 2 Mac 11:17 we have a legendary account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is said to have attempted to plunder a temple of Nanaea in Persia, and to have been treacherously killed in the temple by the priests.

NAOMI.—The wife of Elimelech, the Ephrathite, of Beth-lehem-judah, who was driven by famine into the land of Moab. After the death of her husband and her two sons, she returned, accompanied by Ruth, to her own land. P ascribes to her a matter of surprise to the people of Bethlem, and they said, 'Is this Naomi?' Her answer included a double play of words on her own name, 'Call me not Naomi ('pleasant'); call me Mara ('hateful'): for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me... why call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath tested (anad) against me?' (Ru 1:18).

NAPHISH.—A son of Ishmael (Gen 25:3 = 1 Ch 1:1). In all probability it is his descendant who are mentioned in Ezr 2:24 as 'the children of Nophish' (RV) or Nepushim (AV and RVm). In the parallel lists (Neh 7:52 the reading is Nepushim. R Vm) Nepushim (AV and RV). The reading in 1 Es 5:4 is Nepish.

NAPHTALL.—The second son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, and the sixth son of Jacob (Gen 30:14 [J]). The tradition connects the story in a vague way with the word 'twist, wrestle': Naphtali 'elothm naphthali—Wrestlings of God (or mighty wrestlings)'.—I have wrestled with my brother and I have prevailed,' Rachel exclaimed when Naphtali was born, 'and she called his name Naphtali.'

The information which we have of Naphtali is very meagre. It is ascribed to him four sons when Jacob and his family entered Egypt (Gen 46:29). These four have developed into 'families' at the time of the Exodus, and their number is given as 55,400 in the Sinai census (Nu 1:15). At Moab, however, they had decreased to 45,000 (26:4). None of these clan-names given here, except Guni, appears again outside of the genealogy repeated in 1 Ch 2:12. In the march through the desert Naphtali formed with Dan and Asher the 'camp of Dan,' which constituted a total of 157,000 men of war.

While the genealogical lists cannot be relied on, there is an apparent reason for linking together Dan and Naphtali. But that they are both traced to Bilhah indicates that they were tribes of minor importance, inferior in strength, and of less consequence in the national development at the time when these relationships were created, than the tribes which sprang from Rachel.

Naphtali was the sixth in order to receive its lot (Jos 19:34). It is somewhat more definitely defined than the others, though few of the places mentioned can be identified. No fewer than nineteen cities are said to lie within its territory, the most of which are not found again in the OT, doubtless because the history of Israel was wrought out mainly in the regions to the south. The territory reached on the north almost to the Lebanon. Southward it extended along the Jordan until it reached the point below the Sea of Galilee where the Wady el-Bireh joins the Jordan. The greater part lay to the north-west of the Sea, and in this direction (N. and W.) its boundaries appear to have been shifting. 'Ancient and modern writers' (c2 Mac 2:4 = 1 Ch 2:25) 'vie with one another in praising the soil and climate of the territory owned by Naphtali: it was abundantly irrigated; and its productions rich and varied. Lower Galilee was, however, yet more fertile and beautiful than Upper Galilee. The vegetation in the neighbourhood of the lake is semi-tropical.' Modern writers join with Josephus in praising it, and Neubauer (Geog. du Pal. p. 180) quotes a saying from the Talmud: 'It is easier to raise a legion of olive-trees in Galilee than finding up one in Naphtali. But why? Because that Naphtali is 'like a hind let loose' (Gen 49:23, if this be the correct translation; see the Comm.). Besides these advantages, it was fortunate in location in times of peace. Roads ran in every direction, connecting it with the outer world.

The heroism and warlike daring of the tribe is sung in Jg 5. In that decisive struggle with the Canaanites when the tribe wrote its name on fame, and took Jabin, and Abi-el-macacca and Janos, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilael, and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and he carried them captive to Assyria' (2 K 15:17), See also Tribes.

NAPHTUHIM.—Fourth son of Miriam (Gen 10:5, 1 Ch 1:4). Many suggestions have been made to account for the name, which does not appear exactly in Egyptian or Assyrian inscriptions, but in Ashurbanipal's Insula (col. 1st. 2nd) a district named, probably in Lower Egypt, occurs, which may be the same. An Egyptian n-idhu, 'the marshes,' used in contrast to Pashros, may be intended; but the discovery of Caphor, so long a puzzle, may warn us to wait for further evidence.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

NAPKIN (soudarion).—The cloth in which the unprofitable servant wrapped the money of his lord (Lk 19:21); used to bind the face of the dead (2 K 11:20); carried, possibly as indicated by the name (Lat. sudarium), to wipe off perspiration (Ac 19:2). The Arabic renders mandil, which may be either 'towel,' 'napkin,' 'veil,' or 'head-band.' See also Dress, §§ 5 (a), 8.

W. EWING.

NARCISSUS.—St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans (ch. 16th) salutes, among others, 'them that be of the household of Narcissus that are in the Lord.' The name was not uncommon, but many have identified the person mentioned here with the secretary of the Emperor Claudius. Dier, put to death by Agrippina to bring first year of Nero's reign, about three years before this Epistle was written. According to the custom of those times, the household of the freedman of Claudius would pass into the possession of Nero, retaining the name of their “nations,” and it might have advantage with have carried out the change consistently.

The Heb. (go' or Greek (ethnos) words denote invariably a nation or a people, never a person. Where in the AV (only NT) we find “Gentile” in the singular (Ro 2:11) the RV has “Greece,” following the original. The singular “nation” stands for “Israel,” though we have a few exceptions, as in Ex 9:6 (of Egypt), Fr 14:4 (general), and Mt 21:11. It is often applied to Israel and Judah when there is an implication of disobedience to God, sinfulness and the like: see Dt 32, Jg 6:13, Is 1:1 etc. This shade of meaning became very common in the later writings of the OT. Quite early in Israelite history the singular as a term for Israel was discarded for the word translated “people” (‘am), so that ‘am (“people”) and go' (“nation”) came to be almost antithetical terms “Israelites” and “non-Israelites,” as in Rabbinical Hebrew. For the reason of the change in the use of go' (‘nation”), see below.

In the AV ‘Gentiles’ often corresponds to ‘Greeks’ in the original, as in Jn 7:50, Ro 8 etc. In the RV the word ‘Greeks’ is usually substituted, though the sense is the same, for to the Jews of the time Greek culture and religion stood for the culture and religion of the non-Jewish world.

The two words (Heb. and Greek) translated ‘nation’ have their original and literal sense in many parts of the OT and NT, as in Gn 10:18 etc., Is 2:1 (Mic 4:2), Job 12:24, Ac 17:2, Gal 3:1. In other passages this general meaning is narrowed so as to embrace the descendants of Abraham, e.g. in Gn 17:5, 24:6, where it is the plural that is used. But in the most frequent, standing almost invariably for non-Israelite nations, generally with the added notion of their being idolatrous and immoral: see Ex 23:12, Lv 26:14, Dt 11:13, and often. These are contrasted with Israel “the people of Jehovah” in 2 S 22:1, 1 Ch 11:2 etc.

This contrast between Israel (united or divided into the kingdoms of Israel and Judah) as Jehovah’s people, and all the rest of the human race designated ‘nations,’ runs right through the OT. Such a conception could have arisen only after the Israelites had developed the consciousness of national unity. At first, even among the Israelites, each nation was thought to be justified in worshipping its deity (see Dt 3:9, 1 K 8, Is 19 etc.). As long as this idea prevailed there could be no necessary antagonism between Israelites and foreign nations, except that which was national, for the nation’s god was identified with the national interests. But when the belief in Jehovah’s absolute and exclusive claims possessed the mind of Israel, and was shared by the time of the earliest literary prophets (Am 3:1, Mic 7:4 etc.), the nations came to be regarded as worshippers of idols (Lv 18:12), and in Ps 4:3-7 (cf. Ezk 7:22, 2 K 16:9, Ahaz and Assyria against Israel and Syria), and by the needs of commerce (see Ezk 27:21 [Tyre], 1 Ga 10:19 etc.).

The reforms instituted by King Josiah in the Southern Kingdom (2 K 23:24), based upon the Deuteronomic law newly found in the Temple, aimed at stamping out all syncretism in religion and establishing the pure religion of Jehovah. This reformation, as also the Rechabite movement (Jer 35), had a profound influence upon the thoughts and feelings of Jews, widening the gulf between them and alien nations. The teaching of the oldest prophets looked in the same direction (see Am 2:1, 8:1, 5:1-6, Hos 9:17, 14, 2 K 10:17, Jer 35:19, 27 etc.).

But the Deuteronomist (about B.C. 620) made legally obligatory what earlier teachers had inculcated. Israelites were not to marry non-Israelites, nor to have any except unavoidable dealings with them.

The feeling of national exclusiveness and antipathy was intensified by the captivity in Babylon, where the prophetic and priestly teachers of the exiled Jews taught them that their calamities came upon them on account of their disloyalty to His Law and the ordinances of His religion, and because they compromised with idolatrous practices and heathen nations. It was in Babylon that Ezekiel drew up the programme of worship and organization for the nation after the Return. He was not so much stress on the doctrine that Israel was to be a holy people, separated from other nations (see Ezek 40–48). Some time after the Return, Ezra and Nehemiah had to contend with the laxity to which Jews who had remained in the house and others had yielded; but they were uncompromising, and won the battle for nationalism in religion.

Judaism was in even greater danger of being lost in the wave of modern, realistic, and religious and religion soon after the time of Alexander the Great. Indeed, but for the brave Maccabees rising in the earlier half of the 2nd cent. B.C. both the religion and the language of the Jew might, humanly speaking, have perished.

The Apocrypha speaks of the 'nations' just as do the later writings of the OT. They are 'uncircumcised,' 'having sold themselves to do evil' (1 Mc 1:1); they break the Sabbath, offer no sacrifice to Jehovah, eat uncleanness and such as has been offered to idols (2 Mac 5:6, 11, 15f. etc. etc.).

The NT reveals the same attitude towards foreign nations on the part of the Jews (see Ac 10:23 et passim). In Rabbinical writings Jewish exclusiveness manifests itself even more decisively (see Eiseleimenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, vol. I., esp. ch. xvi.). But, as in the OT a broader spirit shows itself constantly, culminating in the universalism of Christianity, so enlightened and broadminded Jews in all ages have deprecated the fanatical race-hatred which many of their compatriots have displayed.

NATURAL.—The contrast between 'natural' (Gr. psychikos) and 'spiritual' (pneumatikos) is drawn out by St. Paul in 1 Cor 15:44–46. The natural body is derived from the first Adam, and is our body in so far as it is accommodated to, and limited by, the needs of the animal side of the human nature. In such a sense it is especially true that 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God' (1 Cor 2:14). Man derives his spiritual life from union with Christ (the last Adam), but his present body is not adapted to the needs of this spiritual existence; hence the distinction made by St. Paul between the natural body (called the 'body of death,' Ro 7:4) and the spiritual body of the resurrection. The transference from the one to the other begins in this life, and the two beings are identical in Christ. In the meantime he possesses an identity, but otherwise owing to the operation of the union with Christ, distinct.

T. A. MOXON

NATURE.—The term 'nature' is not used in the OT, nor was the conception current in Hebrew thought, as God alone is seen in all, through all, and over all. The idea came from the word physis from Hellensim. Swine's flesh is commended for food as a gift of nature in 4 Mac 5:11. In the NT the term is used in various senses: (1) the forces, laws, and order of the world, including man (Ro 1:18–21, 26, Gal 1:4); (2) the inherent sense of propriety or morality (1 Cor 11:24, Ro 2:4); (3) birth or physical origin (Gal 2:20); (4) the sum of characteristics of a species or person, human (Ja 3:19), or Divine (2 Pt 1:10); (5) a condition acquired or inherited (Eph 2:3, 'by nature children of wrath'). What is contrary to nature is condemned. While the term is not found or the conception made explicit in the OT, Schultz (OT Theol. ii. 74) finds in the Law the general rule that nothing is to be permitted contrary to the delicate sense of the inviolable proprieties of nature, and gives a number of instances (Ex 5:19, 34, Lv 22:12, 19, Dt 22:11, Lv 10:18, 19, 21:22, Dt 1:14, 23:). The beauty and the order of the world are recognized as evidences of Divine wisdom and power (Ps 8:18, 33, 39, 90:14, 136:9, 147, Pr 32:12, Jos 38, 39); but the sum of created things is not hypothesis and personified apart from God, as in current modern thinking. God is Creator, Preserver, and Ruler; He makes all (Is 44:24, Art 11, in all (Ps 139). His Immanence is by His Spirit (Ge 1:1). Jesus recognizes God's bounty and care in the flowers of the field and the birds of the air (Mt 6:25); He uses natural processes to illustrate spiritual, in (Ps 104, 105, seed and soil (13:9), and leaven (13:3)). The growth of the seed is also used as an illustration by Paul (1 Co 15:3, 11). There is in the Bible no interest in nature apart from God, and the problem of the relation of God to nature has not yet risen on the horizon of the thought of the writers.

ALFRED E. GARYE

NAUGHT.—'Naught' is 'nothing' (from A.S. na 'not,' and width 'a whit or a thing'). Sometimes the spelling became 'nought' (perhaps under the influence of 'ought'). In the earliest editions of AV there is no difference between 'naught' and 'nought'; but in the ed. of 1638 a difference was introduced, 'naught' being used in 2 K 2:4, Pr 20:14, because there the meaning is 'bad; 'nought' everywhere else, but with the meaning 'worthlessness.' This distinction was preserved by Scrivener, in his Camb. Par. Bible, and is found in modern English Bibles.

'Naughty,' however, is simply 'worthless,' as Jer 24:20 'very naughty figs.' But 'naughtiness' always means 'wickedness,' as Pr 11:10 transgressors shall be taken in their own naughtiness.

NAVY.—See SHIPS AND BOATS, p. 849.

NAZARENE.—A title applied to Christ in Mt 2:23, apparently as a quotation from a prophecy. Its significance is a matter of controversy. Some think the term refers to the meaning of the word, 'an inhabitant of Nazareth,' there may have been, as is often the case in prophetic quotations, a secondary meaning in allusion to the Heb. word nazer, 'a branch,' in which case the reference may have been to the Messianic passage Is 11:1, or possibly the reference may have been to the word nazar, 'to save.' The epithet, applied often in scorn (cf. Jn 1:43), was used of Christ by demons (Mt 14, Lk 4:34), by the people generally (Mt 10:39, Lk 19:9), by the soldiers (Jn 15:7), by the servants (Mt 26:51, Mk 14:44), by Pilate (Jn 19:19), as well as by His own followers on various occasions (Lk 24:47), in an attempt to connect the word with 'Nazarene' is etymologically impossible, and has no meaning as applied to Jesus Christ.

T. A. MOXON

NAZARETH (mod. en-Nasra).—A town in the north border of the Plain of Esdraelon. It was a place of the history (being entirely unmentioned in the OT, Josephus, or the Talmud), no importance, and, possibly, of had reputation (Jn 1:45). Here, however, lived Mary and Joseph. Either, before their marriage, was the angel Gabriel sent to announce the coming birth of Christ (Lk 1:26, and) the Holy Family retired after the flight to Egypt (Mt 2:19). The obscure years of Christ's boyhood were spent there, and in its synagogue He preached the sermon for which He was rejected by His fellow-townsmen (Mt 13:54, Lk 4:31). After this, save as a centre of pilgrimage, Nazareth sank into obscurity. The Crusaders made it a bishopric; it is now the seat of a Turkish lieutenant-governor. Many traditional sites are pointed out to pilgrims and tourists, for not one of which, with the possible exception of the 'Virgin's Well' (which, being the only spring known in the neighbourhood, was improbably that used by the Holy Family), there is any justification.

R. A. S. MACALISTER

is 'the separated,' 'consecrated,' 'devoted.' Joseph is 'the Nazirite,' i.e., the consecrated prince, among his brethren (Gn 46:26); the nobles of Jerusalem bear the same title (La 4:3); the untrimmed vine, whose branches recall the long hair of the Nazirite proper, is named 'the Nazirite' (Lv 21:10). But, above all, the name belongs to a class of persons devoted by a special vow to Jahweh (Am 2:11, Jg 15:7; 16:1, Nu 6, S. 46:3, 1 Mac 5:42). According to Jg 18 and Nu 6, the details of outward observance by the vow-takers were: (1) abstinence from the fruit of the vine, (2) leaving the hair uncut, (3) avoidance of contact with the dead, and (4) of all unclean food. The reason for which the Nazirite was kept from wine or the untrimmed hair was the more important. Am 2:11 mentions only the former. 1 S 11, on the other hand, refers only to the latter (the LXX 'and he shall drink no wine or strong drink' being an interpolation). If we look outside the OT, we see that among the ancients generally the hair was regarded as so important an outcome of the physical life as to be a fit offering to the deity, and a means of initiating or restoring communion with Him. There is evidence for this from Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Greece, Rome, and, in recent times, even among the Maoris. This, then, seems to have been the original observance. If Am 2:11, of course, is interpreted so, the reason the Nazirite was thus kept from wine or the untrimmed hair is plain. The Nazirite vow was originally a life-long obligation. Young and enthusiastic men were moved by the Spirit of God to take it up, as others were inspired to be prophets, and it was an offence against Him to tempt them to break it (Am 2:11). Women were divinely hidden to devote their promised offspring (Jg 13). One of the methods adopted to prevent this was that the women should then be consecrated to this service (1 S 11; it is noteworthy that in the Heb. and Syr. of Str 46:3, Samuel is expressly called a Nazirite). In course of time, however, a great change came over the purpose and spirit of the institution. The vow was now taken, to gain some personal end—protection on a journey, deliverance from sickness, etc. Women, too, became Nazirites. And the restrictions were only for a certain period. Nu 6 represents this stage, but the information which it gives needs supplementing. For instance, it fails to prescribe the manner in which the vow should be entered on. The Talmud asserts that this was done in private, and was binding if one simply said, 'Behold, I am a Nazirite,' or repeated after another, 'I also become one' (Nazir, i, 3, iii. 1, iv. 1). Nu 6 does not determine the length of these temporary vows. Here, again, a rule had to be made, and it was decided that the person himself might fix the period; otherwise, it should be thirty days (Nasir, i, 3, iii. 1; Jus, B. J. ii. x. 4). In case of accidental defilement, the Nazirite had to undergo seven days' purification, cut off his hair on the seventh day and have it buried (Temura, vi. 4), on the eighth day bring two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, one for a sin-, one for a burnt-offering, as well as a lamb for a guilt-offering, and thus begin the course of his vow afresh (cf. Nazir, iii. 6; Jos. Ant. xx. ii. 5). At the expiration of the time he was brought to the door of the sanctuary, with a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, a ram for a peace-offering, ten unleavened cakes and ten unleavened wafers anointed with oil, a meat-offering, and a drink-offering. When the sacrifices had been offered his hair was shaved and he put it in the fire which was under the peace-offering, or under the caldron in which the dough was made, consisting of the sounding shoulder of the ram, a cake, and a wafer. The fat was then salted and burned on the altar, and the breast and the foreleg were eaten by the priest, on whom, after the wafer and the boiled shoulder, the rest of the bread and meat belonged to the offerer (Maimonides, Hilkoth Maase ha-Corbanoth, ix. 9-11). A free-will offering followed (Nu 6:14). In the second Temple a wafer was placed in the S.E. corner of the women's court, where the Nazirites boiled their peace-offerings, cut off their hair and cast it into the caldron.

The following historical notices are of some interest: (1) 1 Mac 3:17-25 enables us to realize the importance which came to be attached to the punctilious performance of every one of the ceremonies. Just before the battle of Emmaus, the Nazirites, being shut out of Jerusalem, could not offer the sacrifices. Evidently this was regarded as a serious public calamity. (2) The important tractate of the Talmud entitled Berakhoth tells a story of slightly later date than the above, which illustrates the ingenuity which the Rabbinists displayed in finding reasons for releasing from their vows persons who had rashly undertaken them (vii. 2). (3) John the Baptist has been claimed as a Nazirite, but this is doubtful; we read nothing about his hair being untouched. (4) A custom grew up for wealthy people to provide the requisite sacrifices for their poorer brethren. Thus, when Agrippa came from Rome to Jerusalem to enter on his kingdom, he offered many sacrifices of thanksgiving; wherefore also he ordained that many of the Nazirites should have their heads shaven (Jos. Ant. xiri. vi. 1). This throws light on Ac 21:29. (5) Eusebius (HE ii. 25) appears to represent James the Just as a lifelong Nazirite: 'He was holy from his mother's womb. Wine and strong drink he drank not, neither did he eat flesh. A razor passed not over his head.' But the further statement that he alone was permitted to enter the Holy of Holies is so improbable as to lessen our confidence in the narrator. John Taylor.

NEAH.—Named only in Jos 19:18. The name has not been recovered. It is prob. identical with Nael of v. 17.

NEAPOLIS.—The harbour of Philippoi, at which St. Paul landed (Ac 16:16) after sailing from Troas. It lay on the coast of Macedonia opposite Thasos, being situated on a promontory with a harbour on each side. It was about 10 miles from Philipps. The Via Egnatia from Dyrrhachium, after passing through Thessalonica, Amphipolis, and Philippoi, reached the coast again at Neapolis, and the regular course of travellers to Asia was not to continue farther by land, but to cross by ship to Troas. The modern name of Neapolis is Kassos.

A. E. Hillard.

NEBAIOTH.—An important tribe of North Arabians. In Gn 29:31 (=1 Ch 1:30) Nebaioth is the eldest son of Ishmael; also the representative of the Ishmaelite tribes in Gn 28:6. The people of Nebaloth have an important place among the Arabian tribes subdued by Asaiahbath of Asseya, named by him along with the tribes of Kedar (wh. see), just as in the list of Genesis. It is about this date (n. c. 650) that they came into prominence among the competing tribes of the peninsula—a position which they retained for centuries.

Their exact location cannot be definitely determined, but the inscriptions tell us that they were very remote from Assyria, and their place at the head of the tribes of Ishmael, as well as their affiliation with the Edomites (Gn 36 and 36), makes it probable that they were well known to the Hebrews. Hence they are to be sought for not far from the southern border of Palestine. The time when they vanished agrees with the fact that in the Bible they are mentioned only in the late Priestly Code and by the 'Third Isaiah' (Is 60). They are usually, but wrongly, identified with the Nabataeans (the Nabataeans of 1 Mac 59, 96), J. F. McCurdy.

NEBAT.—Father of Jeroboam i. (1 K 119 and onwards). The constant designation of Jeroboam i. as 'ben-Nebat' is probably the usage of a writer later than Jeroboam ben- Joash. It is intended, doubtless, to distinguish the two kings.

NEBEKA (ASSY. Nabâ, 'Announcer').—A Bab. deity who presided over literature and science. The cuneiform system of writing was credited to his invention. He was the son and messenger of Bel-Marduk; whose will to mortals be interpreted. The planet Mercury was sacred to Nebo. The chief centre of his worship was the temple of E-Zida in Borsippa, between which and the temple of Marduk in Babylon took place the great annual processions of which we find a reminiscence in Is 66.1. The name Nebo appears as an element in many Babylonian names—Nebuchadrezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Abednego (properly Abed-nebo), etc.

W. M. Neubst.

NEBO.—The name of a Moabite town, a mountain in Moab, and (according to the Hebrew text) of a city of Judah. The name Nebo (though not quite certain) is shown in these places as named after the Babylonian deity Nebo (see preceded art.), and thus points to the influence of the Babylonian cult at a remote period both E. and W. of the Jordan.

1. Nebo, a city of Judah (Ezr 239, 1 Es 98, Nomaia, Neh 70, 43; 89), identified with some with Beita Nebâ, 12 miles N.W. of Jerusalem. This Nebo is the Neboi (a signatory to the covenant) of Noh 100. Whether either form exactly corresponds to the original name is uncertain.

2. The Moabite town called Nebo is mentioned in Nu 2330, Nu 339, Is 15, Jer 44, again in 1 Ch 8, and also in the inscription of Mesha, who says: 'Ahab sent unto me. Go take Nebo against Israel.' The exact site is unknown, but the town probably lay on, or near, Mt. Nebo.

3. Mount Nebo is the traditional site of Moses' view of Canaan (Dt 341), and of his death (Dt 342). It is described as being 'in the land of Moab over against Jericho' and as reached from the 'steepes of Moab' (Dt 341). There can be no question that this description implies some point on the edge of the great plateau of Moab, which drops steeply some 4,000 feet to the Jordan Valley or the Dead Sea. Two related problems call for solution: Which point in particular on this edge of the plateau is Mt. Nebo? How does the actual view thenes agree with the terms of Dt 3412? It appears to be most reason for identifying Mt. Nebo with the point now called Nebâ, and the identification might be regarded as certain. But we could feel sure that Nebâ is really an ancient name, and not merely (as it may be) the name attached to the summit after tradition had claimed it as the Nebo of the Bible. Nebâ lies about 12 miles from the Jordan at the point where the river enters the Dead Sea, and is one of the summits most easily ascended from the steepes of Moab. In this respect it satisfies the description better than the other sites which have been proposed, (1) the some anizer above Mt. Attauus 10 miles farther south, and (2) Mt. Oshâ some 20 miles north of Mt. Nebâ and a finer point of view, but outside Moab. The view from each of these great points and from several others along the great mountain wall which encircles the Jordan Valley on the E. is extensive and impressive; but its limitations in some directions are also sharply defined. Northward (or, strictly, between N. and N.W.) the view extends far; from Mt. Nebâ, however, it is possible to see Mt. Tabor, 70 miles away. Westward, on the other hand, it is blocked at from 30 to 40 miles by the great wall formed by the sharp declivity of the Judaean plateau to the Jordan Valley. This western mountain wall is of approximately the same height as the Moabite wall on the E. Consequently from any point in Moab it is possible to see the 'hinder sea,' i.e. the Mediterranean; nor is it possible to see more than about one-third of the country between Jordan and the Mediterranean. It follows that the description in Dt 3442 is inaccurate not only in mentioning specific features (the Mediterranean, Dan, probably Zoa) which are out of sight, but in giving the general impression that the view commanded the whole of Western Palestine, whereas it actually commands but a third. The difficulty could be in part overcome by considering Dt 3442 together with the words 'of Gilead unto Dan' in v. 1 an editor's note explaining the phrase 'all the land.' It is significant that this detailed description is absent from the Samaritan text, which has, instead, a shorter description which defines the land of Israel but not the view. For a further discussion of the view from Nebâ, see Expositor, Nov. 1904, pp. 321–341. See also art. PISGAH.

NEBUCHADREZZAR.—See next article.

NEBUCHADREZZAR.—The Nabû-kudur-zur or the Babylonians, for which 'Nebuchadrezzar' (the familiar form often retained in the present work) was son and successor of Nabopolassar, founder of the New Bab. empire (c. 604–601). The fall of Nineveh gave Egypt a chance to reclaim Syria, and Pharaoh-Necho made an attempt to regain it. Josiah fell in a vain effort to repel him (2 K 239), but Nebuchadrezzar defeated him at Carchemish (c. 605). He then recovered the whole of the West, and seems to have been threatening Egypt when recalled to Babylon by news of his father's death. At this time he first captured Jerusalem (1 K 1:7). We know little of his wars from his own inscriptions, which deal almost entirely with his buildings and pious acts at home. According to classical historians, he made Babylon one of the wonders of the world. He fortified it with a triple line of walls and a moat; he restored temples and cities throughout his kingdom. A fragment of his seals records that in his 27th year he sent his son Amasis to Egypt (cf. Jer 469–24, Ezk 29–30). For his relations with Judah, see Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, Gedaliah. He certainly was the greatest king of Babylon since Hamburrizza, see Medicine, p. 599.

having brushed aside the force with which Josiah endeavoured to oppose him at Megiddo, and slain that king. Returning, he deposed Jehoshah, the son and successor of Josiah, at Riblah, substituted for him his eldest son Eliakim, who changed his name to Jehohakim, and exacted tribute from the new king at the expense of the people. But Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, was now secure enough in the east to send his son Nebuchadnezzar to dispute the prize, with the Egyptian king. Nebuchadrezzar routed Noe's forces at Carchemish (in B.C. 665), and took from him all his Syrian possessions, from 'the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates.'

NECK.—The usual most words are

NECKLACE. — See Ornaments, § 3.

NECROMANCY. — See Magic Divination and Sorcery.

NELDABIAH. — A descendant of David (1 Ch 34).

NEEDLE'S EYE. — See Camel, ad fin.

NEEDLEWORK. — See Embroidery.

NEESING. —The vb. 'to sneeze' (mod. 'sneeze') occurs in the 1611 ed. of AV at 2 K 48, 'the child needeth seven times.' But the 'neesing' (Job 41:13) of leviathan (the crocodile) means hard breathing, snorting, and does not come from the same A.S. verb as 'neeze' meaning to sneeze.

NEGB, originally meaning 'the dry land,' is in most passages in the OT the name of a definite geographical area (Dt 17 34, Jos 10 12 etc.); the word is, however, used also in the sense of 'South' (Jos 13 4). The Nebeg was often the scene of Abraham's wanderings (Gn 13 11, 12 20); here Hagar was succoured by the angel (Gn 16 14); Isaac (Gn 24 11) and Jacob (Gn 37 40) dwelt in it; through this district passed the spies (Nu 13 23). In Nu 13 9 the Nebeg is described as belonging to the Amalekites. Later the land was allotted to Simeon, and its cities are enumerated (Jos. 18 7); later they reverted to Judah (Jos 15 26). David was stationed at Achish at Ziklag on the borders of the Nebeg (1 S 27 7). At this time the Nebeg is described as of several parts, the Negeb of Judah, of the Jerahmeelites, and of the Kenites (1 S 27 10); while in 1 S 30 4 we read of the Negeb of the Cherethites and of Caleb. Jeremiah (19) prophesied trouble as coming on the cities of this region, but on the return from captivity they too were to participate in the blessings (32 25 32).

The district in question was an ill-defined tract of country lying S. of Hebron, and extending some 70 miles to the Tih or desert. It was bounded on the E. by the Dead Sea and the 'Ar'اذ, while W. it faded away into the Maritime Plain. It was a pastoral region, wedged between the cultivated lands on the N. and the wilderness, and formed a most efficient barrier to the land of Israel towards the South. Attacks of large armed forces could not come from this direction, but only by the 'Ar'اذ to the S.E. (Ga 14), e.g. Gaza on S.W., or by the 'Ar'اذ of the N. and W. The Israelites were compelled to take the last route. The country consists of a series of mountainous ridges running in a general direction E. and W., with open wadys in which a certain amount of water collects even in ancient days dams were constructed in places to collect and store the rainfall, which to-day soon runs off. Though now little better than a wilderness, the numerous ruins of towns and broken terraces witness to days of greater prosperity and good cultivation; the OT, in its stories of Saul's and David's captures from the Amalekites (1 S 15 27), witnesses to a great wealth of cattle. In Byzantine times the land attained its highest prosperity, and it is often, indeed, little better than a desert: the Bedouins of these parts are known in Palestine for their skill in making rough cisterns on the hillsides to catch the surface water, and have in recent years been employed to construct many such in the 'wilderness of Judaea.' Beersheba and the district around have recently been greatly improved; a rough carriage road has been made from there to Gaza.

NEHEMALITE. — An epithet applied to Shemahiah, a false prophet who opposed Jeremiah (Jer 29 2, 13). According to analogy the word should mean 'ranch' inhabitant of Nehein, but there is no place of that name mentioned in the Bible.

NEHEMIAH. — 1. One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community ('Ezr 2 = Neh 71). 1 Esd 6 neither Nehemias. 2. One of those who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 31). 3. See the following article.

NEHEMIAH. — Son of Hacaliah and cupbearer to king Artaxerxes. Our sole source of information regarding this great Jewish patriot is the book that bears his name. According to this, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (i.e., as usually understood, of Artaxerxes I Longimanus, 464-424), B.C. 445-444, Nehemiah is at Susa, the chief city of Elam and the winter residence of the Persian court. Here, in consequence of a report reaches him regarding the ruinous condition of Jerusalem and its people, Nehemiah is, on his own initiative, appointed governor (פֵּסָח) of the province of Judaea by the king. He is granted a limited leave of absence by the latter, furnished with royal letters and an escort to assure his safe passage; and also with a royal rescript to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forests, commanding that he shall be furnished with sufficient supplies of timber. On arriving at Jerusalem, having satisfied himself as to the ruins and condition of the city walls, he energetically begins the task of rebuilding them, and, in spite of much opposition from without (the Samaritans and others), he, with the aid of the entire Jewish population drawn from the adjoining villages, successfully accomplishes his undertaking within two months (Neh 1-7). All this, according to the usually accepted chronology, happened in the year 444. The wall was 'finished' on the 25th day of the 6th month (6th), and on the first day of the following month the events of the religious reform described in chs. 8-10 apparently began. The Book of the Law was read by Ezra in the presence of Nehemiah before the people in solemn assembly; the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated (8th-14th) national confession of sin was made (ch. 9); and the covenant was sealed, the people pledging themselves to observe its obligations (ch. 10). In 12-18 a description of the solemn dedication of the completed walls is given. If 2 Mac 11 can be relied on as preserving a true tradition, the dedication took place on the 25th of Chislev (December), i.e. three months after the completion, and two months after the reading of the Law and the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles.

The exact sequence of these events is uncertain. Some would place the reading of the Law, subsequent to the Dedication, in the following year. Rawlinson proposed to place the Dedication 12 years later, in Nehemiah's second governorship. But this view is improbable.

Shortly after these events, it would seem, Nehemiah returned to Jerusalem from Persia, and was absent from the Persian court for some years. How long exactly Nehemiah’s first governorship lasted, and for how great an interval he was absent from Jerusalem, are uncertain. In 59 it seems to be stated definitely that he was governor in the first instance for 12 years. But in 13 Nehemiah is not known, though there is a passage which suggests that he had been governor for 36 years. It would seem possible, however, that the ages of the events narrated in these chapters are correct, and that Nehemiah was governor for 36 years, and that the 36th year was the year he retired from office. Nehemiah had so much personal trustworthiness at the court of Xerxes, and so much influence in the court, that he had the position of governor of Jerusalem, and was able to build the walls of Jerusalem, as is stated in this chapter. Nehemiah had also much influence in the court of the Persian king, and was able to build the walls of Jerusalem, as is stated in this chapter. Nehemiah had also much influence in the court of the Persian king, and was able to build the walls of Jerusalem, as is stated in this chapter.

1. Extracts from the memoirs embodied in Nehemiah.

(a) 11-17. At the outset we meet with a long section where the first person singular is used throughout, viz. Ewald. These chapters consist of the original, uncorrupted extracts from Nehemiah’s personal memoirs. They are distinguished by individual characteristics which help us to form a distinct idea of the writer’s personality. Nehemiah is a great man, and unselfish and unselfish devotion to his work is marked, and his devotion to his work is marked. From b it is clear that the narrative can not have been put into its present form till some years after the events recorded. Doubts have been raised as to the authenticity of Nehemiah, but we should not be misled by the objections. Doubts have been raised as to the authenticity of Nehemiah, but we should not be misled by the objections. The Book of Nehemiah (see next article) is composite in character, and the narrative is in part fragmentary. Nehemiah’s memoirs, however, are accurate, and have been preserved to us.

(c) Ch. 11. This chapter, which contains a list of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel, shows Nehemiah’s personal character, and his respect for the work of the exiles. Nehemiah’s personal character, and his respect for the work of the exiles, is also shown in the next section, which describes the wrestling of the walls of Jerusalem, and their dedication to the Lord. It is clear that the narrative can not have been put into its present form till some years after the events recorded, and that the objections (cf. 7. 43) regarding the authenticity of Nehemiah’s memoirs are not well founded.

(d) 13-14. Another extract from the memoirs, giving details of a time some 12 or more years later than that referred to in the earlier extracts. It deals with Nehemiah’s second visit to Jerusalem, and the wall-building of Nehemiah, and the dedication of the walls. Nehemiah’s personal character, and his respect for the work of the exiles, is also shown in the next section, which describes the wrestling of the walls of Jerusalem, and their dedication to the Lord. It is clear that the narrative can not have been put into its present form till some years after the events recorded, and that the objections (cf. 7. 43) regarding the authenticity of Nehemiah’s memoirs are not well founded.

2. Passages in Nehemiah not derived from the memoirs.—(a) 7. 9-109 (36). This long section breaks the connexion which it generally agreed exists between 7. 9 and 109 (36). It is probable that the work of an eye-witness has been used, and the compiler in the present narrative. Probably 9. 109 has been taken over directly from the memoirs of Ezra (the LXX ascribes the prayer beginning in 9. 1 to Ezra: ‘And Ezra said’). The whole section, therefore, can be regarded as of first-rate authority.

(b) 12-28. A list of priests and Levites who returned with Zerubbabel. Notice how the priestly genealogy is carried far down below Nehemiah’s time, as far, in fact, as the reign of Darius the Persian (y. 23), i.e. Darius II. Codomannus (reigned n.c. 333-331). The high priest Jaddua mentioned in v. 13 is known from Josephus to have been a contemporary of Alexander the Great.
NEHEMIAH

this is accepted. Ezra's visit and work of reform fall in the year 398. Kosters goes much further than this.

'According to him, a return of exiles in the second year of Cyrus did not take place at all; the building of the Temple and the walls was rather the work of the population that had remained behind in the land (2 K 25:1), of whom Zerubbabel and Nehemiah were governors; Ezra's visit and work of reform fall in the second governorship of Nehemiah, after the events narrated in Neh 13-8. Ezra arrived for the first time after 438; first of all the community was reconstituted by the dissolution of the mixed marriages, and then solemnly bound to the observance of the Law which had been brought with him by Ezra: the first return-journey under Zerubbabel, with all those who joined themselves with him, had been invented by the Chronicler, who reversed the order of events. Finally, according to Torrey, the '1' passages, with the exception of Neh 1:2 (mainly) and 36-48 (mainly), have been fabricated by the Chronicler, who invented this narrative of his masterpiece; and Nehemiah also belongs to the reign of Artaxerxes II. (Cornell).

Kosters' theory has been energetically opposed by Wellhausen, and since Ed. Meyer's demonstration of the essential authenticity of the documents embodied in Ezra 4-7, the extreme form of the critical theory may be regarded as having lost most of its plausibility.

NEHEMIAH.—1. 1 Es 5.—Nehemiah, Ezr 2: Neh 7. 2. 1 Es 5th, Nehemiah the contemporary of Ezra.

NEHILOTH.—See PRALMS, p. 772.

NEHUM.—One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community (Neh 7); prob. a scribal error for Nehum of Ezra 8. He called in 1 Es 5th RNoum.

NEHUSHTA.—Wife of king Jehoiakim and mother of Jehoiasich (2 K 24). She was taken a prisoner to Babylon with her son in 597 (2 K 24:9).

NEHUSHTAN.—See SERPENT (BRAZEN).

NEIEL.—See NAH.

NEKODA.—1. Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2:7; =Neh 7:2); called in 1 Es 5th Noe. 2. Name of a family which returned from the Exile, but were unable to prove their Israelitish descent (Ezr 2:7; =Neh 7:2); called in 1 Es 5th Nekodan.

NEMUEL.—See JEMUEL. The patronymic Nemuelites occurs in Nu 26:2. 2. A Reubenite (Nu 26:7).

NEPEG.—1. Son of Izhar and brother of Korah (Ex 6:1). 2. One of David's sons (2 S 5:15 = 1 Ch 3:14).

NEFER.—1. The name 'nepher' means 'grandson.' In occurs in Jr 12:9, Job 18:3, Is 14:1, 1 T 5:.

NEPHILIM.—A Heb. word, of uncertain etymology—retained by RV in the only two places where it occurs in OT (AY 'giants'). In Gn 6 we read: 'The Nephilim were in the earth in those days, and also afterwards, when the sons of God went in to the daughters of men, and they bare to them; these are the heroes which were of old, the men of renown.' The verse has the appearance of an explanatory gloss to the obscure mythological fragment which precedes, and is very difficult to understand. But we can hardly be wrong in supposing that it bears witness to a current belief (to which there are many heathen parallels) in a race of heroes or demi-gods, produced by the union of divine beings ('sons of God') with mortal women. The other notice is Nu 13:30, where the name is applied to men of gigantic stature seen by the spies among the natives of Canaan. That these giants were popularly identified with the demi-gods of Gn 6, there is no reason to doubt. See also art. GIANT.

NEPHESHEM, NEPHISIM.—See NAPHEM.

NEPHTHAI.—See NEPTHR.

NEPTHR.—The name given by Nehemiah to a 'thick substance' which was found in a dry pit after the return from Babylon (2 Mac 1:8). The legend relates how certain priests, before the Captivity, took the sacred fire and hid it. On the Return, when a search was made, there was found in its place this highly inflammable substance, which seems not to have differed much from the naphtali of commerce. Some of it was poured over the sacrifice, and was ignited by the great heat of the sun and burned with a bright flame. The name nephthar or nephthai [v.2] has not been satisfactorily explained, although it is said by the writer to mean 'clearing.'

T. A. MOXON.

NEPHTOAH.—A town on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15:18), usually identified with Lifia, about 2 miles N.W. of Jerusalem (so Tobler, Baedeker-Socin, Guthe, etc.). The Talmud identifies Nopher with Ezra, the modern 'Ati 'Adim, at which are popularly called the Pools of Solomon, S. of Bethlehem (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. p. 146). This latter is favoured by Conder, who would place Eleph at Lifis. The phrase 'the fountain of the waters of Nephthoah' in this respect the claim of 'Ati 'Adim is certainly stronger than that of Lifis.

NEPHUSHEM, NEPHUSIM.—See NAPHIS.

N.B.—The father of Abner (1 S 14:20, 26:14 etc.).

NEBUS.—A Roman Christian, to whom, along with his wife, St. Paul sends greeting in Ro 16:12. The expression 'and all the saints that are with them' seems to point to some community of Christians accustomed to meet together. MORLEY STEVENSON.

NERGAL.—The god of the city of Cutha in Babylonia, hence worshipped by the captive Cuthians who were transplanted to Samaria by Sargon (2 K 17:24). In the Bab.-Assy. pantheon he was a god of war and pestilence, and of hunting, and the planet Mars was sacred to him.

The name Nergal is probably of Semitic origin, namely, Ner-gal—great warrior.' The god is sometimes in the non-Semitic texts called Ner-usu-gal, 'hero of the lower regions,' evidently indicating his connexion with death and destruction.

W. M. NISBET.

NERGAL-SHAREZER.—The Bab. Nergal-shar-usur 'Nergal preserve the king,' the Rab-mag (wh. sec.). This, with Nebuzaradan and Neboshabban, released Jeremiah from prison (Jor 39:12). It is tempting to suppose that he was the Nergal-shar-usur who married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and later came to the throne of Babylon, and is known from classical writers as Nergilasir (n.c. 550-540 B.C.) C. W. JONAS.

NERIAH.—The father of Baruch (Jer 32:2). His name, Nerias, is retained.

NERIAS.—See NEHIAH.

NERO is not mentioned by name in the NT, but his connexion with St. Paul's trial (Ac 25-26, where 'Cesar' is Nero), the mention of his household (Ph 4), and the general consensus of opinion that the number of the Beast 666 (Rev 13:1) is a cypher indicating Nero Kesar (the Gr. way of pronouncing the Emperor's name), are sufficient reasons for including him here. Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, son of Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus (consul 32 (died 40 A.D.) and Iulia Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus (the adopted son of the Emperor Tiberius), who became wife of the Emperor Claudius in 48 A.D., was born on 15 Dec. in the year 57 A.D. On adoption by his step-father on 25 Feb. 50 he received new names, by one of which, Nero, he has since been known. On the murder of Claudius his sole rule began in 54, and during it he was officially known as Emperor Nero Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus. His death took place on 9 June, 68, in his thirty-first year.

he was a mere youth, were kept in check by his two tutors, Burrus an experienced soldier, and Seneca the distinguished philosopher. His mother, a woman of very strong will, who had successfully schemed for his advancement, had no good influence on him, and, when of age to throw off all restraints, he plunged into folly and excesses which suspect that madness had unhinged his mind. His defects, however, seem to have done little more than scandalise and annoy Rome; the prosperity of the provinces, thanks to the excellence of the bureaucratic machine, continued. Space permits only a reference to some important events in his reign.

The question of the Eastern frontier, which was a problem ever present to the Emperors, demanded settlement from Nero. The safety of this frontier could be secured only if Armenia were under the suzerainty of Rome. It was therefore the object of their perpetual rivalries, the Parthians, to obtain this suzerainty. The Romans dared not annex Armenia, because it would inevitably become necessary to annex also the whole of the country on the west of the Tigris. At the opening of Nero's reign, Tiridates, a Parthian, had established himself securely on the throne of Armenia, and the possession of Armenia by the Romans was thus seriously threatened. The ultimate intention of Rome was to open war against Tiridates as a pretext, and the governor of Syria and the other officials and client-princes in the neighbourhood of Armenia were instructed to co-operate with him. The condition of the Eastern troops caused alarm, and, after a twelvemonth and a half years, he was appeased in tents in the upland plain of Armenia, Corbulo was ready to strike in spring 68, and as the result of this first campaign Tiridates asked for terms. He was offered his kingdom as a gift from Rome, but refused to accept it, and in the second campaign (69) the Roman general marched upon Tiridates' capital Araratxa, which surrendered, and proceeded thence by a long and difficult march to Tigranocerta, the second capital, in the course of which he was actually on the point of surrendering. In the year 60, which was occupied in pacification, Tigranes, who was educated in Rome, was placed on the throne by Nero. The folly of this king and the cowardice and incompetence of the Roman general Petus threatened to undo all that Corbulo had achieved; but Corbulo, as supreme commander-in-chief for the whole Eastern frontier, retrieved the loss in the year 68 and following on this successful campaign Tiridates received the crown as the gift of Rome. The long peace with Armenia which followed is to the credit of Corbulo's consummate generalship and Nero's skilful diplomacy. The Roman historian, which his predecessor Claudius had obtained, was further strengthened under Nero. It was in his reign that the justly aroused rebellion under Boudicca (better known by the incorrect form Boudleia) in East Anglia was crushed, after terrible massacres by the Britons, by the governor Suetonius Paulinus (60). There was henceforth, for a considerable time, peace in Britain. The Germany and Danube frontiers also engaged attention in Nero's time.

In the city Nero exercised a watchful care for the corn and water supplies. He also increased the power of the Senate, and may be said to have constituted an Imperial Cabinet. He was fond of the arts, especially music and painting, but he never attained more than a respectable standard in either. On 19 July, 64, fire broke out in Rome, and raged for nine days in all, leaving great parts of the city in ashes. On the evidence Nero must be acquitted of all connivance on him, and was due to chance. The populace, however, suspected the Emperor, and were anxious to bring retribution on the originators of the fire. Nero selected the Christians as scapegoats, and he may have believed them guilty, as some of them were understood to have confessed their guilt. They were subjected to every imaginable variety of cruel death. These punishments did not remove suspicion from Nero, and, as the populace soon became sated, other charges had to be brought against them. Of these charges, hostility to civilized society was the chief. At a later stage in history we find evidence to justify the conclusion that the name 'Christian' was first used in itself to be a sufficient charge against itself, against the Emperor's life, in which some of the chief men in the State were implicated, failed of its purpose through treachery. In 65; the effect on the Emperor's mind issued in a reign of terror, and a number of the noblest persons, particularly Sticides, were put to death. The later days of Nero saw the rise of the Jewish insurrection against the Roman power, which culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem and the massacre of countless Jews in a.d. 70. Two years before that, however, the revolt of Gaul under Vindolax had been the prelude to Nero's death. His life of ease and luxury had weakened a nature never trained to hardihood, and when the hour of danger came he sought a refuge in suicide. Not long after his death there arose a curious rumour in the East, that he had come to life again, or had not really died. The East had seen nothing but the best side, and this was taken advantage of by the emperor again, seriously endangered the peace of the Empire, as more than one person came forward claiming to be Nero.

Of the trial or trials of St. Paul we know nothing certain. It is highly probable that his appeal was heard either before a committee of the Emperor's privy council, or before the Emperor's deputy, the prefect of the city, 'after a terrible delay.'

NEST (gsm).—Used literally of birds' nests (Dt 22:32, Job 39:27, Ps 84:104, Pr 27:16; Is 16:10; metaphorically for a lofty fortress (Nu 24:9, Jer 49:9, Hab 2:5); Job refers to his lost home as a nest (28:13); in Gn 64 the 'rooms' of the ark are (see mg.) literally 'nests' (qinām). In Mt 8:8, Lk 9:4 our Lord contrasts His wandering, homeless life with that of the birds which have their 'nests' (kotaxēndēs, Rv m. lodgings-places).

NETAIN.—A place situated probably in the Shephelah of Judah. See Gederah.

NETHINIM.—The word is a late form of a passive participle nēthînim, and denotes 'men who are given.' in early days, when sacrifices were offered in the open air, there was little difficulty occasioned by the odour and dirt arising from the blood, fat, and ashes. But when they were offered within the walls of a temple, and offered with great frequency and with large numbers of victims, some very disagreeable drudgery was always necessary. The chopping of wood, lighting of fires, sharpening of knives, drawing of water, the cleaning not only of the altar and its surroundings and utensils, but of all the whole of the Temple precincts, and the performance of many menial offices for the priests, required a large staff of servants. The analogy of other lands suggests that these offices would be performed by slaves, procured either by purchase or capture. The Greeks had hierodoulai, 'temple slaves,' and the Mohammedans at Mecca similarly. It is not known at what date the practice arose in Israel; but there seem to have been three stages in the history of Temple servants. (1) They were slaves in the strict sense; (2) they were admitted to Israelite privileges, being circumcised, and treated as free men holding an official position in the Church; (3) they rose in standing and prestige so as to become practically equivalent to the Levites.

1. The name Nethinim is not used before the Exile. Ezra 8:27 speaks of the Nethinim as those 'whom David and the princes had given for the service of the Levites,' which shows, at least, that common belief traced their origin back to David. A very similar class of persons, 'the children of Solomon's servants,' is mentioned in Ezr. 2:6, 48, Neh. 7:57, 60, 117; their descent was evidently traced to the non-Israelite slaves employed by Solomon in connection with his buildings, some of whom must have laboured in the new royal sanctuaries and eastern temple. This employment of foreign slaves in the Temple continued till the beginning of the Exile (Ezk 44:1).

2. A change in the status of these men was brought about by the Exile. When the people were far from the land, every one who had held any sort of position in the Temple must have gained a certain prestige. The former Temple-slaves seemed to have formed themselves into a very fact of their kinship, they were freed from their slavery to the Temple, and thus when they and their sons returned to Jerusalem, they returned as free men, who were recognized as part of the Temple service. As a guild, they acquired for themselves the title Nethinim, owing to their traditional origin. In Ezr 2:27-28, 70= Neh 7:58-57 are the names of the Nethinim who are reported to have returned with Zerubbabel; and they are mentioned together with priests, Levites, singers, and porters. Some of the names in the list are undoubtedly of foreign origin. Again, Ezra relates (8:70) that on his return, 220 Nethinim from Gashphah accompanied him. After a time we find them so completely established as a sacred official class, that privileges are accorded to them. They shared with priests, Levites, singers, and porters, immunity from taxation (Ezr 7:24). They lived in a special quarter of the city, called Ophel, i.e. the southern and eastern slope of the Temple hill, or more particularly that part of it which reached to the Water-gate on the east, and the tower projecting from the royal palace (Neh 3:29). They were thus near to the Temple, and near Ryle (Ezr, etc., p. lviii) points out the appropriateness of assigning to 'drawers of water' the position by the Water-gate, which communicated with the Virgin's Spring: Neh 3:29 mentions 'the house of the Nethinim,' which must have been an official building used by them during their periods of duty. They were under the command of two chiefs—of whom one, at least, was a member of their own body—Ziba and Gisha. (Neh 11:13; the former is the first in the list, in Ezr 2:27; Neh 7:58, and Gisha may possibly be the same as Husapha, the second name. Further, only a portion of them, like the priests, Levites, and porters, dwelt in Jerusalem; the others 'dwelt in their cities' (Ezr 2:29; Neh 7:57, 1 Ch 9:5). And so far were they from being regarded as foreign slaves, that they joined, as full members of the nation, in the oath that they would not (among other things) allow their sons and daughters to marry any but Israelites (Neh 10:30).

3. From this point the Nethinim gradually rose in official position, until they were indistinguishable from the Levites. In 1 Ch 23:14 the Levites are spoken of in such a way as to suggest that the term included all Temple-servants. And conversely, since singers and doorkeepers (who are quite distinct from Levites in Ezr.-Neh.) were explicitly reckoned by the Chronicler as Levites (1 Ch 15:20-21), it is probable that the same was the case with the Nethinim. Finally, in 1 Es 1:1 the Levites, and in 8:24, 43 the Nethinim, are described by the same term, hierodoulai.

NETOPHIA.—A town, of which its first occurs in the list of the cities returned under Zerubbabel, probably the same as the modern Bait Netuf at the entrance of the Wady en-Salt or Vale of Elah. The gentilic name the Netophathite(s) occurs in 2 S 23:14, 2 K 25:1, Jer 40.

NETOPHAS (1 Es 5:20) = Netophah of Ezr 2:28, Neh 7:43.

NETS were used in taking wild animals (see HUNTING), and birds (see SHARKES); but their main use has always been in fishing. The ancient Hebrews were not fishermen, nor do they seem to have eaten much fish. There is no reference in OT to fishing in the inland waters of Palestine. The fishers of the Mediterranean have traditionally been, and are, Mohammedans or Phenicians. The 'fisher-partners' of Job 41 are Phenicians; the fishermen of Is 19 are Egyptians. Fish were taken along the Mediterranean coast with 'line and hook' (Job 41, Is 19, Am 4), and the 'fish-spear' or 'harpoon' (Job 41). But sufficient quantities for commercial purposes could be obtained only by means of nets. (a) Heb. mikmar (Is 619) and makmar (Ps 141:14) and the Aram, mikmar (Is 19:9) and mikmereth (Hab 1:14, 15) is probably Gr. saqanı (Mt 13:4), the Arab, jarf, 'draw-net.' It is as much as 400 metres long, 20 ft. deep, and of fine mesh, so that as it sweeps everything before it in a boat it is paid out in a great semicircle, the lower edge carried by lead sinkers, the upper sustained by cork floats. It is then drawn ashore, with its contents, the meshes attached to the end of a rope, and the non-named game, being water, to over stones and other obstructions. This accounts for Simon Peter's condition (Jn 21). (b) Heb. charem (Ezk 26:4, Hab 1:15 et c.), Gr. amphiblastron (Mt 14:4 et c.), the mod. abakoth, 'cat-net.' It is circular, of close mesh, with a cord attached to the centre. The fisherman gathers it together, arranges it on his arm and shoulder, and moves, or wades, stealthily along the shore until he sees signs of fish within reach; then, with a skillful cast, the net flies out and to a full circle on the water; lead beads round the circumference carry it to the bottom, enclosing the fish, which are then secured at leisure. (c) A net used to-day, called m'batlen, consists of three nets strung on a single rope, the two outer being of wide, the inner of close, mesh. It is let down in fairly deep water, parallel with the shore. The fish pass through the outer net, pushing the inner before them through the wide meshes on the other side, thus being entangled. The net is pulled up and emptied into the boats. (d) Gr. diktyon (Mt 4:18, etc) is a term used for nets in general. In the LXX amphiblastron and m'batlen are used indiscriminately as tr. alike of charem and mikmar, etc.

A tax is levied on all fish caught in the Sea of Galilee. The favourite fishing-grounds are near 'Ain el-Ful, south of el-Mejdel; the bay of el-Tebgha; and the waters of el-Batash in the N.E. The Upper Jordan and el-Huleh lie within the private lands of the Sultan, to whom payment is made for fishing rights. See an excellent account of 'The Fisheries of Galilee' in P.E.F. S., Jan. 1908, p. 100, by Dr. Masterman of Jerusalem.

NETTLE.—1. chardal (Job 30:7, Pr 24:44, Zeph 2:5), more probably a generic name for thorn bushes growing in the wilderness, such as the Zizypus and varieties of acacia. 2. qimmmos (Is 34:5, Hos 9), qimmadayim (Pr 24:4, EV 'thorns'). These words all refer to nettles, which are abundant in desert places in Palestine.

NEW TESTAMENT.—See BIBLE, CANON OF NT, TEXT OF NT.
NEZIAH.—The name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2:40, Neh 7:40); called in 1 Es 5:26 Naal or Naasit (the latter form in AV and RVm).

NEZIB.—A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 15:49); the present Beit Nabi, 7 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Hebron.

NIBHAZ.—An idol of the Avvites (2 K 17:26). But the Heb. text is corrupt, and no identification of this deity is possible.

NIBSHAN.—A city in the desert of Judah (Jos 15:57). The name has not been recovered.

NICANOR.—I. Son of Patroclus, a Syrian general who was engaged in the Jewish war (1 Mac 3:24). He was sent by Lyssias in b.c. 166 against Judas Maccabeus, but was defeated. Five years later he was sent on the same errand by Demetrius; this time he endeavoured to win by strategy what he had failed to gain by force. Again he was compelled to fight, and was twice defeated, once at Capharalaham (1 Mac 7:12), and again at Adaas, where he lost his life. The day of his death was ordained to be kept as a festival as ʻNicanor ʻDay.' The account in 2 Mac (esp. 14:18-20) differs in several details. 2. One of the ʻSeven' (Ac 21:21).

NICODEMUS.—A Pharisee and a member of the Sanhedrin (Jn 3:1, 6:49, 19:39), elderly (30) and evidently well-to-do (19:15). He is mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel, and there he figures thrice. (1) At the outset of His ministry Jesus went up to Jerusalem to keep the Feast of the Passover, and His miracles made a deep impression on Nicodemus, half persuading him that He was the Messiah; insomuch that he interviewed Him secretly under cover of the darkness (Jn 3:2). He began by raising the question of the miracles, which, he allowed, proved Jesus at the least a God-commissioned teacher; but Jesus interrupted him and set him face to face with the urgent and personal matter of regeneration. Nicodemus went away bewildered, but a seed had been planted in his soul. (2) During the third year of His ministry, Jesus went up to the Feast of Tabernacles (October). The rulers were now His avowed enemies, and they convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin to devise measures against Him (7:48). Nicodemus was present, and, a disciple at heart but afraid to avow his faith, he merely raised a point of order: ʻDost our law judge a man, except it first know what he doeth?' (3) At the meeting of the Sanhedrin which condemned Jesus to death Nicodemus made no protest; probably he abstained himself. But after the Crucifixion, ashamed of his cowardice, he at last avowed himself and joined with Joseph of Arimathaea in giving the Lord's body a kingly burial (19:38).

DAVID SMITH.

NICOLAITANS.—See next article.

NICOLAS (lit. 'conqueror of the people').—Among the Seven chosen in Ac 6 to minister to the Helenists or Greek-speaking Jews, was Nicolas, a ʻproselyte of Antioch.' The remaining six, we infer, were of Jewish birth, for ʻproselyte' is the emphatic word (6:5). At a later age the Jews divided converts to Judaism into two classes, ʻproselytes of righteousness,' who were circumcised and who kept the whole Law, and ʻproselytes of the gate,' who had only a somewhat undefined connexion with Israel. It is probable that this difference in its essence also holds in NT, where the latter class are called ʻGod-fearing' or ʻdevout,' a description which in Acts appears to be technical (so Lightfoot, Ramsay; this is disputed, however). If the view here stated be true, there were three stages in the advance towards the idea of a Catholic Church: (1) the admission of Nicolas, to offer himself to Christ (Acts 6:5), followed by the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, also probably a full proselyte (8:26); (2) the baptism of Cornelius, a ʻGod-fearing' proselyte, i.e. of the latter class; (3) the direct admission of heathen to the Church without their having had any connexion with Judaism.

Nicolas is not further mentioned in NT, but Ireneus and Hippolytus assert that he was the founder of the Nicolaitans of Rev 2:19 (if indeed this is the Nicolaitans). Lightfoot thinks that there might well be a heresia among the ʻSeven' (Galois, p. 297). It is, however, equally probable that this was only a vain claim of the last 2nd cent. sect. of that name mentioned by Tertullian, for both heretics and orthodox of that and succeeding ages have exaggeratedly claimed Apostolic authority for their opinions and writings; or it is not unlikely that the Nicolaitans of Rev 2 were so called because they exaggerated and distorted in an aniconimic sense the doctrine of Nicolas, who probably preached the liberty of the gospel. Ireneus and Hippolytus are not likely to have known more about the matter than we do.

A. J. MACLEAN.

NICOPOLIS, or the 'city of victory,' was founded by Augustus in b.c. 31, on the spot where he had had his camp before the battle of Actium. It was made a Roman colony, and was peopled by citizens drawn from various places in Acarnania and Etolia.

In Tit 3:2 St. Paul writes, 'Give diligence to come unto me to Nicopolis; for there I have determined to winter.' It may be taken as certain that this means Nicopolis in Epirus, from which doubtlesse St. Paul hoped to begin the evangelization of that province. No other city of the name was in such a position, or so important as to claim six months of the Apostle's time.

The importance of Nicopolis depended partly on the ʻActian games,' partly on some commerce and fisheries. It was destroyed by the Goths, and, though restored by Justinian, it was supplanted in the Middle Ages by Prevesa, which grew up a little farther south. There are extensive ruins on its site. A. E. HILLARD.

NIGER.—The second name of Symeon, one of the prophets and teachers in the Church of Antioch (Ac 13:1). His name Symeon shows his Jewish origin, and Niger was probably the Gentile name which he assumed. Nothing further is known of him.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

NIGHT.—See Time.

NIGHT-HAWK (tachmâs).—An unedan bird (Lv 11:14, Dc 14:5). What the tachmâs really was is merely a matter of speculation. A species of owl, the e.rtich, and even the cuckoo, have all been suggested, but without any convincing reasons. ʻNight-hawk' is merely another name for the familiar night-jar or goat-sucker (Caprimulgus), of which three species are known in Palestine. G. MASTERMAN.

NIGHT MONSTER.—See Lilith.

NILE.—The Greek name of the river, of uncertain derivation. The Egyptian name was Ḥopî, later Ye-r'-o, ʻGreat River,' but the Hebrew generally designates the Nile by the plain Egyptian word for river, ʻFer'. The Nile was rich in fish, and the homes of the hippopotamus and hippopotamus. It bore most of the internal traffic of Egypt; but it was pre-eminently the one source of water, and so of life and fertility, in a land which, without it, would have been desert. The White Nile sends down from the Central African lakes a steady stream, which is greatly increased in summer and autumn, when the half-dry beds of the Bahr el-Azrek and the Aghob are filled by the torrential rains annually poured down the mountains of Abyssinia. The waters of these tributaries are charged with organic matter washed down by the floods, and this is spread over the fields of Egypt by the inundation. The height of the Nile rise was measured and recorded by the Egyptians from the earliest times: on it depended almost wholly the harvest of the year, and a great excess might be as harmful as a deficiency. The rise begins about June 19, and after increasing slowly for a month the river gains rapidly till September; at the end of September it becomes stationary, but rises again, reaching its highest level about the middle of October. The crops were sown as the water retreated, and on the lower ground a second crop was obtained by artificial irrigation. Canals and embankments regulated the water in ancient times. The water was raised for the irrigation of the fields by shadilus, i.e. buckets hung from the end of dipping poles, and handscops, and carried by small carts which could be opened or stopped with a little mud and cut herbage; by this means the flow was directed to particular fields or parts of fields as might be required. Water-wheels were probably introduced into Greece under Macedon, as dams to control the river against the time of low Nile, and steam-pumps (in Lower Egypt) to raise it, have changed the aspect of high Nile and revolutionized the system of irrigation; but for the smaller operations the old methods are still practised. The Nil had seven mouths, of which the western (the Canopic) and the eastern (the Pelusiac) were the most important. The former secured most of the traffic with Greece and the islands, the latter with the Phoenicians. The Pelusiac arm, on which Tahtanhes and Pi-beseah lay, would be best known to the inhabitants of Palestine. Now the ancient mouths are slitted up; only a western (Rosetta branch) and the central one (Damietta branch) survive. The worship of the Nile-god must have been prominent in popular festivals, but has not left much monumental trace. The Nile was not one of the great gods, and his festival was chiefly as emblematic of the river bringing offerings to the gods; the figure is that of an oxcap man with water-plants on his head.

The Egyptians seem to have imagined a connexion of the Nile with the region of the Indian Ocean, and the priests taught the absurd notion that it gushed out north and south from two springs at the First Cataract. They also fancied a Nile in heaven producing rain, and another underground producing the springs. The seven 'lean years' in Genesis is paralleled by an Egyptian tradition of a much earlier seven years' famine under the 3rd Dyn., and years of famine due to insufficient rain of the Nile are referred to in more than one hieroglyphic text.

NIMRAH. See BETH-NIMRAH.

NIMRIM, THE WATERS OF (Is 156, Jer 486).—Named along with Zoar and Horonaim, and must therefore be sought in the S. of Moab. The Onomasticon (Nememrim) places it to the N. of Zoar. The name seems to be found in Wady Nmeirah, which opens on the E. shore, at Burj en-Nmeirah, about three miles from the S. end of the Dead Sea.

W. EWING.

NIMROD (Gn 1012, 1 Ch 116, Mic 56).—A legendary personage, described in Gn 1012 as the first of the 'heroes' or 'mighty hunter before the Lord', the ruler of four ancient Babylonian cities, and the founder of the Assyrian Empire. In the statement that he was begotten by Cush, we have probably a reference to the Assuwa or Qashtu, who conquered Babylon about the 17th cent. B.C., and set up a dynasty which lasted 600 years; the rise of Assyria is said to date from the decline of Babylon under the last Kassite kings. The nearest Babylonian parallel to the figure of Nimrod as yet discovered is Gilgamesh, the tyrant of Erech, whose adventures are recorded in the famous series of tablets to which the Deluge-story belongs, and who is supposed to have lived for centuries, as is often represented on seals and palace-reliefs in victorious combat with a lion. It was at one time hoped that the actual name Nimrod might be recovered from the ideogram commonly read as iz-ru-ban; and though this expectation has been dispelled by the discovery of the true pronunciation Gilgamesh, there is enough general resemblance to warrant the belief that the original of the Biblical Nimrod belongs to Babylonian lore. The combination of warlike prowess with a passion for the chase is illustrated by the numerous hunting scenes sculptured on the monuments; and it may well be imagined that to the Hebrew mind Nimrod became an ideal personification of the proud monarch who ruled the mighty empires on the Euphrates and the Tigris, according to the Targum and the T. S. SKINNER.

NIMSHI. Grandfather of king Jeluh (1 K 96, 2 K 914, 2 Ch 227).

NINEVEH. (Assyr. Ninua, Ninmaku) is said in Gn 101 to have been founded by Nimrod in Assyria. Nineveh was included in the dominions of Hammurabi, who restored the temple of Ishtar there. It was early an important city, and is frequently referred to in the royal inscriptions, but Sennacherib first raised it to the position of capital of Assyria. It lay on the E. of the Tigris, opposite the modern Mosul. Its chief remains are buried beneath the mounds of Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus, but the outline of the old walls can be traced. They enclosed some 1,800 acres, with a circumference of about 8 miles. The mound of Kouyunjik is separated from the mound of Nebi Yunus by the Khoser, and overlies the palaces of Sennacherib to the S., and Ashurbenipal to the N. The southern mound, Nebi Yunus, covers palaces of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon. The Nineveh of Sennacherib's day lay largely outside this area, and included the Rebit Ninua, or Reteboth-r, which extended as far as Khorsabad (Naram-Sin), where Sargon built a great city. Some of the traditions of its great size may be due to a reminiscence of this outer girdle of inhabited country. The fall of Nineveh (a. c. 606) is referred to by Nahum and Zephaniah (2 K 1913 and 2 Ch 369), and is called by the Chaldeans and the Ninevites named in Mt 124, Mk 1112, Lk 1139, 22.

NIPHIS (1 Es 52) perhaps =Magbish in Eze 20.

NISAN. See TIME.

NISROCH. An Assyrian deity in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipping when assassinated (2 K 19, Is 3720).

Gesiusus compared the name with the Arabic nisr ('eagle'), and conjectured that it referred to one of the eagle-headed divinities that appear in the bas-reliefs. In later times attempts have been made to identify Nisroch with Nusku ('the fire-god')—whose name would naturally be most familiar in the construct form Nusuk,—and even with Marduk. But Nusku did not at this period occupy a sufficiently prominent position in the Assyrian pantheon to be identified with the great god of Babylon, being the patron of Sennacherib, the arch-enemy of that city, is manifestly incongruous. The deity that should logically hold this place is Ashur. According to an inscription of Ashur-Adad, Nisroch was a hybrid form due to the combination of Ashur with Nusku. This identification of Greek forms seems to indicate that the original reading was something similar to Asopos. This Schrader explains as Asopos, a hypothetical lengthened form of Asopos. The conjectures of D. E. Meinhold of a compound (Asopos-Asopos) of Ashur with Asopos the Sybarian name of the moon-god, whose Assyrian name Sin is an element in the name Sennacherib.

W. M. NEEB.

NITRE. In its modern usage, denotes saltpetre, nitrate of potash, but the nitrum or nitratum of the ancients was a different substance, nitrone, carbonate of soda. 'Nitre' occurs twice in AV. In Pr 2329 the effect of songs on a heavy heart is compared to the action of vinegar upon 'nitre' (RV 'soda'). Vinegar has no effect upon saltpetre, but with carbonate of soda it produces effervescence. In Jer 232 nitre' (RV 'lye') is referred to as a cleansing agent. Here, again, natron rather than modern nitre suits the connexion.

NO. Jer 469, Ezk 3018, 19. The name of Thebes (Greek Theba), Egy. Neb also No-ammon, Nai 3, Amon (Ammon) being the god of the city. Nahum seems to imagine Thebes as resembling the cities of the less remote Delta surrounded by canals, which were their chief protection; in reality it lay on both banks of the Nile, with describings it on either side, and water probably played little part in its defence. Thebes was of no importance until the Middle Kingdom.

NOAH. — 1. Nnoch, 'rest.' The name is explained in Gn 9: 26 by a play on nicham, 'to comfort;' but perhaps the reading supported by the LXX should be adopted,

The tradition he is the discoverer of the art of making wine (Gen 9: 26). Elsewhere in the Bible, besides the references to the Flood, Noah is mentioned in 1 Ch 1:4, Noshi. — 1. Noah's son, referred to in Gen 5: 32, where the names Noah, Shem, and Jam are given, and where his son is mentioned.

A. H. M'NEILE.

NO-AMON. — See No.

NOB. — A place of this name is mentioned in three passages — 1 S 21: 22, 18: 11, 20: 12. (All text not quite certain). The context in the latter passages points to a place near Jerusalem. In 1 Sam. 21: 22, David passes Nob, which has become 'the city of priests' after the destruction of Shiloh, on his way from Saul (in Gibeah, wh. see) to Gath; this would suit a site near Jerusalem, though it does not demand such a position, unless, indeed, we infer (cf. 1 S 20: 12) that David went to Nob with the intention of proceeding to Bethlehem (5 miles S of Jerusalem). There is no sure strong reason against assuming that in all three passages the same place is referred to. In Neh 20: 18 is referred to. In Neh 11: 18 and in 20: 12. It is closely connected with Anathoth, 23 miles N of Jerusalem. Since in 18: 11, 20: 12, 20: 18, and 20: 12, it is referred to in the Assyrian and Babylonian records, the place from which it threatens Jerusalem, the site is best sought for on an eminence a little N of the city, perhaps in particular (with Driver) on the mountain of Meashor, about which it narrows. This point the ridge from the brow of which the pilgrim along the road north still catches his first view of the holy city.

The name has not survived; and the identification of Hosea 8: 27, 28 is rejected with the correctness of the Hebrew text in Is 10: 4.

G. B. GRAY.

NOBAH. — 1. A clan name of the Israelites who conquered the city of Kenath (wh. see). 2. A place named with Nophel in the account of Gideon's pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8: 1), possibly also in Nu 21: 1-24, where the Sireh reads 'Nobah which is on the desert,' instead of Nophah which reacheth unto Medea. This may have been the original settlement of the clan of that name. It should be sought, probably, near the upper reaches of the Jabbok; but the site has not been recovered. W. EWING.

NOD. — According to Gn 4: 10, the country in which Cain the fratricide took up his abode after his sentence of banishment. The place is unknown. It is probably connected in some way with 'nobi' of v. 14 (RV 'wanderer'). The addition 'eastward of Eden' is of little help for its location. J. F. M'Curdy.

NOBADA. — The name of a tribe mentioned in 1 Ch 5: 12, among with Naphish and Jetur, as among the clans of Egypt. Later, Memphis was said to be the residence of the remote Thebes, which could not be accomplished till Lower Egypt was prostrate. The Theban Ammon was often entitled 'Amen-RE, king of the gods,' being in some way connected with the sun-god. His figure is that of a man, generally coloured green. The ram was his sacred animal. In Ethiopia he was adopted as the national god, and his worship was established in the Oases, especially in the Oasis of Ammon (Siwa), where his oracle was visited by Alexander.

J. F. M'Curdy.

NOEBA. (1 Es 5: 1) — Nekoda Est 2: 3, Neokan 1 Es 5: 12.

NOGAH. — One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (1 Ch 3: 14).

NOH. — Fourth 'son' of Benjamin (1 Ch 8: 45). See also Meshubah.

NOISOME. — Nosisome is literally 'anony-some.' The adj. means 'offensive,' 'injurious' in AV; the word is now rather rarely used, but when it is used it means 'bothersome' rather than 'offensive.'

Noph. — See Memph.

NFOPHAR. — See Nahor.

NORTH COUNTRY, LAND OF THE NORTH. — A phrase of somewhat vague application, but denoting a general form. —1. The source or region from which dangerous foes were to come upon Palestine (so in Jer 6: 16, Zec 6: 1). 2. The regions to which the people of Israel or Judah had been exiled, especially as they were to be restored (so in Jer 3: 16, 18, 3: 19, Zec 6: 11). 3. Northern Syria (so Jer 46: 10). The last-named instance explains itself. The other applications of the term may be further illustrated by the usage of the word 'north' generally in OT. Here it is sufficient to recall the general fact that, while in the early history of Israel the land was invaded by many small peoples from the east and south, after the rise of the Assyrian and Babylonian powers the attacks were made by larger armies which came in the course of their march down through Syria or the Mediterranean coast-land, the eastern desert route being impossible. Deportations of captives were naturally effected by the same routes, and by the same routes they would return. Thus, though Babylonia was in the same latitude as Palestine, it was included among the countries of the 'north.'

J. F. M'Curdy.

NOSE, NOSTIRLS. (Saph is the usual term, only in Job 41: 22, nochar in Job 39: 20, A V 'nostirls,' RV, correctly, 'anomal.') — To have a flat, or more probably 'slit' nose (Lv 21: 20), disqualified a man for the making of offerings. The nose is the organ of the breath by which men live (Gen 2:7 etc.). The breath is easily stopped or expelled, hence the sign signifies the transmission of human life (Le 26:18). Excited breathing, with distention of the nostrils when moved by indignation, led to the nose being used fig. for anger (Gen 27:29, and very often). Ezek 8:9 refers to the custom of putting a censer containing incense on the nose, apparently as a.locus of worship, the significance of which is now obscure. For ‘nose-ring,’ see ORNAMENTS, § 2.

Nought.—See Nought; and notice, further, the phrase ‘set at nought’ (Pr 19, Mk 9:4). ‘To set to’ ‘to value,’ and ‘nought’ is ‘nothing,’ so the phrase means to reckon of no value.

Novice.—In 1 Ti 3:1 it is enjoined that the bishop must not be a novice. The Gr. word (νεοφύτος, lit. ‘newly planted’) was afterwards used in the technical sense of one who has not yet taken religious vows. Here it is general—one newly introduced into the Christian community.

Number.—1. Notation.—The decimal scale of notation was used by the Israelites, Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and so far as we know by the other nations mentioned in the Bible, i.e. they reckoned by units, tens, hundreds, etc.

2. Variety and range of numerical terminology.—The Heb. language expresses integers from 1 to any amount by words denoting units, tens, a hundred, two hundred, a thousand, two thousand, ten thousand, twenty thousand, and by combinations of these words. Thus the highest number expressed by a single word is 20,000, the word used meaning and denoting ten thousand. The word ‘millions’ in AV of Gn 24:2 is a mistranslation; it should be ‘ten thousands’ as in RV. The number referred to in this verse, ‘thousands of thousands,’ for the descendants hoped for from Rebekah, and the number of the angels in Dn 7:10, Rev 5:11, ‘thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him,’ if taken literally, would be the largest numbers mentioned in the Bible, but they are merely rhetorical phrases for countless, indefinitely large numbers. In Rev 7:7 the redeemed are ‘a great multitude which no man could number’ (cf. Gn 15:1)—the nearest approach which the Bible makes to the mathematical idea of infinity.

The largest literal number in the Bible is the number of Israelites fit for war service ascertained by David’s census as 1,100,000. In addition to the men of Judah 470,000 (1 Ch 21:6). In 2 S 24, however, the numbers are 800,000 and 500,000 respectively. Close to this comes the army of Zerah (2 Ch 14:14), ‘a thousand thousand,’ and in 2 Ch 17:22, Jehoshaphat has an army in five divisions, of 300,000, 280,000, 200,000, 200,000, 150,000 respectively. The number of fighting men amongst the Israelites is given in Nu 26 as 603,550; and later on in Nu 29:4 as 601,730.

Hebrew also possessed a few special forms for the ordinals, first, second, etc., and to denote ‘seven times,’ etc.; in other cases, especially for the higher numbers, the cardinals are used. There are also a few words for fractions, ‘a third,’ ‘a quarter.’

The Biblical Greek calls for no special comment; the writers had at their disposal the ordinary resources of the Gr. With the first part of the Gr. text of the NT, numbers are denoted by words. This method is also the only one used in the two ancient Heb. inscriptions—the Moabite Stone (rather later than Ahab), and the Sifram inscription (usually ascribed to the time of Hezekiah). As the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Phoenicians used figures as well as words to denote numbers, it is possible that the Israelites also had arithmetical figures; but at present there is no positive evidence of such a usage.

In later times the Jews used consonants as numerical signs; the units from one to nine were denoted by the first nine letters, the tens from ten to ninety by the next nine, and the hundreds from one hundred to the remaining four letters. Other numbers were denoted by combinations of letters. A curious feature of this system is that the natural combination for 15, viz. Yod—dale, was not used because ‘Yod, Dale’ or Yath was a term denoting ‘tribe’ or ‘clan’ (see Jg 6:5, 1 S 10); so that ‘a thousand’ might contain comparatively few men. This method has been applied to make the census in the Bk. of Numbers more credible by reducing the total amounts; but it is clear that the narrative as it stands intends 'thousand' to be a numeral, and does not use the word for a 'class'.

6. Accuracy of numbers.—Without attempting an exhaustive consideration of the accuracy of numbers as given by the original authors, we may point out that we should not expect a large measure of mathematical accuracy in original numbers. Often, as events are seen, they are apparently given as round numbers. Moreover, in the case of large numbers they would seldom be ascertained by careful enumeration. The numbers of armies—especially hostile armies—of ships, and so forth, would usually be given on a rough estimate; and such estimates are seldom accurate, but for the most part exaggerated. Moreover, primitive historical criticism revealed in constructing hypothetical statistics on the slightest data, or, to put the matter less prosaically, the Oriental imagination loved to play with figures, the larger the better.

But apart from any question as to the accuracy of the original figures, the transmission of the text by repeated copying for hundreds and thousands of years introduces a large element of uncertainty. If we assume that numbers were denoted by figures in early times, figures are far more easily altered, omitted, or added than words; but, as we have seen, we have at present no strong ground for such an assumption. But even when words are used, the words denoting numbers is at times so easily confused with each other, or altered, as to make their meaning uncertain. English. Just as 'eight' and 'eighty' differ only by a single letter; so in Hebrew, especially in the older style of writing, the addition of a single letter would make 'thirty, etc., etc., could, again, in the translation, be entirely different.

A comparison of the various manuscripts, versions, etc., in which our books have been preserved, shows that numbers are specially subject to alteration, and that in very many cases, we are not sure what numbers, or even what letters, were intended. As examples, we may mention as regards the Hebrew text, 666 is given in some MSS as 366, and in others as 76; the number 720, and is represented by the number 666 in the Babylonian Talmud; and the interval from the Creation to the Flood is 2262 years in the Septuagint, 1656 in the Hebrew text, 1567 in the Samaritan text. Again, the number of persons on board the ship on which St. Paul was shipwrecked is given in some MSS as 276, and in others as 76 (Ac 27:9); and similarly the number of the Beast is variously given as 666 and as 616 (Rev 13:18). The probability that many mistakes in numbers have been introduced into the Bible by copyists in the course of the transmission of the text has long been admitted. For instance, in the fifth edition of Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, published in 1825, a thoroughly old-fashioned apologetic work, we are told that 'chronological differences,' i.e. discrepancies, do not appear in the text of the Scriptures. Also, in the different chronology do not imply that the sacred historians were mistaken, but they arise from the mistakes of transcribers or expositors; and again, 'it is reasonable to make abations, and not always to insist rigorously on precise numbers, making the adjustments of scripural chronology' (i. 550 f.).

7. Favourite numbers and their symbolism.—Naturally the units, and after them some of the even tens, hundreds, and thousands, were most frequently in use, and came to have special associations and significance, and a fraction would in some measure share the importance of its corresponding unit, where 'four' is concerned. For instance, if we should also expect to meet with a 'fourth.'

One, suggesting the idea of uniqueness, self-sufficiency, and indivisibility, is specially emphasized in relation to the Divine Unity: 'Jahweh our God, Jahweh is one' (Dt 6:4); and similarly Eph 4:5, 'one faith, one baptism, one God and Father'; and other like passages.

Two.—There were two great lights; men frequently had two wives (Lam 4:8); two sons (Abraham, Isaac, Joseph); two daughters (Lot, Laban, Saul). Or again, where a man had one wife, there was a natural couple; and so with animals; in one account of the Flood they go in 'two by two.' Two men often went together, e.g. Joshua's spies (Jos 2); and the Twelve and the Seventy went out by twos. The fact that men have two eyes, hands, etc., also gave a special significance to the number two. Two or multiples of animals are often required for ritual purposes (e.g. Lv 14:9). There were two tables of stone. Similarly, a half would be a familiar fraction; it is most common in the 'half tribe of Manasseh.'

As sets of two were common in nature and in human society, so in a somewhat less degree were sets of three, and in a continuously lessening degree sets of four, five, etc. In each case we shall refer only to striking examples.

Three.—Three is common in periods; e.g. David is offered a choice between three days' pestilence, three months' defeat, and three years' famine (I Ch 21:1–2); and similarly Eph 1:3, 'three years and three nights' in the tomb (Mt 12:42, cf. Jn 20:12).

Deities often occur in groups of three, sometimes father, mother, and child; e.g. the Egyptian Osiris, Isis and Horus; the Babylonian, the gods Bel, Anu, and Ea. Division into three is common; an attacking army is often divided into three parts, e.g. Gideon's (Jg 7:18; cf. also Rev 8:12, 15).

Four.—The square, as the simplest plane figure, suggests four, and is a common shape for altars, rooms, etc.; hence four corners, pillars, four winds, the four quarters of the earth, N., S., E., W. These arguments show that there must be four pillars in the 'apocalyptic' temples, etc., as we have already suggested.

Five, Ten, and multiples obtain a currency through the habit of reckoning by fives, which again is evidently derived from counting on the ten fingers. The fraction tenth is conspicuous as the tithe; and fifth and tenth parts of measures occur in the ritual.

Six, Twelve, and multiples are specially frequent in reference to time: 12 months, and its half, six months, 12 hours, sixth hour, etc., partly in connexion with the 12 signs of the Zodiac, and the approximate division of the solar year into 12 lunar months. It is suggested that the number 12 for the tribes of Israel was fixed by the Zodiac; in the lists the number 12 is obtained only by omitting Levi or Dan, or by substituting Joseph for Ephraim and Manasseh. When the number 12 was established for the tribes, its currency and that of its multiples were thus further extended; e.g. the 12 Apostles, the 144,000 of the Apocalypse, etc.

Seven and multiples.—A specially sacred character is popularly ascribed to the number seven, and although the Bible does not expressly endorse this idea, yet it is supported by the frequent occurrence of the number in the ritual, the sacred seventh day, the Sabbath; the sacred seventh year, the Sabbatical year; the Jubilee year, the year following seven times seven years; 689
The seven-branched candlestick; sevenfold sprinkling (Lv 4:6 etc.); seven lamps offered (Nu 28:2); forgiveness till 70 times 7 (Mt 18:22); the seven churches of Asia; seven angels; seven stars, etc.; fourteen generations (Mt 1:17); 70 descendants of Jacob (Ex 15); 70 years' captivity, etc. (Jer 25:9, Dn 9, Zec 7); 70 missions (Lk 10). A similar use of 'seven' is found in the Egyptian, Assyrian, and Persian religions, and is often derived from astral worship of the seven heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and the five planets known to the ancients. It is also connected with the seven-day week as roughly a quarter of the lunar month, seven being the nearest integer to the quarter of 294. The Pleiades also thought of as seven (cf. Am 57).

Eight.—There were eight persons in the ark; a boy was circumcised on the eighth day. Ezekiel's ritual has a certain predilection for the number eight.

Forty.—This number apparently owes its vogue to the approximate or perhaps average length of a generation; at least this is a common view. It is a little difficult to reconcile with the well-known Oriental custom of early marriage. The number might perhaps be Great, and by taking the average of the years of a man's age at which his children were born, though such an explanation does not appear very probable. Or the use of 40 for a generation might be a relic of the forty years between the youngest of the two sons of the family tent and sacrifice. At any rate 40 is well established as a moderate round number between 'a few' and 'a very great many.' Thus, in addition to the numerous references, and deliveries of the OT, (60, 64, etc., Isaac and Esau marry at the age of 40; there are 40 years of the wandering; Ezekiel's 40's captivity (295); 40 days was the period Moses spent in the Mount, Elijah and Christ fasted in the wilderness, etc.

A certain mystical value is attached to numbers in later Jewish and Christian philosophy and superstition, perhaps due partly to the ideas suggested by the relations of numbers to each other, and to the practical power of arithmetic; the symbols with which men were thought to have some inherent force of their own. Or, again, if 'seven' is sacred, to pronounce a formula seven times must be more effective than to pronounce it six or eight times.

Great importance is attached to numbers in the mediæval Jewish mystical system, the Kabbala. There are ten sephirot or primary emanations from God, one original sephira, and three derivative triads; there are twelve channels of Divine grace; 613 commandments, etc.

8. Gematria, or Hebraized form of the Greek geometria, used to mean 'reckoning by numbers,' was a late development, but the traces in the OT, are in the latter part of the Bible, in the form of the number being repeated by the author of the number, who is the sum of the consonants of the name of Abraham's steward Eliezer in its original Hebrew form. The number is apparently constructed from the name.

The Apocalyptic number of the Beast is often explained by Gematria, and 666 has been discovered to be the sum of the numerical values of the letters of some form or other of a large number of names written either in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin. Thus the Beast has been identified with hundreds of persons, e.g., Mohammed, Luther, the Pope, Napoleon I., Napoleon III., etc., of whom was especially obnoxious to the ingenious identification. Probably by a little careful manipulation, any name in some form or other, in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, could be made by Gematria to yield 666. The two favourite explanations are Latineos—Latimus (the Roman Empire or Emperor), and Nero Cæsar. The latter has the special advantage that it accounts not only for 666, but also for the various readings 616 mentioned above; as Nerō Cæsar it gives 666, and as Nero Cæsar, 616.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF.

1. The Book of Numbers forms the sequel to the Book of Exodus and contains the history of the Israelites from the stay at Sinai till the arrival at the borders of Moab. The name 'Numbers' is due to the repeated numberings in chs. 1, 3, 4. 26. The book is composed of writings from the prophetical books of J, E, and the Priestly school of P. One passage is from D—21123—Dt 3:4. A minute analysis of the sources, not only distinguishing J, E, and P, but also separating the different strata of P, is necessary for full understanding of the book. The present article, however, can only accept in broad outline the results reached by scholars. The reader is referred to The Hexateuch, ed. by Carpenter and Batten, the art. 'Numbers' by the latter in Hastings' DB II., and Gray's Com. on Numbers.

2. Although the narrative begins at Sinai and ends in Moab, the period of the 40 years' wanderings is a blank, and the events are confined to the periods before and after it. The book consists of three parts: 1—104, 104—213, 211—365.

A. 1104. Ordinances at Sinai.—The section is entirely from P.

Contents.—Chs. 1—4: (a) The census; (b) arrangement of the camp; (c) functions of the Levites. Chs. 5—6: Laws concerning (d) three unclean classes of persons; (e) naming of the camp; (f) the priests' formulae; (g) the priests' formulae of blessing (20—21); (h) Ch. 7: The offerings (identical with the later priestly orderings); (i) Ch. 8: The golden lampstand. (j) Ch. 9—12: Dedication of the Levites, and age of their service. (k) Ch. 9—12: The supplementary Passover. (m) Ch. 9—12: The cloud over the Tabernacle. (n) Ch. 10—12: The two silver trumpets. (o) Ch. 10—12: The two spies. Notes.—Two passages have a corresponding, viz. 7 and 9—14. The rest cover the last 19 days (1—10) spent at Sinai.

(c) The census is referred to by anticipation in Ex 30:23. The strange position of God in the later (20—27) is explained by the position assigned to it in ch. 2, next to Reuben and Simeon on the S. of the camp. The figures of the census are artificial and impossible; they are investigated by Gray, Numbers, pp. 10—15. (b) The arrangement of the camp is based upon the same in the period before Ezekiel (ch. 48). (c) The Levites are instituted as a class of priest's servants—a conception quite at variance with all earlier representations. They are accepted by J in lieu of the firstborn of Israel. The transport duties of the three Levitical tribes, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari, are detailed. Notice that the period of service in 40—20 differs from that in 28—20. (d) The three classes are dealt with in detail in chapters 3, 15 and Nu 19 respectively. The section is supplementary to Lv 26—28. It deals with those who are numbered. The injured party is dead, and there is no next-of-kin. It further lays down that every sacred gift is to belong to the particular priest to whom it is paid. (f) A woman suspected by her husband of adultery which cannot be proved, is made to lie down in the earth, and if she be blameless, no one will suffer. But result in fruitfulness if she is innocent. This and the Nazirite vow (p) are instances of very ancient practices which have survived, in the form of law, only in P. (g) The priestly blessing is probably earlier in origin than P, and may have been used in the Temple before the Exile. Ps 67 appears to be influenced by it. (h) See Ex 25:20—27:2. (i) reads like a later expansion of the commands in chs. 3, 4.

B. 104—213. From Sinai to the desert W. of the 'Arabah.

Contents.—(a) 104—18 P. The move to the Wilderness of Paran in marching order. (b) 105—22 J. Departure from the mountain; Moses asked Hobab to accompany him. Words which Moses used to address him. (c) 12:1—13:18. The Ark. (d) 11:1—14:29. J. Kibroth-hattaavah; the 70 elders, Eldad and Medad; the quails; Hazereth. (e) 12:18 E. Aaron and Miriam attacked Moses; Miriam's leporely. (f) 12:18 J. move to the wilderness of Paran. (g) 13:14 JEP. The sending of the spies; their evil report. (h) Leviticus 16:1—17:4. The 15th chapter of Leviticus is a summary of the law of offerings and libations. (i) cake of first of 'arisoth (7—12), (j) propitiation for sins of ignorance (Ex 23:18), (k) punishment for Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31:13), (l) tassels (Deut 22:13), (m) 16 JEP. Rebellion of Korah (P) and of Dathan, Abiram, and On (Jb). (n) 17 P. Aaron’s rod budded. (o) 18-19 P. Moses and fiery serpents. (p) 18-23 P. Due to the Levites. (q) 19 P. Ritual of the red cow, to remove defilement by the dead. (r) 20-23 JEP. The move to the Wilderness of Zin (P); Mutiny at Kadesh (JE). (s) 21-23 P. The sin of Moses and Aaron at Meribah (P). (t) 20-24 JEP. Edom refused passage through their territory. (u) 20-25 P. Aaron died at Mt. Hor, and was succeeded by Eleazar. (v) 21-2 JEP. Departure from Mt. Hor (P); circuit round Edom; and the bronze serpent (JE).

Notes—(b) Hobah, not Reuel, is Moses' father-in-law; cf. Gen 22:21, 24. (c) A. 2121-32 purely. (d) Moses 17-18.

BOOK OF NUMBERS.

C. 2119-36. Marches and events E. of the 'Arabah and the Jordan.

Contents.—(a) 2114-42 JEP. Itinerary, and two songs. (b) 2121-32 JEP. Amorites refused passage. (c) 2123-25 P. Defeat of Og. (d) 232 P. Arrival at Moab. (e) 22-24 P. JE. Balaam. (f) 25-5 JEP. Immorality and idolatry owing to seduction by the Moabite women; the worship of the Midianitess. (g) 25-30 P. Balaam promised to the line of Phinehas for his zeal in killing the Israelite and the Midianitess. (h) 26 P. The second census. (i) 27-41 P. Case arising out of the daughters of Zelophehad. (j) 27-42 P. Moses bidden to prepare for death; Joshua appointed to succeed him. (k) 28-29 P. A scale of public offerings. (l) 30 P. Conditions of validity of a vow. (m) 31 P. The war with Midian. (n) 32 P. Gad and Reuben, and (o) Manasseh, settled on the E. of Jordan. (p) 33-45 P. Itinerary from Egypt to Moab. 33-46 P. Laws relative to the settlement in Canaan, viz.: (p) 33-46. Destruction of Canaanitish objects of worship, and division of land by lot. (q) 34-46. The boundaries of Canaan. (r) 34-46. Persons to superintend the allotment. (s) 35-36. Levitical cities. (t) 35-36. Cities of refuge. (u) Ch. 36. Heresses (Zelophehad’s daughters) required to marry outside their tribe.

Notes.—(a) v. 14-20 P. take the Israelites from Mt. Hor straight to a spot on the E. of the ‘Arabah, apparently disregarding the detour by the Red Sea and by the E. of Edom. (b) JEP. 22-23 P. contains details of Korah’s rebellion, and of Balaam’s prophecies to the Moabites. (c) JEP. Song of Eision-geber on the Gulf of Akaba; Dt 18-19 gives the previous march southward from Kadesh. (d) The last clause of the song (29:9) may be written, ‘The whole of Egypt is Eision-geber’s possession. One song depends upon its presence or absence (see Gray on the passage). (e) Practically identical with Dt 33:29, the only passage (Dt 23:1) to the borders of Moab, and the last in a Midianitess can hardly have occurred in Moab. The mention of foreign wives in v. 16 may have caused the passage to be excised here. The narrative is only partially preserved, for nothing is said of the ending of the "plague." (f) Vv. 14-20 are closely related to the "plague". (g) JEP. cf. 36:1-4, 12, 14, 27. (h) Passover (14), Unleavened Cakes (15), Feast of Weeks (16), Feast of Trumpets (19), Day of Atonement (7), Feast of Booths (22-33).

(i) These are concerned chiefly with women’s vows, which are treated nowhere else. (m) The story is of the nature of a "midrash": the numbers of the Israelites, and of the slave and the spoils, are arithmetically adjusted to match the numbers of the Midianites, or of the place of lighting. The narrative appears mainly intended to illustrate the rules of the distribution of property (31-41), and the hypothesis of unceasing migration were associated with the dead (32-39). (n) The term ‘Gilead’ is very elastic. In 31, it refers to land south of the Jabbok, but in 33 to land north of it. While in 32 it covers the whole land E. of the Jordan, the towns assigned to Reuben and Gad conflict with P’s theory in Jos 13:12, which is represented in most medieval manuscripts of the book of Joshua in a KGU text. The towns assigned to Reuben and Gad conflict with P’s theory in Jos 13:12, which is represented in most medieval manuscripts of the book of Joshua in a KGU text. (o) 33-45 P. The narrative begins, ‘The sons of Levi are divided into several sections; Gilead, Joppa, and Reuben to the south of the N. end of the Dead Sea. In the present passage the towns of Reuben lie between Gadite and Gilead; towns situated to the N. and the S. of them. v. 24-26 (JEP) represent the men of Gilead on the W. of Jordan as older than that on the E. The verses are a fragment, similar to Jg 1 and the older parts of Joshua. (p) The itinerary falls into four parts: (q) Rameses to the Wilderness of Sinai; (r) to Kadesh, Wilderness of Zin (one stage of 70 miles); (s) thence to Kadesh, Wilderness of Zin (one stage of 70 miles); (t) thence to the steppe of Moab. (u) The objects mentioned are ‘figured stones’ (xiv), ‘wood of the meeting’; Lv 26-28, only, moath, images, and ‘high places’. (v) The boundaries are ideal, at least on the west, for the Israelites never occupied a spot on the coast during their whole journey. (w) The genealogies show Levites had no land property, but were commended to the charity of the rest of Israel; (x) priests and Levites were marked by their distinctive rituals, which are not in the list of Levitical cities. (y) The earlier laws of asylum are given in Ex 21:14, 19:14-18, the development of the procedure is noteworthy. (a) A supplement to 273-31. 3. Broadly speaking, the value of JE's narratives lies in their portrayal of character, that of P's in embodiment of ecclesiastical ideas. In JE the character of Moses is strongly marked, in its strength and its occasional weakness: e.g. his humble piety (12); his trust in J (10:23), his faithfulness to and intimacy with Him (12:9), his affection for his people (11:14-217), his generosity and public spirit (12:23-12); and with this his despondency (11:4-20) and provocation by the people (parts of 20:3-4). And no less vivid is the portrayal of the character of the people—their dislike of restraint, their selfish murmurs, their vehement repentance followed by wilful self-assertion.
The narratives of JE were not compiled for the sake of recording history; it was a prophet with a keen sense of the religious meaning of history. And his view of central character revealed in events is not an incidental, but a primary, element in his work.
And side by side with this is his conception of the relation between J and Israel. J, as Israel's only God, commands every action and step in the drama;
and obedience to Him is followed by prosperity, while disobedience always brings trouble.

The spontaneity and simplicity of the earlier narratives are in marked contrast with the artificial idealism of P. The writings which we know collectively as P extend over centuries, but they were one and all the work of ecclesiastics. Narratives and laws alike were methods of representing the hierocratic conditions either actually prevailing before the Exile, or contemplated by the writers as desirable. Ecclesiasticism entered also into their conceptions of J. In early days any man might 'meet' with J and inquire of Him at the Tent, which was pitched outside the camp (Ex 33:7-11 E). But now the presence of J is protected from pollution by the sacred barrier of the priests and Levites, 'that there be no wrath upon the congregation' (Nu 19). Real matters of abiding consequence to man—sin, and J's attitude towards it, and the means of forgiveness and are hardly touched. And if this description seems to leave in P little of spiritual value, it must be answered that its value lies partly in the very evidence that it affords of the deadening influence produced upon spiritual life, and even upon literary art, by a narrow ecclesiasticism which has itself as its only aim. The age and the writings of the Priestly school are an invaluable background, to show up all the more clearly the brightness of the age which followed it, when universal approach to God was thrown open by 'another priest, who hath been made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an indissoluble life' (He 7:3). A. H. M'Neile.

NUMENIUS.—One of an embassy sent (c. n.c. 144) by the Jews to Rome and Sparta (1 Mac 12:14). He visited Rome on a similar errand a few years later (1 Mac 14:16-18).

NUN.—The fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 14th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

NUN.—The father of Joshua (Ex 33:1, Nu 11:1, Jos 1: etc.).

NURSE.—Healthy women among the Hebrews in ancient times were accustomed to suckle their own children (Gen 21:1). As in Palestine to-day, the child was suckled for a long time, sometimes as much as three years (1 S 19:13, 2 Mac 7:5). Weaning was the occasion of a joyful feast (Gen 21:1, 1 S 1). But the nurse was also found in olden times in Israel, and was often held in great affection and honour (Gen 24:20 33:1, Ex 2:2, 2 K 11:1, 1 S 19:6, 1 Th 2:2). The nurse, ménethe', tr. 'nurse' in Nu 4:4, 2 S 4:4, which means the attendant in charge of the child.

W. Ewing.

NUTS.—1. 'qédzi (Gr 6:7), without doubt the fruit of the walnut-tree (Juglans regia), called to-day in Arab. saw. 'beremt (Gen 41:33) means pistachio nuts, the fruit of Pistacia vera, a tree widely cultivated in Palestine. The nuts, known in Arab. as flqyu, are very great favourites; they are eaten raw, and also made into various sweets and confectionery.

NYMPHA(S).—An influential Colossian Christian (Col 4:1). His house was used as a meeting-place for Christians. The question of the correct reading is a difficult one, and it is uncertain whether it should be Nympheas or Nymphe, a man or a woman. Nothing further is known of the person named. Morley Stevenson.

OAK.—

1. 'Hón, Gn 35:2, Jg 6:19, 2 S 18:11, 1 K 19:1, 1 Ch 11:7, Is 1:13, Jl 6:14, Hos 4:14; (Vale of) Elah' [RVm 'terebinth'], 1 S 17:4-21, Jg 6:3 [AV 'tall tree'].'Elah elsewhere always tr. 'oak' [RVm 'terebinth'], a slight variant, Jos 13:21). 2. 'Elim, perhaps pl. of 'Elah', Is 19:1, 'oaks' [RVm 'terebintas'] 57 [AV 'holo', mg. 'oak', RVm 'oak'] 611 'trees'. The meaning of 'Elim in Exk 31:14 is obscure, if the text be correct. These words, 'Elah, 'olah, and 'elim, all apparently refer to the terebinth (wh. see) 3. 'allón, cannot be the same as 'ela, because it occurs with it in Is 6:9, Hos 4:14; see also Gn 35:9, Is 44:4, Am 2:14. In Is 24:4, Ezek 27:33, Ez 17:11 the 'allonim 'oaks') of Sabaan are mentioned. In Jps 10:29 (AV) 'allón' is treated as a proper name. 4. 'Elón, probably merely a variation of 'allon, is in Gn 12:13 13:4 14:18, Dt 11:9, Jg 4:6. 6, 1 S 10:5 (AV) tr. 'plain' or 'plains', but in RV 'oak' or 'oaks', mg. 'terebinth' or 'terebinth' (wh. see).

Oaks have always been relatively plentiful in Palestine.
Even to-day, in spite of the most reckless destruction,
OATHS.—How the need of oaths must first have arisen can be seen in such a passage as Ex 22:4, "If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or a beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it; the oath of the Lord shall separate them both; whether he beth his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner thereof shall accept it, and he shall not make restitution." As there is no witness to substantiate the innocence or prove the guilt of the suspected person—so man seeing it—God is called to witness. An oath is really a conditional curse, which a man calls down upon himself from God, in the case of his not speaking the truth or not keeping a promise. The use of oaths was not restricted to judicial procedure, but was also connected with a variety of everyday matters; to swear by the name of Jehovah was regarded as a sign of loyalty to Him (cf. Is 48:9, Jer 129:9, Dt 15:2).

There are two words in Hebrew for an oath: (1) sha'bah, which comes from the same root as the word for 'seven' (shab); the Heb. word for 'to swear' comes likewise from the same root, and means literally 'to come under the influence of seven things.' Seven was the most sacred number among the Hebrews (cf. shaḇa'ah, 'week' of seven days), and among the Semites generally. Among the Babylonians the seven planets each represented a god. Originally, therefore, there must have been a direct connection between this sacred number and the oath; of his usual or common form, simply 'God be upon thee;' which, strictly speaking, means a 'curse,' and was a stronger form of oath. The combination of both words was used especially on solemn occasions, e.g. Nu 6:25 (cf. Mt 26:26 of Peter's denial).

There were various forms used in taking an oath, e.g. 'God do so to me and more also if ...' (1 K 2:9); this form was often jotted down in the account of the case, whether being left indeterminate in this form; this is to be explained from the fact that there was a fear lest the mention of the curse should ipso facto bring it to pass; it is a remnant of animistic conceptions (i.e. there was the fear that a demon might think his services were required). In later times, however, the nature of the curse is sometimes mentioned, e.g. ... 'saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire' ... (Jer 29:9; cf. Is 65:4, Zec 8:14). Another form was: 'God is witness between me and thee' (Ge 31:44), or, 'The Lord be a true and faithful witness amongst us, if ...' (Jer 42:9); a more common form is: 'As the Lord liveth' (Jg 8:3), which is sometimes varied by the addition of a reference to the person to whom the oath was given. An other form was: 'God judge between us' (Ge 31:44). God Himself is conceived of as taking oaths: 'By myself have I sworn ...' (Ge 22:24). The usual gesture in taking an oath was to raise the hand and stretch out the arm towards heaven (Dt 32:49, 12); another motive being to point to the dwelling-place of God; to 'raise the hand' became an expression for 'to swear' (Ex 6:1, Nu 14:19). Another gesture is referred to in Gn 42:47, 48, v. putting the hand under the thigh; the organ of generation was regarded as particularly holy by the Hebrews.

With regard to the breaking of an oath see Lv 6:1-20, and for the use of oaths in ratifying a covenant see Gn 21:31-32, 26:3, 31:4, Jos 2:8, 2 K 15:2. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

OABDIAH is a name of a type common among the Semitic peoples; it occurs frequently in the OT, for the most part as the name of persons of whom little or nothing is known. It has also been found on an ancient Hebrew seal. For the meaning of the name, 'servant of Jehovah,' see art. SERVANT OF THE LORD, § 2. The different persons thus named are—1. The author of the Vision of Obadiah; see following article. 2. Ahab's steward, the protector of Obadiah's prophecies against Jezebel (1 K 18:18-19). This person lived in the 9th cent. B.C. 3. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:28), who lived, to judge from his position in the genealogy, about b.c. 700. On the probable genuineness of the genealogy see G. B. Gray, Studies in Heb. Proper Names, p. 241 f. 4. An Issacharite (1 Ch 7:2). 5. A descendant of David in the 5th cent. B.C., if the Hebrew text (1 Ch 3:9) correctly makes him a grandson of Zerubbabel, but in the 4th if the LXX is right and he belonged to the ninth generation after Zerubbabel. 6. The head of a family who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:—Abordes of 1 Es 5:8). A priestly contendents of Hezekiah (Neh 10:5). 7. A door-keeper (Neh 12:9). 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. Various persons in the genealogies or stories of the Chronicler (1 Ch 9:2 [—Aboba, Neh 11:7] 12:27 19, 2 Ch 17:34). On the Chronicler's use of such names, see G. B. Gray, op. cit., pp. 170-176. G. B. GRAY.

OABDIAH, BOOK OF.—The questions as to the origin and interpretation of this, the shortest book of the OT, are the more crucial because the only title describes the book as a 'vision' (cf. Is 1, Nah 1) and ascribes it to Obadiah. Obadiah is one of the commonest of Hebrew names, and occurs both before and after the Exile; preceding attempts have been made to identify the author of the book with one or other of the persons of the same name mentioned in the OT.

The book of Obadiah stands fourth in order (in the Greek version, fifth) of the prophets whose works were collected and edited in (probably) the 3rd cent. B.C.; the collection since the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. has been known as 'The Twelve.' Thus Obadiah was written very early, and may be almost contemporary (cf. Micah [Is. 56, ch. 7]). By the place which he gave this small book in his collection the editor perhaps intended to indicate his belief that it was of early, i.e. pre-exilic, origin. But the belief of an editor of the 3rd cent. B.C. is not good evidence that a book was written earlier than the 6th century. The relative probabilities of the different theories of its origin must be judged by internal evidence; this, unfortunately, is itself uncertain on account of ambiguities of expression.

It will be convenient to state first what appears on the whole the most probable theory, and then to mention more briefly one or two others. The book contains two themes: (1) a prophetic interpretation of an overwhelming disaster which has already befallen Edom (vv. 1-5, 12-15, 15); (2) a prediction of a universal judgment and specifically of judgment on Edom which is now imminent (vv. 16-19, 20-21).

1. The prophetic interpretation of Edom's fall.—The prophet describes the complete conquest of the Edomites and their expulsion from their land (v. 7) by a number of nations (v. 1) once their friends and allies (Dt 23:4, 9). This victory is dramatized as Edom's "bitterness in the day of mischief" by the writer, and forms the actual events are described in the 7th century by the prophet of Judah, Obadiah's contemporary, Obadiah the prophet (Obad.).

The verses thus summarized have these points in common: (a) the tenses are historical except in v. 10 ("shame doth cover thee, and thou art cut off for ever") and v. 18, which may be rendered as presents, and interpreted as at the end of the preceding paragraph; and (b) after v. 7, where Edom, in the present text, is spoken of in the 3rd person, Edom is throughout addressed in the 2nd person singular. Among these verses are now interposed others, v. 5, which speaks of Esau (=Edom) in the 3rd person (pl. in clause a, sing. in b) and which may be an aside in the midst of the address, but is more probably an interpolation; and vv. 8, 9 (together with the last clause of vv. 7), which speak of Edom in the 3rd person and unmistakably regard the disaster as future; these wvs. best regarded as an addition by the editor who wished the prophetic interpretation of past fact to be read as a prophetic description of the future. If now vv. 1-2 (or vv. 1-4, 7-10), which are held together by the common feature of their precise date of the prophecy, is later than n.c. 586; for v. 2 cannot be interpreted by any other disaster than the destruction of Jerusalem in that year. The prophecy also appears in vv. 5-7 to allude to the extinction of the Edomites from ancient Edom owing to the northward movement of Arabs—people who had often satisfied themselves with plundering expeditions (cf. v. 7), but now permanently evicted settled populations from their lands (cf. v. 7). This northward movement was already threatening at the beginning of the 6th cent. n.c. (Ezk 25: 1-19); before n.c. 312, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus, Arabs had occupied Petra, the ancient capital of Edom. Between those two dates (i.e., in the first half of the 5th cent. n.c. (cf. Mal 1: 14)), the prophecy appears to have been written.

2. The prediction of universal judgment.—In contrast with v. 7-10, the persons addressed (2nd pl.) are Israelites, not Edomites, and Edom is referred to in the 3rd person. The prophecy prophecies (a) a universal judgment (v. 1), in which the annihilation of Edom by the Jews (not as nomadic) nations as in vv. 1-7; and Israelites forms an episode which is specially described (v. 19), and (b) the return of the exiles from the Northern and Southern Kingdom (v.18, cf. v. 17), who are to re-occupy the whole of their ancient territory—the Negeb in the S., the Shephelah in the W., Ephratham to the N., Gilead in the E. (v. 19), which after elimination of glosses reads, 'And they shall possess the Negeb and the Shephelah, and the field of Ephratham and Gilead'; in particular, the Israelites will re-occupy as far N. as Zarephath (near Tyre), and the Jews as far south as the Negeb (v. 20). The prophecy closes with the announcement of Jahweh's reign from Zion (v. 21).

The prediction (vv. 18-22) scarcely appears to be the original and immediate continuation of the former part of the chapter, but is, like vv. 6, 9, a subsequent addition. The theory of the origin and interpretation of the book just described is substantially that of Wellhausen; it has been adopted in the main by Nowack and Marti; and, so far as the separation of vv. 18-22 (with 19) from the rest of the chapter is concerned, and the assignment of the whole to a date after the Exile, by Cheyne (EB). One fact has appeared to many scholars an insuperable difficulty in the way of assigning the whole book to a date after 586. It is admitted by all that the resemblances between Ob 1:4, 5, 8, 9 and Jer 49:14-19, 10, 12, 13 are so close as to imply the literary dependence of one of the two passages on the other; it is further admitted by most, and should be admitted, that the common matter is in its more original form in Obadiah, and that therefore so much at least of Obadiah is prior to Jer 49:14-19, 10, 12, 13, and therefore prior to the year n.c. 604, if the theory that was commonly held with regard to the date of Jer 46-49 be admitted. But of recent years many have questioned whether Jer 46-49, at least in its present form, is the work of Jeremiah at all, and consequently whether it was necessarily written before 586. If the argument that Ob 1:4, 5 is pre-exilic be accepted, it is necessary to account for what are now generally admitted to be the allusions to the events of 586 in Ob 12-14. This has been done by assuming that Ob. and Jer. alludes quote from a pre-exilic prophecy, but that Obadiah himself prophesied after n.c. 586. As to the authors cited by them, scholars differ; e.g. Driver considers that Ob 1:4, 5 is derived from the old prophecy; G. A. Smith, that vv. 1, 4-8, 10 are quotations, but that v. 4, which he admits presupposes later conditions, is by Obadiah himself. The weakness of these theories lies in the fact that the distribution of the parts of the text allows the concrete differences of style indicated above, and that v. 4 either receives no adequate interpretation, or is torn away from v. 9, with which it certainly seems closely connected. As to the other arguments as may be pre-exilic, no agreement has been reached among those who hold them to be pre-exilic; no known circumstances explain the allusions. It is also very uncertain whether any inference can safely be drawn from the allusion to Sepharad (wh. sec) in v. 9.

For further discussion of many details, some of which have of necessity been left unmentioned here, and for an acceptance of other theories as well as the one here adopted, the English reader will best consult Driver, LOT; G. A. Smith, Book of the Twelve, ii. 183-184 (with a critical translation); Sotheby's art. in Hastings' DB, and Cheyne's in E.B.

OBAAL (Gen 10: 17).—See Ebal, No. 1.

OBED.—1. The son of Boaz and Ruth, the father of Jesse and grandfather of David (1 Ru 4), and an ancestor of our Lord (Mt 1: 5, 6).

OBED-edom.—1. A Philistine, a native of Gath, who lived in or near Jerusalem. In his house David deposited the ark after the death of Uzzah, and here it remained three months, bringing a blessing by its presence (2 3 6, 1 Ch 15: 16). It is in all probability the same O. that appears as.—2. The eponym of a family of door-keepers in the Temple (1 Ch 15: 24, 16: 24, 2 Ch 23, 9), 3. The eponym of a post-exilic family of singers (1 Ch 15: 16).

OBEDIENCE.—Occasionally this word occurs in Scripture to express the duty of one person to another, as in Dt 21: 15, 16, 22: 16, 2 Th 3: 1, Eph 6: 1-3, 1 P 2: 13. Much more frequently it expresses the duty of man to God (1 S 15: 22, Jer 11: 20, 14: 23). The spirit of obedience is the primal and indispensable requirement for acceptance by the Father. The Son of God Himself was made perfect through obedience (He 5: 9), and only this. It was the motto of His earthly life, 'I am come to do thy will, O God' (He 10: 7). The one lesson of the life of Jesus is the one lesson of the word of God from first to last—God must be obeyed. Absolute obedience was essential to the fulfillment of His mission. Absolute obedience is essential to our own salvation. A life of having learned obedience, He became a Saviour to those who obey (He 5). Obedience is as necessary with us as it was with Him. Obedience is as possible with us as it was with Him. For He is able to work in us now the very same mind that was in Him, the same disposition and spirit He had upon earth. D. A. HAYES.

OBEISANCE.—Obeisance is obedience (coming into Eng. through the French). It occurs only in the phrases 'do obeisance' and 'make obeisance,' and only in the OT. The meaning of the Heb. so translated is to prostrate oneself in token of reverence or for worship.

OBETH (1 Es 8: 92) = Ebed, Exr 8: 9.

OBOL.—The overseer of David's camels (1 Ch 27: 19).

OBOOTH.—A 'station' of the children of Israel (Nu 21: 15, 33: 41). Nothing definite is known as to its position.

OBSERVE.—Mt 6: 5 'Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him.'
The meaning of the Eng. word ‘occupied’ is ‘reverence’ in some instances ‘possessed’ (see Driver’s summary of the use of the word in his Com. on Dt 19). In the narrative of the oppression of the Hebrews in Egypt, the ‘Officers’ are the Hebrew subordinates of the Egyptian taskmasters (see Ex 5:2): for one of their duties, it may be assumed, was to keep account of the tale of bricks made by each of their companions.

On Gn 37:28 and elsewhere ‘officer’ is the tr. of the usual word for ‘enuch’ (wh. see), but, as 59 says, the original (orit) must here signify, more generally, a court official. Still another word, rendered ‘officer’ in 1 K 4:1 etc., denotes the heads of the twelve administrative districts into which Solomon divided his kingdom, corresponding somewhat to the ‘collectors’ in our Indian administration.

In NT ‘officer’ is, with one exception (Lk 12:16), the tr. of a Gr. word of equally wide application. In the account of our Lord’s betrayal and capture the ‘officers’ are members of the Temple police (Jn 7 etc.), as also in the account of the imprisonment of Peter and John (Ac 5:25; cf. 4:7). The same word is elsewhere rendered ‘minister,’ either in the more general sense of ‘attendant’ (so Ac 13:19; Mx), or in the special sense of the ‘minister,’ (RV ‘attendant’) or officer of the Jewish synagogue (Lk 4:9), for whom see SYNAGOGUE.

The word ‘Ouida’ is used of ‘a collection’ (cf. 1 M 3:24), of members of the tribe of Judah, which is, it seems, to have been formerly called Turda.

The next step takes us naturally to Acre, in later times known as Acon, in which we may find an echo of the earlier Odina.

DED.—1. The father of the prophet Azariah (2 Ch 15).

In v. 4 ‘Oded’ of MT is a mistake (through wrong marginal gloss or otherwise) for ‘Azariah.’ 2. A prophet who successfully protested against the proposal to enrol Judahites (2 Ch 28:2).

ODOMERA.—A chief, slain by Jonathan (1 Mac 9:8).

Oph—As already noted, under ‘of.’ ‘of’ is generally used in AV for the agent, as Mt 26:19 ‘He was mocked of the wise men.’ But there are other obloque or archaic uses of ‘of,’ which should be carefully observed. Thus (1) it sometimes means from (the present meaning of the A.S. ‘of’), as Mk 11:2. ‘Others cut down branches of the trees.’ Jn 15:9 ‘All things that I have of my Father,’ Jn 16:16 ‘He shall not speak of himself.’ (2) concerning, as Ac 5:27 ‘They doubted of them, wherunto this would grow,’ Mt 18:8 ‘He rejoiced more of that sheep than of the ninety and nine,’ Jn 21:18 ‘The zeal of thine house’; (3) with, Ca 2:1 ‘I am sick of love.

OFFENCE.—The Greek word skandalon is properly used of a ‘stick in a trap on which the bait is placed, and which, when touched by the animal, springs up and shuts the trap’ (Liddell and Scott). The word is used by Christ (Mt 18:6, Lk 17:17) of offences in the form of hindrances to the faith of believers, especially of Christ’s little ones. The context makes it clear what kind of stumbling-blocks are referred to. In the corresponding passage in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 18:7; ca 2:4) the eight eye and right hand are given as instances of the kinds of offences that may arise. The members here cited are not only in themselves good and serviceable, but necessary, though they are capable, in certain circumstances, of becoming the occasion of sin to us. In the same way the Christian may find pursuits and pleasures, which in themselves are innocent, bringing unexpected temptations and involving him in sin. The possible applications of this are numerous, whether the warning be referred to artistic gifts (the ‘hand’ and ‘eye’), or abuses of certain kinds of food and drink, or any other circumstances which may lead a man from the higher life or divert him from his aims. All these may be compared to the stumbling-blocks which cause a man to fall. Such things must be dispensed with, for the sake of entering the ‘eternal life,’ which is the Christian man’s goal.

OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE and OFFERING.

OFFICER.—By this somewhat indefinite expression are rendered some eight or ten different Heb. and Gr. words, several of which seem to have had an equally wide application. Of the Heb. words, the commonest is shaburah (Ex 27:9, Lk 11:39) to which a root in which both ‘officer’ and ‘sleeper’ are derived. The latter, accordingly, was originally, it would seem, a subordinate official attached to the higher military, civil, and judicial officers of the State for secretarial purposes (see Driver’s summary of their duties in his Com. on Dt 19). In the narrative of the oppression of the Hebrews in Egypt, the ‘officers’ are the Hebrew subordinates of the Egyptian taskmasters (see Ex 5:2); for one of their duties, it may be assumed, was to keep account of the tale of bricks made by each of their companions.

In Gn 37:28 and elsewhere ‘officer’ is the tr. of the usual word for ‘enuch’ (wh. see), but, as 59 says, the original (orit) must here signify, more generally, a court official. Still another word, rendered ‘officer’ in 1 K 4:1 etc., denotes the heads of the twelve administrative districts into which Solomon divided his kingdom, corresponding somewhat to the ‘collectors’ in our Indian administration.

In NT ‘officer’ is, with one exception (Lk 12:16), the tr. of a Gr. word of equally wide application. In the account of our Lord’s betrayal and capture the ‘officers’ are members of the Temple police (Jn 7 etc.), as also in the account of the imprisonment of Peter and John (Ac 5:25; cf. 4:7). The same word is elsewhere rendered ‘minister,’ either in the more general sense of ‘attendant’ (so Ac 13:19; Mx), or in the special sense of the ‘minister,’ (RV ‘attendant’) or officer of the Jewish synagogue (Lk 4:9), for whom see SYNAGOGUE.

OG.—The king of Bashan, who, with his children and people, was defeated and destroyed by the Israelites at Edrei, directly after the defeat of Sihon. His rule extended over sixty cities, of which the two chief were Abharchot and Edrei (Jos 11:20). The whole land of Bashan was assigned to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh (Dt 31:3, Nu 32:3; see also Dt 11 40 31, Jos 20 91a 135 90). The conquest of this powerful giant king by Joshua long lingered in the imagination of the Israelites as one of the chief exploits of the conquest (Ps 135 9138 9). The impression of the gigantic stature of Og is corroborated by the writer of Dt 34, who speaks of the huge ‘iron bedstead’ (or sarcophagus) belonging to him. According to the measurements there given, this sarcophagus was nine cubits long and four cubits broad. It is, however, impossible to estimate his stature from these dimensions, owing to the tendency to build tombs unnecessarily large in order to leave an impression of superhuman stature. The ‘iron’ of which the sarcophagus was made, probably means black basalt. Many basaltic sarcophagi have been found on the east of the Jordan.

OHEL.—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3:2. [Text doubtful.]

OHLAH AND OHOLAH (AV Abolah, Abolah).—Two sisters who were harlots (Exz 23). The words appear to mean ‘tent’ and ‘tent in her,’ the allusion being to the tents used for idolatrous purposes. The passage is figurative, the two harlots representing the Samaritans and the other Jerusalem. Though both were wedded to Jehovah, they were seduced by the gallant officers of the East, Samaria being led astray by Assyria and Jerusalem by Babylon. The whole of the allegory is a continuation of ideas already expounded in chs. 16 and 20, and is intended as a rebuke against Israel for her fondness for alliances with the great Oriental empires, which was the occasion of new forms and developments of idolatry. The main idea of the allegory seems to have been borrowed from Jer 3:12.

OHLIAH (AV Abolah).—The chief assistant of Bezalel (Ex 31:3 35:2 36:1 238).

OHLIBAH (AV Abolah).—See OHOLAH.

OIL.—With one exception (Est 2:12 ‘oil of myrrh’) all the Scripture references to oil are to ‘olive oil,’ as it is expressed term in Ex 27:2, Lv 24, etc., according to the more correct rendering of RV. Considering how very numerous these references are—some two hundred in all—it is surprising that there should be so few that throw light on the methods adopted in the preparation of this indispensable product of the olive tree.

1. Preparation of oil.—By combining these meagre references with the fuller data of the Mishna, as illustrated by the actual remains of oil-pres, either still above ground or recently recovered from the soil of Palestine, it is possible to follow with some minuteness the principal methods adopted. The olives were either shaken from the tree or beaten down by striking the branches with a light pole, as illustrated on Greek vases (illus. in Vigouroux, Dict. de la Bible, art. 'Fruit'). The latter method supplies Isaiah with a pathetic figure of Israel (Is 17:1 RVvm).

The finest quality of oil was got by selecting the best berries before they were fully ripe. These were pounded in a mortar, after which the pulp was poured into a slanting trough or wickerwork. From this, as a strainer, the liquid was allowed to run off into a receiving vessel. After the oil had flowed and been purified, it formed 'beaten oil,' such as had to be provided for the light- oil for the Tabernacle (Ex 27:2, Lv 24; cf. 1 K 8:1 RVvm).

In the preparation of the oil required for ordinary domestic use, however, the methods adopted closely resemble those used for the making of 'wine.' Indeed, it is evident that the same apparatus served for the making both of wine and oil (see Wise for the names of the parts, and note the phrase, 1 K 2:2, 'the fete [vats] shall overflow the wine and oil'). From evidence, historical and archaeological, it is clear that there were various kinds of oil-pres in use in different periods. A very common, if not quite the simplest, type consisted of a shallow trough hewn in the native rock, from which, as in the similar, if not identical, wine-pres, a conducting channel carried the expressed liquid to a slightly lower trough or oil-vat. In early times it appears as if a preliminary pressing was made with the feet alone (Ps 72:9).

In the absence of a suitable rock-surface, as would naturally be the case within a city of any antiquity, a solid block of limestone—circular, four-sided, and eight-sided (Megiddo)—are the shapes recovered by recent explorers—was hollowed to the depth of a few inches, a rim being left all round save at one corner. Such presses were found at Taanach (illus. Sellin, Tell Tu'meke, 61, and note the impression of Ben-Angier's Harris, Arch. 2 110, and elsewhere). In these the olives were crushed by means of a large round stone. The liquid was either allowed to collect in a large cup-hollow in the stone to drain through, from which hand (PEFSci, 1903, p. 112), or it was run off into a vessel placed at the corner above mentioned (see Sellin's illus., and op. cit. 60 f., 93). At a later period, as we learn from the Mishna, a stone in the shape of the modern millstone was used. Through the centre a pole was inserted, by which it was made to revolve on its narrow side round the circular trough—a method still in use in Syria.

From the oil-mill, as this apparatus may be termed, the product of which naturally, after purification, produced the finer sort of oil, the pulp was transferred to the oil-press properly so called. Here it was placed in baskets piled one above the other. Pressure was then applied for the extraction of a second quality of oil, by means of a heavy wooden beam worked as a lever by ropes and heavy weights, or by a windlass. Details of the working of these 'press-houses' as they are named in the Mishna, and of another type of press formed of two upright monoliths with a third laid across, the whole resembling the Gr. letter Σ, have been collected by the present writer in the art. 'Olive' in EFR iii. 3407, and may now be controlled by the account of the elaborate underground 'press-house' described and illustrated by Bliss and Macalister in Excavations in Palestine, p. 208 f. and plate 92 (cf. also 196 f. and Index).

The expressed liquid, both from the oil-mill and from the oil-press, was collected either in a rock-cut vat or in separate jars. In these it was allowed to settle, when the oil rose to the top, leaving a bitter, watery liquid, the 'omerae of the Romans, and other impurities. Oil in this fresh state is distinguished in OT from the refined and purified product; the former is called 'olathor,' so frequently named along with 'new wine' or must (Arabic, see Winer, § 3) and 'corn' or flour products of Canaan; the latter is always 'shemen,' but the distinction is not observed in our versions. The fresh or 'olathor' was refined in the same manner as wine, by being poured from vessel to vessel, and was Afterwards store, in jars and in skins. A smaller quantity for immediate use was kept in a small earthenware pot—the vial of 1 S 10 and of 2 K 9 RV (AV 'box')—or in a horn (1 S 16:1, 1 K 18).

Uses of oil.—First among what may be called the secular uses of oil may be placed its daily employment as a cosmetic, already dealt with under Anointing (see also OINTMENT). This was the oil that made the face of 'oil' is all Eastern lands, oil was largely used in the preparation of food; familiarity with this use of it is presupposed in the comparison of the taste of the strange manna to that of the familiar 'cakes baked of the manna,' Lev 256, see, further, Maimonides, in Harkavy, 619. Oil was also indispensable for the lighting of the house after nightfall. In addition to the universal olive oil, the Mishna (Shabbath, li. 17) names a variety of other oils then in use, among them oil of agarwood, fish oil, castor oil, and naphtha. That used in the Temple (1 Ch 6:9) was no doubt of the finest quality, like the 'beaten oil' for the Tabernacle above described. The medicinal properties of oil were early recognized (Le 4:3, RVd). The Good Samaritan mixed his with wine (Lk 10:35), producing an antiseptic mentioned also in post-Biblical Jewish writings.

Oil has a prominent place in the ritual of the Priests' Code, particularly in the preparation of the 'meal-offering' (Lv 2:4 etc.). It also appears in connexion with the leprosy-offering (14:1-8) and in other connexions, but is absent from the sin-offering (5:26) and the jealousy-offering (Nu 5:15). For the special case of the 'holy anointing oil' (Ex 30:23-30), see OINTMENT.

As might have been expected from the extensive cultivation of the olive by the Hebrews, oil not only of domestic olive, but was exported in large quantities both to the West, by way of Tyre (Ezk 27:17), and to Egypt (Hos 13:2).

This abundance of oil furnished the Hebrew poets with a figure for man's prosperity, and was used for food, and for lamps (Ps 104:16). 'He shall dip his foot in oil.' From its being in daily use to anoint the heads of one's guests at a festive meal (Ps 23:5), oil became by association a symbol of joy and gladness (Ps 45:13; He 1, Is 61).

OIL TREE ('olathshenum, I R 6:28; plur. 'olathshenum), AV 'olive tree,' mg. 'trees of oil' or 'olive trees,' RV 'olive wood'; Neh 8:14 AV 'pine branches,' RV 'branches of wild olive'; Is 11:1 AV and RV 'oil tree,' RVm 'oleaster'). Where there is such variation in translation, it is evident that what particular "tree of oil" is here referred to is far from determined. The term 'olive' itself is improbable from Neh 8:14, where the olive tree is mentioned just before; and that the branches of 'wild olive' should be specially specified, where so like those of the cultivated variety, is improbable. The oleaster (Elaeagnus angustifolia), a beautiful and common shrub, would suit, except that it is difficult to see how it could ever have furnished a block of wood sufficient for the two cherubim 'each ten cubits high' (1 K 6:23); olive wood (as RV suggests) would certainly seem more appropriate. Perhaps Post's suggestion that it was some kind of pine—the 'oil' or 'fat' being the resin—is as likely as any.

OINTMENT.—With two exceptions, 'ointment' in our EV is the rendering, in OT, of the ordinary word for 'oil,' and in some passages the ointment may have consisted of oil only. In most of the references, however, perfumery is undoubtedly meant. The thin oil, distinguished in Lk 7:43, 'My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with ointment (myron). The extensive use of myron in NT in the sense of 'ointment' shows that myrrh was then the favourite perfume. The dead body, as well as the living subject, was anointed with this ointment (Lk 23:56). Another very costly unguent is described as 'ointment of spikenard' ( Mk 14:3, Jn 12), for which see SPIKENARD. These much-prized unguents were kept in pots of alabaster, as in Egypt, where they are said to retain their fragrance for several hundred years (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 426, with illus.).

In the Priest's Code there is repeated reference to a specially rich unguent, 'the holy anointing oil,' the composition of which is minutely laid down in Ex 30:22-41. The ingredients, in addition to a basis of olive oil, are nard, cinnamon, gopher tree, calamus, sweet calamus, and cassia. The penalty for the unauthorized manufacture and sacrilegious use of this sacred chrism was excommunication.

OLIVE (zayth, cf. Arab. zeit 'oil,' and seerit 'olive tree').—This tree (Olea europaea) is the first-named 'king of the trees' (Jg 9:4), and is, in Palestine at any rate, by far the most important. The scantily covered terraced hillsides, the long rainless summer of blazing sunshine, and the heavy soil of the mountain affords climatic conditions which appear in a very special degree favourable to the olive. This had been so in all history: the children of Israel were to inherit 'olives-yards' (De 8:8), which they planted not (Jos 24:13, Dt 6:11), and the wide-spread remains of ruined terraces and olive-presses in every part of the land witness to the extent of olive culture that existed in the past. A large proportion of the fuel consumed to-day consists of the residues of olive trees. In recent years this cultivation has been largely revived, and extensive groves of olives may be found in many parts, notably near Beth Jala on the Bethlehem road, and near Nablus. The peculiar grey-green foliage with its silver sheen, and the wonderful twisted and often hollow trunks of the tree, are very characteristic of Palestine scenery. The OT writers admired the beauty of the olive (see Hos 14:5, Ps 52:128 Jer 11:19). In some parts, notably at Nablus, a large proportion of the trees are invaded by parasitic mistletoe. The cultivation of the olive requires patience, and presupposes a certain degree of settlement and peace: perhaps for this reason it was the emblem of peace. Destruction of a harvest of olives is a temporary loss, but when the vines and, still more, the olives are destroyed, the loss takes many years to make good (Rev. 6:10).

The olive tree, grown from a slip taken from below the grafted branches of a selected fruitful olive, has to be grafted when three years old, but it does not bear fruit for some three or four years more, and not plentifully until it is about seventeen or eighteen years old; and then, when well cared for, continue bearing for many years. The soil, however, must be carefully ploughed and manured every spring, and on the hillsides the water of the early rains must be conducted to the very roots by carefully arranged channels. When, after some years, the stem becomes too hollow from rottig of the wood, and the crop falls, it is sometimes cut sharp off at the root, and new shoots are allowed to spring up, which, after re-grafting, become a fruitful tree. It has been stated by Prof. Ramsay (Expositor, Jan. and Feb. 1905) that it is a custom in Syria to graft a branch of wild olive into the top of a cut tree (cf. Ro 11:17-18). How this can be of any benefit to the tree it is difficult to see. Nor can the present writer, after careful inquiries all over Palestine, find any knowledge of such a custom. Cf. art. GRAFTING.

The wild olive is a kind of resinous primitive plant—such as occurs also with the fig and the almond—and it takes place whenever the growth of the olive is neglected. Thus the little shoots which grow around the main trunk (perhaps the origin of Ps 129:3) are of the wild variety, and also those growing from the self-sown drupe. According to the felakhim of Galilee, the drupe germinates in the soil only after passing through the alimentary canal of the hooded crow.

In most neglected olive groves numerous little bushes of the 'wild olive' may be seen, which, though very unlike the cultivated tree—having a shorter, smaller, and greener leaf, a bloomy, sweeter flower, a smaller, and as is nevertheless derived from it. As a rule the wild olive is but a shrub, but it may grow into a tree and have small but useless 'berries.' Where groves of wild olives are found in Palestine, they are probably always the descendants of cultivated trees long ago destroyed.

The young wild olive trees, scattered over the mountains in Galilee, are gathered by the felakhim and sold for olive plantations. Such plants are grafted three years after transplantation, and always in the late spring or early summer.

The 'olive berries' (Ja 3:9 AV) ripen in the autumn, and are harvested in November or December. They are beaten from the trees with a long pole (Dt 24:20) and collected in baskets. Olives are eaten pickled in brine, either when green and unripe or when soft and black. They are universally eaten by the felakhim with bread—sometimes the oil itself is used instead, much of which is used in our home lands. The oil is also used extensively for making soap, for frying meat, and for illumination. See OIL. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF.—The range of hills east of Jerusalem, separated from the Temple mountain by the Kidron Valley. It is scarcely mentioned in the OT. David crossed it when fleeing from Absalom (2 S 15:22). Here David was said to have cut out 'the feast of Tabernacles (Neh. 8:10). Ezekiel (11:12) and Zechariah (14:19) make it the scene of ideal theophanies: the literal interpretation of the latter prophecy has given rise to many curious and unprofitable speculations. The chief interest of the mountain, however, is its connexion with the closing years of our Lord's life. Over this He rode on His triumphal entry to Jerusalem; and went over the city as it came into view (Lk 19:39); and during the days when He lodged in Bethany and visited Jerusalem He must necessarily have passed over it daily (Lk 21:29). The fig-tree which He cursed (Mt 21:22) was most probably on the mountain slopes; and in one of these daily pilgrimages He delivered to His disciples the great eucharistic discourse (Mt 24, 25)

On the side of the mountain was Gethsemane, where took place the first scene of the final tragedy.

The ridge is formed of hard cretaceous limestone, surrounded by softer deposits of the same material. It is divided, by gentle undulations and one comparatively deep cleft, into a series of summits. There is no reason to apply the name Qaret (Av. 101, S 186, Lat. 'curved' [AV only]) exclusively to any one of these summits. The southernmost, which is separated from the rest by the cleft just mentioned, on the slope of which stands the village of Sилоarn (Silwan), is traditionally known (by the

Onesiphorus, Reubenite 1

On.—The city of Heliopepe, On also in Egyptian, Gn 41:14, 43:2. The same name in Ezek 30:7 has been intentionally misspelled as Aven, i.e. 'idolatry'; in Jer 43:9 it is called Beth-shemesh, the Rising House

The Ch Aven, eloquent). His name is used variously as the one of the Sun, like its Egypp. sacred name P-Rê, and the Gr. Heliopepe. The city lay on the east border of the Delta, a little below the fork of the river. As the centre of sun-worship in Egypt, its temple was of the highest importance: it was favoured by the kings and served by the most learned priesthood in the land. Tradition makes Plato and other Greek philosophers study in Heliopepe; later, the foundation of the Alexandrian library, on the one hand, deprived Heliopepe of the glory of learning, and, on the other, the old traditions of royal descent from the Son-god had little weight with the Ptolemys. Early in the Roman period Heliopepe was described by Strabo as almost deserted. Besides the enclosure walls of crude brick and mounds of rubbish, the site of the temple is now marked by one conspicuous monument, an obelisk set up by Senwosret I. about B.C. 2000. (See F. L. Griffith.)

ONAN.—A son of Judah (Gen 38:4-6, Nu 26:19, 1 Ch 2). After the decease of his elder brother, Er, he was instructed by his father to contract a levirate marriage with Tamar. The device by which he used the object of this marriage was 'evil in the sight of the Lord, and he slew him' (Gen 38:14).

ONESIMUS.—The name of the slave in whose behalf St. Paul wrote the Epistle to Philemon. As in his Epistle to the Colossians, St. Paul speaks of Onesimus as 'one of you' (Col 4:9), we may infer that he was a native of Colosse. His name means 'profitable' or 'helpful'—not an uncommon name for slaves. The Apostle plays upon this word in his letter to Philemon: 'which in time past was unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me' (Philem 11). He ran away from his master, probably after having robbed him (v.18). He fled to Rome, the common hiding-place of criminals. There in some way he came under the influence of St. Paul, and was by him converted to Christianity (v.19). There grew up a deep affection between the two (v.20). The Apostle would gladly have kept him to minister to him (v.19), but would do so without the consent of Philemon, and therefore sends Onesimus back with the letter to obtain his master's forgiveness and his permission to return to St. Paul.

ONESIPHORUS.—The name of a Christian mentioned twice in St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy (2 Ti 1:5:14 and 40). From the first reference we learn that Onesiphorous had showed special kindness to the Apostle during his imprisonment at Rome, when others, from whom he might have expected sympathy and help, held aloof from him; from the second we infer that he and his family lived at Ephesus. From St. Paul's expression 'the house-hold of Onesiphorus,' it has been inferred that One- siphus himself was dead, and this text has been urged in proof of the lawfulness of prayers for the dead. There is much probability in this view, but the breathing of such a plough wi^h has nothing to do with the later abuses which gathered round this practice.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

ONIAS.—Four high priests bore this name. Onias I. was son of Jaddua and father of Simon the Just (2 Macc, where, however, the Heb. reads John in place of Onias). In his time a letter was said to have come from the Spartan king Areus I. claiming kinship and suggesting alliance (1 Mac 12:25 [H. E. A. B.]; cf. Jos. Anti. xii. iv. 10). Onias II. was son of Simon the Just. His reluctance to pay the tribute of 20 talents to Egypt would have led to great trouble if his shrewd and self-seeking nephew Joseph had not conciliated Ptolemy (Ant. xii. vi. 1).—ONIAS III. was son of Simon II. and entered on his office about a.c. 100. According to 2 Mac 3:3-4, he ruled the city well. A dispute arose between him and a man named Simon. The latter persuaded king Seleucus to send Heliodorus (4 Mac 4:34 substitutes Apollonius) to seize the Temple treasury. Heliodorus, being supernaturally repulsed "paradise" ; Noh went to Antioch to defend himself. He was deposed from his office. In a.c. 175 he was murdered (Dn 9:10). The esteem in which his memory was held appears from 2 Mac 15:17-19. His son ONIAS IV. fled to Egypt and was welcomed by Ptolemy Philometor, who gave him a disused temple in Leontopolis, which he re-built after the model of the one in Jerusalem, to serve as a centre of unity for the Hellenistic Jews (Ant. xiii. iii. 1, 5, SJ 1. 1. viii. x. 2).

ONIONS (κρίκακα, Nu 11).—The onion (Allium cepa, Arab. basil) is and always has been a prime favourite in Egypt and Palestine. E. W. G. MANSLERMAN.

ONO.—A Benjamite city (1 Ch 8:9) named with Lod and Haddus (Est 3:29 etc.), to which his enemies invited Nehemiah to conference (9:3). It was re-occupied after the Exile. It is identified with Kefr 'Aand, to the N. of Ludd, the ancient Lod or Lydda. W. EWING.

ONUS (1 Es 5:9) — Ono (wh. see).

ONYCHA (ονυχήθ, Ex 30:4).—One of the ingredients of the sacred composition which gave a sweet smell when burned (cf. Sir 24:4), where apparently the same substance is referred to as onyx). Onyx was obtained from the claw-like [hence the name from Gr. unyx, 'nail'] operculum of some mollusc of the genus strombus. A similar product is still used in Upper Egypt for funerary purposes. E. W. G. MANSLERMAN.

ONYX.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES, ONYCHA.

OPHIR.—A region most probably in Arabia (as it is mentioned between Sheba and Havilah in Gn 10:26), famous for the excellence of its gold, which was brought to Solomon by his Red Sea navy (1 K 9:28). Jehoshaphat, essaying to send to Ophir, lost his ships (1 K 22:29). It has been disputed whether South or East Arabia was the true Ophir; the only datum is the length of the voyage thither from Ezion-geber—eighteen months, as the double voyage took three years (1 K 10:22). As the vessels probably coasted from port to port, the journey may not necessarily occupy a considerable time. It need not be supposed that the other imports—sandal-wood, ivory, apes, and peacocks—all came from the same place. The most careful study that has been given to the subject is that of Glaser (SÉrze de la Géogr. and Geog. Arabiens, ii. pp. 383-387), who has concluded that it was in S.E. Arabia, in the territory of the Gulfs of Oman and of Persia.

Other theories have been put forward in plenty. The most popular recent view sees in Ophir certain parts of Mashonaland. This theory, apart from other difficulties which it presents, stands or falls with the explanation of certain ruins at Zimbabwe, about 200 miles from Sofala. Like Stonehenge and the Great Pyramid, these remains have been made the centre of much visionary speculation, but their true character seems to have been settled by the recent researches of Randall-MacIvor, who has shown that they are native structures of no great antiquity.

Besides S. Africa, various places in India have been fixed upon, such as the mouth of the Indus, Supara in Goa, and 'Mount Ophir' in Johore. Nothing convincing has been said in support of any of these views. For instance, we are reminded that the peacocks are confined to India and Malaya; but it is nowhere said that the peacocks came from Ophir, and even if they did, they may well have been brought thither by further Eastern trade quite independently of Solomon's Phoenician navigators.

On the whole, the view that Ophir is in Arabia (known to the Phoenicians as auriferous, Ezk 27:9) is the simplest and most in accordance with the scanty data.

OPHRAH.—A town of Benjamin (Jos 18:9); unknown.

OPHRAH.—1. A town in Benjamin (Jos 18:9) which was somewhere near Michmas, and is only once elsewhere referred to, as an indication of the direction of a Philistine raid (1 S 13:19). The data for its identification are insufficient: Jerome states that it was 5 Roman miles east from Bethul. 2. Ophrah 'that pertaineth unto Joash the Abiezrite'—i.e. to a member of a sept of the tribe of Manasseh (Jos 17:5), was the native village of Gideon. It is not mentioned except in connexion with the history of him and of his son Abimelech (Jg 6-9). No satisfactory identification has been proposed. 3. A name in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4:4).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ORACLE.—See Magic, etc., Temple.

ORATOR.—The term applied in Ac 24 to Tertullus, who was the advocate for the high priest and elders against St. Paul. Men of this class were to be found in most of the provincial towns of the Roman Empire, ready to plead or defend any cause, and generally possessed of a certain amount of glib eloquence, with a due admixture of flattery. MORLEY STEVENS.

ORNAMENTS.—See ORNA

OREBH.—See MAGIC, p. 869p.

ORDER.—See PRIEST (in NT), 775.

ORDINANCE.—See DECEER.

ORDINATION.—See LAYING ON OF HANDS.

Orebs and Zeeb.—Two princes of Midian in the invasion of Israel, mentioned as inferior to the kings Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 7:20, Ps 83:11; cf. also Is 10:10). The meaning of the name is 'raven' and 'wolf.' Associated with the invasion put down by Gideon, these two princes were killed by the men of Ephraim, who rose at Gideon's suggestion and intercepted the princes and their followers at the river Jordan. That their death, so briefly narrated in Judges, was accompanied by great slaughter may be inferred from the incidental references by the writers of Ps 83 and Is 10. Isaiah compares the destruction to that of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, while the Psalmist compares the flying Midianites to the whirling dust or chaff driven before the wind. The rock Oreb and the wine-press Zeeb took their names from this incident.

T. A. MOXON.

ORGAN.—See MUSIC, etc., § 4 (2) (b).

ORIA.—See STARK.

ORNAMENTS.—1. The custom of wearing ornaments, either as personal adornment or as amulets, or for both purposes combined, is almost coeval with the appearance of man himself. In historical times in Palestine, as elsewhere, these ornaments were chiefly of gold, silver, bronze, and paste, but the excavations have shown that in the neolithic age a favourite ornament was a string of sea-shells. The Hebrews, especially the Hebrew women, shared to the full the Oriental love of ornaments, which are denoted in OT by two comprehensive terms, dark, generally rendered 'jewels' (Gn 24:22, Ezk 28 and oft.), and 'ad, rendered 'ornaments' (Ex 33:6, Ezk 16, etc.). Lists of individual ornaments are found in such passages as Ex 33:6, Nu 31:8, Is 3:20, Ezk 16:11, Jth 10, although the identification of each article is not always certain.
ORNAMENTS

2. Ear-rings, always of gold or silver where the material is stated, are frequently named, from Gn 35:2 onwards. In this passage their character as amulets is clearly implied. Among the Hebrews ear-rings were apparently confined to women, and to children of both sexes (Ex 34:6), for the phrase in Job 42:18, is not necessarily ear-rings as AV. The only men expressly mentioned as wearing them are Midianites (Jg 8:26). For illustrations of gold ear-rings found at Gezer see Macalister, Old Sidgights from Gezer, Fig. 82, continued in Benzing, Heb. Arch. 2 (1907) 85. The ear-rings of Is 3:18 AV rightly appear in RV as 'amulets' (see Amulet). The pendants of Jg 8:5 RV (AV 'collars') and Ezk 28: oral accounts for the original term, the form of drops or beads, although it is unknown whether they were worn in the ears or as a necklace.

The custom still observed by the Bedouin women of wearing a ring through the right nostril (Dougherty, Arab. Deserta, i. 340; ii. 220, 297) was also in vogue among the Hebrew women. Such was the nose-ring presented to Rebekah, wrongly given in AV as an ear-ring (Gn 24:22, Josh 1:8), as also the 'jewels' worn by the ladies of Jerusalem (Is 48:22). It is so, correctly rendered by RV, and by Jg 8:26, Ezk 28:17, and Jb 26:14, as a correct term for 'forehead,' or the former ornaments. Among the Jews of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, it was common to wear a gold band for the forehead, 8 gold rings, of which 7 were simple bands of gold wire, while the eighth was of several strands of wire, 2 silver rings, 2 larger bronze rings, perhaps bracelets, 2 small cylinders of crystal, 5 pearls, a scarab of amethyst and another of crystal, and finally a silver fastener (all illustrated op. cit. Pl. IV. and Fig. 10).

The ornaments found in still greater variety in the mounds of Gezer are described and illustrated in PEFS from 1902 onwards. A special interest attaches to certain recently discovered graves, probably of the 10th century B.C., and to the profusion of jewelry which can be seen, in character and workmanship to the ornaments of the Mycenaean age found in Cyprus and Crete. For a description of the amulets, bracelets, armlets, rings, etc., found in these graves, see PEFS, 1905, 318 ff. and Pl. VI., 1907, 199 ff. and Pl. 1., 240 ff.

A. R. S. Kennedy.

ORNAN.—See Abanaah.

OPHRAH.—A Moabitess, sister of Ruth and daughter-in-law of Naomi, when a widow returning to her own country, Ophrah, following Naomi's advice, elected to go back to her own people and to her god (or gods), while her sister went with her mother-in-law (Ru 4:11).

ORTHOSIA (1 Mac 15:7).—Placed by the Feutinger Tables 12 Roman miles N. of Tripoli, and 30 S. of Antardus. The name has not been recovered.

OSAINAS (1 Es 8:4) = Jashaiah, Ezr 8:4.

OSIA (2 Es 13:10) = King Hoshea (wh. see).

OSEA = the prophet Hosea (wh. see).

OSNAPPAR (so written in RV of Ezr 4:1) = Anamper of AV is more correct; but the best reading of the Hebrew is Assanappar, a curiously distorted form of Ashurbanipal, the name of the last great king of Assyria (n.c. 668-626), the son of Esarhaddon, and grandson of Sennacherib. He is distinguished chiefly as the great conserver of the ancient Babylonian literature, whose rich and varied collections have come to us from his own library in Nineveh. He succeeded by great efforts in keeping together the empire of his father; and he added thereto the country of Elam in a fierce campaign (n.c. 645). He returned to Nineveh, but all his works seem to have been destroyed. The name has not been recovered.

OSNAPPAR (so written in RV of Ezr 4:1) = Anamper of AV is more correct; but the best reading of the Hebrew is Assanappar, a curiously distorted form of Ashurbanipal, the name of the last great king of Assyria (n.c. 668-626), the son of Esarhaddon, and grandson of Sennacherib. He is distinguished chiefly as the great conserver of the ancient Babylonian literature, whose rich and varied collections have come to us from his own library in Nineveh. He succeeded by great efforts in keeping together the empire of his father; and he added thereto the country of Elam in a fierce campaign (n.c. 645). It was after this event that the deportation, alluded to in Ezr 4:10, of 'Shushanchites' and 'Elamites' to Samaria and the vicinity took place. The war against Elam was the conclusion of a great conflict with Babylonia, with which country Elam on the east and most of the western subject States, including Judah, were in alliance. And it was before Ashurbanipal, as victorious king of Babylonia, that the rebel Judahite Manasseh was brought in fetters to Babylonia, as related in 2 Ch 36:9, whose history has been unnecessarily called in question. J. F. McCown.

OSPRAY ('ospray, Lv 1114, Dt 1412).—Probably the fish-eating Pandion haliaetus, which is still found in the Plain of Acre and at the Huleh. The Heb. name may have included also one or more of the smaller eagles.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OSSIFRAGE (pores—'the breaker,' Lv 1114, Dt 1412, RV gier eagle).—This is the Lämmerganger (Gypaetus barbatus), a great bird with a spread of ten feet across, distinguished from the true vultures by its neck being covered by dirty-white feathers. It occurs in the ravines around the Dead Sea, but is apparently gradually becoming extinct in Palestine. The Heb. poras and Latin ossifragus are both due to its habit of carrying large bones, tortoises, etc., to a great height and then dropping them upon the ground in order that it may get access to the soft contents.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OSTRICH.—1. bath yâ'ânâh, Lv 1114, Dt 1412, Job 3019, Is 1312 3412 439, Jer 509, and Mic 13. In all these references AV has 'owl,' but RV 'ostrich.' Lit. tr. of Heb. is 'daughter of greed.' 2. 'wâ'âmitt, 'ostriches,' Is 495. In the Heb. it is 'foolish vultures,' but in English 'ostrich.' (In same verse chitâdâh 'kindly' is in AV mistranslated 'ostrich.') The ostrich (Struthio camelus) still exists in the deserts to E. and S.E. of Syria; a live specimen was brought into Jerusalem a few years ago, and their eggs are from time to time offered for sale by the Bedouin.

The popular view of the ostrich's neglect of her eggs appears in Job 3914-18, but the following is her real habit. The ostrich is polygamous, and a group of three or four hens, jealously guarded by a cock, lay some thirty or forty eggs in a common nest in the ground, covering them over with sand. During the day the heat of the sun is a sufficient incubator, but at night the birds take turns in keeping the eggs warm. A few scattered eggs, said to be used for food by the young chicks, are laid after the nest is closed, and these have given rise to the popular view. The feathers (Job 3919), the swift pace (v. 10), and the mournful cry (Mic 19) of the ostrich are all referred to in Scripture, and in Job 3012 its cry is associated with that other melancholy night-cry—the 'wailing' of the jackal.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OTNI.—A son of Shemenah (1 Ch 26).

OTHIEL (meaning unknown).—According to Js 113 the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. As a reward for taking Kiriath-sepher, he receives Achshah, the daughter of Caleb, for his wife. Othniel is the first mentioned among the 'Judges' of Israel: Cushanrishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, had oppressed the Israelites for eight years, when Jehovah 'raised up a saviour' in the person of Othniel, who fought against the oppressor and overcame him, thus bringing rest to the land.

W. O. E. CUSTERLEY.

OTONIAS (1 Es 93)—Mastanias in Ezr 103.

OUCH.—The word 'ouch' is used in AV for the setting of a jewel, but it is also used in Old Eng. for the jewel itself. See BREASTPLATE (of the High Priest).

OYES.—See Bread.

OWL.—1. bath pu'ânâh, RV 'ostrich.' (wh. see). 2. yâ'ânâh, Lv 1117, Dt 1412, 'great owl;' lycastophil, Is 2412 'owl,' RV 'bittern;' commonly thought to be the hen. 3. kâs, Lv 1111, Dt 1414, 'little owl;' Ps 10212, 'owl.' 4. qippôsa, Is 3414, AV 'great owl,' RV 'arrow-square.' The description 'make her nest, and lay, and hatch,' certainly seems to point to some bird, but what kind is uncertain.

5. 'amoseth, Lv 1113, Dt 1412, AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl.' See SWAN.

6. 'ebâth (av AScy), Is 3414, AV 'screech owl,' AVm and RV 'night monster,' RVm 'Lilith,' the fabulous monster which is in Jewish folklore such an enemy of children.

Owls are very plentiful in Palestine. Most common of all is the little bâneh (Athene noctua), whose melancholy cry can be heard anywhere in the open country when twilight begins. It is a general favourite and very tame. The great Egyptian eagle-owl, the next most common species, is a large bird, nearly two feet long, with long ear tufts (see No. 5). It haunts ruins, and has a prolonged and desolate cry.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

OX.—An ancestor of Judith (Jt 8). OX, OXEN, HERD, CATTLE.—1. shôr, Gn 3210, 1 S 2211; Aram. sîr, (see Abraham) is used in Ezr 616-717 and Dn 412. S. shôr is used collectively and also for a single member of the bovine species (see above) and other races.

2. 'sphîrim (only in pl.): a general term for 'oxen,' Dt 7216, 117, Ps 81, Ps 1416, Is 106. 3. par 'young bull,' 'bullock'; and pârâh 'young cow.' See HEFEN.

4. 'abîr (in plur.) 'bulls' in Ps 2212, 5011; Is 3414; but 'strong ones' or 'horses' elsewhere.

5. têd, Dt 1416 AV 'wild ox,' RV 'antelope;' tê, Is 5110 AV 'wild bull,' RV 'antelope.'

6. Eher herd, in Jl 1114 conjoined with bâbûr 'berds of oxen; and in same verses with tinâ 'berds (EV 'flock)' of small cattle (sheep and goats).

7. mî'neh usu. tr. 'cattle'; in Gn 4712 conjoined with bâbûr 'berds (AV and RV 'cattle of the herd').

Oxen are specially valuable in Palestine for ploughing (Dt 2215, 1 K 1919) and for threshing, i.e. 'treading out the corn' (Dt 25, 10). They were used for carts (Nu 33); the Circassians, recently settled in Palestine, use them extensively in this way, but not thefellahin. In 1 Ch 1219 oxen are also mentioned as burden-bearers. Their use for sacrifice is repeatedly referred to (see 1 K 3, 2 Ch 29). The cattle of Palestine are small and mostly lean, owing to poor food and much work. They are most plentiful in Galilee, where the pasturage is better; and a much larger breed, the cows of which give excellent milk, flourishes around Damascus. In several parts of the Jordan Valley, notably in el-Batîka, N. of Lake of Tiberias, and near Lake Huleh, the buffalo or jemus (Bos bubalus) is kept by the Bedouin; it yields excellent milk.

For the 'wild ox' (RV tr. of 'zârûm'), see UNICORN.

OX-GOAD.—See AGRICULTURE, § 1.

ÖZEM.—1. An elder brother of David (1 Ch 29).

2. A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 29).

ÖZIAS.—1. 1 Es 89, 2 Es 1, an ancestor of Ezra. 2. 1 Es 38—'Uzzi, Ezr 219, Neh 79. 3. The son of Micaah (Jt 516, 32, 16) (see above).

ÖZIEL.—An ancestor of Judith (Jt 8).

ÖZNI.—See EeRON, 1.
PALESTINE.—See NAARAL.

PACE.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

PACHON (month).—See TIME.

PADAN, PADAN-ARAM (the former in Gn 48:7 only).—The name used by P for the region (or a part of it) designated by J as Aram-Naharaim (see ARAM): see Gn 2:5, 7; 11:18; 13:5; 23:4; 46:16. Padanu in Assyrian denotes a measure of land (cf. 'field of Aram' in Hos. 10:11).

PADDLE occurs only in Dt 23:29, where it is used of a wooden tool for digging, a spade. In earlier English a small spade used for cleaning the plough-share was called a 'paddle,' which explains the choice of this word in the Geneva Bible, whence it reached AV and RV.

PADON.—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel, part with Ezra, and part remaining in Babylon. The word has been read to mean 'governor of Moab,' and referred to a dominion once exercised over Moab. It is, however, more probable that we have a corrupted text. See Ezra 2:8, Neh 7:7; iv 15 42 Phastah Moab. W. F. COBB.

PAL.—The capital city of Hadad (Ch.) or Hadar (Gn.) (1 Ch 15). In the parallel passage, Gn 36: 1, the name occurs in the form Pau. The site is unknown.

PAINT, PAINTING.—See EYV, ART.

PALACE.—Primarily 'palace' denotes simply a large house; so the Egyptian royal title Pharaoh or Palace (cf. Sublime Porte) means 'great house'; and the ordinary OT term for 'palace,' in its strict sense of 'royal residence,' is 'the king's house' or 'his house,' 1 K 7: 59. The only royal residence of which we have any details in the Bible is Solomon's palace, 1 K 7: 59, which took thirteen years to build. This included the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon,' a great hall, 100 cubits long, 50 broad, 30 high, with four rows of pillars; a 'porch of pillars,' 30 cubits by 30; the 'porch of the throne' for a court of justice; a dwelling-house for himself, and another for Pharaoh's daughter. Round about the whole was a great court of hewn stones and cedar beams. In Egypt the palace was not only the royal residence, but also the seat of government. The royal apartments were in an inner, the halls of audience in an outer, court. If we include all the buildings required for courtiers and officials, the 'palace' becomes not a house, but a royal city. A characteristic feature was a balcony on which the king would show himself to his people.

The Assyrian and Babylonian palaces were large and magnificent. In Babylonia, the palaces, like the temples, were built on the top of artificial mounds of crude bricks; and were groups of buildings forming a great fortress.

PAAL.—The son of Uzal (Neh 3:6).

PALESTINA.—See next art., § 1.

PALESTINE.—1. Situation and name.—The land of Palestine is the territory which lies between the Mediterranean Sea and the Arabian Desert as E. and W. boundaries, and whose N. and S. boundaries may be approximately stated at 31° and 33° 20' N. Lat. respectively. These boundaries have not always been clearly fixed; but the convention is generally agreed upon that Palestine is separated from Egypt by the Wady el-Asa'ar or River of Egypt, and from Syria by the Karmiyeh or Litani River, the classical Leontes. Biblical writers fix the limits of the territory by the towns Dan and Beersheba, which are constantly coupled together, and say that the author depicts the local scene in a picturesque manner that a certain event affected the whole of the Israelite country (e.g. Js 20). The name 'Palestine' (AV in J 365, Ex 15, 14, = Palestine; RV Philistia), being derived from that of the Philistines, properly belongs only to the strip of coast-land south of Carmel, which was the ancient territory of that people. There is no ancient geographical term covering the whole region now known as Palestine: the different provinces—Canaan, Judah, Israel, Moab, Edom, etc.—are enumerated separately when necessary. The extension of the word to include the entire Holy Land, both west and east of the Jordan, is subsequent to the introduction of Christianity.

2. Geology and geography.—The greater part of the country is of a chalky limestone formation, which covers a layer of red sandstone that appears on the E. shore of the Dead Sea and elsewhere. Under the sandstone are the archean granitic rocks which form a large part of the Sinai Peninsula. Above the chalk is a layer of nummulitic limestone, which appears in some mountains. Volcanic rocks and some mountains. Volcanic rocks and a layer of basalt on the surface. The mountain region and affords the most easy passage into the heart of the country. This plain is covered with a most fertile alluvial soil. (b) The second strip is the mountainous ridge of Judaea and Samaria, on the summit of which are Hebron, Jerusalem, and the important towns of Jericho and Jericho, with the single interruption of the plain of Esdraelon, runs continuously from the south border of the country to join the system of the Lebanon. (c) The third strip is the deep depression known as the Oph, down which runs the Jordan with its lakes. (d) The fourth strip is the great plateau of Bashan, Moab, and Edom, with a lofty and precipitous face towards the west, and running eastward till it is lost in the desert.

3. Water-supply, climate, natural products.—There is no conspicuous river in Palestine except the Jordan and its eastern tributaries, and these, being for the greater part of their course in a deep hollow, are of little or no service for irrigation. In consequence, Palestine is dependent as a whole for its water supply on springs, or on artificial means of storage of its winter rains. Countless examples of both exist, the former especially in Galilee, parts of which are abundantly Fertile by nature, and would probably repay beyond all expectation a judicious expenditure of capital. The case of Judea is a little different, for here there are extensive tracts which are nearly or quite waterless, and are more or less desert in consequence.

The climate of Palestine is, on the whole, that of the sub-tropical zone, though, owing to the extraordinary variation of altitudes, there is probably a greater range of average local temperature than in any other region of its size on the world's surface. On the one hand, the 2,700-foot range of Hermon and the certain peaks of Lebanon are covered with snow for the greater part of the year; on the other hand, the tremendous depression, in the bottom of which lies the Dead Sea, is practically tropical, both in climate and in vegetation. The mean local temperature is said to be 60° F. in the upland district to almost 100° F. in the region of Jericho.

Rainfall is confined to the winter months of the year. Usually in the end of October or November the rainy season is ushered in with a heavy thunderstorm, which softens the hard-baked surface of the land. This part of the rainy season is the 'former rain' of the Bible (as in Jl 2:23). Ploughing commences immediately after the rains have thus begun. The following months have heavy showers, alternating with days of beautiful sunshine, till March or April, when the 'latter rain' falls and gives the crops the final fertilization before the commencement of the dry season. During this part of the year, except by the rarest exception, no rain falls; its place is supplied by mists, which in some years are extraordinarily heavy. Scantiness of the rain is usually accompanied by very powerful or even destruction of the crops, and the rain is watched for as anxiously now as it was in the time of Ahab.

Soon after the cessation of the rains, the wild flowers, which in early spring decorate Palestine like a carpet, become rapidly burnt up, and the country assumes an appearance of barrenness that gives no true idea of its actual fertility. The dry summer is rendered further uncomfortable by hot east winds, which blow from over the Arabian Desert, which have a depressing and enervating effect. The south wind is also dry, and the west wind damp (cf. 1 K 18:30, Lk 12:24). The north wind, which blows from over the Lebanon snows, is always cold, often piercingly so.

As already hinted, the flora displays an extraordinary range and richness, owing to the great variety of the climate at different points. The plants of the S. and of the Jordan valley resemble those of Arabia or in Nubia: those of the upper levels of Lebanon are of the kinds peculiar to snow-clad regions. Wheat, barley, millet, maize, peas, beans, lentils, olives, flax, mulberries, vines, and other fruit; cotton, nuts of various species; the ordinary vegetables, and some (such as solanum or 'egg-plant') that do not, as a rule, find their way to western markets; sesame, and tobacco—which is grown in some districts—are the most characteristic crops produced by the country. The prickly pear and the orange, though of comparatively recent introduction, are now among its staple products. The fauna includes (among wild animals) the bat, hyena, wolf, jackal, wild cat, ibex, gazelle, wild boar, hare, and other smaller animals. The bear is now confined to Hermon, and possibly one or two places in Lebanon; the cheetah is rare, and the lion (or 17°, 1 K 13:4, etc.) is a distinct species. So also is the hippopotamus, bones of which have been found in excavations. Among wild birds we may mention the eagle, vulture, stork, and partridge; there is a great variety of smaller birds. Snakes and lizards abound, and crocodiles are occasionally to be seen in the Nahal ez-Zerka near Caesarea. The domesticated animals are the camel, cow, buffalo (only in the Jordan Valley), sheep, horse, donkey, swine (only among Christians), and domestic fowl. The dog can scarcely be called domesticated: it is kept by shepherds for their flocks, but otherwise prowls about the streets of towns and villages seeking a living among the rubbish thrown from the houses.

4. History, races, antiquities.—The earliest dawn of history in Palestine has left no trace in the country itself, though, owing to the extraordinary range of excavations hitherto carried out. There was, however, a Babylonian supremacy over the country in the fourth millennium B.C., of which the records left by the 'Labilit' may tell us. These records are as yet only imperfectly known, and their discussion in a short article like the present would be out of place. A very full account of all that is as yet known of these remote wails of history will be found in L. B. Paton's excellent History of Syria and Palestine.

About B.C. 3000 we first reach a period where excavation in Palestine has some information to give. It appears that the inhabitants were then still in the neolithic stage of culture, dwelling in caves, natural or artificial. The excavation of Gezer has shown that the site of that city was occupied by an extensive community of this race. They were non-Semitic; but as they practised cremation, the bones were too much destroyed to be made to assign them to their proper place among the Mediterranean races. Further discoveries may ultimately lead to this question being settled. It is possible that the Horites of Gn 14th and elsewhere may have been the survivors.

About B.C. 2500 the first Semitic settlers seem to have established themselves in the country. These were the people known to Bible students as Canaanites and Amorites. The attempts made to distinguish these names, as indicating two separate stocks must be considered doubtful, and it is perhaps safer to treat the two names as synonymous. About B.C. 2000, as appears by the inscription of Amraphel, king of Shinar (= Hammurabi), occurred the battle of the four kings and five recorded in Gn 14—the first event on Palestinian soil of which a Palestinian record is preserved.

The dominion of Egypt over S. Palestine, or at least the influence of Egyptian civilization, must early have been felt, though no definite records of Egyptian conquest older than Tahmus III. (about B.C. 1500) have come to light. But scarabs and other objects referable to the Egyptians (about B.C. 2800–2500, according to the opinions of various chronicologists) are not infrequently found in excavations, which speak of contact and the civilization of the Nile valley. Of the Canaanites very extensive remains yet await the spade of the excavator in the mounds that cover the remains of the ancient cities of Palestine. The modern peasantry of the country closely resemble the ancient Canaanites in physical character, to judge from the remains of the latter that excavation has revealed; indeed, in all probability the substratum of the population has remained unchanged in racial affinities throughout the vicissitudes that the country has suffered; by the conquests of Tantumce III. (c. 1500), and Amenhotep IV. (c. 1450), Palestine became virtually an Egyptian province, its urban communities governed by kings (i.e. local sheiks) answerable to the Pharaoh, but always quarrelling among themselves. The 'heretic king' Amenhotep IV. was too busy with his religious innovations to pay attention to Egypt's foreign possessions, and city by city, his rule in Palestine crumbled away before the Aramæan tribes, named in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets the Khôhârî. This name is identical with that of the Biblical Hebrews; but it has not yet been possible to put the Khôhârî and the Hebrews into their proper mutual relations. The Hebrews represent themselves as escaped slaves from Egypt who (about the 13th cent. B.C.) were led as a solid whole under a single leader (Joshua) to the complete conquest of Canaan—this is the account of the Book of Joshua. According to the older tradition preserved in Jg 1, they entered the country without an individual leader, as a number of more or less independent tribes or clans, and effected only a partial conquest, being baffled by the superior strength of certain isolated cities. This account is more in accordance with the events as related by the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, but further discoveries must be made before the very obscure history of the Israelite immigration can be cleared up.

The Israelite occupation was only partial. The important Maritime Plain was in the hands of a totally distinct people, the Philistines. The favourite, and most probably the earliest, Philistine town is mentioned in Jg 13:19. It is most likely that they were of Cretan origin; but everything respecting that mysterious race is veiled in obscurity. As above mentioned, it is not likely that the change of ownership affected the peasants—the Gibeonites were probably not the only the "heavers of wood and drawers of water" (Jos 9:27) that survived of the older stock. And lastly, we cannot doubt that an extensive Canaanite occupation remained in the towns expressly mentioned in Jg 1, as those from which the various tribes 'drave not out' their original inhabitants. So far as we can infer from excavation—an inference thoroughly confirmed by the consideration of the barbarous history of the Judges—the effect of the Israelite entrance into Canaan was a retrogression in civilization, from which the country took centuries to recover.

The history of the development of these incoherent units into a free-federated state is one of deepest interest. It is recorded for us in the Books of Judges and 1 Samuel, and the course of events being known to every reader, it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. It is not unimportant to notice that the split of the short-lived single kingdom into two, after the death of Solomon, was a rupture that had been foreshadowed from time to time—as in the brief reign of Ahimelech over the tribes north of Jordan (Jos 9:8), and the attempt of the northerners to set up Ish-bosheth as king against David (2 Sam. 2:3), frustrated by Ish-bosheth's ill-timed insult to Abner (2 Sam. 3): Abner's answer (v.19) recognizes the dependence of Judah and Israel on already existing dynasties. This division must have had its roots in the original peopling of the country by the Hebrews, when the children of Judah went southward, and the children of Joseph northward (Jos 16:8-9; 3:24).

Space will not permit us to trace at length the fortunes of the rival kingdoms, to their highest glory under the contemporary kings Uzziah and Jeroboam II, and the gradual decline and final extinction by the great Mesopotamian empires. We may, however, pause to notice that, as in the case of the Canaanites, many remains of the Israelite dominion await the excavator in such towns as lay within Israelite territory, and the Siloam Tunnels inscription, and one or two of minor importance, promise the welcome addition of a few inscriptions. On the other hand, the remains of the population are scanty—for it need hardly be said that the modern Jewish inhabitants of Palestine are all more or less recent importations.

The Northern Kingdom fell before Assyria, and was never heard of again. Tangible remains of the Assyrian domination were found at Gezer, the shape of a couple of contract-tablets written there in the Assyrian language and formula about B.C. 650; and the modern sect of Samaritans is a living testimony to the story of the re-settling of the Northern Kingdom under Assyrian auspices (2 K 17:14-15).

The Southern Kingdom had a different fate. It was extinguished by Babylon about 135 years later, in B.C. 586. In 536 the captives were permitted to return to their land by Cyrus, after his conquest of Babylon. They re-built Jerusalem and the Temple: the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are the record of this work of restoration.

PALESTINE

In B.C. 333 Syria fell to Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus. After his death followed a distracting and complicated period of conflict between his successors, which, so far as Palestine was concerned, had the effect of opening the country for the first time to the influence of Greek culture and religion. From this time onward we find evidence of the foundation of such buildings as theatres, previously quite unknown, and other novelties of Western origin. Although many of the Jews flung in from the Hellenistic world were a staunch puritan party who rigidly set their faces against all such Gentile contaminations. In this they found themselves opposed to the Seleucid dynasty of Syria, and especially to Antiochus IV.

The kingdom was weakened by family disputes; in the end Rome stepped in. Pompey captured Jerusalem in B.C. 63, and henceforth Palestine lay under Roman suzerainty. Several important towns near Jerusalem, and elsewhere, and a large number of remains of cities and fortresses, survive from the age of the family of Mattathias. The conquest of Simon Maccabaeus, son of Mattathias (1 Mac 13:36), was the first capture of a seaport in Syria. Palestine throughout the whole of Israelite history.

The Hasmonaean dynasty gave place to the Idumaean dynasty of the Herods in the middle of the 1st cent. B.C., Herod the Great becoming sole governor of Judea (under Roman suzerainty) in B.C. 40. It was into this political situation that the Christian was born (called B.C. 4). Remains of the building activities of Herod are still to be seen in the sub-structures of the Temple, the Herodian towers of Jerusalem, and (possibly) a magnificent tomb near Bethlehem traditionally called the Tomb of Machabees. Herod died shortly after Christ's birth, and his dominions were subdivided into provinces, each under a separate ruler: but the native rulers rapidly declined in power, and the Roman government was as already exists. The Jews became more and more embittered against the Roman yoke, and at last a violent rebellion broke out, which was quelled by Titus in A.D. 70, when Jerusalem was destroyed and a large part of the Jews were slain or dispersed. A remnant remained, which about 60 years later again essayed to revolt under their leader Bar Cochba: the suppression of this rebellion was the final deathblow to Jewish nationality. After the destruction of Jerusalem many settled in Tiberias, and formed the nucleus of the important Galilean Rabbinic schools, remains of which are still to be seen in the shape of the synagogues of Galilee. These interesting buildings appear to date from the second century A.D. after the partition of the Roman Empire, Palestine formed part of the Empire of the East, and with it was Christianized. Many ancient settlements, with tombs and small churches—some of them with beautiful mosaic pavements—survive in various parts of the country: these are relics of the Byzantine Christians of the 5th and 6th centuries. The native Christians of Syria, whose families had never been absorbed into Islam, are their representatives. These, though Aramaic in race, now habitually speak Arabic, except in Ma'laa and one or two other places in N. Lebanon, where a Syrian dialect survives.

This early Christianity received a severe blow in 611, when the country was ravaged by Chosroes II, king of Persia. Monastic settlements were massacred and plundered, and the whole country reduced to such a state of weakness that the Persian Armenia and the second Caliph of Islam. He became master of Syria and Palestine in the second quarter of the seventh century. Palestine thus became a Moslem country, and its population received the Arab element which is still dominant within it. It may be mentioned in passing that coins of Chosroes are occasionally found in Palestine; and that of the early Arab domination many noteworthy buildings survive, chief of which is the glorious dome that occupies the site of the Hebrew Temple at Jerusalem.

The Moslem rule was at first by no means tyrannical; but as intolerance developed, the Christian inhabitants were compelled to undergo many sufferings and indignities. This, and the desire to wrest the holy places of Christendom from the hands of the infidel, were the ostensible reasons for the invasions of the bruccaries who called themselves Cruzzadeus, and who established in Jerusalem a kingdom on a feudal basis that lasted throughout the 12th century. An institution so exotic, supported by men morally and physically unfit for life in a sub-tropical climate, could not outlast the first enthusiasm which called it into being. Worn out by immorality, by leprous and other diseases, and by mutual dissensions, the unhappy champions of the Cross disappeared before the heroic Saladin, leaving as their legacy to the country a score or so of place names; a quantity of worthless ecclesiastical traditions; a number of castles and churches, few of which possess any architectural interest, and a number of which, by a strange irony, have been converted into mosques; and, among the Arab natives, an unquenchable hatred of Christianity.

We must pass over the barbarous Mongolian invasions, the last of which was under Timur or Tamerlane at the end of the 14th century. But we must not omit to mention the Turkish conquest in 1516, when Syria obtained the place which it still holds in the Ottoman Empire.

PALU.—One of the sons of Reuben (Gen 46:1, Ex 6:4, Nu 26:1, 1 Ch 5:9). The patronymic Palutes occurs in Nu 26:1. We should probably read Palu for Palti in Nu 16:11.

PALM TREE (搡mәr).—The date palm (Phantix dactylifera) is a tree essential to existence in the deserts of Arabia, and was therefore held sacred among the Semites from the earliest historic times. It flourishes in Egypt, Mesopotamia, and the oases of Arabia (Ex 15:18, Nu 33:5), but its cultivation has for long been much neglected in Palestine. It is still found in considerable numbers in the Maritime Plain, e.g., at the Bay of Akba and at Gaza; and small scattered groups occur all over the land in the neighbourhood of springs. In the valleys east of the Dead Sea many sterile, dwarfed palms occur. Both in the OT (De 11:13, Jg 1:19, 2 Ch 20:25) and in Josephus (BJ iv. viii. 2-3), Jericho is famous for its vast groves of palms; to-day there are but few, and these quite modern trees. Not only are dates a staple diet in Arabia and an important article of export, but the plated leaves furnish mats and baskets, the bark is made into ropes, and the seeds are ground up for cattle. From the dates is made a kind of syrup, date-honey or dib, a valuable substitute for sugar. The method of fertilization of the female (pistillate) flowers by the pollen of the male (staminate) flowers was known in very ancient times, and nature was then, as now, assisted by shaking out the pollen over the female flowers. The palm tree is referred to (Ps 92:15) as a sign of prosperity and (Ca 7:10) of beauty. Figures of palm trees were used to ornament the Temple (1 K 6); at a later period they occur on Jewish coins and in the sculpture of the ancient Jewish synagogues, notably in the recently excavated synagogue at Tell Hûm (Capernaum). The sacredness of this tree thus persisted from the early Semite to late Jewish times. Palm leaves were used at the rejoicings of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lv 23:40, Neh 8:14), as they are among the modern Jews, who daily, during this feast, wave branches of palms in their synagogues. In 1 Mac 13:1 we read of the waving of palm branches as the sign of triumphant rejoicing—an idea also implied in their use in Jn 12:13 and Rev 7:9. To-day these branches are used by the Moslems especially at funeral processions, and to decorate graves.

PALMER-WORM.—Old Eng. for 'caterpillar.' See LOCUST.

PALSY.—The modern form of this word is 'paralysis.' See MEDICINE, p. 599.

PALTY.—1. The Benjamite spy (Nu 13:1). 2. The man to whom Michael, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 S 25:4). In 2 S 3:4 he is called Paltiel. See following article under No. 2.

PALTIEL.—1. The man of Issachar (Nu 34:4). 2. 2 S 3:4, the same as Paliti of 1 S 25:4.

PALTITE, THE.—A native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15:1, Neh 11:8). To this town belonged Helez, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23:34). In the parallel lists (1 Ch 11:17, 27:14) he is described, probably incorrectly, as 'the Peliote.'

PAMPHYLIA.—The name of a district on the S. coast of Asia Minor, lying between Lycia and Cilicia. Strictly speaking, it consisted of a plain bounded (and at its widest part) 20 miles broad, lying between Mt. Taurus and the sea. After A.D. 74 the name was applied to a Roman province which included the mountainous country to the N., more properly called Phœdia, but until that time it was used only in the narrower sense. The plain was shut in from all N. winds, but was well watered by springs from the Taurus ranges. Though lack of cultivation it has in modern times become very malarious, and in ancient times, though better cultivated, the district was never favourable to the development of a vigorous population. Moreover, it was very isolated except by sea, for the mountains to the N. had no good roads, and were infested by brigands. Even Alexander had to fight his way through them.

The name is probably derived from the Pamphylians, one of the three Doric tribes, and it is likely that Doric settlers entered Pamphylia at the time of the other Doric migrations. But the Greek element never prevailed, and little Greek was spoken in the island of Cilicia. Paphlagonian cities in the 5th cent. B.C., the Greeks that they spoke was very corrupt and was written in a corrupt alphabet. Seleucus is said to have earned his prosperity as the market of Cilician pirates. The town of Attalia was founded in the 2nd century. But more important was the native town of Perga, situated inland and having apparently a port of its own on the river Cestrus at a distance of 5 miles. It was a religious centre, where a goddess 'Artemis of Perga' was worshipped, her rites corresponding to those associated with Diana of Ephesus, and being therefore more Asiatic than Greek. The ruins of this city date from the period of the Seleucid kings of Syria. Pamphylia was in turn subject to Persia, Macedons, Syria, Pergamum, and Rome.

Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey crossed from Cyprus to Perga, but seem to have gone straight on to Antioch without preaching. It was at Perga that John Mark left them (Ac 13:13). On the return journey, before taking ship at Attalia, they preached at Perga (Ac 14:1), but by this time they had definitely determined to 'turn to the Gentiles' (cf. 13:14). Christianity was slow in taking hold of Pamphylia,—there is no mention of it in 1 P 1,—and this was probably due partly to the absence of Jewish centres, partly to the backwardness of the district. Christian truth in RV simply transliterates the word, with marg. note, 'perhaps a kind of confection.' AV had understood the word as a place name, 'what of Minnith and Pannag.' Of the suggested emendations may be mentioned Cornill's 'wax' (dōnag), and Cheyne's 'grape-syrup', for which see Honey.

PAPHOS was the name of two cities in the W. of Cyprus, Old Paphos about a mile from the sea. New Paphos (now Baffo) about seven miles N.W. of this.
The Phoenician origin of the former need not be doubted;
the latter was by tradition a Greek settlement, but in both the chief object of worship was the 'Paphian goddess,' undoubtedly of Syrian origin, and worshipped under the form of a conical stone, though identified by the Greeks with Aphrodite. Old Paphos was desolate in the time of Jerome. New Paphos was the centre of the Roman administration in Cyprus. It was here that St. Paul encountered the Roman proconsul Sergius Paulus in his first missionary journey—the first presentation of Christianity before Roman authorities

PAPYRI AND OSTRACA.—Until almost the end of the 19th cent., the most important records of antiquity, part from the authors, that had been preserved for literary reasons, were the inscriptions on stone and metal. Published in great collections, and utilized by scholars of all civilized countries, they have given life to all branches of the study of antiquity, to history in the widest sense of the word, and in particular to the history of States, law, economics, language, and religion. From age of modern epigraphy has been extremely productive of knowledge that never could have been discovered from the authors alone. And the end has not yet come. The researches and excavations of European and American archaeological institutes and of special archæological expeditions, in which the Governments of almost all civilized countries and many wealthy individuals have taken part, bring to light innumerable inscribed stones every year. There are the engineering enterprises for opening up the countries of the Levant to traffic and commerce. In the construction of railways particularly, but also in other similar undertakings, a quantity of epigraphical material is discovered and made accessible to scholars.

These epigraphical records were reinforced in the last quarter of the 19th cent. by two quite new groups of records, both of which have ushered in a new epoch in the science of antiquity, and the Papyri and the Ostraca. Both have led to the development of entirely new branches of study. In comparison with the inscriptions they not only constitute an enormous quantity, but, only of some of our materials, they are of quite the most part ope their origin to princes, cities, and wealthy individuals.

Only those rare inscriptions that originated in the middle and lower classes of ancient society had to some extent counterbalanced the one-sidedness of the materials available as sources. The papyri and ostraca, however, have been an unexpected wealth of the work of poor Rubbish mounds such as that which we now assumed hypothetically to be discoverable in our own country, which in reality, owing to the dampness of our climate, probably do exist anywhere in the West, occurred in large numbers in Egypt. In ancient times the dumping grounds for rubbish and refuse were on the outskirts of the cities, towns, and villages. Whole bundles of documents that were too old to be worth keeping were burned by the authorities, instead of being burned; and private persons did the same when they wished to get rid of written material that had accumulated and was considered valueless. The centuries have covered these ancient rubbish-shoots with layers of dust and sand, and this covering has united with the great dryness of the climate that could preserve most excellently the old sheaths of papyri and the inscribed fragments of pottery. Of course these texts, when re-discovered in our own day, throw a flood of light upon the upper cultivated class, but for the most part they are documents of the middle and lower classes.

It had long been known that papyri was in antiquity a very popular writing material. The pith the papyrus plant, which thrives excellently in the damp levels of the Nile, was cut into strips, laid cross-wise, horizontally and vertically, upon each other, the sheets of papyrus were manufactured by gumming and pressing. Perishable as the material seems, it is in reality exceedingly durable. We possess Egyptian papyri of the time of king Assa (c. B.C. 2600 according to Eduard Meyer's chronology); and most of the papyri now in our museums have lain more than 1500 years in the earth of Egypt. It is therefore not such a fantastic plan that has lately suggested in Italy, viz., to re-introduce the manufacture of papyrus and establish it as a State monopoly in connexion with the making of bank notes. It is hoped in this way to attain a material as durable as it would be difficult to counterfeit.

The first discoverers of written papyrus must have been Egyptian jelihiin, digging in the old rubbish mounds for good earth and other materials. In the third century B.C. a European noticed a number of papyrus documents in the hands of some of these peasants; he bought one, and watched them burn some fifty others in order that they might enjoy the aromatic smoke. The one document came to Europe; it is the Charta Borgiana, the deepathering of which marks the first beginning of papyrology. Though a good number of other papyri reached the European museums in the course of the 19th cent., only a few scholars took any trouble to cultivate papyrology further, until in 1877, a hundred years after the acquisition of the Charta Borgiana, many thousands of papyri came to light from the rubbish mounds near the 'City of Crocodiles' or 'City of the Armenotes,' the old capital of the province of el-Fayyum in Middle Egypt.

This was the beginning of a new epoch that has led to a gigantic development of the infant science of papyrology.
The period of chance discoveries, the harvest of which was used to make the financial considerations to be scattered hither and thither, has been succeeded by a period of methodical excavations carried out by highly trained specialists, who keep together the documents they discover and publish them in collected form. British scientists, particularly, have performed signal services by discovering and publishing papyri. Flinders Petrie has obtained magnificent specimens from ancient wrappings which had been made by sticking papyri together. Grenfell and Hunt have carried out splendid excavations at Oxyrhynchus and other places, and have published their results with a rapidity and accuracy that place them in the front rank of editors, as the world of scholarship acknowledges. Besides these there are many other editors, and every year adds to the army of workers on the texts: philologists and papyrologists, lawyers and theologians, all have found and are finding abundant work. The young and hopeful science has found a centre in the Archiv für Papyrussuchung, a journal edited by the leading German papyrologist, Ulrich Wilcken.

The papyri fall into two great classes according to the nature of their contents, viz. literary texts and non-literary texts. Literary texts have come to light in large numbers, though generally only in fragments. They comprise not only very ancient MSS of well-known authors, but also a large number of lost authors; and lost writings by known authors have been partially recovered. These finds would suffice to show the extreme importance of the papyri discoveries. And many scholars have considered these literary finds to be the most valuable.

But for scholarship as a whole the second group, the non-literary texts, is no doubt the more important. As regards their contents, they are as varied as life itself. Legal documents of the most various kinds, e.g. leases, accounts and receipts, contracts of marriage and sale, wills, denunciations, notes of travels, tax-papers, are to be found in innumerable examples; moreover, there are letters and notes, schoolboys' exercise-books, horoscopes, diaries, petitions, etc. Their value lies in the immutable fidelity with which they reflect the actual life of ancient society, especially in its middle and lower strata.

The oldest papyri date from c. a.c. 2600, and are among the oldest known historical documents. To the 5th cent. a.c. belong the Aramaic papyri from Assuan, published by Sayce and Cowley in 1906, and those from Elephantine, published by Sachau in 1907 — documents that have furnished astonishing information relative to the history of Judaism. In the 4th cent. a.c. the main stream, as it were, begins, consisting of Greek papyri, and extending from the time of the Ptolemies till the first centuries of the Arab occupation, i.e. over a period of more than 1000 years. Associated with them there are Latin, Coptic, Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, and other papyri — so that, taken all together, they confer an immense benefit, and at the same time impose an immense obligation, upon the science of antiquity.

What is the importance of the papyri to Biblical science? It is twofold. In the first place, they increase our stock of Biblical MSS in a most gratifying manner; and secondly, they place new sources at the disposal of the philological student of the Greek Bible.

Beginning then with Biblical MSS, and first of all MSS of the Hebrew Bible, we have in the Naṣi Papyrus a very ancient copy of the Ten Commandments. As regards the Greek Old Testament, we have numerous Septuagint fragments (e.g. the Lepzig fragments of the Psalms, the Heldeepberg fragments of the Minor Prophets), together with isolated remains of other translations. For the New Testament we possess an equally fine series of ancient fragments. But besides these we have acquired quite new material, in particular the great abundance of lost gospels and two papyrus fragments and one victory fragment with sayings of Jesus, some of which are not to be found in the NT. Of course with such finds as these it is always a question how far they contain ancient and genuine material; and the opinion of specialists, e.g. with regard to these sayings of Jesus, are at variance. But in any case, even if, as is not at all likely, they should prove to be of quite secondary importance as regards the history of Jesus, they would be valuable documents in the history of Christianity. Quite a number of the papyri throw fresh light on early Christianity as a whole. Fragments of the Apocryphal and Gnostic writings, liturgical texts, homiletic fragments, remains of early Christian poetry, have been recovered in large numbers, both in Greek and Coptic. But to these must be added the large number of non-literary documents, both Jewish and Early Christian, which are to be reckoned among the oldest relics of our religion. From the time of the persecution of the Christians under the Emperor Decius, we possess, for example, not fewer than five hekla issued to libertarii, i.e. official certificates by the authorities responsible for the pagan sacrifices, that the holder of the papyrus had performed the prescribed sacrifices. To the time of the Diocletian persecution belongs probably the letter of Lemesoris, a Christian presbyter in the Great Oasis, refuting a banished Christian woman named Politike. There comes a long series of other early Christian original letters in Greek and Coptic, from the 3rd cent. until late in the Byzantine period.

Centuries have been supposed to be knowable only from the folios of Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical history is thus very considerable. Less obvious, however, but none the less great, is the direct value of the papyri, and chiefly the non-literary documents of private life.

This value is discoverable in two directions. The papyri, as sources of popular, non-literary Late Greek, have placed the linguistic investigation of the Greek Bible on new foundations; and, as autograph memorials of the men of the ancient world from the age of the great religious revolution, they enable us better to understand these men, and to whom the great world-mission of Primitive Christianity was addressed.

As regards the first, the philological value of the papyri, these new texts have caused more and more the rejection of the old prejudice that the Greek Bible (OT and NT) represents a linguistic idiom determined by scholarship. On the contrary, the habit has arisen more and more of bringing 'Biblical' or 'New Testament' Greek into relation with popular Late Greek, and it has come to be realized that the Greek Bible is itself the grandest monument of that popular language.

The clearest distinctive features of a language fall within the province of phonology and accidence. And in the phonology and accidence we see most readily that the assumption of a 'Biblical' Greek, capable of being isolated from other Greek for purposes of study, is altogether wrong. The hundreds of morphological details that strike the philologist accustomed only to classical Attic, when he begins to read the Greek Bible, are found also in the contemporary records of the 'propane' popular language, especially in the papyri and ostraca. The recent Grammata of the NT by Winer-Schmid, Blass, and James Hope Moulton, have furnished an extremely copious collection of parallel phenomena. Helbing's Grammar of the Greek Old Testament (Septuagint) does the same. The Septuagint was produced in Egypt, and naturally employed the language of its surroundings; the Egyptian papyri are therefore magnificently as parallel texts, especially as we possess fragments from the Ptolemaic period, i.e. the time when the Septuagint itself originated. The correspondence between them goes so far that Mayser's Grammar of the Greek Papyri of the Ptolemaic Period might in many particulars be used as a Septuagint Grammar.

Questions of Biblical orthography, which seem unimportant to the layman, but cause much worry to an editor of the Biblical text, are of course illuminated by the contemporary papyri. The matter is not unimportant.
to the scientific scholar, who must work with the fidelity of the wise steward.

In the same way problems of syntax and of style are considerably advanced by the papyri. It is possible, for example, to place the whole theory of the prepositions on a new basis. The use of the prepositions in Late Greek is very interesting. To mention but one small point, we are now able to make much more exact statements with regard to those prepositions in the NT which denote a vicarious relation—and how important these are in the Apostles’ personal confessions of faith! The syntactical peculiarities of the NT, which used to be traced back to Semitic influence, can also be more realistically paralleled from the papyri. The whole question of Semiticisms will now be able to be treated afresh. Formerly, when the NT used to be ‘isolated’ far too much, the question was generally answered to the effect that the influence of the so-called ‘genius’ of the Hebrew or Aramaic language, especially on the Primitive Christians, was greatly exaggerated. Linguistic phenomena that could not be found recorded in the ordinary Greek Grammars were described summarily as Semiticisms. It was forgotten that the NT and the Septuagint are for the most part documents of the popular language, and that the popular language of Greek and in Semitic was much in contact. For example, the so-called ‘parastatic’ style of St. John’s Gospel and St. John’s Epistles, which used generally to be pronounced strongly Semitic, is in fact a style peculiar to Attic, and has its parallels in inscriptions and papyri which certainly are not under Semitic influence. The existence of Semiticisms in the Greek Bible is of course not denied by recent Biblical investigators—in the books translated from Semitic originals they are really numerous—but the number of Semiticisms has been considerably reduced, and in proportion as the Semitic character of the NT recedes, its popular character is made to advance.

To conclude, perhaps, that derives most benefit from the new documents. Late Greek is rich in new words and new meanings of old words; the virgin soil of the life of the people is inexhaustible. Grammarians of a level in the 19th cent.,—the so-called Atticists—tumped by Attic-Greek of the classical period as by a phantom, fought against these new words and meanings, branded them as ‘bad,’ and tried to root them out. A number of Atticists suffered themselves to be bound by the rules of the Atticists, as if they had been living in the 5th cent. B.C. This unhistorical, pedantic, and dogmatic tendency left the men of the NT practically untouched. Many of the Semitic peoples themselves, for example, the Syriac, spoke, and in the Gospels, for example, they for the first time introduced the language of the people with vigour into literature. By reason of its popular character, the language of the first Apostles is pre-eminent in missionary language, and this language it was that really enabled Christianity to rise to a world-religion. All this is confirmed most amply by the new discoveries. Words that we used formerly to regard as specifically ‘Biblical’ or ‘New Testament,’ we find now in the mouth of the people. Besides the papyri the inscriptions are also rich sources. Illustrative quotations from the papyri are for us particularly lifelike, because we can generally date them even to the day. We see over the pages of the second volume of Oxyrhynchus Papyri published by Grenfell and Hunt, and you find that the non-literary examples are almost exclusively documents of the 1st cent. A.D., i.e. the exact time in which the NT grew up. It will be possible from these and other papyri to enrich very greatly the future Lexicon of the NT.

Thus we see the justification of the statement that the new texts of popular Late Greek have placed the linguist investigaters of the Greek Bible on new foundations. In yet another direction they yield an important harvest to theology. The more we realize the missionary character of Primitive Christianity, the more clearly we grasp the greatness of the Apostle Paul working among the proletariat of the great centres of the world’s commerce—Ephesus, Corinth, etc.—the more we shall feel the necessity of studying the men to whom the gospel is preached, i.e. of entering the life of the people, insight into their life, not only into their economic position and their family life, but into their very soul. As regards Egypt, we now possess wonderful documents among the papyri, concerning the life of the people, letters, which were not intended for publicity, but reflect quite naively the mood of the moment. As they have made clearer to us the nature of the non-literary letters of St. Paul—and with a large part of the value of the papyri to NT study—so they make live again for us the men of the middle and lower classes of the age of the Primitive Christian mission to the world, especially for him who has ears to hear the softer notes between the lines. But we may assume that the civilization of the Imperial age was tolerably uniform throughout the whole range of the Mediterranean lands, and that if we know the Egyptians of the time of St. Paul, we are not far from knowing the Corinthians and the men of Asia Minor of the same period. And thus we possess in the papyri, as also in the inscriptions, excellent materials for the construction of the historical background of Primitive Christianity.

In conclusion, reference may be made once more to the fact that recently, in addition to the papyri, a great number of similar ancient texts, written on fragments of pottery, have been discovered in Egypt, i.e. the Ostraca. As the potsherds cost nothing (anybody could fetch one from the nearest rubbish heap), it was the writing material of the poor man, and revenue officials sometimes in the transactions with the poor. The ostraca, which are also numbered by thousands, are on the whole even more ‘vulgar’ than the papyri, but for that very reason valuable to us in all the respects.

But the great founder of the study of ostraca on the great scale is Ulrich Wilcken, who has collected, deciphered, and historically elucidated the Greek ostraca. Next to him W. E. Crum has rendered similar services to the Coptic ostraca. To show that the ostraca, besides their indirect importance, have also a direct value for the history of Christianity, we may refer to the potsherds inscribed with the Gospel, or the early Christian legal documents recently discovered at the town of Menas, but chiefly to the Coptic potsherds containing numerous Christian letters and illustrating particularly the inner history of Egyptian Christianity.

The whole study of papyri and ostraca is still in its infancy. The scholar still sees before him a large portion of the field of work uncultivated. The layman also who loves his Bible may still expect much light from the wonderful texts from the period of the origin of the Septuagint and the NT, and there is no need to fear that the Light of the world (Jn 8:12) will pale before the new lights kindled for us by research. The more we set the NT in its own contemporary world, the more we shall realize, on the one hand, the contact between it and the world, and the more we shall feel, on the other hand, the contrast in which it stands with the world, and for the sake of which it went out to fight with and to conquer that world.

PARABLE (IN OT)—1. The word represents Heb. 'masah, which is used with a wide range of meaning, and is very variously tr., both in LXX and in RV. The root means ‘to be like,’ and OF. Heb. Lex. refers the word to ‘the sentences constructed in parallelism,’ which are characteristic of Heb. poetry and gnomic exposition; i.e. it refers to the literary form in which the sentence is cast, and not to any external comparison implied in the thought. Such a comparison, however, is often found in the masah, and, according to many scholars, is the main idea underlying the word. We are concerned here with the cases where the LXX tr. 'parable'; it is important to notice that in OT 'parable' has the varying senses of μισθαλ, and is never used in the narrow technical sense of the NT. In Nu 23:3 etc. it is used of the figurative discourse of Balaam (cf. Is 14:1 (RV); Mic 2:2; Hab 2:9). In Job 21:20 (RV) Job; sentences of ethical wisdom, differing little from the 'proverbs' of 1 K 4:28. Pr 11:10 (the same word μισθαλ). So in Lk 4:25 (RV) it is used of a proverb. Pr 26:15 speaks of 'a parable in the mouth of fools,' which habits and is misapplied. Ps 49:7-8 'parable' is coupled with 'dark saying' and implies something of mystery; cf. the quotation in Mt 13:35 and Jn 16:13 AVM. RVm, where it represents a Gr. word usually tr. 'proverb.' In Wis 5:26 (AVM, RV), 'rather, instead of being kept,' a sense which μισθαλ placed has. In Ezek 17 we have 'the parable of the eagle, really an allegory (see below); cf. the use in Jn 10:11. He 9:8-9, 11:9, RV, where it represents a figure or allegory. Closely connected in Es 4:4 of the parabolic narrative of the caldron; the action described was probably not actually performed. Such mysterious figures are characteristic of Ezekiel, and he is reproached as 'a speaker of parables' (20:13). 2. The meaning of 'parable' in the technical sense.—If Christ did not create the parabolic type of teaching, He at least developed it with high originality, and gave it a deeper spiritual import—his parables stand as a type, and it is convenient to attach a technical name to the word, as describing this special type. As distinguished from fable (wh. see), it moves on a more ethical and literary plane. Fables violate probability in introducing speech of animals, etc., in an unnatural way, and their moral is confined to lessons of worldly wisdom. The allegory, again, is more artificial. It represents something other than itself (the Gr. word means 'speaking other'), the language of the spiritual life being translated into the language, e.g., of a battle, or a journey. 'The qualities and properties of the first are transferred to the last, and the two thus blended together in a figure of speech, with regard to both the side by side, as is the case in the parable' (Trench, On Parables, ch. 1). Hence each detail has its meaning, and exists for that meaning, not for the sake of the story. In the parable, particularly in those of the NT, the story is natural and self-sufficient as a story, but is seen to point to a deeper spiritual meaning. The details as a rule are not to be pressed, but are simply the picturesque setting. If the story, their value being purely illustrative. In the allegory, each figure, king, officer, servant, or child, 'is' some one else without qualification; each detail, sword or shield, road or tree, 'means' something perfectly definite. It is not so in most of the parables; the lesson rests on the true analogy which exists between the natural and the spiritual world. Without requiring any fictitious 'licence,' the parable simply assumes that the Divine working in each sphere follows the same law. Like an analogy, it appeals to the reason no less than to the imagination. 3. OT parables.—There are five passages in the OT which are generally quoted as representing the nearest approach to 'parables' in the technical sense. It is noticeable that in none of them is the word used; as we have seen, where we have the word, we do not really have the thing; in the same way, where we have the thing, we do not find the word. The first two passages (2 S 12:4-7 [Nathan’s parable], 14:2 [Joab’s]) are very similar; we have a natural story with an application. The first is exactly parallel to such a parable as 'the Two Debtors,' but the second has no deep or spiritual significance. The same is true of 1 K 21:1-2 (the wounded prophet), where the story is helped out by a piece of acting. In all three cases the object is to convey the actual truth of the story, and by the unadorned common name or parabolic idea; the method has perhaps in the last two cases a suspicion of trickery, and was not employed by our Lord; the application of the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21:20) was obvious from the figure in the light of Is 5:1-4. This passage is the fourth of those referred to, and is a true parable, though only slightly developed. It illustrates well the relation between a parable and a metaphor, and the comparison with Ps 82:1-3 shows how narrow is the border-line between parable and allegory. The last passage is Is 28:21-25, where we have a comparison between the natural and the spiritual world, but no story. It should be noted that post-Biblical Jewish literature makes a widespread use of parable, sometimes, alike in spirit, form, and language, a remarkable resemblance to the parables of the NT. C. W. Emmet. 4. Parable (in LXX).—1. Meaning of the word.—The constant use of a word, meaning resemblance, both in Hebrew and in Greek, makes it evident that an essential feature of the parable lay in the bringing together of two different things so that the one helped to explain and to emphasize the other. Of Christ the usual form is that of a complete story running parallel to the stages and divisions of a totally different subject. Thus in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13:1-9) the kinds of soil in the narrative are related to certain distinctions of character in the interpretation (13:19-20). The teaching value thus created came from an appeal to the uniformity of nature. In the Oriental mind, any thought of the Bible writers this contrast field of illustration often grudgingly conceded by the materialistic provincialism of modern Western science. It was recognized and believed by them that the Lord of Creation had the right to do as He pleased with His own. Instead of being an element of disruption, this was to them the guarantee of all other sequences. He who gave to the frail grass its form of beauty could be relied on to do the same great work. As the sun was given to the fall of the sparrow would not be withheld from the death of His saints. The conception gave solidarity to all phenomenal sequences, and forced into special notice whatever seemed to be subject to other influences. Such was the parable value of contrast between the behaviour of Israel towards God and the common sentiment of family relationship, and even the grateful instincts of the beasts of burden (Is 5:25). Thus also Christ spoke of His own homelessness as a privation unknown to the birds and the foxes (Mt 8:19). This effect of contrasting couples formed a literary feature in some of Christ’s parables where opposing elements of character were introduced side by side (Mt 21:22-25; Mk 18:19). 2. The use of the word paroxisma in LXX and in the Gospel of John indicates that a proverb or parable, being drawn from common objects and incidents, was meant for public use. What was once said in any particular case could always be repeated under similar circumstances. 3. Occasionally the public parable value was reached by making an individual represent all others of the same class. The parable then became an example in the ordinary sense of the term (Lk 14:11-14). In 16:14 (15:1-2, there is no independent introductory narrative dealing with shepherd life and the care of the vineyard. Certain points are merely selected and dwelt upon as in the interpretation of a parable story previously given. Here there is the explanatory and persuasive efficiency of the appeal to nature and custom, but, as in this case the reference is to Christ Himself as Head of the Kingdom, the parable has not the general application of those belonging to its citizenship. It is not a general parable, though ‘the Door’ and ‘parable and allegory’ are usually called emblems or symbols of Christ. 2. Advantages and Disadvantages.—In the parable two different planes of experience were brought together, e.g., familiar, concrete, and definite, the other an area of abstractions, conjectures, and possibilities.

3. The special need of Parables in Christ's teaching.—If the teaching of Christ had been devoted to matters already understood and accepted as divine by men, such as the conventional commentary on the law of Moses, such a presentation of moral and spiritual truth, while imparting the charm of freshness to things familiar, would have been actually necessary. The Seraphim and Pharisees did not require it. Even if, passing beyond the Jewish ceremonial observance and externalism, He had been content to speak of personal salvation and eternal life, a new social order so prevalent in the Western Church of to-day, He would not have needed the vehicle of parable instruction. But the subject which, under all circumstances, privately and publicly, directly and indirectly, He sought to explain, warn, and impress, was that of a Kingdom that had for its destiny the conquest of the world. Alike in His preaching and in His miraculous works, His constant purpose was to reveal and glorify the Father (Jn 15:10) and to unfold the mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:38). These mysteries were not in themselves obscure or remote (Mt 16:4, Mk 16:15), but the necessities and motives and rewards were so opposed to all that had entered the mind of man, that it had to be characterized as a Kingdom that was not of this world (Jn 18:36). It was this Kingdom of Messianic expectation that united Christ with the historic past of the elect nation to which according to the flesh He belonged. Its appearance had been prophecy, and its expansion and attendant blessing to humanity had been dwelt upon as the recompense for the travail of Zion. The Messiah was to be the Prince of Peace in that Kingdom of exploded and exhausted evil, where in symbol the wolf and the lamb were to feed together (Is 65:24). The princes of the people of the earth were to be gathered together to be the people of the God of Abraham (Ge 12:3, Ps 47), But the same mysteries of the Kingdom, which connected Christ with the prophetic utterances and developed history of Israel, also brought Him into a relationship of antagonism towards the religious teaching of His own time. The people recognized in His words the authority that belonged to Moses's seat, but they saw very clearly that another than Moses was there. The point of distinction between Him and the Prophets was that in His hands the Law was no longer an end in itself, but became a minister to what was beyond and greater than itself. While the Rabbinical teaching boasted that the world had been created only for the Torah, He taught that the Law had been created for the world. This radical opposition appeared in what He said about the proper use and observance of the Sabbath day, and in His condemnation of those who would neither take with pride and complacency that the Kingdom of God had reached its final consummation and embodiment in their own exclusive circle, whereas the message of Christ was to be born over new areas of promise and expansion until it reached and conquered the uttermost parts of the earth. It was a parting at the fountain-head. One teaching meant the extinction of the other. Of this Kingdom Whose dominion is the earth's, He thereby turned the thoughts of men from the Mosaic succession of Rabbinical precedents and their artificial mediation of the Law of God, and discovered a new source of illumination and authority in the phenomena of the seasons, the relationships of the family, and the Industries of village life. Faith, obedience, and love took the place of technical knowledge and official position. The Kingdom of heaven was at hand, and the King's invitation to enter was always wider than the willingness to accept it. To His disciples He more intimately explained that it was a Kingdom of relation to God, and of men's relationship to one another. This, along with the story of His own life and ministry and resurrection, was to be the gospel they were to preach, by the power of the Spirit, as the message of God's salvation to the world at large. The central theme, the mission and miracles of the Kingdom of heaven were indicated in outline, and in the parables the theme was still the same, whether the story started from the initiative of the Teacher in the presence of the multitudes, or was suggested by some incident of the hour. In the long warfare of the world's kingdoms men had grown familiar with the cry, 'Woe to the vanquished!' but, in that Kingdom of which He spoke, a new social order so prevalent in the Western Church of to-day, was to take upon itself the world's estrangement from God and hardness of heart, and make its own the Christless shame of moral defeat, and social discord, and all unloveliness of life. In the citizenship of that Kingdom the poorest and the lowest was to be exalted, and the blessedness of the lowliest was to be the reward of all who followed Christ, and so partook of the Kingdom of God. It was to be a Kingdom of life, and of Sonship (Rom 8:19). In that Kingdom people would eat and drink and be filled, and be satisfied, and have joy; and the earth and all that was therein would be blessed, and all that was therein would rejoice (Is 65:17; Ps 95:1). It would be a Kingdom of peace, not of war, and that peace should enlighten and illumine the light, and that light should be the light of the world (Mt 5:9, Is 41:7). It was to be a Kingdom where the enemies of God would be destroyed, and the world where the righteous dwell for ever and ever (Ps 11:2-3). It was a Kingdom in which the righteous would live by faith and inherit the Kingdom (Mt 5:5). It was a Kingdom of light, of life, of love, of righteousness, and of peace, and nothing in that Kingdom should bring any man into any condemnation (Jn 17:19). This was that Kingdom of which Christ taught in parables.
PARACLETE and divided allegiance. Failure abnormal. (2) Accepted circumstance: Wheat and Tares (Mt 13:24); malignity progressively revealed in the advancement stages of the Kingdom; the patience of the Spirit. (3) Continuous development and adaptation: Growing Seed (Mt 4:8-9); union in the service of the Kingdom not an artificial pattern commended to a particular age, but a new circle of growth around the parent stem which moves onwards and upwards towards flower and fruit. (4) The appointed task: Talents (Mt 25:14-30). Founders (Lk 19:11-27); faith accepting personal responsibility; the servant of the Kingdom, being relieved from the dangers of success and failure, labours so that he may present his account with joy in the presence of the King, being prepared for that which is prepared for him. (5) The parable used in Acts 15:8: The Husbandmen in the Vineyard (Mt 21:33-4, Lk 19:11-29); names and claims in the Church that dispossess and dishonour Christ. (6) The King's interest: Lost Sheep (Lk 15:3-7); Lost Coin (15:8-19); Lost Son (15:11-21); forfeited ownership sorrowfully known to the owner; social relationship to the Kingdom indicated by the fact that the sheep was one of a hundred, the coin one of ten, and the son a member of a family. (7) Cost and recompense of citizenship: Hid Treasure (Mt 13:44). Pearl of Great Price (13:45-7); self is eliminated, but 'all things are yours.' (8) Fulfilment: The Great Supper (Lk 14:15-23); the King's purpose must be carried out; if individuals and nations of civilized peoples will not be made ready, they will be made ready the honour of the service. (9) Rejected membership and lost opportunity: Rich Fool (Lk 12:16-21). Rich Man and Lazarus (18:19-31). PARADISE.—A Persian word for 'park' or 'garden' (see OUCHAHR); used in the Jewish and Christian thought to represent the abode of the blessed dead. 1. IN THE OT.—While the word paradis occurs only 3 times in the OT (Ec 1:9, Ec 2:2, Neh 2:12), and with no reference to the Garden of Eden, it is unquestionable that Eden serves as the basis for the later conception. The transition from the usage of Genesis to one less literal is to be seen in Ezk 31, which is doubtless modified to a considerable degree by Babylonian conceptions. The idea of an undifferentiated unformed Eden was part of the Genesis picture of Eden. The significane of Ezekiel's conception is that it shows the anticipation of the apocalyptic conception of Eth. Enoch (chs. 23-28) and other apocalypses both Jewish and Christian. 2. IN JEWISH APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE AND IN THE NT.—In the apocalypses there are elaborate descriptions (particularly Eth. Enoch, Apoc. Bar 4, and 2 Es 899) of Paradise as the opposite of Gehenna. In the Rabbinical conception of the universe, Paradise is the abode of the blessed dead. There is the tree of life, and there also the righteous feast. Gehenna and Paradise are, according to the Rabbis, close together, being separated only by a handbreadth. This view, however, is difficult to harmonize with other conceptions, and the adjustment is probably to be made by the other view of a twofold Paradise, one in Sheol and the other in Heaven. Such a view would harmonize with the conception that the righteous would rise from the nether Paradise to the heavenly. The word is never used by Jesus or St. Paul except in Lk 23:31 and 2 Co 12. From some points of view it would be more natural to make these two passages refer to the two Paradises respectively, but a final conclusion is prevented by lack of evidence. The reference of Paul (2 Co 12) is undoubtedly to the upper Paradise—that is, the third heaven. Here again, however, it is not safe to derive dogma from what may be a merely conventional expression.

3. IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.—The term is commonly used as identical with 'heaven,' although in some cases it is distinguished as the 'temporary abode of the saints, either in some place on earth or above the earth. It has been particularly developed in connexion with the speculation as to the 'intermediate state' as the place where the righteous live between their death and the Parousia. Lack of data, however, makes it impossible to reach certainty in the matter, and the most modern theology maintains an attitude of reverent agnosticism regarding the state of the dead, and uses the term 'Paradise' as a symbol rather than with precise definition.

SHAILE MATHEWS.

PARAH.—A city in Benjamin (Jos 18:20). Now the ruin Parah, near the head of the Valley of Michmash.

PARALYSIS, PARALYTIC.—See Medicine, p. 599a.

PARAN.—El Paran, 'the oak or terebinth (LXX) of Paran' (Gen 14), is probably identical with Edath, the ancient seaport on the Gulf of Akabah. Perhaps in this region should be sought 'Paran' of Dt 33, Hab 3:14 (Driver, 'Deut.' [UCB, 332]). Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, p. 510) identifies it, c. 29 miles S. of 'Atn Kados. If Dt 2:2 refers to a place in Moab, no trace of it has yet been found. A city may be intended in 1 K 11:8, lying between Edom and Egypt, which cannot be identified. The exiled Ishmael settled in the 'Wilderness of Paran,' evidently S. of Beersheba (Gen 21:13). Israel's first march from Sina brought them to this wilderness (Num 10:15). Within it lay Taberah, Kibroth-hattaavah, Mazeroth, Kadesh, and what is called the 'Wilderness of Zin'. The spies went from the 'Wilderness of Zin' (13:2), in which lay Kadesh (20:27, cf. 33:5), and this again is identified with the 'Wilderness of Paran' (13:22). It corresponds to the great limestone plateau of ed-Tib, stretching from the S. of Judah to the mountains of Sinai, having the Arabah on the E. and the desert of Shur on the W. If then David fled after Samuel's death (1 S 23), LXX B here gives Ωααο αι Μαοιαν. See Smith, 'Samuel' (ICC, 220 f.). W. EWING.

PARCHAR.—A term identified with parvarim (AV 'suburbs,' RV 'precincts') of 2 K 23:1 and applied to part of the Temple buildings lying on the W., where two Levites were stationed (1 Ch 23:19). The word is supposed to be of Persian origin and to have been taken over into Hebrew to indicate a colonnade or portico open to the light. The pl. form parvarim (2 K 23:1) describes the situation of the 'chamber of Nathan-melech,' and might be translated 'in the colonnades,' but it is difficult to understand how a Persian word could occur so early. Either the word is a late explanatory addition to the text, or perhaps we have a different word altogether, describing the office of Nathan-melech. If we read baparvarim instead of baparvarim, we get the meaning 'who was over the mules.' W. F. BOYD.

PARMASHTA.—The seventh of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews (Est 9:9).

PARMENAS.—One of the 'Seven' (Ac 6:5).

PARNACH.—The father of Elizaphan (Nu 34:7).
PAROSH — The name of a post-exilic family (Ezr 2:3 — Neh 7:6; Ezr 8:10 sq., Neh 3:18 sq.). The Gr. form Phoros is adopted in 1 Es 5:5, 26 sq.

PAROUSIA. —The 'appearance,' Advent, or Second Coming of Christ at the end of 'this age' in order to establish His Kingdom. 1. Origin of the expectation. —The Messianic interpretation given to Jesus by the Apostles was essentially eschatological. No one of them understood Him to be engaged in the work of establishing the Kingdom of God during the period culminating in His death. He was the Christ in the sense that (a) He was anot, i.e. (empowered) by God to deliver men; (b) He was gathering and preparing men for His Kingdom; (c) He died and rose to manifest the justice and love of God, and thus save those who accepted Him as His future King, who would remain Satan, judge both the living and the dead, and establish His Kingdom either in heaven or on a renewed earth. How far we are to believe that this view was held or expressed by the writers and the followers of the Apostles is a question which has been debated. It was held, or at least implied, by the early Church and the NT writers, and is also found among the Essenes and the Sibylline Oracles.

2. Expectation in the early Church. —The elements in the expectation of the Parousia found in the Gospels and the NT can be formulated without difficulty. It was expected within the lifetime of the writers (except 2 P 3:4); 1 Th 4:16; 1 Co 15:51-54; or immediately: Jn 5:28; Ph 4:21; Ro 13:10; 1 Co 15:19; 1 P 4:3. The exact day is, however, not known (1 Th 5:23), but will be preceded by sorrows and the appearance of Antichrist (2 Th 2) and the conversion of the Jews (Ro 11:24-25). The order of events awaited is the descent of Jesus with His angels from the upper heavens to the lower; the sounding of the trumpet and the voice of the archangel which will summon the dead from Sheol; the giving to the saints of the body of the resurrections the catch of the living saints, who have been changed in the twinkling of an eye, to meet Jesus and the risen saints in the air; the general judgment of both living and dead; the establishment of the Messianic Kingdom, which, after a period of struggle, is to be victorious over the Kingdom of Satan; and finally the fixing of the eternal supremacy of God. Among certain Christians this view was further elaborated, so that the appearance of Christ in the sky was followed by the resurrection of the martyrs, a thousand years of peace, during which Satan was to be bound, then the conquest of Satan, the general resurrection, and the establishment of the final conditions of eternity. This latter view, however, although popular in the 2nd cent., does not appear in the NT except in Rev 20:1-2 (see Millenium). It easily passed over into the sensuous chiliastic views which were finally rejected from the main current of Christian thought largely through the influence of Augustine, but which might continue to exist among different sects or groups of Christians.

3. Various identifications of the Parousia. —(a) With Christ's resurrection. Such a view, however, disregards the NT expectation that the NT kingdom has never been widely accepted. (b) The coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost —a view commonly held by those who reject the literalistic interpretation of the apocalyptic elements of the NT, and insist that the incidents of the risen Jesus in the world with the Holy Spirit. This view makes such passages as Jn 14:6 and 16:7 the exegetical point of approach to the entire question. (c) The destruction of Jerusalem. This is generally combined with (b) and said to be forecast in Mk 13 and 14:49. (d) The theory of the successive comings of the Christ in judgment. Thus various historical crises, such as the destruction of Jerusalem and the fall of the Roman Empire, are regarded as due to the immediate influence of the Christ and as a part of the new dispensation of the Spirit. (e) The death of the believer—a view exegetically untenable. (f) The historical-critical view sees in the expectations of the NT Christianity survivals of Jewish eschatology. Such a view does not deny an element of truth in the expectation, but regards the belief as due to the attachment to Jewish expectations (cf. Eth. Enoch 48) now seen to be impossible of realization. The view probably most generally held at the present time involves elements from several of these specific explanations, and is to the effect that, while the Apostles doubted expected the eschatological cataclysm to occur in their day, they saw the future in prophetic rather than historical perspective. As a consequence Second Coming is seen as an event which, if interpreted literally, would mean His return in judgment (cf. particularly Mk 14:27-28, Mt 23:38-39). As to the exact time at which He expected His return we have no information, except such sayings as Mk 8:38 [Mt 18:26, Lk 9:1 sq.] show influence of Apostolic interpretation) and Lk 17:22.

PARSHANDATHA. —The eldest of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews (Est 9:11).

PARTHIANS. —The founders of a powerful dynasty in Persia which overthrew the yoke of the Syrian Seleucid n.c. 250, and maintained itself against all external enemies till a.d. 226, defying even the Romans. They came from northern Iran, and their language or dialect greatly affected the cultivated speech of the empire, which was known as Pahlav during their régime. But the exact form of the language of the Jews or of the Parthians has not been definitively stated in the text of the Bible. It is distinguished by its rich and ornamental style, which is characteristic of Persian literature. The term is also used to denote a people who lived in the region of the Persian Gulf, and who were said to have been converted to Christianity.

PARTRIDGE (garr, 1 S 26:9, Jer 17:11). —Two kinds of partridge abound in Palestine. The chukar or rock partridge (Caccabis chukar) is the commonest of game birds. Its cry may be heard all over the land, and large flocks may be encountered in the autumn. It is distinguished by its red legs. It is excellent eating. Hey's sand partridge (Ammoperdix heyi) occurs in enormous numbers around the Dead Sea. It is probably the wild partridge referred to in Is 26:9. Its flights from place to place when hunted; its hiding, trusting to its invisibility on account of its colour being so like the environment; its quick run from danger before taking to the wing; and its final capture when too weary to fly—must form a very suitable image of a poor human fugitive remorselessly pursued. The reference in Jer 17:11 is hard to understand; it may perhaps refer to the fact that when disturbed from their nests such birds sometimes never return. In Sir 11:10 the heart of a prophet man is compared to a decy partridge in a cage.

It is still customary in Palestine to hunt the red-legged partridge by the aid of such decoys.

E. W. G. MASTERMANN.

PARUAH.—Father or clan of Jehoshaphat, Solomon's prefect in Issachar (1 K 4v).

PARVAIM.—A region whence, according to 2 Ch 26, the wood which was used for ornamentation in the Temple of Solomon. The name is most plausibly identified with Farua in Yemen, or S. W. Arabia. It was possibly from this place that the 'gold of Sheba' (Ps 72:14; cf. Is 60:9) was in part derived.

J. F. M. CURBY.

PASACH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7v).

PAS-DAMMIM.—See EPHER-DAMMIM.

PASEAH.—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4v). 2. The father of Jelada (Neh 9v). 3. The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:42; Neh 7:63); in 1 Es 5th Phineas.

PASHHUR.—1. A son of Mahlah, a prince of Judah in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 21v), who was opposed to the prophet (Jer 38:13). Perhaps he is the father of Gedaliah (Jer 38v), and likely identical with Pashhur, mentioned in 2 Ch 36v, as the ancestor of Adashai. 2. The son of Immer, a Temple official and priest, who caused Jeremiah to be beaten and put in the stocks after he had predicted the fall of Jerusalem. The name of his father was not Pashhur (probably 'peace'), lit. 'staying on every side') but Magoramassibib ('terror or perhaps wandering round about'), and added that he would die in Babylon (Jer 20v). 3. He was the father of Gedaliah (Jer 38v). 4. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah, probably identical with 4, or used of the clan as a whole (Neh 10v).

PASSION.—In Ac 14v. We also are men of like passions with you, 'passion means 'feeling or emotion.' But in Ac 1v. He showed himself alive after his passion,' the word means 'suffering,' as in Wyclif's translation of Hc 2v. 'Thessas for the passion of death, crowned with glory and honour.'

PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.—1. OT references.—(1) Law and Exegesis.—The allusions in Ex 34v and 23v are so dubious that they can hardly give any sure ground on which to base a consideration of the Passover festival. The first certain reference to the feast is in Ex 12v-27. This is probably an older account than 12-27, and differs from it in details.) We find that 'the passover' is assumed as known, and possibly it is the feast referred to in Ex 16v and 23v etc. The characteristic features of the feast in Ex 12v-27 are: (a) a lamb is to be slain and its blood sprinkled on the lintel and side-posts of the houses; (b) the cause for this observance is found in the slaughter of the Egyptian firstborn.
In Dt 16v-2 the Passover is directed to be observed in the month Abib (April), in commemoration of the Exodus from Egypt. The sacrifice is not to be offered in private dwellings, but 'in the place which Jehovah shall choose to place his name there.' With the Passover meal, and during seven days, no leavened bread was to be eaten. None of the flesh was to be left till morning. After the meal the worshippers were to go to their homes; the seventh day was to be a solemn assembly, and this period (7v) was treated as containing the 7 weeks 'joy of harvest,' commencing from Abib, when the corn would be coming into ear. We may notice here: (a) the Passover is regarded as part of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Maazoth), the two being apparently blended into one; (b) the sacrifice, though composed of individual sacrifices, is to be offered only at the Temple in Jerusalem; (c) the offering may be taken from flock or herd.
In Ezk 45v-34 the date is precisely assigned as 14th Abib. The feast lasts 7 days, and unleavened bread is to be eaten. The prince is to offer a bullock as a sin-offering for himself and the people. A young goat on each of the 7 days, as well as 7 bullocks and 7 rams daily, with other offerings of meal and oil. All takes place at the central sanctuary; there is no mention of a lamb, and the Passover is part of the Unleavened Bread festival.
Lv 23v-34 ordains the Passover for the evening of 14th Abib. The Feast of Unleavened Bread is treated separately; it lasts 7 days, a holy convocation is to be held on the 1st and 7th days; and 'on the morrow after the sabbath' a sheaf of new corn is to be waved before the Lord, a he-lamb is to be offered as a burnt-offering with other offerings; and till this is done, no bread or parched corn or green ears may be eaten.
According to Ex 12v-45, the current month of the Exodus is to be regarded as the 1st month of the year. On the 10th day a lamb or a kid is to be taken for each family or combination of families, according to their size. It is to be slain at even on the 14th, and the lintel is to be stained with its blood. It is to be roasted intact, and eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. Nothing of it is to remain till morning. It is to be eaten in haste, the partakers prepared as for a journey; it is a sign of the Lord's 'pass-over.'
Ex 12v-44 forbids any foreigner or hired servant or sojourner to eat the Passover unless he first submits to circumcision.
Nu 9v-13 deals with a case recorded as arising on the first anniversary of the Exodus. It is declared that 'no body who is unclean may celebrate the Passover on the 14th day of the 2nd month.'
In Nu 28v-38 the Passover is distinguished from the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The 1st and 7th days of the latter are to be days of holy convocation. On each of the 7 days two bullocks, a ram, and 7 lambs (with special offerings of meal and oil) are to be sacrificed, and a goat for a sin-offering.
(2) Historical and Prophetical books.—No certain reference is found previous to the date of the discovery of Deuteronomy. Most of the allusions in the prophets are quite general in scope (cf. Hos 2v9; 12v9, Am 5v8v). The observance in 2 K 23v-28 is stated to have conformed to the regulations of Dt 16 and to have been novel in character. 2 Ch 30v-14 perhaps reflects the later usages of the writer's own age. Of post-exilic witnesses Ezr 6v-21 may be quoted, where the priests and Levites play the prominent part in the sacrifice; and the Feast of Unleavened Bread is distinguished from the Passover.
Many of the Passover rites are undoubtedly very ancient; but Deuteronomy tends to emphasize the historical connexion of the festival with the Exodus. The various regulations and allusions in the OT are not consistent with each other, and different ideas were probably associated with the feast at different periods of the national history. Thus Ezek. lays most stress on its aim as a collective palpular sacrifice. It is likely that the feast was observed during the Exile, and that its commemorative significance was then made more ephiphanic. This would explain the omission of the mention of the account in the Priestly Code. But the Chronicler shows preference for the Deuteronomiac version, perhaps owing to the growing centralization of worship at one sanctuary in his time.

2. Origin and primitive significance.—The Passover was in all probability an institution already existing when the Jewish legislation was codified, but taken up and transformed by the Legislator. (a) The most likely accepted theory is that it was in origin the shepherd's offering of the first-fruits from his flocks, the slaughter of the Egyptian firstborn being Pharaoh's punishment for hindering this observance. On this theory, later tradition would then have altered the sequence, and have regarded the slaughter of the Egyptians as the reason why the Israelites should save the firstborn of their flocks. And, finally, the connexion with the pastoral sacrifice would have been forgotten, and the Passover would be treated as instituted in order to save the firstborn of Israel. (b) Another theory finds the central idea of the Passover in the peculiar notion. The sacrifice would be offered as a substitute for the firstborn of man, and this conception is a common constituent of primitive spring festivals. (c) Other theories regard the observance as originating from domestic sacrifice to avert harm in times of pestilence, or from an ancient solemnization of a threshold covenant, when Jehovah was welcomed into a private dwelling.

It is quite possible that all these theories represent different parts of the truth. The Passover appears to date from very early times, and may have amalgamated features from an entire series of festivals. Thus it combines the notions of sin-offering (the sprinkling of the blood), of burnt-offering (the victim being roasted intact), and of peace-offering (the victim being eaten by the celebrants). Other remarkable features are: its date at the vernal equinox; the fact that the sacrifices were mostly or entirely of firstborn, and that an old tradition connected it with the Israelites' desire for a royal kingdom, which eventually led to the Persian monarchy (cf. Ex 5-7). This variety of character suggests the inference that the Passover is the complex amalgamation of different feasts, in which these different elements emerged separately. Its association with the Pentecost, Unleavened Bread is probably accidental, due to on- tiguity in time. The latter is plainly an agricultural festival, and falls into line with the fests of Pentecost as a Towerbridge.

3. Post-exilic observances.—The Samaritans continue to observe the detailed ordinances of Ex 12. But the Jews learned in time to disregard some of the details, as applicable only to the first or Egyptian Passover. Such details were the choice of the lamb on the 10th day, its slaughter at home, the sprinkling of the blood on the house-door, the admission of the unclean, the posture and attire of the partakers, etc. Various alterations and elaborations were introduced. The month Adar was devoted to a thorough purification of lands and houses, sepulchres being whitened, roads and bridges repaired. On the evening of 13th Adib all leaven was swept away. On the 14th Adib, in the Temple, the Passover was celebrated by indiscriminate companies of 10 to 20 people. It was slain in relays at the Temple, and the blood thrown before the altar by the priests. The lambs were then dressed, and the fat offered, while the Levites chanted the Hallel (Ps 113-118). The lambs were taken home and roasted; each of the guests brought 4 cups of red wine, and the meal was eaten with bitter herbs and unleavened cakes. The posture at the meal was re- cumbent (as a token, according to the Pharisees, of the rest which God had given to His people). A blessing was said over the first cup (perhaps implied in Ex 22:42). Then followed the washing of hands and offering a prayer. At the second cup came the son's question as to the significance of the feast, and the father's explanation. This was succeeded by the singing of Ps 113 and 114. Grace was said over the third cup, and with the fourth came the singing of Ps 115-118. Large numbers assembled at Jerusalem for this feast, and such occasions were always carefully supervised by the Romans for fear of insurrection. Hence perhaps would come the custom of releasing a selected prisoner; but we have now no hint of the origin of the custom.

PAUL—See PAI.

PAUL THE APOSTLE.—I. The Authority.—Before discussing the life and teaching of St. Paul, we may consider what material we have at our disposal for determining the facts. We have a history (the Acts of the Apostles) and a collection of Epistles, which have been judged by most or by many scholars to be 1st cent. writings, and to be by St. Luke and St. Paul respectively. Of the Epistles we may, however, set aside the anonymous one to the Hebrews, which the Eastern Fathers generally considered to be St. Paul’s, but which is now recognized by almost all scholars not to be the work of that Apostle himself. It is even denied by many that it belongs to the immediate Pauline circle at all. We may also put aside the Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, which, though it may include some genuine 1st cent. information, is clearly a romance of a later age. We have thus left the canonical Acts and 13 Epistles. The genuineness of these is considered under the separate articles in this Dictionary, but we may here briefly summarize the results of critical investigation with regard to them.

1. The Tübingen theory.—F. C. Baur, the founder of the Tübingen School (1792–1860), maintained that only St. Peter’s Sibyl and the Epistle to the Hebrews were genuine. The principal Epistles and the Acts were products of his ‘principals’—his ‘Paul,’ and his ‘Lukas’—and were written with a purpose or ‘tendency,’ issued in the 2nd cent. in order to promote the idea of a Catholic Church, and to reconcile the contending parties. Baur has few, if any, followers now. It has been seen that it is bad criticism to make a theory on insecure grounds, and then to reject all the literature which contradicts it.

2. The Dutch School.—We may thus name a school of writers which has lately arisen, as their chief strength is in Holland. Prof. van Manen has popularized their teaching in Inege, Bibl. (e.g. artt. ‘Old-Christian Literature,’ ‘Philemon,’ ‘Ephesians,’ ‘Romans,’ ‘Acts’ by Schmedel). According to this school, all the 13 Epistles and the Acts are ‘pseudepigraphic,’ though some fragments of 1st cent. works, such as ‘Acts of Paul’ and ‘Acts of Peter,’ are embedded in them. Other reasons given are that the 13 writings in question are not really epistles intended for definite readers, but are books written in the form of epistles for edification; that there is no trace of the impression which, if genuine, they must have made on those addressed; that St. Paul would not have written to the Romans as he did without knowing them personally; that the large experience and wide field of vision shown in the Epistles were an impossibility at so early a date; that time was required for Paulinism, which was a radical reformation of the older Christianity, to spring up; that the problems discussed (the Law and the Gospel, Justification, Election, etc.) did not belong to the 1st cent.; that persecution had already arisen, whereas in St. Paul’s lifetime, so far as we know, there had been none; and that the chapters Ro 9–11 presuppose a date later than the Fall of Jerusalem. In a word, the historical background of the Epistles had to be of a later age, perhaps a.d. 125–150. The ‘Pauline’ literature sprang from the ‘heretical’ circles of Syria or Asia Minor. Marcion was the first (van Manen alleges) to make an authoritative group of Pauline Epistles; and they were not much approved by Irenæus or Tertullian, who, however, used them to vanquish the Gnostics and Marcionites with their own weapons.

One is tempted to ask, Was there then, St. Paul a myth? No, it is replied, he was a historical person, and the little that we know about him can be gathered from the older material (such as the 'we' sections of Acts) and from our present methods. It is not enough to reply that the objection already made to the Tübingen theory applies here with increased force; no criticism can be more unscientific than that which makes up its main a priori what St. Paul ought to have done and said, and then judges the genuineness of the literature by that standard. And such a deluge of forgery or ‘pseudepigraphic’ in the 2nd cent. (for the Epistles of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp must also, according to this school, go by the board) is absolutely incredible.

3. English and German criticism.—Returning to better-balanced views about the literature, we may remark that scholars in this country are more and more disposed to treat Acts and all the 13 Epistles as genuine, and that in Germany the tendency is in the same direction, though it does not go quite so far. Thus Harnack (Luke the Physician, 2nd ed., Eng. tr.; in the American Acts as Lukas, and Jülicher (Enge, Bibl.) believes Colossians to be St. Paul’s, though he is uncertain about Ephesians. The Pastoral Epistles and 2 Thessalonians are recognized as genuine. Scholars in this country; they are looked on much more doubtfully in Germany, but the former are usually recognized there as containing a Pauline nucleus.

4. The thirteenth Epistle.—It appears that St. Paul wrote other letters than these; references to lost ones are found, probably, in 2 Th iii and 1 Co 5. The thirteen which remain may be divided into four groups. These are all addressed by the Apostle Paul, and (as van Manen remarks) the Pastoral Epistles have, as good external testimony as the rest. By way of example (to take but a few instances), it may be noted that Ignatius (c. 110 A.D.), Polycarp (c. 111 A.D.), and Justin (c. 160 A.D.) use 2 Thessalonians; Clement of Rome (c. 95 A.D.) uses 1 Corinthians and probably Ephesians; Ignatius certainly uses Ephesians; Polycarp uses almost all the thirteen, including the Pastoral. In fact the external evidence is precise; and it would require convincing arguments indeed from internal evidence to overthrow it. Marcion (c. 140 A.D.) included all these Epistles except the Pastoral in his New Testament; and he evidently wrote them as a whole, as we may infer from them, as Tertullian (adv. Marc., e.g. v. 17 f.) tells us.

(a) First Group (1 and 2 Thess.). These were written from Corinth 52 or 53 A.D.; the early date is seen from the fact that the writer expected the Second Advent to be in his lifetime (1 Th 4:14–15), and this is a real sign of authenticity, for a forger would never have put into St. Paul’s mouth, after his death, the words ‘we that are alive’ (v. 18). A possible misconception is rectified by St. Paul in 2 Th 2, for he says that the ‘man of sin’ must be disposed of before the Lord comes.

(b) Second Group, Baur’s ‘principal epistles’ (Gal., 1 and 2 Cor., Rom.), marked by the struggle for Gentile liberty and by the assertion of St. Paul’s Apostleship, which the Judaizing Christians denied. The controversy was evidently dying out when Romans was written, for that Epistle is a calm and reasoned treatise, almost more than a letter (see Art. GALATANS [Ep. to Thess.], § 4). The early date of these four Epistles is seen from the consideration that, as Gentile Churches spread and the converts multiplied, it must have been impossible to form the yoke of the Gospel so simply. It must also be of a later age, perhaps a.d. 685.
objections have been raised against Philippians and Pullemon, for it is hard to take seriously van Manen's arguments in his articles on these Epistles in Enose, Bibl.
And indeed it is impossible that a forger could have conceived such a gem as the latter Epistle; the writer's palette in Pullemon for the runaway slave Oneissen bears genuineness on its face. But the authenticity of these two Epistles has a decided bearing on that of Ephesians and Colossians, for all four hang together, each similar to Pullemon and Colossiand, arguments which have been written at the same time. It is objected that the phraseology of this group differs from that of the second; that Gnosticism did not rise till the 2nd cent.;
that the putting before the Colossiand and Colossians are written at the same time. It is objected that the phraseology of this group differs from that of the second; that Gnosticism did not rise till the 2nd cent.;
that the putting before the Colossiand and Colossians are.
and that these Epistles cannot be reconciled with Acts entirely vanishes. [For the objection from the presenti-ment that St. Paul would not re-visit the Ephesians (Act 208) see art. Acts of the Apostles, § 9; but even if the early date of Acts be not accepted, it is quite possible that St. Paul never re-visited Ephesus. We should rather gather from 1 Tim., especially from 18, that he had an interview with Timothy elsewhere, and that he was passing on his way north; see Prof. Findlay in Hastings' DB lii. 714.—]
In the other considerations, as to diction and subject matter, have little weight when once we agree that the Epistles, if Pauline. had been written perhaps after the others; and it is instructive that in these respects the Third Group makes a half-way house between the Second and the Fourth. We must, moreover, note that there are many indications of genuine ness in 2 Timothy which has all the marks of authenticity, being full of personal allusions which it would be almost impossible for a forger to invent. It is for this reason generally allowed that 2 Ti 18-4² are really Pauline.
But it is grossly improbable that real epistles were used only for patching forgeries and then thrown away.
It is in personal notices that a forger usually goes wrong;
if these are authentic, it is a great argument for the whole writing being authentic (for further details see Salmons *Intro", pp. 397-413). But as all three Epistles hang together, the marks of genuineness in 2 Timothy are a strong argument for the genuineness of the whole group.
If we may briefly sum up what may be said on the difference of subject-matter and style in the thirteen Epistles. At the birth of a Gentile Church the controversy with Judaising Christians was that which was likely to arise, as it does in the present case. Questions were then asked about the Person of Christ and about the Church as a whole, as we see in the Third Group. As the communities grew, their organization occupied much attention, as we see in the Fourth Group.
and style. Sanday-Headlam (Romans, p. liv. ff.) suggest, further, that variations of style are largely due to the nervous temperament of the Apostle, now calm, now fervid; and in a considerable degree also to the employment of different amanuenses. St. Paul did not write his letters himself, but only added postscripts in his own hand. Probably he dictated his Epistles, and they were taken down in shorthand; the difference of scribe would thus mean an appreciable difference of style.

We shall, then, in what follows, without hesitation use the 13 Epistles as genuine, and that they have been briefly argued above be not accepted, this article must be taken as describing, at least, the life and teaching of St. Paul as the early Christians believed that he lived and taught.

Acts of the Apostles.—For the reasons stated in the article on that book, we may with confidence use Acts as a trustworthy authority for St. Paul's life.
But we may here ask what we are to think of St. Paul's speeches in Acts, whether they are a true record of what he said, and whether we may use them to determine his teaching. It is not easy to suppose that they were taken down verbatim as they were spoken; and St. Luke himself was not present at all of them (e.g. Ac 13rd., 14th, 17th.). Yet the speeches agree very well with the circumstances in which they were delivered, and the diction and sentiments coincide largely with the Pauline Epistles. Lukian phrases have been found in some of them, which is natural enough; more so in the speech of Ac 22, which was spoken in Aramaic, and therefore is clearly not the Apostle's 'passing words,' but in the Athenian speech (Ac 17th.) which has no Lukian element. The conclusion may be that the speeches were written down, soon after they were delivered, by a hearer—sometimes the bearer was St. Luke himself—and the notes then taken were afterwards used by the author of Acts.

ii. Sketch of St. Paul's Life.—1. Name.—The future Apostle is first made known to us under the name Saul (Ac 7th.). Being of the tribe of Benjamin (Ro 11th., Ph 3rd), a fact of which he was proud, he doubtless was named directly or indirectly after the king whom that tribe gave to Israel. But while Saul was his Jewish name, he must, as a Roman citizen, have had three Roman names. His praenomen and nomen we do not know, but his cognomen was Paul. After the interview with the proconsul Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Ac 12th.), Paul used his Roman name. The Acts no longer refers to the name Paul from the outset of his mission to the Roman Empire it was fitting that he should be known by his Roman name. We must at once dismiss both the conjecture of Augustine that the Apostle used that occasion assumed the name Paul out of compliment to the proconsul, and also the suggestion that the name was personal to himself, denoting that he was small of stature. The existence of the name Paul among his family is noticed in Acts 16th. The name, which is Roman Greek or Roman name, was quite a common thing among Jews of the 1st cent., e.g. John-Mark, Jesus-Justus. But here the case is different; we never read of a man named Paul, at least in the New Testament.

2. Birthplace and family.—St. Paul was not only a native but also a citizen of Tarsus, possessed of full civil rights in that famous University town, the capital of Cilicia (Ac 21st., 22nd.). His family had perhaps been planted there by one of the Seleucid kings (Ramsay). They were probably Pharisees (Ac 23rd.; cf. 2 Ti 1st); and Aramaic-speaking (Ph 3rd., though here the Apostle may be speaking of his teacher). Several indications point to a high position with which Ramsay's, except that he puts the date of his death at least two years later because of a difficulty about Areopagis (see artt. AREOPAGIS, CHRONOLOGY OF NT), and the Martyrdom about two years earlier.

3. Roman citizenship.—Of this position St. Paul was justly proud. He had not a Roman citizen merely because he had the freedom of Tarsus, for Tarsus was not a Roman Colony; probably his father or grand-father had rendered some services to the State, and had been thus rewarded. In any case St. Paul was freeborn (Ac 22nd.). He had not, like so many under Claudius, bought the citizenship through the infamous favours of the Court. He appealed to his privileges to prevent illegal treatment at Philippi and Jerusalem.

4. Early life.—St. Paul was educated, no doubt, partly at Tarsus (Ac 22nd.), where he would be influenced by Stoic teachers (see § 1.), but chiefly at Jerusalem under the Pharisees. His apostolic work is described for us in detail in Acts 7th., as far as they are combined in his testimony there and in the Acts (see RVm). He had not, however, our Lord (cf. 1 Co 9th. with 15th.), though he would be there in Jesus' lifetime on earth. Probably this period of education was over before our Lord's ministry began; and (Matt xix. 28) it was after Paul's conversion he retained a certain pride in his Jewish birth and a great affection for his own people (Ro 9th. 10th. 11th.). But the name Saul is perhaps taken up, not as a Greek-speaking Jew or Hellenist, but as a Hebrew; for this last term denotes a difference of language and manners (Ph 3rd.; see Lightfoot's note). Accordingly we find him speaking Aramaic fluently (Ac 12th. 22nd.).

The result of this education, in spite of Gamaliel's liberty of thought, was to make St. Paul a zealous and bigoted Jew, determined to crush to the core an youth to uphold the traditions of his fathers. We first meet with him as a young man 'consenting unto' Stephen's death, holding the clothes of those who stoned him (Ac 6th.). And I think we may well believe of his life, that of those who were the first martyrs, that of the Christians in Jerusalem (26th.). The foundation of the church of Damascus in order to arrest all the disciples, and to bring them bound to Jerusalem (9th.). The church of Damascus in order to arrest all the disciples, and to bring them bound to Jerusalem (9th.).—(In the following paragraphs the numbers in square brackets denote the dates A.D. as given by Ramsay. Lightfoot's dates are mostly a year or two later; Harnack's earlier. Turner's (in Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of NT') nearly agree with ours.)

3. Conversion [33].—The journey to Damascus was the great turning-point of Saul's life (Ac 9th.), and is often referred to by him (Ac 22nd. 26th., 1 Co 9th. 15th., Ph 3rd. etc.). When approaching Damascus he saw a strong light, and Jesus appearing to him (so explicitly 1 Co 9th.), saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" The voice was unintelligible to his companions (Ac 22), though they saw the light (ib.) and heard a sound (9th.).

Saul was blinded by the vision and led into Damascus, where he was instructed and baptized by one Ananias. Immediately he confesses Christ in the synagogues at Damascus (9th.), and then retires into Arabia (perhaps the Sinai peninsula, see Lightfoot's note, 37 ff.), doubtless for spiritual preparation (Gal 1st.).

The Lord Himself designates his work as being among the Gentiles. He was not of human origin nor received by human mediation, i.e. not through the Twelve (Gal 1st. 12th.; cf. Ro 11th. 1 Co 7th. 15th.). The Lord Himself designates his work as being among the Gentiles (Ac 9th.; cf. 22nd. 23rd., Ro 11th. 15th., Gal 2nd., Eph 3rd. 1st. 2nd. 21st. A.V.). The argument arises, therefore, What is the meaning of the laying on of hands by the prophets and teachers of Antioch (Ac 13th.- saul was one of them, 13")? this has been regarded by some as an ordination by the church, which thus put an outward seal on the inward call to apostleship (Gore, Lightfoot); by others, as an appointment, not to the apostleship, but to the definite work which lay immediately before barnabas and paul (Ramsay). the returning from Arabia, Saul comes to damascus (Gal 1") while the deputy (eldarch) of the nabatean king Aratos holds the city (2 Co 11") and is persuaded there, but escapes by night, being let down in a basket through the city wall (Ac 9"). he makes his first visit to Jerusalem (3") three years after his conversion—for this is the probable meaning of Gal 1— and is conducted by barnabas and j Barnabas and john mark (6"). here he is told, in a vision in the temple, to escape because of the opposition of the Jews (Ac 22") (unless the vision belongs to the second voyage, and is not recorded by barnabas and john mark (6"). p. 61 f.), and goes to Tarsus (99°), preaching in the united province Siria-Cilicia, in which Tarsus was situated (Gal 1"). after several years, no doubt of preparation, taking along with him barnabas and john mark, he set out to bring him to the syrian Antioch (43"), where the disciples were first called Christians, and they spend a year there (Ac 11"). the Gentiles had already been addressed at Antioch by cyriacus and cyrenians and angelus, the persecution which arose on Stephen's death (11"). henceforward this became a great missionary centre. from Antioch paul made with barnabas the second visit to Jerusalem, taking also to those suffering, who were of the family (11"); and if this is the visit of Gal 2 (see art. galatians [ep. to they], § 3), it originated in a divine revelation, and Titus, a gentile, accompanied them (45 or 46). they returned thence to Antioch (Ac 12"), taking mark with them (46 or 47). 6. first missionary journey, Ac 13—14"). [47 to 49].—sent forth from Antioch, paul and barnabas with mark sail to Cyprus and preach there; at Salamis, the capital, or Nicosia, the capital city, they find a certain Christian, Barnabas and paul go to Tiranes, address a roman governor. henceforward Saul is always in NT called by his roman name. opposed by the 'magician' Elymas (or Eloasmus, paul rebuked him, and predicted his blindness; that stage was immediately deprived of sight, and the proconsul 'believed.' this can hardly mean that he actually became a christian; but, having been under the influence of elymas, his eyes are now opened, and he listens to the gospel message favourably.—from Cyprus they sail to the mainland of Pamphylia, and reach perga, where mark leaves them and returns to Jerusalem. the reference to deflection is not serious, but it is clear that Saul now made a plan for the further extension of Christianity among the Gentiles of the interior of Asia minor, which mark, whose view had not yet been sufficiently enlarged, could not appreciate. it is true that paul was struck down with malaria in the low-lying littoral of Pamphylia, and that this favoured the idea of a journey to the mountainous interior, where he would recover his health. Rainbow takes malaria to be the thorn or stake in the flesh (2 Co 12"). and this would agree with the statement that St. paul first visited galatia, also an infirmity of the flesh (Gal 1:8). on Saul's part, barnabas goes to Tarsus, the church in galatia was now founded; the journey included visits to the south galatian cities of Pisdian Antioch (a roman colony), Iconium (where the apostles were acclaimed, and whence they fled into the Lycaonian district of Galatia), Lystra (also a roman colony, where they were taken for gods, and where the people spoke lycaonian), and Derbe. thence they returned, reversing their route, confirming souls and ordaining presbyters. persecutions in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra are mentioned in 2 Ti 3:1. from the port of Attalia they sail to Antioch, and spent a long time there. in these journeys it was the custom of St. paul to preach to the Jews first (Ac 17") etc., and when they would not hear, to turn to the gentiles.—At this time perhaps occurred the incident of St. Peter at Antioch (Gal 2:11). he at first ate with the gentiles, but, persuaded by judaizers who professed to come from James, he drew back; and even barnabas was influenced by them. but Paul 'resisted' Peter 'to the face,' and his excommunication was successful, as we see from the council of the apostles (Ac 15:22—35). 7. the apostolic council, Ac 15:20—35 [49 of 50].—as soon as gentiles were admitted into the church, the question whether they must obey the masonic law became urgent. judaizers having (to use the expression of paul) rebelled against the necessity of circumcision, paul and barnabas with others were sent to Jerusalem to confer with the apostles and elders. this is the third visit to Jerusalem. the council decided that the gentiles need not be subject to the ceremonial law, but were urged to abstain from things sacrificed to idols, from blood, from things strangled, and from fornication, by which marriage within the prohibited degrees is perhaps intended. Paul and barnabas, with judas and silas, were sent to Antioch with the decrees, and the two latter probably then returned to Jerusalem, though there is some doubt about the movements of silas. 8. second missionary journey, Ac 15:25—18:22 [50 to 53].—Paul and barnabas had a dissenion, the former refusing and the latter wishing to take mark with them; they therefore separated, and Paul took silas (sent for with the greetings of Jerusalem). this second journey took them west through the roman province of Asia minor and Cilicia and by the cilian gates to derbe and lystra and delivered the council's decrees. at lystra they find Timothy, son of a greek father and of a greek mother named eunice. he had been brought up by his mother and by his grandmother Lois (2 Ti 1:5—31). St. paul, wishing to take him with him, first, for fear of giving offence to the judaizers (as he was half a jew), caused him to come to Ant. they proceeded by the 'Phrygo-Galatian region' of the province galatia (see art. galatians [EP. TO THEY], § 2), not being allowed by God to evangelize the province Asia (i.e. the western sea-board of Asia minor) or to enter bithynia (the northerly sea-board), and come to Troas, where they meet St. Luke. [on the N. galatian theory they made a very long detour before entering the province Asia, to galatia proper, founding Churches at Lystra and Derbe, which they left on the journey which they had left.] at Troas, St. paul sees in a dream 'a certain Macedonian,' saying 'come over into Macedonia and help us!' (Ac 16; see art. Acts of the apostles, § 3). they persuade him to send them to Macedonia, and come to Philippi, a roman colony, where they lodge with one Lydia of Thyatira, a seller of purple. St. paul casts out a 'spirit of divination' (meaning sorcery) from a certain slave girl. it is not usual for the opposition of the girl's masters, he and silas are cast into prison. an earthquake looses their bands and the jailor is converted. in the morning the magistrates send to release them, and then paul and silas assert their roman citizenship. leaving Luke behind at Philippi, they pass on to Thessalonica; and this mission seems to be the limit of which the apostle speaks when he says to the Philippians (Ho 1:17) that he had preached from Jerusalem even unto Illyricum (i.e. bithynia), the Illyrian frontier being not far off. at Thessalonica they spent a long time (1 Th 1:1—10), and had much success; many of the 'chief women' were converted. paul worked with his native (2 Th 3:1), but gifts were twice sent to him here from Philippi (Ph 4:15; cf. 2 Co 11:10). the missionary zeal of the Thessalonians is commended in 1 Th 1. the opposition again came from the judaizers who professed to come from James, especially of disloyalty to Rome; ball was taken from Jason, and the apostle was thus injured through his friend. this seems to have been the 'binding of Sartan' which prevented his return (1 Th 2:14, 19, 2 Th 19).
then went to Beroea, where they met with much success; but the Thessalonian Jews stirring up trouble there, Paul went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy behind, probably to bring news as to the possibility of returning to Macedonia. At Athens the Apostle spent much time, and addressed the Court of the Areopagus in a philosophic style; but not many, save Dionysius the Areopagite and Damares, were converted. Timothy returned to Athens and was sent back again to Thessalonica; and Silas and Timothy later joined St. Paul at Corinth (1 Th 3:1, 4; Ac 18:5). From Corinth were sent 1 Thessalonians, and, a little later, 2 Thessalonians. At Corinth St. Paul changed his method, and preached the Cross, simply, without regard to philosophy (1 Co 2:4, 2 Co 4:3); here he had great success, chiefly in the lower social ranks (1 Co 1:26). Here also he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had been expelled from Rome; and they all worked as tent-makers. The Jews being deaf to his persuasions, Paul left the synagogue and went to the house of Titus Justus close by; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was converted with all his house, as well as others, among whom was perhaps Sotheneus (Crispus' successor in the synagogue? Ac 18:7, 1 Co 1:1). Encouraged by a vision, St. Paul spent eighteen months in Corinth; the Jews opposed him, and brought him before the proconsul Gallio, however, dismisse the case. Here we read of the Apostle taking a vow, after the manner of his countrymen, and shaving his head in Cenchreae. He then sailed with Priscilla and Aquila to Ephesus, leaving behind them a young man, Erastus, whence he made his fourth visit to Jerusalem (58), and so passed to the Syrian Antioch. It is probable that from Ephesus Timothy was sent to his home at Lystra; and that he met Antiochus, a Pharisee, bringing news that the Galatians were under the influence of Judaizers, who taught that circumcision was, if not essential to salvation, at least essential to perfection (see art. GALATIANS (Ac, Ro, Ep)). St. Paul, who went to the ends of the earth preaching the Good News, was, however, not always successful. At Corinth he heard of a plot against his life; he had intended to sail direct to Syria, and the plot seems to have been intended to murder Paul on the ship; he therefore took the land journey by way of Macedonia, but sent on several friends to join him at Troas: Sophater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus (both of Thessalonica), Timothy, and Trophimus and Tychicus (cf. Eph 6:3). St. Paul and Gaius of Derbe, who was perhaps his host at Corinth (Ro 16:4, 1 Co 16:17), made a visit there and stayed at the home of Titus (Ac 20:6). There, at a Sunday service which ended with the Eucharist, occurs the incident of the young man Eutychus, who being asleep falls down from the third storey and is taken up dead; but the Apostle restores him alive to his friends. From Troas the party sail along the west coast of Asia Minor, calling at Miletus. Here St. Paul has a visit from the presbyters of Ephesus, to whom he had written one of his Epistles on John's baptism. St. Paul caused them to be baptised in the name of the Lord Jesus, and when he had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. At Ephesus the Apostle spent 21 years and converted many who had practised magic. Hence he proposed to go to Macedonia, Greece, Jerusalem, Rome (Ac 19:1, Ro 16:3), and Spain (Ro 15:23); he sent Timothy to Macedonia, with Erastus as a companion so far (Ac 19:22), and then on to Corinth (1 Co 4:16), while he kept Sothe at his side. After Timothy's departure (40) he sent off 1 Corinthians, which he wrote after he had heard of the success of Apollos at Corinth (11:17), of the success of Apollos (13:3), who had gone there from Ephesus (Ac 18:21), of a case of incest and abuses in respect to litigation and to the Eucharist (1 Co 5:6, 11). This letter is in answer to one from Corinth asking for directions on marriage, etc. The Apostle announces his intention of going to Corinth himself by way of Macedonia after Pentecost (108), and Lightfoot thinks that the Apostle left Corinth, and from Ephesus (cf. 2 Co 13:2 the third time'), but Ramsay puts the visit somewhat later. In 2 Co 1:12 St. Paul says that he had intended to go by way of Corinth to Macedonia, and back to Corinth again, and so to Judea, but that he had changed his plan. At Ephesus there were many persecutions (2 Co 1:10; cf. 4:4, 4:4), and Onesiphorus was very useful to him there (2 Ti 1:14). The stay at Ephesus was suddenly brought to an end by a riot instigated by Demetrius, a maker of silver shrines of Artemis. St. Paul went to Macedonia by Troas, where he had expected to meet Titus coming from Corinth, though he was disappointed in this. At Troas he preached with success; 'a door was opened' (2 Co 2:12). In Macedonia he wrote 2 Corinthians urging the forgiveness of the incestuous Corinthian. [Some modification of the above is required if this Epistle, as many think, is an amalgamation of two or more separate ones. Some think that the person referred to in 2 Cor. is not the offender of 1 Co 5 at all.] Titus joined St. Paul in Macedonia, and gave a good account of Corinth (2 Co 7:17), but troubles arose in Macedonia itself (7). Titus was sent back to Corinth with two others, the letter and announcing St. Paul's own coming (2 Co 13). All this time the Apostle was developing his great scheme of a collection for the poor Christians of Judaea, which was received with enthusiasm in Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia (1 Co 16:2, 2 Co 9:10, Ro 15:25), and which prompted that journey to Jerusalem which is the last recorded in Acts (Ac 21:17). He claimed the right to live of the Gentiles, which the Romans would not usually do, but instead asked offerings for the 'poor saints.' From Macedonia he went to Greece' (Ac 20:5), i.e. to Corinth, for three months, and here wrote Romans (57), landing at Cenchreae, the port of Corinth (Ro 16). At Corinth he heard of a plot against his life; he had intended to sail direct to Syria, and the plot seems to have been intended to murder Paul on the ship; he therefore took the land journey by way of Macedonia, but sent on several friends to join him at Troas: Sophater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus (both of Thessalonica), Timothy, and Trophimus and Tychicus, who had visited Paul at Cenchreae, the port of Corinth (Ro 16). At Corinth he heard of a plot against his life; he had intended to sail direct to Syria, and the plot seems to have been intended to murder Paul on the ship; he therefore took the land journey by way of Macedonia, but sent on several friends to join him at Troas: Sophater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus (both of Thessalonica), Timothy, and Trophimus and Tychicus.
and the chief captain (chiliarch), Claudius Lysias, has brought him into the Castle and orders him to be examined by scouring; but Paul asserts his Roman citizenship. Next day he is brought before the Jewish Sanhedrin, of whom some were Pharisees, some Sadducees, and he affirms his faith in 'the hope of the resurrection of the dead,' the former favour him. In the night he is encouraged by a vision of the Lord telling him that he must bear witness in Rome (Ac 23:11). A fleet of the Jews against him, revealed by his night-vision, is the cause of his being sent down guarded to Cesarea to the governor Felix. The Jews go down there to accuse him, and Felix and his wife Drusilla, a Jewess, hear them, and are moved and quite moved; but he is of Miletus, where for two years, and Felix, when he is recalled, does not release him, hoping to please the Jews. He had expected a bribe from Paul (24:3). Festus, his successor, is asked by the Jews to send Paul to Jerusalem, there being a secret plot to kill him on the road; but Paul appeals to Caesar. While he is at Cesarea, Agrippa and Bernice come down to visit Festus, and Paul narrates to him his conversion (Ac 25:1).

PAUL THE APOSTLE

Wrapping up his imprisonment.—From Cesarea the Apostle is sent, with the two companions allowed to accompany him (Luke and Aristarchus), on a voyage to Italy (59), under the charge of Julius, centurion of the Aug[ustan] Flavian Cohort. They are shipwrecked at Zidon, under the lee (to the east) of Cyprus, the usual winds in the Levant in summer being westerly, and coast along Asia Minor. St. Paul is treated kindly and with respect, and addressed by the centurion, and his advice is accepted. At Myra they tranship and embark in what is apparently a Government vessel taking corn from Egypt to Italy. Sailing south of Crete they reach Paullus, and spend at least some days there; then, though the season of the year is late, they set sail again, hoping to reach Italy safely. But being caught in a storm, they drift for many days, and finally are shipwrecked on the coast of Malta (1R 27:9), and are received kindly. St. Paul heals the father of the 'first man,' Publius, of fever and dysentery. Next spring [60] they sail for Italy by way of Sicily, and land at Puthele, where they reach Rome by land. Here Paul is allowed to live in a hired house, guarded by a soldier, and he remains there 'two whole years,' doing evangelistic work [60, 61]. From Rome, while a prisoner (Ph 1:7, Col 4:18, Eph 3:7, Phil 1) he wrote Ephehians, probably a circular letter to the Churches of Asia (the 'Epistle from Laodicea' of Col 4:16). At the same time he seems to have sent Colossians and Philemon to Philemon and Onesiphorus by Tychicus and Onesiphorus. The Colossians was not sent Paul (Col 2), but, having heard of errors at Colosae, he writes to exhort them and Archippus (417; cf. Phil 2). He has written to the Romans, he is said to have been their chief minister. The short letter to Philemon is a touching appeal from 'Paul, aged man' (v. 21) to a master to receive back a fugitive slave Onesimus; the master formerly, and now the slave, owed their Christianity to St. Paul. At this time the Apostle has with him Epaphras of Colosse (who had come to Rome and was a 'fellow prisoner' with Paul, Phil 4:20), Aristarchus, Mark, Jesus, Justus, Luke, and Demas. About the same date Philippians was written, and sent by Epaphroditus of Philippi (Ph 2:25), who had been sick nigh to death, but had recovered; he had been sent by the Philippians with alms to Rome (Ph 4:15). St. Paul exhorts his 'true yokefellow' (whom Lichfoot takes to be Epaphroditus, but who is more probably the chief minister of the Philippi Church) to appear a quarrel between two Church workers, Euodia and Syntyche (40): the 'clement' there mentioned seems to have been a Philippi convert. St. Paul hopes soon to send Timothy to Philippi (28), and to be free to come soon to them himself (224; cf. Phil 2:23).

12. Later life [end of 61 to 67]—This we can in part construct from the Pastoral Epistles; those who reject them will take their own view of the account which follows. We may first ask whether St. Paul went to Spain. As we have seen, he meant to do so (Ro 15:23), and early tradition affirmed that he did go (above, i. 4 (d)). This tradition, however, may have been based on his recorded intention; and it is a difficulty that no trace is left of a Spanish visit, and that no Church in Spain claims to have been founded by him. Journeys to the East are better attested; he certainly went some eastwards to find out whether the churches he had left in Egypt and Arabia (2 Ti 4:10), and he was present at Corinth (1 Ti 1:3; 2 Ti 4:13), and he was probably present at Corinth (1 Ti 1:3; 2 Ti 4:13) before he went to Rome. We may accordingly read that he went to Corinth and left Erastus there (2 Ti 4:21); that he sailed along the west coast of Asia Minor, leaving Trophimus sick at Miletus (2b.), and that he was at Ephesus for two years (Cu 1:7); that he called at Troas and left some things there (2 Ti 4:12); and that he went to Macedonia (1 Ti 1:3). But these events need not have happened on the same journey. At Ephesus we read of various heresies—of Hymenaeus and Alexander whom Paul 'delivered unto Satan' (1 Ti 15)—Alexander is perhaps the coppersmith who opposed Paul, probably at Ephesus, not Troas (2 Ti 4:-6); of Hymenaeus and the same (1 Ti 1:3). And Paul and Philemon have explained the resurrection of the dead in a figurative sense as an event already past (2 Ti 2:18), and of Phelydus and Hermogenes, who, with 'all that are in Asia' (14), deserted the Apostle; and it is uncertain whether the reference is to the first, or an account of some previous, second imprisonment, before or after the first imprisonment at Rome. Another journey was to Crete, where St. Paul left Titus to rule the Church for a time (Tit 1:7); thereafter the Apostle went to Nicopolis on the west coast of Peloponnesus, opposite Italy, where he intended to winter (Tit 3:12). Before reaching Nicopolis he wrote 1 Timothy (probably) and Titus; he asked Titus to come to him when another could be sent to take his place (39).

The last scene of the Apostle's life is at Rome. He is now a second time a prisoner (2 Ti 2:9), conscious that his life is near its end (40). He writes 2 Timothy (3:4-13). He takes his places in his charge to the Roman Church (41), and to the Ephesians, and to Titus. He carries on the work of the Church as much as possible (42). He says that he has already written Paul and Philemon (28), and he has been released from prison and has not been a prisoner in Rome, perhaps at the first imprisonment, for he has not been freed before 2 Tim. was written (114-15). It is disputed whether the 'first defence' (first, not farmer) of 2 Ti 4:16, when 'all forsook him,' refers to a preliminary examination in the second imprisonment, or, as seems more likely (Zahn), to the first imprisonment; the Apostle speaks of his being delivered out of the mouth of the lion, that through him 'the message might be fully proclaimed, and that all the Gentiles might hear.' This seems to refer to the further travels of the Apostle after his first imprisonment, whereas when writing 2 Tim. he knew that he was already imprisoned. 15. By universal tradition the martyrdom of St. Paul was at Rome (Harnack 64, Turner 64-65, Ramsey and Lightfoot 67). Clement of Rome (Cor. 5), c. a.D. 95, says that the body of John was brought from Rome. At the end of the 2nd cent. Tertullian gives details: 'Paul is beheaded . . . At Rome Nero was the first who stained with blood the rising faith. Then diocletianEvent Paul obtain a birth suited to Roman citizenship . . . there' (Scorpi. 15, Pan. Lat. ii. 12; 244, 255 . . . where Paul wins his crown in Death like John's (de Prasc. Har. 36, Patr. Lat. ii. 59). In the 3rd cent. Origen (Com. in Gen. iii., see Eusebii, HE iii. 1) says that St. Paul suffered martyrdom in Rome under Nero (Nero died a.d. 68). As there is no conflicting tradition, we may with confidence accept this account. More modern traditions make the death to have taken place at St. Fontane, 3 miles from Rome, and the burial at St. Paolo fuori le Mura, nearer the city.

14. Appearance.—The following is the description in the Acts of Paul and Thecla (Armen. vers. § 5, Conybeare's Account, p. 62), which may go back: In this matter, to the 1st cent.: 'Onesiphorus ... saw Paul coming along, a man of moderate stature, with curly hair ... scanty, crooked legs, with blue eyes and large knobbly knees, and he was all full of the grace and pity of the Lord, sometimes having the appearance of a man, but sometimes looking like an angel.' The 'blue eyes' are peculiar to the Armenian. The other versions say that he was bow-legged, with meeting eyebrows, and that his complexion did not agree badly with that of St. Paul's detractors in 2 Co 10 a 11, who said that though his letters were weighty and strong, his bodily presence was weak, and he seemed to be the slave of Christ. In that case, the paragraphs which here follow are an attempt to explain away his authorship. The appearance of the Apostle would be made worse by the permanent marks of persecution, the 'marks of Jesus,' as most moderns interpret Gal 6, which are attributed to Paul as the slave (5) of Christ.

iii. St. Paul's Teaching.—It would be a mistake to look on the Pauline Epistles as constituting a Summa Theologica, a compendium of Christian doctrine. The whole Bible is written, it is assumed that the readers have his possession of the Christian tradition. We have no record of the method by which Paul preached the gospel, but he takes it for granted that it is known to those by whom he had been instructed, and he repeats his arguments only when special circumstances call for repetition. Doctrines like the Godhead of our Lord and of the Holy Spirit, the Atonement, and the Sacraments, are not stated as theological maxims, but as definitions (cf. 2 Th 2 t 3, 1 Co 11 1). Even the Epistle to the Romans, addressed to those who had not heard the Pauline presentation of the gospel, and partaking more of the nature of a treatise than of any of the rest, assumes the substratum of Christian faith and the position in which the Atonement is alluded to in Ro 3 a 17. It follows that it would be extremely unsafe to build any argument as to St. Paul's teaching upon his silence. The paragraphs which here follow are an attempt to bring together references in the Epistles to some of the more important points of Christian doctrine. But we may first ask whether St. Paul used a creed in his instructions. In 1 Co 1 3, he seems to be quoting something of this nature; and a verse from a creed-like hymn is given in 1 T 3 a. Yet the earliest known creed (the 'Apostles') cannot be traced back in any form before the second quarter of the 2nd cent., and the existence of anything like a creed in the Apostles' times is therefore a matter of conjecture only.

1. The Fatherhood of God.—Christianity inherited this doctrine from the Jews. Yet it was fully revealed to us only by our Lord, for the Jews had hardly got beyond the truth that God was the Father of Israel. The Apostle develops this truth. God is the Father of Jesus (2 Co 1 f, Eph 1 f), who is 'the Son of God' (Gal 2 a, Rom 1 a, 2 Co 1 a, Eph 1 f; cf. 1 Th 1 a)—His 'own Son' (i.e. partner of His nature), whom He did not spare (Ro 8 a), passages which recall both Mk 11 and Jn 3 a. But, further, God is the father of all creatures (Eph 4 f), from Him 'every fatherhood' (i.e. family) in heaven and earth is named (Eph 3 ft); He is 'the Father' (Gal 1 f etc.), the 'Father of glory' (Eph 1 f). In a special sense He is the Father of all Christians, whose sons He has adopted (Ro 8 a, Gal 3 a 4 ft, Eph 1 f etc.). St. Paul never confuses the relation of the Father to the Son with that of the Father to mankind, but keeps the distinction of Jn 20 a (my Father and your Father).

2. The Fall of Man.—The universality of sin is the most prominent theme in Rom., among both Gentiles (11 ft) and Jews (22 ft); all are 'under sin' (30 ft). Sin is due to Adam's fall, and is punished by death; yet each man is responsible (59) and is punished (59), not mean more error, as it was understood by the heathen, but moral wrong (cf. Ps 51 a; so frequently in Ot). From Adam came a taint which is called the 'law of sin' in the members (Ro 7 a); it is a moral weakness which makes man inclined to sin. It is noticeable that Genesis says nothing of the penalty and taint as inherited from Adam upon which St. Paul insists; we find it first in Wis 2 24, and probably in Sir 25 a. The Rabbinc teaching varied; some Jewish teachers emphasized the inherited taint and penalty, others the responsibility of each man. For the first cf. 2 Es 7 a, 71 a; for the second cf. 2 Es 9 a (freedom of choice) and Apocalypse of Barnabas 14 1 a, 2 Es 18 a. Two works are probably of the 1st cent. a.D., and parts of 2 Esdras (but not those quoted) seem to have been added by a Christian hand (see Thackeray, St. Paul, as Jewish Thought).—St. Paul traces the universality of sin to the Instigation of Satan, the personal power of evil (1 Co 7 a, etc.), and of his evil angels (Eph 6 a).

3. The Incarnation.—The remedy for universal sin is provided by the love of the Father (Ro 5 a) and of the Son (Gal 2 a), in the Incarnation. That St. Paul uses the title 'Son of God' in no more ethical sense is implied by what he says of Him. He was the only Son (Gal 1 a) 'God sending in His image' (a.t.) the only Son 'in the likeness of the sinless flesh.' The Christ is of the fathers as concerning the flesh, but is over all, God blessed for ever (Ro 9 a); so EV and Sanday-Headlam, who in an exhaustive note uphold this interpretation; those mentioned in RV m as of 'some modern interpreters' seem to suit neither NT usage nor the context). With these passages cf. Ph 2 a, with Lightfoot's note. Christ Jesus, being originally in the form of God, having that is) the essential attributes of God (Lightfoot), did not think the equality with God a thing to be jealously guarded as a robber guard with what is not his, but emptied Himself (of the insignia of majesty) by taking the form of a slave. His position was no uncertain one that it should need to be asserted. It was this fact that made the condescension so great; Christ, being rich, became poor for our sakes (2 Co 8 a). The pre-existence of our Lord is implied by the fact that when Christians had arrived at the second quarter of the 2nd cent., and the existence of anything like a creed in the Apostle's times is therefore a matter of conjecture only. He is the manifestation of the unseen Father; while the second denotes His relation to created things—It implies priority to all creation (for the Arid gloss that it meant that Christ was the first creature is absolutely excluded by v. 16), and implies also sovereignty over creation, for the firstborn is the ruler of God's family (Ps 8 a). In Eph 1 28 be 'church of the firstborn' probably means 'heirs of the Kingdom'; cf. also Ro 8 a). The Pastoral Epistles also teach the pre-existence of our Lord; the words 'manifested in the flesh' in 1 T 3 a (where 'God' must be omitted from the text) necessitate this; and in Th 2 9, according to the most probable interpretation (RV text), Jesus is called 'our great God and Saviour' (see Dean Bernard's note).—It would, however, be misleading (Sp) to suggest that St. Paul's belief in the Divinity of His Son depends only on the interpretation of a few controverted texts, however great their combined force. The whole language of the Pauline Epistles, the devoted submission of Paul the 'slave' (Ro 1 a and passim) to Jesus, are...
inexplicable on any other hypothesis (see also the next paragraph).

The Resurrection.—As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.' The last Adam became a life-giving spirit' (1 Co 15:45; cf. Ro 5:17). Our Lord is the ‘second’ or ‘last’ Adam, thus re-establishing what the first Adam destroyed. It has been thought that the second Adam was a common Rabbinic title for the Messiah, but this seems doubtful. The term ‘first Adam’ is found, but is used in contradistinction to other men (‘Adam’s man’), not as opposed to Messiah (Theocritus, op. cit. p. 41). Others have thought that St. Paul got his contrast between Adam and Christ from Philo and the Alexandrian Jewish school. However this was our Lord came to be the Second Adam ‘from heaven’ (1 Co 15:47), to restore all things, to be the representative man, and to recapitulate or sum up the human species in Himself (cf. Eph 1:20), to show to fallen humanity what God meant man to be.

This restoration was to be by the death of Jesus, by a sacrifice. Christ was set forth by God to be a propitiation, or (as we should perhaps translate) to be ‘a victim’ (1 Jn 2:2). The word is used in LXX as a substantive meaning ‘the place of propitiation’ or ‘the mercy seat,’ the top of the ark, so called because it was sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifice. Thus this can hardly be the meaning in Rom. as the metaphor would be confused, Christ being at once the priest, victim, and place of sprinkling; and the second translation is therefore preferable (so Sanday-Headlam, p. 27 f.). In the meaning we must notice (a) that here as elsewhere (Ro 5:1, Eph 17:23, Col 1:18, 20) the blood of our Lord, shed for the forgiveness of sins, is emphasized; and (b) that in Ro 15:10 Jesus’ ‘man’—the word ‘propitiatory’ of Ro 3:3 can only mean that by Christ’s death, God is propitiated, that is, God’s just anger is taken away from us. (In 2 Mac 14:7-18 God is said to ‘be reconciled to man.’)

This reconciliation is effected by a vicarious sacrifice. In ordinary life vicarious suffering is common, and is usually involuntary. But Christ freely offered Himself, the victim (cf. Ti 2:9), Ti 3:4, 5). Sending His Son to the world not only to save mankind generally, as a body, but to save each individual (cf. Gal 2:20). On the other hand, man can exercise his free will to thwart God’s purpose, as all Israel except a remnant did (Ro 9:6-11, 22, and the call does not necessitate salvation (1 Co 2:27). The election is therefore ‘privilege,’ as it is called; God has chosen certain men to receive privileges in this world, as Jews in the Old Covenant, Christians in the New. Yet there is also an election to life; the ‘glory of the grace’ is not of this world only. Here St. Paul leaves the question, and we may do well to avoid theorizing on it, whether In the direction of the Arminian view (named from van Helmont, a. n. 1660-1668), which was that God knows who will respond to His call, and therefore predestinates the former to life; or of the Calvinist or ultra-Augustinian view, which is that predestination is arbitrary, and that Christ died for those predestined to life (to ‘purchase redemption’). The paradox is insoluble with our present knowledge, and we must patiently wait for its solution in the fuller light of the world to come. It may be remarked that St. Paul, while dwelling on both the goodness and the severity of God (Ro 2:11), never speaks of predestination to condemnation.

By another metaphor the atoning work of our Lord is called by St. Paul ‘the propitiatory sacrifice.’ We are ‘bought with a price’ (1 Co 6:20; cf. Gal 3:14, Ti 2:14, etc., and 2 P 2:2). In his charge to the presbyters of Ephesus, St. Paul speaks of ‘the church of God which he purchased with his own blood’ (Ac 20:28). Without stopping to discuss the other difficulties of this verse (for we cannot be sure that we have St. Paul’s ipissima verba), we may remark that the metaphor of purchase or ransom must not be pressed too far. There need be no question of the person to whom the price is paid, whether it be God the Father, or Satan, who is supposed by some to have acquired a right to man by the Fall. The force of the metaphor is not to place the latter, but in the price paid. It is the immensity of the sacrifice that is emphasized, and the figure must not be carried further than this.

5. Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord.—The former event is made familiar to us through St. Paul’s teaching. His knowledge, and his teaching. In 1 Co 15:12-15 he explains the gospel which he preached as he had received it, that Christ died, was buried, and was raised on the third day (the ‘triumphers’ referred to seems to be 15:16), the historical fact of the resurrection was, he says, witnessed by Cephas, ‘the twelve,’ the 500 brethren [in Galilee] of whom most still survived, James [not in Gal. I Cor. 15:7], Jesus’ brothers, and lastly by himself as ‘one born out of due time.’ The appearance of Christ at his conversion he took to be as real and as little a hallucination as the appearances before the Ascension. So far from the fact of the appearance to St. Paul and those to the rest being put on a par showing that in St. Paul’s view the latter were pure hallucinations, it shows that he was convinced of the reality of both alike (cf. 1 Co 15:3, 8). The criterion of Apostleship was that a man had seen Jesus, not merely dreamt that he had seen Him. In a word, if Christ’s resurrection be false, Paul’s preaching is true. We, on the other hand, are the witnesses of the Ascension. The historical fact is treated as fundamental in the sermons at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13:31), at Athens (17:31), and before Agrippa (26:22); and the salient point of Paul’s teaching seized on by Festus was that he affirmed Jesus, who was dead (‘had died’), to be alive (20:29). It is this fact that is the great power of the Christian life (Ph 3:11).

The Ascension and Future Return of our Lord are often alluded to by St. Paul (see also 10 below). It is explicitly stated in Eph 4 that Jesus ascended to give gifts unto men, and Ps 68:18 is quoted. Jesus is exalted in glory (Ph 2, 1 Ti 3:16), or, in the symbolic language found also elsewhere in NT, expressing the same fact, is seated on the right hand of God (Ro 8:30, Eph 1:10, Col 3:1, from Ps 110:4); so the believer is made to sit in heavenly places (Eph 2:6). Jesus is expected to return ‘from heaven’ (1 Th 4:14, Ph 3:20), i.e., from the world (2 Co 5:10, 2 Ti 4:8, Ac 17:31, cf. Jn 5:22, 27). It is said, however, by Prof. Harnack that the Ascension had no separate place in primitive Christian tradition, and that the Resurrection of the Old Testament were thought of as one act. As regards St. Paul, his silence, his use of Ro 15:5, 8, 8 as to the Ascension is alleged. In the former place reference to the Ascension would have no point, for the Apostle is proving the truth of the Resurrection. In the latter we have the sequence ‘died—was raised—‘is at the right hand of God’—maketh intercession.’ If we are to take the second and third phrases as denoting one act, why not the first and second? [For a full discussion on this point, see Swete, The Apostle's Creed, p. 64 ff.]

6. The Holy Ghost.—In Ro 8:4 St. Paul gives a great deal of the work of the Spirit, which closely approximates to the description of the Paraclete (Helper, Comforter, Advocate) in Jn., though the name itself is not used. The ‘Spirit of life’ dwells in us (cf. 1 Co 3:16) to quicken us (at the same time we read of this as ‘Christ’s being in’). Ro 8:9, 11. Paul has said of the Holy Ghost that he prays for us to the Father—words in which St. Paul indicates what the technical language of Christianity calls the ‘personality’ of the Holy Spirit, distinct from the Father. So in Eph 4:28 the Holy Ghost can be grieved. He is the ‘Spirit of Christ’ (Ro 8:4). In 1 Co 12 the Apostle describes the varying work of the Spirit in man, ‘dividing... as he will’ (v.11; note the indication of personality). We live by the Spirit (Gal 5:5). In 2 Co 3:17 the Spirit is at first sight identified with Christ—the Lord is the Spirit; the gift of the Spirit is the gift of Christ. Here we shall dwell on our Lord’s words in Jn., where the coming of the Spirit and the coming of Christ are identified (Jn 14:16-19). So also are reconciled the apparently contradictory sayings, ‘I will be with you always’ (Mt 28:20) and ‘I go away... I will send him unto you’ (Jn 16:7). It is the work of the Spirit that makes Christ’s presence real to us. Hence also the Spirit works within us; we are united to Christ by Him, and from the beginning of our Christian life we are all baptized in one Spirit (in the body of Christ) (1 Co 12:13). The Spirit is also spoken of as being given to us (Gal 3:29; Tit 3:5; Ac 10:32 etc.). Lastly, we notice that the Father, Son, and Spirit are joined together in the Apostolic benediction (2 Co 13:14), but Jn 14:16-26, 26a, tells us of the further, new work, and helps the Apostle’s thought that it is only by the grace of the Son that we can come to the love of the Father, and that the outpouring of the gifts of the Spirit applies this love to us.

7. Justification by faith.—The Jewish teachers who had preceded St. Paul had taught that man is always laying up a treasure of good and had deeds (cf. Ro 2:4); and according as either preponderate at any given time, he is declared righteous or unrighteous; while if the good and evil deeds are equal, God gives man the benefit of the doubt; and moreover, a man’s good deeds may be supplemented by those of the patriachs. [An echo of this may be seen in Ro 11:32; see Thackeray, op. cit. p. 83f.] It was taught that the whole transaction was a matter of contract, God owing a debt to man for goodness. St. Paul adopts the forensic metaphor of judge and verdict; man is ‘justified,’ or accounted righteous, by God, though he is not righteous. ‘The Christian life,’ it has been said, ‘is made to have its beginning in a fiction’ (Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 30). But this is merely another way of saying that God does not exact the debt to the utmost; He forgives freely (Ro 3:24, 25). Man is given a fresh start, with a clear record. The great difference between St. Paul and the Jewish teachers lies in the place assigned by the one to the future, and by the other to the past. While the good and bad deeds of the past are not to be reckoned, and can only be accounted for, the good and bad deeds of the present and future are to be reckoned, and to be accounted for. The Jews recognized faith only as one of the works, and with them it was no more than obedience to the Law.

The forgiveness of man is described by St. Paul as a manifestation of the righteousness (or ‘a righteousness’) of God (2 Co 5:19, Ro 1:17, Ph 3:6), which is regarded as being transferred among men. In the second Isaiah (Is 45:22 R.Vm, 46:13, 51:5), but the condition of forgiveness is faith, which for the Christian is a real belief in Christ—that conviction which the Apostle himself attained at his conversion, an active and enthusiastic belief influencing his whole life. Abraham was justified because he believed the promises; the Christian will be justified if he believes the revelation of Jesus Christ (Ro 1:17; 10:10 etc.); this is the faith (2 Ti 2:5).

In this connexion we may glance at St. Paul's view of the Mosaic Law. He was no Marcionite, rejecting the OT. In his view the Law was useful as a guardian, a tutor, having chosen the world (Gal 3:24). He was no legalist, either. For he says that the promise was given to Abraham before the Law (Gal 3:17)—and in this place St. Paul takes legal argument from the grammatical form of the word ‘seed,’ which he applies to Christ; and (b) by the fact that it was given not direct from God, as was the promise to Abraham, but by the hands of angel ministers (Gal 3:19; the reference is perhaps to Dt 32:47, Ps 68:17 etc.; and by a mediator, Moses (cf. Dt 5:24). The Law affixes a penalty to sin, but does not provide the way to escape from it; thus those who are under the Law are under a curse, which is removed by the Gospel (Ga 3:15).

In another passage St. Paul draws an allegory from the story of Moses’ veil, put on his face that the people might not see the glory passing away from it. For the Lawgiver veiled his face, not because he did not wish to be seen, but that the Law was transitory, and wished to hide the fact from the people. This seems to be the Apostle’s meaning in 2 Co 3:13 (see The Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, vol. 1).

In teaching free forgiveness St. Paul does not teach lawlessness (Ro 6:1; see 8). But it was perhaps a distorted account of his early teaching that caused St. James to write the famous passage on works which occurs in his Epistle (Ja 2:24). There is no real contradiction between the two Apostles; as so often in religious controversy, an apparent difference comes from words being used in different senses. St. James speaks of an empty faith which does not produce a holy life, that is, which is no real faith at all; while St. Paul speaks of barren works that are a mere mechanical obedience to the Law, as opposed to a faith which necessarily produces active obedience to the commands of the Master.

8. Sanctification and Sacraments.—As has been said, St. Paul dwells on the necessity, not only of forgiveness, but of holiness. The two are inextricably interwoven. We must become the righteousness of God (2 Co 5:21) and be transformed to the image of his Son (Ro 8:29) as the Son is the image of the Father (see above, 3). Sanctification is described as an implanting in the Christian of the life of Christ (Gal 2:20), for the risen life must begin in a very real sense here below if it is to be perfected hereafter (Col 3:3). By a slightly different figure we are said in Ro 6:6 (see R.V) to be partakers of Christ (with Christ), in respect of, or by, the likeness of (i.e. by partaking in) His death and resurrection (cf. Ph 3:10); the language closely resembles our Lord’s words at Capernaum (Jn 6:56), and His parable of the Vine (Jn 15:1-5). Of this union baptism is at once a symbol and an instrument; we are immersed and submerged, then emerge from the font—the reference is to the custom of baptism—by immersion in water, and then rise with Christ to a new life (Ro 6:4; cf. Col 2:12, 23; 3:3); by baptism we are incorporated with Him (Ro 6:4; cf. Gal 3:27, 1 Co 12:13 RV, Mt 28:19 RV, Ac 8:38 RV, 18 RV). The phrase ‘baptized into’ or ‘into’ denotes either the purpose of baptism (e.g. remission of sins) or the person to whom the baptized is united. [In 1 Co 1:16 the words are used in an inferior sense, of the obedience of the Israelites to Moses.) It has been referred to this interpretation that our Lord gave the command to baptize (Mt 28:19) in Aramaic, and that the phrase used in that language could mean ‘to baptize under the authority of’ (Dean Robinson). But whatever the phrase 'in the name of' might formerly have meant among the Jews, St. Paul's language seems to show that the Apostle did understand our Lord's words, even in Aramaic, to convey the new truth that baptism is an incorporation into the Name of Jesus, or of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Bp. Chase). For an exposition on both sides see JThSt vi. 491, viii. 160, viii. 161.

Again, of this union with Christ St. Paul makes the Eucharist at once a symbol and an instrument. That Sacrament is not only a union of Christians among themselves ('one bread, one body'), but also a participation in 'or communion of' the body and blood of Christ (1 Co 10:16). It is this feature of the Sacrament that made the Corinthian abuses so heinous, and that makes an unworthy reception by the communicant so serious, 'if he discern not the body' (1 Co 11:23).

This union with Christ cannot be effected by man's own unaided power, but requires grace. It is impossible here to describe all the figures by which St. Paul gives to this. But we may say in brief, that it is God's good favour towards us, not only as a Divine attribute, but as actively operating and as finally given to the man through the Incarnation (Ro 5:1; 1 Co 1). Hence it is the grace of Jesus Christ (2 Co 8:16). It is at once God's good favour towards us and the active help or power which God gives to man to overcome other miracles (Eph 2:2), and it is 'beyond measure' for him (2 Co 12:9). Emphasis is laid on the fact that grace is not earned, and it is opposed to a 'debt' (Ro 4:4) and to meritorious deeds ('works,' Ro 11:6). The word especially used in connexion with the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, of the help given both to the evangelizer (1 Co 3:15 etc.) and to the evangelized (2 Co 6:1, Ac 13:9 etc.). But in St. Paul the use of it is not only a union of Christians among themselves in a literary sense, in which 'Divine help' became the crystallized sense.

—The large subject of the Church can here be referred to only very briefly. St. Paul maintains in Rom. and Gal. the universality of the Church, a society for all the world, which need not be entered through Judaism. Christ has broken down the wall between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2:14). His Church is a visible society (Eph 3:11; 1 Co 12:12-27) because God is one (Eph 4:4-6); holy because all Christians are called to be saints (1 Co 1); and it is 'cleaned by the laver of water with the word' (Eph 5:26). It especially used in connexion with the Catholic, because for every man (Col 1:20); there is no 'inner circle' of the initiated, and for all nations and ages, and containing all truth (Gal 3:28 etc., 1 Ti 3:16, 2 Ti 2:19; cf. Jn 12:32). Its name itself is not found before Ignatius; and apostolic (Eph 2:25). The last thought is the same as that of Jn 20:23, for Christians are not a self-constituted body, but are 'sent' by God, that is, they are apostolic. St. Paul describes the Church under various metaphors. It is the body of Christ (1 Co 12:12, 'one body in Christ'); 1 Co 12:12 ('the body is one'). Also the Church is the bride of Christ; the title is implied in Eph 5:22 (cf. Rev 21:9). It is the house of God (1 Ti 3:5), a common metaphor which still gives us the double meaning of 'church' as 'home' or 'dwelling.' It is 'the house of God' (1 Co 3:9). The names of God in Eph 2:22. In another figure the Church is an olive tree, being regarded as a continuation of the old dispensation, new branches (the Gentiles) having been grafted in, and old ones (the Jews) broken off, though they too may again be grafted in (Ro 11:17-24). See GRAFTING.

In this Church St. Paul describes a regular ministry; Apostles like himself; apostolic delegates such as Timothy and Thad, whose work, like that of the Apostles, was to appoint local officers, called bishops (overseers) and deacons (ministers) at Philippi (Ph 1:1) and in the Pastoral Epistles (no deacons are mentioned in Th.). Presbyters (elders) are also mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles (cf. also Acts 11:11 15:2. Th 21:18 for those at Jerusalem, 14th 20:17 for those elsewhere); and the identity of these with 'bishops' in the Apostolic age seems to be shown by a comparison of 1 Th 5:17; 1 Ti 3:5, Th 1:1, 1 Th 3:2: though this inference is denied by some. The appointment is by laying on of hands (1 Ti 5:20; cf. Ac 6:6). Timothy is said to have been ordained to 'the ministry' (1 Ti 4:6; probably the body of presbyters is intended), and 'through the laying on' of St. Paul's hands (2 Ti 1:1). Nothing is said in the Pauline Epistles of the method of choosing ministers (see Ac 6:1).—In 1 Co 12:28 St. Paul

10. Eschatology. —As St. Paul makes the Resurrection of our Lord the foundation of his teaching, so he insists on the resurrection of the body at the Last Day as a cardinal truth. The idea of trouble before the end is common in the Jewish apocalypses. The one thing certain is that the coming will be unexpected (1 Th 5:19).—(b) In these earliest Epistles nothing is said of the transformation of the body. But in 1 Co 15:51 this is insisted on (so Ph 3:24; cf. Ro 8:27). As the Resurrection of Christ is an assured fact, so that of all men is certain (1 Co 15:17—28). The resurrection body is at once the same and not the same as the terrestrial body; there is an identity, and yet a change. The resurrection body is said to be 'transformed by fire into immortality.' This is, St. Paul says that this transformation is... necessary, because in our present state we cannot see God; for this seems to be the meaning of the saying that flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God (1 Co 15:35 cf. also Ph 3:20). In this discussion St. Paul does not speak of the resurrection of the wicked; but elsewhere he re-echoes the teaching of Dn 12:2 that the righteous and the evil rise together for judgment (Ac 2:27, Rom. 14:14-15, 2 Co 5:1). It is the less probable that in 1 Co 15:23 a resurrection first of the righteous, and then, after an interval, of the wicked, is intended; the righteous alone are here considered, and they rise at Christ's coming, and 'then' (i.e. at Christ's coming) the end. Those who see in this passage a millennium, and an interval between the razing of the good and of the wicked, are influenced greatly by Rev 20:4; but the 'thousand years' must seem to be a symbolical phrase for the interval between the first Advent and the last conflict, in which the baptized share in Christ's resurrection (cf. Col 3:1, a paradox of obvious meaning). See Sweet's Apocalypse of St. John, p. 200 ff. (c) In yet another passage, 2 Co 4:4-5, the Apostle looks only at the state of the departed immediately after death. Here the metaphor of sleep is dropped, and the nearness to Christ of the faithful dead is dwelt on day by day with Christ,' whereas in 1 Th 4:14 'we that are left' shall meet the Lord only at the sound of the trumpet at the Last Day, and the 'dead in Christ' will meet Him at the same time. An excessive literalism has suggested to many St. Paul changed his mind about the resurrection of the body and gave up the belief in it in favour of a belief in the immortality of the soul only, perhaps under the influence of Alexandrian theology (Philos., cf. above) or to show that the latter, i.e. the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. But this supposition, which is very unlikely in itself when we consider the short interval between the two Corinthian Epistles, is rendered very improbable by the fact that in the written in daily expectation of imminent death, he yet looks beyond the intermediate state to the Day of Judgment, 'that day,' the 'day of the Lord,' when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

11. Marriage and virginity.—St. Paul writes no treatise on marriage, but he often alludes to it. Both Jews and Gentiles had been accustomed to divorce and remarriage. But St. Paul says that a Christian woman is to be bound to her husband for life, though a widow may marry again (Ro 7:2, 2 Co 6:9). Marriage is not to be forbidden (1 Ti 4:2; cf. 1 Co 7:10). In 1 Co 7, according to the usual interpretation, the Corinthians have asked whether men and women who are married in Christ should be discouraged. St. Paul answers that marriage is permissible for all, though the unmarried state is the better one because of the present (or imminent) distress (v. 23); the thought is of the nearness of Christ's coming, and of the perfections which would precede it. But Ramsay thinks that such a question is not to be expected from either Jews or Gentiles of that time, seeing that the Jews for many ages had looked on marriage as a universal duty, and that the Roman law greatly encouraged it; he supposes, therefore, that the Corinthians had asked whether marriage ought to be made obligatory for Christians, and that St. Paul pleaded for a permissible celibacy.—In Eph 5:22 ff. the Apostle emphatically treats marriage as holy, symbolizing the union between Christ and His Church.

So in 1 Ti 5:24 a 'widow' on the roll must have been 'the wife of one man.'

17. PREDECESSORS AND TEACHERS.—In the Apostle the Gentiles all will recognize one of the most original of thinkers; but originality does not necessarily mean having no predecessors in one's line of thought. It lies rather in new organization and arrangement, in the employment of old terms in a wider sense, or in the re-construction of old material so as to make a nobler whole. Again, the fact that the Christian Church believes that St. Paul was an inspired Apostle does not include the idea of human preparation for his life-work. And he undoubtedly gleaned from many fields.

1. Jewish official teachers.—St. Paul had been a pupil of Gamaliel at Jerusalem (Ac 22:3). This Rabbi, whom we may take to be the famous grandson of Rabbeth (Ac 5:29), was of that liberal school of the Pharisees which encouraged the study of Greek literature. It has been objected by Baur that the statement in Ac 22:3 cannot be historical, for his conversion was such a zealous, so blindly bigoted, so unlike Gamaliel. But pupils do not always follow their masters, and we cannot doubt that in God's providence Gamaliel's moderation had its influence on the Apostle in the end, and eventually contributed much to his well-balanced character.

2. Influence of popular Jewish writings.—The Jewish apocrypha have been in considerable vogue. Some examples see § iii.; the Alexandrian writings not so much. But the Book of Wisdom is clearly used in the descriptions of heathen corruption in Ro 1:19-20, and of the power of the Devil in Ro 8:38. The influence of contemporary Jewish thought is also seen in St. Paul's method of treating the OT. His running commentaries (Ro 10:17, Gal 4:25, Eph 4:20), the modernizing of a cento of OT passages to prove a point, thought to be due to the use of a Jewish anthology (Ro 3:25, 2 Co 6:2), his mystical interpretations of OT such as those of 1 Ti 5:1, 2 Co 9:3 (for sake it was written'; cf. 2 Co 10), 2 Co 10:5 (the passage of the Red Sea as 'Baptism,' the passover and the water from the rock an 'Enchirist'), Gal 4:29 (Hagar, note v. 33, are all thoroughly Jewish; and so is the adoption by the Apostle, for purposes of illustration, of some legendary stories added by the Jews to the OT, such as the references to the Rock which was said to have followed the Israelites in the wildness (1 Co 10), the persecution of Isaac by Ishmael (Gal 4:29), and James and John for the sons of Zebedee). For these and some other possible instances of the use of legends see Thackeray, op. cit. pp. 189, 204, 50, 159 ff.

3. Greek philosophy.—This influence, to be expected in a pupil of Gamaliel, is certainly noticeable in St. Paul's speeches and writings. Stoicism especially seems to have left a mark on them. Here we may remark on the undoubted connexion which exists between St. Paul and the Stoic philosopher Seneca (see Lightfoot's essay in his Philippians, p. 270 ff.). Seneca's writings have very numerous coincidences with the Pauline Epistles, with the Gospels, and even with the other books of NT. He and the Apostle were contemporaries. Could either have influenced the other? There are difficulties in the way of supposing that Seneca was influenced by NT. Chronology forbids us to think that he knew the Johannine writings or Hebrews, as he died in Nero's reign; yet he has many coincidences with these books also. Again, Seneca quotes many of the phrases common to him and NT from other writers; these, then, are not due to NT. Further, the coincidences are often verbal rather than ideas; the text of Seneca is often quite dissimilar to the original; the Stoic pantheism and materialism and the absence in that philosophy of any real consciousness of sin making an absolute separation from Christianity. Yet many striking coincidences remain,—more between NT and Seneca than between NT and Epicurus or any other.

Stoic writer. Thus we are surprised to find that the phrase 'to spend and be spent' (2 Co 12'') is common to St. Paul and Seneca; and this is only one out of many parallels. The connexion, however, is probably not between the two writers directly; nor yet (as has been suggested) through Justin, whose Stolicus (the proconsul of Achaea, who was the last person likely to have been interested in St. Paul's doctrine (Ac 18'')). But probably the Apostle, educated partly at Tarsum, a great Stolic centre, imbibed in his youth many Stolic phrases which we find repeated in the Hispanic-Latin Seneca, who derived his Stoicism from the East. If so, we notice that St. Paul often assigned quite a new and a much higher meaning to these phrases. In the same way St. John drew on Alexandrian Judaism for the word Logos, but assigned to it a higher sense than it ever had before. The influence of Stolic philosophy was more general. For instance, the word 'conscience' is derived from the Stoic Aratus (Ac 17''); also found in the Stoic Cleanthes. An example of a striking word-sequence is found in St. Paul's use of 'stir up', which means 'to rouse' in many Stolic passages (where is it used), containing as it does a quotation from the Stolic Aratus (Ac 17''); also found in the Stoic Cleanthes. An example of a striking word-sequence is found in St. Paul's use of 'stir up', which means 'to rouse' in many Stolic passages (where is it used), containing as it does a quotation from the Stolic Aratus (Ac 17'').

1. Influence of the Roman Empire.—It has already been remarked (ii. 3) that St. Paul was greatly influenced by his position as a Roman citizen, to which he owed his great place in history. The same thing is shown by the fact that he was able to get the case of the Christians before the Emperor. This was possible because he had been made a Roman citizen by a Roman law, the imperial writ of Nero (Ac 25'').

Peace

The translation from OT to NT usage strikingly illustrates the inwardness of Christianity. Out of some 90 NT instances of 'peace' there are not more than 8 or 9 which do not refer to heart-peace. The Greek εἰρήνη in its proper sense signified peace strictly, as the opposite of conflict; but it took over, first in the LXX and then in the NT, the broader import of ἱερόν, which is conspicuous in the (Hebraistic) Benedictions (see Mk 5:6, Lk 7:24, Jn 14:6, Ja 2:4 etc.) and in the epistolary Salutations. In the latter formula, 'peace' comes to hand the sum of blessing bestowed, from God in Christ. The Messianic peace (1, 2, above) reappears in Lk 1:26, Mt 10:29, and the peace of harmony with God (1 (3)) in Jn 16:11, Ac 13:52, Ro 8:15 37, 1 Th 5:23. The uses just named are gathered up, with a deepened sense, into the specific NT doctrine of peace, of which Paul is the exponent, and Ro 3:8 classical text (cf. v. 5) also 2 Co 1:20, 2Th 1:6, 2Pe 3:13, see article on Justification: 'peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ' is the state and the experience of those who have been 'reconciled' to the Father through the sacrifice offered by the Son: the 'trespasses' are all 'forgiven' and in whose heart 'the spirit of adoption' dwells. Reconciled to God, men are reconciled to life and the world; by His cross Christ 'has slain' at a blow 'the enmity' between God and man and between race and race (Eph 2:14). 'Peace on earth' is to flow from 'the peace of Christ' that 'rules in Christian' hearts (Col 3:15).

PEACE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, 12.

PEACOCKS.—1. tsq'îbâpûm, 1 K 10:27, 2 Ch 9:20. The word may be from the Tamil tokel meaning 'peacock,' but from the fact that the LXX has in 1 K 10:27 'carved stones,' and in 2 Ch 9:20 the word is omitted, the tr. is doubtful. The peacock (Pavo cristatus) is a native bird of India, AV tr. 2. Pîndudâm, AV tr. in Job 28:28 'peacock.' See OSTRICH.

PEARL.—References in OT are uncertain. In Job 28:16 qâbûs is in AV tr. 'pearls,' but in RV 'crystal,' while pânîmdâm in same verse is in AV tr. 'rubies,' but in RV 'sandstones.' To E. W. G. Masterman, who, however, is otherwise represented as the son of Pedaias's brother Shealtiel, 4. A man of the family of Parosh, who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:25). 5. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the Law to the people (Neh 8:1; 1 Es 9:4 Phileadeus), perhaps identical with 4. 6. A Levite (Neh 13:37). 7. A Benjamite (Neh 117). W. F. Boyce.

PEEP.—To 'peep' (Is 8:8 10:8) is to 'keep' as northings do. RV mistakenly has 'clipped.'

PEKAH was one of the last kings of Israel. The country was unsettled, and there was great dissatisfaction on account of the heavy tribute paid to Assyria. Pekah made himself the organ of the dissatisfaction, and murdered his king Pekahiah (2 K 15:25). He needed the help of only fifty soldiers or braves to accomplish his purpose. Once on the throne he set on foot a movement against the Assyrians In which all the kingdoms of Syria were to unite. When the king of Judah held out against it, Pekah and Ezel invaded that country, as is set forth in the art. Ahaz. The Assyrians were prompt in meeting the coalition, and the issue can hardly have been doubtful, except to those who were blinded by patriotism. The fall of Damascus was followed by the ravaging of the districts of Israel north and east of Samaria, and the transportation of their inhabitants to remote portions of the empire. The capital would no doubt have been besieged had not the party friendly to Assyria got the upper hand and removed Pekah by the usual method of assassination (v. 9). The leader in this movement, Hoshea by name, had an understanding with the Assyrians, and it is perhaps from the first a creature of his. Abject submission on his part saved Samaria for the time being. The length of Pekah's reign is given as twenty years, which is difficult to reconcile with other data, at our command. The true period cannot have been more than five years.

H. P. SMITH.

PEKAI'HIAH, son of Menahem, was king of Israel for a short time in the troubled period which preceded the fall of Samaria. The record tells us nothing about him except that he displeased Jahuweh by walking in the sins of Jeroboam 1, and that he was assassinated by Pekah, one of his officers (2 K 15:28). H. P. SMITH.

PEKOD.— Probably the Bah. Pêkôdû, a people settled in Lower Babylonia, possibly of Aramean race (Ezk 23:20, Jer 50:5). Their seat was near the mouth of the Uknû River.

PELIAH.—A priest.

PELATIAH.—1. A 'prince of the people' (Ezk 11:11); he died as the prophet delivered his message (v. 12). It is difficult to decide whether Pelatiah's death is to be understood as actual or merely symbolical. 2. A grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 33). 3. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4). 4. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10).

PELEG.—A descendant of Shem in the fourth generation, according to the table of peoples given in Gn 10. In Lk 3:33 he stands a generation further off through the interpolation of Canaan from the LXX. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Its reference may be geographical, or racial, or, as the word meansordinarily 'a water-course,' it may denote a land cut up by streams.

PELETHITES.—See CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.

PELICAN (qâ'ath, prob. from root 'to vomit').— One of the 'unclean' birds (Lv 11:16, Dt 14:15) inhabiting the ruins of Nineveh (Zeph 2:14), where it is called 'corbutant,' and desolate Idumea (Is 34:11). A pelican in the wilderness' is referred to in Ps 105:30. If in these two last qâ'ath is really pelican, it is a poetical and conventional reference, for this bird's habit is to rest near pools of water or the sea; the creature's attitude after a plentiful gorge, when it sits with head sunk on its breast, is supposed to suggest melancholy. In Palestine two species are known, of which the white pelican (Pelecanus onocrotalus) is plentiful in the more retired parts of the Jordan lakes, especially in the Huleh. It is nearly 6 feet from beak to end of tail, and is remarkable chiefly for its pouch, in which it collects fish for feeding itself and its young. The other species is P. crispus, the Dalmatian pelican.

PENTECOST, FEAST OF.—1. In the OT.—The offering of a barley-sheaf during the Feast of Unleavened Bread opened the reaping season, which lasted officially for 49 days, a week of weeks. On the 50th day took place the Feast of Pentecost, also called the Feast of Weeks (Ex 34:22, Dt 16:9), the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23:16), and the Day of First-fruits (Nu 28:2). It thus took place at the end of the reaping season, when all the wheat and barley had been cut and gathered, and marked especially the termination of the wheat harvest (wheat being the last of the cereals to ripen in Palestine). The festival was held at the central sanctuary (Dt 16:11), whither the people were expected to repair for the celebration; it cannot, however, have extended to the settlement in Canaan.

The proper method by which to compute the date of Pentecost was a matter of controversy. In Lv 23:36 the terminus a quo is given as the day after the Sabbath during the Feast of Unleavened Bread. In Christ's time the Jews understood this to mean 16th Nisan, treating the first day of Unleavened Bread as a Sabbath, since it was a day of holy convocation. On this computation Pentecost would fall on 6th Sivan (June). But some theorists maintained that the Sabbath referred to was the ordinary Sabbath during the days of Unleavened Bread, whenever it chanced to fall. The objection to this view was that if 14th or 21st Nisan was a Sabbath, the sheaf-waving would occur outside the Unleavened Bread festival, of which it certainly appears to form a part. Anyhow, whatever be the correct interpretation of the disputed passage in Lev. the Jews usually celebrated the sheaf-waving on 16th Nisan and Pentecost on 6th Sivan.

The feast was probably originally a nature-festival, the feast of the ripening of the crops, for it is described in later times at a specified date. It always retained its agricultural character in Biblical ages, but some later Rabbinical writers treated it also as a commemoration of the delivery of the Law on Sinai—an event supposed to have taken place 50 days after the Exodus (Ex 19:1), though this idea is not founded in Philo or Josephus; and the fact that the reading of the Law in the Sabbatical year took place at the Feast of Tabernacles and not at Pentecost, points to the later origin of this tradition.

The festival lasted for one day (though the later Jews allowed two days for it, because in the Dispersion it was difficult to determine accurately the Palestinian month); it was a day of holy convocation, and no servile work might be done. Two leavened loaves of wheaten flour were waved before the Lord; two yearling lambs were also waved as a peace-offering; seven lambs, one bullock, and two rams were offered as a burnt-offering, and one kid of the goats as a sin-offering (Lv 23:8-11). In Nu 28:7 the burnt-offerings are given as two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs. These, perhaps, were supplementary to the offerings prescribed in Lv 23, where possibly only the sacrifices connected with the loaves are specified. Lv 23:20 also prescribes freewill offerings for the poor and the stranger, whilst Dt 16:9 ordains a freewill offering for the sanctuary, and states that the feast is joyful to be shared by all classes. It is probable that this latter offering is referred to in Dt 26:7, and the form of confession and thanking there dictated was so used at this period.

2. In the Christian Church Pentecost was the occasion on which the outpouring of the Holy Spirit occurred (Ac 2). The presence of multitudes at Jerusalem shows the generality of the observance which the Jews paid to this feast. It became one of the Christian Church's great festivals, as the anniversary of the spiritual first-fruits procured through Jesus Christ's sacrifice. By the close of the 2nd cent., it was established as an occasion of Christian rejoicing. No fasting or kneeling in prayer was allowed during its duration, and it was especially used as a season for baptisms. Under the old dispensation Pentecost had been distinctly connected with the Feast of Unleavened Bread. So in Christian times its dependence on the Pasover sacrifice of Christ, which led to the gift of the Holy Ghost, is unmistakable.

PENUEL (once, Gn 32:29; Peniel).—A place E. of Jordan, and near the Jabob, at which Jacob wrestled with the angel (Gn 32:2), and said (v.29) to be called Peniel (or Peniel), i.e. 'Face of God.' Because Jacob said, 'I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved.' (The mention of the 'face of God' in 32:30 makes it possible that another explanation of the origin of the name is there alluded to. There was, however, in Phoenicia, a little S. of Tripolis, a headland called Thaev presop, 'God's face'; and it is thought by some scholars that 'Peniel' really preserved its name from some place where a face of a contour a face was seen. Peniel is mentioned also in the history of Gideon, as a place with a strong tower or castle which Gideon destroyed (Jg 8:26, 31); it may be inferred from this passage that Peniel was a little E. of Succoth (v.25), and also on a higher elevation ('went up,' v.9). Many years later, Peniel was fortified by Jeroboam (1 K 12:29); so that it must have been a place of some strategic importance. The site is not more certain than that of Succoth; see under Succoth some account of the data upon which its settlement depends, and a suggestion for it. Merrill identifies Peniel with Tutul edh-Dhahab ('the hills of gold,' so called from the yellow metalliferous sandstone of which they are composed), two conical hills, about 250 ft. high, round which the Jabob winds, about 6 miles E. of Deir 'Alla (which Merrill identifies with Succoth), up the valley, with ancient ruins on the top; and because identifies it with Ulb el Osha, a mountain 3597 ft. high, with a fine view, 8 miles S. of the Jabob. But to each of these identifications there are grave objections: they regard Merrill's site, it is expressly declared to be by other travellers that the banks of the Jaboc for many miles above Tullil edh-Dhahab are on both sides so lofty and precipitous as to afford no way for either the Midianites or Gideon to pass along them (see Ezp. xii. 1902 457 ff., or more briefly the writer's Genesis, p. 300 ff. ).

PEOPLE.—This is the translation used in AV for a large number of Hebrew and Greek terms. In some cases ambiguity occurs, as the pl. 'peoples' is not used in AV except in Rev 19:14. Thus 'people' is used sometimes of the people of Israel, and often of heathen nations. RV uses 'peoples' freely, and this makes the meaning much clearer in such passages as Ps 67:1, Is 55:6 sq. (see art. NATIONS and preface to RV).

A special phrase 'the people of the land' occurs frequently in the OT, especially in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, 2 K., and 2 Ch. In most of these cases it means the general body of the people, the common people as opposed to the courtiers or the ruling class. In 16:14, '11, Nu 14:9 the term is applied to non-Israelites. In the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah the 'people of the land' are the half-heathen, half-Jewish population with whom less scrupulous intercourse might be availed by the stricter party represented by Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr 10:2, Neh 10:31; cf. 9: Neh 9:4). The same phrase was used by the Rabbis to describe the common people, who were lax in observing the Mosaic law (Jn 7:46).

PEOR.—1. A mountain E. of the Jordan to which Balaam led Israel (Nu 33:9). It looked down upon the desert. The Ovramadon (a.v. 'Fogot') places it 7 miles from Heshbon, above Libis, one of the heights of the Nebo group. Conder suggests for it the peak above Ain el-Miniyeh, about 5 miles W. of Ma'in. Buhl (GTA 5) thinks it may be el-Muhsakken, backed by Wady Heddan and Wady 'Aydan Mauda. 2. In Nu 29:1, Jos 22:9, Peor is the god Baal-Peror. 3. LXX places a Peor (Phagor) in Judah not far from Bethlehem, which is evidently the modern Khurbel Phaghar, to the S. of the town. W. Ewing.

PERESA.—The district called by Josephus 'the Peresa' is referred to in NT as 'beyond Jordan' (Mt 14:14 etc.). When Josephus says that it stretches from Macherus to Pella, and from Philadelphia (Tamar) to the Jordan, he probably gives political boundaries, excluding Decapolis (BJ iii. 3. 3), since (iv. vii. 3, 6) Gadara is called the capital of the Peresa. The name seems to have covered the ancient 'Land of Gilead,' what is now known as Jebel 'Attin and el-Belak. It is perhaps the most picturesque and beautiful part of Palestine. Rough mountain heights rise from the midst of rich fields and fertile valleys; high and bold stretch between, anon romantic vale break down into mighty gorges, where the sound of running water makes music all the year. The olive and vine flourished, and good harvests rewarded the husbandman's toil.

The removal of the Jews from the Peresa by Judas (1 Mac 5:4) left it in Gentile hands. Later, the Jews resumed possession and control. Alexander Jannaeus held sway from the Dead Sea to the roots of Hermon. Perusa was given as a tetrarchy to Phoreros, the brother of Herod (Ant. xv. x. 3, etc.), and later to Herod Antipas (xvii. viii. 1). From Peresa, Simon made his ill-starred raid on Jericho (xvii. x. 6). It was part of the jurisdiction of Felix (BJ ii. xii. 8). Manassah was made governor after the disaster to Cestius (x. x. 4). Placidus effected its final subjugation to the Romans (iv. vii. 3, 6). It was attached by the Moslems to the province of Damascus. Subsequently it was under Jerash.

The Mishna recognizes the Peresa—the land beyond Jordan—as a province of the land of Israel, ranking with Judaea and Galilee on the west. On the border of the Peresa probably Jesus was baptized. It was the scene of happy and profitable intercourse with his disciples (Mt 14:14 etc.). It furnished the retreat from Jerusalem, whence He summoned his disciples to distress at Bethany (Jn 10:46 etc.). The most horrible story connected with the siege of Jerusalem is that of Mary, a native of the Peresa (BJ vi. iii. 4). In the Peresa to-day the Jews are represented only by the Sephardim and the pedlar. Colonies of Circassians are turning the soil to good account, e.g. at Jerash. At es-Salt the natives pursue a profitable trade in raising, while in the borjeh, the uncultivated parts, the nomads find good pasture for their flocks.

W. Ewing.

PERAZIM (Is 28:2) prob. = Baal-perazim.

PERDITION.—The word is used several times in the NT in the ordinary sense of 'destruction,' with special reference to the destruction of the soul (Ph 1:14, 1 Ti 6:9, He 10:19, 2 P 2:17, Rev 17:11). It is found twice in the phrase son of perdition—a Heb. expression denoting close connexion between product and producer (cf. 'sons of thunder,' 'sons of light,' etc.). In Jn 17:12 the phrase is applied to Judas Iscariot, while in 2 Th 2:10 it is used of the 'man of sin,' or Antichrist. In the latter context a great deal of discussion has centred round the meaning of the reference (see art. Antichrist). It will suffice here to point out that the phrase in 2 Th 2, 'the son of perdition,' combined with certain passages in the Apocalypse (ch. 13), points to a constant tradition in the Christian Church of the Apostolic Age, which appears, from the passages alluded to, to have conceived not of a foreign potentate alien to the Church, but rather of a false Messiah who should be sent to them that are perishing (namely, the Jews), and was expected to make his appearance at Jerusalem. The phrase 'son of perdition' suggests not so much the power of destruction exerted upon those who by willful wrongdoing are given over to the power of sin and unbelief (Rm 1:21), as the effect of wickedness upon the soul of the individual to whom the phrase in each case, is applied.

PEREZ.—A 'son' of Machir (1 Ch 7:9).

PEREZ.—Son of Judah and Tamar, and twin-brother of Zara (Gn 38:7), in 1 Es 5: Phares; patronymic Peresites (Nu 26:10). His importance consists in his being the ancestor of David through Boaz and Ruth, and then of Jesus Christ. His descendants were in all probability the most numerous among the families of Judah; hence the blessing of the elders on Boaz: 'Let thy house be like the house of Perez' (Ru 4:11). According to Gn 46:25, Perez had two sons, Hezron and Hamul. From Hezron, according to 1 Ch 2, came Jerahmeel and Ram and Caleb, and through Ram was traced the line of the royal house of David. W. F. Conn.

PEREZITES.—See Perez.

PEREZ-IZZHA (H).—See Izzah, 3.

PERFECTION.—The various Biblical terms connoting 'perfection' differ in shade of meaning between wholesomeness, the attaining of an ideal or ideal, complete adjustment, full equipment in fitness for an appointed task. They are sparingly applied to God; in OT His way, work, knowledge, law are 'perfect' (Ps 18:32, Dt 32:4, Job 37:31, Ps 19); in NT the same term is used of His will, His gifts, His law (Ro 12:1, Jn 17:2). While Christ describes the Father in heaven as 'perfect,' and therefore the source and pattern of moral ideals (Mt 5:48). The sense in which perfection is attributed to or urged upon men must naturally vary according to the moral conceptions of the time.

1. In OT.—In the sharp moral contrasts which are presented in the successive kings of Judah, right doing and loyalty to Jehovah are expressed in the phrase 'perfect heart' (e.g. K 8:1; ch. 11:4-5). It is clear from what is intended by the 'perfect heart'—idolatry, abominable sin—that the phrase has regard only to general tendencies of religious attitude and moral conduct, and its ethical depth is not increased by the addition 'with the Lord's heart,' for in the case of Amaziah a contrast is drawn between the two phrases; 'he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart.' (2 Ki 14). In a similar sense the term 'perfect' is applied to Noah, Abraham, and Job; its meaning is to be gathered from the surroundings which are linked with it—'righteous and perfect,' 'perfect and upright,' 'fear God and eschew evil' (Gen 6:17, Job 1:1, 2; cf. Pr 29:11). It is noteworthy that in a number of passages in RV 'perfect' has displaced AV 'upright,' with greater fidelity of translation but little difference of meaning (e.g. Ps 18:22; 19:12). 2. In NT.—The idea of moral perfection is carried up to an immeasurably higher level by the saying of Christ—the climax of His contrast between evangelical and worldly righteousness—'Ye therefore shall be perfect' (Mt 5:48). This may be regarded as our Lord's re-statement of the OT law, 'Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19:2). In a similar sense the term 'perfect' is applied to Noah, Abraham, and Job: its meaning is to be gathered from the surroundings which are linked with it—'righteous and perfect,' 'perfect and upright,' 'fearing God and eschewing evil' (Gen 6:17, Job 1:1, 2; cf. Pr 29:11). It is noteworthy that in a number of passages in RV 'perfect' has displaced AV 'upright,' with greater fidelity of translation but little difference of meaning (e.g. Ps 18:22; 19:12).
PERFECTION

Moral conduct may indeed involve observance of prohibitions and positive commands, but the morality does not consist in the observance: it must come first, as the spring of action, and will issue in obedience very different from that of the current ethical code. It is the disposition that counts: all duty springs from a love to God, working from within and enabling man to remain itself in free and unimpeded aspiration after His perfection. Hence the characteristic "Ishak not" of the Jewish law, with its possibility of evasion under seeming compliance, given place to a positive "Ishak" of limitless content, because inspired by a limitless ideal (Mt 5:5). When the man came to Christ with his eager question about "eternal life," though he could claim to have kept all the commandments from his youth, he is hidden, if he would be "perfect." To his infallible possession and follow Christ; doubtless, because only through such sacrifice could he come to discern and attain the moral realities revealed by simple dependence on God (Mt 19; cf. Mk 10:17-34. Lk 15:11-32). The similar question of the lawyer is met with the same teaching of love to "your neighbor," the one source of that "doing" in which is life (Lk 10:27).

In the teaching of St. Paul the moral life of the Christian is often dwelt upon, and in some passages is summarized in glowing ideals (e.g. Ro 12, 1 Cor 13, Gal 5; Eph 3:1-12, Ph 4:1-9, Col 1:9-12, 1 Th 5:19-22). Once the ideal is compressed into a phrase which reminds us of Mt 5:7, "Be ye imitators of God" (Eph 5). There is emphasis on the supreme source and manifestation of the moral life (Ro 12:12-13, 1 Cor 13); it is the bond which binds all other virtues into perfection (Col 3:19); the motive power is to be found in faith, and in the energies of the Indwelling Spirit of God (Ro 8, 2 Cor 5, 2 Cor 2; Eph 2:20).

But though St. Paul often uses the word "perfect," he hardly connects it with the attainment of the moral ideal. He advocates the sense of Mt 5:7 by referring to a meaning of the Greek term as applied to men, "full-grown," "mature," and uses it to mark advance from the earlier stage of Christian life and experience, at which, in contrast, he describes the "babes." To his infallible convert he writes, "we speak wisdom among the perfect; complains, 'I could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, as unto babes in Christ'; and bids them 'be not children in mind: howbeit in malice be ye babes, but in mind be perfect' (1 Cor 2:6 14)." The same metaphor is used by the author of Hebrews (5:11-6), where "perfect" and "perfection" connote a Christian manhood which can receive and assimilate advanced Christian teaching. In the later Pauline Epistles the word implies a similar stress on intellectual maturity, possibly with a side glance at the technical meaning of fully initiated into the Greek and pagan wisdom. In protest against the Colossian arrogance by a few, St. Paul, by unrestricted teaching of the whole gospel to every man, would present every man 'perfect in Christ' (Col 2:12 20). So, too, the use of the ideal corporate unity of all Christians is expressed in the phrase 'unto a perfect' (i.e. full-grown) man' (Eph 4:12). It is characteristic of St. Paul's thought that this unity exists (Eph 4:14), and yet is to be attained; similarly, without sense of contradistinction, he can write of himself as 'perfect' (Ph 3:15), and in the same context as not 'perfected' (3:15).

The great Christian verities themselves, and also their implication for the lives of all who believe, are conceived by him as equally real, yet in distinction of them is joined with an appeal for their realization (e.g. Ro 6:12-23). The facts are there, whatever contradictions may seem to be given to them by the imperfect lives which, if individually, they might be supposed to fashion into complete accord. It follows that he is able without misgiving to set before his converts so lofty an ideal of moral perfection as that contained in the passages already cited, the guilt between ideal and visible attainments being bridged by his faith in the spiritual forces at work (Ro 7:7, 8, 1 Cor 10:1, 2 Eph 3:18, Ph 1:21 2:4; cf. 1 P 18).

Any doctrine, therefore, of Christian 'perfection' must reckon at once with St. Paul's sense of its reality, and at the same time of the present difference between real and actual.

The idea of perfection appears also in Je 14, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing ' (cf. 33).

PERGAMUM. "The Oriental liking for odoriferous substances has always rendered the function of the perfumer an important one. The materials used in Bible times were gums, resins, barks, leaves; and these were variously combined according to the skill and fancy of the perfumer. In Neh 3 we read of a guild of perfumers. 'Perfumers' ought in every instance to be substituted for AV 'apothecaries' as well as for confectionaries of 1 S 2194. Cf. 471. APOTHECARY.

PERGA.—An inland city of Pamphylia about 12 miles from Attalia on the coast, but probably the river harbour of the city and the Cestrus 5 miles away. Its walls date from the 3rd century B.C. It was the chief native city of Pamphylia, and never seems to have come into conflict with Greek influence, but it had a Roman name from the 2nd cent. B.C. to A.D. 276. 'Artemis of Perga' was the chief object of worship, and she resembled 'Diana of the Ephesians' in her rites and images, being sometimes represented like the Greek Artemis as goddess of the chase, but more often by a pillar of stone, the top of which was rounded or roughly carved to represent a head. Her worship was more Asiatic than Greek. Her temple probably possessed the right of sanctuary.

St. Paul passed through Perga twice on his first missionary journey. See PAMPHYLIA. But Christianity did not take root there easily. Perga is not mentioned in early martyrologies. When the Empire became Christian, it was the seat of a metropolitan bishop, but after the blow suffered by the Byzantine Empire at the battle of Manzikert, and A.D. 1071, Perga seems to have fallen into the hands of the Turks. In A.D. 1084 we find Attalia made a metropolitan bishopric, and it is the only bishopric in Pamphylia now. The modern name of the site of Perga is Murdana.

A. E. HILLARD.

PERGAMUM, or PERGAMUM, was an ancient city of Mycia, the seat of an independent kingdom. B.C. 280 to B.C. 133, and the capital of the Roman province of Asia from B.C. 133 until the 2nd cent. A.D. It lay in the Calaeus valley about 15 miles from the sea, and its acropolis rose between two tributary streams 5 miles N. of the Calaeus. As the capital of a kingdom, Pergamum had acquired a somewhat factitious importance. It stood on no great trade route, and under the Romans it slowly lost all but the official pre-existence in the province. Its kings had been champions of Greek civilization and arts, and it still remained a centre of conservative culture. But Ephesus was now the centre of trade, and it was at Ephesus that West and East met together, creating a medley of all philosophies and all religions. At Pergamum there were splendid temples of Zeus and Athena, where these gods were worshipped in the ordinary Greek way, but others also of Dionysos and Asklepios.

The only allusion to Pergamum in the NT is in the Apocalypse, where (15 29 it is included among the seven churches of Asia. The message to it speaks of Pergamum as the place "where Satan’s seat is." While it is possible that this refers to it as the chief seat of heathen worship in general, it is more probable that it refers to the worship of Rome and Augustus, participation in which had become a test of loyalty, and at 700

therefore a frequent ground of Christian martyrdom. Otto was brought to Pergamum for trial from any northern part of the province, and the memory of one martyr, Antipas, as having suffered there does not prove that he belonged to Pergamum. The Church at Pergamum is charged with having ‘them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication;’ and also ‘them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans.’ We may gather from this that a definite section of the church at Pergamum maintained that, inasmuch as heathen ceremonies ‘meant nothing’ (cf. Co 8 t. 10), they were at liberty to join in idolatrous feasts, and thus to malign their so-called position and justify their loyalty in the sight of the law. The allusion in 2 t. to ‘a white stone, and in the stone a new name written,’ may be an allusion to a practice of keeping secret a new name taken at baptism in a place where it was dangerous to be known as a Christian. From its official and religious character there can be little doubt that Antipas was but one of many martyred at Pergamum.

Pergamum was the seat of a bishopric, but its subsequent history is obscure. It retains its name in the form Bergama. The German Government has been conducting excavations on the site since 1878, and in 1901 a Pergamum Museum was opened there. The name of Pergamum survives in the word ‘parchment,’ i.e., Pergamum. It is said that King Eumenes, the founder of the library, invented the use of this preparation of sheep skin or goat-skin for the purposes of writing.

PERIZITES.—According to the frequently recurring list of the Davidic genealogies, this is one of the pre-Israelitish nations of Palestine, cf. Ex 3:17 23:24 34:1, Dt 20:1, Jos 11:24. The Perizites, however, do not appear anywhere definitely in the history. Because in Gn 16:15 and Jos 18:2 they are mentioned with the Rephaim, and inferred that they were inhabitants of the pre-Semitic tribes of Palestine. In the J document the Perizites are three times mentioned with the Canaanites (Gn 13:1 34:4b, Jg 11). The name ‘Perizite’ (in AV and RV of 1 Es 8:8, 2 Es 12, and AV of Jh 6:4 Therażitē) is in Hebrew almost identical with a word meaning ‘dweller in an unwalled village,’ hence Moore (on Jg 11) has suggested that they were Canaanite agriculturists, living in unwalled towns, and not a separate tribe. This view is most probable.

PERJURY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 5.

PERSECUTION.—Jesus Christ frequently warned His disciples that persecution would be the lot of all who followed Him (Jn 15:18-20). So far from being dismayed at this, it should be a cause of rejoicing (Mt 5:10). The early Church had not long to wait for the fulfilment of these words. The martyrdom of Stephen was the signal for a fierce outburst of persecution against the Christians of Jerusalem, by which they were scattered in all directions. Saul of Tarsus was the moving spirit in this matter, until, on his road to Damascus to proceed against the Christians there, ‘Christ’s foeman became His soldier.’ The conversion of Saul seems to have stayed the persecution. The attempt of Caligula to set up his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem also diverted the attention of the Jews from all else. Hence ‘the churches had rest’ (Ac 9:5).

The next persecution was begun by Herod, who put to death the Apostle St. James, and would have done the same to St. Peter had he not been delivered. Herod’s motive was probably to gain a cheap popularity, but the persecution was ended by his own sudden and terrible death.

After this the history of persecution becomes more the history of the sufferings of certain individuals, such as St. Paul, though passages in the Epistles and gospels at the spirit of persecution was alive, even if the details of what took place are hidden from us (1 Th 2:19, He 11:37-39). Finally, in the Revelation of St. John, the seer makes frequent references to the persecution and martyrdom of the saints as the lot of the Church in all ages.

PERSIA, PERSIANS.—The Persians, when they established the empire on the ruins of Babylon, saw such as Darius Hystaspis (n. c. 521-466), the second of that name among the ruling family of the Achaeomedes, throw off the Median yoke and depose his sovereign Astyages in n. c. 550. In 545 the kingdom of Lydia fell to him by the capture of Sardis under its king Cyrus. In 539 Babylon surrendered to his troops without fighting, after a two weeks’ campaign, and became the first one of the Persian capitals. Thus the Babylonian empire was added to the Macedo-Persian, cf. Is 19, 14, 21 (where ‘Elam’ stands for Persia, into which it was incorporated; see above) 41, 44-47, Jer 50, 51.

Thus was founded the greatest W. PERSON OF CHRIST.—1. CHRISTOPHORICITY OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—In so brief an article as this present no attempt can be made to detail the stages in the self-revelation of Jesus, or to assign each partial disclosure to a fixed period. Nor is it possible to inquire critically how far the picture of Jesus in the Gospels has been coloured by later experiences of the Church. Accepting the substantial authenticity of the narrative, and of the view of Jesus’ Person and teaching it embodies, we are led to examine chiefly the various significant titles in which His religious claim was expressed. But we must glance first of all at the human portrait drawn by the Evangelists.

1. Humanity of Jesus.—Everywhere in the Synoptics the true humanity of our Lord is taken seriously. His bodily and mental life are both represented as having undergone a natural development. He is hungry and at times capable of the keenest suffering, possessed of a soul and spirit which He yields up to God in death. Joy, sorrow, distress, peace, love, anger—every whole-some human emotion is felt by Him. He prays to God the Father, looking up to heaven habitually for trust, for strength and guidance to do His appointed work. Out of the sinless impulse to use His powers in furthering and defending His own life there rose temptations, not merely at the outset but repeatedly later, which involved Him in a real conflict. He is pictured as sharing in the common secular beliefs of His day and country. Certainly He exhibits at times an extraordinary degree of penetration into the thoughts of men; but to speak of Him as omniscient, whether in regard to the mystery of His future (Mk 13:34), He asks questions to elicit information; He feels and expresses surprise; He looks to find fruit upon the fig-tree, and there is none. So far from being manifestations of omnipotence, His miracles are the fruits of faith in the power of God, the gift of which is sought in prayer and acknowledged with thankfulness (Mk 7:33, Mt 14:34). Finally, it is impossible not to feel that most theological attempts that have been made, by the Annunciation, while it also obscures the fact—indicative of the vast redeeming sacrifice of God—that the life of Jesus, the Son Incarnate, was a life in the flesh, a distinctly human person, which moved within the normal lines of a human mind and will.

2. Messiah.—The first article in the creed of the Apostles is the Messiahship of the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth. Certain scholars have recently denied that our Lord claimed this title for Himself; but we may fairly say that on such terms the Gospel narrative becomes a chaos. The title Messiah (Christ'), familiar to Jewish religion from Ps 2, denotes in general the idea of the King of the future, the King of a redeemed people; and Jesus, retaining the outline of the traditional idea, infused into it a new spiritual meaning, which, as applied to Himself, signified that He was to be the Founder of a new faith, the Bearer and Finisher of divinely wrought salvation. Full consciousness of His Messianic function must have come to Him not later than His baptism, the manner of its coming is for us inexplicable—and at that crisis a wonderful bestowal of the Spirit equipped Him with the knowledge and power demanded by this vocation. His source of this title, Messiah was, however, singular reserve. It followed from His novel view of the Kingdom of God, as the spiritual reign of a Father over His children (no doubt in eschatological perspective), that the Messiahship of His own Kingdom also moved upon novel lines. Hence the almost insurmountable difficulty of revealing Himself as the expected Deliverer without falling into flame such political passions as would have made men deaf to His gospel. It is noticeable, therefore, that at Nazareth He announced Himself not as Messiah, but as a prophet (Lk 4:18).

We are probably right in saying that St. Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:6) was the earliest point at which the Messianic dignity of Jesus became the explicit subject of conversation between the Master and the Twelve; this may be inferred with certainty from the wording of His question and the joy He evinced at the reply. He greeted St. Peter's answer with extraordinary emotion, as seeing in it a proof that the men nearest to Him had gained a clear religious view of the meaning of His life; while He is able to check any secular anticipations they might also form by a sudden adding of the prediction of His death. To the world at large, however, He first declared His Messiahship when arraigned before Caiphas.

Our Lord's reply to the Baptist's message from prison (Mt 11:7) gives us, perhaps, our clearest look at His own conception of the Messianic office. But it is to be observed that He did much more than modify the ancient idea ethically; He superseded it by unalterably binding the Messiah to the function of the prophet, He was not the prophet, but the prototype of that ancient fig-branch, and much more. But although He put into the title an immensity of meaning which bursts its real limits, and in a sense antiquated it, yet the historic name remains to teach that the hopes of men towards God have not been vain, and that it is through a personal Deliverer that God's redemption comes. Furthermore, while the idea of a suffering Messiah may not have been altogether unknown to Rabbinical theology, it was Jesus who first made it current spiritual comfort. Brooding meditation on the Suffering Servant of Is 53 may well have revealed Him to Himself. It was in this mode—through the felt need and reality of saving vicarious sorrow—that the conception of Israel's Messiah was so glorified as to pass into that of the Redeemer of the world. But, even apart from this, a straight line can be drawn from the Messianic claim of Jesus to the later Christology of the Apocalypse: 'With the angel the Messiah is established, for every devout Jew, between Jesus' message and His person, for it is in the Messianic title that God Himself comes to His people, and the Messiah who does God's work and sits at His right hand has a right to be worshipped' (Harnack).

3. Son of Man.—This title is used only by Jesus, and applied to Himself almost in the earliest mention of it in the Synoptic narrative being Mk 2:27. It is scarcely probable, as Dalman inclines to think, that Jesus employed it for the first time after St. Peter's confession; yet at least that crisis does mark an incident standing of its significance on the disciples' part. But it was only at His trial (Mt 14:28) that its meaning dawned upon the general mind. Its absence from NT writings other than the Gospels (except Ac 7:28) is intelligible if we consider that the term, or Lawgiver, which, to any one but a Jew, would require too much explanation for convenience. The virtual disappearance of the title, however, proves conclusively that it was no invention of the primitive Christian Synagogue.

In the Synoptics the name is found on Jesus' lips about 40 times. Various writers have noted that the passages where it occurs naturally divide into two groups, as they refer to Jesus' work in the world in two different Personages, particularly His passion, or to the final glory of His Parousia. It is observable that the ratio of apocalyptic passages is greater in the closing than in the earlier sections of the narrative.

The ultimate source of the title is not a question of first importance, and anyhow it is insoluble, but we are justified in regarding Dn 7:13 as at all events its proximate source, since Jesus obviously refers to this passage in His self-avowal before the Sanhedrin. We must also be prepared to allow for the influence of Ps 8 and perhaps Ezek 2:6. Whether in Dn 7:13 'one like unto a son of man' denotes the ideal Israel or an idealized person, it is hard to say, but the exegetical probabilities are decidedly in favour of the former explanation. Later Jewish thought, however, read the passage in a Messianic sense; and in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch (probably n.c. 96-64) the Son of Man is a pre-temporal person, pre-existent, and personally united with the IGI of Servant of the Lord. Nothing can be more likely than that Jesus was familiar with this circle of ideas; and practically every case His use of the title is intelligible only if it denotes an individual. Recently the argument has been used that the distinction existing in Greek between man' and 'son of man' is made by Jesus, but this is not a startling discovery, for the expression Jesus means more than simply 'man' as such, but 'man' as set apart, and this is more clearly put forward convincing reasons for denying this. Hence we may reasonably assume both that Jesus called Himself the 'Son of Man,' and that He did so frequently.

PERSON OF CHRIST

In asking what Jesus meant by this self-designation, we ought to remember that a given expression may have one meaning for the speaker and another for his audience. Still, one or two things are clear. It is quite un-Biblical to interpret the title as equivalent to 'the idea of man' or 'the ideal man'; title conception is Heilonic rather than Jewish, and though it is embodied in the character of the Son of Man as realized in Jesus, it is not strictly present in the name. Again, the title seems to be theologically not meant as a designation of His true humanity; for of that no one was in doubt. What we judge to have really happened is this: taking the title freely as given in Dn 7, and possibly influenced by the Stigmata of Enoch and the heavenly spheres, Jesus insisted on using it to mean special or representative humanity as appointed to transcendent glory and dominion; but later He defined and enriched this meaning in a singular way by introducing the idea of suffering. On His lips, indeed, the name always had an educative aim. It was, as it were, a suggestive mystery, as much a problem as a disclosure. The title was traditional, yet it awaited final interpretation; and this Jesus gave by stamping on it the Immanuel stamp. Its educative value lay in this, that while in no sense can it be called a popular or transparent designation of the Messiah—otherwise Jesus' question in Mt 16:16 is meaningless—it yet hinted Messianic ideals to those who cared to search deeper. Breaking the bounds of the past, Jesus poured into the name a significance of His own, outréstrapping all previous Messianic ideals, as, e.g., when He claimed that the Son of Man would rise in glory on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9:6). The name is a title which denotes the vocation rather than the nature of Him who bears it; and we are led to think that Jesus chose it deliberately in order to veil, for a time, His personal claim to Messianic dominion.

As used by our Lord, then, the name 'Son of Man' is intrinsically a paradox. It binds Jesus to humanity, yet singles Him out from other men. It precludes of Him alike supernatural glory and human life. It unites in itself the contrast of anticipation and reality, of the future and the present. Yet this seeming contradiction, far from being fatal to the internal coherence of the idea, is really constitutive of it. It is just through present suffering and indignity that He who is to be Saviour and Judge passes to His Kingdom. The "Son of Man," in the mature mind of Jesus, is the Person who unites a career of utmost service and suffering with the. His exuves that transcendent glory. And herein we touch at once the depth and height of His originality (Mulhead). He trained the disciples to grasp this novel view of what it meant to be Messiah; and when they at last understood Him, what their minds dwelt on, and held fast, as indicated by the title so interpreted, was not the Divine origin of Jesus; it was rather His Divine calling and the Divine destiny that compell'd Him. For them 'Son of Man' pointed to the future more than to the past.

4. Son of God.—There are several occasions in the Synoptic narrative on which this title is addressed to Jesus—e.g., by the possessed (Mt 27:34), by the centurion (Mk 15:39), and constructively by Caiphas (Mt 26:69)—whereby it cannot have anything like its full significance for a Christian mind. It is at most only a synonym of Messiah. Even when at the end of their career, the Divine voice hails Him as God's Beloved Son, the words denote simply His definitive consecration to the Messianic office, as is shown by the clear echo of Ps 2. In the OT, we should note, the title 'Son of God' is applied to a chosen people, to the spiritual king who rules and represents it, and to the perfect King who is to come. The outer side of this relation to God consisted in the possession of His power and glory; the inner side was the enjoyment of His love as its chosen object. It was on the inner side of this relation that the mind of Jesus dwelt. In the Synoptic records He does not Himself use the full title 'Son of God'; probably because it was too familiar as a designation of the Messiah. But there are indications that the name which He chose to express His own view of His Person is simply 'the Son.' Not only does this form occur in three important passages (Mt 11:11, Mk 13:16, and possibly Mt 28:26), certain pieces of indirect evidence also bear on the point, such as His veiled reference to His Sonship in the parable of the Vineyard, His question to St. Peter as to the taxing of men's souls, and His conversation with the scribes about David's Son and David's Lord.

Much more significant, however, is His habit of naming God 'my Father' (Mt 7:16, 10:32 etc. and f.), a phrase which, beyond all serious doubt, puts His relation to God in a place distinctly by itself. St. Luke represents the dawning consciousness of this unique Sonship as already present at the age of twelve (2). The classical passage bearing on this point is Mt 11:19: 'All things are delivered unto the Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' Here we ought to note distinctly the three spheres of special that divide; a unity of relation existing between Father and Son is a perfect one. Not only is the Father's nature open to Jesus, without that sense of mystery of which prophets and saints have always only the key. Jesus was, indeed, the unique Son of the Father. He stands to God in a relation of nearness and recognition as no other can share, since even those who become the sons of God through Him are sons only in a secondary and derivative sense. God and Jesus belong together in a fashion transcending man's imagination; it is the Sonship of life is one; and it is constituted by a reciprocal fellowship in which Fatherhood and Sonship are uniquely perfect.

What has been said is enough to cast some doubt on the correctness of Harnack's finding. 'The consciousness,' he writes, 'which Jesus possessed of being the Son of God is, therefore, nothing but the practical consequence of knowing God as the Father of the Son. Rightly understood, the name of Son means nothing but the knowledge of God' (What is Christianity? p. 131). But we are not justified in confining the relation of Sonship to the sphere of special that divide; a unity which is nothing if not personal is not thus to be lowered to the plane of mere cognition. We are aware that there was a time when our knowledge began to be; but Jesus' final relation to God, as far at least as His own words suggest, had no beginning, none at all events of which He was conscious. In Dalmian's words, it seems 'to be naturally bound up with His person; for, in distinction from every one else, just as it is by birth that a son becomes his, so the prospect of universal rule and the possession of immediate knowledge of God were His.' For Jesus' mind, as we can study it in the Synoptics, the secret and origin of His own Person lay in God's creative love. So far, alike in His self-disclosure and in the estimate of disciples, we have no sign of a strict doctrine of incarnation or of two natures united in one person; what we do have is the subduing delineation of One who, in the full value of a career of saving service and as God's beloved Son, is the perfect Revealer of God and the destined Ruler of the world. But it is made undeniably plain that His Sonship lifts Him out of the context of sinful humanity, and puts Him in a relation to God which cannot be fully interpreted by any of the general categories of human life. By calling Himself 'Son' He describes what He is for God; but He does so without giving any explanation of, or explanation of, the sequence of it backwards or forwards in its eternal relations.

That these relations are thereby denied, or made of no account in the interpretation of the name. All that the Apostles say of the pre-existing glory of Christ with God, or of creation as mediated through His agency, takes a place quite naturally as part of its implicit content. But at the same time the notion of the perfection of His highly cultivated human consciousness, as filled, or rather constituted, by personal fellowship and ethical solidarity with God.

This conscious Sonship is for Jesus the supreme reality; and in the light of it He recognizes from the first the perfect cleanness the work God had given Him to do. It was not that He knew Himself to be Messiah, and rose from this to the certainty that God was His Father; the two facts, since the first was the basis of the second, is the reverse. He is Son of Man, and Head of the Kingdom of God, because of the still deeper consciousness that He is Son of God. The roots of His vocation are in the uniqueness of His Person. Verily for test, we cast an alley of leafs. He absorbed the two aspects. The latter in the scale of being a human character stands, the more entirely personality and vocation coincide; and in the case of Jesus Christ the coincidence was absolute.

5. Self-assertion of Jesus.—Apart from specific and, as it were, technical modes of self-designation, the Synoptics picture Jesus as in many ways assuming an attitude to God and men which is scarcely intelligible except in a positive vocation. His higher being, His whole series of features point in the direction of the more developed Christology of the Apostles. He who could speak of Himself as meek and lowly of heart exhibits also ambition and lifted head. The personal trust and volition which He never scrupled to ask from men, putting even natural affection in the second place, is yielded almost instinctively. Nor does the source of the impression thus produced lie in His miracles; it lies in the feeling of His supreme authority. He spoke unhesitatingly of the Father's love, the knowledge that men who knew or understood Him must have been such as to sanction and necessitate the interpretation.

The Synoptics, however, is true, contain no express claim on Jesus' part to be sinless; certainly nothing so strong, were it so. Yet, we the highest His vocation or which reveal His self-consciousness more plainly than even words could do. He called men to repentance; He condemned the 'righteous' unmercifully; He predicted that He should one day judge the world; He urged confession upon His disciples, and put the Lord's Prayer upon their lips: yet He Himself never uttered the cry of the burdened conscience, never spoke one word of need. We do not need to defend Him against the charge of harsh judgment (Mt 239), or a lapse of family affection (v.49), or an excess of passion (219); these, surely, are intelligible manifestations of fidelity to His Messianic task, and it has been justly said that their use and fulness are such as arrest the attention of and do such things without any subsequent regret. The really decisive fact is that in the nature of Jesus there is no trace of old defeats, no memories of weakness remembered. It may be said, indeed, that one may be sinful without being conscious of it, but the familiar distinction is inapposite; for the moral pain of Jesus' answer to Peter's suggestion (Mt 1620) proves with facts, since the facts concerning Him must have been in another, so that He could not have been unconscious of its presence in Himself. Besides, in view of His duty to remove a mistaken impression on such a point, He could not, with the slightest sense of His own nature, would have been an added hypocrisy.

Finally, on every page of the Evangelists we read demands for perfect obedience, as well as promises of grace and help, which it would have been an enormity for a sinful man to utter. From these facts the only permissible conclusion is that Jesus had no experimental, interior knowledge of moral evil. Nor may His participation in the baptism of John be urged against this; for that was 'a great and mighty baptism,' in which He identified Himself with sinful men, and took all their burdens and responsibilities as His own (cf. Donner, Death of Christ, p. 21).

His repudiation of the epithet 'good' (Mt 1033) has perplexed many, and must certainly not be explained away; but, in the first place, it is surely obvious that Jesus meant very much what the writer to the Hebrews means by the words (59); 'He learned obedience by the things that he suffered.' He was being made perfect from the outset to the end; and we see now that to attribute to Him the eternal, changeless perfection of God Himself would be to forget the ethical conditions of incarnation. And, in the second place, should we have thought more highly of one who calmly accepted the face word of praise? Are not even we aliened by careless eulogy?

In the writers, in view of the apparently negative character of the term sinlessness, it is the predicate of Jesus absolute fidelity to His vocation. And it is true not merely that this conception brings out a fact of the utmost significance, but that several NT passages which are commonly held to prove our Lord's sinlessness (e.g. 1 P 22, Ph 22, 1 Jn 39) may more suitably be referred to the other category. Yet the idea of sinlessness is not one with which we can dispense. We need some term which will include, not merely Jesus' actual fulfillment of His Divine commission, but the ebb and flow of His inner, spiritual life and the sinless development of the early years. It is true that such a sinless development is incomprehensible to us. To ethical psychology it remains an undecipherable mystery. All we can say is that it is because no one ever so felt His utter dependence upon God, and hence knew how much in God He had to depend upon that, from first to last, Jesus kept His holiness pure (cf. Du Boulay, Gospel in the Gospels, ch. 13). When we think out the idea of sinlessness, however, and consider how adult mankind rises with organic continuity out of childhood and infancy, we can hardly escape the inference that Jesus' sinless life had from the first a different personal content from ours. The theological expression for this would then be, that in His case Divinity was the basis and condition of sinlessness.

7. Virgin-birth.—In the Gospels of Matthew and Luke the Divine Sonship of Jesus is viewed as being mediated in part by the bestowal of the Spirit at His baptism, in part by the supernatural character of His conception. Weight may justly be laid on the fact that both Evangelists, divergent as their narratives of the conception are in certain points, agree in affirming the special action of the Holy Ghost. On the other hand, quite other, no reference to the Virgin-birth is to be found elsewhere in the NT. It is not present in Gal 4 or Ro 1; and few would say with Westcott that the fact of the miraculous conception, though not stated, is necessarily implied in Jn 3:6. This silence might, however, have led men to ask whether any statement on the subject ought in wisdom to form part of the Creed; and yet again, it would be a mistake to overstrain the argumentum s absiLh. The very fact that the notion of the Divine Sonship of Jesus could thus be held and interpreted without recourse to the idea of virgin-birth proves that that idea did not arise as a psychologically inevitable religious proposition, that it may therefore claim to have a real tradition behind it. The present writer can only say that to him supernatural conception appears a really befiting and credible preface to a life which was crowned by perfection from the dead. That an abnormal fact in the sphere of nature should answer to the transcendent spiritual element in the Person of Christ is both a Scriptural and a profoundly philosophical thought. Nevertheless, the Christian faith of many will always shrink from the assertion that virgin-birth is a sine qua non of real incarnation, or that, in any ultimate sense, it explains the wonder and glory of Jesus' Person.

II. PREMATURE APOSTOLIC DOCTRINE.—In presenting the argument we may take, with some caution, the discourses of St. Peter in Acts, checking our results later by comparison with his First Epistle.

1. St. Peter's discourses in Acts.—The Christology of these discourses is, on the whole, extremely simple. It would have been strange, indeed, had the Apostolic mind come to understand the Person of Christ otherwise than gradually. The words 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs' (Ac 2:23), are the earliest Petrine description of Jesus, and the rudimentary nature of the suggested doctrine is characteristic. A parallel to this is the later verse, from the sermon in Cornelius' house: 'God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power: who went about doing good, ... for God was with him' (10:38). The gist of St. Peter's gospel is that this Jesus is the promised Messiah, attested as such by wonderful works, resurrection, and ascension to glory (28, 32, 58). Hence the name 'Jesus Christ' now appears; 'Christ,' when it occurs by itself, being an official, not yet a personal title. The mission of Jesus is constantly referred to, except in 10:38. But His death, as Divinely ordained and foreknown, and above all His deliverance from death, with the exaltation which followed, are the themes to which the speaker repeatedly returns.

A tendency has been shown, in view of the fact that Jesus is thus described as 'anointed with the Holy Spirit,' as 'the holy one and the just' (3:21), and as a great prophet (1P 2:2), to infer that the primitive Church held a merely humanitarian view of His Person. We have already conceded, or rather asserted, that the doctrine is rudimentary. Specially deserving of note is the eschatological light in which the whole is viewed; thus Jesus being represented as gone meantime to heaven, thus affording the Jews time for repentance, upon which will ensue His return to a restored creation (3:20-21). All is as yet within the limits of nationalistic Messianism. Yet when we look more closely into the clear indications of another kind. Jesus has been exalted to the right hand of God, and made Lord of all things; He is the giver of the Holy Spirit (2:3); He knows the hearts of all men (1:26); He is the Judge, the Mediator of a new covenant. He is set forth quite definitely as the theme of the gospel and the object of faith, from whom repentance and forgiveness come. Prayer is freely offered to Him (1:22). Again and again His name, i.e. His Person as revealed and known, is proclaimed as the only medium of salvation (2:38). Hence, while no attempt has yet been made to define His Person, the attitude of believers to Him is quite clearly one of faith and worship. We can scarcely overestimate the significance for Jews of this ascription of universal Lordship to One with whom they had eaten and drunk, and of whose death they had been witnesses.

The First Epistle of St. Peter.—The interest of this Epistle lies rather in soteriology than in the doctrine of Christ's Person. The sufferings of the Cross are viewed as having been predestined by God and foretold by prophets, and, in connexion with the eternal Divinity of Christ, it is affirmed that, as the foundation of the human being. We can scarcely overestimate the significance for Jews of this ascription of universal Lordship to One with whom they had eaten and drunk, and of whose death they had been witnesses.

PERSON OF CHRIST

of Acts; but its primitive character cannot be mistaken.
Still, there are distinct tokens of the specifically Christian estimate of Jesus’ Person. Thus the Spirit of God is mentioned in the opening verses of Christ’s birth
(1:1); and although the title ‘Son of God’ is not employed, we find in 1

the full-toned phrase ‘the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,’ with a clear implication of His special Sonship. The statement (2) that angels and authorities and powers are subject to Him is a declaration not merely of His exalted state, but of His participation in the Divine power, whose instruments angels are. The dox may mean—what it is alleged to that applied to God is, most naturally interpreted of Christ; and in 5’s a phrase which in 1’s refers to Jehovah is used of our Lord expressly.

St. Peter or St. Paul.—The field of inquiry for the purposes of this article will include not only the four great Epistles of the earlier period (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., and Gal.), but also the Epistles of the imprisonment. We shall use them with equal confidence, although now and then it may be necessary to mark a difference of accent in the later Epistles. But if, as appears to be the case, Ro 9 contains a definite affirmation of the Godhead of Christ, it should be noted with suspicion theories which imply that the Christology of Phil. and Col. is conspicuously higher than what preceded.

Much interest attaches to the question of the genesis of St. Peter’s view of Christ. Following the lead of F. C. Baur, argued for many years that the Apostle’s Christology took shape purely as the result of a logical process in his mind, by the development of the cross, as an antecedent in which he felt the will of God for man’s salvation to be revealed. St. Paul yielded to what was really an intellectual conversion to another Christology which had been taught, and to substitute for it the conception of Jesus Christ we are familiar with in his writings. Others have held the view that Saul the Pharisee was in possession of a complex of ideas as to a superhuman Messiah conceived of as revealer of God and heavenly King—which owed much to mythical elements drawn from Oriental faiths; and that the subjective experiences of his conversion led him, the EXISTENCE of the Jesus whom he seemed to behold in Divine glory with this antecedent notion of Messiah, and in consequence to assert such things of Him as that He existed before the world and shared in its creation. Hence we may infer the Christ of St. Paul has nothing particular to do with the Jesus of history (Brückner).
To make but one criticism, both these related theories merely presup-pose that St. Paul’s vision of Christ on the way to Damascus had no objective reality. But if we find it an incredible supposition that the head of Christ, should the Apostles’ Imagination have actually been momentarily revolutionized his life, or that he could have persuaded the primitive Christian society to accept, or even tolerate, a view of Christ so engendered we shall naturally seek for some more solid basis and justification of his beliefs. And this, with the utmost celerity, we find in his actual relations to the glorified Lord, not merely at his conversion, though most memorably then, but also in his personal life as believer and Apostle. ‘It is this factual life of the Lord, which was borrowed from his own religious experience, that distinguishes Paul’s idea of Christ from a philosophical conception’ (Somerville).

The system of St. Paul’s thought is entirely Christo-tic. Not only so, his conception of God is entirely soteriological. From the saving efficacy of the death of Christ, as the fundamental certainty, he moves on to an interpretation of the Divine-human personality.

In All subsequent acts for all must stand in a unique relation to mankind.

The work and the Person always go together in his mind. His creed in its simplest form is that ‘Jesus is Lord’ (1 Co 12, Ro 10; cf. Ph 2); and although St. Paul’s use of the other terms of the NT, from the belief that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, He at the same time transcends the current Messianic idea, and grasps the significance of Jesus, not for the Jew only, but for the whole world. Nowhere does he employ the title ‘Son of God,’ and for him it is virtually merged in the Person of Jesus Christ.

1. It may be taken as certain that St. Paul was acquainted with the Evangelical tradition as to Jesus’ earthly life. He appeals to the words of the Lord as of supreme authority. Yet no allusion is made to His miracles or to His ways and habits among men. His human birth, His sinlessness, His institution of the Holy Supper, His death by crucifixion and His resurrection on the third day—these and a few more details are. The truth that St. Paul’s mind dwelt chiefly on the decisive acts of redemption, and the blessings won thereby; hence it is not surprising that he should say little or nothing as to Jesus’ human development. At the same time the real humanity of our Lord is to him an axiom. Jesus was made of a woman, of the seed of David according to the flesh. There is nothing inconsistent with this in the remarkable expression (Ro 14) that God sent His Lord Son ‘in the likeness of sinful flesh;’ which simply means that the sinful flesh of man is the pattern on which Christ’s sinless (2 Co 5) flesh was formed; in Him alone we see the flesh in perfect life, the divine life; and was He said to have thereon, was a form of being intrinsically and unavoidably inadequate to His true essence.

2. In addition to a body of flesh and blood, the unique constitution of Jesus’ Person included spirit, ‘the spirit of holiness’ (Ro 1, on which cf. Deut. note in EGE), and a body—of flesh and bone—But this is merely the power energizing in His life in the flesh, the active principle of His resurrection from the dead. To this spiritual being St. Paul would probably have referred for an ultimate explanation of what he means by Christ’s pre-existence.

3. The main reason for St. Paul’s comparative silence as to Jesus’ earthly career is that the Person with whom he was directly in relation, habitually and from the beginning, was the risen Lord. Indeed, to a certain extent, his presentation of Jesus’ death is a pre-occupation with the ascension of the Sonship, and the ways and means of the ascension. Therefore, in his use of the form ‘He was made’ (Heb 2, 15), he has in view the ature of His pre-existence. He has in view the propriety of the definition that the Person of Jesus Christ is the Sonship. The Lord, who had ascended, was not merely and also Jesus of Nazareth, but also the Son of God. The Son of God who ascended was the Lord of the Church. He was Sonship per se.

4. We can hardly put it too strongly, that for St.

Paul’s mind it was after the Resurrection that the manifestated Being of Christ took on its full greatness. The classical passage on this is Ro 1: appointed (or declared) Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead, that is actually the implication that Divine power, acting through the medium of the Resurrection, set Christ free from the limitations of life on earth, limitations which had permitted to His Divine Sonship only a reduced and delimited existence, as we have described it. In the exaltation that Sonship is displayed fully. With this we may compare Ph 2, and Ro 16, the latter being a somewhat remarkable statement:
‘For to this end Christ died, and lived again, that He might be Lord of both the dead and the living.’ In these and all parallel passages the two ideas are com}bined: first, that Christ has ascended up to be Lord of the world, assuming this place for the first time at the Resurrection, and still retaining His humanity;
secondly, that there was in Him from the beginning

that which fully qualified Him for this transcendent glory.

It is rewarding to pause for a moment upon this concrete, working conception of Jesus Christ as it inspired the Apostle's devotion and heroic life. The redemption is to him the Divine Being, clad for ever, as on the way to Damascus, in the glorious radiance which is the mark of Deity. He has reached a position from which he can make effectual the idea which can only be accomplished by passion. He is more than Head of the Church; he is omnipotent in the fullest sense. God has set him far above all rule and authority and power and dominion, and every name that is named, which is indicated by the title 'Second Adam.' As Adam was head, representative, and type of the race that derived from him, so Christ by death and resurrection is Head and life of a new, redeemed humanity (Ro 5:18).

For human development has these, two earthly carnal and the spiritual. Now 'the one element in the conception of Christ that ruled the thoughts of the Apostle was that of Spirituality' (Somerville). The spirit of Christ is the highest and deepest reality of His own life, and of the life that emanates from Him; He is the organic Head of a new spiritual creation, and, as such, mediates to men the renewing grace of God (Col 1:16).

Many scholars, not altogether unnaturally, hold that St. Paul borrowed this turn of thought from the Jewish-Hellenic conception of the pre-existent heavenly Man, the archetype of man's creation, and that he accordingly conceived Christ as having existed as Man in heaven prior to His being incarnate. Certainly we can perceive that the Apostle was acquainted with these ideas. Nevertheless, no decisive proof can be given that he allowed them to exercise any particular influence on his view of Christ. At all events, this is true of the parallel he draws between Adam and Christ in Ro 8:28; and in the passage in which this 'Heavenly Man,' heaven has its chief support, 1 Cor 15:4-28, two points may be noted which lessen the probability of Alexandrian descent:—first, that the Heavenly Man, for whom Philo's designation is the 'First Man,' is by St. Paul called the 'Second Man'; secondly, that the important concluding phrase 'the second man is from heaven' is referred by many to the first exalted and glorified Adam, that the being that at His resurrection Christ became the life-giving head of a new race. It is all but incredible that this 'Heavenly Man' idea, which can only be proved to exist in one chapter of one Epistle, really was the fons et origo of the Apostle's Christology; and in any case it is out of keeping with the idea which the Apostle held that, 'when the end was come, He spoke in a majestic voice, and thrice He swore by himself, who said that He would not fail nor repent; and in the midst of the seven lamps of God's Spirit, and in the seven stars, which are the seven churches of Asia, He said, I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning of the end, and the end of the end, He that is and was and is to come, the Almighty'.
PERSON OF CHRIST

the work of reconciliation, now finds its organic centre. His function as Creator is prophetically viewed as con ducted to a crisis. But the view as Redeemer, however.
expression of the thought is rendered well-nigh impossible by the mysterious relations of eternity and time. Just as even in his conception of the pre-existent One, St. Paul viewed, with sight of the crucified and risen Saviour, neither can he think of Christ as Creator and Sustainer of the world except as he mediates the idea to his own mind through the present certainty of Christ the Re deemer. In a word, the manifestation of Christ is never dwell upon for His own sake, but always in relation to His Saviourhood. It is strikingly so in a verse which in various ways forms a parallel to the verses just commented on, 1 Co 15:

To us this view of God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him.' Here the ideas of creation and redemption are held and envisaged together, redemption being the experimental idea from which the mind starts, as it also is the exalted Lord who is the subject of predic tion. It is a noteworthy fact that the risen Christ should thus be bracketed with God the Father in a verse which actually insists on their simultaneous.

On the other hand, one of the most baffling problems of NT theology is just the fact that St. Paul should combine with these plain assertions of Christ’s Divinity and human nature, or human nature is manifest, that in Col 2:9, 10 'God hath highly exalted him' (Ph 2:9); in which either the gift of Christ to the world, or the bestowal of the Spirit, is declared to be God’s act. All is accepted, endured, achieved ‘to the glory of God the Father.’ Still more explicit is 1 Co 11:2 'The head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God'; and in 1 Co 15— a passage which strangely touched the Imagination of the Greek and Latin Fathers—Christ is portrayed as delivering up the Kingdom to God, and as finally sub ing even Himself to a higher, 'that God may be all in all.' These statements, as we have seen, are to be found on the same pages which unambiguously affirm Christ’s real Deity. It may be that St. Paul nowhere names Christ ‘God,’ and that 2 Th 1st, Tit 2nd, and Ro 1st chapters are otherwise explained; yet a verse like Col 2:9 'In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, asserting that in Christ there is given us a unity, or in organic oneness, the whole sum of qualities and attributes which makes God to be God, is quite decisive as to the Apostle’s real belief. St. Paul does not give us much help, perhaps, in solving this anthomy. Ques tions as to the origin of Christ’s being in God, or the relation of personal energies of the Son to those of the Father, did not, apparently, come before him. It is possibly a true excess which holds that in verses of a subordinatist tendency the subject of predication is Christ viewed as a historical person, the Incarnate Mediator, One who has fulfilled on earth a certain vocation for humanity, and, from the nature of the case, has submitted Himself to God in the fulfilment of the office. But there is at least as much help for the intelli gence in the view that while a certain subordination of Christ inductively forms part of NT teaching, we may still think of Him as being one in nature with God, in the relation of certain human analogies which are the only guide. Father and son, or ruler and subject, may still be of one nature, although there exist between them relations of higher and lower.

It has been argued that for St. Paul the risen Christ and the Holy Spirit are really one and the same. This is a hasty deduction. On the first clause of 2 Co 1st, ‘Now the Lord is the Spirit,’ but it is at once refuted by the second clause,

---which speaks of ‘the Spirit of the Lord,’ so making a distinction between the Spirit of God as Creator, and the Lord, who is the Spirit, in whom He communicates Himself to men, are so indissolubly bound up in one act, so absolute for the same end through the various forms, that from the stand point of the practical issue they are seen as merged in each other. They are one as the fountain and the stream are one. In you, or the Spirit of Christ in you; these are not different realities; but the one is the method of the other’ (Moberly).

5. The Christology of St. Paul, it ought to be said with emphasis, is built firmly on the foundation of the primitive doctrine. After all, his view of Christ in relation to the universe, alike in its creation and its maintenance; also, his personal communication, not so to say, of the Spirit of God with the principles of life and energy that constitutes the personality of Christ. Further, we must allow for the influence of the inter temperate theology of Christ’s Person. Ideas borrowed from Jewish apocalyptic come out in certain pictures of the Lord’s return; and in the statement that the rock which followed the Israelites in the desert is the new Christ, as the Lord himself declared to be the Mediator of the new and better covenant. Hence, even in the case of the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Lord is the mediatory Person. Ideas borrowed from Jewish apocalyptic come out in certain pictures of the Lord’s return; and in the statement that the rock which followed the Israelites in the desert is the new Christ, as the Lord himself declared to be the Mediator of the new and better covenant.

PERSON OF CHRIST

IV. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.—The writer of this Epistle develops his view of the Person of Christ as an implied presupposition of His priestly vocation. Christ is the Mediator of the new and better covenant (Heb 12:22-29); and the name ‘Jesus’ occurs 10 times. He passed through the normal development of human life, and learned by suffering (59). The infirmities and temptations common to man were His also (49), and one verse which means not only that He considered the temptation, but also that He was moved by no sinful impulses of His own (Weiss). Elsewhere His sinlessness is affirmed categorically, in its bearing on His redeeming work (79). The human virtues of Jesus are brought out in a fashion unique in the NT: His fidelity (317). His trust (249). His piety (57). By this course of experience He was finally made perfect (59); not that at any time evil really touched Him, but that the path of personal sinlessness that were in Him were completely evoked by a moral discipline which rendered Him the great High

PERSON OF CHRIST

Priest of humanity. Nevertheless, He does not, as man, give His perfect unity with God's will, but is represented as bringing it with Him into the world (10-14). Life on earth, although an imperfect medium of His higher nature, is a humiliation demanded by His office or vocation as the Sanctifier of sinners. He assumed flesh, not merely to make Himself apprehensible, but in order to suffer, by tasting death for every man; and to the bitterness and shame of death for Jesus to make His relation to the Father, and accomplished His mission, as the perfect sacrifice for the sins of all men, and the ground of justification, is vindicated in the ascension (15-19).

2. In spite of all this vivid portrayal of the humanity of Jesus, the writer well-nigh outstrips Paul in the loftiness of his Christology. As with other NT believers, his mind starts from the Exalted One (cf. 9), whom he conceives habitually as High Priest within the veil, but a Priest who has sat down on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens (8'); and from this Messianic dignity he argues back to Jesus' original nature. In 13 Christ is announced as the 'Son'; and statements are made regarding the Son which imply that He is more than man (11', where He is plainly addressed as God), eternal both before and after (7'), and transcendentally different from mortal men. He made a little lower than the angels (2'); and it touches the writer's heart to think that in coming into the world the Son did not stop short of either the participation in all the infinite glory of His Father, or the assumed burden of the human condition. This is to take this distinction of metaphysical and ethical with great caution. Still, a proof of the primitive feeling which underlies the whole is given in the fact that in Hebrews, precisely as in the Synoptics, the Sonship of Christ is looked upon as the basis of His Messiahship, for it is to fulfill the Messianic function of salvation that the Son comes into the world.

3. A very difficult question is whether in this Epistle 'Son' is applied to the pre-incarnate One, or to the incarnate Christ only. The passage chiefly in dispute is 11-14. No one can doubt that the writer's mind starts from Christ the Son, as known in history and in His exaltation, and holds these revealing facts steadily in the foreground of his thought; but does he go further back, and carry this Sonship into the pre-existent state? A. B. Davidson says, 'Son is His characteristic name, describing His essential relation to God, a relation unaffected by change of state'; and A. B. Bruce urges that the interest of magnifying Christ's sacrifice requires His Sonship to be of older date than the life on earth. In favour of this view, there are weighty arguments against it, is the fact that throughout the three stages of His existence Christ is represented as personally identical. It is prima facie as Son that He is said to have acted as agent of God in the creation of the worlds (13'), or to have built the 'house' of the OT dispensation (3'). But probably the point is one which escapes by itself cannot decide; and we ought to note that a similar unavoidable ambiguity obtains in what are more or less parallel passages—Col 1 and Jn 1.

But, at all events, it is clear that Hebrews teaches the real pre-existence of Christ, whether or not the pre-existent Christ be designated by the title 'Son'. It is the reproach of Christ that Moses bore (11'); as Lord, He laid the foundation of the earth in the beginning (11'); He came into the world with the conscious purpose of sacrificing Himself (10'). Little is said about the pre-existing state, yet it occupies more space than in any other NT Epistle. But the writer offers no rationale of the Incarnation; there is no passage comparable with Ph 2-7; although in one place it is pointed out how Christ's first coming came to men in不起作用 flesh and in glory (21'). The supernatural character of His being is insisted on: 'He did not come out of humanity, He came into it.' At the same time, all docesism is excluded; for not only is suffering and death represented as the aim of His entrance upon human life, but the experience of His passion still remains as the ground on which He is resorted to by men as the great High Priest, who has learned sympathy through sufferings (28').

It is in His capacity as Son that the priestly work of Christ, in which, dying as a man, He offers Himself and is offered for sin, is the essential being of the Son that is indicated when, in a striking expression (9'), it is said that He offered Himself unto God 'through an eternal spirit'; for the words mean that the Spirit which was in Him, and constituted His personal being, was indestructible by death, and enabled Him to pursue His high-priestly vocation in the heavenly sanctuary. Once more, strong emphasis is laid on the activity of Christ the Son for us in heaven, particularly as Intercessor; in 9, 13' it is as Son that He sits down at God's right hand, the heir of all things, and Messianic King; as Son that He carries His offering before the face of God for us, and eternal and Divine. In 13' the Sonship of Christ is the central thought of Hebrews; it supplies the ground and pre-condition of His being a perfect Saviour of the eternal covenant.

4. A brief comparison of the Christology of St. Paul is not without interest. In both there is a distinct assertion of Christ's pre-temporal being, and His activity in creation; the argument going back from His present exaltation, to His pre-existent state. In Hebrews, it is as Son that Christ reaches His throne, far above the angels, by way of the cross; and the idea is suggested that at the Resurrection or Ascension Christ first attained in status what He had always possessed by nature. In both real Divinity is combined with as distinct subordination; thus in Hebrews not Christ, but God, is Judge, and the Son's place is not on, but on the right hand of, the throne of God (8-12'). On the other hand, certain slight features of difference may be noted. In Hebrews, as contrasted with St. Paul, Christ is definitely represented as having taken flesh and blood with a view to suffering; the earthly Jesus, rather than the pre-existing One or the glorified Lord, is viewed as an example; the exaltation becomes slightly more prominent than the resurrection; the high-priestly activity in heaven fills a large place; the mystical strain of reciprocal unity with Christ is absent; nor is there any suggestion, as in 1 Cor 15-47, of a time yet to be when the reign of Christ shall close, and be merged in some final dispensation.

It is not improbable that the writer of Hebrews had felt the influence of the cultivated Jewish thought of Alexandria, which crucified all the creeds. But while the system of Philo may have partially supplied him with a vocabulary, what appears to be certain is that this did not dictate his formation of 'Logos' is not the word used in the Phionic sense, nor is Christ called 'Logos.' His regular designation rather, we have seen, is 'Son,' as given by the OT and Christian usage. What finally puts out of court the identification of the Son with the Logos of Philo is that the Son participates in a redeeming history, which is unthinkable for the other. Nor is there anything in Philo that could properly be compared with the High Priesthood of Christ.

V. THE APOCALYPSE.—The Christology of the Apocalypse presents a rather perplexing problem to the historical critic. Whatever be the sources that lie behind the book, most scholars now regard it as a characteristic product of intensely Jewish Christianity; and OT and Jewish conceptions of the Messiah are certainly the foundation upon which its view of Christ is built up. Yet, on the other hand, its Christology is 'apparently the most advanced in all the NT' (Bousset), and seems at a few points to pass beyond the limits of Paul, iv. 1. Although the book represents the heavenly rather than the earthly life of Christ, yet the personal, historic name 'Jesus' occurs frequently. Our Lord is described as the root and the offspring of David, and as of the tribe of Judah. Primitive Christian thought comes out in the picture of Him as ruling the nations with a rod of iron (Rev 2:27), or, quite in terms of the Danielic passage, as come like unto a son of man (4:4). Hebrews repeatedly set forth in eschatological language: He is the bright and morning star (2:23), ushering in the day of final triumph. His redeeming work on the cross is comprehensively summarized in the profoundly significant title of the Lamb, which may almost be called the writer's favourite designation of Him.

2. Yet all memories of history are lost in the higher view of Christ which centres in His exalted glory. It is not too much to say that the strain of praise to Christ rises from point to point until, in His essential qualities and attributes, He is frankly identified with God. He is the 'Living One,' whose victory over the grave has given Him dominion in phrases like 'the begotten Son of God.' (3:1; cf. Col 1:18), the 'Son of God' (2:2) who names God His Father in some unique sense (2:18; cf. 1:5), and 'the Word of God' (1:14), with a specifically Divine title 'the First and the Last' (cf. 1:4 and Rev 1). He applies three times directly to Himself (1:9, 2:22, 20), thereby signaling His own identity, in.every branch of His life. This title is echoed passionately throughout the book. Notwithstanding the prohibition of 16, all creation unites to worship Him, in strains offered elsewhere to God as Almighty (Jn 1:3; cf. 1:1), and He and the Father receive united adoration (2:11). One meaning of such phenomena is plain. They are the most convincing proof of the impression made by Jesus upon His disciples, one which had been sufficient to revolutionize their most cherished religious belief; for them He had the value of God.' (Anderson Scott).

3. Yet even here the subordinationist note which is audible in other Apocalypse writings does not fail. Thus the narrative forming the book was given to Jesus Christ by God (1): His authority over the nations He has received of His Father (20); and more than once, in the letters to the Churches, the phrase 'One who has opened and shut' is used (Rev 2:11, and 16). There appears the conception—present also in Ph 2:11 and Jn 17:—that our Lord's risen glory is the issue and the reward of His saving work. In reply to the argument that the co-existing and pre-existent Divinity, Weiss remarks, with great point, that so far from the assertion of His original divine nature being neutralized by this representation of Jesus' exalted glory, 'God's gift of God, the one is rather the ground and justification of the other.'

VI. JOHANNINE CHRISTOLOGY.—1. The view of Christ presented in the Fourth Gospel, it should be noted at the outset, is based firmly upon common NT beliefs. The writer—a Jew and an Apostle—declares it his purpose to prove that Jesus is the Messiah (Jn 20), though no doubt He went far beyond primitive Christ faith in setting down things He implies. This interest is everywhere present. Thus in Jn 1st Nathanael hallas Jesus as the Christ on the ground of His prehuman insight; the woman of Samaria is led to the same conclusion; and a similar movement of thought on the part of the multitude is indicated by their question (7:18): 'When the Christ cometh, will he doe more signs than this man?' And the work entrusted to Jesus is specifically Messianic. He comes to save the dead, to execute judgment, to confer the gift of the Spirit according to the ancient promise, to take to Himself universal Lordship (3:16)—in a word, to exert a delegated but competent authority from above, such as none but the Messiah could assume. Only the Jewish horizon has disappeared. All that Jesus is as Messiah, He is for the whole world.

2. It is observable, further, that the writer deliberately makes Christology its main theme. The climax of the Father to the Son, thrown up so conspicuously on one occasion in the Synoptics (Mt 11), now becomes the central interest. The book opens with an assertion of the Godhead of the Son (Prologue), and closes upon the same note (20). Without the self-revelation of daily life and act, the Synoptist had shown Christ to be, the Fourth Evangelist explicitly proclaims and demonstrates that He is; or, as we may express it otherwise, while Matthew, Mark, and Luke exhibit Jesus as Messiah, the Gospel of John goes a step further, and discloses the ultimate ground on which Messianship rests. Christ is Messiah, in the absolute sense of that word; He is the Son of Man, the preterhuman, pre-existence; the world's, the Christian, Divinity, the human, God's, or at least, the writer's, most profound, most personal, articulate expression of God, in whom the Father is perfectly revealed; and the changing incidents of the narrative are so disposed as to bring out, both in the life, the sayings, and the doings, the unique role of this revelation and its diverse reception by men.

As to the historical accuracy of the discourses, it ought to be said that there is a growing consent among scholars that the 'Jesus' words have been formed through the writer's mind, and somewhat taken the colour of his mature thinking. As Haupt has expressed it, the teaching of Jesus is grouped up with its author's, and not from the life Jesus lived at all, and more than all, the truth which St. John and the Church around him had learned by the close of the Apostolic age was really present in the teaching of the historic Jesus. Thus is it that we can understand the comparative absence of growth or progress alike in Jesus' self-revelation and in the development of the Evangelist's thought as well as the historical vibrancy of the evolutionary process was foreshortened (Sawday). He carries out Jesus' teaching about Himself to its last consequence; he views it sub specie aeternitatis; but he does so with unerring perception, for it is remarkable that when we analyze a Johannine discourse into its simplest elements we invariably come to what is present also in the Synoptics. This being granted, however, it ought to be considered an axiom that the writer's conception of Christ had undergone a long, rich development. Influences which must have acted on it can easily be imagined, such as his daily communion with Christ in prayer, the general training of St. Paul, of which he cannot have been ignorant, and the challenge of the fruitful religious questionings everywhere current in the Graeco-Roman world of his day. Unless experience is something of which God can make no use in conveying truth to man, these forces, playing on the writer's memories of the historic Jesus, must have exult in the possibility of increasing appreciation of His significance for humanity. Hence we may conclude that the Fourth Gospel is the work of one who, in the late evening of life, was moved to attempt to communicate to men the intuition he had reached of the permanent and essential factors in the Person of Christ—His unique relation to God as only-begotten Son, His unique relation to men as Life and Truth; and who, in doing so, has really seized the innermost centre of the self-consciousness of the Son, with its firmness and profounder truth than even the Synoptist writers.

3. The Johannine picture of Jesus impresses the reader, from the first, by a certain wonderful and harmonious transcendence. Incessant potest deus, we say instinctively; this is in very deed God manifests in the flesh. Such a figure is not of our world; yet, on the other hand, it would be a grave mistake to conceive Him as out of touch with the realities of human life. No misgiving should ever have been felt as to the genuine humanity of the Christ of St. John (cf. Burdett, The Gospel History p. 233). Can we forget His weariness at Jacob's well, His tears beside the grave of Lazarus, His joy in the fellowship of the Twelve, the dark troubles of His foreboding soul, His suffering upon the cross? Especially does His real oneness of nature with us come out in His independence upon God, which is accentuated in the most striking way. The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do (35; cf. 7:52. 10:17) etc.). Again and again He speaks of Himself as being 'sent' of God, a commissioned ambassador to whom words and works have alike been 'given,' whose knowledge and power are mediated to Him by the Spirit, who seeks the glory of God, and finds His meat and drink in doing a higher will. His human dependence, however, is not a commonplace fact which might have been assumed; it really springs out of the creative ground of His special Sonship, or, in other words, it is the form taken by the Eternal Sonship under the conditions of human life. The life of the Son is wholly rooted in the Father's. Their reciprocal love and knowledge, it is true, are frequently insisted on; yet, although the Son is uniformly dependent on the Father, it would be seriously untrue to St. John to say that the Father is dependent on the Son. The relation leaves a real subordinateness, a human inferiority, on Jesus' side. Again, this dependence is concealed in genuinely ethereal terms as added by motives, feelings, desires, surrenders, not mechanically necessitated by the properties of a Divine substance, or the stiff categories of an a priori metaphysic. All that Jesus says of Himself is perfectly religious in character; it is meant to express personal relations humanly, and so to enable human faith to grasp the only true God through Jesus Christ whom He has spoken. If St. John, then, Jesus is truly and perfectly human; what distinguishes Him from other men is His unique relation to the Father. The idea of a new birth from above, a prelude to union with God indispensable from others is nowhere applied to Him.

4. As in the Synoptics, Jesus is depicted in the Fourth Gospel as striving to free the Twelve from earthly and political ideas of His purpose. And, as a result of His care and teaching, it dawns upon them that Jesus is the Son of God and that He is to be 'the Advocate.' An early stage of the process is marked by St. Peter's words: 'We have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God' (6th); and it is one proof, out of many, of the Evangelist's exalted nature; for he never does not introduce at this point ideas of the Eternal Sonship of the Logos. But it is as Son that our Lord would have them know Him. He uses the phrase 'my Father' 30 times, with ethical intonations added by motives, feelings, desires, surrenders, not mechanically necessitated by the properties of a Divine substance, or the stiff categories of an a priori metaphysic.

5. The last stage of Jesus' claim to and interpretation of the name 'Son of God' is given in connection with the declaration of the glory to which He should rise, and of His future presence in spirit with His followers (especially chapters 19-21). The primary meaning of Sonship had been a relation to the Father of uniquely close love; it now transpires that, as Son, Jesus is destined to share in the Father's omnipotence and universal sway. In the words (189), 'Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into His hands, that the Father is life.' The possessive reason can be offered for limiting 'all things' to the function of revelation and redemption, and barring out omnipotence as such. Besides, the Evangelist is quite familiar with the idea that Jesus is originally Lord and Possessor of men, irrespectively of their faith in Him; He came unto His own, and His own received Him not. Hence in His view the Divine power itself, which Jesus rises is not unshared to His nature, is gained by usurpation; it is His for only so could He receive anything (37), and it answers to the glory which He had before the world was. We see this truth breaking fully on the mind of the Twelve when the cry of Thomas, 'my Lord and my God' (20th), marks the great discovery. In the risen One the Apostle discerns the Victor over death, the Lord of glory; and realizing in that moment of consummation the unexpressible bond between the Son of Messiah and the Son of Man, that Jehovah Himself could be, He grasps Him as having for faith the value, because the reality, of God. Nowhere in the NT is the implication more clear that religious faith in Jesus Christ is really equivalent to faith in His Divinity.

6. These general conclusions are strengthened by an examination of the title Son of Man, as used in the Fourth Gospel. Here also the accent is shifted slightly from His vocation to His Person; the writer employs the name in accordance with his higher view of our Lord's nature to express His personal uniqueness. As in the Synoptics, the term is undoubtedly Messianic (12th); and while in this Gospel it is not used in direct relation to the Second Coming, yet it is noticeable that the majority of passages which Jesus speaks as Himself as such references to His exaltation (31st 22nd 12th), or His glorifying (12th 13th), it being implied that Divine glory beholds and still awaits Him; and this is a link with one side of the Synoptic representation. The other class of Synoptic passages bearing on the work of the Son of Man has also its parallel in Johannine verses, which describe the Son of Man as giving meat which endures to everlasting life (20th), or attaching the possession of life to eating His flesh and drinking His blood, or declare that He must be lifted up on the cross. In point of fact, however, no appreciable distinction can be drawn between what, in the Fourth Gospel, is predicated of the Son of God and of the Son of Man. Both are Messianic names, raised, as it were, to their highest power: one expressing the origin of Jesus' Person in God, the other His human affiliation. Yet, for St. John, the title 'Son of Man' always applies to carry something of the suggestion that for Jesus it is a wonderful thing that He should be man at all. Though in all points perfectly human, heaven is ever open to His present perpetual beholding God with immediate vision (23nd), and He will yet ascend up where He was before (9th).

7. Other forms of thought in which the higher nature of Jesus is set forth in the Fourth Gospel are rich in theological implication. He is the Vine in which His followers inherit and grow as living branches (15:1-17). The Resurrection is the beginning in Him in whom is to overcome death (11:2): He is the Bread of Life which by faith men eat, and live (6:35). In all such utterances the distinction between Christology and soteriology has vanished. To sustain a dualism of vital, inner unity with, and suffusion of, human souls is manifestly beyond the power of any lower than God Himself; and this is really the basic argument for the Unity of Christ which we can see to be implicit in the NT as a whole.

8. The sum and climax of the matter—and this quite irrespective of the Logos idea, to which we shall come more, is that Jesus and God are one (10:30; cf. 17:1, 3): 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14:9; cf. 12:9). By these sayings the mind is led in the direction of a simple monadism, but no theory of it is furnished. The Father given personally in Jesus is the object of saving faith. Jesus is Life and Light in a sense which is absolute (1:16; 3:17); in Him there is a real and inhabitation of God Himself—this faith is certain of and unconditionally accepts; yet what the ontological presuppositions of it may be is a remote and derivative question, and even the Logos idea, which St. John applies at this point, is not fitted, perhaps is not designed, to take us more than a certain distance towards theoretic insight. No explanation, no combination of categories, even as apologetics, is able to place us where we would have the life of God on its inner side. What as believers we are sure of, is that in Jesus the God of heaven and earth is personally apprehensible, actually present in history—everyone of us in all knowledge because first possessing us as our inward life. This is the keynote of the Johannine Christology; the faith out of which the Gospel is written and which it seeks to wake in others, is that Jesus and God are one. Attempt to discredit this unity by describing it as no more than a unity of will are simply wide of the mark. Will, the living energy of persons, is the most real thing in the universe; it is the ultimate form of being; and the suggestion that behind the will there may lie a still more real Divine 'substance,' a more authentic region from which, after all, Jesus is excluded, is a figure of obsolete metaphysics. If it is possible to express in human language the essential and inherent Godhead of Jesus Christ, the thing has been done in the relevant statements of this Gospel.

In the Fourth Gospel, as in the NT generally, this unity with God is viewed as being compatible with real subordination. 'My Father is greater than I' (14:10). In 10th Jesus speaks of Himself as One whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world. Yet the relation which belongs to motherhood and Sonship as such; for, as Lütgert has expressed it, 'the superordination of God above Jesus does not consist in God's reserving anything to Himself; on the contrary, He conveys Himself wholly to Jesus, making Him monarch of the whole world; what it does consist in is the fact that God is everywhere the Origin, the Giver, the Foundation, while Jesus is the obedient and receptive object of His purpose.'

10. Turning now to the Prologue, and its characteristic ideas, let us note first of all that the study of it comes properly at this point, after we have concluded our more general survey. As preface, the Prologue stands first, but we may well believe that it was the last to be written. Touching the origin of the term 'Logos,' while we need not assert that St. John took it from Plato, yet it is extremely probable that the influence of Philonic thought went to decide which term out of those supplied by the OT and the Targums (Wisdom, the Spirit, the Word) he should choose. 'The Word' had long been familiar to the Hebrew mind as designating the principle of revelation, and it had in Asia Minor, to which the thought had come, a certain gravity and depth of significance. The Evangelist, it would seem, took it as singularly fitted to express to men of that time the Divine light and life present in Jesus Christ; but, writing in Asia Minor, he took it on without prejudice to the full Christian meaning it was to bear. It is, besides, a term which must have been in some sort familiar to the Church; for it is introduced without comment. St. John's use of it, too, ethical and eschatological considerations are supreme; 'Logos' receives its colour and atmosphere from the term 'Son,' as denoting the historic Jesus. What the Apostle is setting forth, in short, is not a Greek tranthical idea, but a new impression made by Christ's personality. And when we recall how St. Paul had said that all things were created by Christ and for Him (Col 1:16), is easy to see how strong were the anterior tendencies of faith concurring with this identification of the Jesus of history with the creative Word of God.

In v. 1 three weighty affirmations are made as to the Logos: (a) He existed from the beginning, i.e. eternally; (b) His relation to God was living and personal in character; (c) His place is in the sphere of Godhead. Stevens, with a terminology slightly too developed, but with substantial accuracy, says of the content of this verse: 'the author affirms a distinction, but not a separation, of the inner essence, between the Word and the Father.' It is next asserted that the Logos is the medium alike of creation and of revelation, that He has a universal relation to men (v. 5, 6). That He is now recognized, He is now come personally, and He has given to all who receive Him the right to become children of God (vv. 18, 19). Commentators invite us to note the common fashion in which these affirmations are expressed, alongside of the previous declaration of the absolute being of the Word. The simple phrase: 'the Word became flesh,' appears to signify that He passed into a new phase of being—a phase of human mortality, weakness, dependence—becoming individualized as a man, yet retaining personal continuity with that which He was before. These four stages, then, are discernible in the movement of thought in the Prologue: (1) The Word in His original, eternal being; (2) the Lord who comes to His own as Life and Light; (3) the only Son of the Father; (4) the full name of the Son, before the Evangelist's mind throughout, Jesus Christ. The series is not strictly chronological, but it follows a well-defined gradation of ideas; and from the fashion in which it ends, we can perceive that the term 'Logos' is an ancillary and theoretical one, secondary Interpretative of Jesus as a historic personality, and that, although it stands here as first in the order of thought, it was last in the order of the Evangelist's reflection. The Prologue, it is clear, has nothing to say as to the mode of Incarnation; but when we connect it, as we ought to do, with the Gospel to which it is prefixed, we can perceive the motive to which Incarnation is due, namely, the Divine purpose of giving eternal life to a perishing world. Unlike St. Paul, however, St. John conceives the advent of the Son, not as a humiliation, but as a means of revelation.

11. In the First Epistle of John the unity of God and Christ is so strongly felt that the two subjects are used almost interchangeably; so, for example, in 5:20. Again and again everything is affirmed to depend on the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, as Saviour of the world. At one or yet we may not seem to be conducing to the first movements of a dogmatic Christology (2:26; cf. 3:17). The writer is chiefly concerned to assert the identity of the saving word of Jesus Christ, a docetic idealism having begun very early to dissolve the bond between the two, and to seek some other path to fellowship with God than that which lay through the mediation of Jesus the Messiah.

VII. CONCLUSION.—As we survey the different views of Christ set forth in the NT, the sovereign freedom with which Apostolic believers contemplated Jesus, and the supernatural content which they saw in words which have been quite truly described as ‘literature, not dogma,’ is infinitely impressive. The looked at Jesus each through his own eyes; and to try to force their statements into outward harmony is totally to mistake the genius of Christian faith. On the other hand, all grasped in Christ the reality of a present God of grace, and in this decisive fact lies the deeper, inward unity of NT doctrine. It is tempting to regard the various types of Apostolic Christology as elements in an advancing and organic series. Thus it might be asked whether the Synoptics do not give us the Jesus of history, and St. Paul the living Christ, while St. John fuses both together in an anti-doteic way. It is, however, as far as Christology is concerned, St. John does build upon St. Paul, and St. Paul upon the faith of the primitive society. Nevertheless, it is probably truer on the whole to the facts if we think of NT minds as different prisms, through which the one white light of Jesus’ Person fell, and was analyzed into different colours.

Some certainties are common to the writers with whom we have been dealing: (1) That the life and consciousness of Jesus were entirely human in form; (2) that this historic life, felt and known as possessed of a redeeming supernatural content, is somehow inseparably one with the eternal life of God Himself. Again, it is implied wherever the matter comes up, that it is one and the same personal subject which passes through the three stages—prophetic, historical, and sacerdotal—Apostolic Christology. And we are certainly to go wrong unless we note that the NT is guided, in its Christological passages, by what is really a sociological interest. Dr. Dale’s question: What must Christ’s relation to men be in order that He should be able to die for them? is entirely faithful to the Apostolic attitude. The Person of the Messiah must be of a quality that answers to His function as Redeemer of the world. ‘All the Christology of the NT,’ as Kahler has justly said, ‘is but the reasonable and inevitable conclusion of the conditions and promises of the old dispensation, and guarantees of that which believers may have, should have, and actually do have, for fellowship with God, in the Crucified and Exalted One.’ The one condition which the NT minds as most essential to Jesus as of a quality that is of thinking out and construing to intelligence two things which the Apostles simply put side by side—the true Deity of Jesus Christ and His royal status with the Father. It lies beyond the scope of this article, however, to follow the problem into the Pastoral and later ages.

PETER.—SIMON, surnamed Peter, was the ‘coryphasus of the Apostle choir’ (Chrysostom). His father was named Jonah or John (Mt 16:17, Jn 18:15-17 RV). He belonged to Bethsaida (Jn 1:42), probably the fisher-quarter of Capernaum (Bethsaida—‘fisher-home’). There he dwelt with his wife, his mother-in-law, and his brother Andrew (Mt 13:54-58, Mk 1:38, Lk 4:38, 48). He and Andrew were fishermen on the Lake of Galilee (Mt 4:21—Mk 1:16 in partnership with Zebedee and his sons (Lk 5:11, 16). Simon first met with Jesus at Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1:27 RV), the scene of the Baptist’s ministry (vv.6-8). He had repaired thither with other Galileans to participate in the mighty revival which was in progress. Jesus was there; and Andrew, who was one of the Baptist’s disciples, having been directed by his master to Him as the Messiah, told Simon of his glad discovery, and brought him to Jesus. Jesus ‘looked upon him’ (RV) with those eyes of far perception; and the look mastered him and won his heart. He was a disciple from that hour. Jesus read his character, seeing what he was and foreseeing what the discipline of grace would make him; and He gave him a surname prophetic of the moral and infinite strength which one day Simon the Son of John: thou shalt be called Cephas.’ Cephas is the Aram. — Gr. Petros, and means ‘rock.’ He was not yet Peter, but only Simon, impulsive and vacillating; and Jesus gave him the new name ere he had earned it, that it might be an incentive to him, reminding him of his destiny and inciting him to achieve it. In after days, whenever he displayed any weakness, Jesus would pointedly address him by the old name, thus gently warning him that he should not fall from grace (cf. Lk 22:16, Mk 14:67, Jn 21:17-19).

Presently the Lord began His ministry at Capernaum, and among His first acts was the calling of four of the men Jewish dream of a worldly Messiah, a temporal king, and churchman, and attach themselves to Him, following Him wherever He went (Mt 4:18-22=Mk 1:19-20, Lk 5:1-11). Thus he began the formation of the Apostles. The four were James and John thesons of Zebedee, and Peter and Andrew (Mt 10:1-2,35-42).

The distinction of Peter lies less in the qualities of his mind than in those of his heart. He was impulsive, ‘ever ardent, ever leaping before his fellows’ (Chrysostom), and often speaking unadvisedly and incurring rebuke, disavowal, and for that matter, and the power of leadership, and the concomitant of a warm and generous affection. If John, says St. Augustine, was the disciple whom Jesus loved, Peter was the disciple who loved Jesus. This quality appeared on several remarkable occasions. (1) In the feeding of the five thousand at Bethsaida, Jesus delivered His discourse on the Bread of Life, full of hard sayings designed to test the faith of His disciples by shattering their Jewish conceptions of the Son of Man. Peter, in response to the question, ‘Who do you say that I am?’ recognized Him as the Messiah, the Son of the living God. (2) During the season of retirement at Caesarea Philippi in the last year of His ministry, Jesus, and His Twelve, is asking Peter the question: ‘Simon Peter, the “mouth of the Apostles” (Chrysostom), who answered, assuring Him of their loyalty (v.64). (3) A week later Jesus went up to the Mount with Peter, James, and John, and was transfigured before them, conversing with Moses and Elijah, who ‘appeared in glory’ (Mt 17:1-4=Mk 9:2-7=Lk 9:28-36). Though awe-stricken, Peter spoke: ‘Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah" (Mt 17: RV). It was a foolish and inconsiderate speech (Mk 9, Lk 9), yet it breathed a spirit of tender affection. His idea was: 'Why return to the ungrateful multitude and the malignant rulars? Why go to Jerusalem and die? Stay here always in this holy fellowship.' (4) When Jesus washed the disciples' feet in the Upper Room, it was Peter who protested (Jn 13:8-9). He could not bear that the blessed Lord should perform that menial office on him. (5) At the arrest in Gethsemane, it was Peter who, seeing Jesus in the grasp of the soldiers, drew his sword and cut off the ear of Malchus (Jn 18: 11).

The blot on Peter's life-story is his repeated denial of Jesus in the courtyard of the high priest's palace (Jn 18: 17; cf. Mt 26: 69-75). It was a terrible disloyalty, yet not without extenuations. (1) The situation was a trying one. It was dangerous just then to be associated with Jesus, and Peter's humble and imperious nature was prone to panic. (2) It was his devotion to Jesus that exposed him to the temptation. He and John were the only two who rallied from the panic in Gethsemane (Mt 26: 56) and fully shared their master's fate (Jn 18: 10, 25-27). (3) If he sinned greatly, he sincerely repented (Mt 26: 75 = Mk 14: 70 = Lk 22: 58). A look of that dear face sufficed to break his heart (Lk 22: 58). (4) He was not then under the influence of his own requirements. On the day of the Resurrection, Jesus appeared to him (Lk 24: 13, 1 Co 15: 5). What happened during this interview is unrecorded, doubtless because it was too sacred to be divulged; but it would seem to have been a scene of confession and forgiveness. As Lord and God, he had all the while had His faithless disciple in His thoughts, knowing his distress of mind (cf. Mk 16: 7); and He had that solitary interview with him on purpose to reassure him.

At the subsequent appearance by the Lake of Galilee (Jn 21) Peter played a prominent part. On discovering that the stranger on the beach was Jesus, impatient to reach his Master, he sprang overboard and swam ashore (cf. his action in Mt 14: 22-23). And presently Jesus charged him to make good his protestation of love by diligent care of the flock for which He, the Good Shepherd, had died. 'Be it the office of love to feed the Lord's flock, if it was an evidence of fear to deny the Shepherd!' (Augustine). Jesus was not upbraiding Peter. On the contrary, He was publishing to the company His forgiveness of the erring Apostle and His confidence in him for the future.

Peter figures conspicuously in the history of the Apostolic Church. He was recognized as the leader. It was on his motion that a successor was appointed to James between the Ascension and Pentecost (Ac 1: 25). His impetuosity appearing in this precipitate action (see Matthews; and it was he who acted as spokesman on the day of Pentecost (28: 4). He wrought miracles in the name of the Lord (Mt 10: 8; Mk 6: 34-44); he became confused, denying the Lord, setting the rulers at naught (4: 10-11); as head of the Church, he exposed and punished sin (5: 21-24); he suffered imprisonment and scourging (21: 18-23).

The persecution consequent on the martyrdom of Stephen, by scattering the believers, inaugurated a fresh development of Christianity, involving a bitter controversy between those preached wherever they went, and thus arose the question, on what terms the Gentiles should be received into the Church. Must they become Jews and observe the rites of the Mosaic Law? In this controversy Peter acted wisely and generously. Being deputed with John to examine into it, he approved Philip's work among the haged Samaritans, and invoked the Holy Spirit upon his converts, and before returning to Jerusalem made a missionary tour among the villages of Samaria (Ac 8: 4). His Jewish prejudice was thoroughly conquered by his vision at Joppa and the conversion of Cornelius and his company at Caesarea; and, when taken to task by the Judaistic party at Jerusalem for associating with uncircumcised Gentiles, he vindicated his action and gained the approval of the Church (10: 11-15).

The controversy became acute when the Judaizers, taking alarm at the missionary activity of Paul and Barnabas, went to Antioch and insisted on the conversion of Gentiles being circumcised. The question was referred to a council of the Church at Jerusalem; and Peter spoke so well on behalf of Christian liberty that it was resolved, on the motion of James, the Lord's brethren, that the work of Paul and Barnabas should be approved, and that nothing should be required of the Gentiles beyond abstinence from things sacrificed to idols, blood, things strangled, and fornication (Ac 15: 28-29). By and by Peter visited Antioch, and, though adhering to the decision at the outset, he was presently intimidated by certain Judaizers, and, together with Barnabas, separated himself from the Gentiles as unclean, and would not eat with them, incurring an indignant and apparently effective rebuke from Paul (Gal 2: 12).

There are copious traditions about Peter. Suffice it to mention that he is said to have gone to Rome (which is quite possible) and laboured there for 25 years (utterly impossible), and to have been crucified (cf. Jn 21: 19). In the last year of Nero's reign (A.D. 68) he was a witness at Antioch of St. John's Second Gospel is based upon information derived from Peter. Mark had been Peter's companion, and heard his teaching and took notes of it. From these he composed his Gospel. He wrote it, Jerome says, at the request of the brethren at Rome when he was the apostle, and on hearing it Peter approved it and authorized its use by the Church.

Peter, First Epistle Of.—No Epistle of the NT has caught more of the spirit of Jesus than 1 Peter. Imbued with a strong love for the risen Christ, and a profound conviction of the truth of the gospel as established in the world by the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Messiah, the author delineates a rich Christian life on the basis of these evangelical facts.

1. Contents.—

(a) A sure inheritance, vv. 1-4. To God our Father is ascribed all praise, because by raising Jesus Christ from the dead He has begotten us into a living hope certain to be realized.

(b) A present joy, notwithstanding manifold trials, vv. 5-7. Sufferings refine faith as fire does gold, and even now the unseen Christ is an object of unspeakable joy, and gives a foretaste of full salvation.

(c) The fulfilment of the promises made to the prophets, and a wonder even to angels, vv. 18-19.

(ii.) Exhortation to realize this hope in a holy life as members of a Divine brotherhood, 11-25.

(a) The holy and absolutely just Father requires filial obedience, vv. 17-18.

(b) To redeem us from sin the eternal and spotless Messiah was slain, and by His resurrection has awakened us to true faith in God. It is the Holy God thus revealed that all your faith and hope rest, vv. 18-21.

(c) The family of God, begotten of the imperishable seed of the gospel, must obey the truth, with sincere mutual love and grow to maturity. As living stones built into a spiritual temple Christ, they form a spiritual temple and also a holy priesthood to offer spiritual sacrifices to God. They have become the new Israel, the people of God, 1 Peter, 2: 19-25.
PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF

II. The behaviour of the Christian in the world and in the brotherhood, 2:10-3:22.
1. It must be pure and honourable in the midst of the heathen, 2:11.
   (a) Though free servants of God, Christians must be loyal to the earthly government, and observe their duties to all men in their several stations, v.12.
   (b) Slaves must be obedient even to harsh masters, showing their possession of Divine grace and their discipleship to Jesus, by enduring suffering like Him whose unmerited death has brought us salvation, v.15.
   (c) Wives are to exercise a quiet and gentle spirit, like true mothers in Israel, submitting to their husbands, in the hope that if they are heathen they will be instructed into the faith by their Christian life. Likewise husbands must honour their wives as equally with themselves heirs of life, v.18.
2. The duty of a peaceful and kindly life to strengthen the unity within the brotherhood, v.19-21.
   (a) Suffering cannot really harm one who has Christ in his heart; nay, gentle steadfastness under pressure may be like our Master’s, his own victory over others to God, 3:17.
   (b) Suffering delivers us from our sinful life. Though your former heathen comrades revile you for abandoning your life of sensuality, you must do so with them and leave them to the just Judge of all, 3:2.
   (c) Your sufferings are not unique, but become a blessing if they are the result of fidelity to your Christian profession, the faith of our Christian life. They are a sign that judgment is near, which you may await in a life of well-doing, trusting your faithful Creator, v.20-21.
IV. Miscellaneous advice, 3:14.
   (a) Counsel to elders of the Church, and to the younger members, v.14.
   (b) Exhortation to resignation, watchfulness, and trust in the midst of the terrible sufferings that are being endured by the brotherhood everywhere, v.22.
   (c) Personal greetings, v.14.

2. Readers.—Of the provinces in which the readers lived, Asia Minor and Asia were evangelized by St. Paul; but nothing is known of the evangelization of the rest, nor does the letter assume that St. Peter had any share in it. At first sight it would appear that the readers were Jewish Christians, as some scholars hold that they were, but the body of the Epistle clearly shows that the prevailing element was Gentile, and the words of 1:1 are to be taken figuratively of the sojourn of the Christian as a resident alien on earth, absent from his heavenly fatherland (29:14-19). Doubtless, however, very many who had been Jews were found in all the Churches of the large cities. The former life of the reader, on the average low level of Asia Minor, had been given over to the vices of the flesh; perhaps, indeed, their past conduct was the source from which the criminal charges were brought against them afterwards as Christians (2:10 4:1). The Churches were suffering severely, though there does not seem to have been an official persecution. The present extremity, for it is assumed that most will remain until the Parousia (4:7). So severe was their suffering, that only the strong arm of God could protect them in their temptations (2:4 3:9). Christians are easily confounded with criminals (2:10-11 3:14-17 4:12-19), slaves suffer at the hands of their masters, wives from their husbands, but their experience was of the same character as that of the Christian brotherhood throughout the world (5:8). The Churches are islands in an ocean of heathenism.
3. Purpose.—This letter is an encouragement to readers who are in danger of lapsing, through suffering, into the unholy life of their neighbours. By recalling the fact of the resurrection of Christ, and by an appeal to the example of His remitted sufferings, the author seeks to awaken their faith and hope in this life. They are urged to sustain their moral life in the exercise of a calm and sober confidence in the grace of God, soon to be revealed more fully (15:4 25:4-10), and to commend their gospel to the heathen world by their lives of goodness, entrusting themselves in well-doing to a faithful Creator (4:18).
4. Teaching.—(a) Doctrine.—Faith in God as the holy Father and faithful Creator is built upon the solid facts of the gospel.—in particular, the life, death and resurrection of Christ the eternal Messiah (11-21). The life of Jesus Christ has made an ineffaceable impression upon the author. He was spotless, the perfect pattern for men, but also the Messiah, who as the Servant of the Lord has by His death redeemed a new people and ratified a new covenant (11:25 23:21). By His resurrection He has been exalted to God’s right hand, and will soon return to unveil His Father’s kingdom, and make the new covenant effective (1:1). The most probable interpretation of 3:17 is that Christ went, during the period between His death and resurrection, to the abode of the dead, and, having preached to them, to those who had been the wicked ante-diluvian world, has made it of universal efficacy (cf. Eph 4:8-9). In this life Christ becomes an object of inexpressible joy to believers on whom the Spirit has been poured forth (10-11). Peter does not regard the Spirit as the source of Christian virtues, but as the pledge of our future inheritance, as well as of present Divine grace manifested in the ability to endure suffering (4:7). This Spirit was also identified with the pre-existent Messiah, and was the means of His persistance through death (1:11 3:16 4:6). By the Spirit the brethren are also consecrated in a new covenant to Jehovah, thereby receiving the fulfillment of the promise of the Messianic age (11). The risen Christ has become the object of the believer’s utter love and devotion, and has begun to him the living hope of an eternal inheritance.
5. Literary affinities.—(a) The OT.—This Epistle is greatly indebted to the LXX, especially to the Psalms and to Isaiah, whose teaching as to the holiness of God and the redemptive efficacy of the sufferings of the Servant of the Lord is echoed in Ps 52:5; Is 52:5; 1 P 23: 2, Is 40:5; 1 P 23: 2, Is 23:4; Ps 118:19; 1 P 23:2; Is 53; 1 P 3:17, Ps 34:18-19). Proverbs also is used (1 P 21:25, Ps 24:10; 1 P 4:1, Ps 112; 1 P 5:8, Ps 34:18).
PETER, FIRST EPISODE OF

(c) The Gospels.—While the Epistle affords no proof of acquaintance with our Gospels, it contains many suggestions of the life and teachings of Jesus. Peter claims to have been a witness of the sufferings and the glory of Jesus (9), which may refer both to the Transfiguration and to the appearances of the risen Christ. Christ is set forth as the example for the sufferer, as though He had endured reviling and the agony of death. One had been left indelibly impressed on the author's memory; and, as in the Synoptics, Jesus Christ fulfills the prophecy of the Suffering Servant. The great command of Jesus to His disciples to renounce the world, and to set themselves up as a light in the world (Mt 5:14, 16) seem to speak in 20:18-19. The parable of the Sower may have supplied the figure of 12:45; the lesson of the tribute money may underlie 22:14-15; and Christ's utterance of doom on apostate Israel, especially the parable of Mt 12-14, parallels the teaching in this Epistle.

(d) Acts.—There are similarities with Peter's speeches in Acts, e.g., the witness of the prophets to the Messiah; Jesus Christ as the Suffering Servant whose death was foreknown by God, and was endured for crimes committed in the exaltation and near return to judge the living and the dead (Ac 2:20, 31 3:5, 25; 10:34-43). Cf. also 1 P 3:18 with Ac 3:21-22, and the Christ-like Epistles.—A comparison with this Epistle reveals striking resemblances between them (1 P 1:1, Ro 12:2; 1 P 1:25, Ro 14:12; 1 P 2:1-2, Ro 12:2; 1 P 2:24-25, 10, Ro 8:33-34; 1 P 2:25, Ro 15:1-12; 1 P 3:18, Ro 1:19-20, 4:11; 1 P 4:1, Ro 9:22). It is all but certain that one Epistle was known to the writer of the other; and Romans must have been the earlier. The more or less obvious relation of Ephesians with 1 Peter (1 P 1:15, Eph 1:4-5, 1 P 2:1, Eph 4:25, 1 P 2:2, Eph 4:25, 1 P 3:18, Eph 4:25; 1 P 3:18, Eph 4:25, 1 P 3:21, Eph 4:25, 1 P 3:25). The justifiication of the "author of both letters breathed the same atmosphere" (v. Soden).

(d) Holy Writ.—Many other verbal parallels are found between these Epistles, and their leading religious conceptions are both the same view of faith, of Jesus Christ as an example, and as the One who introduced the believer to the new life as if sacrifice ratifying the new covenant and taking away sin. Similar stress is laid on hope and obedience; the fortunes of old Israel are employed in both to illustrate the demand for faith on the part of new Israel, and a similar use is made of the sufferings of the readers. Cf. 1 P 1:11, He 11:12; 1 P 2:1, He 2:25, 1 P 2:19, Ro 12:1; 1 P 4:19, He 11:13, 11:25; 1 P 4:10, He 12:1; 1 P 4:13, He 13:1. Though direct literary relationship between the two Epistles cannot be affirmed, the author may have been close friends, and the readers were perhaps similarly situated.

6. James.—A comparison of 1 P 1, Ja 1:1; 1 P 1:1, Ja 1:12; 1 P 2:1-2, Ja 1:11-12; 1 P 3:5, Ja 4:5, 1 P 4:13, Ja 5:13—proves close relationship, but the priority can be determined only on the basis of the date of James.

7. Authorship.—According to the present greetings, this Epistle was written by the Apostle Peter, and this is supported by very strong tradition. Polycarp was the earliest writer who indubitably quotes the Epistle, though it was probably familiar to Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Papias, and perhaps Ignatius. Basilius seems to have known it, and it was rejected by Marcion on doctrinal grounds. It is first quoted as Peter's by Irenaeus and Tertullian, and is frequently used by Clement of Alexandria. Its omission from the Muratori Fragment is not significant; it is contained in the oldest versions, and Eusebius, in full agreement with what we know of early Christian literature, places it among the books which the Church accepted without hesitation. In the Apostolic Fathers, e.g., it is extensively attested as Galatians or Ephesians. Harman suggests that the opening and closing verses were later additions, and that Polycarp did not regard the letter as Peter's; but this hypothesis is not without difficulty, and both paragraphs are fitted compactly into the Epistle. The chief objections to the Petrine authorship are—(1) the Epistle is said to be so saturated with Pauline ideas that it could not have been written by the Apostle Peter; (2) the readers are Gentile Christians living within territory evangelized by Paul, in which Peter would have been trespassing on the Gentiles (Gal 2:9); (3) there is a lack of personal reminiscences of the life of Jesus that would be strange in Peter; (4) the use of good Greek and of the LXX would be remarkable in a Galilean fisherman; (5) the persecution referred to in ch. 4 is said to be historically impossible until after the death of Peter.

In answer to (3) reference may be made to 5 (c). If Paul's mention of Peter is to be interpreted, he has told us what the "great and strong" disciple Peter was; his ministry was confined to the Jewish community.
PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF

to understand how he supplanted St. Paul so soon in the capital as the chief Apostle. Evidently the tradition of the first two years’ epistles is a tissue of unauthenticated information, but St. Peter probably came to Rome after St. Paul, and died perhaps in the Neronian persecution of 64, or possibly later. It is in the highest degree probable that St. Peter wrote this Epistle from Rome before A.D. 64.

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF.—This Epistle cannot rank with 1 Peter as a Christian classic; indeed, very many would agree with Jülicher that ‘2 Peter is not only the latest document of the NT, but also the least deserving of a place in the canon.’ Nevertheless, it strikes a pure Christian note in his passion for righteousness.

1. Contents.—

(i.) Greeting and exhortation, 1-11. The Epistle opens with a salutation from Simon Peter to readers who, through the righteousness of God, have been admitted to the full privileges of the Apostolic faith. His prayer for increased blessing upon them, through the knowledge of God and Jesus our Lord, is based on the fact that by the revelation of His glorious excellences His Divine power has made a godly life possible for us, and has given rich promises of our ultimately being conformed to His image and glory; and entrance into His eternal Kingdom depends upon forgiveness of sins, and the zealous effort of the believer to walk worthy of the vocation to which God has called us (vv. 1-11).

(ii.) The sure witness to the gospel, vv. 12-31. The Apostle will hold himself in readiness to remind his readers of the true faith he once professed. He will be ready to leave them a trustworthy memorial of his teaching; for, unlike the false teachers, Peter was an eye-witness and companion of his Master and the return of the Lord, having seen the Transfiguration on the Mount. He also heard the Divine voice that confirmed prophecy, to which they must pay heed, since it was given by the Spirit; but prophecy having such an origin can be interpreted only by the voice of God, not by private opinion.

(iii.) The false teachers, ch. 2. An invasion of false teachers is foretold. These men will subvert the gospel of redemption from sin, and cause apostasy in the Church. But their doom, at the hand of a righteous God, is no less certain than that of those angels who sinned, or the antediluvian world, or Sodom and Gomorrah; though now also, as then, the few righteous will escape (vv. 12-21). Sensual, irreverent, brutish, and ignorant of spiritual things, they destroy even the sacred Christian feasts by their revelry, and, like Balaam, seek, for their selfish purposes, to lead their victims into fornication, deluding recently converted believers with a false doctrine of freedom. Had these apostates never known the truth, it would have been better for them (vv. 22-25).

(iv.) Warning against apostasy (vv. 25-29). The Apostle returns to the return of the Lord, ch. 3. He reminds his readers that it was foretold as a sign of the end that mockers would deny that the Lord will return, but that both the prophets and Christ the Lord proclaimed a day of judgment. The memory of the Flood should be a warning to the scoffers (vv. 1-7). God’s delay is intended to give opportunity of repentance, and His purposes, though slow, will surely be brought to pass without warning; but the Day may be hastened by holy living and godliness. This is the teaching also of Paul, whose gospel of grace seems are seeking to distort into licence. Safety lies in watchfulness and in growth in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ (vv. 8-15).

2. Situation of the readers.—Were it not that 2 Peter 3:1 seems to refer to 1 Peter, no definite information would be found in this letter as to the locality of the readers. It appears to be an Epistle designed to counteract a particular perversion affecting its readers in the Church. It may be inferred that the readers were Gentiles (11), and were being misled by distortions of the Pauline doctrine of grace (3:4, 8), though the Churches were undisturbed by any echoes of the Jewish-Christian controversy. Indifference to Christian morality, inducing a dulled spiritual sense, has made them liable to apostasy under the influence of false teachers who are about to invade the Church. Some are already taken in (2:18-22).

Some seem to have taken advantage of the privilege of prophecy to spread their libertinism, and to have turned the sacred love-feasts into beastly carousals, holding out, especially to recent converts, the distorted promise of Christian freedom. They satisfied their own licentiousness, and scoffed at moral responsibility, teaching. It would appear, that there is no resurrection of the body or judgment to come, by playing upon the deferred Christian hope of the Return of the Lord. Apparently they are of type 5. False teaching is to be compared with the worse sinners of the OT (2:5, 12, 15). There is no evidence of any speculative system like those of the 2nd cent. Gnosticism, but there are features in common with the practices of the Nicolaitans of the Churches of Pergamum and Thyatis (Rev 2:15, 16), though no mention is made of idolatry. A greater affinity may be traced with the Sadducean spirit and patriarchal portions of the Jewish sources, and the false sектism as to spiritual realities went hand in hand with practical immorality. The cities of Syria or Samaria would be a not improbable situation for the readers of 2 Peter.

3. Purpose of the Epistle.—It is a mistake to confine the purpose of 2 Peter to the refutation of one error, as, e.g., the denial of the Parousia. It is a loud appeal for godly living, in the light of the assurance of the gospel, Scripture, and the Christian conscience. God’s promises of mercy and threatenings of judgment are Yea and Amen. The writer aims to impress on his readers: (1) that saving knowledge of Jesus Christ is granted only to the virtuous heart; (2) that Jesus Christ is a present power for a godly life, and is certain to return for judgment; (3) the hideous character of the false teachers and the self-evident doom of themselves and their victims; (4) that delay in the Return of the Lord must be used for repentance, for that Day will surely come.

4. Literary affinities.—(a) The OT.—Though the direct quotations are few (Ps 90:10 in 3:8, and probably Ps 26:6 in 2:18, with reminiscences of Is 54:2 in 3:7, and Is 66:15 66:22 in 3:18), the real indepthedness of 2 Pet. to the OT is very great in the historical examples of ch. 2, and in the view of Creation, the Flood, and the Day of Judgment (3:6-7). The influence of Isaiah is manifest (cf. Is 13:12 34:5 66:10 with 2 P 3:18); and the use of Proverbs may perhaps be seen in 2 P 3:7 (Fr 10:10 21:21), and in 2 P 3:16 (Pr 13:13 12:17, 21).

(b) Book of Enoch.—It cannot be doubted that Enoch 9:10-14 18:1-21 has influenced 2 P 2-3.

(c) The Gospels.—The most obvious references are in 2 P 1:18-19, which agrees fundamentally, though not precisely, with the Synoptic narratives of the Transfiguration, and in 11, which seems to point to the incident in Jn 21:14, 15. The Synoptic exarchatology also, Mk 13:31 32:30 32:31 and 2 P 3:12-15, Mt 19:28 25:34, Lk 21:20-28 and 2 P 3:12, Mt 11:31 32 and the parable of the Sower (Lk 8:15) throw much light on 2 P 3:4, and Mt 12:26 28-29, on 2 P 3:17.

(d) The Pauline Epistles.—Of these there are very few traces, though 2 P 3:5 may be compared with 2 Co 5:7 2 Th 4:2; 2 P 3:10 with 1 Th 3:11 5:21, and 2 P 3:16 with Ro 9:14. There are verbal similarities with the Pastoral Epistles, but probably they do not involve anything more than a wide-spread similar atmosphere. According to 3:4-8, the author seems to know all St. Paul’s correspondence, but he shows astonishingly little evidence of his direct influence.

(e) Jude.—One of these Epistles must have been used by the author of the other, but there is great diversity of opinion as to the priority, the prevailing view at present being apparently in favour of the priority of Jude, though Zahn and Bigg are strong advocates of 2 Peter. The question is really indeterminable, and, apart from the external testimony of the one to the other, has little bearing on the authorship at work among the apostles.

(f) 1 Peter.—(1.) Differences. These are many and serious. 1 Peter is written in fluent Hellenistic Greek.
The testimony of later Christian literature.—Until the 3rd cent. the traces of 2 Peter are very few. It was only once, in the 3rd cent., that 2 Peter was regarded as the work of Peter (c. 150 A.D.), though this is questioned without sufficient reason by some scholars. The first certain quotation is found in Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia (c. 230); probably it is used by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and Origen knew it, but doubted its genuineness. While Eusebius himself did not accept the Epistle, he placed it in its general opinion, among the "disputed" books. It is not referred to by the scholars of Antioch, nor is it in the Peshitta, the common version of the Syrian Church. The oldest Latin versions also seem not to have contained it; possibly it was absent from the original of Codex B, but it is found in the Egyptian versions. Jerome, and afterwards Erasmus and Calvin, harboured doubts about its genuineness.

Authorship.—It will have been evident that there is much in this Epistle to justify the doubt as to its genuineness, which has been entertained by many of the greatest Christian teachers from the early centuries; and recent scholarship has not yet relieved the difficulties in the way of accepting the Petrine authorship. They are (1) the remarkable divergence from the First Epistle, which seems to be too radical to be explained by the employment of different amanuenses; (2) the inferior style of the Epistle, its lack of restraint and its discontinuity, notably in vv. 14-18; (3) the absence of an early Christian atmosphere, together with a tone of disappointment because the promise of Christ to return has been long deferred (3:19); (4) the appeal to the three authorities of the primitive Christian Church—the Prophets, the Lord, and the Apostles (11:31-33); (5) the reference to St. Paul's letters as 'Scripture'; (6) the extremely meagre external evidence.

Of these difficulties the gravest are (1) and (6). It is almost impossible to hold that the author of 1 Peter could have described his letter in the words of 2 Peter, and have regarded 2 Peter as a sequel to the same reader. It has, however, been suggested that 2 Peter was written earlier than 1 Peter, and that the Epistles were composed by different amanuenses for different readers. But this hypothesis has not met with much favour. The insufficient witness is also serious, and though singly the other difficulties may be removed, their cumulative effect is to cast a heavily burdened. But if the evidence is against direct Petrine authorship, is the book to be summarily banished into the middle of the 2nd cent. as entirely apocryphal? Perhaps not. (1) There are no features of the Epistle which necessarily extrude it from the 1st century. Doubus as to the Parousia and similar false teaching were not unknown in the Apostolic age, and some of the most distinctive features of the 2nd cent. and the developed Gnosticism and Chiliasm, are conspicuous by their absence. Also the reference to St. Paul's letters as 'Scripture' is not decisive, for in view of the insistence upon 'written prophecy' and its origin (11:31) it is doubtful whether St. Paul is ranked with the OT prophets. But in any case, by the time of 1 Clement there was a collection of St. Paul's letters which would be read in churches with some Scriptural authority. Finally, there is much to be said for the view that not the OT Scriptures, but other Christian writings, are referred to in 3:15. (2) 2 Peter contains a large distinctively Petrine element. It has already been shown that passages like 1:1 and 2 Peter belong to the 1st cent. They present a non-Pauline conception of Christianity, shared by them in common with the Gospel of Mark and the speeches of Peter in Acts. In Mk. and in 2 Peter Jesus Christ is the second Son of God, whose death cleansed sinners, and whose return to judgment is described in generally similar outlines. In the Epistle it is laid on repentance, as in the opening of Mk. and in Acts (2 P 3:9-15), and there is a striking similarity of the Epistle between Ac 3:19-21 and 2 P 3:13-17. Likewise the Christian life is regarded as the fulfilment of the new law, and the parables of Mk. of the planting and growth of the seed, supply suggestive parallels for both 1 and 2 Peter. Both Epistles, like the speeches in Acts, are Hebrew in spirit, and are influenced by prophetic motives.

Perhaps the solution that will best suit the facts is to assume that a disciple of Peter, who remembered how his master had dealt with an attack of Sadducean sensuality in some of the Palestinian Churches, being confronted with a recrudescence of similar evil, revised his teaching. This will do justice to the moral earnestness and the true Christian note of the Epistle.

PETHAHIAH.—1. The head of the nineteenth priestly course (1 Ch 24:19). 2. A Levite (Ezr 10:34, Neh 9:); in 1 Es 9:2 Pethus. 3. A Judahite officer (Neh 11:).

PETHOR.—Mentioned in Nu 22:21 and Deut 23:19 as one of the cities of Bashan, in N. Mesopotamia, when he was called by Balak to curse Israel. With this indication agrees the repeated statement by king Shalmaneser III of Assyria regarding a certain city which he calls Pitu, that it lay on the river Sogor (modern Sajur), near its junction with the Euphrates. Thus Pethor would seem to have lain a little south of Carchemish, on the west of the Euphrates.

PHACARETH (1 Es 5:4) = Pochereth-hazzebaim, Ezr 2:11.

PHAISSUR (1 Es 9:9) = Ezr 10:9 Pashhur, 1 Es 5:4 Phassurus.

PHALDEUS (1 Es 9:9) = Pedaiah, Neh 8:31.

PHALEAS (1 Es 5:1) = Padon, Ezr 2:4.
PHALIAS

PHALIAS (1 Es 9:4)—Phalaih, Neh 8:1.

PHALTIEL (cf. 2 S 21:24).—The ‘captain of the people’ (2 Es 5:3).

PHANUEL.—The mother of Anna (Lk 2:36).

PHARAKIM.—A family of Nethinim (1 Es 5:7).

PHARAOH.—The later Egyptian royal title, Per-o, ‘Great House,’ adopted into Hebrew. Originally designating the royal establishment in Egypt, it gradually became an appellative title of the king, and from the 22nd Dyn. (c. a.C. 950) onwards was regularly attached to the king’s name in popular speech. The Hebrew Pharaoh-necho and Pharaoh-hophra are thus precise renderings of Egyptian. Shishak also was entitled Per-o Sheshonk in Egyptian, but apparently Hebrew had not yet adopted the novel fashion, and so gave his name without Pharaoh (1 K 11:16-18). Tirhakah is not entitled Pharaoh as in Egyptian documents, but is more accurately described as king of Cush (2 K 19:20).

The following Pharaohs are referred to without their names being specified: 1. Pharaoh of Abram (Gen 12:9-20), impossible to identify. The title Pharaoh and the mention of canals appear to be anachronisms in the story. 2. Pharaoh of Joseph (Gen 39 etc.). The proper names in the story, viz. Potiphar, Potiphera, Asenath, Zaphenath-paneah are at once recognizable (when the vowels are restored as typical names (2 Enoch, Esmeil, Zepetofenokh) of the late period beginning with the 22nd Dyn. (c. a.C. 950), and ending in the reign of Darius (c. a.C. 500). It has been conjectured that the Pharaoh of Joseph was one of the Hyksos kings, but it is not advisable to press for historical identifications in this beautiful legend. 3. and 4. The Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus. The name of Ramesses, given to a store-city built by the Hebrews (Ex 11), points to one of the kings named Ramesses in the 19th-20th Dyn. as the Pharaoh of the Oppression. The chief of these was Ramesses n. (c. a.C. 1350), after whom several towns were named. He was perhaps the greatest builder in Egyptian history. His son Mineptah might be the Pharaoh of the Exodus: but from the fifth year of Mineptah there is an Egyptian record of the destruction of ‘Israel,’ which, if it would seem already in Palestine. At present it is impossible to ascertain the proportion of historical truth contained in the legends of the Exodus.

5. 1 Ch 4:14, ‘Bithiah, daughter of Pharaoh’: no clue to identity. Bithiah is Hebr. and not like an Egypt. name. 6. 3 K 3:6, ‘is his Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon’, must be one of the feeble kings of the end of the 21st Dynasty. 7. 1 K 11:14, the Pharaoh who befriended Hadad the Edomite in the last days of Solomon, and gave him the sister of his queen Tahpenes: not identified. (At this point in the narrative Shishak comes in: he is never called Pharaoh, see above.) 8. Pharaoh, king of Egypt in 2 K 18:19, 13: 6-9 etc., perhaps as a general term for the Egyptian king, not pointing to any individual. In the time of Sennacherib and Hezekiah, Tirhakah or some earlier king of the Ethiopian Dynasty would be on the throne. 9. Jer 57. Eze 29, see HOPHRA. F. L. Guthrie.

PHARihat.—Named, with Timnath and Tephon, amongst the cities which Baachides ‘strengthened with high walls, with gates and with bars’ (1 Mac 6:40). Some authorities read with LXX ‘Timnath-pharaon,’ as indicating one place. Conder suggests that Conder’s mention of a fort about 13 miles W. of Nablus. ‘This seems to be too far to the north, as the towns mentioned are all ‘in Judaea.’ It may possibly be Fer’ata, 6 miles S.W. of Nablus, although the same difficulty exists in a modified degree. Cf. PITHON.

PHARES.—See PEREZ.

PHARISAEES.—See PERSEZ.

PHARISAENS.—A study of the four centuries before Christ supplies a striking illustration of the law that the deepest movements of history advance without the men, who in God’s plan are their instruments, being clearly aware of what is going on. The answer to the question—How came the Pharisees into the place of power and prestige they held in the time of our Lord?—suggests a clear understanding of the task of Israel after the Exile. It was to found and develop a new type of community. The Hebrew monarchy had been thrown into perpetual bankruptcy. But monarchy was the only form that the political principle could assume in the East. What could be put in its place? In solving this problem the Jews created a community which, while it was half-State, was also half-Church. The working capital of the Jews was the monotheism of the prophets, the self-existence of their God, the character of holy and creative Unity, and, inseparable from this, the belief in the perfectibility and indestructibility of the Chosen Nation (the Messiahian idea). Prophecy ceased. Into the place of the prophet came the school-master and the drill-master. They popularized monotheism, making it a national instinct. Necessarily, the popularization of monotheism drew along with it a growing sense of superiority to the heathen and to all alien nations among whom their lot was cast. And by the same necessity the Jews were taught to separate themselves from their heathen neighbours (Ezr 10:2). They must not intermarry, lest the nation be dragged down to the heathen level. In the state of things in the 3rd cent. B.C. (see Essenes), when Hellenism began to threaten Judaism with annihilation, the deepest forces of Judaism sounded the note. The more zealous Jews drew to themselves the ‘Holy Men’ (Chaaadtim), Puritans, or those self-dedicated to the realization of Ezra’s ideal. Then came the great war. The tendencies of Judaism precipitated themselves the ‘Pharisees,’ or men who separated themselves from the heathen, and no less from the heathenizing tendencies and forces in their own nation. They absorbed into the religious life of the nation the heathen with the heathen as an abominable thing (Gal 5:7). As years went on it became more and more clear that the heart of the nation was with them. And so it comes to pass that in our Lord’s time, to use His words, ‘the scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses’s seat’ (Mt 23:23). They, not the priests, are the sources of authority.

The history of Pharisaism enables us to understand its spirit and ruling ideas, to do justice to its greatness, while emphasizing its limitations and defects. Into it went the deepest elements among the forces which built the Jewish church and nation. The Pharisees are seen at their best when contrasted with the Zealots (see CANANEEAN) on the one side and the Herodians (wh. see) on the other. Unlike the latter, they were deeply in earnest with their ancestral religion. Again and again at critical times they showed the vigour and temper of fearless Puritanism. Unlike the former, they held back from the appeal to force, believing that the God of the nation was in control of history, that in His own good time He would grant the nation its desire; that, meanwhile, the duty of a true Israelite was whole-hearted devotion to the Torah, joined to patient waiting on the Divine will. This nobler side of Pharisaism could find itself in Ps 119. The Pharisees were in a sense Churchmen rather than statesmen. They emphasized spiritual methods, and they emphasized spiritual methods, and they emphasized spiritual methods. They lay in the synagogue, in the schooling of children. In missionary extension amongst the heathen, they desired the power and prestige which we find them lacking in our Lord’s time. The Master Himself seems to say this when He distinguishes between their rightful authority and the spirit which they often showed in their actions (Mt 23:5-7). Hence we are not surprised when we learn that, after the confusion which followed the deaths of Nicodemus (66-135), Pharisaism became practically synonymous with Judaism. One great war (the Maccabean) had defined Pharisaism. Another war, even more terrible, gave it the final victory. The two wars together created the Judaism known to Europeans and Americans. And this, allowing for the inevitable changes which a long and varied experience brings to pass in the most turbulent region in Judaism, the Pharisaism of the 2nd century is found.

A wide historical study discovers moral dignity and greatness in Pharisaism. The Pharisees, as contrasted with the Sadducees (wh. see), represented the democratic tendencies of the pious, they stood both for the democratic and for the spiritualizing tendency. The priesthood was a close corporation. No man who was unable to trace his descent from a priestly family could exercise the office of a priest. But the Pharisees and the Scribes opened a great career to all the talents. Furthermore, the priesthood exhausted itself in the ritual of the Temple. But the Pharisees found their main function in teaching and preaching. So Pharisaism cleared the ground for Christianity. And when the reader goes through his NT with this point in mind, and when he notes the striking freedom of the NT from ritualistic features, he should give credit to Pharisaism as one of the historical forces which made these supreme qualities possible.

We have not yet exhausted the claims of the Pharisees on our interest and gratitude. It was they who, as the most part, prepared the ground for Christianity by taking the Messianic idea and working it into the very texture of common consciousness. Pharisaism was inseparable from the popularization of monotheism, and the universal acceptance by the nation of its Divine election and calling. We need only consider our Lord’s task to see how much preparatory work the Pharisees did. Contrast the Saviour with Gautama (Buddha), and the greatness of His work is clearly seen. Buddha teaches men the way of peace by thinking away the political and social order of things. But our Lord took the glorified nationalism of His nation as the basis of His teachings. He worked to raise it, and upon it grafted the Kingdom of God. Now, it was the Pharisees who made idealized nationalism, based upon the monotheism of the prophets, the pith and marrow of Judaism. It was they who wrote the great Apocalypses (Daniel and Enoch). It was they who made the belief in immortality and resurrection part of the common consciousness. It was they who trained the national will and purpose up to the level where the Saviour could use it.

But along with this great work went some lamentable defects and limitations. Though they stood for the spiritualizing tendencies which looked towards the ethics of the Church idea. They made an inextricable confusion between the question of the soul and the question of descent from Abraham. They developed the spirit of proud and arrogant orthodoxy, until the monotheism of the prophets became in their hands wholly incompetent to found a society where Jew and Gentile should be one (Gal 3:29, Col 3:21). They developed Sabbatharianism until reverence for the Sabbath became a superstition, as our Lord’s repeated clash with them goes to show. And in spite of many noble individual exceptions, the deepest tendency of Pharisaism was towards an over-valuation of external things, Levitical correctness and precision (Mt 23:9), that made their spirit strongly antagonistic to the genius of Prophecyism. For Prophecyism, whether of the Old or of the New Dispensation, threw the whole emphasis on character. And so, when John the Baptist, the first prophet for many centuries, came on the field, he put himself in mortal opposition to the Pharisees, no less than to the Sadducees (Mt 3:4, Jn 1:23). And our Lord, embodying the moral essence of Prophecyism, found His most dangerous opponents, until the end of His life, not in the Sadducees or the Essenes of the Zealots, but in the Pharisees.

PHARPAH.—A river of Damascus mentioned with the Abanah (2 K 5:19) by Naaman as contrasting favourably with the Jordan. Its identification is by no means so certain as that of Abanah with the Barada. The most probable is that suggested by Thomson, namely, the Wady Bârân, a river rising on the horizon to the east of Damascus, but not tributary to, one of its sources is called the Wady Bârân, which may possibly be a reminiscence of the ancient name. The principal obstacle to this identification is the distance of the river from the city of Damascus, but Naaman was perhaps thinking of the fertile plain of Damascus as of the city itself. Other identifications have been made with the river flowing from the Asa Pîjeh, or else one or other of the canals fed by the Barada.

PHASELIS is mentioned 1 Mac 15:25 as a city to which the Romans in b.c. 139 sent letters on behalf of the Jews. It was at the E. extremity of the coast of Lycaon, a Doric colony which apparently always maintained its independence of the rest of Lycaon. Its early importance was due to its position in the trade between the Egyptians and the Levant. Its alliance with Cilician pirates caused it to be captured by Servilius Isauricus in b.c. 77, and it seems never to have recovered its former importance. It was a bishopric in the Byzantine period.

PHASSURUS (1 Es 5:2) = Pashhur, Ezr 10:4.

PHICOL.—Abimelech’s captain (Gn 21:17; 26:16).

PHILADELPHIA was a city of Lycaon, 28 miles from Sardis, in the valley of the Cogamus, a tributary of the Hermus, and conveniently situated for receiving the trade between the great central plateau of Asia Minor and Smyrna. The district known as Katakekaumene (Burnt Region), because of its volcanic character, rises immediately to the N.E. of Philadelphia, and this was a great vine-producing region.

Philadelphia was founded and named by Attalus Philadelphia of Pergamus before b.c. 138. It was liable to serious earthquakes, but remained an important centre of the Roman province of Asia Minor. By the name of Neo-Caesarea from Tiberius, and, later on, the name of the Neocorate (i.e. the wardenship of the temple for Emperor-worship). There is no record of the beginning of the Church at Philadelphia, but in the Apocalypse is one of the seven churches to which, as it appears, special messages are sent. In its message (Rev 3:7-12) it is said to have a ‘little strength’ (which perhaps refers to its recent origin), and to have set before it ‘an open door’, which seems to refer to the opportunities it had of spreading the gospel in the centre of Asia Minor. In 3:8 the synagogues of Satan which say they are Jews and are not mean that the Jews of Philadelphia had been lax, and had conceded too much to Gentile ways. But the message contains no reproach against the Christians, although they are bidden to hold fast that which they have, and the promise to him that overcometh is that ‘I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, . . . and mine own new name.’ Doubtless there is a reference here, as in the message to Pergamus, to the new name taken at baptism, and apparently sometimes kept secret.

Philadelphia was the residence of a bishop, but was not a metropolis until about a.p. 1300, when its importance had become less. In the 14th cent., when the Greek Empire retained nothing on the mainland of Asia except a strip of territory opposite Constantinople, Philadelphia still resisted the Ottoman arms, though far from the sea and almost forgotten by the Emperors. In the words of Gibbon (ch. iv.): ‘Among the Greek colonists who cherished the name of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins: a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same.' The date of its final capture is uncertain—probably a.d. 139. Its modern name is Ali-Shah, and a considerable portion of the population is Christian. A. E. HILLARD.

PHILEMON.—Known only as the person addressed by St. Paul on behalf of the runaway slave Onesimus (Col. 4:9). The closeness of the personal tie between him and the Apostle is expressed in the terms 'beloved and fellow-worker,' and appears in the familiar confidence with which St. Paul presses his appeal. From Col. 4:9 it seems that Onesimus, and therefore Philemon, resided in Colossae; Archippus, too, who is joined with Philemon in the salutation, is a Colossian (Col. 4:17), and there is no reason to doubt the natural supposition that St. Paul's greeting is to husband, wife (Apphia), and son, with the church in Philemon's house. That he was of good position is suggested not only by his possession of slaves, but also by his ministry to the saints and by Paul's hope to lodge with him (Phil. 2:27). He apparently owed his conversion to St. Paul (v. 9), possibly during the long ministry in Ephesus (Ac 19:19), for the Apostle had not himself visited Colossae (Col. 2:1).

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.—1. Occasion and contents. —This beautiful private letter, unique in its nature, imports to be from St. Paul (with whose name that of Timothy is joined, as in 1 and 2 Thess., 2 Cor., Philippi., Col.) to Philemon with Apphia and Archippus, and the church in his house. This phrase occurs several times, under the impression, no doubt, that it is a natural and literal address (compare, for example, Col. 4:16; Eph. 6:3). The letter is to Philemon alone ('thee'). St. Paul is a 'prisoner' (v. 1), a first-link of connexion between this letter and Philippians (1:1-11, etc.), Eph. (3:3-6), Col. (1:1-23), Rom. (1:7-11); Col., there is also close connexion in the fact that Onesimus was a Colossian (Col. 4:10), and in the salutations in both Epistles Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke. It is almost certain that the letter was sent from Rome (not Cesarea) to Colossae, along with the Colossian Epistle, to Philemon, and to Onesimus, to be handed to Philemon by the runaway slave, who at St. Paul's instance was returning to the master he had wronged by embezzlement and flight. Onesimus had in some way become known to the Apostle, who had won him to the Christian faith (v. 10). St. Paul regards him as his 'child,' his 'very heart,' a 'brother beloved' (vv. 1-4, 11), and would fain keep his helpful minister (vv. 13, 15). But the convert must first put himself right by voluntary surrender: his service belongs to Philemon, and, however desired by St. Paul, can be granted by him only as his friend's free servant (v. 14). So St. Paul sends the slave back, with this letter to secure his forgiveness and the welcome of one Christian brother for another (v. 15-18). He founds his appeal on what he has heard of Philemon's love toward all the saints (v. 17-18); yet it makes also a personal request from 'Paul the aged and now a prisoner,' who has claims upon Philemon's service (vv. 14, 17-18), with just a hint of an authority which he will not press (vv. 4, 18, 21), 'obedience.' A wistful humour appears in the play on the meaning of the name Onesimus; 'I beseech thee for Profitable, who was aforetime unprofitable, but now is profitable ... Yea, let me have profit of thee' (vv. 10, 19). Also when v. 18 says Paul himself takes the pen and with playful solemnity (cf., for the solemn formula 'I Paul,' 1 Co 16:23, 2 Co 10:16, Col. 4:18, 2 Th. 3:7) gives his bond for the debt, 'I Paul write it with my own hand,' if (as is possible, though it is probable that the Greek tense should be rendered 'I have written,' and that the previous verse also, if not the whole letter, is by St. Paul's hand). Indeed, the mingled earnestness, tact, and charm amply endorse Romans' verdict—'a masterpiece': this letter exemplifies the Apostle's own precept as to speech seasoned with salt (Col. 4:6), and shows the perfect Christian gentleman.

2. Teaching. —It is significant for the depth and sincerity of St. Paul's religious faith that this private letter in its salutation, thanksgiving, and benediction is as lofty devout as any Epistle to the Churches. Apart from this, the dogmatic interest lies in its illustration of Christianity at work. The relation of master and slave comes into conflict with that of the Christian communion or fellowship: the problem is whether that fellowship will prove 'effective': or whether the good thing which is in you unto Christ,' and the slave be received as a brother. St. Paul does not ask that Onesimus be set free. It may even be doubted whether 'the word emancipation seems to be trembling on his lips' (Lightfoot, St. Paul, p. 241); if it is, it is rather that Onesimus may be permitted to return to continue his ministry to the imprisoned Apostle than that Christianity, as he conceives it, forbids slavery. That institution is inexplicable in St. Paul's judgment as it ended. unless it is to be regulated by the Christian principle of equality and responsibility before God (Eph. 6:1-9, Col. 3:18-4:1); to the slave himself his worldly position should be matter of indifference (1 Co 7:20-24). Yet if Philemon should choose to assert his rights, it will mean a fatal breach in Christian 'fellowship' and the rejection of a Christian 'brother.' Thus St. Paul's appeal is carried down the principle of the new kingdom, which inevitably worked itself out—though not till the 19th century—into the impossibility of slavery within a Christian nation. Christians long and strenuously defended it; Christianity, and not legalism, was the issue.

3. Authenticity. —The external testimony is full and consistent, although so short and personal a letter might easily lack recognition. It is contained in the Syriac and Old Latin Versions, and named in the Muratorian Fragment. Marcellus accepted it (Torr. adv. Marc. v. 21). Origen quotes it from three times, in each case as St. Paul's. Eusebius includes it among the undisputed books. On internal grounds it may fairly claim that the letter is genuine, because the addressee is a Christian brother, and not a fellow-worker (cf. ch. 1. 6:11). The writer here speaks as the apostle does; his language is similar, but now, few pages have so clear an accent of truth. Paul alone, it would seem, could have written this little masterpiece' (St. Paul, p. 11). But it must suffice here to assert as the all but universal judgment, that Philemon belongs to the least doubtful part of the Apostle's work' (Jülicher, Introd. to NT, p. 127).

4. Date and place of writing. —The argument for Rome as the place of composition is not convincing. The entire epistle is generally divided as to the order of the Epistles of the Captivity, i.e., whether Philippians or the group Eph.-Philem. is the earlier (see Lightfoot, Philippi, pp. 116-117). In either case the limit of date for Philemon lies between c. a.p. 60-62, and the later date is suggested by v. 21 (see Colossians and Philemians).

PHILETUS.—Mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to Timothy (2 Ti 2:19) as an example of one of those who were doing harm by their false teaching on the subject of the resurrection of the body. For them the resurrection was past. It was a spiritual resurrection from sin to holiness, and there was no future resurrection of the body, no life to come. St. Paul says their teaching will eat away the true doctrine as a canker or gangrene eats away the flesh. Cf. 1 Tim. 4:13.

PHILIP (Apost.).—1. Father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac 1:6). 2. A priest or foster-brother (2 Mac 9:9) of Antiochus Epiphanes, who received the charge (previously given to Lysias) of bringing up young Antiochus Eupator (1 Mac 6:1). On the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Lysias took upon himself to proclaim young Eupator king (1 Macc. 1:64). The jealousy over this matter led to open hostilities between Lysias and Philip. Philip was overcome by Lycas at Antioch and put to death. He is by many regarded as identical with — A Phrygian who (in b.c. 165), when left in charge of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes, was remarkable for the cruelty of his government (2 Mac 5:6, 6:4). Little more is known of the mysterious career of his life; he is first heard of as identified with the former Philip. 4. A king of Macedonia (b.c. 220-179) overthrown by the Romans (1 Mac 6:7).

PHILIP (NT).—1. The Apostle (Mt 10:2—Mr 3:16—Lk 6:13—Jn 1:43).—One of the twelve disciples whom Jesus chose at Bethsaida beyond Jordan in the morning of His ministry (Jn 1:40). He was a fellow-townsmen of Andrew and Peter (v.46), and seems to have had a special friendship with the former (Ja 1:15, 16). He was of a timid and retiring disposition. He did not, like Andrew and John, approach Jesus, but waited till Jesus accosted him and invited him to join His company. Andrew and John found Jesus (v.5); Jesus found Philip (v.6). This characteristic gives some countenance to the tradition that the disciple who would have failed the Lord’s call that he might ‘go and bury his father’ (Lk 9:59—Mt 8:22), was none other than Philip. Though somewhat slow in mental and dull in spiritual understanding (14:4—A), he had his aptitudes. He had a turn for practical affairs, and, as just as Judas was treasurer to the Apostolic company, so Philip was purveyor, attending to the commercial (Benged on Jn 69). If Andrew was the first missionary of the Kingdom of heaven, bringing his brother Simon to Jesus (Jn 1:40), Philip was the second, bringing his friend Nathanael (vv.45-50). It is said that at the departure of Jesus labouring in Asia Minor and was buried at Hierapolis.

2. The Evangelist.—It was soon found necessary in the Apostolic Church that there should be a division of labour; and that they might give themselves without distraction to prayer and the ministry of the word, seven of the brethren were set apart for the management of the business matters of the Church (Ac 6:1). Philip was one of these. He seems to have been a Hellenist, i.e. a Greek-speaking Jew; at all events he was a man of liberal sympathies, and he greatly helped in the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles. He was in fact the forerunner of St. Paul. During the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, he preached in Samaria (Ac 8:4). He was instrumental in the conversion of the chamberlain of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, that Christianity should in this historic heathen country (8:27—40). On parting from the chamberlain he went to Azotus (Ashdod), and travelled along the sea-board, preaching from city to city, till he reached Caesarea (v.49). There he stayed, and during this time he was still residing with his four unmarried daughters, who were prophetesses, when Paul visited Caesarea on his last journey to Jerusalem. The two men were like-minded, and it is no wonder that Paul abode with him during his stay at Caesarea (21:9).

DAVID SMITH.

PHILIPPI was a city situated E. of Mt. Pangaeus; but one of the early acts of Philip of Macedon was to assure himself of revenue by settling these mines and strongly fortifying the city, to which he gave his own name. The mines are said to have yielded 1000 talents a year. Philippi passed with the rest of Macedonia to the Romans in b.c. 168. Until b.c. 146 Macedonia was divided into four regions, with separate governments, and so divided that a member of one could not marry or hold property in another. But in 146 it received the more regular organization of a province. The great Eastern road of the Roman Empire, the Via Egnatia, after crossing the Strymon at Amphipolis, kept N. of Mt. Pangaeus to Philippi and then turned S.E. to Neapolis, which was the port of Philippi. Philippi stood on the steep side of a hill, and immediately S. of it lay a large marshy lake.

The Church at Philippi was founded by St. Paul on his second missionary journey. With Silas, Timothy, and the Thessalonians, he preached the gospel in Philippi, and proved its importance, which St. Luke describes as ‘a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony.’ Philippi was not the capital city of either of the regions into which Macedonia had been divided, but was a city of sufficient size and importance to warrant the extension of the Greek institutions and to warrant the construction of the Greek road which connected Philippi with the colony at Thessalonica and the road which connected Philippi with Thessalonica. One may safely assume that the city was built by the Romans, and the name ‘Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony’ is the natural expression of the phrase ‘first of the district’ that is the province had at this time a division for official purposes of which we do not know. Other divisions are found in the province of Asia, which had been divided into ten districts, each with its capital city, after the battle of Philippi, b.c. 42, when Octavian and Antony, having vanquished Brutus and Cassius, settled a number of their veterans there. Another body of veterans was settled there after Actium, b.c. 31. As a colony its constitution was modelled on the ancient one of Rome, and its two chief magistrates had not only lictors (SV serjeants), but also a jurisdiction independent of that of the governor of the province. Philippi was the first essentially Roman city in Macedonia that the Apostle Paul preached. There was no synagogue, but on the Sabbath, says St. Luke, ‘we went forth without the gate by a river-side where we supposed there was a place of prayer.’ At this place, therefore, St. Paul found a number of women assembled, Jewsesses or proselytes, one of whom named Lydia (wh. sec), a merchant in purple from Thyatira, was immediately converted and baptized. For the subsequent incidents see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO.—1. The Church of Philippi.—St. Paul visited Philippi on his second missionary journey, and founded there his first Church in Europe. The names in Ph 1.1 probably became a Roman colony; the town was called Philippi, and therefore with a sense of its own importance—can be discerned in the letter, though probably the fact that St. Paul was a Roman citizen, and the virtual freedom which he was allowed by the praetors, may have had some effect on the subsequent treatment of the Christians. As one of the Churches of Macedonia referred to in 2 Co 8:23, it was doubtless in deep poverty, but is held forth along with them as a model of liberality. St. Paul seems to have treated the Philippians in an exceptional way, by accepting from them support which he ordinarily refused (2 Co 11:8, Ph 4:10). He must have visited Philippi at least three times (Ac 16, 722
PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO

2 Co 24, Ao 209), and he always found his own love reciprocated by the Church, and experienced a unique joy in their fellowship with him for the furtherance of the gospel (Ph 184). The Apostle's ascendency in the Church was never questioned, as in Corinth. There were, it is true, rivalries in the congregation, especially, it would seem, among some of the active women of the Church, and St. Paul does not hesitate to use the most powerful of Christian motives to give force and direction to the shaft that he aims at discord (22-41). But, unlike the Churches of Galatia, Philippi had not been disturbed by a severe attack from the Judaists, though the Apostle saw threatening indications of their approach (32-181). The Church was organized with bishops and deacons, from whom St. Paul seems to have received the people's guidance (Ph 25). Some of its members sent him a letter. In no part of his missionary field, so far as we know, did he find such a pure Christian life. They were 'lights in the world' (25-35), and the Apostle's 'joy and crown' (41).

2. The Situation of St. Paul.—The Apostle is a prisoner (17). It appears that his imprisonment had become more rigorous since the Philippians received their first word from him concerning him; and it must have been of some duration, because there had been several communications between them (28-38 42). They are disturbed by the fear that the gospel will suffer through his strict confinement, and possibly his martyrdom in the course of his imprisonment, instead of hindering the gospel, has really led to a more eager preaching of Christ by the Christians of the city of Rome. The motive of this increased activity was sometimes an unworthy emulation of his success, and there must have been those in the Church who refused to acknowledge his leadership, being aroused by the success with which his bonds became manifest throughout all the Praetorium and to all the nations (Ph 40). He has come to Rome as a prisoner in order that he may pass an active and peaceful imprisonment (182 125), but as a preacher of a religion different from that of the Jews, and one which had already reached Cesar's household (Ph 48). His offense had been by a people, and the fact that he was at the end of a speedy acquittal (182), though the possibility of martyrdom hangs like a cloud in his sky, bright to his own view, but casting a shadow upon his readers' joy (41).

It has been assumed, in accordance with the overwhelming opinion of scholars, that St. Paul was at the time imprisoned in Rome; but some say in Caesarea. The chief reasons for the local imprisonment are (1) the wide-spread activity on behalf of the gospel by friends and enemies of the Apostle involves a larger Church than seems to have been in Caesarea; and (2) his own conviction that his acquittal is near. With these views the indications of 11 12 and 42 most naturally agree. The Praetorium might, indeed, mean Herod's palace, which was used as the headquarters of the Roman governor in Caesarea, but the words 'in the whole Praetorium' seem to point to the bodyguard of the Emperor, though Mommssen supposes that the conditions are best realized if the words imply that St. Paul was handed over to the judicial prefects of the Praetorian guard, who presided over the supreme Imperial court in Rome. No sufficient proof has been adduced that the word was used for the Emperor's palace in Rome, or for the barracks of the guard. Also 'Cesar's household' (42) probably means the attendants of the Emperor in Rome, including those of high rank and slaves.

Assuming that the letter was written from a Roman prison, what is its relationship to Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon—the other letters of the captivity? Some hold that they were written from Caesarea while Philippians was sent from Rome, but most assign all these Captivity Epistles to Rome. There is, however, no unanimity as to whether Philippians preceded or followed the others. Some of the most distinguished English and American scholars put Philippians earliest, for the reason that in style and language it is very much akin to Romans, while Ephesians and Colossians are more like the Pastoral, and their atmosphere is quite different from that of Romans and Philippians. There is much force in this, though Ephesians also presents strong similarity to Romans. But the situation of the latter Churches, in spite of the bonds they were kept in by error, might have called forth new themes in a formal Epistle like Ephesians, while Philippians is a friendly letter to an old Church whose life was apparently not for the first time being threatened by the Judaists, with their gospel of legal rights. Some, therefore, hold the year or so which on this supposition elapsed between Phil. and Eph. account for the difference between the two. The question of priority may not admit of final decision, but it is probable that St. Paul's letter was written nearer the year of his consular than the other letters. If so, the letter was written earlier than Philippians, and its influence is seen in the latter Epistle.

In regard to the date of Philippians, a further difficulty emerges because of the uncertainty of the Pauline chronology, but since a.d. 61 is the most probable year for the Apostle's arrival in Rome, this letter may, though not found, have been written at that time. But, whatever the date of this letter St. Paul refreshes his lonely spirits by perfect freedom of fellowship with his favourite Church. Rome was not so homogeneous, nor did it acknowledge his gospel as the Church of the Most Holy City. But, as the Church of Rome was partly of a different type; for, notwithstanding the change effected by the Neronian persecution, that Church could not have soon become so decided Petrine had it originally been strongly imbued with the Paul of Corinth. The letter shows us a very active and varied missionary effort in the capital—partly by St. Paul among the Praetorians and in the Imperial household, partly by his friends, and to some extent by the Church who probably preached to the Jews and their proselytes.

3. Contents of the Epistle.—

(i. Cretting, 11-1. Paul and Timothy salute the saints of Philippi, together with their bishops and deacons.

(ii. Introduction, v 3-8. St. Paul is constantly moved to thanksgiving for their generous fellowship with him in the furtherance of the gospel from the beginning, and they are all ever on his heart where Christ dwells. His prayer for them is that their love may abound in knowledge and insight as to what befits the Christian life, that they may live sincere and blameless lives until Christ comes.

(iii. The present condition of St. Paul. His imprisonment has, contrary to expectation, led to the spread of the gospel, partly by his being chained to the Praetorian guard, partly through his new hope, and partly through envious rivalry. He, however, rejoices because he is assured that in answer to their prayers the Spirit will enable him to apply his Lord to the issue of his imprisonment; he does not know what to desire, though he believes that he will be acquitted and will work for their Christian welfare.

(iv. Exhortations to the Philippians to walk worthy of the gospel, 18-23. No hostility must deter them from maintaining the gospel in a spirit of unity, for ability to suffer for Christ is a sign of Divine grace to them and of ruin to their enemies. An appeal is also made to them, by all that they have experienced of Christianity, to complete the work of living in fellowship, and to exhibit that unselfish mind which prompted Christ to come to earth and die for them. Wherefore He is now exalted to be worshipped by every creature.
PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO

By reverent obedience let them work with God and effect His will of good towards them, so that at the last day the Apostle and his beloved Philippians may rejoice in what the gospel has done for them.

(v.) The promise to send Timothy, and the commendation of Epaphroditus to the Philippians (Phm. 27, 28).

On his progress through the knowledge of Jesus Christ, 3:1-4. To sum up his letter, the Apostle would say, 'Rejoice in the Lord.' But, as though suddenly reminded of a doctrine, even as the summing up of wearing them, 'for warning against the Judaisers—dogs, evil workers, mutilators of the flesh.' He who believes in Christ alone as a sufficient Saviour is the true Israelite. St. Paul, who had enjoyed every Hebrew privilege, knows of how small value they were for attaining true righteousness, and now he boasts only in Christ. For personal knowledge of Him he will gladly lose all else, in order that he may get the righteousness which is from God by faith, and in close union with Him may realize the meaning of His sufferings, death, and resurrection. Christian perfection is still in the distance, but all who have been laid hold of by Christ must respond by striving eagerly for perfect fellowship with Him. The mature Christian must keep on in the path of progress, and not be misled by teaching which will end in an earthly goal and the rejection of the cross. St. Paul and his followers are to be their example, for their Commonwealth and its ideals will soon come to translate itself in all of them into His likeness. Wherefore let this Church, which will be his crown at that day, stand fast in the Lord.

4. Purpose and Characteristics.—Epaphroditus had fallen sick at Rome before his work of love for St. Paul was done, and the news, having reached Philippi, cast the Church into anxiety; Epaphroditus in his turn having heard of their alarm has grown home-sick. St. Paul uses the occasion of his return to set their mind at rest about his own imprisonment for the gospel, and to deal with some affairs about which they had inquired him. The letter is so thoroughly personal that it has no plan or any single aim. He thanks the Philippians for their gift, crowning many acts of generosity towards him, and yet, lest they should feel that he was too dependent upon them, he reminds them that it is their spirit that he values most. Again he warns them against a Judaisc gospel, and is urgent in seeking to establish the doctrine of the women who had heard his gospel is the only one, and it is the gospel of love. His union with Christ fills him with love and contentment, and thrills the lonely prisoner with joy, which may be called the note of the Epistle, and he hopes by this letter to prevent some of overgrowth the Philippians also. Should the view that St. Paul was not acquainted be correct, this letter might be called 'his last testament to his beloved Church'; but there is good reason to believe that his hope of release was fulfilled.

Philippians is an excellent example of the Pauline method of sustaining Christian life by doctrinal truth which is the outcome of personal experience. Human thought has made a few noble flights into the mystery of redemption than Ph 2:15-16, but it is used to exalt the holy duty of sacrifice in the ministry of fellowship. Like 2 Co 8, the dynamic of the truth lies not in an interpretation of the mystery of Christ's personality, for little is told further than that He was in His nature essentially Divine, and enjoyed the prerogative of Divinity; but it lies in the fact that St. Paul has learnt from his own intercourse with the risen Christ. His expository prayer is a prayer as the essential Divine Son of God. Everything earthly becomes worthless in comparison with the excellence of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, his Lord. The contrast between His earthly life of suffering and the eternal, glorious existence involved in the vision of the risen Lord, has become the religious motive of supreme efficacy. Similarly in 3:1-11, 13-18 the doctrine is deduced from experience, and is to the Philippians a warning of the possibility of falling into a Judaiscr form of Christianity. The emphasis on the practice of virtue, especially in 4:1-8, is said to reflect the finest contemporary teaching of the pagan world, but the form is pervaded with the deepest Christian spirit.

5. Authenticity and Integrity.—The objections urged against this Epistle by Baur and his followers are not seriously regarded to-day, and have been abandoned by all but a few extremists who start from certain pre-suppositions as to primitive Christianity, and are offended by the tone of 3:1-4, as well as by the abrupt transition in 3:1. The recurrence of the motives, ideas, and language of the great Pauline Epistles, and the external evidence of his use from the earliest, post-Apostolic age, make it unnecessary to consider the objections in detail. More plausibility attaches to the theory that the Epistle, as we now have it, consists of two letters, which are joined at 2:19, the last two chapters being probably earlier and addressed to different readers. In support of this, appeal is made to Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (II.), where the words 'who also wrote you letters' are found (v. 2), and it is argued that he could have written in itself this supposition is baseless; and Polycarp, who knew apparently only our letter, may either have heard of others which St. Paul wrote to the Philippians or from experience, and is to be written, he was referring to a collection of St. Paul's Epistles used widely for edification by all the Churches. The abruptness in 3:1, however, is explained by the fact that St. Paul is expressing himself freely in an intimate letter to his friends, and perhaps it was partly due to something in their letter to him which he suddenly remembered.

PHILISTIA.—See next art. and PALESTINE.

PHILISTINES.—The inhabitants of the Maritime Plain of Palestine (cf. art. PALESTINE, 1) from the period of the Judges onward to the 6th cent. or later. They are said to have come from Caphtor (Am 9:7, Jer 47:4, Dt 20), which is with much probability identified with Crete. At all events they came from over the sea.

Rameses III. of the XXth Egyptian dynasty encountered a pratical sea-faring people on the borders of Syria, whom he called Puruisi = Pholisit or 'Philistia'). They afterwards made incursions on the northern coast of Egypt as well as on the coast of Palestine. In the latter country they gained a permanent foothold, owing to the changing condition. When Wenamon made his expedition to Lebanon for a king of the XXIst dynasty (c. 1100), a Philistine kingdom existed at Dor. (For these facts cf. Breasted, Ancient Records, iv. pp. 274 ff., and History of Egypt, p. 513.)

The Philistines first make their appearance in Biblical history late in the period of the Judges, when Samson, of the tribe of Dan, is said to have waged his curious single-handed combats with them (Jg 13:16-16). These conflicts were the natural result of the impact of the Philistines upon Israel's western border. The reference to the Philistines in Jg 3: 17 is a later insertion (cf. ISRAEL, § 11). During the time of Eli these invaders were trying to make their way into the central ridge of Palestine, and in one of the battles captured the ark of Jahweh, which a pestilence (probably bubonic plague) induced them to return (1 S 4-6).

When Saul became king the Philistines tried to break his power, but were defeated through the bravery of Jonathan (1 S 14). Saul did not permanently check their progress, however, as by the end of his reign the whole of the rich plain of Jezreel was in their possession, including the city of Bethshan at its eastern end (1 S 31). David defeated them again inflicted upon them a severe defeat (2 S 21), afterwards reducing them to vassalage (2 S 8). Down to this time Philistine power was concentrated in the hands of the rulers of the five cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath. The rulers of these cities are called by a peculiar title, which is translated 'lords of the Philistines' (wh. see).

After the reign of David, probably at the division of the kingdom, the Philistines regained their independence, for we find the kings of Israel in the 9th cent. trying to wrest from them Gibbethon, a town on the border of the Maritime Plain (1 K 15:19f.). Late in the same century the king Adad-nirari III. of Assyria took tribute of Philistine kings (KIB 1:190), and began the long series of Assyrian interferences in Philistine affairs. Amos (1:9) denounces Philistine monarchies as among the independent kingdoms of his time.

The position of the Philistines exposed them to every approach of the Assyrians and Egyptians, and during the last third of the 8th cent. and the whole of the 7th their history is a series of conquests, conspiracies, and rebellions. It is possible to follow those with much fulness in the Assyrian inscriptions, but full details cannot be given here. Tiglath-pileser III. received tribute from Philistines (KIB II. 20). They became Sargon's vassals the year that Sargon fell. Gaza in 722 (KIB II. 54), but ten years later a rebellion was led by Ashdod (Is 20:1; KIB II. 64 ff). At the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib another effort was made to shake off the Assyrian yoke. In this Hezekiah of Judah took part by imprisoning Padi, the Philistine king of Ekron, who remained faithful to Sennacherib. The allies thus brought together were defeated at Eltekeh (KIB II. 145). The security of Jerusalem by Sennacherib was the result (2 K. 18. 19). Earaahdon (KIB II. 148), and Ashurbanipal (KIB II. 240) marched across the Philistine territory and held it in subjection.

The decline of Assyria the Philistines began to suffer from the rise of Egypt under the XXVth dynasty. Psammetichus I. took Ashdod after a siege of 29 years (Herod. ii. 157). Necho II., a contemporary of Josiah of Judah, deposed the Philistine kings (Herod. ii. 160). It is probable that the Philistines suffered at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, but no record of his doings among them has been preserved. The Assyrians call the Philistine rulers 'kings.' The older title, 'lords of the Philistines,' has disappeared.

When Cambyses made his expedition into Egypt (a.c. 525), Gaza opposed him (Polyb. xvi. 40). The Sidonian king Edninuazzar claims that Dor and Joppa were added to the city of Sidon. Gaza in 322 held out against Alexander the Great, and his siege of it is famous (Diod. Sic. xvi. 7). The Ptolomys and Seleucids often fought over Philistine territory. It finally passed under Roman rule, and its cities had then an important history.

The Philistines cease to be mentioned by this name after the time of the Assyrians. Some infer from the fact that Herodotus (iii. 3) speaks of the Arabsians as being in possession of the coast in the time of Cambyses, that the Philistines had even then been supplanted. It is probable that in the ebb and flow of the nations over this land they were gradually absorbed and lost their identity.

Probably the Philistines adopted in the main the religion and civilization of the Canaanites. Their chief god, Dagon (1 S 5:1), was a Semitic deity. He appears in the el-Amarna letters and also in Babylonian (cf. Barton, Semit. Or. 229 ff.). There was also at Ashkelon a temple of Ashhtar (Herod. i. 105). If their religion was Semitic, so also were probably the other features of their civilization. If they brought other customs from beyond the sea, they are not described in our scanty records.

PHILOLOGUS.—This word occurs in EV only in Col 2:8, where it refers to an unsond and pernicious form of teaching. 'Philosophy' proper falls outside the scope of the present work. Some points of contact between it and the Bible will be found in such articles as Gnosticism, Logos, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom; cf. also Epicureans, Stoics.

PHINEHAS.—1. —Son of Eleazar, the third son of Aaron. Both his name and that of his mother Putiel are perhaps of Egyptian origin. The only certain occurrence of the name in a pre-exilic writing is in Jos 5:4, a hill (Gibbeth Pinhas) in Ephraim was named after him, where his father and (1XK) he himself was buried. In P and the Chronicler he rises into great prominence. He succeeded Eleazar as chief priest (Ex 6:16, 1 Ch 6:10, Ezr 7:1, 1 Es 8:9), and was the superintendent of the Korahite Levites (1 Ch 24:23). The successor of the priesthood in his line was assur to him when he showed his zeal at Shittim in Moab, when Israel 'joined themselves unto Baal-peor.' An Israelite brought into the camp a woman from the Midianites who had beguiled the people into foreign worship. Phinehas slew the man and the woman (Nu 25:7). This is referred to in Ps 106:28, 4527-25, 1 Mac 2:14. As the expedition to punish the Midianites (Nu 10:14). He was the spokesman of the western tribes concerning the altar which the eastern tribes had erected (Jos 22:32-32, 2 Es 1:27 Phinehas). 2. The younger son of Eli (1 S 2:21-23 Es 1:27 Phinehas). See HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS, S. Ezr 8:9 father of a priest named Eleazar = 1 Es 8:2 Phineas.

PHLEGON.—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16:24.

PHILEI. —The bearer of the Epistle to the Romans (Ro 16:16). She was a 'deaconess' of the church at Cenchreae. See DEACONNESS.

PHENICIA, PHENICIANS.—Phoenicia was the strip of coast land between Lebanon and the hills of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea. Its northern and southern limits are indefinite, being differently defined by different ancient geographers.

The Semite name of the country was 'Canaan' (Kinahechi and Kinoneh in the el-Amarna tablets, and Chana on Phenician coins; cf. CANAANITES). The name Phoenicia is derived from a Gr. root signifying 'blood-red,' and was probably given account of the colour of the soil. It was once thought to be derived from the Egyptian Penth, but that is now conceded to have been a designation of Asiatics in general (cf. W. Max Muller, Asses and Escapists, 298 ff.). The modern name is that of the country may be roughly determined by its chief cities—Arvad or Arados, on the island now called Ruad, eighty miles north of Sidon, Simyra, Arka, Gebal or Byblos, Biruta on the site of the modern Beyrut, Sidon, Sarepta, Tyre, Achzib, and Acco. The latter, the modern Acre, not far north of Mt. Carmel, was the most southerly of these cities.

The Phenicians are proved by their language and religions to have belonged to the Semitic race. Herodotus (i. 1 and vilt. 89) records a tradition that they came from the Red Sea. Scholars now suppose that this refers really to the Persian Gulf, and that the Canaanites, of whom the Phenicians were a part, came from North Arabia by way of the shore of the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates valley. This migration was probably a part of that movement of races which about a.c. 1700 gave Babylon the Kassite dynasty and Egypt its Hyksos kings (cf. Piot, Early Hist. of Syrnia and Pal., ch. v.). Perhaps the Canaanites were the last wave of Amorites (wh. see). Their chief cities may have been built by a previous race. Herodotus (ii. 44) records a tradition which, if true, would carry the founding of the temple at Tyre back to c.2730.

The civilization of the Phoenicians was a city civilization, and each city had its petty king. The history is therefore the record of a number of petty dynasties, often jealous of one another, and never powerful enough to resist a strong invader from without. Hence, between the mountains and the sea, they alone of the early Semites developed navigation, and became the merchantmen and the carriers of the ancient world. Their ship and shipping were important as early as the 14th century B.C. (cf. KIB v. 150-152). Herodotus tells (iv. 42) how Necho of Egypt, a contemporary of Jeremiah, employed Phoenicians to circumnavigate Africa, while Strabo (xvi. ii. 23) again tested in their excellence in seamanship. According to Homer, they had intercourse with Greeks in the time of the Trojan war (II. vi. 290). Traces of their influence are found in Greece (cf. Barton, Strabo, and Pausanias). Tyre and Sidon were in constant fear to found colonies, especially in Sicily, Carthage, and Cyprus.

For some reason Sidon so excelled the other cities in Lebanon that the Greeks and the Egyptians in the Old and New Testaments frequently called 'Sidonians,' even when, as in the case of Ahab's marriage, Tyrians are referred to (cf. Jer. 10: 15, 18; 1 K 9: 11, 18, 20-21; 2 K 11: 19). Their shipping was important in Egyptian embassies (Ant. xi. 299, 302. Od. iv. 518, xv. 118). This reason for this is obscure.

Phoenicia first appears in written history in the record of the Asiatic campaigns of Thothmes III. of Egypt. In his earlier campaign against the region between the Lebanon ranges, in his 7th expedition (c. 1471) he came out to the coast and conquered Arvad, the most northerly of the important Phoenician cities (cf. Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, ii. 190). There are reasons for supposing that Tyre had previously been added to his empire (Breasted, Hist. of Egypt, 298). Probably the same is true of the rest of Phoenicia, for in the Elohim names all the Phoenician dynasties were began in the Egyptian empire of Amenophis iii. and Amenophis iv. These letters show that under Amenophis iv. Rib-Adda was vassal king of Gebal, Amnumria of Biruta, Zimrida of Sidon, and Alalah of Tyre. These kings were in constant fear with one another, with the people of Arvad, and with the Amorites beyond the Lebanon. They are constantly accusing one another (cf. Nos. 33 ff., 129-136, and 147-156). After the Tenth Dynasty Phoenicia was again invaded. Set I. I. Acco and Tyre (Breasted, Records, iii. 47), while Rameses ii. pushed northward to Biruta (iii. 123). In the reign of his successor Ramses iii. the cities of the Lebanon to Ascalon were reoccupied. Phoenicia was probably included in the revolt, for in the poem written to celebrate the subjugation of these lands we read: 'Plundered is Canaan, I bring every evil' (Breasted, Records, iv. 49). (Hist. iv. 470). In the XXII dynasty Rameses iv. (c. 1198-1167) still held the country from Arvad and southward (Breasted, Records, iv. 34, 37). It is probably because of this long Egyptian vassalage that Tyre and Sidon were in constant fear. On the other hand, and the Amorites beyond the Lebanon.

In the Persian period (how Phoenicia became subject to Persia our sources do not tell) Sidon again became the leading city, Tyre taking a second place. An inscription of Yahaw-melech, king of Gebal, probably belongs to this period (C.T. i. 1).

Sidon furnished the best ships for the fleet of Xerxes, Tyre the next best (Diod. Sic. xi. 116; Herod. vii. 24, 96, 98, viii. 46). Straton (Abd-Ashtar?) of Sidon in the next century effected Greek civilization in Sidon. (Straton, Hist. iii. 122-25, p. 394). About 330 his successor Tennes (Tabari) joined in an unsuccessful revolt against Persia, and Sidon was again besieged (Diod. Sic. xvi. 201). After the battle of Issus (c. 338), all the Phoenician cities except Tyre opened their gates to Alexander the Great. Tyre resisted and again stood a siege of seven months (Diod. Sic. xvii. 21-21). During the next 12 years the city was not discomfited of its independence. In c. 148 Augustus made Biruta a Roman colony. Claudius (A. D. 41-54) made Acco, then called Ptolemais (cf. Ap. 217), a Roman colony. Septimius Severus (A. D. 193-231) performed a similar service for Tyre, and Elagabalus (218-222) for Sidon. Gradually the old race was merged with various conquerors.

In civilization the Phoenicians were for the most part borrowers from Babylonia and Egypt. What they borrowed they carried in their trading voyages all about the Mediterranean, and thus diffused culture and the arts of life. Perhaps they were pioneers in the art of seamanship, but of this we can be sure; they may have borrowed this from Crete or the Mycenaeans. That they invented the alphabet and diffused it in their voyages, so that it was adopted by the Greeks and Romans, is generally conceded, but whether they obtained it by adapting Egyptian hieroglyphs, or by Phoenian cuneiform characters, or from some other ancient form of writing, is still in dispute. Religion, they closely resembled the other Semites (cf. W. R. Smith, RS; and Barton, Semti. Origins). Baal and Ashartart wore the principal divinities, and much prominence was given to sexual rites (cf. Lucian, de Syria Des. § 6). Human sacrifice persisted long among them in spite of their contact with the highly civilized Greeks (cf. EBi ii. coll. 3189, 3190).

The best account that we have of the nature and extent of Phoenician traffic is contained in Ezekiel's description (chs. 27, 28) of the trade of Tyre, which, as we have seen, had been the leading Phoenician city for a century or more before his time.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

PHENIX was a good harbour on the S. coast of Crete. It has been identified almost certainly with Loudro, which is said to be the only harbour W. of Fair Havens where a ship of such size as that by which St. Paul travelled (it was a large ship, but had crew and passengers on board numbering altogether 276) could find shelter. Strabo speaks of Phoenix as being on an island opposite Crete, which is evidently the same as Loudro, and it is quite possible that it waspe as belonging to the territory of Lappa, which was not far from Loutro. Other authorities speak of it as if it were near Aradena, which is only a mile from Loutro. The identification with Loudro is the more probable because Phoenix has a harbour a little farther W., of which we have no evidence that it could accommodate so large a ship. It is perhaps more probable that St. Luke makes a mistake in his description of a harbour which he never reached. The RV understands the Greek to mean 'in the direction in which the S.W. and N.W. winds blow,' and therefore translates 'looking N.E. and S.E.' This may have been a sailor's way of expressing it, but we have no authority for it.

PHFRARAL.—In Ad. Est 11! the Book of Esther is called 'the epistle of Phrural' (i.e. 'Purim' [wh. see].

PHYRGIA.—The Phrygians were an Aryan race who seem to have had their first home in Thrace, and to have crossed into Asia through the same southward movement of tribes that brought the Hellenes into Greece. In Asia they occupied at one time the greater part of the country W. of the Halys, probably displacing a Semitic race from whom they may have learned the worship of Cybele. We must regard Homer's Trojans as part of the Phrygian race, and the Trojan War as a contest between them and Greek settlers from Thessaly. In more historical times the name Phrygia applies to an inland region varying in extent at different times, but bounded at its widest by the Sangarius on the N., the Halys on the E., the Taurus range on the S. It thus covered the W. part of the great plateau of Asia Minor and the upper valleys of the rivers Sangarius and Hermus. It was a region fruitful in oil and wine, exporting also wool, gold, marble, and salt.

When the Romans inherited the kingdom of Pergamus in c. 133, a portion of Phrygia was included in the province of Asia, but the southern portion towards Pamphylia was not included. This portion was in the hands of the dependent king of Galatia when Augustus constituted Galatia a province in A.C. 26, and was thus included in the new province which extended from Lydia on the S.W. almost to the mouth of the Halys on the N.E. Hence this portion of Phrygia, with its cities of Antioch and Iconium, came to be known as Phrygia Galatica.

This country was included by St. Paul in the work of his first missionary journey (Ac 13th—14th). From Perga he and Barnabas made their way N. along the difficult mountain road to Antioch, here called 'Read to Antioch' (see PISIDIA). On his second missionary journey St. Paul (now accompanied by Silas) began with the churches of Cilicia and then passed through Derbe and Lystra, where he took 'a ship into Asia,' we have no account of this. The narrative then proceeds (Ac 10th): 'And they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia [Gr. 'the Phrygian and Galatian region'], having been forbidden [AV 'and were forbidden'] of the Holy Ghost to speak the word in Asia, and when they were come over against Mysia they assayed to go into Bithynia; and the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not; and passing by Mysia they came down to Troas. The natural interpretation of this is that from Lystra they traversed Phrygia Galatica, from Antioch took the road leading N. to Dorylalos, where they would be near Bithynia, and from there were directed W. to Troas. Attempts have been made to find here the mention of Galatia proper with its towns of Pessinus and Ancyra. But against this we must set (1) the form of the Greek phrase 'the Phrygian and Galatian region'; (2) the strange silence of St. Luke about the actual visit of the Apostle to Galatia; and therefore be considered impossible; (3) the geographical consideration that the travellers could not have crossed the desert of the Axios straight from S. to N. and must, therefore, have taken a considerable time; (4) the historical consideration that the travellers could not have crossed the desert of the Axios straight from S. to N. and must, therefore, have taken a considerable time, i.e. along the direct route which passed through the higher country from Metropolis to Ephesus, instead of the high road which followed the valley of the Lycus.

The second missionary journey of Paul, which was probably to the same churches, but the order of visits is not at all certain, is doubtless meant to include the churches of Lycaonia first—these were in the province of Galatia, but were not in Phrygia. The order is in any case strongly against the inclusion of Galatia proper. The journey was continued 'through the upper country to Ephesus,' i.e. along the direct route which passed the higher country from Metropolis to Ephesus, instead of the high road which followed the valley of the Lycus.

PHYLACTERIES, FRONLETS.—1. Among the charges brought by our Lord against the Pharisees of a day we read: 'but all who see men: for they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments' (Mt 23: 6; for 'borders' see FAXONA). This is the only Biblical reference to one of the most characteristic institutions of the Judaism of the first century as of the twentieth. The word 'phylacteries' (Gr. phylacterion) literally signifies a 'safe-guard,' as safe-guarding the wearer against the attacks of hurtful spirits and other misfortunes, such as the evil eye—In other words, an amulet. By the Jews then as now, however, the phylacteries were termed tephillah, the plural of the ordinary word for 'prayer.'

2. For information regarding the phylacteries of our Lord's day we are dependent on the somewhat hazy data in the Mishna, with which the modern Jewish usage agrees in all essential points. Then, as now, they consisted of two small square cases or capsules of leather, 'two finger-breathths' according to the Talmud, the size of a ¼ inch. In the side, one of which was worn on the forehead, the other on the left upper arm. The leather had to be prepared from the skin of a ritually clean' animal, and was coloured a deep black.

The case for the forehead, which was termed the 'head-ephillath,' was distinguished from the 'arm-' or 'hand-ephillath' by its being shaped so as to give four small but distinct compartments, while its fellow consisted of a single one on all male phylacteries. In each of the four compartments of the former was placed a narrow strip of parchment, also from the skin of a 'clean' animal, having carefully written on it one of the Pentateuch passages. These, regarded as the Scripture warrant for the institution of the phylacteries (see § 4). These were Ex 13:19-13:20, Dt 6:4-9, 11:18-20. The companion capsules, on the other hand, contained the same four passages, it being the custom, during the third century, for the text of the phylactery to be kept in position when properly 'laid.'

The strap of the head-phylactery was tied behind the head into a knot having the shape of the Hebrew letter shin, and on the two sides of the capsules were impressed the letter shin, on one side with the usual three prongs, on the other with four prongs. The corresponding loop of the phylactery for the arm was supposed to form the letter shin, the three letters together giving the sacred name Jehovah's - 'his mercy.'

3. From the Mishna we learn further that women, slaves, and minors were exempted from the obligation of wearing, or in technical phrase 'laying,' the tephillah, a deed of a significant on all male phylacteries. In each of the four compartments of the former was placed a narrow strip of parchment, also from the skin of a 'clean' animal, having carefully written on it one of the Pentateuch passages. These, regarded as the Scripture warrant for the institution of the phylacteries (see § 4). These were Ex 13:19-13:20, Dt 6:4-9, 11:18-20. 4. The date at which this literal interpretation was first given effect to and the wearing of the phylacteries introduced cannot be determined with certainty. The fact that the institution is unknown to the Samaritans shows that it must have arisen after the date of the Samaritan schism. The passage of Jesus Simon above quoted (written c. n.c. 150-170) seems to imply that the figurative interpretation still held the field. On the other hand, the writer of the famous 'Letter of Aristeas' shows no need to such a literalism; neither, we may be sure, did Jesus or His disciples.

In popular estimation, as is shown by the very name 'phylacteries' (§ 1), and by references in Tacitus and Talmud, the phylacteries were regarded as powerful amulets. In the Middle Ages they seem to have fallen from the absurdly exaggerated esteem in which they were held in Talmudic times. This was no doubt due to the fact that some of the most influential Jewish expositors still fundamentally maintained the figurative interpretation of the cardinal passages of the Pentateuch.

In more modern times, however, the practice of 'laying the tephillah' has revived, and is now universal in orthodox Jewish circles.

PHYLARCH (2 Mac 89.)—A military title for either a cavalry officer or a commander of auxiliary forces.

PHYSICIAN.—See MEDICINE, p. 597.

PI-BESETH.—Ezek 30:24: Bubastis, one of the greatest cities in Lower Egypt; Egypt. "Bubastis, 'House of A Set': it was especially the residence of the 22nd Dyn., which was founded by Shishak. The goddess Ubasti was usually figured with a lion's head, but she was of a mild character, and her sacred animal in later times was the cat. The ruins of the city are now called Tell Basta, lying near Zagazig, in the E. of the Delta.
The temple described by Herodotus was excavated by Naville, yielding monuments of every period from the 4th Dynasty to the 30th. P. Ll. Griffiths.

PIECE.—Piece is used in AV for (1) a measure equal to a firkin (1 Es 8:9 ‘an hundred pieces of wine’); (2) an instrument of war (1 Mac 9:4 ‘pieces to cast darts, and slings’).

PIGEON.—See Dove.

PI-HAHIROTH (Ex 14:2, Nu 33:3).— Mentioned in conjunction with the camping of the Israelites. It was 'between Migdol and the sea, before Bael-sephon' (Ex 14:2). This definition does not enable us to fix its site, for these other places are themselves unknown. In Nu 33:3 the name is simply Hahiroth.

PILATE.—Pontius Pilatus, a Roman of no known family, succeeded Valerius Gratius as procurator of Judea in A.D. 26. He possibly owed his appointment to Sejanus, and his administration, as described from the Jewish standpoint, shows either that he shared the anti-Jewish feelings of Sejanus or that he failed to understand the temper of the people with whom he had to deal. His first offence was not allowing the soldiers to remove the images from their standards on entering Jerusalem. These images were worshipped by the Jews, and therefore the symbols of idolatry. A deposition of Jews waited on Pilate for five days, and refused to desist though threatened with instant death. He was compelled to give way, but subsequently set up in the palace of Herod tablets dedicated to the Emperor Caligula, which was taken as an attempt to introduce the Cesar-worship already flourishing in the rest of the Empire. Only an order from Tiberius compelled him to yield a second time. He gave further offence by a new collection. Theavailability of water in the vicinity was much felt at the time of festivals, and Pilate proceeded to construct a new aqueduct at the expense of the Temple treasure. The Sanhedrin might have ordered such a work, but as Pilate's act caused a riot which was not quelled without bloodshed. To these incidents we must add the massacre of some Galileans by the very altar of sacrifice, referred to in Lk 13:3, but not otherwise explained. The end of Pilate's rule was brought about by a disturbance in Samaria. Tradition says that the vessels of the Tabernacle had been buried on Mt. Gerizim, and a band of armed men escorted thither an impostor who promised to reveal them. Pilate sent troops to the spot, who, after a massacre, dispersed the multitude. Complaint was made to Vitellius, the legatus of Syria, who seems at this time to have had authority over the governor of Judaea. Pilate was ordered to justify himself at Rome (A.D. 36), but before he arrived Tiberius had died (March, A.D. 37), and he was not re-appointed (Joseph, Ant. xviii. iii. 1–iv. 2). Eusebius states that he committed suicide. The 'Acts of Pilate' and his letters to the Emperor are late forgeries.

Pilate would therefore be to us only one of a series of unsuccessful procurators, but for the fact that his years of office covered the period of Christ's ministry. From the accounts of our Lord's trial we learn more of him than from any other source. Except at the times of the great feasts the governors usually stayed at Cæsarea; but Pilate was probably present with reinforcements during the Passover, and had his headquarters in the fortress known as the Tower of Antonia, which adjoined the Temple on the N. side. The praetorium formed part of this fortress (but see Praetorium), and on this occasion, while the prisoner was led inside, the accusers remained below the steps which led into the hall, lest they should be rendered unclean for the feast by entering a place defiled by lepers. Pilate examined Jesus inside the hall, and came outside each time he wished to speak to the accusers. Jesus had been brought to him to be condemned to death, this penalty being out of the power of the Sanhedrin; and at first they expected Pilate to pass sentence on their simple statement that he was 'a malefactor' (Jn 18:28-29). Pilate was too Roman for this—penalties in their power they might inflict, but if he was to add his authority he required a reason. Therefore (avoiding the charge of blasphemy) they accused Jesus of 'forbidding tribute' and calling himself 'Christ, a king' (Lk 23:2). Pilate remained inside, and by questions as aforesaid he exhorted the prisoner claimed only what he would have called a 'philosophical kingship'—an idea familiar to him, if only from the Stoics. Hardly believing that truth was attainable (as he showed by the scornful answer, 'What is truth?'), he was yet prepared to accede to the Jews of his day, to patronize one who thought he had attained to it (Jn 18:38-39). From this time onwards we must regard the trial as a series of attempts on Pilate's part to release Jesus without too great offense to the Jews. (1) Hearing that He came from Galilee, he sends Him to Herod Antipas, who was at Jerusalem for the feast. If Herod 'claimed jurisdiction' over the prisoner he might have released Him, but he had no more power to condemn a man to death in Jerusalem than the Jews had. The courtesy reconciled Herod and Pilate, their former enmity being due to the fact that Herod sent private reports to Rome and was regarded by Augustus as the Emperor's spy. But when Herod gave either reply or miracle from Jesus, he sent Him back to Pilate (Lk 23:7-12). (2) It was a custom (whether Jewish or Roman in origin) to release a prisoner in honour of the Passover. Pilate pretended to offer Jesus, but, persuaded by the priests, the multitude clamoured for Barabbas (Mt 27:16, Mk 15:14, Lk 23:13-14, Jn 18:38-39). (3) After solemnly washing his hands, as if absolving himself of responsibility for condemning an innocent man (Mt 27:22), Pilate hoped to satisfy the rancour of the accusers by scourging the prisoner. 'I will chastise him and release him' (Lk 23:23). But when Jesus came forth, and prayed for them in the decease and death of their own religion the Romans were lending a ready ear to the mysteries religions of the East. Moreover, Pilate's superstitious fear had already been aroused by the report of his wife's dream (Mt 27:19). Again, therefore, he questioned Jesus. But at length the Jews prevailed with the cry, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend' (Jn 19:12). The threat that the province would accuse him at Rome for treason overcame Pilate's scruples. An accusation for 'treason' might mean death under Tiberius. Pilate gave way, caused his throne or tribunal to be brought on to the tesselated space in front of the praetorium (called 'Gabbaiha' in Aramaic), and there pronounced final judgment. But in the taunting words, 'Behold your king!' and 'Shall I crucify your king?' as well as in the inscription on the cross, which he refused to alter in spite of protest, he wreaked upon the Jews such revenge as lay in his power.

In this unjust complaisance we have an illustration of one danger in the strict supervision which Augustus and Tiberius maintained over provincial government. In the main it was a great benefit, but it enabled the provincials to intimidate a weak governor. The weak points in Pilate's character stand out strongly. He seems to have been a sceptic in principle, but not free from superstition, in this resembling perhaps most of the upper class among the Romans in his day. He had probably not taken the trouble to understand the fierce passions of the people whom he was sent to govern, and when worsted by them in early encounters, the scorn which Romans felt for Jews became in him something like hatred, and a strong desire to be avenged on their leaders at all costs save one, namely, disgrace at Rome.

PILDAH.

PILHA.—A signatory to the covenant (10th).

PILLAR.—1. With two or three unimportant exceptions, 'pillar' in OT is the rendering of two very distinct Heb. terms, 'osām and mazzēbāh. The former denotes in most cases—for a conspicuous exception see JACHIN AND BOAZ—a pillar or column supporting the roof or other part of a building (Jg 16:19, 1 K 7:24), also the pillars from which the hangings of the Tabernacle were suspended (Ex 26:8 and oft.). From this sense the transition is easy to a column of smoke (Jg 20:9), and to the 'pillar of cloud' and the 'pillar of fire' of the Exodus and the Wanderings (Ex 13th etc.). The further transition to the figurative use of the term 'pillar,' which alone prevails in NT (Gal 2:9, 1 Ti 3:1, Rev 3:21 10th), may be seen in Job 9:201st passages reflecting an antique monosyzygy in which the pillars of heaven and of the earth were actual supports.

2. It is with the second of the two terms above cited, the mazzēbāh, that this article has mainly to deal. Derived from a root common to the Semitic family, mazzēbāh denotes something 'set up' on end, in particular the an upright stone, whether it be a megalithic monument, such as the stones known to contemporary archaeology as menhirs or 'standing stones,' or a less imposing temporary stele. Three varieties of mazzēbāh may be distinguished in OT.

(a) For reasons that will appear at a later stage, our survey may start from the stone erected over a grave or elsewhere as a memorandum of the dead. The mazzēbāh set up by Jacob upon the grave of Rachel (Gen 35:20) was of this kind. This was the prevailing application of the term among the Phoenicians (see Cooke, Text-book of N. Sem. Inscrips. 60). To this category may also be reckoned the artificial pillar which Absalom set up for himself in his own lifetime (2 Sam 18:34).

(b) In a second group may be placed the stones set up to commemorate, or, in Biblical phrase, for a witness (Ex 15:18), monuments which Absalom set up for himself in his own lifetime (2 Sam 18:34), in particular the appearance or manifestation of a Divine being (a theophany) at a given spot. Such, in the present form of the story—for the probable original form, see § 4 below—was the stone which Jacob set up and anointed at Bethel (Gen 28:18; cf. 31:11 35th). Other examples of mazzēbāh, interpreted by the Heb. historians as commemorative monuments, are the stone Ebenzer of 1 S 7:6, and the cromlech (gilgal) set up by Joshua after the crossing of the Jordan 'for a memorial unto the children of Israel' (Jos 4:5).

(c) The third and most important class of mazzēbāh comprises the pillar-stones which stood beside the altar at every Canaanite sanctuary (see HIGH PLACE). For this class AV has the misleading term 'image' or 'colebs,' but RV has substituted 'special pillar,' which is nearer the original 'obelisk' in the margin. That the local sanctuaries, in most cases taken over from the Canaanites, at which the Hebrews worshipped J מָאזְבָּה (mazzēbāh) was provided with such pillar-stones, is evident both from their references in Hos 3:16 and their continuance in the later Law code (see Ex 34:22, Dt 12:2 10th), and by the Deuteronomist historians (1 K 14:19, 2 K 18:38) for Judah) 17th (Hebrew).

PILLAR.

—A special variety of pillar associated with idolatrous worship emerges in the later writings, the channānām and sun-pillars (AV 'images.' RV 'sun-images'). They were probably connected with sun-worship (Lagrange, Études sur le sacr. suntem. 331 f.).

3. The OT evidence for the mazzēbāh as an indispensable part of the furnishing of a Canaanite high place has been confirmed in a remarkable degree by the excavations of recent years, in the course of which pillar-stones of diverse shapes and sizes have been brought to light. Even to summarize the archaeological evidence would extend this article beyond due limits (see Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente [1907], 102-115; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 2 [1907], 321 ff.; Kittel, Studien zur heb. Arch. [1908], 126 ff.). It is sufficient to refer briefly to the magnificent series of mazzēbāh which formed part of the high place at Gezer (for full details see PEFS, 1903, 22 ff., and Macalister, Bible Sites &c., 54 ff.). Originally ten in number, eight of them are still standing in situ. They are unbroken boulders, simply set on end and supported at the base by smaller stones . . . and range in height from 10 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 5 in. The smaller dimensions are those of the second stone of the series, which is supposed to have been the original beth-el (see § 6) of the high place. The fact that this stone, alone of the group, has its top smooth and polished, as if by long-continued smoothing on the part of the worshipers, is greatly in favor of the view that large, and of the larger stones are provided with cavities, either at the top or in one side. This provision, which is also characteristic of the mazzēbāh found at Tannach and Megiddo, must evidently, as will presently appear, have some relation to the ritual of the worship of these ancient sanctuaries.

4. It now remains to deal with a question which may be thus formulated: What significance did the Canaanites, and the Hebrews after them, attach to the pillar and what place did they hold in the ancient cult?
This question can hardly be approached without a reference to the still unsolved problem of the religious significance of ‘standing stones’ all the world over. This world-wide phenomenon ‘must rest on some cause which was operative in all primitive religions’ (W. R. Smith, RS 200). It will probably be found, on consideration of all the conditions to be satisfied, that the desire to appease the spirit of the dead lies at the beginning, while the conception of the pillar-stone as a receptacle of the deity, beneath the altar dedicated to his worship, comes at the end of a long process of evolution. On this view, a stone, over or beside the grave of the dead, afforded, to the primitive mind, a converter of the departed spirit, when it chose to return to receive the homage and offerings of the living. The blood of the sacrifice was poured over the stone, and thus brought into contact with the indwelling spirit (cf. the cupping of the dolmens on the east of the Jordan and elsewhere). With this desire to do honour to the dead, the idea of keeping alive his memory by a conspicuous or upright stone was sooner or later associated. When and where higher ideas of the spirit world prevailed, the mazzebah became a memorial stone and nothing more, as in group (a) above.

The belief that a stone might become the abode of a deity marked a distinct step in advance. In Gn 38 it is admitted that we have a later adaptation of a Canaanite temple myth, which explained the origin of the sanctuary at Bethel, and especially the sanctity ascribed to the original Bethel, i.e., the abode of the deity. This would be co incidence, if the word in the original form the anointing of the stone was offering to the indwelling numen. The mazzebah shows an exact counterpart to this. The cavities in the other recently discovered mazzebahs, above mentioned, were doubt originally intended to receive similar offerings of blood, wine, oil, etc. (cf. Gn 35:2).

When this fetish worship had been outgrown, the mazzebah became merely a symbol or representation of the deity, who had his home elsewhere. The conical pillar standing in the court of the temple of Baal, as represented on the coins of Byblos, is an illustration of this higher conception. We may be sure that the worshippers of J considered the Canaanite mazzebahs in this light from the first. But the danger of contamination was great (see Hear Place, § 8), and the condemnation of the mazzebah is a recurring feature of all the law codes (ref. above).

5. Another unsolved problem may be mentioned in conclusion. What is the relation of the mazzebah to the altar? Shall we say, with the distinguished author of the Religion of the Semites, that the altar is a differentiated form of the primitive rude stone pillar, the mazzebah; or, with the latest investigator, that ‘the mazzebah is nothing else than the artificial substitute for the sacrificial stone’ (Kittel, op. cit. 129, 134)? If the views expressed in the previous section are correct, the second alternative offers the more probable solution. The pillar will then be a differentiated form of the most ancient altar (Altar, §§ 1, 2), the cause of the differentiation, as we have seen, being the desire to commemorate, as well as to appease, the deity. It is entirely occupied by the numerous ranges into which the Taurus here breaks, with the deep intersecting valleys. The name was applied to a definite political division, and nothing is known of the race inhabiting Pidisia. Until the time of Augustus they were wild mountaineers and brigands. PISPAH

Pisidia. The civilization of the district seems to have been effected by about A.D. 74. Until then it was dealt with as part of the province of Galatia, but at that date Vespasian attached a considerable portion of it to Phrygia Galatia, in which province no great military force was maintained.

Paul and Barnabas traversed the district twice in the first missionary journey (Ac 13:14). It was probably still a dangerous locality, and it is plausibly conjectured that St. Paul refers to it when he speaks of 'perils of robbers' (2 Co 11:32). The route which they followed is uncertain, but the most likely theory is that of Prof. Ramsay (see Church in Roman Empire, ch. ii. 2). That they went through Adada, the ruins of which bear the name Kara Bavo (i.e. Paulo). The dedication of the church to St. Paul may have been due to some surviving tradition of his passing by that way, but we are not informed that he preached at all in Pisidia. There is no evidence that Christianity made any progress in Pisidia before the time of Constantine. From the time of Diocletian the name Pisidia applied differently, namely, to a Roman province including Phrygia Galatica, Lycaonia, and the part of Phrygia round Apamea.

PISPAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:24).

PIT.—Of the dozen Heb. words, besides two Gr. words, that render 'pit' in EV, the following are the most important.

1. The term θωρίον is responsible for nearly half of all the O.T. occurrences. It is the usual word for the cistern, in which every house was supplied with water (see Cistern).

2. A second word rendered 'pit' (σασαύθ) seems to have denoted originally a pit in which, after concealing the mouth by a covering of twigs and earth, hunters trapped their game (Ex 19:4). Like the preceding, it is frequently used in a figurative sense of the under-world; so five times in Job 33 (RV).

3. A hunter's pit, denoted by pāchath, also supplied the figure of 1 S 24:22, and its parallels Jer 48:26, and La 3:24 RV—note the association with 'snares.' Such a pit served as a place of concealment (2 S 17:7) and of burial (19:8).

4. In Mt 12:18 RV rightly recognizes 'a pit for the winepress,' where the reference is to what the Mishna calls a 'cement-vat,' i.e. a pit dug in the soil for a wine- vat (cf. Mt 25:8, where the same expression is used); contrasted with the usual rock-basin vats (see WINE and STRONG DRINK, § 2).

PITCH.—See CENSUS.

PITCHER.—The earthenware jar (cf. La 4:4) earthen pitchers in which all the ages the women of Palestine have drawn and carried the water from the village well (20 24:15). In wealthy households this task was performed by a slave or other material (Mt 14:16, 17). For illustrations of water-jars found in ancient cemeteries, Macalister, Bible Sidelights, etc., fig. 22, and the works cited under House, § 6.

PHARMUAM. One of the 'treasure cities' built by the Israelites in Egypt (Ex 11:7). It is the Egyptian Pithom ('House of Pharaoh'), the site of which is now marked by Tell el-Maskhuta in the Wady Tumilat.

The researches of Naville and Petrie indicate that the city dates as far back as the 12th Dyn., and was supplied down to very late times. It was the capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt, and in it was worshipped a form of the sun-god under the name of Eton.

F. L. GRIFFITH.

PITHON.—A grandson of Merib-baal (1 Ch 8:9).

PITY.—This word is entirely synonymous with compassion, both in OT and NT, except, perhaps, in 1 Pt 3:3, where 'sympathetic' would better express the meaning of the original word (see RVm). Pity was regarded by OT writers as holding an essential place in the relations of God and His people (Is 63:5, cf. Jb 5:25). One of the ways in which this Divine feeling became active on their behalf reveals an incipient belief in the dealings of Jehovah with nations other than Israel; for He is often represented as infusing compassion for His chosen into the hearts of their enemies (cf. 1 K 8:6, 2 Ch 30:1, Ps 106:13, Ezr 9:1, Neh 11:1, Jer 42:5). An objective manifestation of the feeling of pity in the heart of God was recognized in the preservation of His people from destruction (La 3:8), and in the numerous instances which were regarded as the interventions of mercy on their behalf (cf. Ex 15:6, Nu 14:12, Dt 17:25, 2 Ch 34:1). The direct result of this benevolent disposition of Israelites was expected to display a similar disposition towards their brethren (cf. Mic 6:8, Is 11:1, Jer 21:10, Fr 19:7). They were not required, however, to look beyond the limits of their own race (Dt 24:20, Zec 7:10), except in the case of individual aliens who might at any time be living within their borders (see Ex 22:7, 23:10, 12:24, etc.).

In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant, Jesus inculcates the exercise of pity in men's dealings with each other, and teaches the sacredness of its character by emphasizing its identity with God's compassion for sinners (Mt 18:35, cf. Lk 15:31-32). In the parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:31-37, the same time, along with the other elements of justice, kindness, and charity, our Lord provided for by his compassion in the human heart, and by insisting that henceforth it could never be confined to the members of the Jewish nation (cf. the parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10:30-37, and the same time His own attitude to the thronging multitudes surrounding Him was characterized by profound pity for their weaknesses (Mt 15:29-30, Mk 8:27, Mt 9:23). Under His guidance, too, Divine pity for the world was transmuted into a personal love which centered in the Incarnation (Jn 3:4). Side by side with this development, and in exact correspondence with it, Jesus evolves out of human pity for frailty the more fundamental, ultimate, and transcendent basis of love, which He insists will be active even in the face of enmity (Mt 5:44, Lk 6:27).

PLAQUE OF EGYPT.—There are no many references in the Bible to the plagues outside the Book of Exodus. They are epitomized in Ps 78:30-43 and 105:22-32. In Ro 9:14-24 God's treatment of Pharaoh is dwelt upon, to show His absolute right to do what He will with the creatures of His own handiwork. And in Rev 8:9, 16 much of the imagery in the visions of the trumpets and the bowls is based upon the plagues—hail and fire (8:7 10:17), water becoming blood, and the death of the creatures that were in it (8:8 10:7, darkness (8:12 10:1), locusts (9:3), boils (16), frogs (19).

The narrative of the plagues demand study from three points of view: (1) their literary history; (2) the relation of the several plagues to natural phenomena; (3) their religious significance.

The sources.—So far as is possible to determine, the reason for the literary analysis reference must be made to

The analysis, on which critics are in the main agreed, is as follows:

1st Plague—According to J, this consisted in the smiting of the river by J, and the consequent death of the fish, causing the necessity of obtaining water by digging in the neighbourhood of the river. Nothing is here said of blood, but that is introduced in the next stage of development. In E the river is performed not directly by J, but by the exhalation of the fish and the river turned to blood. Two suggestions have been made as to the natural phenomena which might give rise to this state. In NK 4.9c, the river becomes discoloured from fragments of vegetable matter, which gradually turn to a dull red colour as the river rises to its height in August. This is confirmed by many travellers, who also speak of offensive odours emitted at the later stage. Others refer the reddening of the water to enormous quantities of minute organisms. Whatever may have been the actual cause, J comes the nearest to the natural fact; a fetid exhalation killed the fish, or in Hebrew language א"ל the river. And the ease with which the belief could arise that the water was turned to blood is illustrated in Ex 25.16, in P's final amplification, every drop of water in Egypt was turned to blood.

2nd Plague.—From whatever cause the river became blood, a mass of organic matter and of animal life would be collected. And these conditions would be suitable to the rapid multiplication of frogs. In J, J* foretells that he will Himself smite Egypt with frogs; in the ordinary course of nature the river shall swarm with frogs. In P, Aaron (as usual) is hidden by Moses to bring the plague by stretching out his staff. Plague of frogs were not unknown in ancient times; and Haggard tells of a plague in the upper Nile valley in modern times (Under Creasent and Star, p. 279). Frogs are most plentiful in Egypt in September.

3rd and 4th Plagues.—The mass of dead frogs collected in heaps (8q) would lead to the breeding of innumerable insects. In J, J* sends 'swarms of flies'; in the story of Aaron's 'standing' of the plague, 'all the dust of Egypt became mosquitos' (Ex 8.21). The 'mosquitos' cannot have been, according to any natural sequence, distinct from the 'swarms'; P particularizes the general statement of J. Stinging gnats of various kinds are common in Egypt in October. The insects come to maturity after the waters of the Nile inundation have receded, and the pools in which the larvae have lived have dried up. Note that in Ps 105:27, 'swarm' and the 'mosquitos' are coupled in one sentence; and Ps 78:26 omits the 'mosquitos' altogether.

5th and 6th Plagues.—The decomposing bodies of the frogs would produce pestilential effects; and both physiological and technical research shows that some insects, especially mosquitos, are a serious factor in the spread of disease. Thus the murain (J) is amply accounted for. In the preceding narrative J relates that the Israelites stayed away from the devastated districts. The insects, which spread disease, did not enter Goshen. The statement that the murain did not touch the cattle of the Israelites is also explained. P, on the other hand, departs from natural causes. Moses and Aaron flung a 'plague' of air, which became boils on man and beast. Cattle plagues, causing enormous mortality, are reported in Egypt. One such in A.D. 1842 killed 40,000 oxen.

7th Plague.—Thus far the series of plagues have followed one another in a natural sequence. But at this point a new series begins with a destructive thunderstorm, accompanied by hail. Such storms are rare in Egypt, but are not without example. Those which have been reported in modern times have occurred about January; and that is the point of time defined in Ps, 'the barley was in the ear, and the flax was in bud, but the wheat and the vetch... were not grown up.' Thus the cattle plague had lasted about two months and a half (Nov. to the middle of Jan.) when the storm came; and the first five plagues (reckoning 3, 4 and 5, 6 as duplicates) occupied a period of about five months.

8th Plague.—The atmospheric conditions which resulted in the storm also led to other plagues. A strong east wind (the sirocco) was sent by J*, and brought a dense mass of locusts (J). In E, Moses hastened by lifting his staff. The lightness and fragility of the locusts render them helpless before a wind (cf. Ps 105:35). And when the wind shifted to the west, they were completely swept away into the Red Sea (J); cf. J 29.
9th Plague.—Only a fragment of J's narrative has been preserved, which relates the effect of the 'darkness' upon Pharaoh. E, as before, says that it was due to the lifting of the staff by Moses in the form of the electrical wind 'hama'min. This is a S. or S.W. wind that is so named because it is liable to blow during the 25 days before and the 25 days after the vernal equinox ('ham'min = 60). It is often not so much a storm or violent wind as an oppressive hot blast charged with so much sand and fine dust that the air is darkened. It causes a blackness equal to the worst of London fogs, while the air is so hot and full of dust that respiration is impeded. . . . Denon says that it sometimes travels as a narrow stream, so that one part of the land is light while the rest is dark.' And he adds that three days is not an uncommon duration for the hama'min.

10th Plague.—Malignant epidemics have at all times been the scourge of busy lands; and it is worthy of note that many authorities state that pestilence is often without blame of the hama'min. In the Biblical narratives, however, all thought of a 'natural' occurrence has passed away. Only the firstborn are smitten, as a just retribution for Pharaoh's attempt to destroy the posterity of the Israelites.

3. Religious value.—This is manifold. Considered from the point of view of natural phenomena, the narratives teach the all-important truth that God's providential care of men is not confined to 'miracles' in the commonly accepted sense of the term, else were God's providential actions unknown to-day. The lifting of Moses' staff to bring the plagues, and his successive entreaties for their removal, teach that prayer is not out of place or unavailing in cases where natural laws can be co-ordinated and guided by God to bring about the wished-for result. And from whatever point of view the plagues are regarded, the same great facts shine through the narratives—that J is supreme in power over the world which He made; that He has an absolute right, if He so wills, to punish Pharaoh in order to show forth in him His power; that He does so, however, only because Pharaoh is impenitent, and consequently 'fitted for destruction,' for J is a God who hates sin; that if a man hardens his heart, the result will be as inevitable as results from the natural world—so inevitable that it may truly be said that J hardens his heart; that the sin of Pharaoh, and so of any other man, may entail sufferings upon many innocent men and animals; and finally, that J is mindful of His own elect and wills them to escape from 'noisesome places,' from the 'pestilence that walketh in darkness,' and 'the destruction that wasteth at noonday,' so that 'no plague can come near their dwelling' (Ps 91:12).

PLAIN.—This word is given by the AV as the equivalent of 8 different terms, 7 Heb. and 1 Greek: but is retained by the RV in the case of 4 only, all Hebrew.

(1) biculta is translated in the RV by 'plain' in Gn 11:34, Neh 6:1, Is 40:14, Ezk 32:28; Dt 3, Dn 3, but elsewhere by 'valley.' It generally designates a broad vale between hills; among the localities to which it was applied the most notable are the plain between Lebanon and Hermon ('the valley of Lebanon,' Jos 11:17, 12), and the plain of Edronelon ('the valley of Megiddo,' 2 Ch 30:4, Zec 12:10). (2) meqida is usually translated by 'plain' or 'plain country,' sometimes accompanied by the mg. 'table land' (Dt 34:3, Jos 13:1, 1 K 20:31 etc.); but in the poetical and prophetical books by 'even place' (Ps 26:8) or 'strength' (Is 60:21). It is primarily a level land; and the word, with the article, was specifically used of the high plateau on the E. of the Dead Sea. (3) 'arabah is ordinarily rendered in the AV by 'plain' ('plains') and 'desert' ('wilderness'), but in Jos 18:21 it is transliterated 'Arabah'. The RV renders it 'plain' only, but in the Hebrew text the opposite meaning is intended. (4) 'ar'bah is often confused in the RV with the preceding word by 'plain' (e.g. Jos 14:4, Is 33:3 etc.).

(1) 'ste'arim, unlike the preceding, characterizes not the surface of the locality to which it is applied, but its shape. It is used specifically of the low-lying part of the bed of the Jordan, where it flows into the Dead Sea, and possibly also of the depression S. of the same sea; and should be rendered by 'circle' rather than by 'plain' in Rev 19:12. It is also rendered by 'circle' in RVm by 'circle.'

(2) Of the other Heb. words sometimes rendered in the AV by 'plain,' 'shephelah' is uniformly translated in the RV by 'lowland,' and designates a group of 'low hills' on the E. of the Maritime Plain, which are separated from the hills of Judea and Ephraim by a series of valleys (Dt 10 Jos 18:14 etc.). It is also rendered by 'circle' (Gn 12:13 etc.).

The only passage where the word 'plain' is employed in the NT occurs in St. Luke's account (61) of one of our Lord's discourses, which, acc. to St. Matthew, was delivered on a mountain (Mt 5:); the RV substitutes a 'level place.'

G. W. WARD.

PLAIN, CITIES OF THE.—These five are in number, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela (or Zoar), situated in the plain ('circle') of Jordan. It is used specifically of the low-lying part of the first four of the above-named five which were overthrown by fire. Lot, the nephew of Abraham, who had made his home in Sodom, was warned by the Lord to withdraw from the city before it was destroyed. And he accordingly escaped to Zoar, which, at his entreaty, was spared the fate of its neighbours (Gn 18:19).

The situation of the five cities has been variously placed at the N. and the S. end of the Dead Sea. The Biblical statements are generally in favour of the former site, which is supported by the facts: (1) that the circle of the Jordan, which is also called the circle of the valley of Jericho (Dt 34:4), is appropriate only to the broad basins of the Jordan, near its mouth; (2) that Jericho is from near Bethel (Gn 13:13-14); (3) that the cities were N. of Hazazon-tamar (usually identified with En-gedi), since this place was passed by Aaraphel when he marched from Kadesh against the king of Sodom and his allies (Gn 14:6). On the other hand, (1) it is implied in Ezk 16:15 that Sodom was on the right (i.e. south) of Jerusalem, whereas if it were at the N. end of the Dead Sea it would be almost due E.; (2) Zoar, which must have been near the other cities (Gn 19:25), is placed by Josephus in Arabia (Bj iv. viii. 4), and by Eusebius at the opposite end of the Dead Sea to Jericho; (3) the name Sodom is generally identified with Jebel Usdum, a cliff of rock-salt near the S.W. corner of the Dead Sea; (4) Hazazon-tamar may be, not En-gedi, but the Tamar of Ezk 47:15, which has been identified with a locality 20 m. W.S.W. of the lake, and therefore on the road between Kadesh and Sodom if the latter were at its S. end. If this view is right, the site of the cities is probably the marshy flat es-Selekh, E. of Jebel Usdum. But the statement that the plain (or circle) of Jordan was near Jericho seems incompatible with a situation S. of the Dead Sea; and if the name Sodom survives in Jebel Usdum, that of Gomorrah seems to linger in that Jebel Darwiya, a place at the N.W. corner of the lake; so that, though the evidence is conflicting, the preponderant weight appears to support a S. site. (For the other view see Driver's art. 'Zoor' in Hastings' DB.

The nature of the catastrophe which destroyed the cities can only be conjectured. It may perhaps be suggested that the bitumen which abounds in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea was ignited by lightning, and that this caused an extensive conflagration in which the cities perished.

PLASTER. PLASTER.—I. See ARMS AND CRAFTS, § 3, Note 4.

2. The 'plaster' (Is 38:2; Amer. RV etc., 'plaster') which Isaiah prescribed for Hezekiah's boil was a fig-poultice, according to the text of 2 K 20:20, but the parallel passage above cited reads literally, 'let them take a cake of figs and rub it upon the boil.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PLANE.—Is 44* only; see ARMS AND CRAFTS, § 1. For 'plane tree' see CHESTNUT TREE, PINE TREE.

PLED.—In AV 'pled' always means 'to argue for or against a cause' as in a court of justice, never to 'pray' or ' beseech.' The substantive 'pleading' is used in the same sense in Job 13:1 'Hearken to the pleadings of my lips.'

PLEBGE.—The taking of a pledge for the re-payment of a loan was sanctioned by the Law, but a humanitarian provison was introduced to the effect that, when this pledge consisted of the large square outer garment or cloak called simial, it must be returned before nightfall, since this garment often served the only covering of the poor at night (Ex 22:28*, Dt 24:11; cf. Am 2*: Job 22:24*, Exk 18:1*, § 338). It was forbidden also to take the mill or the upper millstone as a pledge (Dt 24:6). In Is 56:9 the reference is to a pledge to be forfeited if a wager is lost (cf. RVm). In 1 S 17:24 'take their pledge' probably means 'bring back a token of their welfare' (Driver).

PLEIADES.—See STARS.

PLEROMA.—The translatior of a Gr. word which is generally rendered 'fulness' in the NT. πληρωμα is derived from the verb πληροω, which means either (a) 'to fill,' or (b) 'to fill up,' hence to 'fulfill.' The corresponding meanings of the noun are (a) 'fulness,' (b) 'fulfilment.'

1. πληρωμα—'that which fills.'—The word has this meaning in the LXX version of Ps 24* (cf. LXX Exk 5*, Dn 10*). quoted in 1 Co 10:18 'The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;' also in Mk 6:* (cf. sqm), where the fragments of the loaves are described as amounting to 'the fillings of twelve baskets.'

2. πληρωμα—'that which fills up.'—The word has this meaning in Mt 2*: (cf. Mt sqm) which refers to the effect of sewing a piece of undressed cloth on a worn garment: 'That which should fill it up (to πληρωμα) taketh from it, the new from the old, and a worse rent is made.' Lightfoot says the patch 'must be called' the πληρωμα 'not because it fills the hole, but because it is itself fulness or full measure as regards the defect.' His paraphrase is 'the completeness takes away from the garment, the new completeness of the old garment' (Com. on Col., Note on 'The meaning of πληρωμα'). The obscurity of this statement is removed by the active interpretation: the supplementary 'unfulfilled' patch taketh away from the original garment. The new piece used to fill up the rent 'tears itself away by contraction when wetted, taking a part of the old garment along with it' (Bruce, BEYI. 1:53).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

PLUMBLINE, PLUMMET.—The latter a diminutive of 'plumb,' from Lat. plumbum, 'lead,' and denotes the combined cord and weight, by suspending which against a wall it can be seen whether or not the latter is perpendicular. On the strength of Sec 4* (below) the word, the 'plumb,' not 'lead,' and AVm) it has been inferred that the Hebrew masons used a plumb-bob of lead, but the text of this passage is undoubtedly corrupt (Weih, Martl, Nowack). The Hebrew plummnet (2 K 21:19*, 22:37) more probably consisted of a stone (Is 44:* AV, but RV 'plummnet') suspended by a cord, the 'plumbline' of Am 7*: (cf. ARMS AND CRAFTS, § 3).

POETRY.—1. The presence of poetry in the Bible is natural and fitting. As it is the easiest form of composition which is easiest to memorize, whether in earlier stages of a literature, or later in the expression of common religious experience, it is natural that poetry should be preserved, and should be the preserve of Hebrew thought. As the form of literature which is concrete in its pictures, it is to be expected that the Hebrew people, to whom abstract thought and terminology are almost unknown, would employ it very freely.

2. In the literature of poetry, there exist not only the usual poetic differences, but also several peculiarities which are not in accordance with the general mode of human expression.

3. These peculiarities are brought about by the fact that, in Hebrew, there is no such thing as metrical poetry; the Hebrew metre must be merely a working hypothesis, and no complete system can be expected. There is not a commanding tradition of the pronunciation of the language, whether we think of vowels, syllables, or sounds.

4. We have no knowledge of Hebrew music of a character that would aid in determining the rhythm of the poems that were sung to its accompaniment.

5. Even the consonants at times are corrupt, in many places confusedly sewn, and there is almost no place where a form in Hebrew poetry is not used. So certain that a new scholar does not feel himself free to arise and emend it, and so win his spurs. Under these circumstances wide differences of opinion are possible, and even the existence of a hypothesis may not be expected.

6. Of poetry must be interpreted as poetry. To apply to it the same principles of exactness as are applied to prose is highly absurd; for in attempting to mark the differences between prose and poetry we must go below the form of language, and note that there is a distinctly poetic mode of thought and expression. The fact of experience are so grouped and wrought upon by the imagination as to become a new creation. The singer is not bound to time or place: he speaks in figure without knowing that it is a figure; he speaks in hyperbole because he does not have the sense of proportion. The poetry of the thought affects also the vocabulary of the singer; it modifies his word meanings, and affects his grammar. It alters his literary style, and there arises a distinction, that of literature as poetry—a study in which the attempt is made to discover how poetic forms express the poetical thought of the writer.

7. Among the poetry of the Bible we are concerned chiefly with the OT. The NT has a few poetical sections (see HYMN), but these are confessedly Hebrew in character, and do not call for independent treatment here. Compared with the OT, the NT has been very little poetry, for the obvious reason that Christianity, early and late, has largely found the Hebrew Psalter sufficient for its devotional purposes.

8. What are the characteristics of Hebrew poetry? They must be found from an inductive study of recognized poetical sections of the OT. A certain part of the Scriptures is clearly poetry; a certain other part is clearly prose. Between the two there is a great amount of literature, especially in the prophetic books, about which there is a difference of opinion. It is called poetry or prose according to the scholar’s definitions and his zeal in making emendations. There are prose passages which are products of real poetical imagination and artistic in form, but lacking in poetic rhythm. These doubtful passages should be left out of account until the essential principles of the poetry of the Hebrew people are determined, and then the test can be more properly applied to them. Such has not always been the mode of procedure on the part of scholars. Sometimes their aim seems to have been to discover new examples, whether by direct study or by inexact methods.

9. One cannot look very deeply into the subject without discovering the most extreme differences of opinion among scholars. There is abundant reason for this state of things. The very reasons which make the presence of poetry in the Bible natural and fitting, operate to make its definition difficult. The more natural the poetic expression of thought and feeling, the freer it will be from conventional regulation, and the less sharp will be the differences between the Biblical and the poetical literature of a people. And again, in Hebrew so many facts are lost upon which we are wont to place dependence in such a study, that until we get a new light from the natural and fitting purposes of Hebrew metre must be merely a working hypothesis, and no complete system can be expected. There is not a commanding tradition of the pronunciation of the language, whether we think of vowels, syllables, or sounds.

10. We have no knowledge of Hebrew music of a character that would aid in determining the rhythm of the poems that were sung to its accompaniment. Even the consonants at times are corrupt, in many places confusedly sewn, and there is almost no place where a form in Hebrew poetry is not used. So certain that a new scholar does not feel himself free to arise and emend it, and so win his spurs. Under these circumstances wide differences of opinion are possible, and even the existence of a hypothesis may not be expected. Of poetry must be interpreted as poetry. To apply to it the same principles of exactness as are applied to prose is highly absurd; for in attempting to mark the differences between prose and poetry we must go below the form of language, and note that there is a distinctly poetic mode of thought and expression. The fact of experience are so grouped and wrought upon by the imagination as to become a new creation. The singer is not bound to time or place: he speaks in figure without knowing that it is a figure; he speaks in hyperbole because he does not have the sense of proportion. The poetry of the thought affects also the vocabulary of the singer; it modifies his word meanings, and affects his grammar. It alters his literary style, and there arises a distinction, that of literature as poetry—a study in which the attempt is made to discover how poetic forms express the poetical thought of the writer.

11. Among the poetry of the Bible we are concerned chiefly with the OT. The NT has a few poetical sections (see HYMN), but these are confessedly Hebrew in character, and do not call for independent treatment here. Compared with the OT, the NT has been very little poetry, for the obvious reason that Christianity, early and late, has largely found the Hebrew Psalter sufficient for its devotional purposes.

12. The OT is not quite destitute of evidence that the Hebrews themselves sung without, any sort of Hebrew metre, between their prose and their poetry. They had special names for ‘proverb’ and ‘song’; they provided the Psalms with headings, some of which must have been musical directions; they made alphabetical poems, the several lines or stanzas of which begin with the letters of the alphabet in regular order. These lines and stanzas are of equal length and similar rhythm. Some of the poems inserted in the prose books are written and printed line by line, as Ps 89:4, Dt 32, Jr 5, 2 S 22; and for the three poetical books of the canon the Massoretes of later times provided a special system of pointing, thereby recognizing a distinction that must have had its basis in tradition, although the special pointing was not to preserve the poetical value.

13. Passing over, with the brief allusion already made, the peculiarities of thought, of vocabulary, and of grammar which poetry reveals, the features that one expects to find in OT poetry concern the line, and the stanza or strophe. (1) The line is so constructed that when it is read aloud it sounds agreeable to the ear by virtue of a distinct rhythm; this rhythm is repeated with little or no variation from line to line; the end of the line coincides with a break in the sense. The line is properly regarded as the unit of poetical expression. It is commonly of a length to be uttered with a single accent, and in Hebrew poetry this is the only metrical unit that accompanies it. The fundamental importance of the line makes it desirable to determine, if possible, what are the rules for its length, and what is the nature of the measure that gives the rhythmical effect so universally recognizable. The history of the search for a satisfactory system of metre cannot be given here. Classical models, with quantity as a basis, were long ago abandoned; one group of scholars discard the Massoretic accents, and attempt an explanation on the basis of Syriac metre, counting syllables, and accenting alternate ones; but the predominant theories are accentual.

Of these some have reckoned only the rises (accented syllables), and others count the falls also, permitting only a certain number of them to intervene between rises. This number is made to depend on the metrical value of the syllables, which, according to some scholars, is determined by the number of mora, or time units, which they contain.

It should be remembered that we are dealing with an ancient literature, and that this literature is an Oriental one. This creates a very strong presumption against an elaborate and minute system of metre. The Hebrew language was indeed dominated by tradition, which made it difficult to alter established practice; but in case the tradition was one of freedom on the part of the writer to construct his poem as he chose, it naturally operated to keep him free from the complicated rules which spring up in the later periods of the life of a language.

Until the contrary is shown on other grounds, it must be assumed that the Hebrew accent system, differing traditionally from Arabic and Syriac, differed from them actually; and as the traditional grammatical forms depend largely upon the accent, the natural inference is that it is an important feature of the language. If so, it may be supposed that it is important also in poetry. This view seems best to suit the facts as they are laid down; it makes the smallest demands in the way of departure from ordinary prose style, and that yields at the same time results reasonably satisfying to the poetic feel of the writer: the line was composed of a definite number of accents, or, as ordinarily each word had one accent, of a definite number of words. This view does not fit all the lines of every poem; but the possibility of exceptions at the will of the writer is a part of the theory. Moreover, the percentage of exceptions is very likely not greater than that of probable corruptions in the text. It is not to be counted as an exception when, in order to secure the regular number of accents, two short words must be pronounced as one, as is so often done for other reasons with the insertion of a maqeph (ֶך), or when a word exceptionally long and heavy must be pronounced with two accents for the same purpose.

The next higher unit is the group of lines taken together. The name strophe might be applied to all such groups, but it is usually reserved for the larger groups. The smallest group—the couplet or distich—exhibits the most characteristic feature of the poetry of the language, namely Parallelism, a name given by Lowth in 1753. The lines are so related to each other that there is a correspondence of parts, both in form and sense. It is not necessary to go to the theory of poetry, for it is nothing but the development of the idea of balance and euphony of parts which is found in elevac poesy style, especially such as is uttered orally. The mind more easily grasps the thought of a second clause, it fashioned like an earlier one. It is less occupied with the form, for that is already familiar. It is also, and doubtless for that very reason, more agreeable to the ear. What is desirable in prose, and often used there, becomes the rule in poetry, as one may easily understand when one considers the necessity of a uniform line for the sake of easy utterance with musical accompaniment. It is by its persistence and uniformity that parallelism certifies to the poetical nature of a passage. This parallelism is of the utmost importance in determining the meaning of a verse. While its adoption as a poetical form has a logical basis, once it be accepted, the whole composition, and it cannot fail to operate to modify the thought as well as the form.

What would otherwise appear to be a careful choice of synonyms, for example, perhaps to secure dimiteric effect, may be simply the operation of this principle. So the unusual position of a word in a clause may be traceable to this rather than to a desire to secure special emphasis. Several distinct forms of parallelism have been observed.

(a) Synonymous parallelism.—The thought of the two lines is synonymous, and so are the several terms by which the thought is expressed.

How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed?

And shall I defy whom Jahweh hath not defied?

—(Nu 23:14).

(b) Antithetic parallelism.—The second line expresses the same real truth as the first, but it does it antithetically. The form is truly parallel, and one member of the lines is synonymous, the other two contrasted. This is especially common in proverbs.

A wise son maketh a glad father,

But a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.—(Pr 10:1).

(c) Slant-like or ascending rhythm.—The thought of the first line is repeated in part, or, if entirely, more briefly, so that the second line can add a further item of thought, thus rising above the parallel line.

Till thy people pass over, Jahweh,

Till thy pestilence pass over, which thou hast purchased.—(Ex 15:16).

(d) Synthetic parallelism.—The thought of the second line is entirely different or supplementary, none of the first being repeated. The distich remains in parallelism, for the two lines correspond in form.

Answer not a fool according to his folly.

Lest thou also be like unto him.—(Pr 26:13).

Other varieties are often singled out for discussion, and it will not be supposed that a typical form is always to be discovered. The lines and combinations are very numerous, and the study of them is full of interest and novelty.

The two-line group, or distich, has been considered above, as the simplest in which parallelism can be observed. It is also the form which is most used in the Bible. When, however, the lines are grouped in a similar way as are the single lines of the distich. It often occurs that several lines are grouped together so regularly that a stanza or strophe is recognizable. It may be marked off by a line repeated as a refrain, or by a special initial letter, or in alphabetical poems; but such indications are not of common occurrence. Absolute regularity in length is not often found, and scholars often attempt to secure it by assuming the loss or insertion of a couplet or two. There is also no specific principle distinct from the parallelism above mentioned, to form the basis of a strophical division. It seems likely that the lines are not to be considered as an essential feature of Hebrew poetry, like the stanzas of a hymn that is to be sung; but that the grouping is entirely optional and ordinarily logical—a literary feature. Rhyme and sequence are known in the language, but are not used persistently throughout a poem, and cannot be anticipated or reduced to rule when present.

3. By far the greater part of the OT poetry is of a religious and ethical, as the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job (see art.). Outside of these books, however, is an interesting and by no means small amount of poetry which the Bible student may profitably study for its literary and historical value.

In family and social life, poetry evidently had a large place. Marriage occasions furnished the very best opportunity for the composition of songs, and for their execution to the accompaniment of music. Such are the songs in the Book of Canticles. The wedding song evidently furnished the model of the passage 1 Sa 18:19.

Lamentation for the dead is also an evidence. The finest example is that of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sa 11--37). A part of a lament by him over Abner is found in 2 S 3:36--37. The tenderness and fitness of these utterances are very different from the stereotyped dinges of which there is notice in Jer 9:19 (cf.). The character of these may be seen from the Book of Lamentations.
where the poet laments over the city as over a person.
The first four of the five poems of this book are alphabetic, being composed in the form of a hymn, which is often emphasized by the choice of a peculiar rhythm, known as the elegiac rhythm. There is a long line, commonly broken by a casura. The first half contains three beats or rises, the ordinary length of the Hebrew line. The second half has but two. In ordinary rhythm it would have three, and would form a second line in parallelism with the first. The same rhythm is detected in a few passages of similar import in the prophets. There are allusions, too numerous to cite, to the use of songs at feasts of various kinds, and at the drunken revels against which the prophets protest. Nu 21:15 is claimed to be an example of the songs often sung to celebrate the discovery of a spring or the successful digging of a well.
The religious use of poetry is scarcely to be distinguished from its national use. For when Jaltiel could be addressed as the Favourite of the Shub, it might be compared to incite or reward bravery could not fail to make use of religious as well as of patriotic emotions to secure their end. See, for example, Jg 5.

POMEGRANATE (rimmn, Arab. rimmSn).—Tree and fruit (Ex 23:9; Nu 33:30, 31; Dt. 20:4; Is 1:16, 17; 1 K 7:11, 20, 21, 2 K 25:17, 2 Ch 31:4, 42, Ps 1:26, 71:2, Jer 52:21, Hag 2:14). The pomegranate (Punica granatum) is one of the familiar fruit trees of the OT; it is often a shrub, but may be a tree of a trunk (1 S 14:4), it was much admired for its beauty (Ca 4:6-9), and its flower was copied in ornamentation (Ex 23:9, 1 K 7:11). Its dark green leaves and brilliant scarlet blossom make it a peculiarly attractive object, especially when growing in orchards (Ca 4:6-9), mixed with trees of other shades of green; its buds develop with the tender grapes (Ca 7:5), and the round, reddish fruit, with its brilliant crimson, juicy seeds, ripens at the time of the vintage. The fruit is a favourite food, and the bark a valued astringent medicine.

POND.—See Pool.

PONTUS.—In the earliest times of which we have any account, this name, meaning 'sea' in Greek, was used by Greeks to indicate vaguely country bordering on or near the Black Sea. From its importance for the corn supply of Greece, the Black Sea and the land around it came to be known as the sea par excellence. As time went on the term gradually became confined to the country to the south of the Black Sea. It was not till about B.C. 302 that a kingdom was here formed. In that year, consequent upon the troubles due to the early death of Alexander the Great, a certain Mithridates was able to carve out for himself a kingdom beyond the river Halys in N.E. Asia Minor, and about B.C. 281 he assumed the title of king. It is not possible to define the exact extent of the territory ruled by this king and his descendants; but it is certain that it included part of the country previously called Cappadocia, some of the mountain tribes near the Black Sea coast, and part of Paphlagonia; and also certain that its extent varied from time to time. The Mithradatean dynasty lasted till B.C. 63. In the preceding year the kingdom ceased to exist, and part of it was incorporated in the Roman Empire under the name Pontus, and this district henceforth constituted one of the combined province of Cappadocia-Pontus, which was put under one governor. The remaining portions of the old kingdom were distributed in other ways. The civil wars helped Pharnaces, a son of the last Mithridates, to acquire the whole of his father's kingdom, but his brief reign ended in defeat by Julius Cesar (B.C. 47). The narrowed kingdom of Pontus was re-constituted by Mark Antony in B.C. 39, and given in B.C. 36 to Polemon, who founded a dynasty, which ruled over this kingdom till A.D. 63. The daughter of this Polemon, Queen Tryphanna, is mentioned in the apocryphal book, The Acts of Paul and Thecla, as having been present at a great Imperial festival at Pisidian Antioch in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, whose blood-relation she was. This statement is no doubt founded on fact. These Acts relate that she protected the Christian maiden Thecla, and was converted, and through her influence the connection between Polemon and the church of Pisidian Antioch was strengthened. The Cappadocian polem archbishop Thecla became a favourite of Thecla, and was king of part of Cilicia that he (later than A.D. 63) married Berenice.

In the 1st cent. A.D., therefore, the name Pontus had various significations, and a strict nomenclature was not available for its distinction. The province was Pontus, Polemon's kingdom was Pontus Polemonianus (incorporated into province Galatia A.D. 63), the part of Mithridates' old kingdom which province Galatia (p. 32-2) was Pontus Galaticus, and the region that lay E. of Pontus Polemonianus, between the Black Sea and Armenia, were known as Pontus Cappadocius. (Into the difficult question of the institution of this fourth district we cannot enter here.) It is also to be mentioned that an inscription has recently been found referring to one Aquila at Sinope, one of the principal cities of the Roman province Pontus. The only remaining NT reference to Pontus (Ac 27:5) is over easily explained. It must be left uncertain whether the name Pontus there is used strictly of the province, or more loosely of the kingdom, or of the kingdom and the province together.

Christianity was not brought to Pontus by St. Paul, if we can trust the silence of Acts, and it is best to do so. From 1 Peter it is clear that about the year 80, the probable date of the Epistle, there were Christians in that country, and these converts from paganism to Christianity probably came there from the Asian coasts or from Rome. There is a well-known and valuable testimony to the prevalence of Christianity in this province, belonging to the period A.D. 111-113. At that time the younger Pliny was governor of the province Bithynia-Pontus, and addressed inquiries to the Emperor Trajan on the manner in which Christians ought to be treated by the administration. He reports that many men and women of all ages and of every rank in town and country were Christians, and that some had abandoned the faith 20 or 25 years before. After Pliny's time Pontus continued to be a stronghold of Christianity. From here came the famous Marcion (born about 120 at Sinope), and of this province Aquila, translator of the OT into Greek, was a native.

A. SOUTIN.
POOL, POND

POOL. POND.—*ágam, a collection of standing water, is distinguished from *migqeq, a place into which water flows, or is led (Ex 7:19). The former may denote the water left in the hollows when the inundation of the Nile subsides, and the latter, reservoirs (cf. Gn 11:5, Lv 11:38). AV tr. *ágam 'pond,' in Ex 7:19; 8: RV uniformly 'pool' (Is 14:23 etc.), *bérakah (2 S 2:14, 46 etc.) is the same, as *goph, an artificial pool or tank. It is applied to great reservoirs constructed to furnish water for cities, or for irrigation, like that at Gibbon (2 S 2:14), those at Hebron (2 S 4:6), and at Jerusalem (2 K 18:7), etc.; and also to large basins, such as lead fountains to the courts of the houses in Damascus. The usual Hebrew equivalent is kolométhah, the word used in NT for the pools of Bethesda and Siloam (Jn 5:9). In Is 19:19 read with RV 'all that work for hire shall be given in soul.' See also Ezek. W. EWING.

POOR.—See POVERTY.

POPULAR (lubhāb [root meaning 'white'], Gn 30:7, Rv 'storum'; Hos 4:6). The Heb. is very similar to Arab. lubāba meaning 'storum,' which is the LXX tr. in Gn 30:7; on the other hand, in Hos 4:6 the LXX has labāh ['white'], i.e. the 'poplar.' The poplar may easily have furnished Jacob with white rods. There are two kinds of poplar in Syria, Populus alba and P. euphratica; they both flourish round Damascus, where their branches are much used in making supports for the mud roofs. E. W. G. MANTELMAN.

POSITA.—The fourth son of Haman (Est 9).

PORCH.—This word is a doublet of 'portico' (from Lat. porticus), both originally denoting a covered entrance to a building. When the front of this entrance is supported on pillars, the porch becomes a portico. porticus, like the Gr. staust, was extended to signify a roofed colonnade running round a public building such as a temple, or enclosing an open space, like the cloisters of a medieval monastery. The most famous 'porches'—a sense in which the word is now obsolete—were the 'painted porch'—the Porch par excellence—at Athens, and Solomon's porch at Jerusalem (see below).

In the OT a porch is named chiefly in connexion with the Temple (see below), or with the palace (wh. see) of Solomon. The pillars of the temple of Dagon at Gaza which Samson pulled down, or rather slid from their stone bases, were probably two of those supporting the portico, as ingeniously explained by Macalister, Bible Side Notes, etc., ch. vii. (see Hums, § 5). The word rendered 'porch' in Jg 3:5 is of quite uncertain meaning and of doubtful authority.

In the NT, in connexion with the trial of Jesus, mention is made of a 'porch,' or, as RvM, 'forecourt' (Mc 14:38), as distinguished from the 'court' (v. 48 RV) of the high priest's palace, for which Mt 27:24 (Rv 'porch') has a word elsewhere rendered 'gate.' In both cases the covered gateway leading from the street to the court is probably meant.

Solomon's porch (Jn 10:23, Ac 2:46) was a covered colonnade or cloister running along the east side of the Temple enclosure (see Temple, § 1 (c), where the triple colonnade of Herod's temple—the 'Royal Porch' of Josephus—is also discussed. For details see Ezra, Nov. 1908, p. 58). A similar colonnade enclosed the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5).

PORCUPINE.—See BITTERN.

PORPOISE.—Ex 22:12, Ezk 18:4 RvM. See BADGERS' SKINS.

PORT.—The 'port' of Neh 2:16 is a 'gate,' the same Heb. word being translated 'gate' in the same verse. Cf. Ps 24:6. A version of Ps 9:4 ('Within the ports of the daughter of Zion.') PORTER in RV has always the sense of 'doorkeeper' (see Hums, § 6) or 'gatekeeper' (see Fortification and Siegecraft, § 6, end.). In Jn 10:9 the porter is the man left in charge of a sheepfold by the shepherd shepherds whose sheep are there housed for the night. In private houses the doorkeeper might be a woman (2 S 9:3 as restored from Lxx, Ac 12:24). In OT, however, porters are most frequently named in the Books of Chron., Ezek., and Neh. in connexion with the Temple (1 Ch 25:1 onwards), where they had charge of the various gates (see Temple, § 6, Priests and Levites, § 12:2),. The same word is rendered doorkeeper in Ac 1:26, 15:32, and in several other places in RV (15:18 etc.). It is to be regretted that this term was not substituted throughout, as in Ps 84:10 the original is different, and should probably be rendered: 'I had rather be [standing or lying] at the threshold in the house of God.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

POSIDONIUS.—An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas (2 Mac 14:4).

POSSESSION.—1. Meaning of the term.—The central idea in the word is the coercive seizing of the spirit of a man by another spirit, viewed as superhuman, with the result that the man's will is no longer free but is controlled, often against his wish, by this indwelling person or power. In Scripture the idea is associated with both phases of moral character; and a man may be possessed by Christ or the Holy Spirit, or by the devil. Later usage has confined the word to the devil, though not exclusively, to possession by an evil spirit. Of the better possession there are several kinds of instances in both Testaments. It is sometimes represented, according to the more materialistic view, as early as the seizure of a man by an external power, though the internal occupation is implied, and the control is none the less complete (1 S 10:6, Is 61:1; cf. the frequent 'the hand of the Lord was upon' him, 1 K 18:20; so of an evil spirit, 1 S 18:4). The inspiration of the prophets is in some places described as effected by a supernatural agency occupying the seat of personality within the prophet, and controlling or uncontroling him (Lk 1:1, 1 P 1:1, 2 P 1:1, 2 Es 14:2). In personal religion not only is the transference of authority within to the indwelling Christ spoken of (Jn 17:7, Gal 2:20), but the Holy Spirit also may seize and possess a man (Ac 2, Lk 1:1, Ro 8, Eph 5, and should rule in him (Eph 4:7). But this involves a welcome and glad submission to the sway of a spirit within, though personal wishes may be thwarted or crossed (Ac 16:9). Demonic possession, on the other hand, is characterized by the reluctance of the sufferer, who is often conscious of the hateful tyranny under which he is held and against which his will rebels in vain.

2. Features of demonic possession.—In such possession two features may generally be traced. It is allied with and yet distinct from physical disease, and there is almost always something abnormal with respect to the psychical development or defect of the sufferer. It is given as the explanation in cases of imbecility (Mt 9:25, Lk 11:14), of deafness and dumbness (Mt 9:28), of blindness and dumbness (Mt 12:22), of curvature of the spine (Lk 13:11), and of epilepsy (Mt 12:22). Elsewhere such complaints are referred to as mere disease, and no suggestion is made that they were caused or complicated by the action of an evil spirit (Mt 15:20, Mk 7:23, Lk 10:16). Sometimes possession and disease are even distinguished by different enumeration (Mt 10:1, Mk 16, Lk 6:17, 15:22); and once at least epileptics (or lunatics) and palsied occupy a different category from demoniacs (Ac 28:2). The right conclusion seems to be that the same disease was in some cases ascribed to ordinary causes and in others to possession, the distinguishing feature being possibly intractability due to the violence of permanence of the symptoms. Evidence that the disorder was at the same time of a psychical or nervous character is plentiful. According to Arab belief, something abnormal in the appearance, such as a strange look in the eyes or an unusual catching in the throat, was an invariable symptom, and both are indications.

of nervous excitement or alarm. The will was paralyzed (Mk 9:4), and the sufferer was under the influence of illusions (Jn 10:1). He identified himself with "the demons, and was averse to deliverance (Mk 1:25). In such cases Jesus does not follow His usual course of exciting faith before He heals, but acts as though the sufferer were not in a fit state to trust, and must be dealt with fearfully first of all. Some confident and majestic word is spoken, of which the authority is immediately recognized; and only then, when the proper balance of the mind has been restored, is an attempt made to communicate religious blessing.

3. Our Lord's belief.—Two opinions have been held as to whether Christ actually shared the current views of His day as to demonic possession. That He seemed to do to this discipline of the xdungeon and implicitness, represented an argument to the view of His, and it is generally held that Christ never entangled His teaching with contemporary ideas to the question at issue. That He adopted different methods from those followed by professional exorcists whose success He expressly exalts (Mk 3:15), is exactly what His difference in person from them would cause to be expected, but does not necessarily involve a difference in theory. To humour a patient by falling in with the hallucinations, or not a correct description of Christ's procedure; for in many of the instances the treatment is preternatural and stern (cf. Mk 9:4, where the sufferer was not consulted, and any comforting followed the cure; so elsewhere), and the devil spirits are represented after expulsion as actual and still capable of mischief (Mk 5:7). Christ's own language is itself significant. He makes the current belief the basis of argument (Lk 11:19), attributes the power to cast out demons to the Son of Man, and recognizes the possession as resident in others (Mk 9:43, Mt 7:22), without a single intimation that He was speaking in metaphor, and that His hearers were blundering in assuming that He meant what He said.

(b) The real explanation is to be found in quite another direction. His humanity was true and complete, the humanity of the age into which He was born; and His Divine attributes He 'emptied himself' (Ph 2:6, 2 Co 8:13), except to the extent to which His perfect human nature might or the organ of their manifestation (1 Cor. 2:8, 11; Jn 20:19). It is the Incarnation, 610 ft.). In virtue of this voluntary self-limitation, His humanity was not lifted clear of the intellectual atmosphere of His time; but He shared the conceptions and views of the people amongst whom He became incarnate, though His sinlessness and the well-comes of the Holy Spirit aided His human intelligence, removing some of the worst hindrances to correct thinking, but not making Him in any sense a prodigy in advance of His age in regard to human knowledge. Accordingly, He avoids the extreme and exaggerated demonology into which an unduly extended animistic interpretation of the universe was leading in His day. But He was not unable to use such interpretations as were available, and to question the interpretation itself. At a later date there was a disposition to ascribe all diseases to possession, to multiply evil spirits beyond calculation, and to invest them with functions and activities of the most grotesque kind. Christ's attitude was altogether different, though He consistently talks and acts upon the assumption that evil spirits were no creatures of the fancy, and that possession was a real state of human affairs. That such an assumption was wrong it is outside the province of the real sciences to assert or to deny; and there are some considerations that make the conclusion at least probable, that personal spirits of evil exist, and are responsible for the mental activities of human beings.

POTIPHAR.

On 36, a high Egyptian official in the story of Joseph. The name is perhaps a deformation of Potiphars (wh. see) or an unsuccessful attempt to form an Egyptian name on the same lines. Potiphar seems to be entitled 'chief cook' (EV 'captain of the guard'), and likewise sarts, 'eunuch of Pharoh. But the former title 'cook' may be only a mark of high rank; persons described as royal tasters in the New Kingdom were leaders of expeditions, investigators of criminal cases, judges in the most important trials, etc; as yet, however, there is little indication that eunuchs were employed in Egypt even at a later period; so this is the title. The official title of the man of Hebrew word sarts is actually found attached to the names of Persian officers in Egypt. Joseph was sold to Potiphar, on whose wife's accusation he was cast into the king's prison (in Potiphar's house), to which Pharoh afterwards committed his chief butler and chef. The office thus held by Potiphar cannot yet be precisely identified in Egyptian documents. In the passage 41a and the repeated description of Joseph's wife, the forms of the names and the title of the priest are much more precisely Egyptian.
POTTERY

POTTERY.—The artificer (yōšūr) is first named in 2 S 173. This implies the use of pottery at an earlier period. The ancient Egyptians were familiar with its manufacture (Wilk. Anc. Egyp. ii. 190 ff.), and Israel could not be entirely ignorant of it. During their nomad life, however, such brittle material would be little serviceable, and its use would be reduced to a minimum—skins for water, wine, etc., being used in use at all times, down to the present day (Gn 214, Jg 41, 1 S 169 etc.); but we also find the earthenware pitcher, or jär (kød), similarly employed (Gn 24, Jg 70, 1 K 172 [EV 'barrel'] etc.). Only after settlement in Palestine was the art developed to any extent by Israelites. In the later writings the potter is frequently referred to (Ps 23, 82 20). The later had first kneaded the clay with his feet (Is 41), then shaped the vessel on the wheel (Jer 18). This consisted of two wooden disks attached to a perpendicolar axle, the larger being below the work-table. The potter turned with his feet. The vessel was then fired in an oven (Sir 38). In later times the art of glazing was also understood, oxide of lead ('silver dress'), obtained in refining silver, being used for this purpose (Ps 29, Sir 39). In Jeremiah's day the potters seem to have had a stable—by the 'gate of potter's fields' (Jer 18 196, RV 'gate Harshîth'), probably in the neighbourhood of the clay pits, where they offered their wares for sale.

The thought of the potter moulding his clay at will is implicit in many passages where yōšūr, 'to form,' is the verb used (Gn 21, Ps 339 96 etc.), and is made explicit in such passages as Is 44 4, 47 2 10 9 etc.

The reading el ḫāyāṭîr ('Syr.'), 'into the treasury,' is preferred in Zec 11 by many scholars and RV in the 'treasury, unto the potter.' The passage is one of great difficulty. What is known of the potter's art in Palestine is due mainly to the work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and especially to that carried out by Flanders Petrie, Bliss, and Macalister, at Tell el-Hesi—possibly the ancient Laqish—and elsewhere, from 1869 onwards. The result of their investigations, and discussions by other scholars, are found in the PEFSt; Petrie's Tell el-Hesi; Bliss's Mound of Many Cities; Excavations in Palestine, by Bliss, Macalister, and Wünsch, etc.

Petrie distinguishes three periods of ancient pottery.

1. Amorite, pre-historic, where the shape and markings of the vessels seem to show that they were moulded on the old leathern vessels. 2. Phoenician, rough and porous in character, often with painted ornamentation, of which possibly metal vessels furnished the models. This may be dated from B.C. 1400 to 1000. 3. Jewish, in which Assyriote and Phoenician styles are blended; this apparently belongs to the time of the later monarchy. On many jar handles are legends stamped in characters resembling those of the Siloam inscription. Along with the Jewish, Greek types of pottery are found, 'chubby ribbed bowls, and large amphorae with loop handles. The red and black figured ware was also imported' (Bliss, in Hastings' DB iv. 27).

Where pottery of the Seleucid age, with Greek names stamped on the handles, or Roman pottery, ribbed amphorae, and tiles stamped with the stamp of the tenth legion,' or Arab glazed ware, is found, sites may be dated with approximate accuracy. But for these and other data furnished by remains of pottery must be used with caution. Thus certain jars found at a great depth below the surface at Jerusalem, undoubtedly belonging to a comparatively early time, closely resemble some of those in use at the present day (Cowack, Heb. Archaeol. in W. Ewing.

POTTER'S FIELD.—See ACKELDAMA.

POUND.—See Money, § 7; Weights and Measures, § 3.

POVERTY.—I. In the OT.—The character and degree of the poverty prevalent in a community will naturally vary with the stages of social development through which it successively passes. In periods of prosperity poverty naturally decreases (e.g., Is 22 23); in periods of theocratic nationhood, poverty was not necessarily felt, and its extremes were more marked, where city-life and commerce have grown up than where the conditions of life are purely nomadic or agricultural.

The causes of poverty referred to in the OT (apart from those due to individual folly) are specially (a) bad seasons, involving failure of crops, loss of cattle, etc. (cf. 2 K 5 27, Neh 9); (b) raids and invasions; (c) land-grabbing (cf. Is 5); (d) over-taxation and forced labour (cf. Jer 22 24); (e) extortionate usury, the opportunity for which was provided by the necessity for meeting high taxation and the losses arising from bad harvests (cf. Neh 6 13).

In the earlier period, when the tribal system with its complex of clans and families flourished, poverty was not acutely felt. Losses, of course, there were, arising from bad seasons, invasion, and pestilence; we hear of a famine, freeing the poor (2 S 12 4); but there was little permanent poverty. Matters were maintained in a state of equilibrium so long as the land-system, under which all free Israelitish families possessed a patrimony, remained in working order. It is significant that in the earlier legislation of JE (cf. esp. the Ten Commandments, Ex 20 17, and the 'Book of the Covenant,' Ex 20 23 239) poverty is apparently not mentioned, while in the later (cf. e.g., Is 18, Am 4 6, Zec 9) the Deuteronomistic legislation (7th cent.) bears eloquent testimony to the prevalence of poverty under the later monarchy (cf. Dt 10 17 13 14 14 15, 23 20 24 8 38 14), and in one famous sentence predicts its permanence ('the poor shall never cease out of the land,' 15).

The classes of poor more particularly mentioned are widows, orphans, and the 'southerners,' or resident strangers, who possessed no landed rights (27 18). The Levites also are specially referred to in Deut. as an impoverished class (cf. 12 18),—a result of the centralization of worship in the one sanctuary at Jerusalem. All classes of the poor are the objects of special solicitude and consideration in the Mosaic legislation, particularly in the Priestly Code (cf. e.g. Lv 5 7 19 15 etc.).

For a long time after the Exile and Return the Palestinian community remained in a state of miserable poverty. It was a purely agricultural society, and suffered much from contracted boundaries and agricultural depression. The 'day of small things' spoken of by the prophet Zechariah (4 16) was prolonged. A terrible picture of devastation (produced by a locust plague) is given by the prophet Joel (ch. 1), and matters were aggravated during the last years of Persian rule down to 332, and by the conflict between the Seleucids and Ptolemys for the possession of Palestine which raged for considerably more than a century (322–198). It is significant that in the Psalms the term 'poor' or 'lowly' has become synonymous with 'pious'. During the earlier part of the post-exilic period the wealthy Jewish families for the most part remained behind in Babylon. In the later period, after the conquests of Alexander the Great (from 322), prosperous communities of Jews grew up in such centres as Antioch and Alexandria (the Greek 'Dispersion'). Slowly and gradually the Palestinian community grew in importance; for a time under the Maccabees there was a politically independent Jewish State. A certain amount of material prosperity ensued. Jerusalem, as being a centre of pilgrimage, received large revenues from the Jewish pilgrims who thronged to it: a Temple-tax swelling the resources of the priests. Taxation was at first voluntary, and in the Priestly Code this is the unrealized ideal of the Jubilee Year (Lv 25, cf. Dt 15:1–11). All these provisions were supplemented by almsgiving, which is mentioned in Deut. 15:10, 11 and has been one of the most important parts of religious duty (see ALMS, ALMSGIVING).

2. In the NT.—In the NT period conditions were not essentially altered. The exactions of tax-collectors seem to have been acutely felt (notice esp. the collection 'publican' and 'sinners', but almsgiving was strongly inculcated as a religious duty, the early Christians following in this respect the example set by the synagogue (cf. Ro 12:14, and St. Paul's collection for the poor of Jerusalem (Ro 15:26). The early generations of Christians were drawn mostly from the poorer classes (slaves or freedmen), but the immediate disciples of our Lord belonged rather to what we should call the lower middle class—such as the Galilean fishermen, owning their own boats, or tax-collectors. It should be noted that in the Gospels (e.g. in the Beatitudes) the term 'poor' sometimes possesses a religious connotation, as in the Parable of the Rich Man.

G. H. Box.

POWER.—In general the word means ability for doing something, and includes the idea of adequate strength, power, skill, resources, energy, and effort, either material, mental, or spiritual, to effect intended results. Strictly speaking, there is no real power or authority in the universe but that which is ultimately of God (Ps 62:1, Jn 1:1, Ro 13:1). But this Almighty One has originated innumerable subordinate powers, and some of these are possessed of ability to perform acts contrary to the will and commandments of the Creator. And so we may speak of the power of God, or of man, or of angel, or of demon, or of powers inherent in things inanimate. Inasmuch as in the highest and absolute sense 'power belongeth unto God,' it is fitting to include under this power all those as appear in 1 Ch 29:1, Mt 6:3. In Mt 26:6 the word 'power' is employed for God Himself, and it is accordingly very natural that it should be often used to denote the various forms of God's activity, especially in His works of creation and redemption. Christ is thus the power of God both in His Person and in His gospel of salvation (1 Co 1:24, 21, Ro 1:4). The power of the Holy Spirit is also another mode of the Divine activity. By similar usage Simon the sorcerer was called 'the power of God' which is called Great' (Ac 8:9), i.e. a supposed incarnation of the power of God. The plural powers is used in a variety of meanings. (1) In Mt 7:6, Lk 10:4, Ac 2:38, 'powers,' or 'mighty works,' along with 'signs and wonders,' are to be understood as miracles, and were concrete manifestations of the power of God. (2) The powers of the heavens' (Mt 24:3, Mk 13:9) are understood by some as the forces inherent in the sun, moon, stars, and other phenomena of the heavens, by others of which they 'rule over the day and over the night' (Jn 1:4); by others these heavenly powers are understood to be the stary hosts themselves conceived as the armies of the heavens. (3) Both good and evil angels are designated by the terms 'principalities and powers' in such passages as Eph 1:10, 18, Col 1:16, 20, 1 P 32. The context of each passage must show whether the reference is to angels or demons. (4) In Ro 13:3 civil magistrates are called 'the higher powers' because of their superior rank, authority, and influence as officers ordained of God for the administration of justice among men (cf. Lk 12:14, Tit 3:1). (5) The 'powers of the age to come' (He 6:9) are best understood of all supernatural gifts and spiritual forces which have to do with the consummation of the Kingdom of God, of which Jesus is the Mediator (cf. He 2:8). They include the 'greater works' (Jn 13:20) which Jesus promised His disciples they should do after His going out to the Father and sending them the Spirit of truth. See AUTHORITY, KINGDOM OF GOD.

POWER OF THE KEYS.—In ecclesiastical history the phrase is associated primarily with the so-called 'Privilege of Peter,' upon which the whole structure of Papal primacy was built, and also with the delegated authority of an official priesthood to pronounce sentence of the absolution or the retention of sins. The fundamental passage concerned is Rev 21:20: 'and the foundations of the wall of the city shall have twelve keys. He should be noted that in the Gospels (e.g. in the Beatitudes) the term 'poor' sometimes possesses a religious connotation, as in the Parable of the Rich Man. of the keys on these occasions. It was its believing confession of Christ that had gained him the privilege, and both in Jerusalem and at Caesarea it was by a renewed confession of Christ, accompanied by a testimony to the truth regarding Him as that had been made known in the experience of faith (Ac 22:20, 30-47), that he opened the doors of the Kingdom alike to Jews and to Gentiles.

With regard to the second part of the verse, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven,' some scholars have regarded it as merely explaining what is meant by the keys of the Kingdom, while others hold that it confers a privilege. The latter view is the more probable. And as we know that in the Rabbinic language of the time, to 'bind' and to 'loose' were the regular terms for forbidding and permitting, these words confer upon the Apostle a power of legislation in the Christian Church—a power which we see him exercising by and by, along with the other Apostles and the elders, at the Jerusalem Conference (Ac 15:1-21).

But now comes the question. Was this twofold promise, which was given to St. Peter personally, given him in any exclusive sense? As regards the second part of it, clearly not; for on a later occasion in this same verse we find Jesus knowing precisely the same privilege on His disciples generally (18:17; cf. v. 1 and also vv. 18-20). Moreover, the later NT history shows that St. Peter had no supreme position as a legistator in the Church (as e.g. Ac 15:1-11). Can it be, therefore, that the power of binding and loosing was not given to him exclusively, the presumption is that the same thing holds of the parallel power of the keys. As a matter of fact, we find it to be so. Though St. Peter had the privilege of first opening the doors of the Kingdom to both Jews and Gentiles, the same privilege was soon exercised by others (Ac 8:11ff. 12ff.). By and by Peter falls into the background, and we find Paul and Barnabas rehearsing to the Church how God through their preaching had 'opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles' (14:7). But this does not mean that the privilege was withdrawn from St. Peter; it means only that it was extended to others on their fulfilment of those same conditions of faith and testimony on which Peter had first received it.

2. In Mt 18:18 there appears to be no reference whatever to the remission and retention of sins. As in 16:14, 'whereover' is 'everywhere' not 'where'; the word employed, and here as there the binding and loosing must be taken to refer to the enactment of ordinances for regulating the affairs of the Church, not to the discharge of such a purely spiritual function as the forgiveness of sins. In any case, the promise is made not to the Apostles, much less to an official priesthood deriving authority from them by an Apostolic succession, but to 'the Church' (v. 17).

3. In Jn 20:23 we find the assurance definitely given of a power to remit or retain sins. But the gift is bestowed upon the whole company present (cf. Lk 24:47) as representing the Christian society generally. That society, through its possession of the Holy Spirit (v. 22), is thus empowered to declare the forgiveness or the retention of sins (cf. Jn 20:22, Gal 6; and see F. W. Roberton, Sem., 2nd part, xi.).

PRÆTOR. See MAGISTRATE, PROVINCE.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD. See next art. and Guard.

PRÆTORIUM (Gr. πρατήριον) occurs only once in AV (Mt 27:55). Elsewhere it is represented by 'common hall' (Mt 27:57, RV 'palace'), 'judgment hall' (Jn 19:1, 2, 18, Ac 23:19, RV in all 'palace') and 'palace' (Ph 1, 18, RV 'prætorian guard'). The word at first denoted the headquarters in the Roman camp, a space within which stood the general's tent, the camp pillar, the augurial, and the tribunali; then the military council meeting there. Each prætor, on completing his year of office, went as governor to a province, and his official residence was called 'prætorium'; then any house distinguished by size and magnificence, esp. the Emperor's residence outside Rome. In the Gospels, prætorium perhaps (but see PRÆTOR, p. 722f) stands for the palace of Herod the Great, occupied by Pontius Pilate—a splendid building, probably in the western part of the city. In Ph 19 it is probably the barracks of the Imperial guard that will be gained thereby. Originally the Cohors Praetoria was a company attached to the commander-in-chief in the field. Augustus retained the name, but raised the number to ten cohorts of 1000 each, quartering only 5 cohorts in the city at a time. Tiberius brought them all to Rome, and in a fortified camp, at the northern extremity of the Viminal. Under Vitellius their number was raised to 16,000.

PRAISE is the recognition and acknowledgment of merit. Two parties are involved: the one possessing at least supposed merit, the other being a person who acknowledges the meritorious quality.

Men may praise men. Forms of praise may be used without genuine feelings of praise, and extravagant praise may be rendered intentionally, because of the removal of all right hypocrisy, and the whole burden of the moral teaching of the Bible, and especially of Christ, is against hypocrisy. Again, the estimate of values may be so complex as to be incapable of precise definition, or of comprehension in cases where it is undeserved. And Jesus' whole influence is directed towards the proper appreciation of values so that the good shall appear to us good.

In its common Biblical use, however, praise has God for its object. This restriction does not involve an essential difference either in the praise or in the sense of moral values. The difference lies rather in the greater praiseworthiness of God. This praiseworthiness is of course called forth only as He reveals Himself to men, only as men recognize His activity and His power in the event or condition which appears to them adequate to call out praise. Men praise God in proportion as they are religious, and so have conscious relations with God.

The praiseworthiness of a god is involved in the very definition of a god. If men postulate a god at all, it is as a being worthy to be praised. Every thought and feeling of God is called forth only if he is regarded as a real and true, for consecration of sin, the same is true, for confession is not made to a being who does not hold a place of honour and praise. If some active service is rendered to God, this subjugation of ourselves to Him can be explained only by the conviction that God is in every way entitled to service.

Moreover, as in the case of praise of men, there is a very clear distinction to be drawn between genuine and hypocritical ascription of praise to God. The temptation to the latter is extreme, because of the immense gain presumably to be secured by praise; but the hypocrisy and the sin of It are equally great. Indeed, the seriousness of the offence is evident when one reflects that he who praises God knows full well the praiseworthily of God, so that he praises while the genuine feeling is lacking and the sincere act of praise is unperformed, only moral perversity can account for the hypocrisy.

In order to genuineness, praise must be spontaneous. It may be commanded by another human being, and the praise commanded may be rendered, but the real compelling cause is the recognized merit of God. God may demand from His creatures in commands transmitted to them through prophets and Apostles, but if man praises Him from the heart, it is because of the imperative inseparable from the very being and nature of God.

We may, therefore, find that in the Bible praise to God is universal on the part of all who acknowledge Him. It is the very atmosphere of both dispensations. It is futile to attempt to collate the passages that involve it. One prayer is measured by special terms or confined to special occasions. The author of Gn 1, like every reader of the chapter, finds the work of creation an occasion for praising God. The chapter is a call to praise, though the word be not mentioned.

We have but to turn to the Psalms (e.g. Ps 104) to find formal expression of the praise that the world inspires.

The legal requirements of the Law likewise depend for their activity with man, upon the recognition of the merit of the Law-giver. 'Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy,' has no force except for him who acknowledges holiness in God who commands; and obedience is the creature's tribute of praise to the holy God.

The whole history of Israel, as Israel's historians picture it, has in it the constant element of praise to Israel's God: we turn to the Psalms (e.g. Ps 102) or to the Koran (e.g. Ps 15), and find the praise of the heart rising to formal expression.

In the NT, praise of Christ and of God in Christ is the universal note. It is the song of those who are healed of their sicknesses; of those whose sins are forgiven; of those who mediate on the gospel message and salvation through Christ; of those who rehearse the glories of the New Jerusalem as seen in apocalyptic vision.

We are prepared by this universality to find that praise cannot form a topic for independent treatment. There is no technical terminology to be examined in the hope that the etymology of the words used will throw light upon their subject. The history of praise in the OT and the NT is the history of worship, temple, synagogue, sacrifice, and other expressions of religious sentiment. The history of praise is the history of the literature of religion, whether as the product of national consciousness or of personal religious experience.

It will suffice to mention one or two of interest which the student may well bear in mind as he studies the Bible and consults the articles on related subjects.

The Heb. word customarily used for praise is hallel, perhaps an onomatopoetic Semitic root meaning 'cry aloud.' An interesting feature is the use of the imperative in ascriptions of praise. Taken literally, the imperatives are commands to praise; but they are to be taken as real ascriptions of praise, with the added thought that praise from one person suggests praise from all. Cf. the doxology 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' which consists solely of four imperative sentences.

The imperative of the Hebrew verb, followed by the divine name, gives us Hallelujah, i.e. 'Praise ye Jehovah.' The word is used at the beginning and end of Psalms, apparently with liturgical value. Cf. also the Hallel Psalms (113–118, 136). The noun from the same root appears as the title of Ps 146. See Hallel.

The form which praise took as an element of worship in Israel varied with the general character of worship. It was called forth by the acts of Jehovah upon which the traditions were especially wont to dwell in different periods. For personal and family favours they praised Him in early times with forms of their own choosing. When the national consciousness was aroused, they praised Him for His leading of the nation, in forms suitable to this service. As worship came more and more to conform to that elaborated for, and practised in, the royal sanctuary—the Temple at Jerusalem—the forms of praise could not fail to share the elaboration and solemnity of the worship and the gradual elaboration and solemnization. The modifications of place is placed to be studied in the history of OT religion.

PRAISE

Praise was certainly a part of the varied service rendered by the Levites in the Temple ritual. Their performance, an examination of which will show how far praise was given over to them, and how much was retained by the congregation. The Psalms are certainly adapted to antiphonal rendering. Did the Psalmist and the Levite respond to the same centers, or were there two choirs? [This word occurs in EV only in RVM of Neh 12:1.] The element of praise in the synagogue worship is an interesting and disputed question. Cf. also ADORATION, RV 49,4b,4c.}

PRAYER.

—Prayer in the Bible is the uplifting of the heart to God with whatever motive. It includes supplication, whether in view of material or of spiritual need; intercession, for individuals or communities; confession of sin—but also assertion of righteousness; adoration; colloquy with God; vows; thanksgiving; blessing; impregation. The results are chiefly objective and external. But the apparent failure of prayer may be more instructive than its outward success. (Apart from Christ's prayer in Gethsemane [Mt 26:36], I. John 5:14.) Failure makes way for a deeper, greater, the one needed. Such cases would support the view that prayer is reflex in its action, specially potent in a subjective, inward, spiritual sense. Intercessory prayer must on the lowest view be of great altruistic value; while a personal, conscious, universal declaration makes nature that the belief that He may control events in answer to prayer made according to His will.

1. Terminology.

(1) In OT.—(1) The most usual noun (tephillah) and the verb (primarily of petition, it is possibly derived from a root meaning 'to cut.' If so, this might have been a prayer of the year of grace to the ascetic in general. The word is often used of prayer to God from a root of similar meaning to instruct theerchant that the Jewish tefillah (phylacteries) originated as substitutes for such marks of invocation. Tephillah may, however, indicate merely 'intervention.' Several words of the same root are the Name of worship (e.g. Gn 4:2). Others mean to call for the redress of wrongs (e.g. Ps 94), or for help in trouble (e.g. Ps 79). One noun is a 'singing outcry' (e.g. Ps 17): it is natural to find words meaning 'seek' (e.g. Am 9:5; a different word in Hos 5:5 'to seek God's face,' ask (e.g. Ps 106): To all such words, and generally, the correlative is 'hear' or 'answer.'

(2) Some expressions are anthropomorophic:—'to encounter,' 'fall upon,' in order to supplicate or intercede (e.g. Jer 7:7); 'to make the face of God pleasant,' i.e. to appease (e.g. Ex 33): thus equivalent to a more general word, 'to crave favour' (e.g. Le 10).

(3) Other terms regard the suppliants' state of mind: prayer is an 'outpouring of soul' (e.g. Ps 62): or a meditation (e.g. Jol 15:17 RVM); or 'complaint' (e.g. Ps 12:2); or the original connotation may be physical,—'to bow down' (Ex 18:14, cf. Exh 3:3), 'whisper' (Is 26:6 RVM).

(2) In NT.—(1) The classical Gr. word (proseuchema) is largely used. Unlike most OT words, this is used for prayer to God only. A related word (euchomai) is by itself little more than wish (e.g. Ro 9), and needs supplementing to mean prayer (e.g. 2 Co 13). The corresponding noun (euchos) usually means vow (e.g. Ac 18:18); but prayer in Js 5:12.

(2) 'To call on the Name' or invoke prayer (e.g. Ac 9:4).

(3) The words for 'seek' and 'ask' may be used of requests or inquiries made to man (e.g. Ac 8:26) and of themselves connotate worship. One word denotes the request of the will (e.g. Mt 6), another request of need (e.g. Ac 23), another the form of the request (e.g. Jn 17, cf. RVM).

(2) The OT 'encounter' has NT equivalent used of intercession (e.g. Ro 8).

(5) Prayer is a 'struggle' (e.g. Ro 15:3). One picturesque word (izonea, found only in 2 Th 5:17) suggests the olive branches held forth by suppliants.

2. Place, time, and circumstance.—(1) PLACE.—While no restriction is suggested at any period (cf. e.g. Gn 37:10; Jos 1:1), in the times of the Judges, Ps 40:6, 106:15; Jon 2, Ps 40:5; 96:1; 64:4, Lk 6:24, Ac 18:15; 21:43), and is disclaimed by Christ in view of the Temple (Jn 4:18), yet naturally specific worship-centres were regarded as appropriate; thus in early times Shiloh, where the ark rested (1 S 12. 18), Mizpah (1 S 7, 1 Mac 34), Gibeon (1 K 30). But, later, the Temple was the place where (Is 27. 5) 'prayer' (in absence) 'towards' which prayer was offered (1 K 831. 10 etc., Ps 289, Dn 69, 1 Es 44). Synagogues afforded, in later times, local prayer-centres. Where there was no synagogue, and the town was closed, there was some practice, for hand-washing before prayer (Ac 104. 18). In the NT we find Apostles going to the Temple (Ac 23); and St. Paul attended the synagogue on his mission journeys (Ac 16. 7). Distinctively Jewish worship was held in ordinary buildings (Ac 13. 14-18, 12, 135, Col 43), a practice made natural by Jewish arrangements for private prayer (Dn 64, Jb 80. 10, Mt 10. 28, Ac 18. 28) or for Passover celebration (Mt 26. 7). Ousentations praying at street corners is discouraged by Christ (Mt 6). (ii.) Time.—It became a custom to pray twice daily, i.e. at the 3rd, 6th, and 9th hours (cf. Ps 9317 [may mean 'all day long'], Dn 64, Ac 310. 18, cf. 19. 1f.). For instances of 'grace before meat,' Mt 1 S 15, Ac 274, and the Paschal meal. (iii.) Circumstance.—(1) Attitude: (a) standing (e.g. Gn 18. 3, S 19, Neh 8, Mk 11, Lk 1011. 18) the usual Jewish positioning in temple prayer, was no longer observed in the early Christian stream on Sundays and the days between Easter and Whitsun); (b) kneeling (Ps 93, Is 45, 1 K 84, Ezr 9, Dn 65, Lk 224, Ac 760 26 26, Eph 3); (c) prostrate, face to ground (Ex 34, Neh 8, 1 Es 84, Jb 40. 12, Ac 139, Mt 2639, cf. Ps 51), or (d) on knees (1 K 19. 18, cf. Ps 3610); (e) sitting (2 S 74); (f) hands uplifted (Ps 289, 63. 134, Lk 23 4, 2 Mac 39, 1 Ti 28) or extended [symbol of reception from God] (Ex 9, 1 K 8, Is 114, Ezr 9, Ps 77 [cf. AY]). (2) Forms of prayer: (a) formula (Dt 21. 26); (b) the Lord's Prayer; (c) allusion to the Baptist's prayer (Lk 11); (d) Christ's repeated prayer (Mt 28); (e) allusion to 'plain repetitions' or 'brevity' (Mt 67, cf. Sir 71); (f) incense. The OT word sometimes means merely the smoke from a sacrifice. Real incense was (certainly in later OT period) in use at sacrificial ceremonies, with which prayer was probably always associated (cf. Gn 129). Incense typifies prayer (Ps 141; cf. Jer 111, Mal 1, Lk 11, Rev 84). (3) Fasting. Being appropriate for times of solicitude and sorrow, fasting naturally became associated with prayer (Ps 33), especially after the Exile (Neh 14, Dn 9, cf. Lk 29), and was continued in the Christian Church (Ac 13 148, Mt 94). The following AV allusions to fasting coupled with prayer are absent from RV: (a) Mt 17. 25; (b) Mt 15. 33); (c) Lk 1. 35; (d) Lk 18. 10. (4) Prayer in the OT.—(1.) Patriarchal Period.—Prayer is (1) collocy with God (e.g. Gn 15. 2, 7, 1713. 18); (2) intercession (e.g. Gn 1710); (3) personal supplication (e.g. Gn 15 262410); (4) assentation (e.g. Gn 14); (5) vow (e.g. Gn 2812; see art. Vow). (ii.) The Law (i.e. as codified and expanded in later times).—The re-assertion as to prayer might suggest that it is voluntary and not patient of legislation; but in OT it is less a general duty (cf. NT) than a prophetic privilege (especially re intercession); cf. Gn 20 and below, §§ iii. vii. Note, however, the formula for thanksgiving (Dt 284), assertion of obedience (vv. 12, CT), supposition (v. 24), explanation (21). (iii.) Moses to Judges.—(1) Moses pre-eminent a man of prayer and an intercessor (e.g. Ex 86, 34 1211, 2, cf. Jer 15); collocy with God (Ex 3 4, 56. 61, 12, 24, 36, 36. 1, Israel in crisis (Ex 9, Nu 119) prophetic blessing (Dt 2311); (2) Joshua's prayer after defeat (Jos 78), and in battle (1013); (3) Gideon's collocy (Jg 61); (4) Israelites' frequent cry for help (Jg 3. 16 etc.). (iv.) Kingdom Period.—(1) Samuel, like Moses, an intercessor (1 S 7. 4, 8. 58. 12, 12151); collocy (1 S 1614, cf. 3. 12); (2) David: apart from the Psalms, with which his connexion is dubious, the following prayers may be noted, especially the last:—for guidance (1 S 25, 4, 30) [consulting ephod], on behalf of child (2 S 12), prayer of asecration (1 S 2413, 25) [a word]; (3) Solomon's prayer for wisdom (1 K 3), note the elaboration on cession attributed to him at dedication of Temple, 1 K 84, where (cf. v10) 'sacrifice' is not mentioned; (4) Elisha's intercession (1 K 18. 39), collocy (19); (5) Hezekiah's collocy in national crisis (2 K 19) in illness (20), note his assertion of righteousness. For this period see also § v. (v.) The Prophets.—Intercession in attitude, action, word, characterizes the prophets (much more than the priest, but cf. Jl 2), whether the earlier prophets, (§ iv. above) or those whose written works are extant. The reason lay in the prophet's Divine call, his vision of the Divine will (so a 'sorer'), and his forthtelling of the Divine message. Hence comes the peculiar expectancy (e.g. Jer 49), in the spirit of Hab 2; and intercession to avert disaster (e.g. Am 7. 3 and 6, Is 6317), and vividly Jer 14, 15 [where observe the collocy of persistent intercession notwithstanding Divine discouragement]. Combined with prayer in view of personal difficulty (e.g. Jer 20). (vi.) Exile and Redemption.—In this period prayer looms large, owing to the cessation of sacrificial worship and the realization of chasement. Accordingly confession and a humble sense of dependence are predominant between (1 K 18, cf. Ps 36); (2) hands uplifted (Ps 289, 63. 134, Lk 23, 2 Mac 39, 1 Ti 2) or extended [symbol of reception from God] (Ex 9, 1 K 8, Is 114, Ezr 9, Ps 77 [cf. AY]). (vii.) Psalms, Prayers, Job.—The Book of 'Praise' might be appropriately called also the Book of 'Prayers.' (Five only are so described in title: 17. 86. 90. 102. 145, but cf. 729, Hab 3.) (1) Throughout the Psalms, prayer—whether of the poet as an individual or as representing the nation—is specially an outpouring—arising, and impulsive, of varied experiences, needs, desires. Hence typical psalms exhibit transitions of thought and alternation of mood (e.g. 6142. 6927. 30 7712 10039). (2) The blessing sought is often material or external, like rescue from trouble or chasement. Not seldom, however, there is a more spiritual aim: in Ps 51 pardon is sought for its own sake, not to avert punishment, and Ps 119 is notable for repeated requests for inward illumination among other things (Ps 103, 1 Co 7, 6). The trend of the whole collection is indicated by its ready and natural adaptation to NT ideals of prayer. In estimating psalms which express vindictive and imperatory sentiments, we should note that they breathe abhorrence of evil, and are not the utterance of private malice. Even on the lowest view they would illustrate the human element in the Scriptures, and the progressive nature of revelation, throwing into vivid relief the Gospel temper and teaching. The propriety of their regular use in public worship need not be discussed here. (Proverbs. Note the suggestive allusion to the character of a suppliant (15. 24 58; cf. Ps 14515, Jb 88, Sir 359, Ja 58), and Agur's prayer (304). (v.) Job. In this dramatic poem Job's objections to his friends' criticisms often take the form of daring apostasies directly addressing God and a heavenly messenger (ch. 10). As a 'cry in the dark' the book re-echoes prayers like Ps 88; but the conflict of doubt culminates in the collocy between God and Job, in which the latter expresses the reverent submission of faith (42) etc.). (4) Prayer in the Apocrypha. —The Apoc. books—of fiction, fable, history, with apocalyptic and satirical writings—are of very unequal value, but contain many prayers. The ideas are on the whole admirable, some times reaching a distinctively NT level; the thought in 2 Mac 12:42 as to prayer in relation to the dead is noteworthy (cf. below, 2 Es. and Bar.). As the books are read, it may be well to take them in order, giving fairly full reference to relevant passages.

2 Esdras. Zechariah’s thanksgiving (4:4-6); prayer for journey, with confession (28:1-10).

2 Esdras. Confession and historical retrospect (3:30); colloquy with Uriel (4-14), where note the allusion to various OT intercessors, all useless as judgment-days, (7:12, 17 [not in AV]).

Tobit. Prevailing prayer of Tobit and Sarah (3:41); Tobias urged to pray (4:9) — prays in nuptial room (8:6-7); thanksgiving of Raguel (8:11-17), Tobit (11:18, 17, 13).

Judith. Except where general supplementation is made (4:1-11, 16:18, 27:11), or where Judith’s intercession is sought (8:2), prayer in this romance is of a very unassuming kind. Here is a prayer of success for a trick (ch. 9); prayer and the plans of Holofernes (11:17-19); prayer before slaying him (13:1).

Ad. Esther. Prayers of Mordecai (13:14-18) and Esther (14:18) in national peril.

Wisdom. Chs. 9-19 are in prayer-form. Note the picturesque illustration of manna and the morning prayer (16:25).

Eschyn. Jews of Babylon ask those of Jerusalem to pray for welfare of Nebuchadnezzar (1:14; cf. Ezr 6:9, Jer 29:1, 1 Ti 2:3) — prayer and confession of captives Israelites (15-35), where note prayer by the dead, 3d, see RV, v. 49.

Song of the Three. Prayer and confession of Azarias before the Benedict (v.1-22; cf. Ezr 9, Dn 9).

Susanna. Her prevailing prayer (v. 41-44).

Bel. Brief prayer by Habakkuk (v. 38), Daniel (v. 34), kings of Babylonia.

Prayer of Manasses. For pardon.

Maccabees. The two books are quite distinct, 1 Mac, being much the more reliable as history. Prayer is very prominent throughout the whole Maccabean struggle — before, during, and after battles (1 Mac 6:4-12, 20, 30-32, 45:7-8, 11; 4:17; 2 Mac 1:14-18, 3:10, 11, 11:12, 15:5-15, 11:14, 14:1-3, 15:26-28, 4:8). In particular, the prayers of 2 Mac are specially suited to the efficacy of prayer, etc., of the living for the dead (12:4-6; cf. baptism for dead, 1 Co 15:22, and 1 Th 2:1), and prayer of the dead for the living (15:24; cf. 1 Th 1:2, 3, Zech 6:18).

5. Prayer in the NT. — I. Example and Teaching of Jesus Christ. — The special character of the Fourth Gospel should be remembered. Of the Synoptics, Lk. is particularly instructive as to prayer (cf. Acts also). For Lord’s Prayer, see separate article.

(i.) Christ’s example. — (a) Prayers at great moments in His life: baptism (Lk 3:21), election of Apostles (Lk 6:13), miracles (Lk 8:52; cf. Jn 6:6, Mk 7:32) [implicated Jn 1:49, Jn 4:43, Mat 11:16, 21, 22, 26:39, 42, 23:39], crucifixion (Lk 22:43) — Gethsemane (Lk 22:44); crucifixion (Mt 27:46, Lk 23:37) — (b) intercedes for disciples (Jn 17), Peter (Lk 22:29), soldiers (Lk 23:30); for His intercession in glory, see below, § II (b) (1).

(ii.) Christ’s teaching. — The range of prayer is chiefly (cf. OT) for spiritual blessing (cf. Lord’s Prayer) and, esp. Mt 6:9, but not exclusively so (‘daily bread’ in Lk 11:3). The conditions and requisites of prayer are numerous. — (a) Earnestness (cf. urgent supplication in OT, esp. Psalms) (Lk 11:1-13), where note juxtaposition with Lord’s Prayer, 18:12; and His attitude to the Sophronician seems to teach urgency of petition (Mk 7:27). (b) Humility (Lk 18:10-14); the juxtaposition with preceding parable is suggestive, and cf. OT assertion of righteousness: e.g., in Dt. and Neh. (see above, 3 (vi.), Lk 17:19); ambition rebuked (Mt 20:22-26). (c) A forgiving spirit: as in Mt 6:14, 15; cf. above, § 4. (d) Privacy recommended see above, § 2 (L) end, and cf. Christ’s own example of solitary prayer (Lk 5:16). (e) Without ‘battology’: see above, (f) (ii.) (2), where the reader is shown that prayer is not discouraged by the mere mechanical prayer (cf. heathen incantations) or of pretence (Mt 22:24). (f) With faith. Mk 11:24 contains just such hyperbole as would appeal to an Eastern mind and enforce the value of prayer; while the seeming paradox of v. 24 must be taken along with this and understood in the light of Christ’s general teaching. The need of faith is further illustrated by Christ’s attitude to those seeking aid (Mt 6:31-33, 9:18, 9:24, Lk 18:49). (g) Agreement when two or three join in prayer (Mt 18:19, 21). (h) In His name (Jn 14:13, 16:23, 26). This specially Johannine feature suggests framing of mind rather than form of speech (cf. Mt 18:19, 26), 108 etc.; on the other hand, cf. Ac 3:2, 15. For the Christology it supports, see below, § II. (I.) 1.

II. Customs and Ideas in Apostolic Times. — Evidence is afforded by Acts (where the prominence given to prayer is natural if Lk. wrote it, see above, § I), and by Eph., whose writers had inherited the best traditions of Jewish piety and had also assimilated OT passages. (1) The Master’s teaching (cf. Mt 6:1-20, Lk 11:1-4) is specially developed in the Apostolic Church (1 Th 1:21; cf. § 4 ‘Baruch’). (2) Sickliness (Ja 5:14-16), where notice conjunction of prayer and outward means (or unfction cf. Mk 6:5) with contemplation, physical and spiritual healing are associated, and both with prayer; see above, § 4 ‘Baruch’. (3) For temporal gifts is not very conspicuous in NT, but see Ro 11:4, 12 Co 13:3, Ph 4:3. (4) Zealations to prayer (Ro 12:1-1, Col 4, 1 Th 5, 1 Pt 4, Jude 19, 20). (5) Reminiscences of OT occur in prayer as coloquy (Lk 1:16, 21), as struggle (Ro 15:30, Col 2:8, cf. Gn 32:24), as cry for vengeance (Rev 6:16, ct. 1 Th 2), (5) Intercession, which in OT is specially characteristic of the prophetic office, here the same function is performed, especially by the apostolic church. For converts (Ro 10:12-18, 2 Co 13:1, Eph 1:4, 3 Th 1, 2, 1 Th 2, 2 Th 1, Phil 3, 3 Jn); converts for Apostles (Ac 12, Ro 16:5, 2 Co 10:4, Col 4, 2 Th 3, Phil 2, 1 Th 4, 2 Th 3, Philem 28); for one another (Ja 5, 746
PRAYER OF MANASSES

(6) Thanksgiving abounds
(Ro 1:8; 1 Co 2:5; 2 Co 3:17; Phi 3; Col 1:4; 1 Th 2:23; 2 Th 2:1; 1 Ti 2:10; 2 Ti 1:3).

Note also the salvation and blessing at the beginning and close of Epistles.

The NT closes with a threefold prayer for Christ's coming (Rev 22:17-19).

PRAYER OF MANASSES.—See Apocrypha, § 11.

PREACHING.—In the OT 'preaching' is referred to explicitly in the case of Jonah's preaching in Nineveh (Jon 3:7). The word here used means strictly 'proclamation,' and corresponds to the NT word used with reference to our Lord 'proclaiming' (as a herald) the advent of the Kingdom of God (e.g. Mt 4:17), which, in its initial stages, was closely associated with the preaching of John the Baptist (cf. Mt 3:1-7). Christian preaching is, on other days in the NT, these occasions of 'good tidings' ('evangel,' 'gospel'). Strictly, the 'proclamation' ought to be distinguished from the 'teaching' that followed on it. But in its more extended application 'preaching' covers all instruction in religious matters of a homiletical character, and especially such as is associated with public worship.

The prophetic preaching hardly falls within this category. The prophets undoubtedly spoke their discourses (before writing them down). But these allocations were formal, and in character, not regular part of the public worship.

The preaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus was largely in character—the gospel may be described as a 'revival of the spirit of prophecy'—but nevertheless it possessed some affinities with the synagogue preaching, which had become an institution of peculiar importance in many respects in marked contrast with and independent of it (our Lord constantly addressed the multitudes in the open air).

Preaching as a regular part of the service of public worship is constantly referred to as such. One nearly undoubted instance is the practice of speaking the discourses (before writing them down). But these allocations were formal, and in character, not regular part of the public worship.

of others expressing the same, or related, meanings, as 'predestination,' (in pragmatic sense, Ac 2:23, Ro 9:23, 1 P 1:20, 20, 'determine' (Ac 17:27), 'appoint' (1 P 22, 'purpose' (Eph 1:9), in the case of believers, 'choose' or 'elect' (Eph 1:1 etc.). In the OT the idea is expressed by the various words denoting to purpose, determine, choose (e.g. Is 14:17, 17, 47, 47, 51)), with the abundance of phrases extolling the sovereignty and immutability of God's counsel in all the spheres of His operation (see below, so in NT). The best clue to the Scripture conception will be found in tracing it as it appears in these different spheres of the Divine action.

1. In its most general aspect, predestination is coextensive with the sphere of God's universal providence. The Bible idea is, in fact, but another name for the eternal plan, design, purpose, counsel of God, which executes itself in providence. The election of believers, to which 'predestination' is sometimes narrowed, is but a specific case of the 'purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1:11). It is in this wider regard, accordingly, that predestination must be studied first. It can hardly be doubted that all Scripture, OT and NT—requires God's external choice of the individual to salvation, and over the world a providence that is absolutely universal. Nothing, great or small—operations of nature or actions of men—is left outside its scope. This divine eternal thought of God is in accordance with His own counsel, purpose, essentially all-embracing, which has existed from eternity. As Plato says in his Parmenides that nothing, not even the smallest object, is impenetrable by the idea of God's eternal purpose, so each and every individual has most casual happenings, of life (the numbering of hairs, the fall of a sparrow, Mt 10:29) are included in the Divine providence. Free agency is not annulled; on the contrary, human freedom and responsibility are everywhere insisted on. But even free volitions, otherwise mere possibilities, are taken up in their place into this plan of God, and are made subservient to the Divine will. Thus salvation is not only God's, but the believer's; it is not only God's love, but also his own (Rom 8:28); it is not only God's grace, but the believer's (Rom 3:24).

2. A universal, pervading purpose of God in creation, providence, and human life, is thus everywhere assumed. The end of God's purpose, as regards humanity, may be thought of as the establishing of a moral and spiritual kingdom, or Kingdom of God, in which God's will should be done on earth, as it is done in heaven (cf. Mt 6:10). But this end, now that sin has entered, can be attained only through a redemption. The centre of God's purpose in our world, therefore—that which gives its meaning and direction to the whole biblical history, and constitutes almost its sole concern, is the fact of redemption through Jesus Christ, and the salvation of men by Him. To this everything preceding—the call of Abraham, the Covenant with Israel, the growing revelation of Law and Prophets—leads up (on predestination here, cf. Gn 18:19, 19, Lk 20:34, 34, Is 43:1, 1 etc.); with this begins (or, more strictly, continues) the ingathering of a people to God from all nations and races of men, in their completeness, constitute the true Church of God, redeemed from among men (Eph 5:21, 21, 1 P 2:10, Rev 19:14, 14 etc.). The peculiar interest of the doctrine of predestination, accordingly, in this NT, consists in the calling and salvation of those described as the 'chosen' or 'elect' of God (Eph 1:4 etc.). The doctrine of predestination (predestination) here coexists practically with that of election (wh. see). Yet certain distinctions arise from a difference in the point of view from which the subject is contemplated.

Electing, in the NT, in the article referred to, relates to the external choice of the individual to salvation. As little as any other fact or event in life is the salvation of the believer regarded as lying outside the purpose or pre-determination of God; rather, an attempt is made to trace the workings of God's part in the matter, and to light on the elected one brought into the Kingdom (2 Th 2:13). There is the yet deeper reason for seeing in the believer's calling and salvation the manifestation of a Divine purpose that, as lost in the, is now revealed, incapable of effecting this saving change in himself. He owes his renewal, his quickening from spiritual death, to the gratuitous mercy of God (Eph 2:5; see in Rom 11:28). But that salvation is conscious in its deepest moments that it is only of God's grace it is there, and is ready to ascribe the whole glory of its salvation to God (Rom 7:24), and to trace the whole secret of obtaining it in the will and purposes of God. Thus regarded, 'election' and 'foreordination' to salvation seem to have much the same meaning. Yet in usage a certain distinction is made. It may perhaps be stated thus, that 'election' denotes the Divine choice simply, while 'foreordination' has generally (in sense of 'predestinate') a reference to the end which the foreordination has in view. Thus, in Eph 1:4—'Even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world...having foreordained us unto adoption as sons' (where 'having foreordained,' as Meyer rightly says, is not to be taken as prior to, but as coincident in point of time with, 'he chose'); and in v.5 'having been foreordained,' i.e. to be 'made a heritage,' and this 'to the end that we should be unto the praise of his glory' (v.12). In Ro 8:28, again, where 'foreknew—which seems to take the place of 'choose' (it can hardly be foreknowledge of the faith which is the result of the later 'calling')—comes before 'foreordained,' the former has the end defined: to be conformed to the Image of his Son.' Those 'foreknown' are afterwards described as God's 'elect' (v.28). This striking passage further shows how, in foreordination the end, God likewise foreordains all the steps that lead to it ('foreknew—foreordained—called'—the soul—glorified). On the other hand, 'foreknowledge' is distinguished from election—still, however, in sense of pre-designation.

3. God's foreordination, or predestination, whether in its providential, historical, or personal saving aspects, is ever represented as a great mystery, the depths of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of which (for this is the character of its mystery) man can never hope to fathom (Rom 11:33). When the Apostle, in Ro 9, is dealing with objectors, he does not attempt a rationale of that which he admits to lie beyond his ken, but falls back on the unchallengeable sovereignty of God in acting as He wills (vv.14-16, 11-12). The answer would be a poor one, were it not as absolutely assumed throughout that God's is a will in which there can be no taint of unrighteousness, and that there is nothing in His action which does not admit of vindication for perfect wisdom and goodness. If God shows His mercy upon whom He wills, His right to do so cannot be assailed; if He hardens—not arbitrarily, but through the fixed operation of ethical laws—and glorifies His wrath in the destruction of the hardened, it is not without sufficient cause, and only after much long-suffering (v. 29). As little does the Apostle attempt to show the compatibility of the Divine foreordination with human freedom, but habitually assumes that the one is not, and cannot be, in violation of the other. The material with which the potter works (v. 10) is not, in this case, after, mere inanimate clay, but beings who can reply against God' (v. 14), and are the objects of His long-suffering endurance (v. 12). Sovereignty is seen in this, that even those who refuse to be moulded to higher uses do not escape the hands of God, but are made to subservire His glory, even if it be in their destruction. Doubtless even here a purpose of God is to be recognized. Godet, who is not a rigid predestinationist, says of the instance in v. 17—'God might have caused Pharaoh to be born in a cabin, where his proud obstinacy would have been displayed with no less effect, but without any historical consequence; on the other hand, he might have placed on the throne of Egypt at that time a weak, easy-going man, who would have been driven to put an end to that which would have happened? Pharaoh in his obscure position would not have been less arrogant and perverse, but Israel would have gone forth from Egypt without éclat' (on Ro 9.17, 18).

Only in this sense, of those willfully hardened and persistently obdurate, is it permissible to speak—if the language should be employed at all—of a decree of reprobation. Scripture itself, with all its emphasis on foreordination, never speaks of a foreordination to death, or of a reprobation of human beings apart from their own sin. See REPROBATE. Its foreordination is reserved for life, blessing, sonship, inheritance.

PRE-EXISTENCE OF SOULS.—

'Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar.'

—Wordsworth, Intimations of Immortality

The idea expressed in these lines has been prominent in many religions—cultured and crude alike. That it had Jewish adherents is clear from (a) Wis 8.9, 32, written by some Jewish thinker influenced (as, e.g., Philo, a believer in the same doctrine, was conspicuously) by Platonist study; (b) the reference of Josephus to Essene doctrine; (c) the Talmud. That traces occur in the OT is doubtful. The idea can be more easily read into, than gathered out of, such passages as Job 18 (cf. Sir 40), Ec 12, Ps 139, Cf. also Rev 4.11. But something very like it occurs in Gk. Had the man been born blind because of his own sin? In His reply Christ finds no fault with the question as such. The objection that such an idea would be unfamililiar to the disciples is weakened by considerations as to the advanced thought of the Fourth Gospel; moreover, the Book of Wisdom (see above) is clearly re-echoed in NT. Some think that the question rose from Jewish ideas as to pre-natal consciousness. See Gn 25 (strife), Lk 14, 44 (joy). Non iunctum must be the verdict. The subject re-appears in Origen's speculative teaching and, indirectly, in related controversies.

PREPARATION (Gr. parasekudea).—A term applied by the Jews to the day preceding the Sabbath, or any of the sacred festivals, especially the Passover.

PRESEBTER (Gr. presbuteros, 'elder').—The word occurs only once in EV, viz. as an RV marginal alternat-
RV, and J 314 RV 'winepress.' Also Hg 22 AV, along with the only instance of 'pressfat' (RV 'winefat'), as the rendering of a rare word, which RV wrongly tr. 'vessels.' The passage in question should run: 'When one came to the winepress (expecting) to draw of any measures (probably 'baths' are intended) from the wine-trough, there were but twenty.' For the ancient winepresses, see WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2.

PREVENT.—To prevent in the Eng. of AV is to 'be before,' 'anticipate,' 'forestall,' as Ps 11940 'I prevented the dawning of the morning and cried' (Amer. Revision has 'anticipated' here, but the Eng. Revisers retain 'prevented'). Sometimes it is to forestall for one's good, as Ps 5910 'The God of my mercy shall prevent me'; and sometimes for one's hurt, as Ps 181. The scope of 'hinder or prevent' never occurs in AV.

PRIESTS AND LEVITES.—The method here adopted as a rule comes to the winepress (exacting) to draw of any measures (probably 'baths' are intended) from the wine-trough, there were but twenty.' For the ancient winepresses, see WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2.

PRIESTS AND LEVITES

furniture. In short, they were required to do everything connected with the service which was not by law required of the priests themselves (Nu 8:2-3 39-40).

III.

The Levites were supported from the tithe, which was in the first instance paid to them (Nm 18:24).

Levitical and priestly cities.—According to Nu 35:4, there were assigned to the Levites in different parts of Palestine 48 cities with suburbs and surrounding pasture land (1000 to 500 yards in diameter) as an early tradition thereon the division of the land under Joshua, 13 of these, in the territories of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, are given to the priests (Jos 21: see also 1 Ch 6:49-80, where, however, the text is very corrupt). No trace of any such arrangement is to be found in Ezekiel's ideal sanctuary, according to which the priests and Levites have their possessions in the 'oblation' or sacred ground, which included the sanctuary (49'-50'). This provision of cities and land in P appears to be in direct contradiction to the oft-repeated statement that the Levites had no portion in the land because Jehovah was their portion (Dt 10:19, Nu 18:20 etc.), a statement explained in P as meaning that they did not depend on the tithe. In accordance with this view, we refer to its being an hereditary guild. But silence on this latter point does not prove that they were not. In law what is customary is often taken for granted.

Genealogical theory of the hierarchy.—P's theory of the origin of the hierarchy was as follows: The Levites were one of the 12 tribes of Israel, descended from Levi, one of Jacob's sons. They were set apart by Jehovah for Himself in lieu of the firstborn of the Egyptians (Nu 3:13-14). All the 'sons' of Aaron—a descendant of Levi (Ex 6:16)—were priests (Lv 21:1 etc.). The high priesthood descended in one line from Aaron, his sons, and his descendants (Nu 3:17-19), Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons, having perished, it passed to Eleazar, the next in age (Nu 20:28-29, Ex 6:19). The son of Phinehas, who had blessed him, was Eleazar's son, and his son, Phinehas, was in his turn succeeded by his son, Eleazar, and so on. The family of Kohath, as being that to which both Aaron and Moses belonged, had the most honourable office. They had charge of the sacred furniture and vessels—the ark, altar, candlestick, and table, and the families divided between them the charge of the different parts of the building (Nu 3:29).

II.

EVIDENCE FOR THE EVOLUTION OF THE HIERARCHY.—There is reason to believe that the hierarchical system of P was not handed down in its completeness from primitive times, but was of gradual growth.

A. The Book of the Covenant.—1. Status of the local priests.—The earliest document bearing at all on the subject is the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 21-29), to which we should add Ex 20 and 24. The priests of the several sanctuaries, of which many are contemplated (20:24), are called Elohim (TV 'God,' AV usually 'the judges'), probably in the sense that they were God's representatives, and that their decision, often probably determined by the sacred lot, was regarded as the expression of God's will. We may compare Ps 82:1 'said, Ye are gods'—a reference undoubtedly to this passage, made to show how unworthy the judges of a later time were of their sacred office.

2. Their work, etc.—These local priests were required to superintend the ancient primitive ceremony connected with the sacrifices of the temple. In the case of the burnt offering (Ex 21:1), decide suits, impose fines and the like (21:22-24). To 'revile' them was a crime (22:7, where the order of phrases suggests that they were of more consequence than the Levites). In the description of any distinctive dress, even where one might certainly have expected it (cf. 20:26 with 28:3, from which we may gather that the linen breeches were the addition of a Z. R. probably not at this date). Nor is anything said of their being an hereditary guild. But silence on this latter point does not prove that they were not. In law what is customary is often taken for granted.

B. The First Book of Samuel.—1. Temple of Shiloh.—With the Book of the Covenant we may compare 1 Samuel, which points in many ways to the state of society and religion assumed by the former. Here we find several local sanctuaries. One of the most important is Shiloh, the temple of which, according to Jer 18:10 (P), was the ark, and the Infant Samuel slept inside the sanctuary to protect it (1 Sam. 3). The priest Eli seems to have had a large influence and to have exercised a judicial function, and the whole tribe of Ephraim. In 2 Sam.—In a document probably at earliest only a little before Josiah's reign—He is spoken of in a way which implies that he held a unique position among the tribes of Israel. The further statement in 4:8, that he judged Israel 40 years, is a still later editorial insertion connecting 1 Samuel with Judges (see Js 18:10 18:12 etc.).

2. Position of Samuel.—Shiloh was destroyed by the Philistines, Samuel came to be a still more powerful priest, being, according to 1 Sam 7:11, connected, both as priest and ruler, with several local sanctuaries—Bethel, Gibeath, Micah, and Ramah. But even these were comprised within a very small circle. It is curious that, according to 9:1—part of one of the earliest sources of the book.—Saul did not appear, at the time of searching for his father's asses, to have even heard of Samuel's existence. It is also significant that in 2 Sam. Eli uses Elohim as in the Book of the Covenant, showing that, in his time at any rate, there were other priests exercising jurisdiction at their several sanctuaries.

3. Absence of regular religious organization.—1 Samuel points to great liberty of action on the part of the priests, or, at least, of Samuel himself. His movements do not seem to imply any regularly organized sacrificial system. Except for new moons and yearly feasts of perhaps more than one kind (1 Sam 1:1 20:6, 27, to which we should probably add sabbaths (cf. 2 K 43), there seem to have been no regular feast days.

The priest appoints and invites whom he chooses to the sacrificial meal (1 Sam 8:24), and on one occasion takes with him the animal for sacrifice (16:4-6)

4. Dress of the primitive priests.—In 1 Sam 2:13, the two parts of the dress of Samuel, the ephod and the robe, are, in name at any rate, what afterwards belonged to the peculiar dress of the high priest (Ex 28:40 39:25). But the robe is also called the 'robe of the priest' (Ex 29:2), and may have been worn for the upper garments, and is used of that worn by Jonathan and Saul (1 Sam 18:24). Of the use of the ephod by the priests of this date there is abundant evidence. It was essentially the priestly garment of primitive times, and especially connected with the act of sacrificing the officiating priest by means of the sacred lot. Utim and Thummim, which was the peculiar province, and one of the most important functions, of the priest (1 Sam 14:s 28:3 28:4 29:7), The Utim is expressly mentioned in 28:9, and the Utim and
The priests were both originally in the text of 14th - 5th, as a comparison with the LXX and Vulgate shows.

5. The priests means of support.—According to 1 S 2 — from a relatively old document — the priests had no fixed dues; but the passage seems to suggest that they, or at least in the writer’s day, what had been voluntary gifts were passing into customary charges which were liable to abuse. The chief ground of complaint was the wrong committed not so much against the sacrificer as against God, to whom was due the fat of the inwards, which should first be burnt (28).

A dynasty of priests.—In addition to the priests of the local sanctuaries, we find in 1 S 21 22 an account of a settlement of priests at Nob under Ahimelech, all of whom except Abiathar his son were put to death by Saul, and found in the troubles brought about by the Philistines.

1. Priests not regarded as Levitical.—There is nothing in the Books of Samuel which affords a sufficient reason for connecting the priesthood of this period directly with a tribe of Levi, the mention of the ‘Levites’ in 1 S 6(4) and 2 S 6(5) being clearly a very late interpolation which assumes the liturgical arrangements of P. Had these been in vogue at the time, we should certainly have found some reference to them in 2 S 6 such as we find abundantly in the parallel in 1 Ch 15, where v.3 suggests that Joseph was a priest ‘in the things’ but not Levites having carried the ark.

C. Jg 17-21 (a document which, though revised by a priestly writer, belongs to rather the earlier part of the monarchy, and the first-fruits' condition of the latter is not confirmed in many ways the Books of Samuel. It speaks of different sanctuaries — Mizpah (290) and Bethel (291-2), besides Shiloh, which is a place of comparatively small importance, yet marked, as in 1 Sam., by a yearly visit of a local secular committee (cf. 219-22 with 1 S 1 11-16; 28). The ‘Levite’ who is priest to Micah is actually the tribe of Judah (177). There is mention of an ephod and a suit of apparel for the priest, but it is uncertain whether the ephod referred to is that of the Levites, or is of a different type and referred to the tribe of Judah.

D. 1 and 2 Kings (original documents) up to Josiah’s reform.—There were two circumstances which tended to diminish the prestige of the local priests.—I. The establishment of the monarchy, by which many, if not all, of the secular functions of the priests had passed into the hands of the king or his deputies. Of these one of the most important was the practice of judicial hearing (see esp. 2 S 12 14-24 15-1, 1 K 3 16-14; cf. also D 15). It is also true that, sooner or later, the idea of the king as God’s earthly representative was substituted for that of the priests.

2. Of even greater importance was the building of the great Temple at Jerusalem by Solomon. From the very first it made for the centralization of worship, though not of course intended originally to be the one single local sanctuary which it afterwards became. The local sanctuaries (‘high places’) were still tolerated (1 K 154 224 etc.), but would tend more and more to sink into insignificance beside this splendid building. This was especially the case in the Southern Kingdom. In the north the local sanctuary worship had more vitality, but it was largely maintained, and even regarded for political reasons (1 K 1228-29). The calves of Jeroboam were probably Canaanite, though later on the cultus probably spread, and was seen as symbols, not rivals, of Jehovah. The cult of the ‘high places’ seems gradually to have relapsed into familiar and popular types of Semitic worship; and in the books of the early prophets Amos and Hosea it is not always easy to distinguish between heathenism and a heathenish worship of Jehovah.

With the decline of the local sanctuary the status of the priests gradually declined, and finally reached the low level implied in Jg 17-19, in Deuteronomy.

E. Deuteronomy.—1. Levites.—In Dt. (first published in all probability in Josiah’s reign) we find the terms ‘priests’ and ‘Levites’ rather curiously used. The latter occurs frequently, but it is always as of a class deserving of pity. The Levite is frequently ranged with the slave, the widow, and the fatherless (Dt 14 11 1619). The descriptive phrase is ‘within thy gates’ meaning that it is more or less distinct from Jerusalem, as we see from 12 16, where the local sanctuaries are contrasted with the one permissible sanctuary. The Levites were certainly the poetry of the Levites is also testified by Jg 17-19, in which we find more than one case of Levites wandering about in search of a living.

2. Effect of abolishing local sanctuaries.—Dt 18-20 suggests that Levites might desire to go up to Jerusalem and perform priestly functions and receive support, and orders that they should be allowed to do both, and be treated in these respects on an equality with the priests at Jerusalem.

When we realize that the ideal of Dt. was the one only sanctuary, it becomes evident that the case contemplated was one which would naturally arise when the local sanctuaries were abolished, as in fact they were by Josiah.

3. ‘The priests the Levites.’—On the other hand, the priests of Jerusalem are generally called distinctively, it would seem, ‘the priests the Levites’; occasionally even ‘the Levites only, when the context makes it clear that the priests of Jerusalem are meant, as in 18 19.

4. The duty of these priests, including the Levites who joined them, were the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the loins (still in the field and garden produce. They did not include, as in P, the thigh or the firstlings. The tithes were not given by right to the priests or Levites, but the latter shared in the family feast at the one sanctuary, as will later be said, and the sacrificial act. The same was the case with the firstlings, vows, and free will offerings (18 2 129-14). One sees in these arrangements very clearly the system which was elaborated in P, and a development from what is implied in S 2.

5. Levitical theory variously explained.—Not only are the priests of the local sanctuaries and those of Jerusalem both called ‘Levites’ in Dt.; but the name is distinctly understood as that of a tribe to which both belonged (18-7). The traditional explanation accepted by Dt. of the exceptional position of the tribe, was that it was a reward for having slain a large number of rebellious Israelites, probably on the occasion of the golden calf (cf. Dt 10 1 with Ex 3218, 19. [There are some critical difficulties in both passages concerning the connexion of the incident with the context]). This does not very well accord with P, which, as said above, connects the separation of the tribe with the dedication of the firstborn and the last of the plagues, and that of the priests, or the high priest especially, with the action of Phinehas at Baal-peor (Nu 25-12 134).

It is quite impossible to say what elements of truth may underlie these traditions. But if the word ‘Levite’ was originally merely official, such a united act on the part of a body of priests seems improbable; and the stories may have arisen as different ways of accounting for their dispersion. But the belief that the priests all belonged to one tribe proves at any rate that at the time when Dt. was written, and probably long before, the priesthood had become a hereditary and isolated guild. That is to say, every priest was the son of a priest, and his sons became priests. The curing of Levi in Jacob’s blessing, so conspicuously contrasted with the glorification of Joseph (i.e. Ephraim and Manasseh), perhaps shows that the writer, even though the Northern Kingdom, despised the priestly office.
PRIESTS AND LEVITES

F. Reforms of Josiah as they concerned the Levites.—When Josiah abolished the local sanctuaries, the difficulty about the priests contemplated by Dt. seems to have arisen in fact. But it was not solved altogether in the way directed. Probably the priests of Jerusalem resented the presence of the local priests at their altar, and continued that their services could hardly have been required. In fact the language of Dt. almost suggests that the main purpose was to secure means of support (189). This purpose was at any rate secured by Josiah. They were to receive allowances of food with the priests of Jerusalem, but were not allowed to perform priestly functions (2 K 239). It is to be noticed that the writer treats them with respect, calling them priests, and speaking of the priests of Jerusalem as brethren.

G. Ezekiel's Ideal sanctuary.—In his ideal sanctuary Ezekiel makes a marked distinction between the 'Levites that went far from me, when Israel went astray,' and the 'priests the sons of Zadok,' who had faithfully 'kept the charge of my sanctuary' (44°-10). The Levites are here charged with apostasy and idolatry, in reference, no doubt, to the sin of Jeroboam, which Ezekiel so regarded. He directs that as a punishment they should be forbidden the office of priest, and be allowed to do only the servile work of the sanctuary, such as the oversight of the gates, slaying of victims—work that had hitherto been done by Ezekiel complies, by uncircumcised aliens (vv. 1-19). There can be little doubt that Ezekiel here gives the clue to the way in which the 'Levites' in the later sense of the term arose. The descendants of the priests, turned out from their local sanctuaries and made pensioners, do the regular work of the priests. They were a sort of inferior order, to do the menial service of the Second Temple.

2. The appellation 'sons of Zadok' seems to imply that the priests in Jerusalem also were, at least in Ezekiel's time, an hereditary gild. Zadok himself was the chief priest appointed by Solomon in the room of Abiathar, in consequence, no doubt, of his loyalty with reference to Absalom. It is only to be supposed that the priests of Jerusalem could not have been 'sons of Zadok,' and it is extremely unlikely that their successors were all descended from him or any other ancestor.

3. Like the 'Levites,' the high priest seems to have emerged gradually. In the different small sanctuaries each priest probably occupied an independent position. As some of these grew in importance, the priest attached to them would obtain a relatively greater influence, or possibly a paramount influence, over a district or tribe, as in the cases of Eli and Samuel, whose power, however, a later tradition seems to have greatly magnified. When some of these priests were associated together, as exceptionally perhaps at Nob (see II. B. 6.), and afterwards in Solomon's Temple, some kind of leadership became necessary, without any necessary difference of religious functions. Such a leadership seems to have been held by Ahimelech (1 S 21), Zadok (1 K 28), and Jehoiada (2 K 11). These were known as 'the priest.' Such is probably meant by 'the priest that shall be in those days' in Dt. 269.

In Ezekiel's ideal sanctuary there is no distinction between priest and high priest, and the only special vestments sanctioned for the priests are the garments kept in the priests' chambers, but no details are given as to their character or style (429).

The document with the distinction appears is probably the almost contemporary 'Code of Holiness' (Lv 17-26). In 21° we find the curious phrase 'he that is the high priest among his brethren' (RV), which might be more exactly rendered, 'the priest that is greater than his brethren'—an expression which would very well apply to one who did not hold a distinctly different office, as the high priest of P., but was rather priest in office, and the distinctions concerning this office deal entirely with ceremonial and social obligations, which were rather more exacting in his case than with other priests. For instance he might not marry a widow, or rend his garments as a sign of grief (2113-14).

The allusion to a special sanction (see L. A. 1. B. 1) and the high-priestly dress in 10 and 12 are almost certainly later interpolations.

III. Development in the Hierarchy after the Exile.—Reforms.—In the books of Chronicles the Levites and Nehemiah which belong to them, point to a highly organized service in which singers, and players on musical instruments, porters (RV sometimes 'doorkeepers'), and Nethinim appear.

The Nethinim are always distinguished from the Levites, as in 1 Ch 9 (Neh 11), Ezr 2 (Neh 7) and elsewhere. Both singers and porters are distinguished from the Levites in documents contemporary with Nehemiah and Ezra, but included among them by the Chronicler (cf. 1 Ch 913-24 (Neh 11, 16) 1513-24 etc. with Ezr 7103 34, Neh 7103). This shows that the 'porters and singers' came to be regarded as 'Levites,' and were believed to be descended from one tribe. Meanwhile the more menial work of the Levites passed into the hands of the Nethinim, who are said in a Chronicler's note to have been given by David to do the work of the sanctuary (vv. 1-15), but are now exempted from taxation by a decree of Artaxerxes. What is apparently the first mention of them is in what is, on the face of it, a list of the families which returned from the Exile in Ezr 2 (Neh 7), in which the singers, porters, and Nethinim appear as separate classes. A closer examination, however, of the parallel passages makes it clear that the list in Nehemiah is not what was in the Chronicler's mind. In Ex 721, where they as well as the Nethinim were given (nethinim) to the priests (cf. Ezr 835 with Nu 189).

2. (a) Their history.—The origin of the singers and porters is unknown. That they were both in existence in some form when Ezra began his work of reform is clear from Ezr 711, where they are mentioned in the list of the Levites to be given (nethinim) to the priests. What is apparently the first mention of them is in what is, on the face of it, a list of the families which returned from the Exile in Ezr 2 (Neh 7), in which the singers, porters, and Nethinim appear as separate classes. A closer examination, however, of the parallel passages makes it clear that the list in Nehemiah is not what was in the Chronicler's mind. In Ex 721, where they as well as the Nethinim were given (nethinim) to the priests (cf. Ezr 835 with Nu 189).

The Chronicler in Ezr 3, after giving the list of Levites, porters, and Nethinim, appears to have taken the whole extract from the same source as in Nehemiah; Ezr 2 cannot, therefore, be cited as independent evidence for the early date of this list.

The Chronicler might very naturally have arisen out of the necessity of defending the city and Temple from hostile attack (2 Ch 23, Neh 11). The complicated reforms in Ezr 3 suggest that an original necessity had become a stately ceremonial.

The Chronicler, or at any rate the musicians, of Nehemiah's time appear to have belonged to one particular guild, that of Asaph (Neh 12-19). This particular guild would appear to be a later insertion of the Chronicler, who ascribed to David all the Temple institutions not already assigned to Moses in P.

It appears from Neh 7 that Nehemiah probably went a long way in re-organizing the work of Levites, singers and porters.

(6) The Books of Chronicles and the Psalms as a whole point to a later development of the Temple offices. (1) Several guilds connected with the names of Korah, Heman, and Jeduthun (or Ethan) were added. The guilds of Asaph and Korah, and perhaps Heman and Jeduthun, had each a psalm-book of their own, of which several were afterwards incorporated into the general Psalter (see Ps 73-85, 87-89, 1 Ch 1513-25). On the other hand, in 1 Ch 91, the Korahites, who were perhaps really of Levitical origin, are represented as doing the menial work, which had been done by the Levites in days of old.

It is impossible to say which represents the earlier arrange-
PRIESTS AND LEVITES

1. PRIEST IN THE OT.—In the OT, the term 'priest' (Heb. kohen, Gr. hieros) appears without any definite meaning as to the office. The OT does not distinguish between the Levitical and the Aaronic priesthood. The expression 'priest of the Lord' (Heb. hophniym, Gr. hierá) was a general designation for the religious official, whether Aaronite or Levitical. The Levitical priesthood held a higher position than the Aaronic priesthood and the order was to some extent a hierarchy. The Levitical priesthood was divided into the Kohathites, Gershonites, and the Merarites, each with their own duties and responsibilities. The high priest was the leader of the Levitical priesthood and was the direct descendant of Aaron. He was responsible for the spiritual and ritual life of the Israelites.

2. PRIESTS IN THE NT.—In the NT, the term 'priest' (Gr. hieros) takes on a new meaning. It is used to denote anyone who functions as a mediator between God and humanity. This includes not only the high priest, but also the priests of the temple, and the Baptist, who was a priest of the order of Aaron. The NT also introduces the concept of an lay person being a priest, which is the case with Paul, who said, "priest of the gospel of God." This concept of the priesthood is based on the idea that all believers are called to represent God to the world and to bring the world to God. This is known as the "priesthood of all believers." The NT also emphasizes the idea of a priest who is "set apart," which is exemplified in the life of Christ, who is the ultimate high priest. The NT also introduces the concept of "priests for all times," which is exemplified in the life of Christ, who is the ultimate high priest. The NT also introduces the concept of "priests for all times," which is exemplified in the life of Christ, who is the ultimate high priest.
PRIEST (IN NT)

Place with his offering of blood (He 9:22). Most frequently of all the word occurs in the plural form 'chief priests' (archiereis), an expression that probably designates a high-priestly party consisting of the high priest proper, the ex-high priests, and the members of those privileged families from which the high priests were drawn (v. 3). In the Ep. to the Hebrews Christ is described as both priest and high priest, and the fact that Melchizedek (wh. see), the chosen type of His eternal priesthood, is also described by the same two terms (cf. 5' with v. 10, 6' with 7') shows that no distinction in principle is to be thought of, and that Christ is called a high priest simply to bring out the dignity of His priesthood. This conception of Christ as a priest is clearly stated in no other book of the NT, though suggestions of it appear elsewhere, and esp. In the Johannine writings (e.g. Jn 17:19, Rev 1:4). In Heb. it is the regulating idea in the contrast that the author works out with such elaboration between the Old and the New Covenants. He thinks of a mediating priest as essential to a religion, and his purpose is to show the immense superiority in this respect of the new religion over the old. He finds certain points of contact between the priesthood of Aaron and that of Christ. This, indeed, was essential to his whole system. The foundation of the Aaronic having a shadow of the good things to come (10:1), and of the priests who offer gifts according to the Law as serving 'that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things' (8'). Christ was Divinely ordained and commissioned, even as Aaron was (5' 4). He too was taken from among men, was tempted like His fellows, learned obedience through suffering, and so was qualified by His own human sympathies to be the High Priest of the human race (4'42, 5'8). But it is pre-eminently by way of antithesis and not of likeness that the Aaronic priesthood is used to illustrate the priesthood of Christ. The New Testament of the Jewish faith were sinful men, while Jesus was absolutely sinless (4'8). They were mortal creatures, 'many in number, because that by death they are hindered from continuing' (7'), while Jesus 'abides ever,' and so 'hath his priesthood unchangeable' (v. 4'). The sacrifices of the Jewish Law were imperfect (10'2): but Christ 'by one offering hath perfected for ever them that are being sanctified' (10'1). The sanctuary of the old religion was a worldly structure (9'), and so liable to destruction or decay; but Christ enters 'into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God for us' (9'4).

And this contrast between the priesthood of Aaron and the mediatorial priesthood of Christ is brought to a head when Jesus is declared to be a priest—not after the order of Aaron at all, but after the order of Melchizedek (711'). 'Order,' it must be kept in mind, does not here refer to ministry, but to the high priest's personality—a fact which, when clearly perceived, saves us from much confusion in the interpretation of this Epistle. The distinctive order of Christ's priesthood is found in His own nature, above all in the fact that He is 'a priest for ever.' The Melchizedek high priest is conceived of all through as performing the same kind of priestly acts as we are discharged by the high priests of the house of Aaron; but the quality of His Person is quite different, and this completely alters the character of His acts, raising them from the realm of copies and shadows to that of absolute reality and eternal validity (cf. A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, 149).

PRINCE.—This is the tr. of a considerable number of Heb. and Gr. words, expressing different shades of meaning, e.g. 'chiatric,' 'ruler,' 'king,' 'governor,' 'noble,' 'deputy.' The main terms are 1. sar, 'one who has authority or power to rule.' It is used of rulers (Is 21:4, Nu 24:6 et al.), of royal officials (Gn 12:2, 2 K 24:2, et al.), of leaders in war (1 S 22:1), of tribal chieftains (e.g. Philistines, 1 S 18:39), of the chief butler and baker (Gn 40:2), of the keeper of prison (Gn 39:1), of the taskmaster (Ex 11:1), of the prince of the eunuchs (Dan 1:17). It came later to be applied to the guardian angels of the nations (Dan 10:13, 20, 21), to Michael the archangel (Dan 12:1). It is the most general term for prince, and occurs in the term, kroíh, 'princes,' used of the wives of Solomon (1 K 1:11), and also of Jerusalem 'princess among the provinces' (La 1:11), and it is translated 'ladies' in Jg 5:21 and 'queens' in Is 49:24.

2. a name who is high, conspicuous, outstanding.' It is applied to the governor of the palace (2 Ch 28:7), the keeper of the treasury (1 Ch 26:9), the chief of the Temple (1 Ch 9:1, 2 Ch 31:10); also to the chief of the tribes (2 Ch 11:18), the king himself (1 S 25:38), the high priest (Dn 9:6), and is occasionally in AV translated 'captain.'

3. nōš, 'one lifted up.' is applied to chiefs of tribes, princes of Ishmael (Gen 17:12), to Abraham (28:2), to Shechem (34:4), to Shechem (35:1), used of the heads of the Israelitic tribes, and translated 'ruler' in AV. The word is frequently in Ezekiel used of kings of Judah and foreign princes, and is also the proper name of the future head of the ideal State (24:24 etc.).

Other less frequent terms are nāšī 'installed,' portēmōn 'leading men,' qātsā 'judge,' šālīt 'officer,' kāstōn 'deputies.' In Dn 5:4, 5-6, the term 'princes of AV are Pentapolis' cataps, while in names Rabakēs, Rabukōs the prefix ṭāḇ signifies 'chief,' as also the proper name Resōn (1 K 11:24), which occurs as a common noun (rešōn) in Pr 14:4. We may also note that in Job 4:19 the word 'prince' (šālīmān) is wrongly rendered 'princes,' and in Ps 65:4 the word translated 'princes' is not found in any other passage, the text being likely corrupt.

1. archon, applied to Christ 'the Prince (author) of life' (Ac 3:14), 'Prince and Saviour' (Ac 5:34); so in He 2:6 Jesus is 'the author (AV) of salvation' and in He 12:2 the 'author and finisher of our faith.'

2. archon, used of Bukephal (Mt 20:28, Mk 10:41), of the princes of the Gentiles (Mt 20:30), of the princes of this world (1 Co 4:1), prince of the power of the air (Eph 2:2), the Prince of the kings of the earth (Rev 19).

3. μαγεύω, used of Belshazzar, 'not least among the princes of Judah' (Mt 26:18, cf. O.T. 'prophets').

PRISCA, PRISCILLA.—See AQUILA AND PRISCILLA.

PRISON.—Imprisonment. In the modern sense of strict confinement under guard, had no recognized place as a punishment for criminals under the older Hebrew legislation (see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 9). The first mention of such, with apparently legal sanction, is in the post-exilic passage Ezr 7:24. A prison, however, figures at an early period in the story of Joseph's fortunes in Egypt, and is denoted by an obscure expression, found only in this connection, which means 'the Round House' (Gen 39:16). Some take the expression to signify a round tower used as a prison, others consider it the Hebraized form of an Egyptian word (see Driver, Com. on Ex), which Joseph had already found that a disinclined easter was a convenient place of detention on the 37th and Jer 37:14 in the expression rendered by AV 'dungeon' and dungeon house respectively; also alone in 35:16.

The story of Jeremiah introduces us to a variety of other places of detention, no fewer than four being named in 37:12-14, two of these are later cloisters. Rigorous imprisonment is implied by all the four. The first 'prison' of v. 16 AV denotes literally 'the house of bonds,' almost identical with the Philistine 'prison house,' in which Samson was bound 'with fetters of brass' (Jg 16:22). The second word rendered 'prison' in Jer 37:3 (also v. 4, 13 52:9 and elsewhere) is a synonym meaning 'house of restraint.' The third is the 'dungeon house' above mentioned, while the fourth is a difficult term, rendered 'cabins' by AV, 'cells' by RV. It is regarded by some as a prison, however, as a gloss on the third term, as the first is on the second.

Jeremiah had already had experience of an irksome form of detention, when placed in the stocks (20:9; cf. Ac 16:16), an instrument which, as the etymology shows, compelled the prisoner to sit in a crooked posture. 2 Ch 16:9 mentions a 'house of the stocks' (RVm; EV 'prison house'), which is associated with the stocks (so RV for AV 'prison') an obscure instrument of punishment, variously rendered 'shackles' (RV), 'pillory' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.), and 'collar' (Driver). The last of these is a favourite Chinese form of punishment.

In NT times Jewish prisons doubtless followed the Greek and Roman models. The prison into which John the Baptist was thrown (Mt 14:10) is said by Josephus to have been in the castle of Macheras, the prison in which Peter and John were put by the Jewish authorities (Ac 4:2 AV 'hold,' RV 'ward') was doubtless the same as the 'public ward' of μορίων AV (common prison). St. Paul's experience of imprisonment was even more extensive than Joseph's, or even than that of John the Baptist. 28', varying from the mild form of restraint implied in Ac 23:31, at Rome, to the severity of the 'inner prison' at Philippi (16:3), and the final horrors of the Mamertine dungeon.

PROCONSUL.—This was originally two words—pro consule, meaning a magistrate with the insignia and powers of a consul. Whether 28:28 associates with the term, procurator of the Emperor is uncertain. In Rome it gave place to a rule of two men, not called by the new denoted name, but named praetores ('generals') or consules ('collegues'). As the Roman territory increased, men of praetorian or consular rank were required to govern the provinces (1 Th 5:12), and the number of proconsuls increased. During the Empire all governors of senatorial provinces were called procursors, whether they were ex-consuls and governed important provinces like Asia and Africa, or merely ex-praetors (1 Th 5:12). A praetor, who governed a less important province, Achaia.

PROCURATOR.—Originally a procurator was a steward of private property, who had charge of the slaves and his master's financial affairs. His importance depended on that of his master. Thus the Emperor's stewards were persons of consequence, and were sometimes trusted with the government of some less important Imperial provinces as well as with the Emperor's financial affairs in all provinces. They were of equestrian rank, like Theophilus, to whom the third Gospel and Acts are addressed. The following were at different times procurators of Judea: Pontius Pilate, Felix, and Festus, called in NT by the comprehensive term 'governors.'

PROFANE.—'To profane' is 'to make ceremonially unclean,' 'to make unholy.' And so a 'profane person' (He 12:16) is an 'ungodly person,' a person of common, coarse life, not merely of speech.

PROGNOSTICATOR.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY, and STARS.

PROMISE.—Although the OT is the record of God's promises to lowly saints and to anointed kings, to patriarchs and to prophets, to the nation of His choice and to the world at large, the word itself is only found in the EV, and less frequently in the RV than in the AV. The Heb. noun ādāhār is generally rendered 'word,' but 'promise' is found in 1 K 8:9, Neh 5:19.
PROMISE

In Ps 105:4 the change made in the RV reminds us that God's "holy word" is always a 'holy promise.' Similarly, the Heb. word urther is usually tr. 'speak'; but 'promise' is found in Ex 12:6, Jer 33:26 etc. In several passages, as e.g., Dt 10:20, Neh 9:18, the RV gives 'speak' or 'say' instead of 'promise.' A complete study of the subject would therefore require a consideration of the whole question of OT prophecy. 'For thy word's sake' is the ultimate appeal of those who can say 'thou art God, and thy words are truth, and thou hast promised.' (Ps 102:17: RV.) See Promise.

1. In a few passages (Jos 6, Neh 9, Est 4, Mt 14, Mk 14, Ac 7, 2 P 29) the reference is to a man's promises to his fellow-man; once only (Ac 23:29) the noun has this meaning in the NT. In Dt 29:4 the verb refers to man's promises to God, and is synonymous with vowing unto God. This passage is instructive, on account of the stress that is laid on the voluntary nature of the obligation that is incurred by him who promises or makes a vow. Driver renders 'according as thou hast vowed freely unto Jehovah, thy God, which that thou hast spoken (promised) with thy mouth.' (ICC, loc.) The thought of spontaneity is an essential part of the meaning of the word when it is used of God's promises to man, and especially of 'the promise' which comprises all the blessings of the Messianic Kingdom (Ac 2:23 etc.).

2. The Gr. word epanelekthai, tr. 'promise,' is found only in the middle voice in the NT; its root-meaning is 'to announce oneself,' hence it comes to signify 'to offer one's services,' and 'to engage oneself voluntarily to render a service.' Delitzsch derives the NT conception of the promise from the Rabbinic phraseology concerning 'assurance.' A typical example is Bar. R. 76: 'for the plaus there is no assurance (promise) in this age;' cf. Apoc. Bar 58', the promise of life hereafter' (The Words of Jesus, p. 105).

The promises of God are numerous (2 Co 1:20); they are also 'precious and exceeding great' (2 P 1). His every word of grace is a promise; even His commandments are氤onomic, conditional only upon men's willingness to obey. When God commanded the children of Israel to go in to possess the land, it was as good as theirs; already He had 'lifted up' His hand to give it them; but the promise implied in the command was made of no effect through their disobedience. The possession of Canaan, the growth of the nation, universal blessing through the race, are examples of promises of which the patriarchs did not receive the outward fulfillment (He 11:21). Abraham 'obtained the promise,' because the birth of Isaac was the beginning of its fulfillment ( Heb 11:9); on the other hand, he is one of the fathers who received not the promise, 'but with a true faith looked for a fulfillment of the promises which was not granted to them' (cf. Westcott's note on He 11).

3. The NT phrase 'inherit the promises' (He 6; cf. 11, Gal 3:29) is found in Ps. Sol 132 (n.c. 70 to n.c. 40).

This passage is probably 'the first instance in extant Jewish literature where the expression "the promises of the Lord" sums up the assurances of the Messianic redemption' (Ryle and James, Com., in loc.). In the Gospels the word 'promise' is used in this technical sense only in Lk 24:47, where 'the promise of the Father' refers to the gift of the Holy Spirit (cf. Ac 1:23, 33, Gal 3:14, Eph 1:13). The Ep. to the Hebrews is especially rich in passages which make mention of promises fulfilled (He 1:1, 4:2, 9:17, 7:18 etc.), but both in his speeches and in his Epistles St. Paul looks at the Christian gospel from the same point of view (Ac 13:22, 28:17, Ro 9:4, Gal 4:2, Eph 3:7; cf. the only Johannine use of 'promises' in 3:17, 19); there are promises to encourage believers as they strive to perfect holiness (2 Co 8), whilst 'to them that love him' the Lord hath 'promised the crown of life' (Ja 1:12); there is also the unfulfilled 'promised one coming' (2 Pt 3). But 'how many sower be the promises of God, in him is the Yea; wherefore also through him is the Amen, unto the glory of God through us.' J. G. TASKER.

PROPHET, PROPHETS.—Hebrew prophecy represents a religious movement of national and worldwide importance, not paralleled elsewhere in history. Most significant in itself, it has acquired deeper and wider import through its connexion with Christianity and the philosophy of religion generally. The present article will deal in brief in outline with (1) the inspiration, and (3) the functions and special teaching of the prophets of the OT; also (4) with the special topic of Messianic prophecy and its fulfilment in the NT.

1. History and prophecy. Proposition proper may be said to have extended from the 6th to the 4th cent. n.c. During these centuries at least, prophecy was a recognized, flourishing, and influential power in Israel. But a long preparatory process made ready for the work of Amos, Isaiah, and their successors, and it is not to be understood that with the last of the canonical writings the spirit of prophecy disappeared entirely from the Jewish nation. It is not surprising that the beginnings of Hebrew prophecy are lost in comparative obscurity. Little light is shed upon the subject by a comparison between similar phenomena in other religions. It is true that among Semitic and other peoples the idea of a self-fulfilling oracle of the gods, connected with the spoken words of the deity and considered as his will, was frequently practised with special intercourse with the deity and entrusted with special messages from heaven, or an unusual power of prognostication of future events. The line which separated the priest from the prophet was not always clearly traced, and the early times a very narrow one, and sometimes the functions of the two offices were blended. In Israel also, during the earlier stages of history, lower conceptions of the Divine will and human modes of obtaining knowledge of it prevailed, together with practices hardly to be distinguished from pagan rites. The description in Dt 18:15-19 proves how long these mantic ideas and customs lingered on in the midst of the deep-seated spiritual light. When the true significance of prophecy came to be understood, the contrast between it and theheavenly divination was very marked, but the process by which this stage was reached was gradual. Its course cannot always be clearly traced, and down to the Christian era, the lower and less worthy popular conceptions existed side by side with the high standard of the prophetic ideal.

No certain information can be gathered from the names employed. The word which is frequently used in OT (more than 300 times) is הָבוֹל, but its derivation is doubtful. It was long associated with a root meaning 'to speak,' and would thus denote the ecstatic influence of inspiration, but it is now more usually connected with a kindred Arabic word meaning 'to announce.' Two other words—רְאָה, which occurs 9 times (7 times of Samuel), and אָבָה, about 20 times—are of known derivation and are both translated "seer." The historical note in 1 S 9 marks the fact that רְאָה passed comparatively out of use after Samuel's time, but both it and אָבָה are used later as synonymous of נָבֹע, and in Chronicles there appears to be a revival of knowledge of it. We shall probably not be far wrong if we find in the words the two main characteristics of the prophet as "seer" and "prophet," the spiritual vision which gave him knowledge, and the power of utterance which enabled him to declare his message with power. Other passages employed are—"man of God," used elsewhere in history for the prophet, and others; "servant of God," a term not limited to prophets as such; "messenger of Jehovah," chief in the later writings; and once, in Hes 9, the significant synonym for a prophet is used, "man of the spirit," or "the man that hath the spirit"

We may distinguish three periods in the history of prophecy: (1) sporadic manifestations before the time of Samuel, (2) the rise and growth of the institution from Samuel to Amos, (3) the period marked out by the canonical prophetic writings.

(1) In dealing with the first, it will be understood that the literary record is later than the events described, and the forms of speech used must be estimated accordingly. But it may be noted that in Gn 20: Abraham is called a prophet, and in Ps 105: the name is given to the patriarchs generally. In Ex 3: Aaron is described as a prophet to Moses who was 'made a god to Pharaoh.' In Nu 12: it is the incident of Eldad and Jeconiah shows that in the wilderness 'the spirit rested' on certain men, enabling them to 'prophesy.' The episode of Balsam in Nu 22:24 is very instructive in its bearing upon the idea of the revelation of God. It is a helpful and most beautiful text for insight into the nature of prophecy. In Nu 23:3 the Divine Intercourse vouchsafed to Moses—'with him I will speak mouth to mouth, even manifestly,'—is distinguished from the lower kind of revelation, in a vision, in a dream, granted to the people; and in Nu 18:7 Moses is described as possessing the highest type of prophetic endowment. Later, Deborah is described (Jg 4:6) as both a prophetess and a judge, and an anonymous source ascribes the composition of the book of Judges to her. In Jdg 6:3 Samson was not a prophet, but upon him, as a Nazirite from infancy, 'the spirit of Jehovah began to move' in youth, and it 'came mightily upon him in accordance with O.T.'s special revelation given to Samuel, there came a 'man of God' to Eli, rebuking the evil-doings of his sons and announcing punishment to come. It must be borne in mind, moreover, that during all this period God was, according to the O.T. narrative, speaking to His people in various ways, revealing Himself by dreams and visions, or through special messengers, though the term 'prophet' but seldom occurs.

It is generally recognized that a new era begins with Samuel. Peter in Ac 3:7 used a current mode of speech when he said 'all the prophets from Samuel and them that followed after,' and the combination in the prophet and the judge enabled him to prepare the way for the monarchy. The statement in 1 S 3: that in the time of Eli 'the word of Jehovah was rare' and that 'vision' was not widely diffused or frequent, points to the need of clearer and fuller revelation such as began with Samuel. This new spirit continued through the middle and late periods of the monarchy, though it was not uniformly in evidence. But at Ramah (1 S 16:14), at Nabal (2 S 6), at Bethel, Jericho, Gilgal, and other places there were settlements which may be described as training-schools for religious purposes, and there provided a succession of men, who were in theory, and to some extent in practice, animated by the devoted and fervent spirit which was necessary for the maintenance of the prophetic fire in the nation. Music formed a prominent part in the worship (1 S 16:13). These societies might constitute a true and abiding witness for Jehovah (1 K 18:17), or they might be characterized by false patriotism and subserviency to a popular policy (1 K 22:29). Saul was at one time bewitched under their influence in a remarkable manner (1 S 19:18), and Samuel evidently exercised a commanding influence over them, as did Eli, a later day. To these 'colleges' may probably be traced the preservation of certain national traditions and the beginnings of historical literature in Israel.

David is styled a 'prophet' in Ac 2:27, but this is not in accordance with O.T. usage, though the Spirit of Jehovah is said to have rested on him as a psalmist (2 S 23:1). In his time began that close association between kings and prophets which continued in varying phases until the Exile. Nathan the prophet was his faithful spiritual adviser, and Gad is described as 'the king's seer' (2 S 12:24). Both these counsellors exercised a wholesome influence upon the large-hearted, but sometimes erring, king, and according to the Chronicler they assisted him in organizing Divine worship (2 Ch 29:7). Nathan, Ahiah of Shiloh, and Iddo the seer are mentioned in 2 Ch 9:28 as having taken part in the compilation of national records, history and prophecy having been from the first closely associated in Israel. In Solomon's time prophecy would seem to have been in abeyance.

But it appears again in connexion with the description of the Kingdom, and from this time forwards in Israel and Judah the relation between Church and State, between king and prophet, was of an intimate and very close kind. The prophet, as a man specially endowed with the spirit of God, did not hesitate to warn, rebuke, oppose, and sometimes remove, the king who was 'God's anointed.' But when the monarch was not a strong hand, Elijah, in the idolatrous times of Ahab, is the very type of the uncompromising and undaunted reformer; and Elisha, though of a milder character and with a less exact task to accomplish, was instrumental in the overthrow of the ungodly house of Omri (2 K 9). These two are essentially prophets of action; the writing prophets do not appear till a century later.

(3) It is inevitable that for us at least a new era of prophecy should appear to set in with the earliest prophetic book that has come down to us. We are dependent upon our records and though the continuity of prophecy was not quite broken, the history of the prophets assumes a new character when we read their very words at length. Amos, the first in chronological order, shows in 20:6 that he was only one of the long line of witnesses, and that he was but recalling the people to an allegiance they had forgotten or betrayed. But he introduces the golden age of prophecy, in which Isaiah was prominent, and to which the modern critic has carried the analysis of the prophetic books as they have come down to us so far that it is not easy to present the chronology of the prophetic writings in a tabular form. But it may be said roughly and generally that six prophets belong to the Assyrian period, Hosea in the Northern Kingdom, about the middle of the 8th cent. B.c., and Isaiah and Micah in the Southern, a little later, whilst Zephaniah and Nahum belong to the early part of the 7th, and minor prophets to the 7th and 6th centuries. From the Chaldean period we find Jeremiah and Habakkuk before the Exile (c. 586), and Ezekiel during the formative period of the Captivity. Before its close appears the second Isaiah (perhaps about 540), and after the Return, Haggai and Zechariah (chs. 1—8), whilst Malachi prophesied in the middle of the 5th cent. B.C. The dates of Joel, Jonah, Obadiah, and Zec 9—14 are still debated, but in their present form these books are generally considered post-exilic. Many chapters of Isaiah, notably 24—27, are ascribed to a comparatively late date.

It is impossible here to trace the fluctuations in prophetic power and influence, and the varying fortunes of the nation throughout the period of the monarchy. The Northern Kingdom came to an end in b.c. 722, but for more than 150 years and longer the prophets in Judah who added the repeated efforts at national reformation made by kings like Hezekiah and Josiah. These, however, met with little permanent success, and a change in the character of prophecy begins with Jeremiah. Thus far the prophets had aided the cause of religious and civil progress by bringing to bear upon national policy the moral principles of the religion of Jehovah, but at times taken, the recuperative power of the nation declined, 'false' prophets gained predominating influence, and the true prophet's task grew more and more hopeless. All that remained for Jeremiah was to preach submission to foreign foes, and the imminence of coming judgment, and to point out the spiritual fulfillment of promises which could no longer be realized by any means of any earthly monarch or dynasty. It was the painful duty of Jeremiah to oppose princes, priests, and people alike, as his predecessors had done, and to stand alone, charged with lack of patriotism, if not with actual treachery. Though a man of peaceable and kindly temperament, he was involved in perpetual quibbles, and whenever he was tempted to withdraw from a thankless and apparently useless office, the

The burning individual ancient his Jahweh may no Mac the ‘writings.' dreams distinguishing and of their sages was now filled up; they raised as a nation their suffer practical extinction; but stress was laid upon the importance of individual fidelity and the fulness of spiritual blessing which might still be enjoyed, whilst hopes of material good and moral prosperity had been distinctly anticipated.

The fall of Jerusalem brought with it many changes. Ezekiel adopted and expanded many of Jeremiah’s ideas, but his forecasts of restitution, as delivered to the exiles in Babylon, took fresh shapes, determined by his circumstances, his personal temperament, and the fact that he was priest as well as prophet. It was left for a great unknown seer to deliver in the second part of the Book of Isaiah the most spiritual message of all, and to re-animate his countrymen by means of pictures glowing with larger and brighter hopes than any of his predecessors had portrayed. But after the return from captivity prophecy did not renew its ancient fires. Haggai and Zechariah and the minor stars in the great constellation, and the book known as ‘Malachi’ testifies to a dwindling inspiration, though fidelity to truth, and hope of fuller Divine manifestations yet continued. An entirely extinct in God’s messengers and representatives.

At last Ps 72:1 and 1 Mac 4:107 and 114 point to a time when ‘signs’ were no longer seen among the prophets. ‘There is no nation, and any prophet, that is there any among us that knoweth how long.’ The latest ‘prophetic’ book, Daniel, does not properly belong to this list; it was not reckoned by the Jews among the prophets, but in the third part of the sacred canon known as ‘writings.’ The remarkable visions it contains do not recall the lofty spirit or the burning words of Isaiah; they contain another kind of declaration, and belong not to prophecy but to apocalyptic.

Nearly two centuries elapsed before John the Baptist, the last prophet under the Old Covenant and the forerunner of the New, came in the very spirit and power of Elijah to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him.

2. Inspiration of the prophets.—When we seek to pass from the outward phenomena of prophecy to its inner mental processes, from its history to its psychology, many questions arise which cannot be definitely answered. How did God reveal His will to the prophets? In what did their inspiration consist? How far were their natural faculties in abeyance, or, on the other hand, heightened and strengthened? Did the prophet fully understand his own message? How could personal errors and prejudices be distinguished from direct Divine affluence? To these questions no simple categorization can be made. Scripture sheds sufficient light on them for all practical purposes.

It must be borne in mind that prophecy has a history, that the record is one of development—of rise, progress, and decay—and that precise definitions which take no account of these changes are misleading. Some forms of inspiration are higher than others, and a measure of advance is discernible from the lower forms which belonged rather to the soothsayer, to those higher modes in which the distinguishing characteristics of all the different forms of the process are not always discernible, but the distinction between lower and higher is to be drawn according as (1) the prophet was a mere unconscious inspiration or his highest mental and spiritual faculties were enlisted in his work; (2) the inward revelation of the Divine will was or was not bound up with external and objective manifestations; and especially (3) the moral and spiritual element in the message became its distinguishing feature, in contrast with a mere non-ethical ‘seeking for signs.’ Revelation by means of dreams and visions was recognized throughout, and in Nu 12:1, Dt 13:1, Jer 23:6 a dreamer of dreams is synonymous with a prophet. The distinction between dream and vision appears to be that the former occurred in sleep, the latter in a kind of ecstatic waking state, the seer ‘falling down and having his eyes open.’ But the distinction is not strictly enforced, and in the Hexateuch, and where the Elohist speaks of dreams, the Jahwist more frequently describes God as speaking directly to His messengers. Sidel by side with revelation by means of dreams and visions is a more spiritual enlightenment which we associate with Hebrew prophecy at its best state.

It was not necessary that a prophet should receive a formal ‘call’ to undertake the office. Many were trained in the schools who never became prophets; and some prophets, like Amos, received no preparation, whether in the schools or elsewhere. Upon some, the affluence appears to have descended occasionally for a special purpose, whilst in other cases the influence of the Divine Spirit was permanent, and they were set apart to the work of a lifetime. The important point was that in every case the Spirit of God must rest upon His messenger in order to make him in all other influences and ideas, and this higher impulse must be obeyed at all costs. The prophet must be able to announce with unswerving confidence, ‘Thus saith the Lord.’ In some instances a description is given of the manner in which this overpowering conviction came upon the man. Samuel was (perhaps) called as a child; Amos exclaimed, when both king and priest did their best to shut his mouth, ‘Who art thou, Jehovah?’ Isaiah, when he was a youth, was strengthened to be as an iron pillar and a brass wall against the whole force of the nation, because God had put His words in his mouth. The vision of the chariot which came to Ezekiel by the Chubar dominated his imagination and moulded all his ministry. Whether a ‘vocation’ prepared and moulded sense was, or was not, vouchsafed at the opening of a prophet’s course, it was absolutely essential that he should be directly moved by the Spirit of God to deliver a message which he felt to be an irresistible and overwhelming revelation of the Divine will.

The phraseology used to describe this inspiration, though varied, points entirely in this direction. The Spirit of the Lord is described as coming mightily upon David, Saul (1 Sa 10:10); the hand of the Lord was on Elijah (1 K 18:10; Ezk 1); or the Spirit ‘clothed itself’ with the man as in Jg 6:18, 2 Ch 24:22; or Michah is said to be full of power by the spirit of the Lord (Dan 10:12). Jacob’s transgression (39). Perhaps the impulsions were more violent and external in the earlier history, whilst in the later more room was left for human free-will, and for discriminating comprehension of the Divine will and word. Still, it would be a mistake to suppose that the overmastering power of the Divine commission was relaxed in the later prophetic period. No stronger expressions to describe this are found anywhere than those used by Jeremiah, who ‘sat alone because of God’s hand,’ and to whom God’s word was ‘as a burning fire shut up in his bones,’ so that he could not contain (15:29).

The idea of communicating the Divine will, nor the precise measure of personal consciousness which obtained in the prophetic state, can be defined; these varied according to circumstances. But speaking generally, it may be said that the personality of the prophet was not merged or absorbed in the Divine, nor was his mind as an inanimate harp or lyre which the Divine Spirit used as a mere instrument. Moses is represented as holding back from the Lord His commandments, and the High Priest with God’s glory (Ex 33), as representing himself as a sacrifice to appease the Divine anger (32:9).

Amos succeeded in modifying the Divine decree (7:4), and PROPHETY, PROPHETS

Jeremiah was very bold in reproaching the Most High with having given him an impossible task, and as having apparently failed to fulfill His own promises (15:9). A careful study of all the phenomena would go to show that whilst supernatural power and operation were taken for granted, the workings of the prophetic mind under inspiration were not very different from some of the experiences of saints in all ages. Divine and human elements being blended in varying proportions. The fact of inspiration, rather than its mode, is the important feature in the Bible narratives.

A similar answer must be given to the question whether the prophets understood their own prophecies. For the most part they understood them very well, and expressed themselves with remarkable clearness and accuracy. What they often did not understand, and could not be expected to understand, was the full bearing of their words upon contingent events and their application to conditions as yet in the far future. In this respect, as in others, their prophecies are more to be considered as provisional, or under certain circumstances, the fulfillment of their words should come to pass. But the declaration of moral principles required no such elucidation, and the prophets were the first to recognize that the fulfillment of their words depended on the reception in which they were received. For the work of the prophet was not to mouth out oracles, mystic sayings obscure to the mind of the speaker and enigmatical to the hearers, like the utterances of Delphi or Dodona. The root idea of prophecy is revelation, not mystery-mongering—Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets' (Am 37).

Among the more important questions concerning the nature of prophetic inspiration gather round the existence of 'false prophecies'—this term does not occur in the Hebrew text—the line of distinction between the true and false. What the oracle was, or what was not inspired, and could not be expected to understand, was the full bearing of their words upon contingent events and their application to conditions as yet in the far future. In this respect, as in others, their prophecies are more to be considered as provisional, or under certain circumstances, the fulfillment of their words should come to pass. But the declaration of moral principles required no such elucidation, and the prophets were the first to recognize that the fulfillment of their words depended on the reception in which they were received. For the work of the prophet was not to mouth out oracles, mystic sayings obscure to the mind of the speaker and enigmatical to the hearers, like the utterances of Delphi or Dodona. The root idea of prophecy is revelation, not mystery-mongering—Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets' (Am 37).

The most obvious answer to the question whether the prophets understood their own prophecies was a very determined one. This is the case of the Lord's declaration to Jeremiah: 'They will say, the oracle of the Lord!—and you will say, it is the word of the Lord. For whether a prophet is called by the Lord or not, he explains the meaning of the word of the Lord, as if he were giving it to himself. Some think that the prophecy was inspired, for they say that the Lord gave the prophet the word, and the prophet explained it to himself. Others think that the prophecy was not inspired, for they say that the Lord did not give the prophet the word, and the prophet explained it to himself. There is no way of deciding this question, as it is impossible to know whether a prophet is inspired or not.' The prophets themselves were deceived, and how were the people to distinguish between the true and the false? It is possible that the prophets themselves were deceived, and how were the people to distinguish between the true and the false?

Ostensibly both classes had the same ends in view—the honour of Jehovah and the prosperity of the nation. But some put religious principles before, and taught that righteousness would follow obedience; others, blinded by false ideas of national advantage, thought they were doing God good by following a policy which seemed likely to lead to the downfall of His people. The reason for this difference has often been observed in the Christian Church between a true religious leader and a mere ecclesiastic, honestly persuaded that whatever advancement 'the Church' must be for the Divine glory, but who, none the less, perverts the truth by setting the means above the end. Lower ideas of God, of morality, and of true national prosperity lay at the root of the utterances of the false prophets. The main distinction between them and the true prophets was in their inspiration. The spiritual one, and discrimination was possible only by trying each on its own merits.

But certain tests are suggested. Sometimes (a) a sign or wonder was wrought in attestation (Dt 13:2), but even this was not conclusive, and the true prophets seldom availed upon this evidence. Again, (b) in Dt 13, the test of prediction is added as a test. Clearly that could not be applied at once, and it would rather be used afterwards to settle the very present history. The people had occasion about to enter on a battle or an alliance. But (c) the people were expected to use their moral and spiritual insight and distinguish the issues set before them, as a man has to judge for himself in questions of conscience. In the case of Hananiah (Jer 28), an example is given of two lines of national policy presented by two leading prophets, and the process of judging between the true and the false was a part of the education through which Israel was called to pass, and in which unfortunately it often failed. The difficulty of this process of discrimination was often lightened (d) by watching the career of the prophets, as to how near their character bore out their professions, what motives actuated them—whether crooked policy, immediate expediency, or high self-denial and self-sacrifice—that was the tale. Certainly the prophets were successful in foretelling the future, and in what would happen in the future, and in recording the events of prophecy. The people were not to be deceived by the false prophet's words, but to believe in the true prophet's words, and to follow his teachings, as he was the one who spoke in the name of the Lord. The true prophet's words were to be remembered and acted upon, as they were the words of the Lord. The false prophet's words were to be rejected, as they were the words of a deceived man. The true prophet's words were to be remembered and acted upon, as they were the words of the Lord. The false prophet's words were to be rejected, as they were the words of a deceived man.

His servant first to see and then to speak, did in certain cases inspire him also to write; and thus words which were intended in the first instance for rebellious Israel or disconsolate Judah have proved of perennial significances in the religious education of the world.

3. Functions and teaching.—One who was essentially a 'man of God' under the conditions of life which obtained in Israel must have had many parts to play, many duties to give; and many would be the lines in which he brought his influence to bear upon the life of his time. The prophetic office in its essence implied freedom from such routine duties as occupied (e.g.) the priest and later the scribe. These could easily be enumerated, but the work of the prophet, from its very nature, cannot be defined by strict boundary lines.

In the earliest times prophets were consulted on common matters of daily life. Samuel was asked by Saul's servant how to find the lost asses of his master. Later, inquiry was made concerning the sickness of Jeroboam and its probable issue, and Elisha throughout his life was sought for in times of private and domestic need. On another side of their lives the prophets were closely connected with literature; they compiled historical records and preserved the national chronicles (see 1 Ch 29:29). The narrative portions of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophetic books show that the prophet is a man whose searching glance may run backwards as well as forwards. It required a prophetic eye rightly to read the lessons of Israel's past, and to this day the inspired historical books of OT teach lessons which no other book could have perceived or conveyed. The work of other prophets lay in the department not of literature but of action, and—apart from Elijah and Elisha—some of the most notable figures in the prophetic succession have been distinguished, not so much for what they taught as because at the critical moment they threw the weight of deserved great influence into the right scale, and actually led the people in the right way.

These, however, were not the prophet's main functions. His chief work was to serve as a great moral and religious teacher, especially in relation to the duties of national life. He was sent to minister to his own age, to match his contemporaries the duties of the hour, to apply the highest religious principles to current questions of political and social life. In the course of the delivery of this message he was most of the time predicting, and this gave his teaching a most characteristic and important feature of the prophet's teaching that foretelling the future came to be regarded as his chief work. This was not strictly the case, since the forecasts of the future arose out of the delivery of the message to the speaker's own age. But prediction must be allowed its due place in an estimate of Hebrew prophecy; a reaction against the excessive stress formerly laid upon this element has unfortunately led to the opposite extreme of underestimating its importance.

Moral teaching was pre-eminent. The prophets were not exponents of the 'law' in the technical sense; that belonged to the priest (Jer 18:9); but the 'word' which was given to the prophet was an immediate revelation of the will of God, and was sometimes necessarily opposed to the orthodox and conventional religious teaching of men. More often, however, they strove by way of example to drive home their message, not by disputation but by a growing influence as between Egypt and Assyria (Is 30:); whilst, as already pointed out, it was sometimes the duty of a Jeremiah to preach submission to the power of Babylon, even though that course might be represented as pusil- lanimous truckling to enemies. In matters of the national policy, the prophet might be commissioned to announce the success or failure of certain projects, and to foretell the consequences of a given course of action. But if the future was to be correctly interpreted, it will be seen that the forecasts were for the most part conditional—If thou wilt hear and obey, thou shalt eat the good of the land; if not, thou shalt be devoured.

with the sword—the object of such vaticinations being pre-eminently moral, to bring the people to such a state of moral disorder that the threatened evil might be averted.

The value of such an institution in any State is obvious. J. S. Mill describes it as an ‘inevitably precious’ feature, that ‘the persons most eminent in genius and moral feeling could not, with the authorship of the Almanacks, give a higher and better interpretation of religion, which heretofore became a part of that religion.’ The power of the prophet has been compared to the modern liberty of the press. The comparison is sadly inadequate, for as the press represents the highest current of public opinion, whilst it was one of the chief duties of the prophet to rebuke public opinion in the light of higher truth, which he discerned as from a mountain top whilst all the valley below lay in darkness. That the ethical standard was maintained in Israel as high as it was, and that the Jews were the most progressive people of antiquity, and consequently the Greeks have so strongly influenced modern culture, is due mainly to the prophets.

Religious teaching was closely connected with the ethical. The prophet would not permit any severance of these two elements. The explanation of the freedom and beauty of the moral life on which they insisted was that it was not inculcated as a code, but as a service rendered by the holy and glorious God and propitiatory to offer the kind of service with which He would be pleased; hence the higher their conceptions of God were raised, the higher also became their standard of conduct. The prophets of the 8th cent. B.C. are sometimes described as the first teachers of ethical monotheism, but this position it would be difficult to establish. That the standard of the people had sunk sadly below that of the revelation granted to them is no marvel; and the prophets not only recalled them to their duty, but raised their very conceptions of Deity, is practically certain. But Amos, the first of the writing prophets, and his successors, inculcated a God-consciousness already developed, and his rebukes presuppose the knowledge of one holy God, and do not inculcate the doctrine for the first time. Both he and Hosea press home the duty of the people to return to the God they had forsakensometimes sternly, sometimes with tender and pathetic pleading: ‘O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? Thou art graven on the palms of my hands;’ or he describes not only of the wickedness of the times lay in the unfaithfulness of Israel to the God who had bound His people to Him by the closest ties, and their disobedience is described as infidelity to a spiritual marriage vow. The prophets strove and urged and remonstrated, ‘rising up early’ and pleading that they might win the heart of the people back to God, sure that thus and thus only, a basis could be secured permanently uprightness of national and individual character. From this point of view their words can never grow obsolete.

As to the predictive element in prophecy, it may be developed on every page, but it is not of the ‘fortune-telling’ order. Most of the predictions refer to national events, in Israel or surrounding nations. Some of these enter into detail, as in the overthrow of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead foretold by Micah (1 K 22°), and the failure of Sennacherib’s expedition announced by Isaiah. Others threaten in a more general way that punishment will follow disobedience, this strain becoming ever stermer and more pronounced as time advanced. These dark prophecies were fulfilled in the case of the Northern Kingdom in the 8th cent. B.C. and afterwards when Judah refused to take the warning, her calamities culminated in the capture and overthrow of Jerusalem. The prophets, however, are able to take a wider outlook, their penetrating gaze extends to the more distant future. This feature is so closely blended with the last, that it is sometimes hard to distinguish the two. But in the habit of the prophets to pass immedi and without warning from the nearer to the further horizon, and the question perpetually recurs—Of whom, of what period, spakest thou the prophet this? That their power of foresight was akin to the moral insight which otherwise would have been possessed, and which, in the same sense that he should undertake the task of interpretation, the poets may be admitted. But no parallel has been found in any other nation to the phenomena of Hebrew prophecy, especially in the continuous succession of men carrying on the work for generations. Many critics seek to eliminate the element of the supernatural from prophecy. But, whilst it may be granted that many prophecies were not fulfilled because they were given with a condition stated or implied, and that the poetical language of many others never was literally fulfilled, or intended to be so, there remain a considerable number of national prophecies which were fulfilled in a very remarkable manner, especially when we bear in mind that they ran directly counter to the prejudices of the times and were sometimes uttered at the risk of very life to the daring messenger himself.

A candid examination of the whole conditions of the case must lead to the admission of a supernatural power and knowledge in Hebrew prophecy—quite apart from the Messianic element, which will be considered separately. The attempt to explain this way has failed. The prophetic power was not exceptional political shrewdness, nor the mere sanguine expectation of enthusiasts, or the giddy foreboding of convinced pessimists; it was not like the second-sight of the Highlander, the effect of excitement or sensitive temperament, nor is it like as rationalism teaches, can all predictions be explained on the vaticinia post eventum principle, as history written after the event. On the other hand, supernatural enlightenment and divination must be in vain, and it may be freely admitted with Tholuck that the predictions were for the most part ‘not of the accidental, but of the religiously necessary,’ that they were mostly general, sometimes evident to a God-conscious person, who would find freedom of the persons addressed, and that while they contain what some call ‘failures,’ in broad outline they reflect with wonderful accuracy and force the word of God in relation to the principles and progress of human history.

4. Messianic prophecy and its fulfilment.—It was inevitable that teachers so commissioned by God to declare His will should take a wider range. Theirs was emphatically a message of hope—they were sent to prepare the way for a brighter future. Hence we find them passing, by rapid and almost inesamable gradations, from immediate to far distant issues, and descriptions of a Final Consummation are blended with their practical teaching as to present duty. In later Judaism these prospects of coming national felicity gathered around the term Messiah, the Anointed One, used to designate a coming Deliverer, through whose instrumentality the glories of the future age were to be realized. Christians believe that Jesus of Nazareth claimed to be, and was, the promised Messiah of the Jews, and the name ‘Messianic prophecy’ has been given to predictions which refer directly to the ideal personage of whose coming the prophets were the heralds. But this narrower meaning of the phrase is for several reasons unsatisfactory. In the first place, ‘Messiah’ is not a recognized OT term for this Deliverer; it may be questioned whether the word is once used in this sense. Further, there is a great body of prophetic utterances which belong to the ‘Messianic’ era, though no mention is made of a personal King or Saviour. And from the Christian view of the preparation for the coming of Christ was very various; many prophecies are believed to find direct fulfilment in Him, in which neither the name nor the idea of a personal Messiah occurs; hence ‘Messianic prophecy’ is now generally understood to mean all the OT promises which refer to the final accomplishment of God’s purposes for the nation and the world.

The whole OT religion is one of hope. God’s promises made to His people were large, his is the possession of their privileges were too lofty, to find full realization at any early stage of national development. And Israel itself was so intractable and unfaithful, and the gap between profession and practice was so painfully obvious, that the gaze of the whole world was fixed on the future. Sometimes the prospect was held out of a regenerated city, sometimes of an ideal temple and its worship, sometimes the idea prevailed of a personal manifestation of God Himself in the Godhead. Of His people, sometimes expectation pointed to a Ruler who would embody all the qualities of righteousness, wisdom, and power. Sometimes it was to a conspicuously lacking many monarchs of the Davidic line. Sometimes material considerations figured most largely in the pictures of the future—the fruitfulness of the land, abundance of corn and wine and oil; sometimes a promise filled the air like music, of an unprecedented peace which should bless the often invaded and always more or less disturbed country; sometimes a broad landscape picture was drawn of the extensive dominion and influence which Israel should exercise over the nations. Sometimes the ideal Prince of the house of David who that forecasts which contain a more directly personal reference should be separated from these others with which they were closely connected in the prophets' thoughts, especially as closer examination has tended to reduce the number of passages which may be described as directly Messianic.

A few central ideas lay at the heart of the whole. The Covenant which bound together God and His people, the idea of the Kingdom in which His law should prevail and His will be always done, were never very far from the prophet's mind. Correspondingly, the prophecies anticipated, the coming of the ideal King who would dwell in the City and at the head of the heavenly Temple, the ideal Israel, and especially the Divine Presence, the kingdom in which the future was to be a Theophany indeed.

It was only in the 2nd cent. B.C. that the term 'Messiah' became the focus in which all these rays were centralized. It looks as though the word was used as the equivalent of the king, 'Jehovah's anointed'; it is used of Cyrus, a heathen prince; in Is 45:4; possibly, though improbably, it may be understood as a proper name in Dn 16:7; whilst some would find in Ps 2 an almost unique use of the word to denote the Messianic or ideal Prince of the house of David who should rule all the nations with unparalleled and illimitable sway.

But if the term 'Messiah,' standing alone to designate a unique office, appears comparatively late in Jewish history, a less clearly defined idea of a personal Ruler and Deliverer pervaded the national thought for centuries before. The terms (1) 'Son of David,' pointing to a ruler of the Davidic line, together with 'Branch' or 'Seed' of David, with the same meaning; (2) 'Son of Man' applied to OT to Ezekiel and others, sometimes indicating man in his frailty, but sometimes man as God intended him to be; and (3) 'Son of God,' indicating the nation Israel, Israel's judges and Israel's king, all representing the Messiah and the hallowed people, was a way of thinking which the whole of Israel as a people, and in its midst, the Messiah should, in an undefined and unimaginable way, unite the excellences of the whole in His person. (4) One other name, such as would not have occurred to the earlier prophets, appears freely in Second Isaiah; and, as the event proved, influenced subsequent thought to an unexpectedly profound degree—the Servant of Jehovah's 'Sufferer and Saviour.' It was along these lines and others kindred to them which have not been named, that the preparation was made by the prophets for the coming of Israel's true Deliverer. When all are put together, it will be seen that the number of passages in which a Messianic idea is presented by name is unexpectedly small, the number which prepared the thoughts of the people for His Advent is exceedingly large, and these are so various in their character that it might well have seemed impossible that they should all be realized in one person.

It is quite impossible here to survey this vast field even in outline. But one point must not be lost sight of—the distinction between those prophecies which are directed to subsequent events involving the Messiah and those which are more lofty to be applied in any sense to a earthly kingdom, or where the context necessitates it, we may assume that the prophet's eyes were fixed, not on his contemporaries but on the far distance, and the period of the Consummation for which it was needed long to come. But without the mention of local and temporal conditions or of human imperfections makes it clear that the immediate reference of a passage is to the prophet's own times, whilst yet his glance shoots at intervals beyond them, there the words are only indirectly Messianic, and a typical significance is found in them. That is, the same ideas or principles are illustrated in the earlier as in the later dispensation, but in an inferior degree; the points of similarity and difference varying in their relative proportions, so that a person or an event or an institution under the Old Covenant may more or less dimly foreshadow the complete realization of the Divine purpose yet to come. The type may be described as a prophetic symbol.

The line between typical and directly prophetic passages is not always easy to draw. For example, it may be debated in what sense Ps 2. 8, 16, 45, 72 and others are 'Messianic,' the probability being that in every case the primary reference of the Psalmist was with the history that he knew, though his words in each case soared beyond their immediate occasion. So the language of Is 55—which for centuries has been understood as typical of Christian interests—extends directly to a suffering Messiah—is now understood by some of the best Christian scholars as referring at least in the first instance to faithful Israel. An Ideal personification of Israel, i.e., identified with the nation distinct from it, is represented as the true servant of God carrying out His purposes for the national purification, even through persecution, suffering, and death. Opinions as to whether this interpretation is adequate. But it must be borne in mind in any case that in the prophets we do find a remarkable combination of two features—a wide outlook into the future implying preternatural insight, and very marked limitations of vision derived from the ideas of the times in which they lived. The object of the student of Messianic prophecy is to examine the relations between these two elements, and to show how out of the midst of comparatively narrow ideas determined by the speaker's political and historical environment, there arose others, lofty, wide, and comprehensive, with 'springing and germinating accomplishments,' and thus the Spirit of Christ which sufficed to satisfy before them, also the fruits of Christ and the glories that should follow them.'

When we inquire concerning the fulfilment of prophecy, it is necessary to distinguish between (1) what the prophet meant by his words in the first instance, according to their plainest and simplest interpretation; (2) any realization, more or less imperfect, of his utterances in Jewish history; (3) any complete realization of them which may have taken place in God's Christ and Christianity, considered as the Divinely appointed 'fulfilment' of Judaism; and (4) any appropriate application of the prophetic words which may be made in subsequent generations in further illustration of the principles laid down. If there be a wise and gracious God who orders all the events of human history, if He inspired the OT prophets to declare His will for some centuries before Christ, if the climax of the OT is the Messiah as the perfect Sufferer and Saviour, Jesus Christ our Lord, and if He is still working out His purposes of righteous love among the nations of the modern world, it is to be expected that the declarations of the prophets will receive many 'fulfilments,' to refer to many of them much wider, deeper, and more significant than the prophets themselves could possibly understand. But the meaning of the original words as first uttered should first of all be studied without any reference to subsequent events indirectly Messianic.
the principles on which the NT writers find a complete realization of the promises of the Old Covenant in the New. And afterwards it will not be difficult to see in what sense perpetually new applications of the prophetic promises may be legitimately made to the subsequent history of the Kingdom of God in the earth.

Every reader of the NT must have noticed that the words 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Holy Ghost through the mouth of our father David,' is used very freely by the several writers of the NT, and not always in precisely the same sense. Christ Himself led the way and the Apostles followed Him in declaring that His work on earth was to 'fulfil' both the Law and the prophets, and that the whole of OT Scriptures pointed to Him and testified of Him. It was not so much that minute coincidences might be discerned between the phraseology of the OT and the events of His life, though it was natural that such should be noted by the Evangelists. But Jesus specially insisted upon the fact which it is most important for the student of the Bible to observe, viz., that what the Law failed to accomplish, and what the prophets and those who looked for the fulfilment of their words had failed to realize, He had come completely and perfectly to achieve. The emphasis lies, as might have been expected, upon the spiritual, rather than the literal, meaning of the Scriptures; and the most complete fulfilment of OT words lies not in a precise correspondence between circumstantial forecasts made long before with the details of His personal history, but in a spiritual realization of that great end which is the object of the givers, kings, prophets, and righteous men under the Old Covenant desired to see, but were not able.

OT prophecy, then, is best understood when it is viewed as one remarkable stage in a long and still more remarkable history. Some of its utterances have not been, and never will be, fulfilled, in the sense that many of its students have expected. A large proportion of the prophecies have, for various reasons, been considered to have been fulfilled. But that which is accomplished in God’s faithful word thus far will not find it difficult to believe that our Lord Jesus is the Christ and is in the establishment of His Kingdom on the earth, to be found the fullest realization of the glowing words of the prophets who prepared the way for His coming. For a still more remarkable fulfillment of their highest hopes and fondest visions the world still waits. But those who believe in the accomplishment of God’s faithful word will see that prophetic utterance they were not to be fulfilled—‘Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the prophets; till all things be accomplished.’

W. T. Davison.

PROPHET (IN NT).—1. The spirit of prophecy, as it meets us under the Old Dispensation, runs on into the New, and there are prophets in the NT who are properly to be described as OT prophets. Such as Anna the prophetess (Lk 2:36; cf. Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah in the OT); Zacharias, who is expressly said to have prophesied (Lk 1:12); Simeon, whose Νῦντ Λεγεται is an utterance of an unmistakably prophetical nature (289). But above all there is John the Baptist, who was not only recognized by the nation as a great prophet (Mt 14:16, Mk 11:10, Lk 20:21), but was declared by Jesus to be the greatest prophet of the former dispensation, yet while yet less than the least in the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 11:11 = Lk 7:27).

2. Jesus Himself was a prophet. It was in this character that the Messiah had been promised (Dt 18:18; cf. Ac 2:22, 27), and had been looked for by many (Jn 6:14). During His public ministry it was as a prophet that He was known by the people (Mt 21:11; cf. Lk 7:18), and described by His own disciples (Lk 6:17), and even designated by Himself (Mt 13:33, Lk 12:20).

And according to the teaching of the NT, the exalted Christ still continues to exercise His prophetic function, guiding His disciples into all the truth by the Spirit whom He sends (Jn 16:12, 14), and ‘building up the body’ by bestowing upon it Apostles, prophets, and teachers (Eph 4:11).

3. From the prophetical office of her exalted Head there flowed the prophetical endowment of the Church. Joel had foretold a time when the gift of prophecy would be conferred upon all (289), and at Pentecost we see that word fulfilled (Ac 2:18). Ideally, all the Lord’s people should be prophets. For the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy (Rev 19:10). The title is only bestowed in measure upon the Apostles and prophets (Ac 20:32; 1 Cor 12:28; 1 Thes 5:28), and the number of persons so designated as Christians are filled with the Pentecostal Spirit they will desire, like the members of the newborn Church, to bear testimony to their Master (cf. Nu 11:17, 1 Cor 14:1).

4. But even in the Spirit-filled Church diversities of gifts quickly emerged, and a special power of prophetic utterance was bestowed upon certain individuals. A prophetic ministry arose, a ministry of Divine inspiration, which has to be distinguished from the official ministry of human appointment (see art. Minister). In a more general sense, all who ‘spoke the word of God’ (He 13:1) were prophets. The term ‘prophet’ (Ac 6:9) was a prophetic ministry, and so we find St. Paul himself described as a prophet long after he had become an Apostle (Ac 13:9).

5. But in a more precise use of the term we find the specific NT prophets distinguished from others who ‘spoke the word of God,’ and in particular from the Apostle and the teacher (1 Co 12:29, cf. Eph 4:11). The distinction seems to be that while the Apostle was a missionary to the heathen (2 Co 11:23), the prophet was a messenger to the Church (1 Co 14:32); and while the teacher explained or enforced truth that was already possessed (He 8:9), the prophet was recognized by the spiritual discernment (He 13:10), though he were, like Agabus, ‘not possessed’ (Ac 11:28, 1 Jn 4:1) as the Divine medium of fresh revelations (1 Co 14:26, 28, 30; cf. Did. iv. 1).

Three main types of prophesying may be distinguished in the NT.—(a) First, there is what may be called the ordinary ministry of prophecy in the Church, described by St. Paul as ‘edification and comfort and consolation’ (1 Co 14:3). (b) Again, there is, on special occasions, the authoritative announcement of the Divine will in a particular case, as when the prophets of Antioch, in obedience to the Holy Ghost, separate Barnabas and Saul for the work of missionary evangelization (Ac 13:2; 13:2; 14:14—17). (c) Rarely there is the prediction of a future event, as in the case of Agabus (Acts 13:11, 18; v. 4).

Of Christian prophets in the specific sense several are mentioned in the NT: Judas and Silas (Ac 15:35, 36), the prophets at Antioch (13), Agabus and the prophets from Jerusalem (11:21, 21), the four daughters of Philip the evangelist (v. 5). But these few names give us no conception of the numbers and influence of the prophets in the Apostolic Church. For light upon these points we have to turn especially to the Pauline Epistles (e.g. 1 Co 12:28, 14, Eph 2:20, 4:11). Probably they were to be found in every Christian community, and there might even be several of them in a single congregation (1 Co 14:29). Certain of them, possessed of no doubt of conspicuous gifts, moved about from church to church (Ac 11:26, 21; cf. Mt 10:1, Did. xiii. 1). Others, endowed with literary gifts, prophets, could commit their visions and revelations to writing. Just as some prophets of the OT had done, though of this literary type of prophecy we have only one example in the NT—the Book of Revelation (cf. Rev 1:1). Under the inspiration of the OT prophets by the evidence of the Didache. See there that about the end of the first century or the beginning of the second the prophet is still held in the highest estimation (cf. 7:13), and takes precedence, wherever he goes, of the local ministry of bishops and deacons (x. 7). But we also see the presence in the Church of those influences which gradually led to the elimination of the prophetic ministry. One influence is the abundance of false prophets (xi. 8 ff.; cf. Mt. 7:24-28, 1 Jn 4:1), tending to make the Church suspicious of all prophetic utterances, and to bring prophecy as such into disrepute. Another is the growing importance of the official ministry, which begins to claim the functions previously accorded to the prophets alone (xv. 1). Into the hands of the official class all power in the Church gradually passed, and in spite of the most propitious claims, during the latter half of the 2nd cent., in connection with the Montanist movement, the prophet in the distinctive NT sense disappears entirely from the Christian Church, and while the Old Testament is the place of the ministry of inspiration. J. C. LAMBERT.

PROPHETESS. 1. The courtesy title of a prophet's wife (Is 8:3). 2. The OT title of women in whom the promise was fulfilled: 'your daughters shall prophesy' (Jl 2:20; cf. Fs 66:20 RV). 'The term is of course not to be misunderstood, as if it referred merely to predictions relating to the future: the reference is in general to inspired instruction in moral and religious truth' (Driver, Cump. Bible, in loc.). The title is given to Noadiah (Jgs 11:6), Deborah (2 Ch 34:11), and Noadiah (Neh 6:1). 3. The NT gift of prophecy was bestowed on women (Ac 21:11, 1 Co 11:11). Anna (Lk 2:36) is the only 'prophetess' mentioned by name, except Huldah (Rev 20:21), who was probably not the wife of the angel of the church (RVm), but a sempstress of the Christians at Thyatira to whom was given the name of Israel's iecel queen. J. G. TASKER.

PROPITIATION.—The idea of propitiation is borrowed from the sacrificial ritual of the OT, and the term is used in the RV of the NT (cf. 1 Co 1:22; 1 Jn 2:2) of Christ as offering the sacrifice for sin which renders God propitious, or merciful, to the sinner. In the first of these passages the word is strictly 'propitiation,' answering to the LXX propitiation of Christ; but RV renders 'whom God sent forth to be propitiatory,' without, however, essential change of meaning. In the two Johannean passages the word is directly applied to Christ; 'he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for our only, but also for the whole world' (20): 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins' (4:10). In one other passage, He 2:21, the RV renders 'to make propitiation for the sins of the people,' instead of, as in AV, 'to make reconciliation.'

1. In the OT.—In the OT, to which we go back for explanation, the Heb. word kippor, which corresponds with 'to make propitiation,' is ordinarily rendered 'to make atonement,' sometimes 'to reconcile' (e.g. Lv 6:6 AV, but in RV 'to make atonement'); the word has primarily the sense of 'to cover,' but in actual usage has the meaning of 'to conciliate' an offended party, or 'to hide or expiate' an offence. A person may be conciliated by a gift (Gn 32:20); may be made propitious by intercession (Ex 32:30); an offence may be atoned for by an act of zeal for righteousness (Nu 23:30). In ritual usage it is the priest who 'makes atonement' for the offender, as touching, or concerning, his sin (cf. Lv 1:4; 4:14, 18). Both ideas seem to be implied here; the offence is cancelled or annulled,—hidden from God's sight,—and God is rendered propitious: His displeasure is turned away. The means by which this was effected under the Law was ordinarily sacrifice (burnt-offering, sin-offering, guilt-offering; the idea was doubtless present in the peace-offering as well). The blood of an unblemished victim, obtained by slaughter, was sprinkled on the altar, or otherwise presented to Jehovah (cf. Lv 1:1-7, and see ATONEMENT). On the annual Day of Atonement expiation of the sins of the people was effected by an elaborate ceremonial, which included the carrying of the blood into the Holy of Holies, and the sprinkling of it upon the mercy-seat (Lv 16). The significance of these rites is considered in the arti. ATONEMENT and ATONEMENT [DAY OF].

2. In the NT.—These analogies throw light upon the meaning of the term in the NT in its application to Christ, and further illustration is found in St. Paul's words in Ro 3:25. The Apostle now tells us that no one can attain to righteousness, or be justified before God, by works of law, proceeds to exhibit the Divine method of justification, without law, by 'a righteousness of God' obtained through faith in Jesus Christ. 'Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood, to sh"
LXX as 'proselytes' in Egypt (Ex 22:23 sq., Lv 19:19, Dt 10:9). The 'stranger' of the OT becomes the 'proselyte' of the NT. For the history that lies behind the use of the word see art. STRANGER. By the 4th cent. B.C., the 'stranger' had become a member of the Jewish Church—a proselyte in the technical sense (Bertholet, Stellung der Israeliten, p. 178).

Other expressions used in the NT to indicate a close and sympathetic religious life with the Jewish Church include: (1) circumcision (phokos nomi ion Theon, Ac 10:28, 13:15, 17, etc.), and 'worshippers of the God' (phonomenon ion Theon, 16th, 17th, 17th.). These were such as were drawn from heathenism by the higher ideals and purer life of Judaism. They were dissatisfied with the religious life of their nation, and were willing, but not necessarily, to sacrifice for the cause that had lifted them nearer to God and truth.

2. Proselytizing activity of the Jews.—Up to the time of the Exile and for some time after, the attitude of the Jews towards strangers was passive: they did not invite their presence into their community, and did not encourage them to be sharers of their faith. But before the 2nd cent. B.C. a change of outlook and policy had taken place, which had converted them into active propagandists. There appear to have been three reasons for this change. (1) The Jews were no longer concentrated in one narrow land where a Jew had more to look to than a brother Jew. They were distributed over all parts of the civilized world, and found themselves in contact with peoples who were religiously far inferior to themselves, however otherwise they might be placed, and who excited, to a certain extent, a pity in their hearts.

(2) Many of those in the Gentile world who were dissatisfied with the intellectual and religious conditions of their time saw in Judaism, as lived and taught before their eyes, something finer and nobler than they had found elsewhere; and were drawn to its practical teaching and life without committing themselves to the ritual of Judaism. In the 1st cent. B.C. a change of outlook and policy had taken place, which had converted them into active propagandists. There appear to have been three reasons for this change. (1) The Jews were no longer concentrated in one narrow land where a Jew had more to look to than a brother Jew. They were distributed over all parts of the civilized world, and found themselves in contact with peoples who were religiously far inferior to themselves, however otherwise they might be placed, and who excited, to a certain extent, a pity in their hearts.

(3) The Hebrews themselves seem to have responded to their opportunity with a quickened enthusiasm for human and a higher ideal of their national existence, in the providence of God, for the nations of the earth. It does not appear that the Hebrews have ever been so powerfully moved towards the peoples lying in darkness as in this time subsequent to the Exile (Harnack, op. cit. i. 11, 12). They were convinced of the claim of God to the hommage of men everywhere, the universality of their revelation of truth and duty, and their own fitness to bring the world to God. The needs of the world moved them powerfully, and the thoughts that found expression in such passages as Ps 33 ("Let all the earth fear the Lord, let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him") 36:4—64:65 etc., filled them with a burning zeal to make the world their offering to God (Bertholet, op. cit. p. 191 f.). Perhaps we may not be wrong in regarding the Septuagint as a product of, as it certainly was an aid to, this missionary effort.

This spiritual enthusiasm for God's honour and man's salvation continued till about the time of the Maccabees, when the tenderer springs of the Jewish spirit were dried up, and the sword became the instrument of national idealism, and whole cities and tribes were given the option of circumcision or exile, if not slaughter (1 Mac 2:6 13:6 14:6; Jos. Ant. xix. 1, x. 3, xiv. 4). Of course, this was a means that was not available outside their hereditary home. This propaganda went on till the 1st cent. of our era, when the dissatisfaction of the Jews with the Roman supremacy culminated in insurrection. In their conflict with Rome their illusion was greatly reduced by slaughter, and the power of religious expansion was checked by the decree of Hadrian, modified later by Antoninus, in forbidding circumcision. But this time, however, Judaism had won a large following in every town of size and importance (cf. Ac 2:41; Jos. BJ viii. ii. 3, c. Apion. ii. 11, 40; Seneca, op. August. de Civitate Dei, vi. 11: cf. 'vicili victoribus leges dederunt'; Harnack, op. cit. i. 14; Scharer, HJP vi. ii. 304 ff.). But now bloodshed and persecution produced the twofold result of closing and sealing the heart of Judaism to the outside world, so that proselytes were no longer sought by the Jews, and the tenets and the practices of Judaism became crystallized and less amenable to Hellenistic influences, and so less fitted to win the Gentile spirit.

3. Admission of the proselyte.—The ritual conditions imposed on the proselyte on entering Judaism were three: (1) circumcision or baptism, and (2) sacrifice. Baptism took place after the healing of the wound caused by circumcision. Some have sought to discover in it an imitation of Christian ritual. But it is not necessary to go beyond the ordinary sense of the word to find a meaning in the Gentile name. The word was drawn from the practice of the people of the land, and the religious lay in the very nature of Judaism.—the heathen was uncircumcised and so had to be cleansed by washing in water before admission into Judaism. Sacrifice was an expression of the appropriateness and an individual participation in Jewish worship. With the fall of the Temple sacrifice lapsed, though at first it was made a burden on the proselyte to lay aside enough to pay for the sacrifice, should the Temple again be restored; but then this demand was in course of time allowed to lapse, as the prospect of restoration vanished. These three conditions seem of early origin, though we may not have such specific reference to them till the 2nd cent. A.D.

Among pre-Israelite teachers there was difference of opinion as to the necessity of circumcision and baptism, but all early usage seems to confirm their actual observance. It is true that Izates, king of Adiabene, for a time refrained from circumcision under the guidance of his first Jewish teacher, Ananias, but this counsel was given, not because it was impossible, but because (cf. Harnack, op. cit. i. 10 f.).—(3) The Hebrews themselves seem to have responded to their opportunity with a quickened enthusiasm for humanity and a higher ideal of their national existence, in the providence of God, for the nations of the earth. It does not appear that the Hebrews have ever been so powerfully moved towards the peoples lying in darkness as in this time subsequent to the Exile (Harnack, op. cit. i. 11, 12). They were convinced of the claim of God to the hommage of men everywhere, the universality of their revelation of truth and duty, and their own fitness to bring the world to God. make the Law the necessary avenue to it, and so they acted rather as a hindrance than as a help to the progress of the gospel. If the experience of Justin be any indication of the general attitude of the proselytes to the Church, they must have deemed it a duty to their adopted faith to manifest a violence of speech and an aggressiveness of action unsurpassed by the Jews themselves; for he says, 'the proselytes not only do not believe, but twofold more than yourselves blaspheme and wish to torture and put to death us who believe in Him' (Dial. 129).

But the proselytes must always have formed a very small minority of those amongst the Gentiles who had lent an ear to Jewish teaching. There were many who were attracted to the synagogue with the helpings of its worship and the purity of its teaching, who had no sympathy with its ritual. Amongst these the gospel had a different reception; it was readily accepted and eagerly followed. They found in it all that drew them to the synagogue, and a great deal more. With historical Judaism they had nothing to do, and loyalty and nationality did not appeal to them as motives to maintain it against Christianity. Amongst the Jews both the proselyte and the devout worshipper occupied an inferior place, but here was a faith that made no distinction between Jew or Gentile, a faith whose conception of God was tender and whose ethical standards were high, that made love and not law the interpreter of duty and the inspiration of service, that lived not in an evening twilight of anticipation of a glorious Messianic morning, but in warm fellowship with a Personality that was the evidence of its power and truth. It was easy to understand how quickly the gospel would be adopted by these adherents of Judaism. Every synagogue would become the seed-plot of a Christian church. And so it was specially to these that St. Paul addressed himself on his missionary journeys, and from them he formed the beginnings of many of his churches and received so much kindness (Ac 13: 5: 16: 7 e). Of a kindred habit with the feeling of a blinded jealousy and hate the Jews would see these worshippers detached from the synagogue and formed into a church. But Judaism had nothing to offer the Gentile who was not better provided by the Christian Church, and so it receded from the attack on Christianity like the spent waves from the rock-bound coast, angry but baffled. Failure drove the Jews in self-defence upon themselves. They left the field to Christianity, restricted their vision to their own people, and left the outer world alone. J. GHIOY.

PROVENDER.—1. mishp' (Gr 2424; 4237 434, Jg 19: 24, 41), a general name for cattle food. 2. bēdē, Job 6: 2 ('fodder'; bēêt châtea, is 30: 4 'clean (AV) and RV 'savoury', RV 'salted') 'proverb', i.e. fodder mixed with salt or aromatic herbs. The ordinary food of cattle in Palestine—besides pastureage—is tīm (broken straw), kuršennah (the vetch, Vicia ervilia), bran (for fattening especially), and sometimes hay made from the flowering herbs of spring.

PROVERB.—1. Meaning.—In the Bible there is no essential difference between the proverb and the parable (wh. see). The Heb. ḫéb and the Gr. προβολίζον, mean 'parable,' were applied indiscriminately to both. The value arising from this likeness was twofold. In the first place, as the moral truth seemed to emerge from the observed habits of animals, objects in nature, familiar usages, or occurrences in daily life, such juxtaposition gave to the ethical precept or fact of conduct the surprise and challenge of a discovery. Thus the whole influence of example and environment is compressed into the metaphor, 'As is the morning, so is the evening.' (Ezk 16: 16.) The surprise was intensified when the parable product contradicted ordinary experience, as in the statement, 'On soweth and another reapeth.' (Jn 4: 30.) Definite labour deserves a definite reward, yet the unexpected happens, and, while man proposes, there remains an area in which God disposes. Out of such corroboration grew the second value of the proverb, namely, authority. The truth became a rule entitled to general acceptance. The proverb usually has the advantage of putting the concrete for the abstract. Among the modern inhabitants of Palestine, when a letter of recommendation is asked, it is customary to quote the proverb, 'You cannot clap with one hand.' Of a dull workman without interest or resource in his work it is said, 'He is like a sieve, he can do only one thing.'

2. Literary form.—(1) Next to the fact of resemblance was the essential feature of brevity. Such a combination at once secured currency to the unpremeditated exclamation, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (1 S 10: 13.). When the proverb consisted of two parts, rhetorical emphasis was secured either by repeating the same thought in different words (Pr 31: 1) or by the introduction of contrasting particulars (30: 1). (2) Rhythmic measure was also studied, and the proverbs formed an untranslatable felicity of balance and repeated sound. The final mark of literary publicity was conferred by a rhetorical touch of picturesque hyperbole, as in the reference to a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Mt 19: 24). (3) The fact that a wise saying was meant for the wise encouraged the use of elliptical form. This carried the compliment suggestion that the hearer was able to understand a reference that was confessedly obscure. On this account proverbists 'tried to make the wise more wise' (Pr 22: 7). Hence the note of surprise and unexpectedness in Christ’s words, when He said that the mysteries of the Kingdom had been hidden from the wise and understanding and revealed unto babes (Mt 11: 25, Lk 10: 21). (4) The obscurity referred to was sometimes making the leading feature and motive of the proverb, and it was then called an enigma or dark saying (Ps 49: 3, Pr 1: 24-28). Its solution then became a challenge to the ingenuity of the interpreter. Both the prophets and Christ Himself were charged with speaking in this problematical manner (Ezk 20: 1, Jn 14: 19). Riddles were introduced at festivals as contributing an element of competitive acuteness and facetious exhilaration. Instances resembling Pr 30: 11-12 are common among the modern Arabs and Jews in Syria, as when it is said: 'There are three chief voices in the world, that of running water, of the Torah, and of money.' An enigma for the study of books is: 'Black seeds on white ground, and he who eats of the fruit becomes wise.'

3. Subject-matter.—This is summarized in Pr 1-4. The reference is generally to types of character, the emotions and the desires of the heart, and the joys and sorrows, the losses and gains, the duties and the relationships of human life. Amid these the proverb casts a searching light upon different classes of men, and points out the path of wisdom. Hence the name 'words of truth' (Pr 22: 17).

4. Authority.—Proverbial literature is more highly esteemed in the East than in the West. While the popularity of proverbs is partly due to literary charm and intellectual force, and the distinction conferred by the power of quotation, and understanding them, the principal cause of their acceptance lies in their harmony with Oriental life. The proverb is patriarchal government in the region of ethics. It is an order from the governing class that accepts of no exception. The proverb is not the pleading of the lawyer in favour of a certain view and claim, but the decision of a judge who has heard both sides and adjudicates on behalf of general citizenship. Such authority is at its maximum when it is current but has handed down from previous generations. It is then 'a parable of the ancients' (1 S 24: 23). The quotation of an appro-praise proverb in a controversy always carries weight, unless the opponent can quote another in support of his claims. Thus, to the careless and inattentive man in business who says 'Prosperity is from God,' it may be retorted, 'It does not follow that God is with him.'

Beneath commendable social qualities belonging to this attitude there is a mental passivity that seeks to attain to results without the trouble of personal inquiry, and prefers the benefits conferred by truth to any sacrifice or service that might be rendered to it.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. —The second book among the "Writings" is the most characteristic example of the Wisdom literature in the OT. We may adopt the division of the book made by the headings in the Hebrew text as follows:—

I. 1-9, The proverbs of Solomon, son of David, king of Israel (heading for more than this section). See below.

II. 10-25, The proverbs of Solomon.

III. 22-242. . . . The words of the wise (227-27 forms an introductory poem).

IV. 24-36. Also are the sayings of the wise.

V. 25-29. Also are the proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah copied out.

VI. 30. The words of Agur, etc.

VII. 31-44. The words of King Lemuel, etc.

VIII. 1-11. Without heading, but clearly distinct from VII.

Sections I., II., and III. form the body of the book; sections IV. and V. are additions to the earlier portion, and sections VI. and VII. are of later additions.

We consider section I. first, because here the typical Hebrew proverb is best seen, especially if chs. 10-15 are taken by themselves as 11a. These chapters consist of aphorisms in the form of couplets showing antithetic parallelism (see Proverbs). The couplets are wholly detached, and little order is observable in their arrangement. In content they come nearest being popular, even if they are not so actually. In general they show a contented and cheerful view of life. The wise are mentioned, and with admiration, but not as a class or as forming a school of thought or instruction. They are the successful, upright, prosperous men, safe examples in affairs of common life. In 11b the lines are still arranged in distichs, but the antithetic parallelism has largely given way to the synonymous or synthetic variety. This form gives a little more opportunity for classifying and developing the sentiment of the proverb. 'My son' is addressed a few times, but not regularly. Section III. again marks an advance over 11a and 11b. The verses 22-24 are a hortatory introduction. There follows a collection of quatrains, instead of couplets. They are maxims with proverbs among them. Consecutive thought has developed. The truths stated are still the simple every-day ones, but they show meditation, as well as observation. Section IV. is an appendix to the third, both coming from 'the Wise.' It is very defective in rhythm, and seemingly the text has suffered corruption. In the few verses three themes are treated, chiefly the sluggard. Section V. is easily subdivided. Chs. 25-27 contain proverbs in the form of comparisons. Chs. 28-29 are in the style of section II. Between the two a little piece (27a-27) praises the life of a farmer. Section VI. consists of several independent discourses. The heading (30) separates the chapter from the preceding, but otherwise adds little to our knowledge of the origin, for it is wellnigh unintelligible. Even if it consists of proper names, as is most likely, there is no gain from knowing them and nothing more. In vv. 10ff. are several stanzas of peculiar 'numerical' style: there are three things that . . . and four ... namely, ... . Section VII. is a brief manual for a king or judge, though the maxims are rather rudimentary and homely. If there is a temperance lesson, it is only for the king; the advice to the poor and oppressed is very different (see vv. 4 and 5). Chapter VIII., noticeable for two things: its alphabetical structure, each couplet beginning with a new letter in regular order, and the unusual subject, the capable housewife. A most delicate tribute is in the omission of any reference to her virtue, which is tacitly assumed, and not even mentioned.

There remains the important section chs. 1-9. Its position at the head of the book does not show that it was first in point of time. It is clearly a preface, or hortatory introduction. It does not so much give counsels of a concrete kind, as praise the wisdom illustrated in the concrete counsels of the following sections. It is studied, philosophical, flowing in style. It addresses 'My son' at the beginning, a new paragraph, exactly as a teacher addresses 'My hearers' as he begins a lecture. In one chapter at least, the eighth, the adoration of wisdom is carried to the limit, and in spite of the fine personification one feels, regretfully, far removed from the plain practical precepts of sections II. and III. In this 'cosmogenic hymn' wisdom is assigned a dignity in the universe hardly inferior to that of the Creator.

Among the various attempts to explain the form in which the book comes to us, perhaps the following will be found as simple as any. We may suppose that the proverbs of 'Solomon' in 11a and 11b were collected separately and then combined in 11i.; that 'the words of the wise' in 11i. at first stood by themselves, and were supplemented by IV.; that the two groups, II. and III.-IV., were then joined together, becoming the proverbs of Solomon; 'the words of God' in IV. was attached, that to this book section I. was then prefixed as an introduction, which was thus stamped as the literature of the school of Wisdom. The few remaining chapters, sections VI., VII., and VIII., were added later from the mass of Wisdom literature which must have been in existence, or later came into existence.

2. As for the date of the book, the traditional ascription of parts of it 'to King Solomon' at the beginning, a new paragraph, exactly as a teacher addresses 'My hearers' as he begins a lecture. In one chapter at least, the eighth, the adoration of wisdom is carried to the limit, and in spite of the fine personification one feels, regretfully, far removed from the plain practical precepts of sections II. and III. in this 'cosmogenic hymn' wisdom is assigned a dignity in the universe hardly inferior to that of the Creator.

3. The authors of the Wisdom literature do not claim revealed wisdom; their teachings are only practical common sense. They are humanists, basing their morality upon the universal principles underlying all human nature. From this practical insight, meaning and scope, the book can be applied: to the wide sweep of ch. 8. 'Proverbs may be regarded as a manual of conduct, or, as Bruch calls it, an anthology of gnomes.' Its observations relate to a number of forms of life, to affairs domestic, agricultural, urban (the temptations of city life), commercial, political, and military (Toy, Proverbs, p. x.).

O. H. GATES.

PROVIDENCE

—1. The word is not found in the OT. In the NT it is used only once; in the exordium of his address to Felix, the orator Tertullian says: 'By thy providence evils are corrected for this nation' (Ac 249).

Here 'providence' simply means 'foreknowledge,' as in 2 Mac 4. 'the king's providence.'

2. The first appearance of the word 'providence' (Gr. pronoia) in Jewish literature is in Wis 14:16, pointing out that there is a God of providence, not the God of the Stoics philosophers: 'Thy providence, O Father, guideth us along.' In a later passage, recognizing the sternness of the truth, to which the OT also bears witness, he contrasts the destinies of the Israelites and Egyptians and describes the latter, when they were 'prisoners of darkness,' as 'exiled from the eternal providence' (179).

3. Although the OT does not contain the word 'providence,' it is a continuous and progressive revelation of Him whose never-failing providence ordereth all things both in heaven and earth. Historians narrate the gradual accomplishment of His redemptive purpose concerning the Chosen People and the world at large (Gen 50:20, Ex 8:25, Dt 32:35; cf. Ps 74:12-14); poets delight to extol Him whose tender mercies are over all his works (Ps 145:8, 20, 104, 115; 1); prophets point to the proofs of God's guidance in the past. In Him the people may gain wisdom for the present and courage for the future (Dt 32:2-4, Hagg 2:7, Is 51:11, Mal 4:2). The Book of Job has been called 'the book of Providence,' because it not only gives the author's solution of perplexing problems, but also 'furnishes reasons for believing in the righteous providence of God from the consideration of His character and His dominion over nature' (Oehler, Theory of OT, II, 474; cf. Job 27:34 § 36 § 37 §).

4. Belief in Providence stands or falls with belief in a personal God. It is incompatible with mechanical or pantheistic theories of Creation. Ancient philosophy, which perplexed Greek philosophers and Hebrew sages, press heavily upon the modern mind as it strives to reconcile its trust in Divine providence with the reign of law in the universe and with the existence of pain and evil. Some hold that the Christian religion is based on the established methods of His Heavenly Father's working, and that they fulfill as well as reveal His will (Mt 6:25-34, Jn 6:27). Belief in Providence means to the Christian, trust in the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has so clearly revealed His will in His Son as to make it plain to His children that natural laws may not only subserve moral and spiritual ends in the present time, but may also further His unerring purposes which are not bound by this mortal life (Ro 8:28, 2 Co 4:14, 1 P 1:19).

PROVINCE.—This word, of unknown derivation, originally meant simply 'a sphere of (magisterial) duty,' and was applied, for example, to the duty of the prætor urbicus, who was never permitted to leave Rome. With the extension of the Roman Empire, and the consequent much increased number of spheres of duty outside Rome and Italy, the word came gradually to have a territorial application also. It is in this derived sense that the word is taken here. It was part of the Roman policy throughout to be in no unnecessary hurry to acquire territory and the responsibility connected with it, and it was not till the year n.c. 227—hundreds of years after the foundation of the Roman State—that the first province was taken over. In that year Sardinia and Corsica became one province, Western Sicily another, and each, after the details of government had been settled by special commissioners, was put under an additional prætor elected for the purpose.

Behind this step, as behind the annexion of most Roman provinces, there lay long years of warfare. Province after province was annexed, until in the time of Christ the Roman was in possession of the whole of Europe (except the British Isles, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia), all Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and the north-west of Africa. Most of this territory had been acquired during the Republic, but certain portions had not been annexed till the time of the first Emperor, Augustus. During the Republic the governors of these provinces were appointed by the Senate from the names of the senators, generally after a period of service as praefect or consul, as the case might be. They were unpaid, and had heavy expenses to bear. Few resisted the temptation to recoup themselves at the expense of the provinces, and the vast sums acquired by an extortionate governor in his one year's governorship may be estimated from the fact that Cicer, a just and honest man, acquired £18,000 during his tenure of the province Cilicia.

During the Empire the provinces were treated accord-

PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION.—The province (principatium) was the central administrative unit of the Roman State. Each province retained a large degree of autonomy, and was governed by a governor (præfectus) who was appointed for a term of years. The governor was assisted by a council of notables (senatus consultum) and a body of local magistrates (curia). The province was divided into smaller administrative units, such as districts (regiones), districts (consulariae), and Even as a province...
PSALMS

The Hebrew and Greek titles for the whole book was 'Book of Praises'; this referred directly to the subject of the poems, and less directly to the Greek title to their musical character. Both titles take into account the majority of the poems rather than the whole; not all the Psalms were sung to musical accompaniment, and not all of them consist of psalms of praise. The Psalter contains, according to the division of the Hebrew text followed by EV, 150 poems; the Greek version contains 151, but the last of these is described as 'outside the number.' This number does not exactly correspond with the number of different poems. On the one hand, there are one or two clear cases, and there may be others less clear of a single Psalm having been wrongly divided into two; thus Psalms 9 and 10 are shown by the continuance of the artistic selection. The Psalms are numbered (Ps 1-34) to be one poem. But the Greek version is scarcely true to the original in making two distinct Psalms out of each of the Psalms numbered 116 and 147 respectively in the Hebrew text and EV. Probably in a larger number of cases, owing to an opposite fortune, two poems originally distinct have been joined together under a single number. A clear instance of this kind is Ps 108, which consists of two Psalms of the fragments of Psalms (vi. 37-60). Among the more important and recognized instances of the kind are Ps 19 (=vv. 1-9, 14-15) 31 (==vv. 14-24) 83 (==vv. 14-24) and 119 (=vv. 29-36, 37-40). Some larger number of cases are inferred by Dr. Briggs in his Commentary (ICC).

The Psalter does not contain quite the whole of what survives of Jewish literature of this type. A few Psalms, not included in the Psalter, are found in other books: e.g., 1 S 2, 10, Is. 12. Some, and probably others, have not been mentioned in the Psalter because they are not found in the Hebrew text, and have been considered to be not psalms after the form of the Psalter.

2. Origin and history.—(1) Reception into the Canon.—The history of the Psalms and the Psalter is obscure; and many conclusions with regard to it rest, and for lack of other independent evidence must rest, on previous conclusions as to the origin and literary history of other Hebrew and Jewish literature. Conclusive external evidence for the existence of the Psalter in its present extent does not carry us very far back beyond the close of the Jewish Canon (see Canons of OT); but the mode of allusion to the Psalms in the NT renders it very unlikely that the book was still open to additions in the 1st cent. A.D., and the fact that none of the Psalms of Solomon (see § 1, end) gained admission, and that this collection by its title perhaps supersedes the canonical ‘Psalms of David,’ renders it probable that the Psalter was complete, and that it is itself in consequence, some time after 92, n.c. 63. Other evidence (cf. Hastings’ DB iv. 147), such as the derived from the substantial agreement of the Greek version with the Hebrew text, does not carry the proof for the existence of the Psalter in its present extent beyond the close of the OT.

(2) Previous history.—Behind that date lies a long history; for the Psalter represents the conclusion of a complex literary growth or development. We may note, first, two things that prove this general fact, that the Psalter is not merely a simple edition of the poems of a single man or age, nor the division of its parts, at each of Ps 72 the words: ‘The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.’ This is intelligible if the remark once closed an independent collection, and was not added to the collection of David by the compiler, as a larger work. But apart from such hypothesis as this it is not intelligible; for the remark is not true of the Psalter as we have it; the prayers of David are not always the first Psalms assigned to David, and described as ‘of David’ are Ps 86 and 142; and several subsequent Psalms assigned to David are without being so entitled, actually prayers. (2) The same Psalm is repeated in different parts of the Psalter with slight textual or editorial variations; thus Ps 14—Ps 53; 40-1-117-70; 108—571-60-34. The Psalter, then, was composed by drawing on, and in some cases incorporating, earlier collections of Psalms.

Our next questions are: How many collections earlier than the Psalter can be traced? How far can the methods of the editor who drew on or combined these earlier collections be discerned? The first clue to the first question may be found in the titles referring to persons and their distribution; the more significant features of this distribution may be shown thus—

1. Ps 1-2 are without title.
2. Ps 3-31 are all entitled ‘of David,’ except Ps 10, which is a continuation of Ps 9 (see above), and Ps 33.
3. Ps 32-49 are all entitled ‘of the sons of Korah,’ except Ps 45, which is a continuation of Ps 42 (see above).
4. Ps 50 is entitled ‘of Asaph.’
5. Ps 51-72 are all entitled ‘of David,’ except Ps 66, 67.
6. Ps 73-88 are all entitled ‘of Asaph.’
7. Of Ps 89-84, four (Ps 84, 85, 87, 88) are entitled ‘of the sons of Korah,’ one (Ps 86) ‘of David,’ and one (Ps 89) of Ethan.
8. Ps 120-134 are all entitled ‘Songs (so rather than a song) of Ascent.’

The remaining 46 Psalms (90-119, 135-160) are either without title, or the titles are not the same in any considerable number of cases in the Psalms (but note 105-110 and 138-145 entitled ‘of David’).

Now, if it stood by itself, the statement at the close of Ps 72 could be explained by a single process—the incorporation of a previous collection under a new title of Ps 1-72 by an editor who added these to Ps 73-150 derived from other sources. But within Ps 71-72 we have two occurrences of the same Psalm (Ps 14 = Ps 53), which in itself indicates that the Psalter was compiled either in parts or in fragments. Again, Ps 53 differs from Ps 14 by the entire absence from it of the name ‘Jahweh’ and the use in four places of the name ‘God,’ where Ps 14 uses ‘Jahweh’ (EV ‘the Lord’). So also in Ps 70 = Ps 40-1-119, 135-160 are either without title, or the titles are not the same in any considerable number of cases in the Psalms (but note 105-110 and 138-145 entitled ‘of David’).

In addition to the occurrences of Psalms in two recensions and the occurrence of collections of its psalms in another place points to earlier independent books of Psalms: this is a fact of the occurrence of a doxology or suitable concluding formula at certain points in the Psalter, viz. 419 at the end of the first group of Psalms entitled ‘of David’; 72-3, 19 immediately before the statement that the Prayers of David are ended; and 892. See also 1064 and 150, which last Psalm in its entirety may be taken as an enclitic doxology at the close of the completed Psalter. The doxologies at the end of Ps 41 and 72 occur at points which we have already found reason for regarding as the close of collections; that at 89a, however, occurs not at the close of the Elohist Psalms, but six Psalms later. Now five of these are not found either in the same sources as supplied the Elohist editor, viz. from the 'prayers of David' (Ps 86) and the book 'of the sons of Korah.' In Ps 42-89 we probably have the original Elohist Psalter (Ps 42-85), enlarged by the addition of an appendix (Ps 84-89), in which the name 'Jahweh' was left unchanged, and consequently the form 'Elohim' ceases to predominate.

The evidence thus far considered or suggested (it cannot here be given in greater detail), we may infer some such stages as these in the history of the Psalms before the completion of the Psalter:—

1. Compilation of a book entitled 'of David' and including Ps 3-41 (except the unimportant Ps 33).

3. Compilation of a book entitled 'of Asaph' (Asaph being the chief of a guild of musicians, Ezra 2:42)

4. Compilation of a book entitled 'of the sons of Korah' (also probably a guild of musicians; cf. 2 Ch 20:19).

5. Compilation of 'of the Elohist Psalter' cut of Psalms derived from all three earlier sources, or, who, generally speaking, supplanted 'Elohim' ('God') for 'Jahweh' (E V 'the Lord').

6. Enlargement of 5 by the addition of Ps 84-89.

7. Compilation of a book entitled 'Songs of the Ascents.'

Can we detect the existence of other Psalters?

So far we have taken account mainly of titles of one type only and of titles which occur in groups. Dr. Briggs carries the argument from titles to the existence of collections of Psalms further. He infers that there was a collection of Michtam or chosen pieces, whence Ps 16, 56-60 and 138-39 were drawn; another collection of Maschil or meditations, whence Ps 32, 44-6, 55-56. The Psalms 110-142 were derived from Psalms proper, of poems set to music, whence the 57 Psalms described in the titles as Mirmir (EV 'psalm') were derived; and yet another collection which bore the name of the musical director or choir master (EV 'the chief musician'), whence the 55 Psalms so entitiled were derived. If this be the case, then the composite titles enable us to see that many Psalms stood successively in two or three collections before they obtained their place in the completed Psalter; e.g. Ps 19—entitiled 'of (or belonging to) the chief musician, a Psalm, of (or belonging to) David'—had previously been included in three distinct collections; and so also Ps 44—entitled 'of the chief musician, of the sons of Korah, Maschil.' Perhaps the strongest case for these further collections is that of the chief musician's Psalter; in any case, the English reader must be warned (Ps 110-142) that the designation prefixed to the 'chief musician' is the same as that prefixed to 'David' or 'Asaph' or 'the sons of Korah,' though in the first case RV renders 'for' and in the latter cases 'of.' Consequently, since in many cases the 'chief musician' is not only inferred from the title, but is also subsequently frequently used as a preposition (e.g. in Ps 12, 43), to interpret such a combination as 'of the chief musician, of David, of the sons of Korah' of joint authorship, we must see in them either conflicting ascriptions of authorship placed side by side, or, far more probably, as just suggested, the titles of collections of Psalms or hymn-books to which they had previously belonged. It is then highly probable that in Ps 110-142, in such cases as 'of David, of the sons of Korah,' were neither intended nor understood to name the author of the Psalm in question. But if this was so, we can also see that before the final stage in the growth of the Psalter was reached, the title prefixed to 'David' clearly implied authority to the author(s) of the longer titles in Ps 7 and 8: it is scarcely less clear that the title implied authority to the authors of other titles that stand at the Psalms.

Titles of the Psalms.—Inasmuch as the terms occurring in the titles to the Psalms are not explained elsewhere in this Dictionary, it will be convenient to give here brief notes on those which have not already been discussed. It may be said in general that great obscurity envelops the subject, that, in spite of the many ingenious suggestions which the terms in question have given rise, it is hazardous to base, on any particular theories of interpretation, far-reaching conclusions. With the names of the latter part of the Psalter (Ps 90-150) are free from these terms.

The names of the titles do not alone indicate the source whence the Psalm was derived (see above); but also in some cases notes defining the character of the Psalm are given below (Nos. 12 and 13, etc.).

1. Inasmuch as the title is omitted, it is beyond any probability that the Ps 92 was to be used on the Sabbath, Ps 30 at the Feast of the Dedication (1 Mac 4:40, Jn 10:22), celebrated from the time of the Maccabees onward (Ps 127:1 on the occasion of offering thank-offering; so also to bring to remembrance (RV) in Ps 38 and 70 may rather mean 'at the time of setting up,' RV 'Ezor, memorial,' e.g. Nu 5:3); see see No. 6 (below). This type of notes is more frequent in the LXX, which assigns Ps 24 for the use of the first day of the week, Ps 48 for the second, Ps 94 for the third, Ps 93 for the day before the Sabbath. Other titles, it is supposed, name the opening words of songs sung to it or otherwise, the tune to which the Psalm was to be sung (see Ajeleth hash-shahar, Al-tashheth, Jonath-elem-rehokim, Nehiloth, Neginoth). For ease of reference we give the terms in alphabetic order.

1. Ajeleth hash-shahar (Ps 32) is a transliteration of Hebr. words meaning 'the beginning of the song,' or 'first' title, the conjectural consoants might equally well mean 'the help of the morning,' ‘These words are preceded by the Hebr. preposition 'of,' which, among many other things, can have a sense of association with, and here in other similar titles not improbably means 'set to' (AV). The whole note, then, may mean that Ps 32 was to be sung with the song beginning 'the kind (or the help) of the morning,' had been accustomed to be sung. The renderings 'upon Ajeleth hash-shahar' (AV) and 'of another collection of songs' (RV) are parallel and legitimate, but less probable. With this title cf. below Nos. 3, 7, 9, 10, 16, 19 (not all equally probable instances).

2. Al-tashheth (Ps 46). This is taken to mean 'a high place,' and is most probably the name of a high place near Jerusalem, in view of 1 Ch 15:2-22, that these terms are names of tunes, though they obviously have some reference to the music. The usual meaning of chemineth in Heb. is 'eighth,' of alamoth 'young women'; so that the titles run 'upon' or 'according to' or 'set to the eighth' of the maidens." The meaning is conjectural, means 'the voices of maidens,' and that, it is further conjectured, stands for the false voice of maidens." So that the whole phrase 'set to the maidens' would mean 'to be sung with soprano voices.' Thence, it is inferred, 'set to the eighth' means sung with the bass voice. All this, though it has found considerable acceptance and has sometimes been stated with little or no qualification, possesses no more than the value of an unverified and perhaps unverifiable guess.

3. Al-tashheth (Ps 57, 58, 59, 75). The words 'of a eight (RV; 'degree' AV), a song of (Ps 120-134). The Hebr. may also be interpreted as a compound expression, and mean 'Songs of Ascent.' In the latter case the title of the whole collection has been prefixed to each Psalm (see above). 'Songs of Ascent' might mean 'Songs of the ascent' (cf. Ezr 7:1), from Babylon, but more probably 'Songs of the Ascent' to Jerusalem on the occasion of the great yearly festivals. Or, as a conjectural suggestion that the meaning of the phrase is not to be taken to mean 'ascent' but to the making of the Women's Court to that of the men in the Temple area; it has been inferred that one of each of these 15 Psalms is to be sung on each of the 15 steps (cf. Ps 132). The improbable suggestions have been offered (cf. most lately, J. W. Thirlow, Old Testament Problems).

4. Ascent (RV; 'degree' AV). The word is the fem. of the adj. derived from 'ascent.' In the three titles it is preceded by... the prep. 'at (see under No. 2), and the phrase has been supposed to mean that the Psalm was to be sung to the sound of the Gittite instrument (cf. Nos. 15 and 16), whatever that may have been, or to the Gittite tune (cf. No. 1). If the word was originally pronounced 'Gittite,' at least, the note may direct that the Psalms were to be sung to some vintage melody (cf. No. 3).

2. Haggai.—The word thus transliterated in 46th (RV) translated in 92° 'a solemn sound' (RV), 'murmuring sound' (Driver), and in 191 'meditation.' In 191 it seems to be a musical note.

3. Jeduthun.—On the analogy of 'of David,' etc. (see above), the title in Ps 93 should run 'of the sons of Korah, of Jeduthun.' In Ps 62, 77 the preposition prefixed to the term is 'at (cf. No. 1), and by analogy Jeduthun might be the name of a tune or an instrument. But this is very uncertain; see art. Jeduthun.

4. Jonath-elem-reheokim (Ps 50). The Heb. consonants are not naturally translated 'the dove of the distant terehinath,' less probably, but as the tradition embodied in the vocalized Heb. text suggests, 'the dove of the silence of them that are distant.' The note is to be explained as
No. 1.

5. Mahalath (Ps 53), Mahalath Leannoth (Ps 88). The words are very ambiguous and obscure, and the fact that in both Psalms the prep. 'at precedes, relates these notes to the group of which No. 1 is typical.

6. Neginoth (AV in Ps 4. 6. 54. 55. 67. 76) and Neginah (Ps 61). The words thus, in excess of caution, transliterated by AV, are correctly translated by RV 'stringed instruments,' Ps 61 'song'), and so even by AV in Hab 31.

8. Nehiloth (Ps 54), often supposed to mean 'wind instruments' (cf. No. 15). But this is quite doubtful. Uncertain, too, is the view that the word indicates a tune: the preparation (of) that precedes is not the same as that which generally introduces what appear to be names of tunes elsewhere cf. No. 13), but cf. No. 15.

10. Shiggaion (Ps 33). The pl. of this word (Shiggaion) occurs in Hab 31; possibly by error for Neginoth (cf. No. 15), which perhaps stood in the text from which the Greek version took its form. The word is derived from the words 'to go astray' or 'to reed' (as, e.g., from drunkenness).
Hence, since Ewald, many have conjectured that Shiggaion meant a trailing tune, with rapid changes of rhythm,' (Oz. Lax.)
The meaning really remains entirely uncertain.

12. Shoshannahm (Ps 45. 69), Shushan-eduth (Ps 60), and Shoshannim-eduth (Ps 80) appear to be different ways of eliding the same song to the tune of which these Psalms were to be sung. The preposition used before these words is 'at (cf. No. 1), except in Ps 80, where it is 'in,' which in some cases is used interchangeably with 'at. It is curious that Psalms so different as 45 and 69 should be set to the same tune. Ps 80 cites the first two words of the poem, 'a (Like) ilies (or rather anemones) is the Testimony (or Law); Ps 45. 69 the first word only; and Ps 60 apparently was variant, 'a (like) lily' (singular for plural, etc).

3. Dates of the various collections.—Is it possible to determine the dates at which any of these collections of Psalms were written? Obviously they are earlier than the completion of the Psalter, i.e. than about a.c. 100 (see above); obviously also the collections were later than the latest Psalm which they originally contained. One or more Psalms in all the collections show more or less unanimously, admitted signs of being post-exilic. The various collections therefore which we have in the Psalter were compiled between the 6th and the 2nd centuries a.c. By arguments which cannot here be restated (cf. Robertson Smith, 'A history of Religion,' etc.), the following conclusions are reached:
The first Davidic

4. Dates of individual Psalms.—From the collections we come to the difficult and much discussed question of the dates of the individual Psalms. All that will be possible here is to point out certain general lines of evidence, with one or two illustrations in detail. If this and other conclusions with reference to the collections are sound, a minimum date is fixed for many Psalms.

A. Psalms 3—41 was compiled about the time of David and his court (Pss 37—72) in the 4th cent.; the Asaphite (Pss 50. 73—83) and Korahite (Pss 42—49) Psalms are of the 3rd cent. a.c. But whatever the value of these detailed conclusions, which are not all very secure, one general fact of much importance already stands out:
the period between the Exile and the 1st cent. a.c.
was marked by much activity in the collection of the Psalms; and this, apart from the dates of individual Psalms, is significant for the part played by the Psalms in the religious life of the post-exilic community.

PSALMS

Now, since in e.g., Ps 29. 21 the allusion to the king cannot satisfactorily be explained of a foreign monarch, and these Psalms cannot be taken as late as n.c. 105, it appears to follow that they originated before 586. Other Psalms alluding to a king who cannot well be a foreigner, or have lived so late as n.c. 105, are Ps. 2. 18. 28. 45. 61. 63. 72. Yet there still remains a question of interpretation: Is the king in these Psalms an actual contemporary individual, or the Messianic king whether regarded as an individual or as the royal people of Israel (cf. JQR. 1895, p. 658 ff.17. If the latter interpretation is correct (as e.g., in the case of Ps 2 at least, it probably is), the value of the allusion as a criterion of pre-exilic date vanishes; for a reference to a king who is not a person of history, but an ideal personification, is less probable in a post-exilic than in a pre-exilic poem. Further, a purely proverbial allusion to the king, such as occurs in Ps 33, furnishes no valid criterion, for pre-exilic origin, nor does an allusion to kings in the plural (e.g. Ps 110# 1451).

If, as the previous remarks should have suggested, it is in most cases only possible to determine whether a Psalm is pre-exilic or post-exilic as evidence somewhat widely applicable, and in many cases incapable to determine even quite decisively, it should be clear that the attempt to fix the authorship or dates of Psalms very precisely must generally prove fruitless. Are there one or two Psalms which can be referred, even in very great probability, to a particular occasion as that of their origin, or to a particular writer? The mere fact that a Psalm may appear to us suitable to a particular occasion, as e.g., Ps 46 to the deliverance from Samson, cannot necessarily prove that it even refers to it, still less that it was written at the time; the question arises, Is the occasion in question the only one to which the terms of the Psalms are applicable, or are those terms sufficiently general to render it improbable that the Psalm might have fitted other occasions unknown to us, or but partially known? Thus Ps 44. 74. 76. 118 presuppose conditions which resemble what is more of the nature of the community of the Maccabees, more closely than what is known of any other period, and on that ground they have been assigned by many to the Maccabean period. The question is: Are the descriptions so specific that they might not also correspond to the conditions of the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. (to which other scholars have referred Ps 44. 74. 79) if we were equally well informed with respect to Jewish history?

The question of Davidic Psalms.—The question of authorship retains an interest only with reference to David. The theory that David was the author of Psalms can be traced back as far as the time (not to be dated very precisely, but centuries at least after David's time) when the historical notes were added in certain Psalms to the title 'of David' (see above). Whether it goes back further (except in the case of Ps 18—2 S 22; see below) to the time of the origin of the collection entitled 'of David' is less clear, for it is by no means certain that the similar title 'of the chief musician' referred to authorship (see above). Still, we may consider the argument which, based on the assumption that it did, is to the effect that if so many Psalms (as 73 in the Hebrew text, more in the Greek text, and all in later Jewish tradition) were attributed to David, some must actually be his, though many of them are demonstrably and admitted not. In a word, where there is much smoke, there must have been some fire. The argument at best does not seem to justify more than a strong probability that David wrote psalms; and possibly the fact that David was a famous poet, even though all his poems more nearly resembled 2 S 11-27 than the Psalms, coupled with his fame as a zealous worshipper of Jehovah, may be the extent of the historical fact underlying the late traditions. Beyond that, however, the evidence seems to strong enough to justify the statement that some Psalms of David are preserved in the Psalter, the most important problem still remains to be solved, viz. which Psalms in particular are David's? It will be found on an examination that the positive reasons assigned for regarding any particular Psalm as David's are inconclusive: they often amount to nothing more than an argument that there is nothing in such and such Psalms which is characteristic of David. There are some Psalms which in whole or in part may not be incompatible with what we know of David's life, but the allusions are too general to enable us to deny that they are equally applicable to many other lives. The Psalms which is most generally claimed for David by those who go beyond the general argument and specify particular Psalms as his, is Ps 18; but many who hold this to be in the name David's feel the indulgence of treating v. 16-27 as later. An external argument in favour of the Davidic authorship of this Psalm has often been sought in the fact that it appears in 2 S 22 as well as in the Psalter; but the argument is of little value: it carries us back, indeed, beyond the evidence of the Psalm-titles, but the Books of Samuel were composed long after David's time, and 2 S 22 occurs in a section (25. 21-94) which shows signs that entitle us to conclude that it was inserted at a later date. We may safely conclude thus: There are Psalms in the Psalter of which, if we may remove certain parts as later interpolations, a residue remains of which it would be unjustifiable to assert that it was not written by David.

6. Character of the contents: the 'I' of the Psalms.—But if we cannot determine the authors of the Psalms, or the particular occasion out of which they arose, we may yet ask, and ought to ask, What type of persons wrote them, what type of experiences do they embody, with what type of subject do they deal? In order to answer this question, we will discuss briefly an important principle of interpretation.

A considerable proportion of the Psalms describe, from the writer's standpoint, the experiences or aspirations of the religious community—whether this community be co-extensive with the nation or a group or party within it. The Psalms which most obviously belong to this class are those in which the pronoun of the first person plural is used. There are some 27 in number (see Ps 21. 33. 46. 47. 48. 50. 60. [both v. 1-4 and 4-11 = 105-7] 65. [in v. 2a Vulg. and LXX read 'us' for 'me'] 67. 79. 80. 81. 90. 94. 96. 100. 106. 113. 115. 117. 124. 128. 132. 136. 144. 147). In another group of 25 Psalms (viz. Ps 8. 17. 22. 40. 44. 49. 59. 62. 66. 68. 71. 74. 75. 78. 84. 85. 89. 94. 103. 106. 110. 118. 122. 135. 137. 141) the personal pronoun is sometimes in the first singular, sometimes in the first plural; this interchange is not perhaps to be always accounted for in the same way; but in some of these Psalms it is obviously the main purpose of the writer to describe the experiences of the nation (cf. e.g., Ps 44. 74. 78). Another group of Psalms, not so easily defined as the two preceding, but including some 22 Psalms at least (Ps 1. 12. 14. (= 53) 15. 19. 24. 29. 34. 72. 76. 82. 93. 96. 107. 112. 114. 123. 127. 133. 134. 148. 149. 150), are as little limited to individual experience as the first: they are, for example, calls to praise God for His goodness, or descriptions of the character which is pleasing to God. The remainder of the Psalms, about (so it is thought) perhaps a whole number, appear superficially, in contrast to the foregoing, to describe the experiences or aspirations of some individual. They are written in the first person singular. But in one Psalm, owing to its peculiar structure, the Psalmist supplies the interpretation of the pronoun of first singular, and in this case the singular pronoun refers, not to an individual, but to the nation (see Ps 129). The personification of the nation as an individual which underlies this use of the singular in Hebrew literature (see Servant of the Lord, § 5). How far does it extend in the Psalter? Is the much afflicted subject of other Psalms written in the first person and individual, or, like the afflicted subject of Pss 129-132, Israel? For instance, does the author of the words, 'Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Sheol, nor suffer thy holy one to see corruption' (Ps 16:10), express the conviction that in the final death of the individual (for it is this and not resurrection that the words imply), or that Israel will never cease to be? Does the author of Ps 51 make confession of purely personal sins (vv. 1-4), and look forward as an individual to a missionary career (v. 12), or, like the authors of La 10:1-22, Is 65:25-66:4, does he, identifying himself with his people, make confession of national sins? It is impossible either to discuss this fully here, or to attempt to determine how far the use of Ps 51 to illustrate what may have been written for the nation (e.g. Ps 20:11-18), or as a model for the community as a whole to participate in the writer's experience or aspirations (cf. e.g. Ps 34:3, 188). These departures from the apparently individual tenor of the Psalms are sometimes treated as glosses; and they may be such. Not all of these Psalms need have the same origin: some may have been originally written as national confessions, some as personal, and a mixture of both may have been used for the community, by the addition of liturgical verses and the elimination of what was too limited to be of general applicability.

The conclusion to be drawn from this brief survey of the origin of the Psalter and the character of the Psalms may be stated thus:—The Psalms as we have received them are sacred poems that reveal more of Jesus, or, like the conditioned affictions of the exilic. Jewish community and express its varying religious feelings and aspirations; in origin some of these Psalms may go back to the pre-exilic period, some may have sprung out of circumstances peculiar to and characteristic of the individual experiences of the Psalms in question, but in most cases the Psalms have been fashioned by the successive compilers of the post-exilic hymn-books through which the Psalms have come down to us, most of the peculiarly pre-exilic or individual characteristics which they may have possessed when originally composed have been largely obliterated.

7. Religious value and influence of the Psalter. — Probably no book of the OT has exercised a more profound and extensive influence on succeeding generations than the Psalms. Among the Jews, indeed, the Law has received a more persistent and general attention; but the place of the Psalms in the history of the Christian Church and the Christian experience is typified by the frequency with which they are quoted in the NT. To trace this influence, or to illustrate it as Mr. Prothero has so excellently done in his volume entitled The Psalms in Human Life, falls outside the scope of this article. All that can be attempted, and even that but very inadequately, is to indicate some of the leading religious ideas, some of the striking religious qualities of the Psalms. And in doing this it is necessary to emphasize clearly the fact that such ideas and qualities are by no means common to all the 150 or more poems which were written by an indefinite number of writers, and were gathered together in our Psalter. What is still more of interest is that we may observe the extent of the ideas in some of the qualities that are at least frequently present, and of the ideas which are so constantly and strikingly appear —to the ideas and qualities which have in large measure become the cause of the great and persistent influence which the Psalms have exercised.

(1) The Psalms occupy a peculiar position in the OT literature in consequence of their character. The Law codifies the customs of Israel which had received the approval of Jehovah; the Historical Narratives relate Jehovah's dealings with Israel; the Prophets deliver Jehovah's message to Israel, and in the Psalms Israel replies. These distinctions are of course broadly drawn, and we may find, for example, in Jeremiah (e.g. 20:7) 'contentions' with Jehovah that may be somewhat closely paralleled in the Psalms; or, again, the facts that faced the author of the Book of Job are discussed, for example, in Is 57, 49, 73, though the writer will never cease to face death (for it is this and not resurrection that the words imply), or that Israel will never cease to be? Does the author of Ps 51 make confession of purely personal sins (vv. 1-4), and look forward as an individual to a missionary career (v. 12), or, like the authors of La 10:1-22, Is 65:25-66:4, does he, identifying himself with his people, make confession of national sins? They look beyond the present which for the writers is often full of oppression and affliction, to a future which is sometimes described with such fohness (e.g. Ps 72), but is often merely suggested by the call on God to arise, to awake, to reveal Himself; or by some other brief but pregnant phrase. We cannot here discuss how far the Psalms anticipate a particular Messianic individual; it is enough to say that if the original sense of some passages has been obscured by specific applications to the life of Christ—applications which in some instances have been built on a very questionable Hebrew text or an illegitimate translation, and that in some Psalms (e.g. Ps 2) the 'Messiah' is perhaps rather the nation of Israel, supreme among the nations of the world (cf. Dn 7), than an individual ruler or deliverer, whether of Israel or of the world. But where fuller expression is given to the hope, it often takes the form of the establishment of the Kingdom of God, without reference to any other king than God Himself; the overarching thought is of the manifestation of His supreme sovereignty and the consequent promotion of righteousness and equity among all people (so pre-eminently Psa 96-100). Even in the broadest form of this thought, it is true that Israel occupies a central position, and that is to become for the whole world what God has long been for Israel. But the centre of the region, the place where Jehovah will be worshipped (cf. esp. Ps 87). No Psalmist has attained to the standpoint of our Lord's teaching in Jr 31.31-34. The Psalms of the Psalms is the thought of the Psalms about God and their hope in Him, we may turn to their thought of men, which is for the most part primarily of Israel, and in particular to their sense of sin.

Judged by their attitude towards sin, the Psalms fall into two classes, the first group of which the extreme representatives of each group are very different in thought, tone, and temper; the less extreme approximate more or less closely to one another. In the one group the writers claim for themselves, and, so far as they identify themselves with Israel, for their nation, that they are righteous, and in consequence have a claim on God's righteousness to deliver them from present afflictions (so, e.g. Ps 7, 17, 26, 29, 86). In the second group the confession is made of great iniquity: the appeal for help, if made, can be made to God's mercy and lovingkindness alone (see Psa 25. 32. 40. 51. 65. 85. etc.). The first group stand far removed from the early Prophets; but they have considerable resemblance in thought to Habakkuk; the second group, again, differ from the early Prophets; for though both recognize the sinfulness of Israel, yet the Prophets complain that Israel does not recognize its sin, whereas these Psalms make confession of sin on behalf of the nation (cf. the late confession in Is 63?—64?).

(6) The view taken of sin in both groups of Psalms is best appreciated by noticing how, with all their differences, they are yet related. Some sense of sin is perhaps never altogether absent from the Psalms that lay claim to righteousness, and a strong sense of relative righteousness generally accompanies the most fervent confession of sin. Even in such Psalms as the 32nd and the 51st, where the difference is most clearly felt between God's standard and man's performance, the sense is also present of a sharp difference between those who, in spite of sin, yet pursue after righteousness, and those who constitute the class of 'the wicked' or 'the transgressors.' This attitude towards sin might doubtless without much difficulty be called non-metaphysical; but it is also closely akin to the highest Christian consciousness, in which the shadow of sin shows darkest in the light of the righteousness and love of God as revealed in Christ, and which leads the truest followers of Christ, with all honesty, to account themselves the chief of sinners. And it is because the 'potential' Psalms are confessions, not so much of grosser sins open to the rebuke of man, but of the subtler sins which are committed in the sight of and against God only, of the sins which stand in the way of the nation called of God fulfilling its missionary destiny, that these Psalms have played so conspicuous a part in forming the habit and moulding the form of the confession of the Christian man and the Christian Church.

On the poetical form of the Psalms, see Poetry and Acrostic. The first edition of T. K. Cheyne's Book of Psalms (1882), with its original translation and terminology full of insight, is one of the best books for the student; in the second edition the translation is based on a very critical re-construction of the Hebrew text, which has not obtained general approval. Other translations are Wellhausen-Furness's in the Polyglot Bible and S. R. Driver's Orthodox Psalter (Prayer-Book, Publisher, and revised version). The most important Com. in English is by C. A. Briggs (ICC, 1906-7). Other useful commentaries are W. E. Cobb (with independent translation), Kirkpatrick on AV (in Cambridge Bible), and W. T. Davison and T. W. Davies on RV (Century Bible). The most exhaustive treatise on the literary criticism and religious thought of the Psalter is T. K. Cheyne's Origin of the Psalter (1891); many details are discussed. The emphasis on the literary questions of W. J. Smith's chapter (vii.) on the Psalter in OTJC, and S. R. Driver's LOT.

PSALTERY.—See Music, etc., § 4.

PSYCHOLOGY.—The Bible does not contain a science of psychology in the modern sense; but there is a definite and consistent view of man's nature from the religious standpoint. This being recognized, the old dispute, whether it teaches the bipartite or the tripartite nature of man, loses its meaning, for distinction of the spirit is not a division of man into soul and spirit along with his body or flesh, but a difference of point of view—the one emphasizing man's individual existence, the other his dependence on God. Hence no pre-existence of the soul is taught (except in Ws 71. 20), nor is the future life conceived as that of a disembodied soul. Man is the unity of spirit and matter; hence the hope of immortality involves the belief in the resurrection of the body, even though in St. Paul's statement of the belief the body raised is described as spiritual (1 Co 15). The OT has not, in fact, a term for the body as a whole; the matter to which the spirit gives life is often referred to as flesh. This term may be used for man as finite earthly creature in contrast with God and His Spirit. Man is 'flesh,' or 'soul,' or 'spirit,' according to the aspect of his personality it is desired to emphasize. The various senses in which these terms are used are discussed in the separate articles upon them; here only their relation to one another is dealt with. These are the three principal psychological terms; but there are a few others which claim mention.

Heart is used for the inner life, the principles, motives, purposes (Gn 6. Ps 5119, Ezk 365, Mt 1520, 2 Co 39, without precise distinction of the intellectual, emotional, and will, or, as the preceding terms, be used for the whole man. St. Paul, influenced probably by Greek philosophy, uses nous for mind as man's intellectual activity (Ro 720-23), and even contrasts it with the ecstatic state (1 Co 1410) and adopts other terms used in the Greek schools. Another Greek term, synedesis, rendered ' conscience,' is used in the NT consistently for what Kant called the practical reason, man's moral consciousness (Ac 2324-24, Ro 3491, 1 Co 87, 1310 Ti 220, 2 Co 114, 1117)).
PTOLEMAIS

—The same as Ancyra (12 n.), now the port 'Akka, called in the West, since Crusading times, Acre or St. Jean d'Acre. Acre received the name Ptolemais some time in the 3rd cent. B.C., probably in honor of Ptolemy II, but although the name was in common use for many centuries, it reverted to its Semitic name after the decline of Greek influence. Although so very casually mentioned in OT and NT, this place has had as various tragic a history as any other spot in Palestine. On a coast peculiarly unfriendly to the mariner, the Bay of 'Akka is one of the few spots where nature has lent its encouragement to the building of a harbour; its importance in history has always been as the port of Galilee and Damascus, of the Hauran and Gilead, while in the days of Western domination the Roman Ptolemais and the Crusading St. Jean d'Acre served as the landing-place of governors, of armies, and of pilgrims. So strong a fortress, guarding so fertile a plain, and a port on the highroad to such rich lands to north, east, and south, could never have been overlooked by hostile armies, and so we find the Egyptian, the Roman, and the Arab, not only fortified in the city, but in the adjoining promontory and hills, as early as the Assyrian Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal, and several of the Ptolemies engaged in its conquest or defence. It is much in evidence in the history of the Maccabees, a queen Cleopatra of Egypt holds it for a time, and here some decades later Herod the Great entertains Caesar. During the Jewish revolt it is an important base for the Romans, and both Vespasian and Titus visit it. In later times, such warriors as Baldwin I. and Guy de Lusignan, Richard Coeur de Lion and Saladin, Napoleon I. and Ibrahim Pasha are associated with its history.

In the OT it is mentioned only as one of the cities of Asher (13 n.), while in Ac 217 it occurs as the port where St. Paul landed, 'saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day,' on his way to the new and powerful rival port, Caesarea, which a few decades previously had sprung up to the south.

The modern 'Akka (11,000 inhabitants) is a city, much reduced from its former days of greatness, situated on a rocky promontory of land at the N. extremity of the bay to which it gives its name. The sea lies on the W. and S., and somewhat to the E. The ancient harbour lay on the S. and was protected by a mole running from the S. extremity, and one running S. from the S.E. corner of the city. Ships of moderate dimensions can approach near the city, and the water is fairly deep. The walls, partially Crusading work, which still surround the city, are in the ruined state to which they were reduced in 1840 by the bombardment by the English fleet under Sir Sidney Smith. Extending from Carmel in the south to the 'Ladder of Tyre' in the north, and eastward to the foothills of Galilee, is the great and well-watered 'Plain of Acre,' a region which, though sandy and sterile close to the sea, is of rich fertility elsewhere. The two main streams of this plain are the Nahar Na'mdn (R. Benua), just south of 'Akka, and the Kishon near Carmel.

Under modern conditions, Halifa, with its better anchorage for modern steamships, and its new railway to Damascus, is likely to form a successful rival to 'Akka.

PTOLEMY V. (Epiphanius).—Ptolemy' was the dynastic name of the Macedonian kings who reigned in Egypt from 305-31 B.C., during which period this Egypt was an independent country, it was not until the great victory of Augustus at Actium (B.C. 31) that Egypt again lost her independence and became a province of Rome. This time under Roman rule lasted until 268-182. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus III. the Great; this matrimonial alliance between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids is alluded to in Lk 21. During his reign Palestine and Coele-Syria were lost to Egypt, and were incorporated into the kingdom of Syria under Antiochus III.; this is probably what is alluded to in Lk 11:48-51.

PTOLEMY VI. (VII.) (Philometer).—Son of the foregoing, who reigned B.C. 182-146; in 170 the kingdom was divided between him and his brother Ptolemy VII. (Physcon); peace was made between them by the Romans, and they continued as joint kings. In the year B.C. 170, while Ptolemy VI. was still in power, he attempted to conquer the Syrian provinces which had been lost during his father's reign; the attempt was, however, abortive, and he was defeated by Antiochus IV. It was only through the intervention of the Romans that Antiochus was prevented from following up this victory by further conquests. References to Philometer are to be found in 1 Mac 11:10-15, 11:24-29, 12:14-26; and see Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 4-9.

W. E. OSTERLEY.

PHAUH.—1. One of the Hebrew midwives (Ex 2:10). 2. Father of Tola (Jgs 10:1). In Gn 46:14, Nu 26:24 (P'vah), 1 Ch 7:16, he is Tola's brother.

PUBLICAN.—This term is a transliteration of a Latin word, which strictly speaks, of one of the great Roman financial companies, which formed the taxes of the provinces of the Roman Empire. The Roman State during the Republican relieved itself of the trouble and expense of collecting the taxes of the provinces by putting up the task of each in a lump to auction. The auctioneer was the censor, and the buyer was one of the above companies, composed mainly of members of the equestrian order, who made the best they could out of the bargain. Their abuses to which this system gave rise were terrible, especially as the governors could sometimes be bribed to wink at extortion; and in one particular year the provincials of Asia had to pay the taxes three times over. These companies required officials of their own to do the business of collection. The publicans of the Gospels appear to have been agents of the Imperial procurator of Judea, with similar duties (during the Empire there was State machinery for collecting the taxes, and the Emperor had a procurator in each province whose business it was to supervise the collection of revenue). They were employed in collecting the customs dues on exports. Some Jews found it profitable to serve the Roman State in this way, and became objects of detestation to such of their fellow-countrymen as showed an importunate hatred of the Roman supremacy. The Gospels show clearly that they were coupled habitually with 'sinners,' a word of the deepest contempt.

PUBLIUS, or Popilius.—The 'first man' of Malta, whose father was killed by St. Paul on account of his disloyalty by laying down his arms (Ac 28:12). The title Pròtos ('first man') at Malta is attested by inscriptions; it occurs also at Ptolemaic Antioch (Ac 13:36, cf. 28).

A. J. MACLEAN.

PUDENS.— Mentioned by St. Paul as sending greetings from Rome to Timothy (2 Ti 4:11: 'Pudens and Linus and Claudia'). For the suggested relationship of these persons and identification of the first and of the last, see art. CLAUDIA. Pudens is a common Roman name.

PUL.—1. See ASYRIA AND BABYLONIA, p. 66^.

2. In Is 66^9 Put is prob. a slip for PUT (wh. see).

PULSE (zbr'vn), Dn 11^4; zbr'nvm, v. 11 RvM 'herbs,' cf. Is 611 EV 'things that are sown' may have been any garden produce. The Eng. word 'pulse' belongs to homogenous granules specially, but it is doubtful whether the meaning of the Heb. can be so restricted. In 2 S 17^4 'pulse' is supplied after 'parched, but 'grain' would be better. See also FOOD, § 3.

E. W. G. Masterman.

PUNISHMENTS.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, §§ 8–11.

PUNICE.—The gentile name from Puvuh, Nu 26^9. See PUAH, No. 2.

PUNON.—A station of the Israelites (Nu 33^4). Cf. also art. PINON.

PUN.—See PURIM.

PURAH.—Gideon's servant or armour-bearer Jg 7^16.

PURGE.—To 'purge' in AV is simply to 'cleanse oneself,' as Ps 51^7 'purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean'; Mk 7^1 'purging all meats,' i.e. making all food ceremonially clean.

PURIFICATION.—See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

PURIM.—1. In the OT.—On the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (March) fell the celebration of the Feast of Purim or Lots. This commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from Haman, who was about to carry out their extermination throughout the Persian empire (Est 3^9–12). In 2 Mac 15^10 it is called 'Mordecai's day.' The observance of this festival was probably not at first universal, but Josephus mentions its occurrence, and it held an established position before the time of Christ. At first no special religious services were enjoined to mark it, nor was there any prohibition of labour. It was a time of feasting and joy, of the giving of presents and alms. In later times it was celebrated by a synagogue meeting on the evening of the 13th and the morning of the 14th, when the Book of Esther was read through, special prayers and thanks were offered, and the congregation ejaculated curses on Haman and blessings on Esther and Mordecai. The rest of the feast was given up to good cheer and boisterous enjoyment of an almost Bacchanalian character. In 1 Mac 7^11 and 2 Mac 15^11, as also in Josephus, the 13th of Adar is recorded as a feast-day in commemoration of the defeat of the Syrian general Nicanor in B.C. 161. But later ages observed it as the Fast of Esther (cf. Est 9^4), the celebration taking place on the 11th, if the 15th happened to be a Sabbath.

The origin of the Purim feast is a matter of dispute. It is difficult to identify any known Persian word with pur (Est 3^9), which gave the festival its name. Various theories have been put forward, of which the most noteworthy are: (a) that which derives it from a Persian spring festival; (b) that which regards it as a transformation of an old Zoroastrian festival of the dead; (c) that which traces its origin to a Babylonian New Year's festival.

2. In the NT.—Some have supposed that the nameless feast mentioned in Jn 6^1 was Purim. But this is not the case. For (a) Purim was never one of the great national solemnities which called for attendance at Jerusalem; it was observed locally and not only at the capital; (b) Christ would naturally go up for the Passover in the next month. And it is more probable that the Passover is the feast here intended. Cf. art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, I, § 2. A. W. F. Blunt.

PURITY.—1. Ceremonial purity is acquired by the noobseance of external rites. The Jewish law pre-scribed various regulations by means of which outward defilement might be removed and the 'unclean' person be restored to fellowship with God. But the OT recognizes that moral purity is essential to acceptable worship of the Holy God (Ps 24^-4); and the Apostle of Elyphias expresses the conviction of those who know how absolute is the Divine holiness: 'Shall a man be pure before his Maker?' (Job 4^4 RVm; only to the man who 'purifies himself' can such a glory (Ps 18^5, the verb is reflexive). The writer of the Ep. to the Hebrews reminds Christians who were familiar with the OT ceremonial of purification that the voluntary sacrifice of the Son of God is the means of purification under the new and better Covenant; 'the blood of Christ' removes the inward defilement which unites sinful men for the service of the living God (9^-4). In the NT 'pure' has the more restricted meaning of 'chaste' in a few passages. Underlying the true reading of 2 Co 11, 'the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ,' is the metaphor of v^- (Rv), 'I espoused you to one husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ' (cf. Ti 2^3, 1 P 3^2). The same noun is tr. 'purity' in 2 Co 4^-2 (Rv); cf. 1 Ti 4^-25; also, for the wider meaning of the verb, J 4^-1, 1 P 5^3, 1 Jn 3^2 and of the adjective, Pb 4^-1, Ti 5^-3, J 3^-7. See, further, art. HOLINESS. J. G. Tasker.

PURPLE.—See COLOURS, § 5.

PURSE.—See BAG.

PUT, PHUT.—A people counted amongst the sons of Ham (Gn 10^6, 1 Ch 1^6), and frequently mentioned in the prophets as an ally of Egypt (Jer 46^-6, Ezk 27^-9, 30^-13, Nah 3^-9). It has been suggested that it represents (1) peoples of the Libyan and Egyptian race, e.g. the Libyans of the African coast of the Red Sea with Somalia, etc.; warriors may perhaps have been obtained thence for Egypt; or (2) Libyan, whose people were called by Egyptians Putat (in the times of the Hebrew prophets the Libyans were the backbone of the semi-native army); or (3) the bow-bearing allies pold (7) (?); (4) being generally associated with Lud—Lydians (once in Nah. Lubim), it is thought that Put may be a name for the Carlians or other pre-Hellenic peoples of Asia Minor or the Egyptian islands. F. W. C. Griffith.

PUTEOLI (modern Pozzuoli).—In ancient times an important harbour and emporium, especially for Eastern trade, on the W. coast of Italy near Naples. It was founded by Greeks at a very early period. Such cities were specially sought by Jews and other foreigners, and Christians would easily be living there, as St. Paul and his party found them on reaching this port at the end of their voyage from the East (Ac 28^-9). A. Sorrier.

PUTHITES.—A family of Kiriath-jezarim (1 Ch 2^-9).

PUTIEL.—The father-in-law of Eleazar (Ex 6^-9).

PUVAH.—See PUAH.

PYGARG (aóhófi).—A 'clean' animal, Dt 14^- only. From its associates in the same sentence it may be inferred that it was a deer of some kind. The LXX tr. is, on what grounds is not known, pygargos, i.e. 'white-rumped' (hence the Eng. 'pygarg'). This description and a process of exclusion—the hart, roebuck, etc., all being otherwise accounted for—make it probable that the aóhófi was the addax (A. nasomaculatus), an antelope with a white tail and long, backward-curved, twisted horns. It is rare in Palestine to-day, but is known to the Bedouin.

E. W. G. Masterman.

PYRRHUS.—A man of Beroea, father of Sophat, according to the best text (Ac 20^-11). For the unusual insertion of the patronymic, see art. SOPHAT. A. J. Maclean.

PYTHON.—In Ac 16^- we read of a young girl at Philippi who had 'a spirit, a Python' (this is the reading of all the best MSS). Python was a district close to Delphi; and Python was the serpent at the place slain by Apollo, who therefore was called 'the Pythonian.' Hence the priestess at Delphi was called 'the Pythonian.'
QUAIL ( editar, Ex 16th, Nu 11th, Ps 105th).—This bird (Coturnix communis), the smallest of the partridge family, migrates annually from Africa to Europe, crossing the Sinaitic peninsula and Palestine en route; it reaches the latter about March. It migrates in vast numbers, always flying with the wind, and often settling, after a long flight, especially across the sea, in such an exhausted condition as to be easy of capture. The flesh is fatty, and apt to disintegrate if taken to excess, especially if inefficiently preserved.

QUARREL.—The original meaning of this Eng. word (from Lat. querella) is a 'complaint.' This is its meaning in Col 2:18 AV if any man have a quarrel against any. Then it came to mean any cause of complaint, or any case that had to be stated or defended, as Mk 6:3 Herodias had a quarrel against him; so Lk 4:32 K S.

QUARRY.—In the story of the slaughter of Elgon by Ehud (Jg 3) we are told (v.13) that Ehud turned back from the quarters that were at Gilgal, while after the assassination he 'escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quarries' (v. 13). An alternative translation 'graven images' is given in AV and RVm, while other versions, e.g. LXX and Vulg., read 'idols.' The Heb. word festim is applied to images of gods in wood, stone, or metal (Dt 7:5, 12; Is 21:3 309, 2 Ch 349). Moore suggests the translation 'sculptured stones (probably rude images)'. Probably the stones set up by Joshua to commemorate the crossing of the Jordan (Jos 4) are what is referred to.

'Quarry' occurs also in RV of 1 K 6. The stones used for the Temple building are said to have been prepared 'at the quarry,' AV reads 'before it was brought thither.' RVm 'when it was brought away.' The translation 'quarry' is probably correct. W. F. BOYD.

QUARTUS.—Mentioned as joining in St. Paul's greeting to the Church of Rome (Ro 16th).

QUATERNION.—A guard of four soldiers (Ac 12th).

QUEEN.—The functions of a queen reigning in her own right would be identical with those of a king (wh. see). The queen as the wife of a monarch in Israel held a position of comparatively little importance, whereas of a dowager-queen ('queen-mother') commanded great influence (cf. the cases of Bathsheba, Jezebel, Athaliah).

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. mlekheth hash-shâmah-ym).—An object of worship to the people of Jerusalem (Jer 7th-20) and the Jewish exiles in Egypt (44th-30). The Massoretes evidently took the first word as mlekheth ('work,' 'creation')—assuming that the silent aleph ('') had been omitted—and considered the expression a synonym for 'Host of Heaven' (le'hôd hash-shâmah-ym, Jer 8th 19th, Zeph 11th, Dt 4th 17th etc.). In apparent confirmation of this view we have the fact that this term was used in a collective sense as equivalent to 'other gods.' On the other hand, many modern scholars regard malkath ('queen') as the correct reading, and suppose the cultus to be a worship of the Semitic Mother-goddess, the Phoenician Ashtart—the Assyr. Istar (see Assyro-Romer). Indeed, Istar is credited in Assyr. inscriptions Bêtî Shamâ ('lady of heaven') and Sharraî Shamâ ('queen of heaven'); but Mâkal Shamâ ('which is the cognate of the term under discussion, and which in Assyrs. means 'princess of heaven') is not one of her titles. The fact that cakes were offered in this worship has little evidential value, as we find this rite a frequent feature in Semitic worship. In Arabia, cakes were offered to the goddess of the evening-star and to the sun-god; and the Israelites offered bread and cakes to Jehovah (see 'Meal-offering' and 'Shewbread' in art. SACRIFICE), Cf. the modern Jewish massâth.

QUICK, QUICKEN.—In AV 'quick' frequently means 'living,' and 'quicken' means 'bring to life.' The phrase 'the quick and the dead' occurs in Ac 19th, 2 Th 4, 1 P 4th.

QUICKSANDS (Ac 27th, RV Syri).—The Syrtes, Major and Minor, are situated on the N. coast of Africa, in the wide bay between the headlands of Tunis and Barca. They consist of sandbanks occupying the shores of the Gulf of Sidra on the coast of Tripoli, and that of Gabes on the coast of Tunis or Carthage. They have been considered a source of danger to mariners from very early times, not only from the shifting of the sands themselves, but owing to the ebb and flow of the adjoining waters.

QUIRINIUS (AV Cyrenius).—In Lk 2nd-4 we are first met by a grammatical difficulty. V. 2 may be translated either: 'this was the first enrolment that took place (and it took place) while Quirinius was governing Syria'; or: 'this was the first of two (or more) enrolments that took place while Quirinius was governing Syria.' The first statement is probably true, but it is likely that the second is what the author meant, because it is certain that a census took place during the governorship of Syria by Quirinius (A.D. 6-9), when Judas was incorporated in the province Syria. This latter census was a basis of taxation, and was made according to the Roman method: it thus aroused the rebellion of Judas (Ac 3th). The fact that enrolments took place every fourteen years in Egypt has been absolutely proved by the discovery of numerous papyri there, containing returns made by householders to the government. One of the dates thus recovered is A.D. 20. There is also evidence in the ancient historians of enrolments held in certain other provinces. The truth of Luke's statement in 2nd need not therefore be doubted. The real difficulty lies in the statement that Quirinius was governing Syria at the time the first census of all was made. It is quite certain that he could not be governing Syria, in the strict sense of the term governing, both at the time of the birth of Christ and in A.D. 6-9. This is contrary to all ancient procedure, and the rules as to such appointments were rigid. Further, we have ancient authority that the governor of Syria from A.D. 9 to 7 was Sentius Saturninus, and from A.D. 6 to 4 was Quinctillus Varus. After A.D. 4 we know nothing till the succession of P.
quotations (in NT)

The NT writings contain quotations from four sources: (1) the OT; (2) noncanonical Jewish writings; (3) non-Jewish sources; (4) letters to which the author of a letter is replying, or other private sources. It is significant of the relation of the NT writers to these Scriptures, that the quotations of the first class far outnumber all those of the other three classes. Swete counts 169 passages directly quoted from the OT, by writers of the NT, including those which are cited with an introductory formula, and those which, by their length or accuracy of quotation, are clearly shown to be intended as quotations. Westcott and Hort reckon the total number of NT quotations from the OT at 1279, including passages formerly cited and those in which an influence of the OT upon the NT passage is otherwise shown. Even this list is perhaps not absolutely complete. Thus, while WH enumerate 61 passages from Is 1:1-8, H. Osgood, in his essay "Quotations from the OT in the NT," finds exactly twice as many—122. Against this large number of quotations from the OT there can be cited at the utmost only some 24 quotations by NT writers from non-canonical Jewish sources (see Ryle, art. 'Apoxyphæa' in Smith's DB; Zahn, Com. on Gal 3:19 5th ed.; Woods, art. 'Quotations' in Hastings' DB). Of quotations from non-Jewish sources the following are the only probable instances: 1 Th 1:3; Ac 17:11, 1 Co 2:7-8 15:20. To this short list it should be added that Luke's phrase (1:3) is perhaps constructed on classical models (cf. Farrar, Life and Work of Paul, Excursus 3; Zahn, E. t. c. p. 51). Of quotations from private sources there are several unquestionable examples in the Pauline letters: 1 Co 7:8 11:17, 12:2, Ph 1:24 4:1-18; cf. also Phil 3:1. Of the numerous quotations from the OT by far the largest number are derived directly from the LXX, even the freedom of quotation, which the NT writers in common with others of their time permitted themselves, in no way obscuring their direct dependence upon the Greek version. Among the NT books the Epistle to the Hebrews shows the strongest and most constant influence of the LXX. According to Westcott (Com. p. 479), 15 quotations agree with the LXX and Hebrew, 8 with the LXX where it differs from the Hebrew, 3 differ from LXX and Hebrew, 3 are free renderings. Westcott adds that 'the writer regarded the Greek text as authoritative. The LXX, which was not a . . . source, was used at times even with immediate knowledge of the Hebrew text.' The Gospel of Matthew, on the other hand, exhibits the largest influence of the Hebrew. In the quotations from the OT which are common to the Synoptic Gospels (occurring chiefly in the saying of Jesus) Matthew alone exerts the dominant influence. But in those passages which are peculiar to this Gospel—being introduced by the writer by way of comment on events—though the writer is not unmindful of sources or with intention by the LXX, the Hebrew is the dominant influence: 1st 18, 19, 23 lXX 129, 13th 21, 27b, cf. also 29. This difference in the two groups of quotations tends to show that while the common source of the Synoptic Gospels was, in the form in which it was used by the Evangelists, in Greek, and shaped under Hellenistic influence, the author of the First Gospel was a Christian Jew who still read his Bible in Hebrew, or drew his series of prophetic comment-quotations from a special source coined by a Jew of this kind. The quotations in the Gospel of John and the Epistles of Paul, while derived mainly from the LXX, show also an acquaintance of their authors with the original Hebrew. (On the fact that the NT quotations from the LXX show a special similarity to the type of LXX text found in Cod. A, cf. Staehl, Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. 1., XXXV, XXXVII, XXXVIII, XXXVIII, 1893; and Swete, Introd. to OT in Greek, p. 395.)

As regards the nature and extent of the influence exerted by the OT in passages which may be called quotations in the broad sense, there are nearly several distinguishable classes, though it is sometimes difficult to draw the line sharply. We may recognize: (I) Argumentative quotations. The OT passage is quoted, with recognition of its source, and with intention to employ the fact or teaching or prophecy for an argumentative purpose. Passages so quoted may be: (a) historical statements which are supposed to contain in themselves an enunciation of a principle or precept, or to involve a prediction, or to tend to prove a general rule of some kind; cf. Mk 2:24; Mt 24, Jn 19:4; Mt 15:3, He 7:18, (b) predictions; cf. e.g. Ac 2:25; (c) imperative precepts, quoted to enforce a teaching; Mk 9:44, 11:28; 1 Co 2:9; or figurative use, involving a general principle of Divine action or a general characteristic of human nature; Mk 12:40, Mt 5:1, Lk 4:21, Ac 14:27, Ro 3:10, 18, Js 1:27, 1 P 2:3. (II) Quotations made the basis of comment. In this case the language of the OT is not cited as supporting the statement of the speaker or writer, but is itself made the basis of exposition or comment, sometimes with disapproval of its teaching or of the teaching commonly based on it; Mt 5:27, 36, 38 etc., Ro 4:14, Ac 8:16, (III) Quotations of comparison or of transferred application. The OT language is employed, with recognition of it as coming from the OT and with the intention of connecting the OT event or teaching with the NT matter, but for purposes of comparison rather than argument. The language itself may refer directly and solely to the OT event, being introduced for the sake of comparing with this event some NT fact (dimme); or the OT language may be applied directly to a NT fact, yet so as to imply comparison or likeness of the two events (metaphor); Mt 12:40, Lk 11:29, Ac 22:21, Mt 21:43, etc. Closely allied to these, yet perhaps properly belonging to the class of argumentative quotations, are cases of quotation accompanied by allegorical interpretation; cf. e.g. Gal 4:4-5. (IV) Literary influence. In the cases which fall under this head the language is employed because of its familiarity, and applicability to the matter in hand, but without intention of affirming any other connexion than this between the OT thought and the NT fact or teaching. The writer may be conscious of this influence of the OT language or not, and the interpreter often cannot determine with certainty which is the case; Mt 24 10, Gal 6, Eph 1, Rev 5 7: 9 4 14 211.

As concerns the method of interpretation and the attitude towards the OT thus disclosed, there is a wide difference among the speakers and writers of the NT. It is an indirect but valuable testimony to the historical accuracy of the Synoptic Gospels that they almost uniformly ascribe to Jesus a method of interpretation quite different from that which they themselves employ. Jesus quotes the OT almost exclusively for its moral and religious teaching, rather than for any predicable element in it, and interprets alike with insight and with sobriety the passages which He quotes. The author of the First Gospel, on the other hand, quotes the OT mainly for specific predictions which he conceives it to contain, and controls his interpretation of the passages quoted rather by the proposition which he wishes to sustain, than by the actual sense of the original. The one quotation which is common to the first three Gospels, and not included in the teaching of Jesus, has the same general character (Mk 1 and parallels). In general it may be said of the other NT writers that they stand in this respect between Jesus and Matthew, less uniformly sober and discerning in their interpretation of the OT than Jesus, yet in many instances approaching much nearer to His method than Matthew commonly does. The Apocalypse, while constantly showing the literary influence of the OT, contains no explicit or argumentative quotation from it.

ERNEST D. BURTON.

is called (Gn 10=1 Ch 1 Rama'al) a son of Cush, and father of Sheba and Dedan (Gn 10). The locality of this Arabian tribe is not yet ascertained. Orbulon is divided between the Ramaa of Ptolemy, on the W. of the Persian Gulf, and the Rammonites of Strabo in S. Arabia, N.W. of Hadramaut (see HAHRAMAVETH) and E. of the ancient Sheba. The latter is the more probable identification. Raamah is also associated with Sheba in Ezek 27 24 as trading with Tyre.

J. F. McCurdy.

RAAMAH,—One of the twelve chiefs who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 Ezra 2 Reeluijah, 1 Es 3) (Resalas).

RAAMES, RAAMES.—One of the treasurers built by the Israelites in Egypt, and the starting-point of the Exodus (Ex 11 126, Nu 33 4). The site is not quite certain, but it was probably one of the cities called in Egypt. R. Ra'masse, 'House of Ramasse,' after Ramesses II. In Gn 47 1 Joseph, by Pharaoh's command, gives to Jacob's family 'a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Ramesses.' It thus lay in the Land of Goshen (wh. see), and is to be looked for in the first place in the Wady Tumiat. Petrie identifies it with Tell Raba, where he has found sculptures of the age of Ramesses II.

F. Ll. Griffiths.

RABBAH.—1. The capital city of the Ammonites (wh. see). Rabbah was situated on the upper Jabbok on the site of the modern 'Amman. It was destroyed from the Jordan about 20 miles, though the distance by way of the Jabbok is much greater, for the stream at Rabbah flows towards the N.E. and reaches the Jordan only after a wide detour. The Ammonite city was situated on the hill-top to the N. of the river. From its position it commanded a wide view in all directions, but especially extensive to the N.E. Rabbah is mentioned in Dt 30 as the place where Og's 'bedstead' might still be seen. This is thought by some to be a reference to a large dolmen still visible not far from 'Ammon. In Jos 13 Rabbah is mentioned in defining the boundaries of the tribe of Gad. The chief event connected with Rabbah which the OT relates is its siege by Joab, in connexion with which Uriah the Hittite, by the express direction of king David, lost his life (see 2 S 11 126. 1 9 and 1 Ch 20). The city was at this time confined apparently to all the hills mentioned above; and since the sides of the hill are precipitous (see the photograph in Barton's Year's Wanderings in Bible Lands, opp. 150), the task of capturing it was difficult, and the siege was stubborn and prolonged.

These conditions gave Joab his opportunity to carry out David's peridious order (2 S 11). From 2 S 12 9 4 it appears that the city consisted of two parts, one of which was called the 'royal city' or the 'city of waters.' This Joab captured, after which David came and captured Rabbah itself. What relation this 'royal city' bore to Rabbah proper, it is difficult now to conjecture. It is probable, however, that the text of Samuel is corrupt—that we should read 'city' or 'cistern of waters'—and that Joab, like Antiochus IV. and Herod in after centuries, captured the covered passage by which they went to a cistern for water, or the fort which defended it, and carried it down to David. This cistern was discovered by Conder (see Survey of Eastern Pal. p. 34 ff.).

The Israelites did not occupy Rabbah, but left it in the possession of the Ammonites, who became David's vassal. When David later fled to Mahamna, east of the Jordan, because of Absalom's rebellion, the Ammonite king was residing in Rabbah (2 S 17). In the time of Amos (c. n. c. 750) Rabbah was still the capital of the Ammonites (Am 14), and such it continued to be down to the time of Nebuchadnezzar, who, if we may judge from the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Jer 49, Ezek 21 229), punished Rabbah for a rebellion of the Ammonites by a siege. Whether the siege resulted in a capture we do not know, but it probably did. Only cities situated like Tyre, which was partly surrounded by water, could withstand the might of that monarch.

For a time the city (one of the Decapolis group) bore the name Philadelphia, given to it by Ptolemy Philadelphia (n.c. 263 247), but finally received its modern name, 'Amman. It is to-day quite a flourishing city, inhabited partly by Arabs and partly by Circassians. The latter form a more energetic element than is found in most Syrian cities, and give 'Amman a greater air of prosperity. The Hay railway, from Damascus to Mecca, passes near 'Amman, which has a station on the line.

2. A city in Judah (Jos 15); site unknown.

W. A. Barton.

RABB.—The transliteration of Heb. word meaning 'my master.' In Mt 23 8 it is referred to as 'the usual form of address with which the learned were greeted' (Dillman, Words of Jesus, p. 331); in the following verse it is regarded as synonymous with 'teacher.' John the Baptist is once called 'Rabbi' by his disciples (Jn 3 2). Elsewhere in the Gospels it is our Lord who is thus addressed: by His disciples (Mt 26 64, Mk 9 11 14, Jn 14 4 18 11), by others (Jn 3 24). Rabboni is the transliteration of the Pal.-Aram. form of the word; it occurs twice, namely in Mk 10:40 and Jn 3:39.

J. G. TEERI.

RAABTH.—A town of Issachar (Jos 19:22), probably the modern Raba, on the S. of Gilboa.

RABRONI.—See Rabi.

RAB-MAG.—The title of Nergal-shar-ezer, a Babylonian official present at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer 39:13).

For various conjectures as to the origin of the title, see Hastings' Dict. of the Bible (s. v.).

Rabbinic law is very stringent against libellous expressions, which were to be treated as serious offences liable for punishment to the supreme court (like murder).

J. H. BOX.

RACAL in 1 S 30:2 is prob. a mistake for 'Carmel' (No. 1).

RACE.—See Races, p. 282.

RACES.—The following is a list of the races mentioned in the Bible, so far as they are mentioned, classed according to modern ethnological principles.

1. ASIANS (sons of Japheth, Gn 10).—1. Greeks (Ro 1:14, etc.).
3. Phrygians (Ass 2:1).

GEORGE A. BARTON.

RAAHAL (Rahel in Jer 31:16 AV, 'ewe').—The younger daughter of Laban, and favourite wife of Jacob (Gn 29:12-29), who was betrothed to her by her sister Leah.

In the quarrel between Jacob and Laban, she, as well as Leah, took the part of Jacob (31:1-2). When leaving her father, she stole his household divinities, the teraphim (31:21), an incident which suggests the laxity in worship and in ideas of property characteristic of the times. Her sons were Joseph and Benjamin: she died in giving birth to Benjamin.

Rachel's grave.—The location of this is disputed.

It was near Ephraim, Gn 35:19, 20. S 10, Jer 21:17 indicate that it was on the N. border of Benjamin towards Ephraim, about ten miles N. of Jerusalem. In other places, however (Ru 1:2, Mic 5:7), Ephraim is another name for Beth-lehem, as it is also explained in Gn 35:19. 45. In accordance with this latter group of passages, tradition from at least the 4th cent. has fixed the spot 4 miles S. of Jerusalem and 1 mile N. of Beth-lehem. Either the northern location is correct, or there are here two variant accounts. The former view is probably to be preferred, since Rachel has no connexion with Judah. In that case 'that is Beth-lehem' is an incorrect gloss (cf. Jw. 3:9).

RAGES.—The modern Re, 6 miles S.E. of Teheran, one of the seats of the ancient Iranian civilization, but now a mass of fallen walls and stupendous ruins covered with mounds of debris. Its position near the Caspian Gates gave it great strategic importance. It was the capital of Media before Ephesus, and has the distinction of having been the home of the mother of Zoroaster. It is frequently mentioned in the Apancysa. In Tobit (14:4, 15:5; 16:9) it was visited by the angel Raphael, and there he recovered for Tobias the deposit of silver which his father had placed there. In Judith (1:10) it is said that in Ragus (evidently the same place) Nebuchadnezzar slew in battle 'Arphaxad' prince of the Medes. In To 60 read 'Ephesus for Rages.

RAIGEL.—See Refuel, 2. 2. The father of Sarah, the wife of Tobias (To 3:17, 18 14:3).

RAHAB ('wide').—1. The story of this woman, called a harlot, of Jericho is given in Jos 2. The two spies sent out by Joshua to view the Promised Land come first to the house of Rahab, in Jericho. The king bears of it, and bids Rahab bring them forth; but she asserts that they have left her house and that she does not know where they have gone; she had, however, previously bid them among stalks of flax upon the roof. After their pursuers have left, Rahab comes to their assistance by giving her belief in Jahweh, and adjuring them, to spare her and herkinsfolk when the attack on Jericho is made; this they promise shall be done; and after arranging that a scarlet thread is to be hung from her window, in order to denote which house is to be spared, when the sack of the city takes place, the two spies escape from her house by a rope (Jos 2). The promise is duly kept, and Joshua spares her when the city is burned. In Mt 11:1 Rahab is mentioned in the genealogy of our Lord.

2. A name for the 'Dragon,' applied also to Egypt. This name is not the same as that just considered, which is written Rahab in Hebrew. It is the name given to a mythological monster who is frequently referred to in the Bible. In Is 30:7 the old myth that Jahweh in the beginning subdued Rahab—7Tbhm, the 'Great Deep;' the Rab. Tshum)—is employed to show that Jahweh will in like manner subdue Egypt (cf. Ps 87:3), and that it is therefore vain for Judah to trust to it. The words in RV 'the righteous shall tread it,' still imply that Rahab had been subjugated, but not eliminated. i.e. it was believed that Rahab was still living somewhere in the depths of the sea; the final destruction is referred to in Rev 21:1 'And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth are passed away: and the sea is no more.' The next reference to Rahab is in Is 51:14, a very important passage, which shows distinctly that Rahab, the Dragon, the sea, or the 'Great Deep' (7Tbhm), are all names for one and the same being. The belief is also expressly stated that 'in the days of old' there was a conflict between Jahweh and Rahab, and that the latter was overcome. Further references to the Rahab-myth are to be found in Ps 80:9, 10; Job 9:26-28; it is important to note how in all these passages the myth is treated as well known, it is taken for granted that the reference is perfectly understood. RAIN.—The Palestinian year is divided roughly into two parts—the rainy and the dry. The first rains after the summer begin to fall in November, though showers in April and May are not uncommon, and the weather continues intermittently wet until the following March, or sometimes till April. As a rule the first rains, which are accompanied by heavy thunderstorms, are followed by comparatively fine weather, bright sun, and occasional wet days, after which, towards the end of the rainy season, there are again heavy successions of rain-storms. The agricultural value of this division is obvious, and it is recognized by the expressions 'former' and 'latter' rains which we meet with in the Biblical writings. The first rains soften the iron-bound soil, baked hard, so to speak, by the summer heat, and so make it fit for ploughing; the comparatively fine intervals give the husbandman time to sow; and the occasional showers water the seed. The average annual rainfall in Jerusalem is about 28 inches, though this is subject to much variation. In the winter of 1904-1905 nearly 40 inches fell. Such rainfall, however, is not always followed by an epidemic of malaria in the succeeding summer.

RAMAH (RAMOTH) OF THE SOUTH

Near it are some remarkable ancient monuments, known locally as 'The Graves of the Children of Israel,' which possibly are the 'tomb of Rachel' of the ancient tradition. This town was probably the home of Shimeel, the Ramathite, David's vine-dresser (1 Ch 27:24). 4. A place in the district called Ramathaim-zophim (1 S1), a (corrupt) name prob., the two heights of the Zuphites. The latter ethnic can hardly be dissociated from the name of the great high place of Mizpeh (Neh 8:6). Its chief distinction is its connexion with Samuel. It was 'in the hill-country of Ephraim,' but might have been over the S. border of the tribe. Here Ekanah lived, and here was the headquarters of Samuel throughout his life (1 S 19:1; 21:7; 17:8; 19:34; 19:5; 21:29; 20:25; 28:29). This is probably the Ramath fortified by Baasha against the Judahite kingdom (1 K 15:18; 2 Ch 16), rather than the Benjamite Ramath; the latter being actually within Judahite territory would not have been accessible to him. This Ramath appears also in 1 Mac 11:6 as Ramathaim. No satisfactory identification of the Ephraimitic Ramath has yet been proposed. It may be identical with No. 3, Rim-elah, a large village about 12 miles N. of Jerusalem, would fairly well suit the requirements of the history, but there are no definite indications of antiquities there. 5. By the name Ramathaim-zophim is made to Ramoth-gilead (wh. see) in 2 K 10:21 and the parallel passage 2 Ch 22:9. 6. Ramath-lehi, the scene of Samson's victory over the Philistines with the jawbone (Jg 15:13), is unknown. See Lemi. Ramathaim-lehi here is probably a common noun, and we ought to render it 'the height of Leli.' 7. Ramathmizpeh (Jos 13:5). See Mizpah, No. 4. 8. Ram (or Ramoth) of the South (Jos 19:16). A town in the tribe of Judah, given to Simeon; to whom David sent the spoil of Ziklag (1 S 30:37). It is quite unknown.

RAMOTHGILEAD, OR 'RAMOTH IN GILEAD' (cf. Ramah, 5), was one of the cities of the division of Gilead (Dt 4:41, Jos 20:14), assigned to the Meraritic Levites of God (Jos 16:5, 1 Ch 6:7). It was in the administrative district of Solomon's lieutenant Ben-geber (1 K 4:15); the scene of Ahshah's last fight with the Syrians (1 K 22, 2 Ch 18) and of another battle with them fought by Ahshah's son Jehoram, where he was wounded (2 K 8:26, 2 Ch 22:9); the place where Elisha's messenger anointed Jehu (2 K 9:24). That it was a place of some sanctity is probable from its name ('the high places of Gilead'), and arguments, not altogether conclusive, have been offered in favour of its identification with Mizpeh, the place of the reconciliation of Jacob and Laban. The attempt has plausibly been made to identify it with Gerash, the modern Jerash—an extensive town in the ancient territory of Gilead, of unknown origin, whose ruins are still among the most striking east of the Jordan. For this identification several forcible arguments can be brought forward. An identification with another place, Reimun, rests solely on the superficial similarity of the name, which is always an unsafe guide. Es-Salt is another suggestion. On the whole, however, Jerash is perhaps the most probable, though final decision must, as usual, be left to the test of excavation. R.A.S. MACALISTER.

RAFUEL ('God has healed') is the good angel of Tobit. In 31st he is sent to heal Tobit, by restoring his sight; to give Sarah, daughter of his kinsman Raguel, to his son Tobias for wife; and to prevent the demon before God (Rev 5:8). The doctrine of the Divine aloofness made it hard to conceive that man could have had direct access to the ear of God, any more than a subject could enter into the presence of an Oriental monarch, or that He could interfere directly in the petty affairs of men. See Angels. (3) He is also a guardian angel, being present at Tobit's good deeds, and the companion of Tobias. The long-maintained disguise as a unique feature; the `sewed-hand drinking' is explained as an illusion (12a). (4) He is true to his name, 'the healer'; cf. Enoch 107, where he is ordered to bind Azazel (so 54), and heal the earth which the angels have defiled; and 49, where he is said to have names for diseases and wounds of the children of men.' Pr 21:6). Its glossy plumage is referred to in Ca 58; it often dwells in the wilderness (Is 34:5), and yet God cares for and watches over it (Job 38:46, Ps 147:12, Lk 12:6). The name 'ebbeh is doubtless generic, and includes all the eight species of the Corvus known in Palestine.

REBEKAH (in Ro 9* Rebecca).—The daughter of Bethuel, the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, and his wife Milcah (Gen 22*). She was also the sister of Laban and became the wife of Isaac. The well-known story of the facts leading up to the marriage of Isaac and Rebekah is told in Gen 24, and gives valuable information as to early marriage customs. Isaac is not consulted. Abraham's servant Eliezer (Gen 15*) is sent to seek for a wife among his master's kinsfolk. The servant proceeds to the city of Nahor (Haran), and, arriving at the gate of the city, waits by the well till the women come out to draw water (v. 11). He prays that God may prosper him and give him a sign by which he may recognize the woman Providence has set apart for Isaac. Rebekah comes out and offers to draw water for the servant and his camels. The servant loads her with gifts, and her family, led by her brother Laban, being convinced of Abraham's wealth, and recognizing the will of Heaven in the match, agree to the marriage. Rebekah returns with the servant and becomes Isaac's wife (v. 67).

In Gen 25* we are told that Rebekah, like many other favorite wives of the O.T. (e.g. Sarah, Rachel, Hannah), was at first barren, but in answer to her prayer Jacob and Esau were born (Gen 25*—8). Before their birth Rebekah received the oracle from Jehovah, that two nations were in her womb and that the elder should serve the younger. No doubt this story is a part of the legend, arising from the desire to find the history of the two peoples Israel and Edom foreshadowed in the lives of their progenitors. Rebekah again comes before us during Isaac's sojourn in Gerar (Gen 26*—11). Fearing lest the beauty of her husband might excite the desire of the king of Gerar and so lead to his own death, Isaac passed her off as his sister—a course of action which led him into difficulties with Abimelech (Gen 26*).

The destiny of Jacob, her favourite son, was strongly influenced by his strong-minded mother. She was the author of the treacherous plan by which Jacob deprived Esau of his birthright (Gen 25*). She advised him to flee from his home to his brother Laban (Gen 27*—45). In Gen 28*, however, the motive of the journey is that he might take a wife from the family of his mother, in contravention of Esau, who had governed his parents by taking a wife from among the Canaanites (Gen 28*—5). Rebekah died before Jacob's return from Haran, and her burial at Machpelah is mentioned in Gen 49*. The death and burial of Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, who had followed her from Haran (24*), are reported to have taken place after Jacob had returned to Canaan (Gen 35*).

The character of Rebekah has a peculiar charm and fascination. Appearing first as a pure, unsullied, loving girl, she becomes a woman of great strength of mind and depth of character. She is clever, active, energetic. She can make plans and carry them out, give orders and expect them to be obeyed, but her masterful spirit cannot brook opposition or contradiction. Esau's wives vex her beyond measure. When she loves, she loves with all her soul, and will spare no pains, consider no consequences, or grudge any sacrifice for those she loves. 'Upon me be thy curse, my son' (Gen 27*), is her answer to Jacob when he fears that a curse will fall on his deception. Although that curse fell and her beloved son had to flee and she saw his face no more, yet we forget the scheming, ploting woman in the loving wife and self-sacrificing mother. W. F. Boyd.

RECEAH.—A place name (1 Ch 4*) quite unknown.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM.—See CUSTOM(S), TRIBUTE.

RECHAB, RECHABITES.—1. Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, appears in 2 K 10*—24 as a fervent supporter of Jehu's attack on the house of Ahab and his endeavours to root out the idolatrous worship which that dynasty had allowed. That his influence was a matter of importance is clear from the prominent place which the new ruler gave him (2 K 10*—23). The principles which actuated him are to be gathered from Jer 35, where we find that he had hidden them abainst from it, build no houses, sow no seed, plant no vineyard, but dwell in tents all their days. He evidently held that civilization and settled life were contrary to Jehovah's plan, and he was driven (in his ancestral Deity of his tribe. And the peril was a very real one, because of the invertebrate popular belief that the local Baals were the dispensers of all blessings pertaining to field and vineyard (Hos 2*—1). Of the House it seemed to be more by popular tradition than by one of the prophets that the early, simple period of the nation's life, ere it became immersed in the Canaanite civilization, was preferable to all later developments (Zg 2*, Hose 10*). Again, the self-restraint of the Rechabites reveals the influence of the Nazirite (see NADIRITE). But the latter did not include so many taboos. It permitted the cultivation of land and the building of houses. It was not binding on an entire nation. The custom is probably a repetition of the Chronicler's statement (1 Ch 24*), that the clan of the Rechabites was connected with the Kenites, and this would square admirably with the view that the Jahweh-religion was communicated to Israel by Kenite influence. Subsequently to Jeremiah we do not find more than two Biblical allusions to the clan in question, and one of these is doubtful. Neh 3* reports that Malchith, the son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-haccerem, assisted in re-fortifying Jerusalem. But if he was a Rechabite by descent, he must have abandoned their principles. The men whom Jeremiah approached were nothing but temporary sojourners, living in a country town, and interested in the metropolis. The title of Ps 71 in the LXX is: 'Belonging to Jehonadab the son of Rechabites and of the earliest captives,' as though the exiles and the Rechabites agreed in appropriating this poem of sorrow and hope. Finally, it may be noted that later Rabbis found the fulfillment of Jer 35* in those marriages of the priestly families of Zadok and of the later priests sprang. Hengstenberg relates that one of the Rechabite priests interceded in vain for the life of James the Just (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. 2*).

2. Rechab and his brother Baana, two guerilla captains, treacherously murdered Ishboseth, his king, and met with the due reward of their deed at David's hands (2 S 4).

RECONCILIATION.—The word 'reconciliation,' with its cognates, is a Pauline one, and is not found in the Gospels, or other NT writings. The chief passages in which it and related terms are employed are Ro 5*—11 (RV), 2 Co 5*—20, Eph 2*—4, Col 1*—2. In Re 2*—3, where the AV has 'to make reconciliation for the sins of the people,' the RV reads, more correctly, 'to make propitiation,' OT usage, where the word occasionally tr. 'reconcile' (Lv 6* etc.) is again more correctly rendered in RV 'make atonement,' throws little light on the NT term. The effect of propitiation is to remove the variance between God and man, and so bring about 'reconciliation.' The means by which this result is accomplished in the NT is the reconciling death of Christ (Col 1*—2). On the special questions involved, see artt. Atonement and Redemption.

Perhaps better than any other, this term brings out in vivid form St. Paul's conception of the gospel. As the sinner is reconciled to men, the gospel is a message of 'reconciliation' (2 Co 5*—20). It is a misunderstanding of the Apostle's meaning in such passages to suppose that the need of reconciliation is on man's side only, and not also on God's. Man, indeed, does need to be reconciled to God, from whom he is naturally alienated in his present state (Col 2). 'The mind of the flesh is enmity against God' (Ro 8), and this enmity of the carnal heart needs to be overcome. On this side, the 'ministry of reconciliation' is a beseeching of man to be reconciled to God (2 Co 5). But it is the ground on which this appeal is based is that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses' (v.19). It is an essential part of the Apostle's teaching that sinners are the objects of a Divine kindness of heart (Rom 5). They lie under a condemnation that needs to be removed (3:21). They are described as 'enemies' in two passages (Rom 5:10, where the word is plainly to be taken in the passive sense of objects of wrath (cf. In 1:9, the contrast with 'beloved'). It is this barrier to God's reconciliation with men that, in the Apostle's doctrine, Christ removes by His propitiatory death (Rom 5:19). The ground on which men are called to be reconciled to God is: 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5:21). Believers receive 'a reconciliation already made' (Rom 5:1). The gospel, in other words, has a twofold aspect—a Godward and a manward; and peace is made by the removal of the variance on both sides. See art. above referred to. JAMES OER.
RECORER

RED.—See COLOURS, 3.

RED HEIFER.—The ashes of a 'red heifer'—more correctly a red cow—added to 'running water,' and the most powerful means known to the Hebrews of removing the defilement produced by contact with a dead body. The method of preparing the ashes and the rite for the application of the 'water of impurity' (see below) are a subject of a special section of the Priests' Code (Nu 19). It will be advisable to summarize the contents of the chapter, in the first place, and thereafter to inquire into the significance of the rite in the light of recent anthropological research. The chapter above cited consists of two parts; the first part, vv.1-10, gives instructions for the preparation of the ashes, and (vv.11-19) for the removal by their means of the defilement contracted by actual contact with the dead body. The second part, vv.14-25, is an expansion of vv.11-12, extending the application of the 'water of impurity' to uncleannesses arising from a variety of sources connected with death.

The animal whose ashes acquired this special virtue had to be of the female sex, of a red, or rather reddish-brown, colour, physically without blemish, and one that had never borne the yoke. The duty of superintending the burning, which took place 'without the camp,' was entrusted to a deputy of the high priest. The actual burning, however, was carried through by a lay assistant, which fact, taken along with the detail (v.7) that every particle of the animal, including the blood, was burned, shows that we have not do here with a ritual sacrifice, as might be inferred from the EV of v.9. The word there rendered 'sin-offering' properly denotes in its 'sacrificial' sense (cf. 8) a 'purification for sin' (Orff. Heb. Lex. 310; cf. SACRIFICE, § 14). The priest's share in the ceremony was confined to the sprinkling of some of the blood 'toward the front of the tent of meeting' (v.9), the token of the dedication of the animal to J, and to the casting into the burning mass of a piece of cedar wood and a bunch of hyssop bound with a piece of scarlet cloth (such, at least, is the regulation of the Mishnah treating dealing with this subject).

A third person—the priest and his assistant having themselves become 'unclean' through contact with these sacred things (see below)—now gathered the ashes and laid them up 'without the camp in a clean place,' to be used as occasion required. The special name given to the mixture of 'running water' (v.18), lit. 'living water,' i.e. water from a spring, not a cistern) and the ashes is properly 'water of separation,' i.e. water for the removal of impurity or uncleanness. This powerful cathartic was applied to the person or thing to be cleansed, either by being thrown over it (see Gray, Com. on v.18) or by being sprinkled with a sprinkler of hyssop (v.18). This was done on the third and seventh days, after which the defiled person washed himself and his garments, and was then restored to the privileges of the cult and the community. The only other reference to the 'water of impurity' is in the late passage, Nu 31:2, which central significance of the rite above described is found in the primitive conception of uncleanness, as this has been disclosed by modern anthropological research (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). In all primitive societies a dead body in particular is regarded as not only unclean in itself, but as capable of infecting with uncleanness all who come in contact with it or are even in proximity to it. The Semites shared these ideas with primitive communities in every part of the world. Hence, although the literary formulation of the rite of Red Heifer in Nu 19 may be late, the ideas and practices thereof are certainly older than the Hebrews themselves.

While the central idea of the rite—the efficacy of ashes as a cathartic, due probably to their connexion with ash (cf. Nu 31:2) and Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, 101 n.—has its parallels elsewhere, the original significance of several of the details is still very obscure. This applies, for example, to the red colour of the ashes and to the addition to her ashes of the 'cedar wood and hyssop and scarlet' (for various suggestions see, in addition to Gray, op. cit., Hastings' DB iv. 208 ff.; Bever in JBL xxiv. (1905) 43 ff., who suggests that the cow may have been originally a sacrifice to the dead). The value of the chapter for the student of Hebrew ritual lies in the illustration it affords of the primitive conceptions of uncleanness, especially of the uncleanliness of the dead, and of the 'contagiousness of holiness,' the nature of which has been so clearly expounded by Robertson Smith (see EES 446 t. 'Holiness, Uncleanness, and Taboo'). The ashes of the red heifer and the water of impurity here appear, in virtue of their intense 'holiness,' as 'a conducting vehicle of a dangerous spiritual electricity' (Farnell, op. cit. 95), and have the same power as the dead body of rendering unclean all who come in contact with them (see vv.20, 21 and art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN).

There are no inventions in ritual, it has been said, only survivals, and in the rite under review we have one of the most interesting of these survivals. The remarks made in a previous article (Arrowement [Day of]) are equally applicable to the present case. As re-interpreted by the compilers of the Priests' Code, the rite conveys, in striking symbolism, the eternal truth that purity and holiness are the essential characteristics of the people of God. A. R. S. KENNEVED.

RED SEA.—The body of water, over 1000 miles in length, which divides Africa from Arabia. The Biblical interest of the name centres at its northern end in its two projections, the Gulf of Suez, running north-west, and the Bay of Akabah almost due north. The former is an extension much water to the north, along the route of the present Suez Canal. Anciently it was known as the Gulf of Herosopolis, running as far north as the Bitter Lakes. In this region it is probable that the passage of the sea described in Ex 14 took place, though it has been located above the present Suez, and by others still farther south.

This primitive extension of the gulf to the north,

the region of reeds, probably accounts for its name, Yem Suph, 'sea of reeds' (Ex 20:15 215), which was later applied also to the eastern extension, the Bay of Akabah (Nu 21:1), to the entire body of water now known as the Red Sea, stretching from the Ras Ma'dan (Arabah) to the smashward to the strait that leads from the Persian Gulf (Ex 23:38). No satisfactory explanation of the term 'red' (Gr. Ergane, Lat. Rubrum) has been found.

This history is concerned with the western gulf (Suez, 130 m. long) only in connection with the Exodus. Those who locate Mt. Sinai in the peninsula between the two gulfs, either at Mt. Serbal or at Jebel Musa, trace the route of the wanderings down the eastern shore of this water as far as Ras Abu Zenimleh, or (with Shaw, Pococke, etc.) as far as Taw, and then through the mountain wadys to Sinai. Those who locate the mountain of the Law farther north in the region north of Akabah, trace the wanderings directly eastward from the sea (Jg 11:18).

The Bay of Akabah, 90 m. long, lies in the southern end of the long trench which extends from the Red Sea proper northward to the Lebanon, the upper portion of which is occupied by the Jordan and the Dead Sea. Between the latter and the Bay of Akabah lies the Arabah. At the northern end was an important maritime way in the reign of Solomon (Arabah). The entrance to the harbour of Ezion-geber (near to, or perhaps the same as, Elath), at its northern end, Solomon built his navy, with the help of Phoenician seamen (1 K 9:26), and sent out expeditions to India. Jehoshaphat was less successful (1 K 22:4).

REDEEMER, REDEMPTION.—Redemption means in strictest delivery by payment of a price or ransom, hence, metaphorically, at any great cost or sacrifice; but in the OT, outside the Law (especially in Deut., Psalms, Isaiah), is often used also of deliverance simply, as from oppression, violence, sickness, captivity, death—redemption by power. The typical redemption in the OT was the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (cf. Is 51:1-4).

Two words, with their derivatives, are used in the OT to express the idea. The one, qâneh (from which qâneh, 'reeds'), is used technically of redemption of an inheritance, of titles, and the like; in a wider sense it is a favourite term in the later Psalms and Deuter.-Isaiah. The other, 'pôdâh, is frequent in Deut, and in the earlier Psalms. The qâneh is the kinman who has the right to redeem; the term is used also of the 'avenger of blood' (Nu 19:6). Elsewhere, as in Jgs, and especially in Deuter-Isaiah, it denotes Jehovah as the vindicator, deliverer, and avenger of His people (cf. Is 40:5-6). The second word, pôdôth, is used two or more words—qâneh, 'to buy or purchase' (1 Co 30:7, 27; 2 Pe 21:8; Rev 4:13); pôdâh, 'to redeem' (Is 50:9-10, 1 Co 119, Eph 1:7 etc.). In 11:2-13 'Deliverer' is used for the OT 'Redeemer' (Is 52:10).

Pious circles in Israel the coming Messianic salvation was viewed as a 'redemption' (Lk 2:25), in which, possibly, political deliverance was included, but in which the main blessings were spiritual—knowledge of salvation, remission of sins, holiness, guidance, peace (Lk 1:78-79). In Christ's own teaching the political aspect altogether disappears, and the salvation in his teachings is in some ways complete. He connects it with His Person, and in certain well-known passages with His death (Jn 3:16-18, Mt 20:28; Lk 23:39 etc.). In the Apocataitic teaching (Acts, Paul, Peter, Heb, Rev.) Christ's work is littled to a 'redemption' by cedipulation, moreover, is not used here simply in the general sense of deliverance, but with definite emphasis on the idea of personal deliverance (Ac 20:26, 1 Co 6:8, Eph 1:7, 1 T 2:5, 1 P 5:4, Rev 5:5 etc.). This glance back to Christ's own saying that He came 'to give his life a ransom (lutron; cf. antilutron in 1 T 2:5) for many' (Mt 20:28). Further, 'ransom,' 'price,' 'purchase,' 'redeem,' are not to be taken simply figuratively, in the sense that Christ has procured salvation for us at the cost of great suffering, even of death, to Himself. This is true; but the consensus of Apostolic teaching gives a much more definite interpretation to the language: in accordance with Christ's own meditations. His death was an expiatory sacrifice by which those who avail themselves of it are literally redeemed from the wrath of God that rested on them, and from all other effects of sin. The apostle St. Paul who worked out this idea most systematically (cf. Ro 25:8-15, 2 Co 5:18-21, Gal 3:13-14, 5-6, Tit 3:4 etc.), though all the NT writers share it. The immediate effect of Christ's redeeming death is to free from guilt and annul condemnation (Ro 5:9-11), but it carries in its train deliverance from sin in every form (from sin's dominion, from the tyranny of Satan, from an evil world, from 'all iniquity,' Ro 6, Gal 1, Tit 2, He 2 etc.); ultimately from death itself (Ro 8). It not merely redeems from evil, but puts in possession of the highest possible good—'eternal life' (Ro 6:23, Eph 1:3 etc.). It is a redemption in every way complete. See, further, ati. Atonement, Propitiation, Reconciliation, Salvation, James Orr.

REED.—1. qâneh, tr. 'reed,' 1 K 14:13, 2 K 15:16, Is 36:22-23, 'stalk,' Gn 41:25, 'sweet cane' (RVm 'calamus'), Is 43:5, 6:6, 'calamus,' Ca 4:4; Ezek 27:19-20, 'papyrus,' etc. (cf. Ex 25:27). The qâneh is metaphorically used for a 'bone,' Job 31:12; the arm of a balance, Is 46:14, and branches of a candlestick, Ex 25:28-29. The qâneh is probably the familiar gândh (Arundo donata), which flourishes on the banks of all the streams and lakes of the Jordan Valley. Miles of it are to be seen at the 'Ain Feshkhab oasis on the Dead Sea shore, and at the Huleh marshes. It is a lofty reed, often 20 feet high, brilliantly green in the late summer, when all around is dry and bare; but dead-looking, from a distance, in the spring, when it stands in full flower and the lofty stems are crowned by beautiful silken pannicles. In the district mentioned the reeds are cleared from time to time by fire, that the young and tender shoots may grow up to afford fodder for cattle. The covert of the reeds is often the only possible shade (Job 40:5). The bruised reed, which, though standing, a touch will cause to fall and lie broken on the ground, is a familiar sight (2 K 15:16, Is 36:19, Ezek 29:7). A reed forms a most convenient measuring-rod, being straight and light (Exk 408, 17). In certain passages where qâneh is tr. 'calamus,' or 'sweet cane,' yârû, 'cane,' 'reeds' is meant. For the use of reeds as pens, see Writing, 6.

2. 'Calamus,' is 19° (AV 'paper reeds,' RV 'meadows'). See Mead.ow.

3. 'Spannmin, lit. 'pools' (see Pool), is in Jer 51:14 tr. 'reeds.' See Fuirbrushes see Reeds.

4. 'Châkî, Job 218 EV 'flag,' RVm 'reed-grass.' See Mead.ow.

5. 'Châkî, Job 98 (RVm 'reed'). The reference is to light skiffs of papyrus. E. W. G. Masterman.

REELAIAH.—See Raamiiah.

REELIAS, 1 Es 5:4, corresponds in position to Bigvai in Ezr 2, Neh 7: the form of the name may be due to a duplication of Reelaiah in the same verse of Ezra.

REFINER, REFINING.—The ancient Egyptians purified gold by putting it into earthen crucibles with lead, salt, a little tin, and barley bran, scaling the crucibles with clay, and then exposing them to the heat of a furnace for five days and nights. Refining silver by cupellation, moreover, is not used here simply in the general sense of deliverance, but with definite emphasis on the idea of personal deliverance (Ac 20:26, 1 Co 6:8, Eph 1:7, 1 T 2:5, 1 P 5:4, Rev 5:5 etc.). This glance back to Christ's own saying that He came 'to give his life a ransom (lutron; cf. antilutron in 1 T 2:5) for many' (Mt 20:28). Further, 'ransom,' 'price,' 'purchase,' 'redeem,' are not to be reference in Mal 3:1 is to the purifying influence of affliction on the people of God; their sinful impurities gradually disappear, and at last the Divine image is reflected from the soul, as the face of the refiner from the surface of the purified silver.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. —1. Origin of the right of asylum. —The city of refuge was the product of two primitive religious ideas that were employed to neutralize or control the sacredness of blood or life and to sanctify the sacredness of locality; both were based on the presence of the Divine in the blood and the locality. There was a community of blood or life between the god and his people; and to the averager of blood or life and the community of blood or life. A murderer, if he escaped to a city of refuge, he was safe from those to whom he had forfeited his life, so long as he remained within the sacred limits (cb. Ex 21:13). The blood of the murderer that he had shed disproved the purity of his blood, but he remained an inoffensive unit for his tribe; immediately he left the asylum of the god he was at the mercy of the avenger of blood, and so both the individual and the community of blood were preserved. This primitive usage still prevails in savage communities, and has been widened by extending the privilege of asylum to places occupied by former kings and to the graves of former rulers (Frazier, Fort. R все., 1899, pp. 650-654).

2. Development of asylum in OT. —In this absolute form the right of asylum is not recognized anywhere in the Bible until three (Ex 21:13) who has wrongfully intended to commit homicide (Ex 21:13). One who has treacherously slain his fellow with blood can find no asylum at the altar of God; he may be taken from it to death (Ex 21:19), or he may be thrown down at the altar, as was the fate of Josiah (1 K 21:25-28). The community came between the avenger and the avenger of blood, and determined whether he should be handed over to death. This was the result of the fusion of different tribes and the necessary recognition of one common authority. We can trace three stages of development of asylum in the OT.

(1) Every altar or sanctuary in the land could extend its protection to one who had without intention taken the life of another. He had to justify his claim to protection by showing to the authorities of the sanctuary that his deed was unpremeditated. But after the fugitive had submitted satisfactory evidence, he was allowed to remain within the sacred precincts. He could not, however, return home, and had evidently to pass the remainder of his life in the refuge to which he had fled. He could not appease the avenger by money. His want of prudence must entail some punishment, and so he could not pass beyond the city boundaries without risk of death at the hands of the avenger of blood if provision was made for his maintenance. This is not revealed, but very likely he had to win his subsistence by his work. Whether his family could join him in his asylum is a question that is also unanswered. This is the stage of development in Ex 21:13 (cf. 1 K 21:25-28). It is not at all likely that Josiah's death was brought about at the altar in Jerusalem because of some exceptional authority exercised over it by the king. Josiah evidently knew he could be put to death there (1 K 23).

(2) When the provincial high places and altars were suppressed by Josiah in 221 to 621, the right of asylum there fell with them, and provision had to be made for the continuance of ancient usage on a modified basis. Very likely there was less need for it, as the power of the Crown had been growing. Cities of refuge, situated at convenient distances, were set apart for the manslaughterer (Dt 19:13), and it may even be that they were specially kept and marked to make escape easy (Dt 19:20; cf. Steenmager, Deut. p. 71 f.). The fugitive had to justify his claim to protection by showing that he had it in his conscience of murderous motives. Any one who failed to convince them of the validity of his defense was handed over to the elders of his own city, and they in turn surrendered him to the avenger of blood. The community administered justice, but when the death penalty was to be exacted, it was exacted not by the community, but by the avenger of blood in accordance with primitive usage (Dt 19:11).

(3) In post-exilic times the cities of refuge established under the Deuteronomic Code remained, and the judicial procedure followed was very much the same, only the community—presumably at Jerusalem—and not the elders of the city of refuge (Nu 35:14, 16, 24) was to determine the guilt or the innocence of the fugitive. Jos 20, however, contemplates a provisional inquiry by the elders of the city before protection is granted. The object of the law that the unconverted was no longer doomed to spend all his days there but was free to return to his home on the death of the high priest of the time (Nu 35:21; Jos 20:7). This point shows that in the post-exilic modification of this primary law of this high priest was then the only constituted authority that Jewish law could recognize.

3. Number of cities of refuge. —The statements bearing on the number of the cities of refuge are conflicting (Nu 35:12-15, 21). It has been suggested that there were six, but at first there appear to have been only three (1 K 19:4). Three were established then, the time of Josiah when the boundaries and the population of the Jewish State would be comparatively small, and Jewish authority did not likely cross the Jordan to the east. In such conditions three cities would be ample. But when in post-exilic times the Jews covered a wider area, there would naturally be need for more cities; and so we find the number in Numbers and Joshua stated at six, and additions made to the text in Dts 4:41 and 19:14 to suggest two. The roads were established in the beginning. These six cities were Kedesh, Shechem, and Hebron on the west,—all well-known sanctuaries from early times,—and Golan, Ramoth, and Bezer on the east. Of the situation of these last we know nothing definitely; even the site of Ramoth, to which reference is made elsewhere in the OT (1 K 4:17; 22:28), is a subject of doubt (see G. A. Smith, HGL p. 837; Driver, Deut. xviii, xix), but they probably shared the sacred character of the cities on the west.

REFUSE. —The vb. 'to refuse' has lost much of its vigour. In AV it often means 'to reject.' Thus Ps 119:22 'The stone which the builders refused,' cf. Tindale's trans. of Mt 21:42 'Then two shall in the feldes, the one shall receve, and the other shall refuse.'

REGEM. —The eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 24:).

REGEM-MELECH. —One of the deputation sent to the prophet Zechariah (Zech 7:).

REGENERATION. —In the language of theology, 'regeneration' denotes that decisive spiritual change, effected by God's Holy Spirit, in which a soul, naturally estranged from God, and ruled by sinful principles, is renewed in disposition, and becomes the subject of holy affections and desires, and enters on a life of progressive sanctification, the issue of which is complete likeness to Christ. The term, however, to which this word corresponds (Gr.

what to new, is.

12-'.

He

would so distinctly a supernatural work, it is made clearly that it is not a magical work; not a work bound up with rites and words, so that, when these rites and ceremonies are performed, regeneration is based on the error of superstitiousness which binds up this spiritual change with the rite of baptism. It would be wrong to say that baptism has no connexion with the change, for it is often brought into most intimate connexion with it (Ro 6^, 2. 3). But in Christ's words, Is 35; with the historical examples of the connexion of the receiving of the Spirit with baptism, Ac 2^, 19 etc.). Baptism is connected with regeneration as our reality with sentencing it, and being a symbol of it; as connected with profession (1 P 3^, 3), and pledging the spiritual blessing to faith;
but it neither operates the blessing, nor is indispensable to it, nor has any virtue at all apart from the inward susceptibility in the subjects of it. In some cases we read of those on whom the Spirit of God fell, that they were baptized afterwards (Ac 10^, 44), and in all cases faith is presumed to be already present before regeneration is administered; that is, the inward decisive step has already been taken.

On the other hand, when we look to the meanings
the instrumentality—by which the Holy Spirit effects our change, we find in the OT: the Spirit and the word, to be one thing, namely, the word. This is what is meant by saying that regeneration is effected, not magically, but by the use of rational means. It is such a connection with the outward call of the gospel, that the older divines were wont to treat of this subject under the head of 'vocation,' or 'effectual calling'.

We speak, of course, only of adults, of those who are capable of hearing and understanding the word, and are far from limiting the grace of God in infants, or others whom this call does not or cannot reach.

What is affirmed is, as regards those who have come to years of intelligence, that they are capable of understanding the word, and this is the constant representation.
The OT equally with the NT asserts the saving, converting, quickening, cleansing, sanctifying power of the word of God (e.g. Ps 118, 19). Jesus declares the word to be the seed of the Kingdom (Lk 8^). He says:
'Sanctify them in the truth; thy word is truth' (Jn 17^).
Conversion, regeneration, sanctification, are connected with the word (Ac 11^, 15, Eph 1^, Col 1, 1 Th 2^, 2 Th 2^, 1 Th 2^, 1 P 1^, 21, 2 Cor 6^, 23) and can be effected, derived from the corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God,' etc.

If this is the nature, generally, of regeneration, then it has what may be termed a psychology; that is, there is a process which the mind goes through in the experience of this spiritual change. The Spirit of God, doubtless, has innumerable ways of dealing with human souls;
still, if we look closely, it will be found that there are certain elements which do in some degree enter into all experience in regeneration, and furnish, so far, test of the reality of the change. There is first, of necessity, the awakening of the soul out of its customary spiritual dormancy—out of that deep insensibility to spiritual things in which ordinarily the natural mind is held (Eph 1^, cf. Ro 16^, 11). Especially there comes into view here the peculiarity of the awakening of the soul through the conscience, which is not a form of what we call conviction of sin towards God (cf.
Ac 16^, 30). Probably no one can undergo this spiritual change without in some degree being brought inwardly to the realization of his sinful condition before God, and to the sincere confession of it (Ps 51^). The law of God has its place in producing this conviction of sin; but law alone will not produce spiritual conversion. See Regeneration. For this there is needed the exhibition of mercy. Hence the next stage in this spiritual process is that described as enlightenment—growing enlightenment in the knowledge of Christ,

REHOBOTH.—1. A well dug by the servants of Issac and finally conceded to him, after two others, dug also by them; had been the objects of quarrel with Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gn 26:21). Several identifications have been proposed, of which the most probable is that made by Parker with or-Ruhabaib, about 20 miles S. of Beersheba. 2. The name of a king of Edom in Gn 36:34, where it is called 'Rehoboth of the River,' 'The River' here may not be, as usually, the Euphrates, but the 'River of Egypt' (see Egypt [River or]).

REHOBOTH-IR (lit. 'broad places of the city').—One of the four cities in Assyria built by Nimrod (Gn 10:10). It immediately follows Nineveh, and might mean a suburb of that city, originally separate from it, but later joined and containing some of its most spacious streets or market-places. A suitable identification has been found in the Assyr. ębbl Nînâ ('broad places of Nineveh'), mentioned by king Esarhaddon (a.c. 681-686). This is the exact equivalent of the Biblical name. In taking it over, 'the city' was substituted for 'Nineveh.'

REHOBOTH-IR.

REI ('J.' is a friend').—The name is given to one of the supporters of Solomon at the time of Adonijah's attempt to secure the throne (1 K 1). He is mentioned along with Shimei, and was an officer in the royal guard. These troops seem to have had an enormous influence in determining the succession to the throne.

The reading, however, is not above suspicion, and Jos. (Ant. vi. 4) reads Shime, the friend of David, and thus gets rid of Rei as a personal name (so Lucian). Several attempts have been made to identify him with other figures, as Ira or Jair (Winckler, Gesch. ii. 247) or Haddai (Ewald, Gesch. iii. p. 266 note).

REINS.—See Kidneys.

RELIGION.—The word 'religion,' wherever it occurs in AV, signifies not the inner spirit of the religious life, but its outward expression. It is thus used of one form of religion as distinguished from another; as in 2 Mac 14:5, where the same word is translated in the middle of the verse 'Judasism,' and in the end of it 'the religion of the Jews.' It is also used by St. James (1:27) to contrast moral acts with ritual forms.

REMNANT.—See ISRAEL, p. 387.

REPHAN.—See REPHAN.

REPENANCE.—Repentance, in the sense of turning from a purpose, is frequently predicated of God in the OT (Gn 9:5, Ex 34:10 etc.), or, in conjunction with faith (Mt 15:6, Ac 20:9 etc.), as an indispensable condition of salvation. The word ordinarily used (metanoia) means literally 'change of mind.' The change, however, is one in which not the intellect only, but the whole nature (understanding, affections, will), is involved. It is such an altered view of God and sin as carries with it heartfelt sorrow for sin, confession of it, and decisive turning from it to God (2 Co 7 9, I Cor 6 10 etc.). Its reality is tested by its fruits (Mt 7 15, Lk 6 45). From this 'godly sorrow,' which works 'repentance unto salvation' (2 Co 7 9, 10), is distinguished a 'sorrow of the world' which 'worketh death' (v.10), i.e. a sorrow which has no relation to God, or to the intrinsic evil of sin, but only to sin's harmful consequences. There may be keen remorse, and blaming of one's self for one's folly, yet no real repentance.

Disputes have arisen in theology as to the priority of faith or repentance, but unnecessarily, for the two, rightly viewed, are but the positive and negative poles of the same state of soul. There can be no evangelical faith which does not spring from a heart broken and contrite on account of sin; on the other hand, there can be no true repentance which has not the germ of faith in God, and of hope in His mercy, in it. The Law alone would break the heart; the Gospel melts it. Repentance is the turning from sin; Gospel faith is the turning to Christ for salvation. The acts are inseparable.

REPHAEI.— A family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 25).

REPHAH.—An Ephraimitic family (1 Ch 74).

REPHAI.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 3).

2. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4).

3. A descendant of Issachar (1 Ch 7).

4. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 9); called in 1 Ch 12, Raphah. B. One of those who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3).

REPHAM.—A name given in several Biblical passages to some pre-Israelite children of people. In Gn 14 they are said to have dwelt in Ashteroth-karnaim. In Gn 15 they are classed with Hittites and Perizzites (similarly Jos 17), Dt 20 calls certain peoples 'Rephaim' whom the Moabites and Ammonites called respectively 'Emim' and 'Zammuzmim.' Dt 31 says that Og, king of Bashan, alone remained of the Rephaim (so also Jos 12 13), while Dt 32 says that Argo was a land of Rephaim. A valley near Jerusalem was also called the 'Vale of Rephaim' (see 2 S 5 7). In 2 Ch 8 14, 1 Ch 11 14, Is 17, Rephaim is called together with the Anakim, who were giants, and 2 S 21 19 says that the sons of a certain Rapha (see Rym) were giants, it has been supposed by some that Rephaim means 'giants,' and was given to a race as their name by their neighbours because of their stature. Cf. art. Giant.

The word רַפַךְ ('reb'), in Hebrew means also 'shades' or disembodied spirits. At least it is used to describe the dead, as in Ps 88.2. Schickly is probably right, therefore (Leben nach dem Tode, 64 ff. and ZATW, xvii, 127 ff.), in holding that the word means 'shades,' and that it was applied by the Israelites to people who were dead and gone, and of whom they know little.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

REPHAN (AV Remphan).—A word which replaces Chinn of the Hebrew text of Am 5th, both in the LXX and in the quotation in Ac 7th. The generally accepted explanation of this word is that Remphan (the preferable form) is a corruption and transliteration of Kesenon (Kaiwan, Kaawan—see Chinn)—it having somehow mistakenly replaced כ and ו (the Hebrew ווע or ווע) having been transliterated φ (the Gr. φψ).

V. M. NEBETH.

REPHIDIM.—A stage in the Wanderings, between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 17; Jos 5:19; cf. Nu 33:14). Here water was miraculously supplied, and Israel fought with Amalek. Those who accept the traditional Sinai generally place Elin in Wady Gharandel, and Rephidim in Wady Feiran, about four miles N. of Mt. Sebail (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, Index). The tribesmen of Aharon naturally wish to claim name Késenon, and the valley against such a host as Israel. Moses might have surveyed the conflict from the height of Jebel Tahineh, on the N. of the valley. Only we should hardly expect the right to the south. It is true that those who place Sinai east of the Gulf of 'Akhabah, identifying Elath and Elim, are right, then Rephidim must be sought somewhere in that district. (Sayce, HCM, p. 289.)

REPROBATE.—The Heb. word so rendered in Jer 6(60) (AV; RV 'refuse') has its meaning explained by the context. 'Refuse silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them.' Like metal proved to be worthless by the smith's fire (v.29), they are thrown away (cf. Is 12). In the NT, in accordance with the meaning of the Gr. word (adokimos), 'reprobate' is used of that which cannot abide the proof, which, on being tested, is found to be worthless, bad, counterfeit, and is therefore rejected. *A reprobate mind *in Ro 1:28 (with tacit reference to the previous clause, 'they did not approve to have God in their knowledge') is, as the context shows, a mind depraved and perverted by the evil desires of which the mind of God abandoned those who willfully exchanged His truth for a lie (v.25). In 1 Co 9:7, St. Paul declares that he 'buffets' his body 'and brings it into bondage,' 'him having preached to others, he himself should be rejected (reprobate). The figure is that of an athlete who, through remissness in training, fails in the race or fight (for the opposite figure, cf. 2 Ti 2). In Ro 1:26-27, the word ('reprobates') occurs three times, in each case as opposed to genuine, true. Christ is in them, except they be reprobates, i.e. false to their profession, hence rejected by God. Let them 'prove themselves by this test (v.5). St. Paul trusts that the will know that he abides this test (v.5); but let them think of him what they will, if only they themselves do what is honourable (v.7). 'Reprobate' here is contrasted with what is 'approved,' 'honourable'; it is identified with 'doing evil.' In 2 Ti 2:19, certain are described as 'corrupted in mind, reproving concerning the faith,' where both moral corruption and false speculation as the result of this corruption seem intended. They fail, brought to the test of 'sound' or 'healthy' doctrine (1 Ti 4). Similarly Tit 1:16 speaks of those who, denying God by their works, are 'unto every good work reprobate.' Their hypocrisy is brought to the notice of them by their wicked lives. If such a mind 'know God,' they are proved by their works to be counterfeit, imposters. The word occurs, finally, in He 6, where those whom it is impossible 'to renew again to repentance' are compared to ground which, receiving the rain off upon it, and being tilled, brings forth only thorns and thistles, and is 'rejected.' From all this we may conclude that 'reprobate,' generally, denotes a moral state so bad that recovery from it is no longer possible; there remains only judgment (cf. He 6). It is only to be added that the term has no relation in Scripture to an eternal decree of reprobation; at least, to none which has not respect to a thoroughly bad and irreparable condition of his objects. Cf. Predestination.

RESAIAS.—See RAMAH.

RESEN.—The last of the four cities built by Asshur, or, according to the RV, by Ninrood, and described as lying between Nineveh and Calah (i.e. Koyunjik and Nimroud), on the E. bank of the Tigris, and in the place reported to have been built on the empty site referred to should be at or near the present Shediyeh, which lies between the two points named. Resen seemingly represents the Assyrian name Resa-Eni, the meaning of which is not properly translated, but is probably not to be confused with the Rish-Eni mentioned by Sennacherib in the Bavian inscription, which is regarded. as being the modern Rds 'el- 'Ain a little N. of Khorsabad. The words 'the same is a great city' should refer to Rezen alone seems unlikely—more probably Nineveh, Rehoboth-ir, and Calah are included, the two latter forming, with Rezen, suburbs of the first.

RESH.—The twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the letter which begins with this letter.

RESHEPH.—An Ephraimitic family (1 Ch 7:37).

REST.—The conception of rest as a gift of God runs through the Bible, as a wondrous act of kindness, but the freedom from anxiety which is the condition of effective work. It is promised in Isa and to Israel in Canaan (Ex 23:14, Dt 30:20), and Zion is the resting-place of J (Ps 126:1-2). The rest of the Sabbath and the Sabbatical year are connected with the rest of God after creation (Gen 2, Ex 20, Lv 23; see art. SABBATH). The individual desires rest, as did the nation (Ps 85:2); it is not to be found in ignoble ease (Ps 49:9, Isa 57:5), but in the ways of God (Ps 27). Job 14:14 is the gift of Christ (Mt 11:28). Sinners fail to find it (Is 25:1-5), as Israel failed (Ps 95:1). He, 4 develops the meaning of this failure, and points to the sabbath rest still to come. This heavenly rest includes not only freedom from labors, but an NT Job 31:17 (in Ps 16, see RV), but also the opportunity of continued work (Rev 14:10).

RESTITUTION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, 8.

RESTORATION.—In a variety of phrases—"regeneration" (palingenesia, Mt 19:28), "restoration of all things" (Ac 3:21), "summing up all things in Christ, the things which are in heaven, and the things which are on earth, both in Christ who is the head of the apostles and who is the firstborn among many brethren, new heavens and a new earth (2 P 3:13, Rev 21:1), "make all things new" (Rev 21:5)—the NT points forward to a perfected condition which shall supervise the present imperfect condition of mankind and evil (cf. Mt 13:11-13, 42, 43, 44, 45), including a renewal of nature, the quelling of all evil (Ph 2:11), and restoration of order and harmony in the universe, with Christ as Head. The hope is connected with OT prophecy (Ac 3:20, 2 P 3:13), and the transformation itself is invariably associated with the Parousia (cf. Mt 19:28 etc.). The question of chief interest is, how far these predictions of a coming restoration (apokatastasis) of all things will point forward to a realization of this restoration. Gladly as one would read this meaning into them, sober exegesis shows that they will not bear so large an interpretation. The passage which speaks of restoration "falls also of those who will not hearken, and shall be destroyed (Ac 3:20). The Parousia, when the new state of things is represented as introduced, is always connected in the NT with an awful judgment. St. Paul speaks of all things being summed up in Christ, of Christ subduing all things to Himself, etc. (Eph 1:10, 1 Co 15:24-28, Ph 2:6, 11); but unbiased study of the passages and their context shows that it is far from the Apostle's view to teach an ultimate conversion or annihilation of the kingdom of evil. It must be owned, however, that the strain of these last passages does seem to point in the direction of some ultimate unity, be it through forcible subjugation or in some other way, in which active opposition to God's Kingdom is no longer to be reckoned with.

RESURRECTION.— 1. In OT.—In our study of the OT doctrine of the resurrection we recognize the need for taking into consideration the chronological order of the different documents from which it is composed. No other belief, perhaps, presents a history into which the process of slow and halting development enters so visibly and consistently. That the later orthodox Jews advocated the existence in their earlier Scriptures of the principles which give vitality and a referal basis to this doctrine, is seen in their satisfaction with the answer of Jesus to the Sadducean cavils of His day (see Mt 22:23; cf. Lk 20:34, Mt 22:31). The gradual awakening of human consciousness in this respect is the best attestation to the Divine self-accommodation to the needs and limitations of the race. Beginning with the vague belief in the existence of a spiritual principle of Divine life in man (cf. Gn 27), the latest passages of the OT dealing with the subject embody a categorical assertion of the resurrection of individual Israelites (cf. Gn 12:2; Ex 12:38; Jos. 22:15; Ps 139:18; etc.). The question of the resurrection of the whole race of Israel is also raised in the Psalms, and to this question we have the speculations of Psalmists and Prophets, while death became gradually shorn of many of its terrors and much of its power. The common Jewish belief in the time of Jesus finds expression in the words of Martha concerning her brother Lazarus (Jn 11), while this formed one of the deep lines of religious cleavage between the Pharisees and the Sadducees (Ac 23:8; cf. Jos. B.J. n. 8, 14; Schürer, HF p. 139).

A peculiar feature of Jewish thought as to human life, marking it off clearly from some of the ethnic speculations and philosophic conceptions, consists in their habit of regarding the body as essential to man's existence. "The human body appears as a more permanent and essential part of man than mind or spirit. The translations of Enoch and Elijah (Gn 5:2, 2 K 2:20) receive their explanation on the assumption that in this way alone would they be enabled to enjoy the continuance of a full and perfect life in the grave. It was this idea also that gave such a feeling of the incompleteness of the existence in Hades, and inspired the Psalmist's assurance, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption' (Ps 16, cf. Job 14:9, 19:15).

The first specific mention of the hope of a resurrection is found in Hoses, where between these two utterances of the nature of an aspiration than the distinct announcement of a future event (6, cf. 13). This is, however, the expression not of an individual who looks forward to being raised again and made perfect, but of one who sees his nation once more quickened and 'brought up again from the depths of the earth' (Ps 71:9; cf. Kirkpatrick, The Psalms, ad loc.). A similar hope finds expression in Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (Bzk 37:10). A distinct advance on these utterances is found in the post-exilic prophecy, Is 26:19, where the prophet breathes a prayer for the resurrection of the individual dead. When this passage is contrasted with the confident assertion of v.14 it is seen that as yet there is no universal satisfaction to be thought of a resurrection save for the Israelite. The same restriction is also found to exist at the later date, when the Book of Daniel was written. In this book there is a clear, unambiguous assertion of the resurrection of individuals, and at the same time a no less clear announcement that there is a resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous (Dn 12). It is true that these words not only have no message of a resurrection hope for nations other than Israel, but even limit its scope to those of that nation who distinguish themselves on the side of good or of evil (cf. Driver, 'Daniel,' ad loc., in CamB. Bible). At the same time it is easy to see that a great stride forward had been taken already, when the atrocities of Antiochus Epiphanes brought religious despair to the hearts of all true Israelites, and roused the fervid patriotism of Judas Maccabaeus and his followers.

2. In the Apocrypha.—The development of this doctrine in the deuter-canonical and apocryphal literature of the Jews presents a varied and harmonious blend of colours. Indeed, attention is no longer confined only on the ground that each writing was influenced by the individual experience as well as by the theological idiosyncrasies of its author. Strach.—The oldest of the deuter-canonical books is that of ben-Sira, and in his work we look in vain for the idea of a resurrection, either national or individual. On the other hand, the eschatological conceptions of the Dead Sea sect and somewhat earlier of the Essenes contains an elaborate theory of Sheol, and teaches the resurrection of all righteous Israelites, and so many of the wicked as have escaped 'without incurring judgment in their lifetime.' The sinners who have suffered here 'will not be raised from thence' (229), insasmuch as retribution, in part at least, has overtaken them. Another writer of a somewhat later date speaks of the resurrection of righteous Israelites only. These shall be raised, after judgment and retribution have been meted out to sinners, to share in the glories of the Messianic Kingdom (69). A similar opinion is expressed in another part of the writing. None but the righteous shall rise (914); but the author seems to interpret the resurrection as that of the spirit only, and not of the body (1034).

The most important and best known section of the Book of Daniel is known as the Similitudes. It contains an explicit assertion of a general resurrection (5a). Whether, however, the writer intended to convey the idea of a resurrection of the Gentiles is somewhat doubtful. The words of this passage, if taken literally, would certainly convey the impression that a universal resurrection is meant. At the same time we must remember that this thought would be quite contrary to the whole habit of Jewish eschatological thinking, and would stand unique in Jewish pre-Christian literature. For discussion of this question see the admirable critical edition of the Book of Enoch by R. H. Charles, passim.

Psalms of Solomon.—These are probably the productions of the 1st cent. B.C. Here, too, a resurrection of the righteous alone is taught (38 13, cf. 46). Moreover, no resurrection of the body is mentioned explicitly, though it would be rash to assume from his work that there existed a belief in the resurrection of the dead.

2 Maccabees.—A very definite doctrine of the resurrection is taught in this book, though the author expressly denies its applicability to the Gentiles (74, cf. 2 Es 7 31). The resurrection of the body is strongly held, as affording a powerful incentive and a glorious hope for those who underwent a cruel martyrdom (14 7, cf. 7 11). At times the writer seems to be contending for the denial of a resurrection, as when he stops to praise the action of Judas in offering sacrifices and prayers for those who had fallen in battle, on the ground that he did so because 'he took thought for a resurrection' (126). If there were no resurrection of the dead, such a course of action would be superfluous and idle (124).

Book of Wisdom.—It is only necessary to say of this writing that it is an Alexandrian work, written about the beginning of the Christian era, and that according to it the body is an incubus dragging the soul, which is destined for incorruption (28 38), earthward (912 [cf. art. 'Wisdom, Book of,' in Hastings' DB iv. 980 f].)

3. Position of the doctrine at and immediately subsequent to the time of Jesus Christ.—It must be said, and said with justice, that the foregoing views were representative, not of contemporary popular beliefs and literatures, but of educated and thinking classes. It is reasonable, however, to expect that by the time of Jesus these lines of thought would have penetrated to the masses, with such modifications as they were likely to assume in and during the process. This expectation is found to be in harmony with what we observe to have actually existed; for, with one or two exceptions, when He felt called on to answer the specific question of the Sadducees (cf. Mt 12 18-21; Mk 12 18-22), He pointed to the resurrection of the dead. We know that materialistic views of this doctrine were held side by side with the more spiritual idea, so prominent in the Book of Enoch (cf. 514 104-6; 620-4 etc.).

In the Apocalypse of Baruch, for example, the question was asked, 'In what shape shall those live who live in the day?' Will they resume the forms of the past, or be changed? We have in this case a vivid idea that the bodies of the dead shall be raised exactly as they were when committed to the ground, so that they may be recognized by their friends (502). After this object has been achieved, a glorious change will take place: they shall be made like unto the angels, and be made equal to the stars, and they shall be changed into every form they desire, from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory' (115, cf. Mk 12 22-23; Lk 20 34-35; Mt 22 30). Even in Rabbinical circles sensuous conceptions were frequent, so that even the clothes in which one was to be buried became an object of anxious care (see The Apoc. of Baruch ed. R. H. Charles, notes on chs. 50-61, and Introd. p. lxxv). At this period, too, the ideas of a universal and of a first and a second resurrection were held and taught (Apoc. Bar 30-42, 2 Es 778 1-7). For our purpose it is not necessary to do more than refer to the Hellenistic or Fylyaean speculations of the Essenes to which we have already referred (RJ iv. vi. 19-21; JHP ii. iii. 205). The only form of Judaism which contained principles of continuity and life was represented by Pharisaism. The view of this, the most religious and the most orthodox of the Jewish sects, with regard to the resurrection, limited it to the righteous, for whom they postulated a new and a glorified body (see BJ iv. vii. 14, cf. Ant. xvm. i. 3). While this doctrine of a personal resurrection seems to have made much more headway in the Judaism of this age than it had been in the past, still the Pharisaic idea was at least as common as it had been, and was believed at least as much, as is shown by the fact that it was taught by the Pharisees (cf. the references cited above). The Sadducees, however, were opposed to the idea that there should be a resurrection, not merely of the joyful, but of those who had been wicked (1 Es 15 4-5; cf. 1 Kings 22 35-36), and among the disciples of Jesus we may find a number of members who did not believe in the possibility of a resurrection (Mk 14 72; Mt 27 50-54; Lk 23 52). The idea of a personal resurrection seems to have been generally held by the Jews of the later period (see ed. R. H. Charles, passim). It is, however, clear that the idea of a universal resurrection was not held by all, but that there were many who believed in a particular resurrection (see ed. R. H. Charles, passim). The form of the expression 'the resurrection from the dead,' as has been pointed out, 'implies that some among the dead are raised, while others as yet are not' (see Plummer, 'St. Luke' in ICC, ed loc.). The other expression, 'sons of the resurrection,' is remarkable for a similar reason. There seems to be an implied antithesis between those whose sonship results in immortality and those who can have no such hope (cf. Plummer, op. cit. Lk 20 34-35). Other instances, which might be considered as lending countenance to this view, speak of the 'resurrection of the just' (Lk 14 19), and contain promises of the glory of the resurrection in the Kingdom to 'his elect' (Mk 13 27; Mt 24 30). When, on the other hand, we take a general survey of the eschatological teaching of Jesus, we find that the doctrine of a general bodily resurrection occupies a very assured position even in the Syripic revisions. Not only do we find, as already noted, that His teaching on this subject, as against Sadducean negations, was pleasing in Pharisaic circles (cf. Lk 20 34-35), but He is also asked to refer to this situation in terms that have Jewish orthodoxy. The future life is personal in the fullest sense, and it is not incorporeal, for 'many shall come from the east and the west and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 8:11; cf. Lk 13:21).

(b) The Fourth Gospel.—The Johannine record of Jesus' eschatological teaching reveals a profounder view of the resurrection life than that contained in the Synoptics, for it is there dealt with as a spiritual condition intimately connected with the quickening life which is 'given to the Son' (Jn 5:22; cf. 17:11). When Martha expresses her assurance that her brother shall rise again in the resurrection, at the last day' (v. 24), Jesus at once lays broader and deeper the foundations upon which this belief is to rest for the future. While tacitly acquiescing in her conviction as a 'sure and certain hope,' He establishes an organic relationship, immediate and spiritual, between Himself and those committed to Him. This living relationship, in which all believers share, contains the germ of that resurrection life which springs into being at present, and will be perfected at 'the last day' (Jn 11:25; cf. Jl 4:4; Heb 3:3).

It is true that Jesus seems to have given no thought to the difficulty of conceiving a resurrection of the wicked on the ground that all resurrection life has its origin in Himself; at the same time no doubt can be reasonably entertained that He looked for the resurrection of all men (see Jn 12:42, of those passages which speak of the body being cast into Gehenna, Mt 10:25; Mk 13:4). He considered that a sufficient explanation consisted in asserting the omnipotence of 'the Father' after the manner of the OT: 'The Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them' (Jn 5:21; cf. Dt 31:6; 2 Co 1:21). In the Lukan version of Jesus' argument with the Sadducees we may understand a reference to the idea of the resurrection of all men based on the truth that 'all live unto him' (Lk 20:36, of a slightly different expression in Ac 17:2).

It may be pointed out here that Jesus seems to have answered the oft-asked question of the curiously inclined to the nature of the resurrection body. He compared the condition of those who had arisen to that of the angels (Mk 12:25), a comparison which is noteworthy for what it implies as well as for the reserve which Jesus used when speaking on this subject. At the same time, we must remember that certain incidents in the post-resurrection life of Jesus on earth appear to have been designed to meet this idea in speculation of this kind. He was anxious to prove that His was a bodily resurrection (Lk 24:48; Jn 20:22; cf. Ac 10:4), and that His risen body was capable of being identified with the body to which his disciples had been accustomed from before (v. 20). On the other hand, the controversies of His existence underwent a complete alteration. For Him now physical limitations, as regards time or space, did not exist (Mt 28:20; Jn 20:26; Lk 24:48, cf. 24:43); and this freedom from temporal conditions resulted in a life which transcended ordinary experience. Sometimes He remained unrecognized until a well-known characteristic phrase or act revealed His personality (Jn 20:19; 21:7; Lk 24:41, cf. the author's comment 'but some doubted' in Mt 28:17).

5. Apostolic teaching.—(a) The Acts.—Although the Apostles do not seem at first to have shaken themselves free from Judaistic conceptions of the Messianic kingdom (Ac 1:6), it is plain that they looked on the fact of Jesus' resurrection as of primary importance (see Ac 1:5). At all costs this must be placed in the forefront of their evangelistic work, and the principal element of their doctrine is the fact that the attention of their Jewish hearers lay in their power, as eye-witnesses, to offer irrefragable proof of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead (Ac 2:32b; 3:16, 17; 4:2, 11, 22, 30; cf. 1:22). When we compare the fragmentary reports of Pilate's teaching in the Acts with the attention that they dwelt on the doctrine of a literal, bodily resurrection, St. Paul's writings are rich with another conception which is more especially connected with the present life. Following the teaching of Jesus, who claimed to be the power by which resurrection life is given new and glorious life here and now. It is rooted, so to speak, in the earthly life of men, and its final growth and fruit are consummated hereafter (cf. Col 3:9; Ph 3:20, Ro 8:11). This inchoative resurrection life has its origin in the spiritual union of baptized Christians with Christ (cf. Ro 6:4, Col 2:9, Gal 2:20), and the tremendous possibilities of development are, according to Dr. St. Paul, due to a transparent and ceremonial with the glorified Jesus (see Eph 1:18-20, 2 Cor. 12:1). His resurrection is the power by which this union, in all its aspects, is perfected (1 Cor. 15:20-22, cf. Ro 14:9). It was without doubt the one-sided presentation of Pauline eschatology that led to the heresy of Hymenaeus and Philetus (I Cor. 15:32), and the Apostle seems to have felt the necessity of balancing his mystical interpretation by a phatic insistence on the literal truth that the resurrection is a future objective fact in the progressive life of man.

That St. Paul held the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous is evident not only from the words of his defence before Felix at Caesarea (Ac 24:16, cf. Lk 14:4), but also from incidental remarks in his Epistles (see 1 Th 4:16 and 1 Co 15:23), where the emphasis which is laid on the first resurrection implies a second and a separate event; cf. Ac 26:22 and Ph 3:5, where the same implication may be observed.

What the connexion is, however, between these two distinct resurrection does not appear to have occurred to the Apostle's mind, and there seems to be little ground for the supposition that he believed in a distinction between them as regards time. Indeed, the phraseology which is used by the millenarians may prove the affinity of the Pauline and Apocalyptic doctrines in this respect says nothing of any resurrection except that of 'those that are Christ's' (cf. 1 Co 15:23). The resurrection of the wicked occupies a very sub-ordinate place in Pauline eschatology, and we need not be surprised at the scanty notices taken of it, when we remember how constantly he is pressing on his readers' attention the power by which the resurrection is to be understood. (Ro 8:4, 1 Co 15:57; cf. Jn 6:30, 44, 45, 51 for the teaching that it is the quickening Spirit of Christ which causes the resurrection 'at the last day'). It is sufficient for him to urge men to the attainment of this resurrection which was the goal of his own aspirations (cf. Ph 3:20), and to warn them of the fate attendant on the rejection of Christ (note the expressions 'day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God', Ro 2:6; 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord', 2 Th 1:9; cf. 1 Th 1:10, Ph 3:19 etc.).

6. The Apocalypse.—The principal contribution of the apocalyptic eschatology to the doctrine of the resurrection is contained in Rev. 20. Although there is no specific reference to the resurrection of the wicked, this is implied in the expression 'the first resurrection' (20), as well as in the connexion established between the Resurrection and the Judgment. Rewards and punishments are meted out to all as they stand 'before the throne,' for 'death and Hades gave up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works' (v.14). What precisely is the interpretation by which the millenarian reign of the martyrs and loyal followers of Jesus is to be adequately explained it is difficult to conjecture. See, further, art. CHILiasm, MILLENNIUM.

REUBEN. — Son of Peleg (Gn 11:23, 1 Ch 1:5, Lk 3:34).

REUBEN. — The firstborn of Jacob by Leah, Gn 29:32 (J) 35:2 (P 46:4 (R)). The popular etymology connects the name with Leah's distress, because of Jacob's previous dishonourable possessive Reuben: for she said, because Jehovah hath looked upon my affliction (כְּרָוִד be'engan). This, however, is clearly a patronymica, though evidently intended seriously; otherwise the possessive is without meaning. The Hebrew word is רַבִּי ye s' on'. In Josephus the form is Reuwal, and in Syrian it is רַבִּי. Lengthy discussions have been given of the have included six cities, which appear to have formed a sort of enclave within Gadite territory. 'The children of Reuben built Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Kirjathaim; and Nebo, and Baal-meon (their names being changed), and Sibmah: and gave other names unto the cities which they built.' The names given here must be the original names, as it is improbable that the author would allow the appellatives of Jehovah to couple with the names of their cities the gods Nebo and Baal. But we nowhere read of the new names. Their list of cities is increased in Jos 13:27, without regard to the above list, Kirjathaim and Sibmah being the only ones in it that are mentioned.
These cities elsewhere assigned to God and four assigned elsewhere to Moab are here given to Reuben.

Reuben is rebuked in the Song of Deborah, because it did not participate in the war against Sisera, in words that reflect the pastoral occupation of its people. It is there followed by Gilead (Gad). In the Mesha inscription (9th cent.), though the 'men of God' are referred to as having dwelt in Ararat 'from of old,' the name of Reuben is omitted, though some of the cities ascribed to the tribe in the genealogies are said to have been taken or rebuilt. As we have seen in the above reference to the Blessing of Moses (probably about the first half of the 13th cent.), the tribe was apparently reduced at that time to an insconsiderable remnant of number, 'i.e. so few that they might easily be counted.
It is, however, still mentioned in 2 K 10:29 as though it maintained its separate organization when Baalom coalesced with Moab and smote the eastern Israelites. Its name appears more than one hundred years later, when Tiglath-pileser III. deported the tribes to Assyria in 734 (1 Ch 5:20). In all probability, however,
It was a mere remnant, an insignificant unit (see Gad).

REVELATION.—1. Meaning of revelation.—The English word, which comes from the Latin, implies the drawing back of a veil, the unveiling of something hidden. It is the almost exact equivalent of the NT word apokalypsis or 'uncovering' (Rev 1). For our present purpose the word is specially applied to the revelation of God, the 'unveiling' of the unseen God to the mind and heart of man. The application of the word to the visible is vulgar. The wider sense is that in which it is used by Gwatkin (Knowledge of God, vol. i. p. 5):
'Any fact which gives knowledge is a revelation, . . .
the revelation and the knowledge of God are correctly equivalent in expressing the same order of the same thing.' The following specific uses of the term need consideration:
(a) The revelation of God through nature.
This refers to the indications of wisdom, power, and purpose in the material world around (Ro 19). (b) The revelation of God in man. This applies to the traces of God in man's conscience with its sense of obligation, In his emotional nature with its desire and capacity for fellowship, in his personality which demands personality for its satisfaction. (c) The revelation of God in history.
This means the marks of an over-ruled providence and purpose in the affairs of mankind, of a Divinity that has shaped man's ends, the traces of a progress and onward sweep in history. All these aspects of revelation are usually summed up in the term 'natural religion,' and do not touch the specific meaning of revelation which is associated with Christianity. (d) The revelation of God to Israel. By revelation, as applied in this way, we mean a special, historical, supernatural communication from God to man. Not merely information about God, but a revelation—a disclosure of God Himself in His character and His relation to man. In addition to revelation through nature, conscience, and reason, Christianity implies a special revelation in the Person of Christ.
2. Problem of revelation.—The statement of the full content of the Christian revelation is naturally excluded from this article, but for our purpose we may say brievly that its essence is the self-manifestation of God in the Person of Christ for the redemption of mankind.
Christianity is the revelation of God's grace for man through the historic Personality of Christ. The problem is to correlate this supernatural content with the historical process by means of which it has been revealed, and to do justice at once to the superhuman fact and content, and the human media and conditions of the revelation.
In so doing we shall be brought face to face with the antitheses of revelation and discovery, of revelation and speculation, of revelation and evolution; and, while we recognize to the full the theism by which Christianity has come to us, we shall see that the gospel of Christ is not adequately accounted for except by means of a personal revelation of God, using and guiding history for the purpose, and that it cannot be explained merely in terms of history, discovery, philosophy, and evolution.
3. Possibility of revelation.—We argue this on two grounds: (a) From the Being of God. God, as a Supreme Being which for our present purpose we assume), He must necessarily be able to reveal Himself to man. Given God as personal, this includes the power of self-revelation in a way that makes revelation possible. A bare theism has never been a permanent standing-ground, for men either have receded from it or have gone forward in the direction of the revelation of God's nature. The fact of personality, with all its possibilities, implies man's capacity for communion with a Being higher than himself, or higher than any other human personality. 'Thou hast made us Thyself, O Lord, and our heart is restless until it rests in Thee' (Augustine).
4. Probability of revelation.—This also we argue on two grounds: (a) from the nature of God, and (b) from the needs of man. Granted a Supreme Historical Being, we believe not only in His ability, but in His willingness to reveal Himself to man. Belief in God prepares us to expect a revelation. Human personality with its capacity for God prepares us to expect a revelation, which thus becomes antecedently probable. The desire for it is an argument for expecting it. Man, as man, needs a revelation to guide him, an authority above him greater than himself in things spiritual and Divine.
Still more does man as a sinner need such a Divine revelation. Amid the sins and sorrow, the fears and trials, the difficulties and perplexities of life, man needs some Divine revelation that will assure his justification, holiness, and immortality. No one can say that the light of nature is sufficient for these needs, and that therefore a revelation could add nothing. Most men would agree that there is at least room for a revelation in view of the sin and suffering in the world.
Our deepest instincts cry out against the thought that sin is final or permanent, and yet it is equally clear that nothing but an intervention from above can deal with it. It is impossible to conceive of God leaving man to himself without a definite, clear, and sufficient manifestation of His own character, His will, His love, His grace.
5. Graduality of revelation.—The proofs of a Divine revelation are many, varied, converging, and cumulative, (a) Speculatively, we may argue that 'the universe points to Idealism, and Idealism to Theism, and Theism to a revelation' (Blair Forrester, Reason and Revelation, p. 243). (b) Historically, the Christian revelation comes to us by its witnesses in (1) miracle,
(2) prophecy, and (3) spiritual adaptation to human nature. (c) Behind all these are the presuppositions of natural religion as seen in nature, man, and history, (d) But ultimately the credibility of Christianity as a revelation rests on the Person of its Founder, and all evidences converge towards and centre in Him. Christ is Christianity, and Christianity is Christ. And the credibility of Christianity fundamentally in the fact and trustworthiness of Christ. Herein lies the final proof of the credibility of Christianity as a Divine revelation. If it be said that God has chosen man for His manifestation of Himself in the historic experience, we do not deny it. All truth, however mediated, must necessarily have come from the primal Source of truth. The genuineness of Christianity does not necessarily disprove the genuineness of other religions as 'broken lights.' Each system claiming to be a revelation, whether partial or final, must be tested by its own evidence, and a decision made accordingly. Thus the historic personal revelations claiming to be Divine is their power to save. It is not truth in itself, but truth as exemplified in human life and delivering from sin, that constitutes the final proof of a religion. Not to be tested by mere criteria of truth, but the peculiar, non-recurrent, non-reversible miracles which are God's singular manifestation of Himself. We are not to, and the ideal practically realized in human experience, is the supreme test. When this is applied, the true relation of Christianity to other systems is at once seen.

Methods of revelation.—(a) The Christian revelation is first and foremost a revelation of life. Christianity is primarily a religion of facts rather than of truths, the doctrines only arising out of the facts. All through the historic period God's manifestation has been given to life. Whether we think of the patriarchs, kings, and prophets of the OT, or of Christ and His Apostles in the NT, revelation has ever been connected with human life and personality. (b) But meditately it has been given in word, first orally and then written. Both in the OT and in the NT we notice first what God was and did to men, and afterwards what He said. We can and must distinguish between the facts and the record, and the record, this earlier revealed word and the true record, is the NT. (c) But the underlying fact is that each revelation which has been granted to man is a revelation in the NT. It is a revelation to us.

7. Development of revelation.—Revelation has been mediated through history, and has therefore been progressive. (a) Primitive revelation is the first stage. How men came to conceive of God must remain a matter of conjecture. As there is so little known about primitive man, so also there must be about primitive religion. One thing, however, is quite clear, that the terms 'savage' and 'primitive' are not synonymous, for the savage to-day often represents a degeneration from primitive man. All analogy favours the idea that primitive revelation was such a manifestation of God which made men wakc to the idea of God. But there exists no information as to how God's power and glory were revealed to men in the OT. (b) OT revelation. a) OT revelation. If we could be able to prove this, there is no reason to deny its possibility or probability. Without some such assumption, all ideas of revelation varies, and religion is merely a human conception. Revelation is then more than the soul's instinctive apprehension of God, for the simple reason that the instinctive apprehension itself has to be accounted for. The difficulty urged by some writers, the incompleteness of religion against primitive revelation, arises out of the assumption that all revelations are mere natural processes. There is no argument against primitive revelation which is not valid against all revelation. Christianity included. The power and possibility of man's self-development towards God are inconsistent with the fact of sin and man's bent towards evil. (b) OT revelation. However and whenever we may develop our argument, we cannot help being conscious of something in it beyond that which is merely human and historical. There is in the NT a character and record which cannot be explained solely in terms of historic events. The OT does not merely represent an endeavour to obtain an ever more worthier idea of God; it records a true idea of God impressed upon the people in the course of history, under a Divine direction to which we call a revelation. The OT conception of God is so vastly different from that which obtained in the surrounding nations, that unless we predicate something supernatural, there is no possibility of accounting for so marked a difference between people living under the same conditions, but different in their progress. As Wellhausen truly says, 'Why did not Semitic MoAb, for instance, develop into a God of Righteousness, and the Creator of heaven and earth?' It is possible to give a satisfactory answer to this question, however, when we come to the NT. (d) NT revelation. The historical revelation culminated in the manifestation of Jesus Christ. It was given at a particular time and place, mediated through One Person, and authenticated by supernatural credentials. In Christ the self-disclosure of God reached its climax, and the NT is the permanent witness of the uniqueness of Christianity in the world. God, who in ancient days spoke to men in many different messages and by various methods through the prophets, has at the end of these days spoken unto us through a Son (Heb 1, Weymouth). The Person of Christ is utterly inexplicable in terms of history, or discovery, and requires the hypothesis of revelation.

This brief sketch of the historical development of revelation will enable us to understand the importance of the truth of the progressive nature of revelation. God taught men as they were able to bear it, leading them step by step from the dawn to the noonday of His self-disclosure. While such a stage of the revelation was adequate for that time, it was not necessarily adequate with reference to succeeding stages. This principle of progress enables us to avoid a twofold error. It prevents us from underestimating the OT by reason of the fuller light of the NT; and it prevents us from using the OT in any of its stages without guidance from the more complete revelation of the NT. We thus distinguish carefully between the dispensational truth intended absolutely for immediate need at each stage, and those permanent elements in the OT which are of eternal validity. It is necessary to remember the difference between revelation written for us and to us. 'All Scripture was written for our learning, but not all was written to us directly. If it be said that revelation should be universal, and not limited to one time or place or nation, the answer is that the historical method is in exact accordance with the universal method of communicating and receiving all knowledge. It is observable in the course of history some nations and men have influenced and influenced more than others, and this constitutes an analogy, and argues the possibility that a special revelation might also be mediated through some particular race and person. Further, by limiting revelation in this way, God
REVELATION, BOOK OF

1. Canonicity.—The Revelation was not universally accepted by the early Church as canonical. There is no evidence of its existence worthy of consideration in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, although it is just possible that Papists may have known of it. By the middle of the 3rd cent. it is well known, and is declared by Justin to be by the Apostle John (Dial. Ixxxi. 15). It is also used, among others, by Melito, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen, and attributed to the Apostle John by the first-named as well as by Irenaeus. The fact that it appears in the Canon of the Muratorian Fragment is evidence that by the middle of the 2nd cent. It was accepted in the West. After its defence by Hippolytus its position was never seriously questioned except in the East. Jerome is, in fact, the only Western theologian of importance who doubts it, and he puts it among those books which are 'under discussion,' neither canonical nor apocryphal.

In the East, as might be expected, it was rejected by Marcion, and, because of disbelief in its Apostolic authorship, by Dionysius of Alexandria (middle of the 3rd cent.), Palestinian and Syrian authors (e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem) generally rejected it, because of the struggle between the Easterners and the Montanists, by whom Revelation was used as a basis of doctrine. It does not appear in the lists of the Synod of Laodicea, the Apostolic Constitutions, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, the Chronography of Nicephorus, the 'List of the New Books,' or in the Peshitta version of the NT. It was included by the Galasian Decree at the end of the 5th cent., as canonical, and was finally recognized by the Eastern Church. Yet as late as 1322 the Council of Orange decided no more than two decrees, the one including the Apocalypse in the Canon, the other excluding it. It was not held in high repute by the reformers Carisius, Luther, Zwingli, all of whom doubted its authenticity. The fact that it appears in the Codex Sinaiticus, in the Christian Church, presupposes the continued recognition by the Western Church general of its Apostolic authorship. Eusebius, however, suggests that it may have been written by John 'the Presbyter,' mentioned by Papists but otherwise unknown. At the present time the belief is divided as to whether the author of Revelation is John the Apostle or John the Presbyter. If Eusebius is correct the chief argument against the view that the author is John the Apostle lies in the differences existing between Revelation and the Gospel and the Epistles of John, both in style and in method. Notwithstanding the use of the term 'Logos' (19), these divergences are too obvious to need specifying. If Johannine authorship be assigned the Gospel and Epistles is more difficult to explain in revelation; but, on the other hand, it is difficult to believe it to be either pseudonymous or written by the mysterious John the Presbyter. As the case now stands, criticism seems to have reached an impasse, and all the Western Church generally is unable to accept the Apocalypse, but the Presbyter, the authorship is not so certain that it is possible to discount 15, 229). Justin (Dial. Ixxxi. 15) distinctly states that Revelation is by 'John, one of the Apostles of Christ,' and Tertullian along with the Western Church generally adjoins John the Presbyter in the Canon. 4. Composition.—The prevailing hypotheses may be grouped in three classes.

(1) The currently accepted view that it was written entirely by the Apostle John. Such a view, is, however, open to serious objections, because of the similarities, if not тожейство, existing between Revelation and other apocalyptic literature of the period, as well as because of the evidences of composite character of the writing, implying sources of different origins and dates, such as the two breaks in the process of the vision (the lack of any single historical point of view is seen by a comparison of 12:13; 17), in an effort to identify historically the two breaks, or in a comparison of 11:1—13

(2) The view that the work, while essentially a literary unit, is a Christian redaction of a Jewish writing. This view would attribute to the Christian redactor the first three chapters and important sections like 5:1—7; 17; 13:2—22:6, in addition to separate verses like 12:1—14:1; 14:2; 16:1—17; 19:13—21:4; 21:9—22:5. The difficulties with this position are not only those which must be urged against any view that overlooks the evidences of Christian composite authorship of the work, but also the impossibility of showing that ch. 11 is Jewish in character.

(3) Theories of composite origin.—These are of various forms—(a) The theory according to which an original work was interpolated with apocryphal matter of various dates (7:4; 8:17—11:18; 12:11; 12:17—13:7) and subjected to several revisions. (b) The view that Revelation is a Christian book in which Jewish apocalypses have been framed. (c) The theory according to which Revelation is composed of three sources, each of which has subdivisions, all worked together by a Christian redactor. (d) Notwithstanding the difficulty in determining the sources, critics are pretty thoroughly agreed that, as the book now stands, it has a unity which, though not inconsistent with the use of older material by its author, is none the less easily recognized. Some of the older material, it is now held, undoubtedly represents the general stream of apocalyptic that took its rise in Babylonian mythology. The structural unity of the book appears in the repetition of sevenfold groups of episodes, as well as in a general grammatical and linguistic similarity. In achieving this remarkable result, the redactor so combined, recast, and supplemented his material as to give the book an essentially Christian rather than Jewish character.

5. Analysis.—As it now stands, literary and critical analyses do not altogether coincide, but until criticism has finished its task, literary analysis must be of primary importance. Authorities here differ, but the following analysis does not differ fundamentally from that of other writers.

i. Introduction (ch. 1).
ii. The Message of the Spirit to the Seven Churches (chs. 2—3).
iii. The period of struggle and misery (chs. 4—7).
iv. The final Messianic struggle (ch. 8—14).
v. The victory of the Messiah (chs. 15—20).
vi. The vision of the Messianic Kingdom (chs. 21—22).

Interpretation.—No Biblical writing, with the possible exception of the Book of Daniel, has been so subjected to the vagaries of interpreters as Revelation.

(a) On the one extreme are those ("Liberals") who have seen in the book a forecast of a universal Christian history, as well as all the enemies of Christianity, both within and without the Church. To such interpreters the book has been a thesaurus of that chiliasm doctrine which is Greek as well as the modern scientific attitude of mind has found so repugnant. (b) At the other extreme there are those interpreters who see in Revelation a plain reference to the historical conditions of the first century of the Christian era. (c) There is a measure of truth in each of these two methods, but the real method of interpretation must be independent of dogmatic presuppositions. As narrative matter must be interpreted by the general principles applicable to all literature of its class, so must Revelation be interpreted in accordance with the general principles applicable to apocalypses as a form of literary expression. The fundamental principles of such interpretation involve the recognition of the facts—(1) that apocalypses are the outgrowth of definite historical situations; (2) that they attempt to stimulate faith by an exposition in symbolic terms of the deliverance which God will give His suffering people from actually existing sufferings; (3) that the deliverance which is foretold is supernatural, because of its claim to superhuman origin reinforced by pseudonymous authorship; (iv.) that the deliverance which is thus supernaturally portrayed is dependent on the introduction of evil; both elements are set miraculously given by God rather than by evoking historical forces, and is not described with the same detail as are the conditions from which God is to deliver His people.

An application of these principles to the interpretation of Revelation demands (1) that an historical interpretation be given the pictures describing the miseries of the Church. The conditions of such interpretation are most naturally fulfilled in the persecution under Domitian (81—96), although there may be references to that under the dead Nero. The persecuting force is clearly Rome, as represented both by the Emperor and by Emperor's agents, who are seen in the person of the great, of the Pierced; the oppression of the Church is set forth. A point of departure for the identification of the historical figures who are to be subjected to the Messianic punishment might be thought to be in the number of the Beast that is to say, the Emperor Nero, who was expected to return from the news (see BEAST [IN APOC.]). Pseudo-Nero did, in fact, appear in Asia Minor in A.D. 69, and among the Parthians in 79—81 and 86. The identification, however, is not altogether satisfactory, as the Hebrew letters, whose numerical equivalents give by the process of Gematria, are not precisely those in Cæsar Nero. If the correct reading of 8:1, those whose heads are like Caesar, another interpretation would make the Latin or the Roman Empire. The best that can be said, however, is that if the interpretation by Gematrion is unsatisfactory, the interpreter is forced back upon the general references of the hills, the city, and the horns or kings, as a basis for regarding Rome as the great enemy of the Christian and his Church.

A further difficulty in formulating precisely the historical situation, arises from the fact that the author, though producing a book of great literary unity, has embodied sources which refer to conditions of different times. Thus 11:14 would naturally infer the existence of the Temple, which was destroyed in 70; ch. 13 may have come from the days of Caligula; 17th most naturally implies some time in the reign of Nero; 17th apparently implies Domitian, the eighth emperor; 17th would also argue that the book was written during the period that believed in Nero redivivus. The redactor (or redactors) has, however, so combined these materials as to give a unified picture of the approaching Messianic struggle.

(2) On the other hand, the deliverance of the Church is, like all apocalyptic deliverances, miraculous, and described transcendentally. Besides the martvys, the only identification possible in this connexion is that of the conquering Lamb with Jesus Christ. The fall of Rome is foretold definitely in ch. 17, but the section is true to the general apocalyptic form in that it makes Rome the agent of Satan. The ultimate victory of the Church is similarly portrayed as the victory of God, and is identified with the return of Jesus to establish His Messianic Kingdom.

Such a method of interpretation, based upon general characteristics of apocalypses, preserves the element of truth in both the futurist and the historical methods of interpretation, the pictures of persecution symbolizing actual historical conditions, but the forecast of revelation reverting to the general Messianic expectation of events lying outside of history.

The sublime theme of Revelation thus becomes evident—the victory of the Messiah over the Roman Empire, together with the miseries to be inflicted on His enemies and the blessings to be enjoyed by His followers.

7. Religious value.—If properly interpreted, Revelation is of really profound religious value. It cannot serve as a basis of theology, but, like any piece of imaginative writing, will serve to stir the emotion and the faith of the Christian. Its literary form is so remarkable, the passages descriptive of the triumph of the Messianic Kingdom are so exquisite, its religious teaching is so impressive, as not only to warrant its inclusion in the Canon, but also to make it of lasting value to the devotional life. More particularly the Letters to the Churches are of value as criticism and inspiration for various classes of Christians, while its pictures of the New Jerusalem and its insistence upon the moral qualifications for the citizens of the Messianic Kingdom are in themselves notable incentives to right living. Strip of its apocalyptic figures, the book presents a noble ideal of Christian character, an assurance of the unfailing justice of God, and a prophecy of the victory of Christianity over a brutal social order.

REVENGE.—See AVENGER OF BLOOD, KIN OF NEXT-OF.

REVISED VERSION.—See English Versions, 35.

REVIVE.—In i. K 17a, 2 K 13a, Neh 4, Ro 14, to revive is literally "to come to life again," as in Shaks. 1 Henry VI. i. i. 18—"Henry is dead, and never shall revive." We thus see the force of Ro 7 when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.

REZEPH.—A city mentioned in the message of the Rabbahsk of Sennacherib to Hezekiah (2 K 19a, Is 37a). It is the Ratsappa or Ratespi of the Assyrian inscriptions, the modern Rasafa, between Palmyra and the Euphrates. This district belonged for several centuries to the Assyrians, and many of the tablets show it to have been an important trade-centre. Between B.C. 849 and 737 the prefects who had authority in the place were, to all appearance, Assyrians, only one, of unknown but apparently late date, having a name which may be West Semitic, namely, Abda, possibly a form of Abda or Obaudah. T. G. PINCHES.

REZIN.—From the ancient versions and the cuneiform inscriptions it is clear that the form should be Rezon or Rizin.

1. The last king of Damascus. Towards the close of the 8th cent. B.C. Damascus and Israel were under the suzerainty of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser III. enumerates the allies paid him tribute by Ar-sun-nu of Damascus and Menahem of Israel (Is 7, 78). Pekah, one of Menahem's successors, joined Rezin in the attempt to throw off the yoke. Failing to secure the co-operation of Ahaz, they turned their arms against Judah (Is 7, 74). 2 K 16 mentions, among the incidents of the campaign, that Rezin 'recovered Elath to Syria, and drave the Jews from Elath.' [This statement originated in a scribal error, the r in Aram ('Syria') having been accidentally substituted for the c of Caria, and the place name being added still later for the sake of completeness (cf. 2 Ch 297)]. The two allies besieged Jerusalem, greatly to the alarm of the populace, and Isaiah strove in vain to alysl the terror (Is 7–9). Ahaz implored aid from Tiglath-pileser, to whom he became tributary (2 K 16). On the approach of the Assyrians, Pekah was murdered by his own subjects. Damascus sustained a siege of months, but was ultimately taken (Is 7, 72), and Rezin was slain (2 K 10). Rawlinson found an inscription on which this was recorded, but the stone has unfortunately disappeared. It is not quite certain who 'the son of Tabeel' (Is 7, 8) is. Winckler (Attent. Untersuch., p. 74C) fails to carry conviction in his attempt to identify this man with Rezon. More probably he was the tool whom the confederates proposed to set on the throne of Judah.

2. The children of Rezin are mentioned as a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2, Neh 7). Like the Nethinim generally, they were very likely of foreign descent. In 1 Esd 5 they are called 'sons of Daisan,' another instance of the confusion of r and d. J. TAYLOR.

REZON.—According to the Heb. text of 1 K 15, Rezon, son of Eliada, was one of the military officers of that Hadadezer, king of the little realm of Zobah (cuneiform, Sub-Di, S. of Damascus and not far from the Sea of Tiberias, whom David overthrew). For some unknown reason he deserted Hadadezer, gathered a band of freebooters, seized Damascus, and founded there the dynasty which created the most powerful of the Syrian kingdoms. He was a thorn in Solomon's side, and his successors were bitter adversaries of Israel. Unfortunately, the text presents a suspicious appearance. Vv. 15, 16 have evidently been intercalated between v. 14 and 18, and in the best MSS of the LXX the story, with some variations, follows v. 14. In either position it interrupts the course of the narrative, and the best solution of the difficulty is to regard it as a gloss embodying a historical reality. There is not sufficient evidence for the view maintained by Thienus and Klostermann, that the name should be spelled Heiron and identified with Rezon (1 K 15).

RHEGIUM (now Reggio) was an old Greek colony near the south-western extremity of Italy, and close to the point from which there is the shortest passage to Sicily. Magna Graecia (modern Messina) on the opposite side is but 6 or 7 miles distant from Rhegium. The whitewash of Charybdis and the rock of Scylla are in this neighbourhood, and were a terror to the ancient navigators with their small vessels. Rhegium was in consequence a harbour of importance, where it was probably the wine of Sidon was awaited. The situation of the city exposed it to changes of government. In the 3rd cent. B.C. Rome entered into a special treaty with it. In NT times the population was mixed Graeco-Latin. St. Paul's ship waited here one day for a favourable south wind to take her to Puteoli. Ac 27 describes how the ship had to tack from Syracuse to Rhegium, owing to the changing winds.

RHODA.—The name of the maid-servant in the house of Mary, John Mark's mother, when St. Peter came there on his release from prison by the angel (Ac 129).

A. J. MACLEAN.

RHODES was one of the most important and decorated cities in ancient Greece. It was founded in B.C. 408, at the N.E. corner of the island of the same name, which is 43 miles long and 20 miles wide at its widest. The situation was admirable, and the people were able to take advantage of it and to build up a splendid position in the world of commerce. It reached the summit of its success in the 2nd cent. B.C., after the settlement with Rome in 189 made it mistress of great part of Caria and Lycia. Rome's trade interests were set on with the Greek cities, with this powerful rival, and in B.C. 166 Rome declared the Carian and Lydian cities independent, and made Delos a free port. Its conspicuous loyalty to Rome during the first Mithradatic War was rewarded by the recovery of part of its former Carian possessions. It took the side of Caesar in the civil war, although most of the East supported Pompey, and suffered successive misfortunes of revolution, but was eventually taken (A.D. 72). Rawlinson has shown that the town, which was a Roman provincial town, though it remained a free city in St. Paul's time, and retained its fine harbours, walls, streets, and stores. St. Paul touched her on his way from Troas.

RIGHTEOUSNESS

RHODES was one of the free States to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jews. Ezek 27:1, according to the LXX, reads "sons of the Rhodians": this is an error; the sons of whom in Gr. 19:6 (LXX) and 1 Chr 1'7 (LXX), is probably correct. The famous Colossus was a statue of the sun-god at the harbour entrance, 105 feet high. It stood only from b.c. 280 to 224. [A. SCOUTER.

ROHODUS.—A Jewish traitor (2 Mac 19?)

RIBAI.—The father of Itai (2 S 23:4 = 1 Ch 11'4).

RIBLCH.—1. An important town (mod. Riblah) and military station between Hamath, 50 miles S. of Hamath. It is mentioned in the Bible only in the literature of the Chaldean period, and was apparently the headquarters of Nebuchadrezzar the Great for his South-Syrian and Palestinian operations. From this position the Phoenician cities of the coast were within easy command, as also were Coele-Syria and the kingdom of Damascus, along with the land-routes leading farther south. Here judgment was pronounced upon Zedekiah and his officers (2 K 25: 2, 6, Z Jer 59: 5, 52m).

The statement of 2 K 23:2, that Pharaoh-necho put Jehoiakim to death at Riblah in the land of Hamath, may be corrected by the parallel passage 2 Ch 36:6, where the transaction is said to have taken place in Jerusalem itself. The true reading is, and Pharaoh-necho removed him from reigning in Jerusalem (cf. also the LXX). It was the later action of Nebuchadrezzar with regard to Zedekiah, however, that secured the change of title. The phrase in the land of Hamath (2 K 25:5) is to be compared with the "nineteen districts of Hamath" enumerated in the Tiglath-pileser m.

Riblah should be read for Diblah in Ezek 6:4. See No. 2.

2. Riblah (with the article), is, if it is reading correctly, mentioned as one of the eastern boundary marks of Israel in Nu 34:11. The place intended was not far N. on the line of Gallio, but the exact site is not known.

It was, of course, not the Riblah on the Orontes. It is remarkable, however, that this Riblah is mentioned in connexion with the 'approach to Hamath' (v. 4), which, as Winckler has shown, was on the S.W. of Mt. Hermon and the centre of the kingdom of Hamath of the time of David. Cf. Ezk 6:6 as above corrected. [J. F. McCown.

RIDDLES.—See GAMES, and PROVERBS. 2.

RIE (the AV spelling of 'rye') occurs twice (Ex 9:9, Is 26:8) in AV as rendering of 'kussammeth, which in Ezk 49 is rendered 'fitches.' In all three passages RV has 'spelt.' Whatever 'kussammeth was, it was neither true rye, which is a cereal unknown in Palestine, nor spelt. See FITCHES. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

RIGHTEOUSNESS.—1. In OT.—

'Righteousness,' 'righteous' (except in a few passages) stand in EV for some offshoot of the Semitic root kidd which is met with as early as the Tell el-Amarna letters in the sense of 'to be innocent.' The Heb. derivatives are the adjective teediaq and the nouns tseidq and teedaq (which seem to be pronominal equivalents in meaning), and the verbal forms tedaq, kitidq, etc. This group of words is represented in EV in about 400 passages by 'righteousness,' 'righteous,' etc. in the remainder, about one-fifth of the whole, by 'just,' 'justice,' 'justify,' 'right.' Whether the primary notion was 'straightness' or 'hardness' is uncertain, and quite immaterial for the present inquiry.

The material can be conveniently arranged under two heads: (1) righteousness in common speech; (2) righteousness in religious terminology. The order is not necessarily significant. It has been justly remarked that the development of the idea of righteousness in OT moves in the opposite direction to that traversed by the idea of holiness. While the latter starts from the divine and comes down to the human, the former begins with the human and ascends to the Divine.

1. Righteousness in common speech.—(a) It is perhaps safest to begin with the forensic or juristic application. The plaintiff or defendant in a legal case who was in the right was 'righteous' (Dt 23:1, Is 58'); and his claim resting on his good behaviour was 'righteousness' (1 K 8:49). A judge who decided in favour of such a person gave 'righteous judgment,' lit. 'judgment of righteousness' (Dt 16:'29), judged 'righteously' (Dt 17:7), judging 'in righteousness' ( Officials 5:9-11), being the ideal judge, would be 'swift to do righteousness' (Is 1:10), would 'judge the poor with righteousness' (119), and would have 'righteousness for the girdle of his loins' (v. 5). A court of justice was 'the place of righteousness' (Ec 3:5). The purified Jerusalem would be 'a city of righteousness' (Is 5:8). On the other hand, corrupt judges 'cast down righteousness to the earth' (Am 5:7), while doing justice was 'righteousness of the righteous from him' (Is 5:5). (b) From the forensic use is readily developed the general meaning 'what is right,' 'what ought to be' [some scholars invert the order of a and b, starting with the idea of 'rightess']. In Pr 16:9 we read: 'Better is a little with righteousness (i.e., a little got by right conduct) than great revenues with injustice.' Balances, weights, and measures which came up to the required standard were 'just balances,' etc., lit. 'balances of righteousness' (Lv 19:35), whilst their converse were 'wicked balances,' lit. 'balances of wickedness' (Mic 6:19) or 'balances of deceit' (Am 5:11). If righteousness came under the category of 'righteousness,' 'righteous lips,' lit. 'lips of righteousness,' 'are the delight of kings' (Pr 16:9).

2. Righteousness in religious terminology.—(a) For the ancient Hebrew, 'righteousness' was especially correspondence with the Divine will. The thought of God, indeed, was perhaps never wholly absent from his mind when he used the word. Note, for this conception of righteousness, Ezk 21:14, where doing what is right (isddaq) is illustrated by a number of concrete examples followed up by the general statement, 'hath walked in my statutes and kept my judgments to deal justly.' The man who walked straight with the Lord was 'just,' rather 'righteous' (isddaq). The Book of Ezekiel has many references to righteousness thus understood.—(b) As the Divine will was revealed in the Law, 'righteousness' was thought of as obedience to law (Dt 6:5). Note also the description of a righteous man in Ps 1 (cf. v.17, with v.34 and v.9). The expression was also used of obedience in a single instance. Restoring a pledge at sun-down was 'righteousness' (Dt 24:9). The avenging deed of Phinehas was 'counted to him for righteousness' (Ps 106:34). So we find the word in the plural: 'The Lord is righteous: he loveth righteousness' (Ps 119:65). In most of the passages quoted, and in many places in Ezk., Job, Prov., and Ecclesiastes, the righteousness of the individual is referred to; but in others Israel (Ps 146:6 '118' etc., Is 41:11, and other parts of Deutero-Isaiah, Hab 1:2 etc.), or a portion of Israel (Is 51: 7 etc.), is represented as 'righteous.'—(c) Since righteousness is conformity to the Divine will, and the Law which reveals that will is righteous in the whole and its parts (Ps 119:1, 71, 117 etc.), God Himself is naturally thought of as essentially righteous (Dt 32:4 where 'just' = 'righteous'; Jer 12:2, Is 40, Ps 72:11 [109], His throne is founded on righteousness and judgment (Ps 89:8-9), and all His ways exhibit righteousness (Ps 145:13). As, however, Israel was often unrighteous, the righteousness of Jehovah could then be revealed to it only in judgment (Is 1:18, 10:10). In later times it was revealed in judgment on their heathen oppressors (Is 43:10, etc.) in a number of passages, especially in Is 40-46. Righteousness is almost synonymous with justification, salvation (Is 43:16, 55:16, 59:16, 61:26; many passages in Psalms [232 vs 24: etc.], Mal 4 [Heb 3:4]). For more on this subject cf. art. Justification.

II. In NT.—

The Greek equivalents of teedaq, teedag, etc., are dikaios (51 times), 'righteous,' 'just'; dikaios (5 t.), 'justly,'
RIMMON
‘righteousness’; dikaiosynē (92 t.), ‘righteousness’; dikaios (99 t.), ‘justly’; dikaioma (104x), ‘righteousness’ (4 AV); ‘judgment’; dikaiosan (12x), ‘righteousness’; dikaiokratia (2 t.), ‘righteous justification’ (Ro 2:27).
In the teaching of Jesus (Mt 5:6, 10, 36; Lk 23 21f., Jn 10:16, 18), and in NT generally, ‘righteousness’ means, as in OT, conformity to the Divine will, but with the thought greatly deepened and spiritualized. In the Sermon on the Mount righteousness clearly includes right feeling and motive as well as right action. In Mt 23 (where dikaiosynē is unquestionably the true reading) there may be an echo of the later meaning acquired by ισεδόθησα, its Aramaic equivalent, the beginnings of which can be traced in Lxx (Dt 6:3, 9, 11, 18; Zec 10:2, etc.) and the Heb. Sirach about b.c. 200 (314 RE) ‘benevolence,’ ‘almsgiving.’ If, as cannot be reasonably doubted, the Sermon on the Mount was originally in Aramaic, the word for ‘righteousness’ can hardly have been used in such a connexion without a side glance at a common popular application of it. Still, it is not safe to find more than a hint or echo.
In Mt 23, Zahn has observed, dikaiosynē seems to be used in the sense of dikaiōma, ‘ordinance.’ In the Pauline Epistles, where dikaiosynē and dikaios are most frequently used, notice is taken of the former in a considerable number of cases describes not the righteousness required by God, but the righteousness bestowed by God and accepted by faith (Ro 1:17, etc.).
For fuller treatment cf. art. JUSTIFICATION.

RIMMON (god).—Rimmon is the Hebraized form of Rimmon, the Baal, air, weather-god and storm-god associated by popular etymology to the word for ‘pomegranate.’ He is mentioned, however (in Mt 23:5), not as a Palestinian or Babylonian, but as a Syrian, deity, which is fitly honored as the chief god of Damascus, and there are many indications that the chief Aramaean divinity was called by that people Rimmon or Rimman, but Hadad (wh. see). Rimmon (meaning the thunder) was, in fact, independent in Babylonia, where he played a great mythological and religious role, in his twofold aspect of a beneficent deity, as the giver of rain, and of a malignant, as the maker of storms and the wielder of the thunderbolt. His symbol was the axe and a bundle of lightning-tarts. He was thus in some features the analogue of Zeus or Jupiter and Thor.
In Assyria, both the Aram. and the Bab. forms of the name were current (see Hadad). The currency of the latter among the Hebrews (as Rimmon) is to be attributed to the levitical occupation of Palestine before Abraham’s time. The same combination as the Assyrian is indicated in the Biblical Hadad-rimmon (wh. see).

The emblem of Rimmon was the bull, and the widespread cult of the air-god may have had something to do with nationalizing the worship of Jahweh as represented by that animal. Cf. also the name Tab-rimmon.

RIMMON.—1. A Beerotith (2 Sm 4:1, 8). 2. The rock whither the remnants of the Benjamites fled (Jg 20:21). It has been identified with a lofty rock or conical chalky hill, visible in all directions, on the summit of which stands the village of Rummon, about 3 miles E. of Bethel. 3. A city in the south of Judah, towards the border of Edom, Jos 15:36; in 19th counted to Simeon; in Zec 14:10 named as lying to the far south of Jerusalem. See, further, EN-RIMMON. 4. In Jos 19:18 one of the boundaries of Zebulun is given as ‘Rimmon which stretcheth to the Nē’ śhā’ (AV wrongly ‘Rimmon-thoth, the to Nē’ śhā’). In 1 Ch 6:77 (Psam) the name appears as RIMMON, and in Jos 21:26 as Rimmonah (for which, by a textual error, MT has Dinannah). This Rimmon is the modern Rimmonah, north of Nazareth.

RIMMONAH, RIMMONO.—See RIMMON, No. 4.

RIMMON-PEREZ.—A ‘station’ (unidentified) of the children of Israel (Nu 33:11).

RING.—See ORNAMENTS, 2, 4. In Ca 5th Rvm ‘cylinder’ is preferable to EV ‘ring,’ the comparison being probably with the fingers of the hand.
RINGSTRAKED.—See Colours, 6.
RIMAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4:4).
RIPHATH.—One of the sons of Gomer (Gn 10:21). The parallel passage 1 Ch 1:15, by a scribal error, reads Diphath.
RITHMON.—A ‘station’ of the Israelites (Nu 33:24).
RIVER.—For the meaning and use of ḫāduth, ṣe’er, and nachal, sometimes rendered ‘river,’ see art. Snoc. ṣe’er (Jer 17:8), ‘abdal (Dn 9:21, 4), are from the root yabal, ‘to flow,’ ṣegep, ‘division,’ signifies an artificial water-channel, used for irrigation (Ps 123), etc., by which the water from cistern or stream is led to the various parts of field, garden, or orchard requiring moisture. It is used poetically of the stream bringing the rain from the great storehouses on high (Ps 65). ṣeranth (Eek 31:1) is properly a ‘channel’ or ‘conduit’ (so 2 K 18:26, Is 7:36, also Job 38:19 RV). The usual word for river in OT is nahar (Job 41:4, Ps 48). It is often used of rivers that are named: e.g. the rivers of Eden (Gn 24:18, etc.), the Euphrates (Gn 15:18, etc.), the rivers of Damascus (2 K 25:1). The Euphrates is called ‘the river’ (Gn 21:19, etc.) and ‘the great river’ (Gn 16:10, Dt 1), a title given also to the Tigris (Dn 10:1), Amaranaharaim (Ps 60 [title], also Heb. Gn 24:18, Dt 23), ‘Aram of the two rivers,’ is Mesopotamia. The word seems to have been limited to the Arab. nahar, only of perennial streams. It is applied, indeed, to the Chebar (Eek 1) and the Ahava (Ezr 8), while in Ps 137, Nah 2, Ez 7:18, 8, canals seem to be intended. But in all these cases they were probably not mere temporary conduits, but had become established as permanent sources of supply, so that, as with Chebar and Ahava, they might have names of their own. The NT word is potamos (Mk 7:1). In the fig. language of Scripture the rising of a river in flood signifies the furious advance of invading armies (Jer 46:17, 167), Is 87). The trials of affliction are like the passage of dangerous fords (Is 43:3). The river is significant of abundance (Job 29:12, etc.), and of the favour of God (Ps 46). To the obedient peace is everlasting as a river (Is 48:20). Prevailing righteousness becomes realistic as an overflowing stream (Am 5:24).
Palestine is not rich in rivers, in our sense of the term. The Jordan is perhaps the only stream to which we should apply the name. Apart from the larger streams, the wady of the mountain is sometimes the nahar of the plain, before it reaches the sea, and is perennial. Bearing the name nahar in modern Palestine, there are: in the Philistine plain, the Skhreet and the Rubin; to the N. of Jaffa, el-Aujeh, el-Ptak, el-Dendera, and Datch; to the N. of Carmel, el-Mugueita (the ancient Kishon), Na’melin (the Belus), and Mejedd. The streams that unite to form the Jordan in the N. are Nahar el-Haabdán, Nahar el-Leddán, and Nahar Buntán. The only nahar flowing into the Jordan from the west is the Jalud, near Beisaén. From the east Nahar Yarmuk drains the Jauín and Haurán, and at its confluence with the Jordan is almost of equal volume. Nahar el-Alag is also an important stream, draining a wide region.
The rivers are crossed to-day, as in ancient times, almost entirely by fords. When the rivers are in flood, the fords at the forts are not infrequent. The rivers that pass into the Mediterranean have their main fords at the mouth. The sand washed up by the waves forms a broad bank, over which the water of the stream spreads, making a wide shallow. RIVER OF EGYPT.—See Egypt [RIVER OF].
RIZIA.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:34).
RIZPAH.—Daughter of Ahia, concubine of Saul, seized by the ambitious Abner after he had placed Ish-bosheth (Ish-baal) on the throne. When accused by the king, Abner, who was the real ruler of Israel, promptly proffered the Northern Kingdom to David (2 S 18:1). A three years’ famine was divined to be due to the displeasure of Jehovah at the slaugther of the Gibonites by Saul. When David inquired what expiation he should make, the Gibonites refused money compensation, but demanded descendants of Saul to expose before Jehovah. The king gave them two of Rizpa’s sons, who were slain and exposed on Mount Gibeah (2 S 21:1-14). Rizpa spread sackcloth on the rock,—a sign that the land repented, and that the rock-city that was pitched, the water gushed out again, and the rain came. Her vigil ended, she was at liberty to perform the rite of burial.

ROADS AND TRAVEL.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE. ‘Byways’ in Jg 22:20 should rather be ‘round-about.’ In Jer 19:14 ‘bypaths’ (RV) are opposed to the old tracks.

ROBBERS OF CHURCHES.—See CHURCHES (ROBBERS OF).

ROBE.—See Dress.

ROCK represents various Heb. words, which, generally speaking, have the same ideas as the Eng.—strength, stock, foundation, etc. (cf. Stanley, 2F., Appendix). The names of rocks named in OT are Oreb (Jg 7:18), Esarhaddon, etc. (cf. Ps 125:2). The rock named Sela in Ps 104:25 (RV ‘Sela’) is a proper name. Sela or Petra, the rock-city par excellence; in Jg 19:14 (RV ‘Yr’v Sela’) the identification is doubtful; es-Safleh, ‘a bare and dazzling white sandstone promontory 1000 feet high above the Dead Sea, is the natural impossibility of horses running over crags. Dt 32:17 emphasizes the fact that in Palestine even the rocks are the home of bees (Ps 81:13, 17:4), and the rock soil produces olives (Job 29:9). Besides this natural marvel, we have the miracles of Ex 17:6, Nu 20:20 etc. In 1 Co 10:10 St. Paul follows a wide-spread Jewish hagadah, which can be traced to the 1st century A.D., according to which the rock (perhaps originally the well) followed Israel wherever they went. In the Tabernacle it was pitched, the water gushed out afresh, the princes singing the song of Nu 21. The epitaph ‘spiritual’ does not deny the literal reality of that to which it refers; the manna was literal to St. Paul, and the water and rock must have been so too. He sees in the literal fact a foreshadowing of the Christian sacraments. Further, he identifies the rock with Christ, implying His pre-existence and care for His people; cf. Philo’s identification of it with the Wisdom and Word of God.

Rocks, particularly the soft sandstone of Edom, were primitive dwelling places (Job 24:30; cf. cave-dwellers of Dt 22), and were used for sepulchres (Is 22:9, Mk 15:44). Job 19:16 refers to the permanent rock inscription; 28:1 (a somewhat unusual word, ‘flinty rock’ RV) to mining. In Jg 6:13 the rock is a natural monolith; altar; in De 6:28, ‘strong-hold’ with RV. Rocks as dangers to ships are mentioned in Ac 27:27, and metaphorically in Jude 5 RV [but RV and BMg retain ‘spots’ of AV, which has the support of the parallel 1 Th 2:17]. The barrenness and desolation of a rock is the point of Ezk 26:8-10, with a pun on Tyre (‘rock’—cf. the unfruitful rock’ (Is 59), 2) (or ‘rocks’ (Mt 13:20 RV) of the parable of the Sower; i.e. rock with a thin layer of earth. The rock meets us continually as a place of refuge, literal or metaphorical (Nu 24:8, 1 S 13:19, Is 24, Jer 48:40, Ob 1); cf. ‘foot on rock’ (Ps 27:40) in Is 32:1 it is a shade from the heat. And so it is a frequent title for God, as the unvarying strength and support of His people (Dt 32:40 [6 times], Ps 17:5 etc., Ps 28:7, 117:30, Hab 3:19). It is doubtful how far ‘Rock’ (Zur) was a definite name for God. It has been found in compounds in two S. Arabian inscriptions, and occurs in the proper names of Nu 13:14, 34, ‘Great Rock’ is a common title of Asur and Bel in Assyria. In Dt 29:1, Is 31:1 the title is given to heathen gods, but in the latter passage the word sela is used. And the fact that this word is freely employed in this connexion side by side with zur rather than in the device recorded that the latter was technically a proper name. Convolutions of nature and the power of God are connected with breaking the rock (1 K 19:10, Job 18:1, Jer 23:9, Nah 1, Mt 27:51), and in Jer 5:6 it is a symbol of obstinacy. In Mt 21:4 it is the sure foundation; cf. Mt 10:16 and art. POWER OF THE KEYS, p. 742b. The name ‘Peter’ is a tr. of the Aram. Cophas, the Heb. form of which is used Jer 6:1, Job 50 (see art. Peter). For the ‘rock of offence or stumbling’ see the device recorded in Gn 30:27. are true rocks; but in Is 26 the same word (maqgel) is properly rendered ‘staff.’ On the other hand, Moses’ rod (so RV) is rather his shepherd’s rod (Ex 4:2). For the rod as an instrument of punishment, shibbet is more frequently employed than matteh, as Pr 6:16 26, although both are not seldom employed in parallel lines (Is 10:30, etc.). It is often represented on the shepherd’s club (described and figured in Enl. DB iv. 291a, PEFS, 1905, 36). In Ps 23, Lv 27:3 (EV ‘rod’). See also SCEPTRE. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Time, occasion, and character.—The letter to the Romans belongs to the central group—which includes also Galatians, and the two letters to the Corinthians—of St. Paul’s Epistles. Marion’s order—Gal., Cor., Rom.—is not unlikely to be the order of writing. of the data to be found in the letter, with statements in Acts, suggests that Rom. was written from Corinth at the close of the so-called third missionary journey, in the period of missionary activity described in Acts 18:2-21. After the riots in Ephesus (Acts 19:34-41), St. Paul spent three months in Greece (20:1), whither Timothy had preceded him. He was thus carrying out a previous plan somewhat sooner than he had originally intended (1:21). Informing us that the Apostle wished to make a tour through Macedonia and Achaia, and afterwards, having first visited Jerusalem once more, to turn his steps towards Rome. From the letter itself we learn that he was staying with Galus (16:10), who is probably to be identified with the Galus of I Co 1:14. At the time of writing, Paul and Timothy are together, for the latter's name appears in the salutation (16th). Sopater, whose name also appears there, may be identified with the Sopater mentioned in Acts 20:16. Finally, the bearer of the letter, belongs to Cenchrea, one of the ports of Corinth. The allusions in the letter all point to the stay in Corinth implied in Acts 20. Above all, the letter itself, apart from the important passages in 11:11 and 14:23-29, is ample evidence of St. Paul's visits to Rome,—the plans mentioned in Acts 19:21. It is then more than probable that the letter was written from Corinth during the three months' stay in Greece recorded in Acts 20.

A comparison of Ro 15:19 with Ac 15:21 brings out one of the most striking of Paul's 'undesigned coincidences.' In Ac 15:22, Paul's references to Jewish obsessions in Ro 1:29 and 2:19 are also noteworthy. It should, however, be mentioned that if we turn to a critical ground ch. 18 has to be detached from the original letter, and regarded as part of a lost letter to the Ephesians, much of the evidence for the place and date of Romans is destroyed, though the remaining indications suffice to establish the position laid down above.

The date to which the letter is to be assigned depends on the chronology of St. Paul's life as a whole. Mr. Turner (Hastings, Dict. s. v. 'Chronology of St. Paul') suggests a.d. 55-56. But for further treatment of this subject, readers must consult the general articles on Chronology of NT and Paul.

The immediate occasion for the letter is clearly the projected visit to Rome. St. Paul is preparing for his coming. This explains why he writes to the Romans at all; it does not explain why he writes the particular letter we now possess. A shorter letter would have been sufficient, if Paul had intended to write to Titus, if the letter is addressed to the Ephesians.

Our knowledge of Paul's travels, extending from the middle of the first century to the end of the second, is meagre. It is not easy to draw any sharp line between the first two. The following is a brief analysis of the argument:

The salutation is unusually long, extending to seven verses, in which St. Paul emphasizes the fact that he has not set apart for the work of the Apostle to all the Gentiles. Then follows a brief introduction. The Apostle first thanks God for the faith of the Roman Christians, and then expresses his earnest desire to visit them and to preach the gospel in Rome. For he is confident—and here he states his central theme—that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation for all men, if they will only believe (1:17).

Salvation for all through the gospel—that is the thought to be developed. And first it is necessary to show that such a saving power is a universal need. The evidence for this is too abundant. Nowhere have men attained God's righteousness everywhere are the signs of God's wrath. The wilful ignorance which denies the Creator has led to the awful punishment of moral decay with which St. Paul had to deal familiarly in the great cities of the Empire. Indeed, so far has corruption advanced that the consciences of many have been defiled. They not only commit sin without shame; they rejoice in it, and glory.
ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE

by faith, we have been set free from sin that we may serve God, that we may win the fruit of our faith in sanctification, and enjoy the free gift of eternal life (6:1-9). The new life likewise brings with it freedom from the Law: it is something more than a break with the old life; it is a death, which is the deliverance of the sin that is in us (10-13). Do we dare to say that the Law was sin; but, as a matter of experience it is through the commandment that sin deceives and destroys men (17-20). We have considered the exceeding sinfulness of sin lies in its bringing men to destruction through the use of that which is good. And in a statement of intense earnestness and self-abasement, St. Paul describes his pre-Christian experience. He recalls the torturing consciousness of the hopeless conflict between spirit and flesh, which the Law cannot quench and could not heal. The weakness of the flesh, sold under sin, brought death to the higher life. But from this law too, the law of sin and of death, Christ has set us free (7:24-25).

For the Christian is not condemned to endure this hopeless struggle. God, in sending His Son, has condemned sin in the flesh. The often power, sin, is no longer to rule. The reality and the strength of the Spirit of God have come into our lives with Jesus, so that the body is dead, to be revived only at the bidding of the same Spirit (8:2). Why of the inward conflict? Is it because he hates sin? Why is he so ready to accept it as a part of his being? He thirsts for righteousness, but he finds it not, for it is not in him. For "the will is ready, but the flesh is weak" (8:7-13). God's promise is that in the new life, we shall possess only righteousness (8:22-27).

The rejection of the Jews, by which the grace of God has come to the Gentile, grieves him to the heart. How is God's treatment of the Jews, of natural descent, the outcome of His purpose, the first place in the order of the Gentile dispensation? 'He has made them all sin, that He might show mercy unto all' (5:21)

The renewal and growth of the Christian is a process of development, not a single act of conversion. God's grace is allpowerful, but it is not omnipotent. We are responsible to His grace, and without faith we have not. We must believe the gospel and confess Jesus as Lord, and then the Spirit of God works. If we do not believe, then what is involved in this kind of teaching we have accepted. If we are justified

St. Paul does not really solve the problem. He answers it, but he asserts most emphatically that God's right to choose individuals for salvation cannot be limited by human thought (Rom. 9:13-17). The justice of God's rejection of the Jews cannot be questioned a priori. But what are the facts? The Jews in seeking to establish their own righteousness, have failed to fulfill the condition of the promise, and were therefore cast out of the covenant (Rom. 10:1-14). God's choice of Israel as a nation was made prior to the giving of the Law, not in order to fulfill the promise, but to establish the faith of the Gentile (Rom. 11:24-26). The natural unbeliever of the present age is in the same state of unbelief as the natural unbeliever of the Old Testament (Rom. 11:25-27). But St. Paul cannot believe that it is final. Even now a remnant has been saved by grace; and the present rejection of Israel must have been intended to save the Gentiles. What larger blessing will not God bestow when He restores His people? The Gentiles must see in the fall of Israel the goodness of God towards themselves, and the possibilities of mercy for the Jews. This is enforced by the illustration of the wild olive and the natural branches (11:17-24). The Gentiles have been introduced as enemies now, in order that God may bless the Gentiles. But they are still beloved, for the sake of the fathers. No, God has not deserted His people. If they have not received the spirit of God, but are in the same state of unbelief, then it is the anger of God that has willed it so. And the same unsearchable mercy will one day restore them to His favour (11:25-26).

The fatal mistake of the Jews is strikingly evidenced. St. Paul begins his practical exhortation. Self-surrender to God is demanded as man's service. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind' (Deut. 6:5). With the thought of that in view, St. Paul makes profession. We make profession of loving Him who has made us a new creation in Christ. We must shun the life of obedience to God. The fact that we are under grace means that sin's dominion is ended. If we do not strive to live up to this we fail to understand what is involved in this kind of teaching we have accepted. If we are justified love, which alone fulfils the Law: to put off all sloth and vice, since the day is at hand (ch. 15). The duties of strong and weak towards each other will call for brotherly love. We must not surrender the principle of individual responsibility, which has been so well laid down by the Lord. We have no right to judge, and we must not force our practices on our fellows. On the other hand, we must not push our individual liberty so far as to offend our brothers. Let us give up things we feel to be right, if we can.stand and doubt by asserting our liberty. The strong must bear the weight of the weak. Even if Christ pleased not in ancient times, My Father finds our joy and peace in following Him (14:15f).

St. Paul then concludes by explaining why he was so bold as to say that the place of God, and by describing his placid hopes for the future (15:24-34). The last chapter contains an account of the Ephesians which brings the letter, and a number of detailed satiatsions to individual members of the Church, and to some house-churches. A brief warning against teachers who cause division, greetings from St. Paul's companions, and an elaborate doxology bring the letter to a close (ch. 16).

The theology and leading ideas of the letter cannot be treated here. In a sense, however, the importance of Romans lies rather in its religious power than in its theological ideas. The letter is bound together by St. Paul's central experience of the mercy of God. In God's grace he has found the strength which can arrest the decay of man in sin, careless and rebellious. God's grace has also found the secret of overcoming for the man who is conscious of the awfulness of sin, and of his own inability to save his life from destruction. The problem of the Ephesians who are representative of the Jewish converts, is raised by them in their previous privileges as by God's present mercy. St. Paul cannot be satisfied till he has grasped the love of God, which he feels must be the heart of the mystery. The love of Christ will bring the nearness of God's mercy determinate, and the Christian character render it possible. It is noteworthy that, though St. Paul seldom refers to the sayings of Jesus, he arrives at the mind of Christ through the gospel account of the gospel plan of God, and by comparing his plan of salvation with the plan of salvation with the Church as it is known to him. As Deissmann suggests, we do not recognize the special characteristics of St. Paul if we regard him as first and foremost the theologian of primitive Christianity. Romans is the passionate outpouring of one who has come into living touch with his heavenly Father.

Se textual points: integrity and genuineness.—

The omission in manuscript G of the words en Rōmē in 1:1 is an interesting indication of the probability of a shorter edition of Romans, with the local references suppressed, may have been circulated in quite early times. The letter to the Ephesians seems to have been treated in the same way. This shorter edition may have concluded at 14:27, where the final doxology (15:24-34) is placed in several MSS (ALP, etc.). But the shifting position of this doxology in our authorities perhaps indicates that it is not part of the original letter at all (see Denny, in the BGT). But there is further evidence to show that some early editions of the letter omitted chs. 15 and 16. Marcellus apparently omitted these chapters. Tertullian, Irenaeus, and Cyprian do not quote them. There is also some internal evidence for omitting ch. 16, as least in part. It may be pointed to Ephesians. The reference to Epanthetos in 16:19 would be more natural in a letter to Ephesus than in a letter to Rome. In view of Ac 18:10 it is difficult to suppose that Aquila and Piscilla had returned from Ephesus to Rome. On the other hand, none of these considerations affects or explains ch. 15, and the two chapters cannot be separated very easily. Further, Sanday and Headlam have collected an imposing array of evidence to prove the presence at Rome of persons with such names as are mentioned in ch. 16 ('Romans' in ICC xxxiv f.).

The question must still be regarded as open. But while there is evidence that ch. 16 is part of a distinct letter, the theories of dismemberment, or rather the proofs of the composition of Romans advanced by some Dutch scholars, cannot be considered convincing. The view of H. G. B. von Soden and of M. D. G. Luthan have received perhaps undue attention, owing to the fact that the art. on 'Romans' in the EB is from his pen. His criticism was certainly arbitrary, and his promise frequently inexact. Thus he quotes with approval Evan'son's statement that there is no reference in Acts to any project of St. Paul's to visit Rome—a statement made in direct contradiction of Ac 19:24 and about the middle of the sixteenth century, according as the probable date of Romans, in face of the external evidence of 1 Clement (ib. col. 4143). The general argument against the genuineness of Romans, which weighs most with van Manen, lies in the fact that 'it has learned to break with Judaism, and to regard the standpoint of the law as once for all past and done with.' This is 'a remarkable forward step, a rich and far-reaching reform of the most ancient type of Christianity; a movement becomes at a moment the adherent of a new religion and its great reformer' (ib. col. 4138). Of this disproof of Pauline authorship it is quite sufficient to say with Prof. Schmiedel: 'Perhaps the author was an imitator, but there is no evidence to show that he was so.' Indeed, Prof. Schmiedel's article on 'Galatians' (ib. vol. ii. col. 1620 f.) is a fresh refutation of the Dutch school represented by van Manen. They have advanced yet no solid reason for doubting the genuineness of Romans.

appears to have been a bulbed flower. The RVm suggests 'autumn crouce' (Colchicum autumnale); on the other hand, many good authorities suggest the narcissus, which is a great favourite to-day in Palestine. Two species are known—N. Tazetta and N. serotinus.

In Wis 2:3, Sir 24:20, 37:30 we have mention of rhodon (Gr.). Whether this is, as Tristram maintains, the Rhododendron or the true rose is uncertain; both occur in parts of Palestine.

In Ezk 38:9, 39:7 the word Roush is thought by many interpreters to refer to a people, otherwise unknown, but coupled with Mesech and Tubal (wh. see). It is possible, however, that the word meaning 'bead' is used as a preposition 'over,' so that the phrase here applied to God (wh. see) simply means, 'prince over Mesech and Tubal'; cf. AVm.

It has been conjectured that these two are the same person, that Simon's widow (?) had emigrated to Rome with her two sons, where they became people of eminence in the Church, and that this is the reason why they are mentioned by St. Mark, who probably wrote in Rome.

RUHMAH.—The second child (a daughter) of Gomer, Hosea's wife, was called Lo-ruhmah, 'unpitied' (Hos 11:4). The name was given symbolically to indicate that God had ceased to pity Israel, and given her over to calamity. The return of God's mercy is indicated in Hos 2:21 'Say ye unto your brethren, Ammi (i.e. 'my people,' in opposition to Lo-azm, 'not my people'); and to your sisters, Ruhmah' (i.e. ye are 'pitted'). A similar play on the word is found in Hos 2:19 'I will have mercy on 'her that had not obtained mercy' (Lo-ruhmah).'

RUTH (Book of).—1. Contents.—The book is really the narrative of a family story, told in a charmingly idyllic way. The fact of most far-reaching interest which it contains is that the Moabitess Ruth, i.e. one who is non-Israelite, is represented as the ancestress of the house of David; this is very important, as testifying to a spirit which is very different from ordinary Jewish exclusiveness, and as far as the OT is concerned can be paralleled only by the Book of Jonah. A point of subsidiary but yet considerable interest in the book is its archaeology; the notices concerning the laws of the marriage of next-of-kin (2:14,15), and of the method of transfering property (4:1-4), and of the custom of the formal ratification of a compact (4:9-12), are all evidently echoes of usages which belonged to a time long anterior to the date at which the book was written, though in part still in vogue.

2. Date.—The language of the book has an 'Aramaizing tendency'; it implicitly acknowledges itself to have been written long after the time of the events it professes to describe (1:47); in the Hebrew Canon it is placed among the Hagiographa; these considerations lead to the conclusion that the book must be a late date. That it is post-exilic cannot admit of doubt; but to assign it a date more definite than this would be precarious. This much, at least, may be said: the third portion of the Hebrew Canon was completed, at the earliest, after the close of the 3rd cent. B.C. Now it is not likely that a book which purported to contain a fuller genealogy of David than that of 1 Samuel would have been long in existence without being admitted into the Canon. W. O. E. SABBATH.—1. Origin of the Sabbath.—The name 'Sabbath' (Heb. sabbath, from a verb sabbath, meaning 'to desist') might be applied to any sacred season as a time of cessation from labour, and is so used of the Day of Atonement, which was observed annually on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lv 16:29). But in usage it is almost confined to the day of rest which closed each week of seven days, the cycle running continuously through the calendar without regard to the month or the year. The origin of this institution, and its early history among the Israelites, are involved in much obscurity. That it has affinities with certain Babylonian observances is obvious; but the differences are very marked, and a direct dependence of the one on the other is difficult to understand. It is known that in two months (possibly in all) the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days (those in which the moon enters a new phase), and also the 19th (the 7×7th= 49th from the beginning of the previous month), were regarded in Babylonia as unlucky 'seven days', on which certain actions had to be avoided by important personages (king, priest, physician). The name shabattu has also been found in the inscriptions, where it is explained as Am nakh libbi 'day of the appeasement of the heart' (of the deity),—in the first instance, therefore, a day of prayer or atonement. But that the five unlucky days mentioned above were called shabattu has not been proved, and is, indeed, rendered improbable by the more recent discovery that shabattu was a name for the day of the full moon (the 15th of the month). When we turn to the early references to the Sabbath in the OT, we find a state of things which seems at first sight to present a parallel to the Babylonian usage. It is a singular fact that except in the expansions of the Fourth Commandment in Ex 20:8-11 and Dt 5:12-15 (which are evidently no part of the original Decalogue), there is nothing in the pre-exilic literature which explicitly indicates that the word 'Sabbath' denotes a weekly day of rest. In the kernel of the Decalogue (Ex 20:8, Dt 5:12), the observance of the Sabbath is enjoined; but neither the manner of its observance nor the period of its recurrence is prescribed. Where, on the other hand, the weekly rest is inculcated (Ex 20:10 34), the name 'Sabbath' does not occur. In the prophetic and historical books 'Sabbath' and 'new moon' are associated in such a way as to suggest that both were lunar festivals (Am 8, Ho 2, Is 1,2, 2 K 4),—and the attempt has been made to trace the transition from the Babylonian institution to the Hebrew Sabbath by the hypothesis that originally the Sabbath in Israel was the feast of the full moon, just as in Babylonia. This theory, however, is little but an ingenious paradox. It is arbitrary to deny the antiquity of Ex 20:8 or 34; and if the word 'Sabbath' is not found in these passages, yet the related verb shabath is used in both, as is rarely the case except in connexion with the Sabbath. Moreover, the way in which the Sabbath is isolated from all other sacred seasons (Decalogue, 2 K 4) goes far to show that even in the pre-exilic period it was a festival not generis, and had already acquired something of the prominence which belonged to it in later times. How little force there is in the argument from the connexion of 'new moon' and 'Sabbath' may be seen from Is 66:24, Col 2:16. The most reasonable conclusion is that the weekly Sabbath is everywhere presupposed in the OT, and that, if it be connected historically with Babylonian institutions, the development lies behind the range of Israelite tradition, and in all probability was a feature of Canaanitish civilization when the Hebrews settled in the country. It must be remembered, however, that the hypothesis of a Babylonian origin does not exhaust the possibilities of the case. Although a regularly recurring day of rest is neither necessary nor possible for pastoral nomads, it is quite conceivable that some form of Sabbath observance, depending on the phases of the moon, was practised by the Hebrews in the desert, and that the transformation of this primitive lunar festival into the Sabbath as we know it in the OT was due to the suppression of its superstitious associations under the influence of the national religion of Israel.

2. Religious significance of the Sabbath.—The distinctive characteristics of the Hebrew Sabbath were mainly these two: it was, first, a day sacred to Jahweh, and second, a day of rest. In the earlier period cessation from labour may have been merely a consequence of the coastal character of the day; although the references of the ceremonial sanction by humanitarian motives in the legislation (Ex 23:12, Dt 5:14) show that already the religious mind of the nation had grasped the final justification of the Sabbath as an institution made for man, and not one for which man was made. This conception of the Sabbath underwent a radical modification in the age of the Exile. It is hardly accurate to say that the change was entirely due to the fact that the Sabbath was to that extent the law of the gentile ordinances by which the Israelite in a foreign land could mark his separation from heathenism. The idea of the Sabbath as a covenant between Jahweh and Israel, which is elaborated in Ezekiel and the code called the Law of Holiness, is foreshadowed in Dt 5:14; and even the more imposing conception of it as a memorial of the Creation finds expression in Ex 20:11, when Jahweh, in all humanism, and to admit any rate that it was a day of account in Creation in Gn 1. The truth is that in this, as in many other cases, the real turning-point was not the departure of the people but the suppression of the ceremonial statutory by Josiah's renunciation. Less is it important to observe that, for whatever reason, a profound transformation of the character of the Sabbath emerges in writings of the Exilic and post-exilic period. The obligation to rest, from business, necessity concomitant of acts of worship, or a means to a higher end, becomes an end in itself, a form of self-denial, pleasing to the Deity as an act of implicit obedience to His positive command. The whole of the subsequent legislation proceeds from this point of view. In Ezekiel the Law of Holiness the Sabbath (as has just been observed) is conceived as an arbitrary sign of the covenant between Jahweh and Israel, and of the individual's fidelity to that covenant. The Priestly Code not only exalts the Sabbath by basing its sanction on the example of the Creator (Gn 2:1-4, Ex 31:17), but seeks to enforce its observance by the insertion of the death penalty in Ex 31:14, and sets the example of guarding its sanctity by prohibitive regulations (Ex 35:3). The memoirs of Nehemiah reveal at once the importance attached to the Sabbath as a mark of the distinction between the faithful Jews and their heathen neighbours (10:5-13), and the stern determination which was necessary to compel obedience (13:15). In post-exilic prophecies there are several allusions to Sabbath observance as a supreme religious duty, and a condition of the fulfilment of the Messianic expectations (Jer 17:24, Is 56:3, 58:13, 66:23). At the commencement of the Maccabean revolt, regard for the Sabbath was so ingrained in the mind of the people that strict Jews allowed themselves to be slaughtered by their enemies rather than use arms for their own defence (I Mac 2:20ff.); though after one incident of this kind the maxim was laid down that defensive operations in war were legitimate on the Sabbath (v.44).

3. The Sabbath in the NT.—The Gospels show that the time of Christ the casuistry of the scribes had hardened round the Sabbath with many of those petty and vexatious rules which are preserved in the Rabbinical literature, and which completely evacuated the institution of any large principle of religion or humanity. Accordingly the Sabbath law was (next to His own Messianic claims) the chief subject of contention between our Lord and the Pharisees (see Mt 12:8-10, Lk 13:14).

SABBATH YEAR

14th, Jn 5:17, 738, 919, etc.). As regards our Lord's own attitude, it is enough to say that it combined reverence for the ordinance, in so far as it served religious ends (Lk 4:16, etc.), with a resolute vindication of the principle that 'the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath' (Mr 2:27). Similarly, in the Pauline Epistles the Sabbath is relegated, either formally incidentally (Ro 14:21, Gal 4:10) or expressly (Col 2:16), to the category of things morally indifferent, with regard to which each man must follow the dictates of his conscience. It is significant also that the high Council of Jerusalem does not impose the observance of the Sabbath on the Gentile Churches (Ac 15:1). On the latter Christian observance of the first day of the week, and its assimilation to the Jewish Sabbath, see Lord's Day.

SABBATH YEAR (including year of Jubilee).—

1. OT references.—In a consideration of the regulations connected with the Sabbatical and Jubilee years, it is of the greatest importance to keep distinct the various stages of the Jewish legislation on this subject. The various ordinances differ greatly in character and detail; and in order to comprehend this diversity it is necessary to assume as granted the main conclusions of OT authority and, so far as it separated in time and difference in spirit characterize the several parts of the Mosaic Law.

Exodus. In 23:11 an entire cessation of all field-work is ordered to take place in every seventh year. This is said to be dictated by a regard for the poor and the beasts of the field. In effect the gift of one year's produce to the poor is prescribed, that the landless may receive the unfruit of the soil. In 21:4 it is laid down that a Hebrew slave can be kept in bondage only for six years. After this period he was automatically emancipated, though his wife and children must remain in servitude, if he had married after his term of service began. Day provision was made for JPs, a pecuniary where a slave might desire to remain in this condition. A public ceremony took place which signified his acceptance of the position in perpetuity. Nothing is here said which leads us to suppose that there was one simultaneous period of emancipation all over the country, and no reference is made to redemption of land or remission of debts.

Deuteronomy. In 15:1-10 the 7th year is assigned as the period at which all the liabilities of a Jew were suspended (or possibly, as Josephus supposes, entirely cancelled); this provision was to be of universal operation, 15:19-21 referring the ordinances of Ex 21 with regard to the emancipation of slaves; here again no simultaneity of redemption can be inferred. 31:19-21 prescribes that the Law is to be read every 7th year (the 'year of release') at the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Neh 8:18). Nothing is said in Deuteronomy about a possible redemption of land.

Leviticus. In 25:3-5 provision is made for a seventh-year furlough; but there is no mention of the poor. The reason assigned is that the land, being Jehovah's land, must keep Sabbath, i.e. the Sabbath principle is extended to cover nature as well as man. We also find here the jubilee ordinances. After 49 years had elapsed, every 50th year was to be inaugurated as a jubilee by the blowing of the trumpet on the Day of Atonement. All slaves were to be emancipated (this may be a modified substitute for the earlier provisions with regard to emancipation after 7 years); no mention is made of the possibility of perpetual slavery, but it is ordained that the Israelite slave of a foreigner may be redeemed by a relative, all Jews being essentially Jehovah's servants. The land was to lie fallow, and providential aid is promised to ensure sufficiency of produce during the period of three years when no harvest could be gathered, viz. the 49th year, which would be a sabbatical sallow, the year of jubilee, and the following year, when village would be resumed. Here also we find elaborate directions for the redemption of land in the jubilee year. They may be thus summarized: (1) No landed property may be sold, but only the unfruit of its produce up to the jubilee; and the price must be calculated by the distance from that period. (2) A kinman may redeem land thus mortgaged, or (the meaning may possibly be) exercise a right of pre-emption upon it. (3) The mortgagee may redeem at the selling price, less the yearly proportion for the time elapsed since the sale. (4) House property in walled towns (not in villages) may be sold outright, and is redeemable only during one year. Such property was probably regarded as human and sacred, whilst all land was essentially the property of Jehovah. (5) The Levitical possessions were redeemable at any time, and did not come under the jubilee provisions. (6) Nothing is said in Lev. as to the remission of debts, but there is a general prohibition of usury. (7) In Lv 25: 1-13 a field devoted to Jehovah must be valued at once at a fixed rate, and might be redeemed at this price, plus a fine of 5% per cent, up to the year of jubilee. If not redeemed by then it became sacred property: no redemption of it was thereafter possible.

2. Purposes of the Sabbatical rules.—The purposes underlying the ordinances thus classified may be summarized briefly.

(a) The periodical fallow. This is a very common provision in agriculture, and the seven years' period of fallow is observed in Syria. Since the fallow year was not at first everywhere simultaneous, the earlier historical books are silent about it; and indeed it cannot have been generally observed. For the 70 years' captivity and desolation of the land was regarded as making up for the unobserved Sabbaths of the land (2 Ch 36:19, cf. Lv 25: 4). The reference in Neh 10:1 may be to the periodical fallow or to the remission of debts. But in 1 Mac 10:16 it is said that the fallow year was to be during the year of the jubilee.

(b) The emancipation of slaves (cf. Jer 34: 1-9). Such a provision must have been very difficult to enforce, and we find no other possible reference to it.

(c) The remission or suspension of debts. The unity reference is the dubious one in Neh 10:31.

(d) The redemption of real property. The kind of tenure here implied is not uncommonly found in other countries, and Jer 32: 6-12, 4 Ro 4, Ezk 22: 30 show that something akin to it (cf. also Ezk 46: 2). But that it was in no sense universal may be inferred from Isaiah’s and Micah’s denunciations of land-grabbing; on the other hand, Is 61: 4 furnishes an instance of the inalienability of land. Cf. Leviticus, p. 543.

In general we have no sign that the sabbatical and jubilee provisions were ever strictly observed in Biblical times. Their principles of rest and redemption, though never practised as a piece of social politics, were preached as ideals, and may have had some effect in discouraging slave-owning, land-grabbing, and usury, and in encouraging a more merciful view of the relations between Jew and Jew. Thus Is 61: 4 is steeped in the jubilee phraseology, and Christ adopted this passage to explain His own mission (Lk 4: 16).

SABTA, SABAHT.—In the genealogical list of Gn 10: 9 a son of Cush, named between Havilah and other Arabian districts. It was probably a region on or near the east coast of Arabia, but in spite of several conjectures it has not been identified with any historical tribe or country. The relationship with Cushi is to be accounted for on the ground that the Cushites were first extended across the Red Sea from Nubia north-eastward over the great peninsula. J. F. McCurdy.

SABBIO.—The youngest son of Cush according to Gn 10: 9. The only identification at all plausible has been made with Samytakele on the E. side of the Persian Gulf. But this is improbable, since that region did not come within the Cushite domain, as judged by the names of the other sons of Cush. Possibly Sabbio is a miswriting for Sattah (wh. see). J. F. McCurdy.

SACKBUT.—See SACRED EMBLEMS, § 4 (c).

SACKCLOTH.—The sackcloth of OT was a coarse dark cloth made on the loom from the hair of goats and camels. In the extant literature it is almost always associated with mourning for the dead (Gn 37: 32, 2 S 23: 28 & oft.); and especially with the public expression of humiliation and penitence in view of some national misfortune, present (1 K 21: 9, Neh 9: 10, Jon 3: 6) & 4. For other tokens of grief and penitence, associated with the donning of sackcloth, such as ashes or dust on the head, and the rending of garments (this being a later sign), there is no evidence. It is probable that the form of a loincloth or sashcloth, tied in the ancient manner in a knot in front (cf. Is 20 ‘lose the sackcloth,’ lit. ‘untie the knot’). It was worn by women as well as men (Is 32: 11, Jer 21: 13). The putting on of it upon cattle, however, as mentioned in Jon 3 and Hc 4, and even upon an altar (4: 11), is, from the nature of the passages cited, rather a literary than a historical extravagance. In this custom most modern scholars recognize an illustration of conservation in religious practice. The sackcloth is known to have been the oldest article of dress among the Semites (see DRESS, § 2), and as such it appears to have been retained in mourning customs and in humiliation before God, and perhaps in the exercise of the cultus, long after it had ceased to be the only garment of the people. The ‘ibram or waistcloth still worn by the Modern pilgrims during their devotions at the sacred shrine at Mecca, has often been called a modern parallel.

of a mystery was carried still further by Tertullian, and was greatly fostered by the fact that about this time a tendency was rapidly growing in the Church to an assimilation of Christian worship to the Mystery-worship of the Graeco-Roman world (see ART. MYSTERY). This tendency (end of 2nd cent. and beginning of 3rd) first writer (Pliny) refers to the name ‘sacramentum’ to commit no kind of crime’ (Ep. x. 96), it has been suggested by some that he was using the word in the Christian sense, and was referring either to the baptismal vow or to participation in the Eucharist. The fact, however, that we do not find such a use of the word, even in Christian writers, for nearly a century afterwards makes this extremely unlikely; and the probability is that Pliny intended it in the old Roman sense of an oath or solemn obligation.

2. Nature and number.—(1) Though used especially of Baptism and the Eucharist, the application of the term by Christian writers was at first exceedingly loose, for it was taken to describe not only all kinds of religious ceremonies, but even facts of the Christian faith. The vagueness of prevailing notions is illustrated by Augustine’s remark that ‘signs pertaining to things Divine are called sacraments, and thus well-known designation of a sacrament is the visible form of an invisible grace.’ It is otherwise illustrated by the fact that Tertullian (12th cent.) enumerates about 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the Church. The Council of Trent defined the nature of a sacrament more closely, by laying down that not all signs of sacred things have sacramental value, and that visible forms are sacraments only when they represent an invisible grace and become its channels. It further delimited the sacramental area by re-enacting in its 7th session (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439) in which effect was for the first time authentically given to the suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other Schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at 7, namely, Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion that was evidently influenced by the belief that 7 was a sacred number.

(2) In the Reformed Churches criticism of this scheme was based on the fact that it proceeds on settled principles. The number 7 is perfectly arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particulars is impossible. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the word ‘sacrament’ as a convenient general idea that has to be drawn from the characteristics of the acts classed together under this name—a term, moreover, that is sanctioned by the usage of the Church from the days of Tertullian—they found the distinguishing mark of a sacrament in the fact of its being instituted by Christ Himself and enjoined by Him upon His followers. And as Baptism and the Lord’s Supper are the only two rites for which this can be claimed, it follows that there are only two sacraments in the proper sense of the word. The uniqueness that belongs to these as resting upon Christ’s personal appointment and being bond and doctrine of His own words (Mt 28:19, Mk 16:18; Mt 26:26-28), I Co 11:23-26) justifies us in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies whatsoever, however closely and suggestive any of these may appear to be, and raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical revelation of God in Christ, and so of being not signs merely, but in very truth, in Augustine’s phrase, the word made visible. A justification may perhaps be found in the fact that St. Paul traces an analogy between Circumcision and the Passover—the two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the one hand, and Baptism (Col 2:11) and the Lord’s Supper (cf. 1 Co 10:5 with 11:23-24 respectively, on the other. The Efficacy. — According to the Roman view, these sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. by a power inherent in themselves as outward acts. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, maintains that though their benefits are Divinely appointed through grace, their recipients are contingent upon subjective spiritual conditions, and above all upon the exercise of faith in Christ. Himself. See, further, BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, ORDERS, etc. ON OF HANDS.

SACRAMENT AND OFFERING.—1. TERMINOLOGY OF SACRAMENTS.—(a) General. Since every sacrifice was an offering, but all offerings were not sacrifices, this preliminary study of the usage of these two important terms in our EV may start from the more comprehensive ‘offering.’ If the word ‘offering’ is used in the majority of cases (AV, RV), it is a synonym of ‘sacrifice’ (cf. German Opfer). This is the case more particularly in the extensive nomenclature of the various sacrifices, as ‘burnt’ offering, ‘meal’ offering, etc. As will presently appear (§ 2), the compound expression in such cases represents but a single word in the original, which is the technical term for the particular sacrifice.

In the matter of these occurrences, however, ‘offering,’ or its synonym ‘oblation,’ is used in a more extended application to denote a gift offered to God, as opposed to a secular gift, in the form of a present, bribe, or the like. The meaning of ‘sacrifice’ or offerings may be divided into three classes, namely, (1) altar-offerings, comprising all such offerings as were brought into contact with the altar (cf. Mt 27:37), mostly for the purpose of being consumed thereon; (2) the stated sacred dues, such as tithes, first-fruits, etc.; and (3) special votive offerings, e.g. those specified in Nu 7. In this comprehensive sense of the term, ‘offering,’ or as almost uniformly in RV, ‘oblation,’ corresponds to the Hebrew popular to Ezekiel and the priestly legislation. It is the corban of Mk 7:12, ‘that is to say, Given to God’ (RV; AV ‘a gift’), and means ‘something brought near’; i.e. to the altar, or at least presented at the sanctuary, in other words, a present to God. The term, as has been said, appears late in the history of OT sacrifice (Ezk 20:26-28 and the various strata of Ps add to the NT, the older corresponding term in the older literature being minchah, for which see § 2.

The classification of OT offerings above suggested serves, further, to bring into relief the relation of ‘sacrifice’ to ‘offering.’ The former may be defined as an offering which is consumed, in whole or in part, upon the altar, or, more briefly, as an altar-offering. It is in this more restricted sense of altar-offering that ‘sacrifice’ and ‘offering’ are employed synonymously in our English nomenclature of sacrifices.

But there is still another use of these terms in which they are not synonymous but contrasted terms. In the sacrificial system of OT altar-offerings—‘sacrifices’ in the sense above defined—are of two kinds: animal offerings and cereal offerings, using the latter term a fortiori for all non-bloody altar-offerings, including not merely cereal oblations in the strict sense (flour, cakes, etc.), but also offerings of wine, oil, and the indispensable salt. Now the characteristic and significant Heb. designation of an animal, or, as it is often termed, a bloody, offering is zebach, lit. ‘slaughter,’ from the verb sāḇaḵ, originally to slaughter generally, then specially to immolate the sacrificial victim, to sacrifice; hence also the word for 'altar,' mizḵāḵ, lit. the place of slaughter (for sacrifice). The complement of sāḇaḵ in this sense of animal sacrifice is mīnḥāḵ, in the later specialized sense of cereal offering (see, further, for both terms,湛江). It is also to say that 'sacrifice' and 'offering' can denote the whole category of altar offerings (Ps 40, 1 S 29, Am 5—as also Is 19:19 'sacrifice and oblation'). In this sense, also, they are to be understood in the title of this article. The results now reached may thus be summarized: 'sacrifice' is used as a convenient term for both kinds of OT altar-offerings, but in the EV, and in strict usage, it corresponds to the Heb. sāḇaḵ, which is always used of animal sacrifice, while 'offering' is used in three different senses—for (7) the votive offering (EV 'vow'), defined in the latter passage as 'a sacrifice to accomplish a vow,' and (6) the freewill offering (RV), which explains itself.

The probable meaning of the different terms rendered (9) sin offering, and (10) trespass (AV) or guilt (RV) offering will be more profitably discussed when the subject of these offerings is under consideration (§14.). All the various terms (1 to 10) are explicitly or implicitly included in a favourite term of the Priestly legislation, namely (11) tārāmō, fire offering, in EV 'the offering (or sacrifice) made by fire.' The latter offering is also mentioned in Dt 18 and 1 S 25 (a Deuteronomic passage).

Two other significant terms may be taken together, namely, the heave offering and the wave offering. The former is the rendering, in this connection, of (12) tārāmāh, which etymologically signifies not something 'heaved up' (so Ex 29:7), but rather 'what is lifted off a larger mass, or separated from it for sacred purposes.' The Heb. word is used in a variety of applications—gfts of agricultural produce, of the spoils of war, etc., and in these cases is rendered 'offering' or 'oblation' (see Driver, DB ill. 588, and Com. on Deut. 142, who considers 'that continuation in perhaps the English word which... best suggests the idea expressed by the Heb. tārāmāh'). In connexion with sacrifice, however, it denotes certain portions 'taken or lifted off' from the burnt offering and to the priests. It is, however, in particular the 'heave thigh' (Lv 7:24 RV), or the 'thigh of the heave offering' (Ex 29:17). 'Heave offering' accordingly in the sacrificial terminology is the equivalent of 'priest's portion' (cf. Lv 6, where, however, a different word is used).

(13) With the tārāmāh is closely associated the lēḇāphō or wave offering. The Heb. word denotes a movement to and fro, swinging, 'waving,' the priest lifting his share of the viclencing up and down in the direction of the altar, thus symbolizing the presentation of the part of J's sacrifice, and J's return of it to the priest. It is applied specially to the breast of the sacrificial victim, hence terms like wave offering or 'wave offering' (Ex 29:14), or more tersely the 'wave breast' (Lv 7:24 10 iv). Further, like tārāmāh, lēḇāphō is also used in the more general sense of 'offering' (Ex 33:11; cf. Nu 8:13 of the Levites, where the change from 'offering' (AV) to 'wave offering' (RV) is not an improvement).

(14) The last entry in this vocabulary of OT sacrifice is reserved for the obscure term of the memorial offering, applied especially to the handful of the cereal offering burnt by the priest upon the altar (Lv 21:2, 5, etc., EV 'memorial'). According to the usual, but certainly, derivation of the term (akin to 'remember'), the 'azkāḏāh is understood as an offering designed to bring the offerer to J's remembrance.

3. SACRIFICE AND OFFERING IN THE PRE-EXILIC PERIOD.—The history of OT sacrifice, like the history of the religion of Israel of which it is the most characteristic expression, falls into two main divisions, the first embracing the period from Moses to the end of the monarchy (b.c. 586), the second period from the Babylonian exile to the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. For the latter period we have the advantage of the more or less systematic presentation of the subject in the various strata of the complex legislation of P (Pentateuch). The first period we must have recourse to the numerous references to sacrifice in the non-Priestly sources of the Pentateuch, in the early narratives of the historical books, and in the writings of the pre-exilic prophets.

Now, according to J, sacrifice as an institution is as old as the human race itself (Gn 4:4). In this significant narrative, sacrifice appears as the spontaneous expression of man's need of God, who, made of every nation of men that he looks upon 'a goodly race,' ('Gen 10:29'), that they might feel after him and find him' (Ac 17:24 RV).
Our study of the terminology of sacrifice has shown that the dominant conception of sacrifice is that of a gift presented first to last in that of a gift, or offering. The object of the gift, reduced to its simplest terms, may be said to be threefold—to secure and retain the favour of J, to remove his displeasure incurred, and to express gratitude for benefits received. In this, Hebrew sacrifice differed from sacrifice elsewhere, even in the lowest religions, only in respect of the deity to whom it was offered.

The sacrificial worship of the earlier differs from that of the later period mainly in the greater freedom as regards the occasion and in particular the place of sacrifice, in the greater simplicity of the ritual, and in the joyousness of the cult as compared with the more sombre atmosphere of the post-exilic worship, due to a deepened sense of sin and the accompanying conviction of the need of expiation.

As regards, first of all, the place of sacrifice, every village appears to have had its sanctuary or 'high place' with its altar and other appurtenances of the cult, on which the recent excavations have thrown so much new light (see J.G. and S.G.). There it that sacrifice could be offered at any spot the worshipper might choose; it must be one hallowed by the tradition of a theophany: 'in every place where I record my name I will come to thee and I will bless thee' (Ex 20:24, RV). With the abolition of the local sanctuaries by Josiah in B.C. 622-21, the Temple at Jerusalem became, and henceforth remained, the only legitimate place of sacrifice as required by the legislation of Deuteronomy (12-15).

The occasions of sacrifice were manifold, and in the days of the local sanctuaries, which practically means to the post-exilic period, under which these occasions were naturally taken advantage of to an extent impossible when sacrifice was confined to the Temple of Jerusalem. Only a few of such occasions, whether stated or special, can be noted here. Of the regular or stated occasions may be named the daily sacrifices of the Temple—a burnt offering in the morning followed by a cereal offering in the afternoon (2 K 16 v, 1 K 15 v, 8 v, which, however, may refer to one or more of the large sanctuaries of the Northern Kingdom. e.g. Bethel or Shomaril, the 'yearly sacrifice' of the various clans (1 S 20 v), those at the recurring festivals, such as the new moon and the three agricultural feasts (Ex 23:4 v, 34 v), at which the oldest legislation laid down that 'none shall appear before me empty' (23:13, 34:20), that is, without an offering in token of gratitude and homage. Still more numerous were the special occasions of sacrifice—the installation of a king (1 S 11 v, the arrival of an honoured guest, family events such as the weaning of a child, a circumcision, a marriage, the dedication of a house (Dt 26 v); no compact or agreement was completed until sealed by a sacrifice (Gn 31 v etc.); at the opening of a campaign the warriors were 'consecrated' by a sacrifice (1 S 13 v, 1 S 13 v, RV). One of the most fruitful occasions of sacrifice was undoubtedly the discharging of a vow, of which those of Jacob (Gn 28 v-22, Jephthah (see 5), Hannah (1 S 11 v), and Absalom (2 S 15 v) may be cited as typical specimens, just as in Syria to-day, among felakim and new, similar vows are made to the local shrines by, or on behalf of sick persons, childless women, or to avert or remove plague or other threatened calamity.

4. THE VARIETIES AND MATERIAL OF SACRIFICE IN THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD. Three varieties of sacrifice are met with in the older Hebrew literature, viz. the burnt offering, the 'peace' offering, and the cereal or 'meal' offering. The two former, appearing sometimes as 'burnt offerings and sacrifices' (Ex 12:3, Jer 7:19 etc.), sometimes as 'burnt offerings and peace offerings' (Ex 24 v, 1 S 13 v etc.), exhaust the category of animal sacrifices, the special 'sin' and 'guilt' offerings being first definitely named by Ezekiel (see §§ 13–15). The typical animal offering in the pre-exilic period is that now termed the 'peace offering' (Am 5 v) to differentiate it more clearly from the burnt offering, now still more explicitly 'sacrifice of peace offerings' (perhaps rather 'of reconciliation,' chibhorah, § 5). Almost all the special offerings and most of the stated ones were of this type. Its distinguishing feature was the sacrificial meal, which followed the sacrifice proper. When the blood had been returned to the life (we have no details as to the manipulation of the blood in the earliest period, but see Ps 145 v, 19, and the fat burned upon the altar (1 S 2 v; cf. Is 18 v), the flesh of the victims was eaten by the priest and his family (1 S 11 v) or, in the case of a communal offering, by the representatives of the community (13-22). The last passage shows that a special 'guest-chamber' was provided at the 'high place' for this purpose.

The underlying idea of this, by far the commonest, form of sacrifice was that of sharing a common meal with the deity. The worshippers were the 'guests' (Zeph 1 v) of God at His sanctuary, and as such secure of His favour. To this day among the Arabs 'the act of eating together is regarded as something particularly solemn and sacred,' and, as is well known, creates a bond of intimacy between guest and host (see note on) imposes upon the latter the duty of protecting his guest so long as, in Arab phrase, 'his salt is in his belly' (see Jaussen, Coutumes des Arabes [1908], 86–88). This is the bond of table communion, it is as it is termed, in accordance with the Semitic idiom: 'none which may be reckoned a common possession of the Semitic stock. Even to St. Paul the eating of meat that had been sacrificed to heathen deities appeared as one of the acts of communion (AV 'fellowship') with demons' (1 Co 10 v, Amer. RV). References to this solemn— one might almost say sacramental—eating of the sacrifice are too frequent to require citation, but we may recall the favourite expression of Deuteronomy, 'ye shall eat and (drink) before the Lord your God' (12 v, etc.), often followed by the equally characteristic 'ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God.' Here we meet with the dominant note of Hebrew worship in this period, the note of joyousness above referred to—an element which not infrequently led to the excesses deplored by the prophets.

Much less frequent in the older documents is the mention of the burnt offering, more precise than the peace offering (see above, § 2). The fact that the whole was consumed upon the altar enhanced its value as a 'holy gift,' and accordingly we find it offered when the occasion was one of special solemnity (Gn 33 v, 1 K 3 v etc.), or was otherwise extraordinary, as e.g. 1 S 6 v. In most cases the burnt offering appears in conjunction with the ordinary 'sacrifice' above described (Ex 18 v, 1 S 11 v, 1 S 11 v, 2 S 6 v, 2 K 11 v, Is 1 v, Jer 7 v, 179 v).

Apart from the special offering of the first-fruit, the cereal or meal offering (AV 'meat offering' § 2) is rarely mentioned as an independent offering in this period, but is frequently named along with the two more important offerings discussed above, as Jg 13 v, Am 5 v, Jer 14 v (with the burnt offering), 1 S 22 v, 3 v, Is 19 v (EV 'oblation'), and often, 'When the Hebrew ate flesh, he ate bread with it and drank wine, and when he offered flesh upon the altar of his God, it was natural that she should add to it the same concomitants that were necessary to make up a comfortable and generous meal' (RSV 222). The various forms which the meal offering might assume are attested in the post-exilic period by Lv 2, for which see § 11. One form occurring there is undoubtedly ancient, viz. parched ears of corn (2 v; cf. Foon, § 2).

Another very ancient form of offering, although not an altar-offering in the strict sense (yet strangely reckoned among the fire offerings, Lv 24 v), is that named the presence bread (EV 'showbread'), which perpetuates the primitive idea of an offering as a meal for the deity (1 S 21*14, 1 K 7*8). The mention in a later passage of 'the flagons thereof and the bowls thereof to pour out withal' (Ex 25*28, see, further, Subsection) shows that, as for an ordinary meal, the 'holy bread' was accompanied by a provision of wine, in other words by a drink offering. This species of offerings occurs as an independent offering only in Gn 25*4. The skins of goats mentioned in 1 S 1*4 10* doubtless served in part for a drink or 'wine offering' (Hos 9*8), in part, like the accompanying flour and leaven, for the sacrificial meal. More explicit reference to the wine of the drink offering as an accompaniment of animal sacrifice is found in Jt 25*9 (cf. the early reference, Jg 9*4, to wine 'which cheereth God'). For the ritual of the later drink offering, see § 11. It is significant of the predominant part played by the drink offering in early Babylonian ritual, that the word for libation (miqve) has there become the usual term for sacrifice (K'AT 595).

A water offering appears only in the isolated cases 1 S 7*7, 2 S 23*8, but emerges as an interesting survival in the rites of the Feast of Tabernacles (wh. sec.). Honey, although offered among the first-fruits (2 Ch 31*18), was customarily given with milk, and was served from the 'altar' (the 2*4; see also Lev 2*16).

5. MATERIAL AND RITUAL OF SACRIFICE IN THIS PERIOD—From the details just given it is evident that 'among the Hebrew offerings drawn from the vegetable kingdom, meal, wine, and oil take the chief place, and those were also the chief vegetable constituents of man's daily food' (Ps 2*9 21*9). The remark holds good of the animal sacrifices, which were drawn chiefly from 'the herd,' i.e. neat cattle, and from the 'flock,' i.e. sheep and goats. Excluded from these, on the other hand, were unclean animals, but also game and fish, which, not being reared by man, were probably regarded as God's special property, and therefore inadmissible as a present from man. This idea that only what was man's 'very own' constituted an appropriate sacrifice is reflected in David's words to Araunah, 2 S 2 24* (offerings 'which cost me nothing' RV).

Males of the various species,—a heifer is mentioned in connexion with ordinary sacrifice only 1 S 16*9 (Gn 14*19, 1 K 21*16, 1 S 6*4 do not belong to this category),—and of these, yearlings, as in the earlier legislation, were doubtless the commonest victims, although we read of 'a bull of three years old' (1 S 1*4, see Ps 8*11, RV 'corrupt,' 'seven years old').

The question of human sacrifice cannot be passed over, even in this brief sketch of a vast subject. The recent excavations at Gezer and elsewhere (see Hoh Pl, 2*8) have revealed the surprising extent to which this practice prevailed among the Canaanites (cf. 2 K 3*9), and well-attested instances are recorded even among the Hebrews (Jg 11*10-14, 1 K 16*4 RV, for which see Hoh Pl, § 2), apart altogether from the child sacrifices to Moloch. Indeed, the familiar story of Abraham's frustrated sacrifice of Isaac is now regarded as a polemic against this inhuman custom, which certainly had no sanction in the religion of O.T.

As regards the ritual of sacrifice in this period, we have little information. 1 S 28*4-14 being the only passage that touches definitely on this subject. This much is certain, that much greater latitude prevailed while the locum; Ex 26*13 is corroborated even afterwards; and also, that the priest played a much less conspicuous part in the rite than he does in the developed system of the Priests' Code. The chief function of the priest in the earliest times was to give direction (torah) by means of the oracle, and to decide in matters pertaining to the sphere of 'clean and unclean.' The layman— as father of the family or head of the clan, still more the anointed king—offered his sacrifice without the intervention of the priest. The latter, however, as the custodian of the sanctuary, was entitled to his due (see 1 S 2*4, 1 K 18*9). At the more frequented sanctuaries—Jerusalem, Bethel, Beersheba, etc.—a more or less elaborate ritual was gradually evolved, for which the priest, as its depository, became indispensable.

But even from the first the deity had to be approached with due precaution. The worshippers sacrificed themselves by ablution (1 S 18*9), and by washing (Ex 19*19) or changing their garments (Gn 19*5); for only those who were ceremonially 'clean' could approach the altar of J.' The sacrificer then entered the high place and immolated the animal sacrifice found in Jt 25*10 (cf. the early reference, Jg 9*4, to wine 'which cheereth God'). For the ritual of the later drink offering, see § 11.

While the normal attitude of the worshippers on such occasions was one of rejoicing, as became those who, thus renewing their covenant relation with their Lord in accordance with the divine appointment, felt themselves secure of His favour and protection, a more serious note, implying a sense of alienation and the need of propitiation, is introduced into the exilic sacrifice, as will appear in a later section (§ 13).

6. THE DEVELOPED SACRIFICIAL SYSTEM OF THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD—ITS GENERAL FEATURES. In an earlier section it was shown how the cult, connected with the everyday life of the family were the free, joyous sacrifices at the local sanctuaries. The abolition of the latter by Josiah, in accordance with the demands of Deuteronomy (for the justification of this measure, see Hoh Pl, § 6), marks an epoch in the history of the sacrifice. Hitherto every slaughter of a domestic animal for the entertainment of a guest, or to celebrate a family 'event,' was a form of sacrifice (for a remarkable list and description of such 'immolations' as performed by the Arabs of Moab at the present, see Jaussen, Coutumes des Arabes au pays de Moab [1908], 337-363). Henceforward this was no longer so. The restriction of the 'ultimate sacrifice' to the one distant locality, Jerusalem, meant in practice the divorce from common life of the principal rite of religion. The Temple, from being only one, although certainly the most important, of the local sanctuaries of Judah, became the one central sanctuary; the cultus assumed an official character, while its dignity was enhanced by the presence of a numerous priesthood and a more elaborate ritual. Sacrifice, in short, lost its former spontaneity and became a statutory obligation. The Jewish nation had taken the first step towards becoming the Jewish Church. A still more potent factor, making for change, soon appeared in the shape of the crushing calamity of the Exile. Then, at last, the world which came home to men's hearts and minds, and it was recognized that the nation had received due reward of its deeds. A deepened sense of sin and a heightened conception of the Divine holiness were on the most precious fruits of the discipline of the Exile. The confident assurance of J.'s protection and good-will, which marked the relations of worshipper and worshipped in the days of Israel's prosperity, had passed away. In its place rose a conviction of the need of expiation and propitiation—a conviction reflected in the whole sacrificial system, as gradually systematized and elaborated, on the basis of the usage of the Temple, by successive generations.

of Priestly writers from Ezekiel onwards. In its fully developed form, as we find it in the middle books of the Pentateuch, we see how the cultus as a whole has become the affair of the community: the old sacral units, the family and the clan, have disappeared.

Great—once it was tempted to say, the main stress is now laid on the technique of sacrifice, on the proper observance of the prescribed ritual, the slightest want of conformity thereto invalidates the sacrifice; the old latitude and freedom are gone for ever. The necessary corollary is the enhanced status and importance of the priest as the indispensable intermediary between the worshipper and the Deity. Beyond immolating the victims, the laity are no longer competent to perform the sacrificial rites. The relative importance of the two sectors, public and private, is reversed. The typical sacrifice is no longer the latter with its accompanying meal, but the 'continual burnt offering,' an act of worship performed every morning and evening in the Temple in the name of the community, whose presence is unnecessary for its due performance. Still more characteristic of the later period, however, is the emergence of special propitiatory sacrifices (piqulot)—the allied sin offering and guilt offering. Though the categories of sacrifices, though still retained, their propitiatory efficacy are no longer sufficient to express and adequately to satisfy the new consciousness of man's sinfulness, or, more accurately expressed, of God's exacting holiness.

7. The Five Kinds of Altar-offerings in E.—The numerous altar-offerings mentioned in the various strata of the Priestly legislation are divided by Josephus into two classes: (i) those offered 'for private persons,' and (ii) those offered 'for the people in general,'—a classification corresponding to the Roman sacrificia privata and sacrificia publica (Ant. iii. 1. 1). The public sacrifices were offered on special occasions or on a regular basis by the former any of the important group comprising the daily burnt offering (see § 10) and the additional sacrifices at the stated festivals—Sabbath, New Moon, New Year, the three great feasts, and the Day of Atonement.

Since it is impossible within present limits to attempt to enumerate, much less to discuss, the multifarious varieties and occasions of public and private sacrifices, it will be more convenient to follow, as before, the order of the five distinct kinds as given in the systematic manual, Lv 1—7. These are (1) the burnt offering, (2) the cereal or meat (AV 'meat') offering, (3) the peace offering and the two propitiatory sacrifices, (4) the sin offering, and (5) the guilt (AV 'trespass') offering.

Arranged according to the material of the offering, these fell into two groups represented by the terms 'sacrifice' and 'offering' (§ 1); in other words, into animal and vegetable or cereal offerings (including the drink offering). The four animal or bloody offerings may be classified according to the destination of the flesh of the victim, thus (cf. the relative §§ below)—

(i) The flesh entirely consumed upon the altar—the burnt or whole offering.

(ii) The flesh not consumed upon the altar—the peace offerings and the two propitiatory offerings.

The second group may again be subdivided thus—

(c) The flesh apart from the priest's dues, assigned to the offerer for a sacrificial meal—the peace offering.

(2) The flesh assigned to the priests to be eaten within the sanctuary—the guilt offerings and the less important of the sin offerings.

(c) The flesh burned without the sanctuary—the more important sin offerings.

8. The Material of Sacrifice in E.—'Holy' and 'sacred.'—The material of all is the same as in the pre-exilic period (§ 5), with the exception of pigeons and turtle-doves to meet the needs of the poor, but the victim for each special kind of sacrifice, and its quality, are now definitely prescribed. As regards meat and small cattle, the victims must be males for the most part, entire and without blemish (see Lv 22 for list of imperfections—an exception, however, was made for the freewill offering, v. 5). For the peace offering both sexes were equally admissible (3'), and a female victim is specially prescribed for the less important sin offerings (47'). The animals were eligible for sacrifice from the eighth day onwards (22'), but the typical sacrifice was the yearling. For the material of the cereal offerings see below.

Here may be noted an interesting contrast between such offerings as were regarded as merely 'holy' and those reckoned 'most holy.' The limits of the former category are somewhat vague, but it certainly included firstlings and first-fruits, the tithe and the portions of the peace offerings falling to the priests, whereas the shewbread (Lv 24), the sacred incense (Ex 30), the meal offering (Lv 2), and the sin and guilt offerings (16'), are all classed as 'most holy.' One practical effect of the distinction was that the 'most holy things' could be eaten only by the priests, and by them only within the Temple precincts (16', Nu 18'; cf. Ezek 44 15). In the sacrificial list with a special potency of holiness, which was highly contagious, the 'most holy things'—there were many other entries in the category, such as the altar and the high priest's dress—rendered all who came in contact with them 'holy.' In modern phrase 'taboo' (Lv 16', 27). The 'holy things,' on the other hand, might be eaten by the priests and their households, if ceremonially clean, in any 'clean place,' practically in Jerus. (16' 36)."

—of these upon the altar of burnt offering, the fire on which was kept continually burning (Lv 6:1). Of these various elements of the ritual, those requiring contact with the altar as a 'most holy thing,' viz. (4), (6), and (7), represent the priest's, the rest the layman's, share in the rite of sacrifice.

10. The burnt offering (Lv 1:1-9, 11-17; Ex 29:39-43; Nu 28-29).—This type is the most elementary of sacrifices. Lv 1-7, is occupied by the sacrifice which was alone entirely consumed upon the altar, hence the older and more correct designation 'whole offering' (§ 2)—a feature which constituted it the typical holocaust sacrifice, the fullest expression of homage to Jh on the part alike of the community and of the individual. The victim from the flock and the herd was always a male—young bull, ram, or he-goat. The turtle-dove and the young pigeon of the poor had their special ritual (114-14). The most important of the stated sacrifices in the period under review was the 'continual burnt offering' (Ex 29:11-28, Nu 28-29), so called because it was presented every morning and evening along with a cereal oblation by the particular 'course' of priests on duty in the Temple. The victim was a yearling lamb, which was offered on behalf of the whole community of Israel throughout the world. An initial of the primitive anthropomorphic conception of sacrifice, as affording a complete meal to the deity, is seen in the provision that every burnt offering (as also every peace offering) must be accompanied by both a meal offering and a drink offering (see next §).

11. The meal (AV meat) offering (Lv 2:1-3; Nu 15:1-18 etc.).—As pointed out in an early section, the term minchah, which originally was applicable both to a meal offering and to a cereal offering, in the later legislation limited to the latter species. As such it appears in a large variety of forms, and may be either an independent offering, as contemplated in Lv 2, or, as in most cases, an accompaniment of the burnt and peace offerings (Nu 15:14-18). One of the oldest forms of the minchah was, undoubtedly, the 'meal offering of first-fruits,' as described Lv 22:14; another antique form survived in the unique offering of barley meal in the jealousy offering (Nu 5:2). As an ordinary altar-offering the minchah consisted of 'fine flour,' and was presented either cooked or uncooked, as prescribed in cfr. Lv 2:1-3. In the latter case the flour was placed in a vessel and mixed with oil, the equivalent of our butter in matters culinary. The dough was then covered with frankincense, when it was ready for presentation at the altar. The priest took off all the frankincense, then removed a handful, which he put into another vessel, added salt, the un-failing accompaniment of every species of altar-offering (29, Mk 9:45), and the frankincense, and proceeded to burn the whole upon the altar. The portion burned was termed the 'azizarah (§ 2), or 'memorial' (see EV from Vulg. memoriale). The remainder of the offering fell to the priest, by whom it was eaten as 'a thing holy' (§ 8). The priest's own meal offerings, on the other hand, were wholly burned (Lv 6:9).

In Nu 15:14 and elsewhere, minute instructions are given as to the precise amounts of fine flour, oil, and wine which should accompany the burnt and peace offerings (cf. Ezk 46:1-3 and the tabular comparison of the quantities in the two passages in Gray, 'Numbers' [ICC], 170). These were regulated by the importance of the animal sacrificed, the drink or wine offering (Hos 9:4), for example, being uniformly ⅓ hin for a bullock, ⅔ hin for a ram, and ⅔ hin for a lamb—the hin may be taken approximately as 12 pints.

No instructions have been preserved as to how the wine was to be offered, but from later evidence it appears that, like the blood, it was 'poured out at the foot of the altar' (Sir 50:12; cf. Jos. Ant. i. 11. 4). For the importance of incense in the later ritual, see Incense.

12. The peace or thank offering (Lv 3:1-3; 7:1-4; 8:1-33; 9:3-4). The latter rendering, which is that of Rvms., is nearer what we consider to be the meaning of the original term, 'sacrifice of recompense' (§ 2). It distinguishes two features continued to be the sacrificial meal which followed the actual sacrifice. Three varieties are named—(a) the thanksgiving offering (26. ṣōḥāh, also rendered 'thanksgiving' in the younger senses, 2 Ch 30:27) in some manuals more particularly mercy; (b) the votive offering (EV 'vow', Lv 7:16), in discharge of a vow; and (c) the freewill offering, a spontaneous and unsolicited recognition of God's goodness. The last was clearly of less importance than the others, since for it alone imperfect victims were admitted to the altar (229). As a fourth variety may be reckoned (d) the priests' installation offering (Ex 29:38-39).

The modus operandi was essentially the same as for the burnt offering.—female victims, however, being admitted equally with males. Special instructions are given as to the removal of the fat adhering to the inward (see the coloured illustrations in S.D.F. 'Levit., in loco., along with the 'cail of the liver,' i.e. the caudate lobe (G. F. Moore; see E.B. iv. col. 4206, and the ref. in Orz. Heb. Lex. 1124)), and the two kidneys. The parts falling to the priest, the breast and the right hind leg—these varied at different times, cf. Dt 8:8 with Ex 29:40, Lv 7:24—were symbolically presented to and returned by Jh, by being 'waved' towards the altar (see § 2 for this custom, and the expressions 'beave thalith' and 'wave breast'). The fat was then salted and burned, while the remainder of the flesh furnished the characteristic meal. Both sexes, if ceremonially clean, might partake of this meal, but only on the day of the sacrifice, or the next day (Lv 7:13-19). The flesh of the special thanksgiving offering (ṣōḥāh), however, had to be eaten on the day it was offered (7:22-23).

13. The special propitiatory sacrifices.—The sin offering and the guilt offering.—One of the characteristic features of the later period, as has already been pointed out, is the stress laid on the propitiatory aspect of sacrifice. It is not, of course, to be supposed that this element was absent in the earlier period. Such passages as 1 S 31:21, 2 S 24:25, Mic 6:6 and others prove the contrary, even were it not the fact that the idea of propitiating the unseen power is one lying at the root of all sacrifice (see above, § 3). But, as shown by the passages now cited, expiation and propitiation were sought through the medium of the ordinary sacrifices. The special propitiatory sacrifices with which we have now to deal will form the main topic of the present section in the dark days which preceded the fall of the Jewish monarchy, although, so far as our literary evidence goes, Ezekiel is the first to differentiate them by name, as the 'zakath' (sin) and the 'ṣōḥāh (guilt), from the older types of offering (409 423 etc.).

The study of these newer sacrifices is complicated, in the first place, by the divergent regulations found in the different sections of the compiled Pentateuch, which seem to reflect the practice of different periods, or perhaps the views of different schools; and, in the second place, by the consequent difficulty of detecting a clear line of demarcation between the burnt and two allied offerings (see § 15). From the point of view of ritual, the chief points of difference are these: (1) In the guilt offering the manipulation of the blood agrees with that prescribed for the older sacrifices; in the sin offering, on the other hand, the blood ritual is more complicated and varies in intensity according to the theocratic and social position of the offerer. This feature alone is sufficient to distinguish the sin offering as par excellence for propitiatory purposes from the burnt and atonement (Lv 1:4); (2) For the guilt offering the victim is uniformly a ram ('the ram of atonement,' Nu 5); for the sin offering the victim varies according to the same principle as the blood ritual, the higher the position of the offerer in the theocratic community the more valuable the victim. On the other hand, both agree as compared with the older sacrifices: (1) in the disposal of the flesh of the sacrifice in a manner as nothing entirely burned on the altar it is in the whole offering, nor assigned to the offerer for a sacred meal in the peace offering, but was otherwise disposed of (see next §§); and (2) in the absence of the cereal and wine offerings which are the regular accompaniments of the other animal sacrifices.

14. The sin offering (Lv 4—5; De 33, Ex 29:11—14, Nu 15:25—29 etc.).—Leaving aside the question of the relation of these sections to each other as to origin and date—all-important as this is for the evolution of the sin offering—we find from a comparison of Lv 4, 5—14, the most systematic as it is probably the latest exposition of the subject, with other sections of the code where this special sacrifice is required, a prescribed medium of expiation for two main classes of offences. Three are (a) sins committed in ignorance or by inadvertence (4:16—17, Nu 15:25—29) as opposed to sins committed with a high hand (5:26, RV), i.e., in conscious and willful defiance of the Divine law, for which no sacrifice could stone; (b) cases of defilement or uncleanness, contracted in various ways and having nothing to do with 'sin' in the moral sense of the word, of the moral law, such as the defilement of childbirth and of leprosy, the uncleanness of the altar and the like.

At this point it will repay us to examine the origin of the term chattát, omitted from § 2, as likely to afford a clue to the true significance of the sacrifice. Derived from the verb 'to sin' in the sense of 'to like' (the mark or the way), chattát denotes sin, then a sacrifice for sin. It may be questioned, however, whether this transference of meaning was as direct as is usually implied. The intensive sense of the root-word are repeatedly used in the 'positive' sense best expressed by 'to unsin' (Germ. entsündig- en) by some rite of purification, as Lv 5:5, Ex 29:20, of 'unsinning,' i.e., purifying or purging the altar; Nu 19:10, of 'unsinning' a person defined by contact with a corpse; 8:6, the Levites unsinned themselves (RV purified themselves from sin) and washed their clothes, where the 'sin' of RV refers only to ceremonial uncleanness. From this usage of the verb, chattát itself, as used to the sacrifices prescribed, is 'purification,' e.g., Nu 8:7 (AV rightly 'water of purifying'—RV 'expulsion') and 19—21, where the red heifer and her ashes are described as a chattát, that is, as means of removing the uncleanness caused by the dead. It follows from the above that 'purification offering' better expresses to the modern mind the purposes of the chattát than does 'sin offering,' with its misleading associations.

The various considerations lead up directly to the heart of the sacrificial doctrine, if the term may be allowed, of Ezekiel and the Priests’ Code. Sacrifice is the Divinely appointed medium through which the holy community is to be maintained. God’s all-devouring holiness requires that the people shall keep themselves free not only from sin, but also from every form of defilement that would interrupt the relations between themselves and God. In the sphere of morals only ‘unwitting faults’ are contemplated, for ‘these are the only faults of which the redeemed and restored people will be guilty’ (A. B. Davidson), and, in so far as the ritual of the sin offering provides for their expiation, these sins of inadvertence are conceived as defiling the sinner who, because of his uncleanness, becomes a source of danger to the community. From this point of view, the sin offering in the victim presented first becomes intelligible; for the higher the theocratic rank of the sinner, the greater, according to the antique view of the concept of both of holiness and of uncleanness, is his power of contamination. It is to be noted, finally, that the order is first the removal of the defilement by means of the sacrifice, and then the Divine forgiveness of his sin as a moral offence (see Lv 4:3—4, a. 4).

Returning to Lv 4—5, we find that, apart from the gradation of the prescribed victims already referred to, the main feature in the ritual of the sin offering is the more intense application of the blood. In this respect two grades of sin offering are distinguished, a higher and a lower. In the higher grade, which comprises the purifying of the high priest and that of the ‘whole congregation,’ the blood is carried by the officiating priest into the Holy Place of the Tent of Meeting—in practice the Temple. There some of it is sprinkled with the finger seven times before the veil, and some applied to the horns of the altar of incense, while the rest is poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering. The victim in both cases is a young bull, the flesh of which is so sacrosanct that it has to be burned without the camp. In the lower grade, which is performed upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, while the rest was poured out, as before, at its base. It is interesting to note, as bearing on the evolution of the ritual, that in a presumably older stratum of P (Ex 29:13—14) the blood ritual, even for the high priest’s offering, does not exceed that of the lower grade of Lv 4. The flesh of the latter, which was also ‘most holy,’ was eaten by the priests within the sanctuary (6:23—24). To meet the requirements of the poor man, provision was made for the admission of ‘two turtle-doves or two young pigeons,’ and in cases of extreme poverty of ‘the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour’ (about 7 pints), offered without oil and without incense (31:13).

If the conclusion reached above be accepted, that the chattát is essentially a sacrifice of purification, it is evident that the victim cannot be regarded here, any more than in the other sacrifices, as the all-devouring ‘sacrifice of atonement,’ any more than in the other sacrifices, as the all-devouring ‘sacrifice of atonement,’ or ‘sacrifice for the remission of sins’ (cf. 5:14—15). Taking the most explicit of the passages, however, Lv 6:1—6, we see that the guilt offering deals with the misappropriation of the property of another. In 5:14—15 this misappropriation takes the form of unwittingly withholding part of the sacred dues, ‘the holy things of the Lord.’ In both cases the offender has to restore the property or due withheld, together with a fine amounting to one-fifth of its value for the loss sustained, and to offer a sacrifice as expiation of his breach of faith (5:9, RV ‘trespass’). Provision is also made for a public confession (Nu 5:7). The victim in these typical cases is invariably a ram, and the ritual is that of the ordinary sacrifices, except that the flesh can be eaten, like that of the lower grade of sin offerings, only by the priests in a holy place.

For the various occasions on which one or more of the five varieties of sacrifice above enumerated had to be offered, see, among others, the following articles:—

atonement [Day of], clean and unclean, covenant, frasins, nazirites, tythes, vow, etc.

16. The significance of sacrifice in OT.—The origin and significance of sacrifice is a problem on which students of religion are still greatly divided. So far as the OT student is concerned, the question of origins does not necessarily arise, for the institution of sacrifice had already a long life behind it when the Hebrew tribes first entered upon the stage of history. One fact, at least, seems to be well established. The ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Arabs of the present day, had no ‘offerings made by fire,’ but were content to pour the blood over the sacred stone without burning any part of the flesh. (For the view that the Hebrews of the historic period still retained a recollection of this older custom, see Kittel, Studien zur heb. Archäologie [1908], 96--108. For the rest the wisest word recently spoken on this subject is that of the late Professor Stade (Bibl. Theol. d. AT, 156): 'The sacrificial worship of ancient Israel is a very complicated phenomenon, which is not always easy to put out of one's hands, but it is by no means to be derived from a single fundamental idea (aus einem Grundgedanken). Let us proceed to illustrate this word of wisdom.

(q) The first period covered by the OT literature, sacrifice, as the terminology proves (see § 1), was thought of as a gift or present to God. The motives which prompted the gifts are nowhere stated in so many words, but may be clearly inferred. In the earliest period, the gift was offered, as we may say, in token of homage, now as an expression of gratitude for benefits received; again, particularly in the very numerous cases of vows, with a view to obtain a coveted boon, for among the Hebrews as among the Greeks it was believed that 'gifts persuade the gods, gifts the revered kings.' We are not surprised, therefore, to find in the oldest Hebrew law-codes the command that none should eat before its owner, that is, without a gift (Ex 23: 19, 34). From first to last, the OT witnesses to this 'conviction that the gift of piety really produces a gratifying, propitious, and in the end conciliatory effect on God' (Schultz, 'Significance of Sacrifice in OT,' AJTh iv. 284).

The form which these 'gifts of piety' assumed was chiefly that of food. The Hebrew offered to God of the things with which his own table was furnished, and these only of the best. This is the nature of the sacrifice as 'the food (EV 'bread') of God' is still found as an interesting survival in the later literature (Ezk 44: 1, LXX 2: 21 etc.). Cf. 'my food' (Nu 28: 9), the table of the Lord (2 Cor 8: 10, and the institution of the shewbread. In the historical period, as we have seen, this food of God was always 'etherealized' by being converted into 'sweet smoke' upon the altar; it thus became, in the later language, a sacrifice of 'a sweet savour' unto the Lord. Cf. I S 25: 16 'let him accept (lit. smell) an offering' (as a propitiatory).

(b) But this antique conception of sacrifice as the food of the deity by no means exhausts its significance to the Hebrew mind. The typical sacrifice in the pre-exilic period was the peace offering, of which the characteristic feature was the common meal which followed the actual sacrifice. The OT is silent regarding the significance to the Hebrew worshipper of this part of the sacrificial worship. Robertson Smith, as every student knows, would have us see in this 'act of communion in which the god and his worshippers united by partaking of the flesh and blood of a sacred victim' (RS 226 f., and passim), the unconscious survival of the sacramental eating of their god by the members of the totem clan of pre-historic days. This is not the place to enumerate the difficulties of this theory when applied to Semitic sacrifice, the absence of convincing proof of the existence of totemism in the Semitic field being not the least of these.

It is more natural, as suggested above (§ 4), to recognize in the Hebrew sacrificial feast a transference to the sphere of religion of the Semitic idea of the friendship and fellowship which are formed and cemented by participation at a common meal; a meal at which, as guests of God, the common meal of which the worshipped and the worshippers partook within the sanctuary, the latter renewed the bond which united them to their covenant God; they 'ate and drank before the Lord' in full assurance of the continuance of all the blessings which the covenant relation implied.

(c) In the later period of Jewish history, this conception of sacrifice as a table-communion with the deity seemed in favour of another, to which less prominence was given in the early period. And in which, as has been pointed out (§ 14), sacrifice was regarded as the first and most important of the Divinely appointed means by which the ideal relation of a holy God to a holy people was to be maintained unimpaired. For inadvertent omissions and transgressions, and for all cases of serious ceremonial defilements, which interrupted this ideal relation, sacrifice in its different forms—not the special propitiatory offerings merely—is said to 'make atonement.'

The Heb. is, tipper, of which the original signification is still uncertain. But whether this be 'to cover' or 'to wipe off,' it gives little help in deciding the special meaning of the word in the terminology of sacrifice. And here it is used in either of the senses given above, but always in close connexion with the verbs signifying 'to purify' (dorah) and to 'unsin' (chatit)—terms belonging specially to the terminology of purification (see § 14). Applied to material objects, such as the altar: 'altar is little more than a synonym of doreh and chait,' applied to persons, it is the summary expression of the rites by which the offender against the holiness of God is made fit to receive the Divine forgiveness and to be re-admitted to the fellowship and worship of the theocratic community. The agent is the priest, who performs the propitiatory rites on behalf of the offender. The words in italics, though they are, fairly express the meaning of this much discussed term of the Heb. ritual (see, further, Driver's exhaustive discussion of the phrase in Hastings' DB iv. esp. p. 131, on the difficulty of finding a satisfactory English rendering). See, further, the small print in § 14.

Now, although it is true, as G. F. Moore reminds us (EBi iv. 4218), that 'the whole public cultus is a means of propitiating God and obtaining remission of the blood uncleanness' (Ezk 45: 17), it is equally true that the propitiatory efficacy of sacrifice is represented by the Priestly writers as especially bound up with the blood of sacrifice, the sacrificial viaticum. When we speak of the efficacy of the blood, the comparison with the life of a plant is obvious. In virtue of what property does the blood make atonement? we find the answer incidentally in the oft-quoted passage Lv 17: 14. We say incidentally, because v. 11 ('a person whose flesh is the flesh of a sin offering') is not an efficient question—Why is blood taboo as an article of food? Now the verse runs in RV: 'For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul of the life'. Strictly speaking, therefore, it is not the blood but the life that is in it that is the medium of propitiation. Beyond this we cannot go in our search for the explanation of the 'how' of atonement on OT ground.

Along other and extra-Biblical lines students have diligently sought for the ultimate basis of this efficacy of blood. It is doubted whether this blood can be the almost universal belief that blood is a fluid in which inheres a mysterious potency, no less dangerous when misused than efficacious when properly employed (G. F. Moore, EBi iv. 4218; cf. Trumbull, The Blood Covenant, passim; and Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, 94 ff.). Just because of its 'mysterious potency,' and its association with the 'great primal mysteries of life and death' (Farnell), blood was felt to be too sacred, and indeed too dangerous (see I S 14: 14), to be used otherwise than as the proper due of the Author of all life. It was at once the most persuasive of gifts at His altar, and the most potent cathartic by which the sinner was purged of uncleanness and sin.

The traditional view that the blood of the sacrifice atoned for the sins of the offerer, because the victim suffered the death which the sinner had incurred, is now generally maintained. As theory of a zona vicaria is untenable for these among other reasons: (1) The sins for which the OT sacrifices made atonement were not such as involved the penalty of death (§ 16). (2) Had the guilt of the offerer been transferred to the victim by the laying on of hands, the blood of this rite, see § 9—the flesh of the sacrifice would have been in the highest degree unclean, and could not have been eaten by either priests or people. (3) The idea that the Divine forgiveness is procured by the victim in whose place the offerer stands is supposed by the admission, for the propitiatory sacrifice par excellence, of a bloodless offering in the shape of an oblation of flour (§ 14, end). Nevertheless, although the doctrine that the death of the victim was a vicarious punishment for the sin of the offerer is not to be found in the legislation itself, the thought was one that could scarcely fail to suggest itself to the popular mind—a conclusion to which it was doubtless assisted by the representation of the vicarious sufferings of the Servant in Is 53.

Summing up the conclusions of this section on the significance of sacrifice in OT, we find it represented in all periods as a gift, mainly of homage to the Divine Sovereign, in the earlier period also as a rite of table communion with the covenant God of Israel, and finally in the later period as pre-emminently the appointed means of purification and expiation as the preliminary to forgiveness, in other words of atonement.

Of the ultima ratio of sacrifice no explicit statement is found in OT. The explanation of the Priestly writers would doubtless have been—God hath so appointed it. Beyond this we cannot go. The 'conclusion of the whole matter' may therefore be given in the words of Jesus: 'See that thou appealest not in the presence of the Lord empty; for all these things are to be done because of the commandment' (35f). The final ground of the sinner's pardon and restoration is thus not the preceding sacrifice but the free grace of a merciful and loving God.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SADDUCEES.—Probably the name 'Sadducees' is derived from the name Zadok, the high priest in the time of David and Solomon (2 S Smth 15th, 1 K 1st). His descendants long played the leading part among the priests, so that Ezekiel regarded them as the only legitimate priests (Ezk 48th, 49th, 50th). This indicates the fact that is most decisive for the right understanding of the Sadducees. About the year 200 b.c., when party lines were beginning to be drawn, the name was chosen to point out the party of the priests. That is not saying that no priest could be a Pharisee or a Scribe. Neither is it saying that all the priests were Sadducees. In our Lord's time many of the poor priests were Pharisees. But the higher priestly families and the priests as a body were Sadducees. With them were joined the majority of the aristocratic lay families of Judea and Jerusalem. This fact gives us the key to their career. It is wrapped up in the history of the high priesthood. For two centuries after the Exile the high priesthood earned the right to the leadership of the Jewish nation. But in our Lord's time its leadership lay far back in the past. Its moral greatness had been undermined on two sides. One side it had lost touch with what was deepest in the being of the Jews. For the most part this was due to its aristocratic bias. The Levitical priesthood was a career for the man not born a priest to become a priest. More and more, as the interests of the nation widened and deepened, the high priesthood failed to keep pace. Its alliance with the aristocratic families made things worse. The high priesthood and the people drifted apart. No great institution can do that and remain great.

From another side also—the political—the high priests were under the mixture of Greek and Syrian in the mixture of Gentile and Greek and State the high priests were necessarily in politics all the time. Consequently the historical process, which ended by incorporating Palestine in the Roman Empire, sowed out of the high priesthood all the moralizing influences involved in the handling of large affairs. So, undermined on two sides, the high priesthood lost the right to lead. And the party built up around it—the Sadducees—became the party of those who cared more for their own well-being and for the maintenance of things as they were than for the Kingdom of God.

When we turn to the tenets of the Sadducees, it is still in contrast with the Pharisaic that puts them in an intelligible light. Pharisaism, with all its faults, was the heart and soul of the nation, the steward of its treasures—the Holy Scriptures—the trustee of its vitalizing hope. The Sadducees stood for the tenaciously conservative tendencies in the nation. The curse which rests upon all aristocracies, the inability to realize that the best things must grow. They denied the Pharisaic doctrine of the resurrection of the body (Mt 12th, Mt 22th). For the Sadducee the Kingdom is better understood in this field than Josephus, who affirms (B J ii. viii. 14. Ant. xvi. 4) that they denied the immortality of the soul. Josephus overstated things in his desire to make the Jewish parties look like the philosophical schools of Greece. The Sadducees did not deny the immortality of the soul. But they lingered in the past, the period when the belief in immortality was vague, shadowy, and had not yet become a working motive for goodness. They did not accept the developed faith in immortality which was part and parcel of the Pharisaic teaching regarding the Kingdom of God. And this meant that their nation had outgrown them. The Sadducees also denied the Pharisaic doctrine regarding angels and ministering spirits (Ac 23th). Thereby they maintained a certain sobriety. They even emancipated themselves from a considerable amount of superstition bound up with Pharisaism. But such an attitude by it a wholly disproportionate sacrifice of vital piety.

From this sketch we can see why our Lord had almost no dealings with the Sadducees during His ministry. Their interests were with the common people. This brought Him into continual conflict with the Pharisees. It was not until His popularity seemed to threaten the peace of Jerusalem that the high priest, with the Sadducees at his back, was moved to decisive action. We can also see why the Apostolic Church, in her first years, had most to fear from the Sadducees (Ac 4th and 5th). See also artt. PHARISEES, SCRIPHS.

It existed as early as the 6th cent. B.C. as an important Greek town on the E. coast of Cyprus. In Roman times it remained a flourishing commercial city, and the eastern half of the island was governed from there. There were many Jews in Cyprus. Christianity was early preached there (Ac 11th, 26th), and among early converts were Mnason (Ac 21st and 38th). A. SOUTER.

SALASADAI.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8th).

SALATHIEL.—1. (1 Es 8th. 4th, 6th) = Sheldiel (wh. ses). 2. Another name of Esdras (3 Es 31th).

SALECAH (Dt 3th, Jos 13th 12th, 1 Ch 5th) was the most easterly of the towns claimed by Israel. It was assigned to the tribe of Gad, and is always described as being on the eastern frontier of Bashan. But it is better indicated less theoretically as being in the extreme south-east of the Hauran. On account of its commanding position it has always been of strategic importance; but it was probably never permanently occupied by any of the Israelite peoples. It was a Drusian and Roman stronghold, and a station on the great trade and military road from Gadara and Edret eastward through the desert to the Persian Gulf. It is now inhabited by Druses, and bears the name Sakka.

SALEM (1 Es 8') = Shalumm, Ezr 7'; called also Salmas (?), 2 Es 1'.

SALEM.—1. A place mentioned only in Gn 14 as the kingdom of the mysterious Melchizedek (wh. see). It is natural to identify it with Jerusalem (wh. see), especially since the Tell el-Amarna tablets show that Urusalim existed as a name for that city even before the Israelite immigration. But the only real links between 'Salem' and Jerusalem are two in number: (1) the mention of the 'King's Vale,' where, apparently, Melchizedek met Abram, which seems to be the place where Abasalom reared his memorial (2 S 5:8'); it would presumably be somewhere near Jerusalem, but,pace Josephus, this is not certain. (2) The allusion to Jerusalem by the name Salem in Ps 76'. This poetical abbreviation, however, which occurs nowhere else, may have been suggested by Salem in the ancient record, just as was the name Moriah (wh. see), and the reference to Melchizedek in Ps 110'. There is some similarity between the name of Melchizedek and that of the Jebusite king Adonizedek (Jos 10'), but upon the whole the identification of Salem with Jerusalem is rather shadowy. Jerome records another tradition, connecting Salem with Saltum (Salaminas) in the Jordan valley, where there is a tall with the tomb of 'Sheikh Salm.' 3. The Valley of Salem (Jth 4'), possibly the Jordan valley, or a part of it. 3. The LXX reads Salem for Shiloh in Jcr 41'. This must be a Salem near Shechem. If this reading is to be followed.

There is a place called Salm, east of Nablus.

SALEMAS (2 Es 1') = Shalumm, Ezr 7'; called also Salem (? in 1 Es 8'.

SALIM, near to which was Ελων (Jn 3'), lay on the west of Jordan (cf. 1 Es 8' 10'). Ελων is placed by the Onomasticon eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis (Beisith), 'near to Salim and Jordan.' This points to the neighbourhood of the ruin Umm el-′Amādān, with Tell er-Ridghah on the north, where the tomb of Sheikh Salm probably preserves the ancient name. Ελων, 'place of springs,' we may find in the seven copious fountains near by. In Christ's time the district belonged probably to Scythopolis, not to Samaria. The difficulties of other suggested identifications can be got over only by doing violence to the text (Cheyne, EBi, s.v.); or to the sense.

W. Ewing.

SALIMOTH (1 Es 8') = Shelomith, Ezr 8'.

SALLUMUS (1 Es 9') = Shalumm, Ezr 10'; called Salum, 1 Es 5'.

SALIMA.—See Salmon.

SALIM.—A family of Nethinim, Neh 7'; called in Ezr 2' Shalum, in 1 Es 5' Subai.

SALMANASAR (2 Es 15') = Salmaneser (wh. see).

SALMON, or SALMA.—The father of Boaz (Ru 4'), and therefore in the direct line of the ancestry of our Lord (Mt 1', Lk 3'). If the Salma of 1 Ch 2' is the same person, he was the 'father' or founder of Bethlehem, but it is to be noticed that that Salma is reckoned as one of the sons of Caleb the son of Hur.

SALMON.—A promontory at the N.E. end of Crete, now Cape Sidero. St. Paul's ship, after reaching Culdes with difficulty, was met by a powerful N.W. wind, which forced the captain to alter the course. Off Salmon (Ac 27') he decided to work his way westward under the lee of Crete. A. Scourten.

SALMA.—Greek form of Shalumm (Bar 1').

SALOME.—1. The daughter (unnamed in NT) of Herodias, who danced before Herod and received as a reward the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14', Mk 6'). 2. One of the women who were present at the crucifixion (Mk 15') and who afterwards visited the sepulchre (16'). By comparing Mk 15' and Mt 27' it has been almost certainly concluded that Salome was the wife of Zebedee, who also figures in the incident Mt 20'—21'. The conjecture that Salome was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus has no adequate support.

SALT.—Salt is rightly included by ben-Sira among 'the chief of all things necessary for the life of man' (2 S 20'). The Hebrews, with their northern kingdom, at least, had access to inexhaustible stores of salt, in the waters of the Dead Sea,—hence named in OT the Salt Sea' (Dt 3').—whence it could easily be obtained by evaporation, and in the deposits of the Jebel Udam at its north-western extremity. References to saltpits or saltlumps, or to both, are found in Zep 2', 1 Mac 11'. One hundred pounds of water from the Dead Sea are said to yield 24 lbs. of salt, compared with 6 lbs. obtained from the same quantity of water from the Atlantic.

In addition to its daily use as a condiment in the preparation of food (cf. Job 6'), and its important use in the sacrificial ritual, salt was employed by the Hebrews in an even greater variety of ways than it is among ourselves. New-born infants, for example, were rubbed with salt (Ezk 16')—a practice in which a religious, rather than a hygienic, motive is implied. Salt, or salted meat, was eaten with meal, as an antidote against salt (Lev 2'). A grain of salt placed in the hollow of a decayed tooth was considered a cure for the universal evil of toothache (Mishna, Shabbath, v. 5). In other treatments of the Jews we find frequent references to the use of salt for salting fish, for pickling olives, vegetables, etc. The salting of meat for preservation is referred to in the Parable of the Leaven (Mt 13'), and in the Parable of the Mustard Seed (Mt 13').

In the Dead Sea Scrolls, salt formed a government monopoly (1 Mac 10' 11'), as it did in Egypt under the Ptolemies. As regards the presence of salt in the ritual and sacrifices, the words of Mk 9' 'every sacrifice shall be salted with salt,' although omitted by RV following the best authorities, are nevertheless true to fact. The legislation of the Priests' Code, at least, expressly ordains: 'with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt' (Lv 2')—a passage which expressly specifies that the cereal or vegetable offerings (the 'meal offerings' of RV) had to be salted as well as the more important and more evident animal or flesh sacrifices (cf. Ezk 45'). A special 'salt chamber' is mentioned among the chambers adjoining the Priests' Court in the description of Herod's Temple given in the Mishna. The sacred incense, also, had to be 'seasoned with salt' (Ex 30'), as was also the case with the shewbread, according to the better Gr. text of Lv 24'. The original idea in this extended ritual use of salt was doubtless that it was an indispensable accompaniment of man's daily food, so it could not be absent from the 'food of God,' as the sacrifices are termed in Lv 21' 17.

In the developed priestly legislation, however, there can be little doubt that the presence of salt—this metaphorical significance. From its use as a preservative, reflected in our Lord's figure, 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5'), and as an antidote to decay, it is natural that salt should become a symbol of permanence, and even of life as opposed to decay and death. 'Salv.' has been said, 'stands for life in many a form of primitive speech and in the world's symbolism (C. Trumbull, Covenant of Salt). From this symbolical standpoint we probably reach the true explanation of the striking expression 'a covenant of salt' (Nu 18:19, 2 Ch 13), which denotes a covenant that is inviolable and valid in perpetuity. The presence of salt, therefore, with every sacrifice may have come to symbolize the irrevocable character of J's covenant with Israel (cf. G. B. Gray's Com. on Nu 18:19).

This seems preferable to the usual explanation which connects the expression in question with the well-known code of Arab hospitality, by which a traveller in the desert, and even an enemy, if he has once taken of an Arab's hospitality, has a right to his host's protection; since this 'ordinance of salt,' as it is termed, is valid only for a limited period (see Jansen. Coutumes des Arabes [1905], 87 f.). On the other hand, the obligations which the partaking of one's hospitality imposes on a guest are emphasized in the words of Ezr 4:14 'because we eat the salt of the palace (RV).

In marked contrast to the above-mentioned employment of salt as a symbol of life, stands its parallel occurrence as the symbol of barrenness, desolation, and death (5 X 229 and elsewhere). By this aspect the symbolism of salt it has been usual to explain the treatment meted out by Abimelech to the city of Shechem in the early narrative, Ez 3:11 'He beat down the city and salt it.' More in harmony, however, with the fundamental conception of the ban (see BAN) to regard the strewing of the site of the city with salt as symbolizing its complete dedication to J to the terms of the conclusion in Ezr 4:14 because we eat the salt of the palace (RV).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SALT, CITY OF.—A city of Judah (Jos 15:27). It may be inferred to have occupied some position on the western shore of the Dead Sea, between En-gedi and Khushh Uldum (the salt mountain).

SALT SEA.—See Dead Sea.

SALT, VALLEY OF.—The scene of memorable victories of David over the Edomites (2 S 16:4, 1 Ch 18:9), and, at a later period, of Amaziah over the same enemies (2 K 14; 2 Ch 24). It may be identified with the plain extending from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the foot of the cliffs which cross the valley from side to side and form the southern margin of the Ghor.

SALTWORT (Job 30:4 RV).—See MALLOW.

SALU.—The father of Zimri (Nu 26:14, 1 Mac 2:2).

SALUM—El Es 5:26; Shallum, Ez 22:29; called Salum, 1 Es 9:5.

SALUTATION (or greeting) is a serious matter in the East; some knowledge ofimmelunar practice is necessary in dealing with Orientals. The subject salutes his king by prostration; the humblest by touching the ground with his hand; and then his lip and brow. The young salutes the aged, the rider the footman, etc. In crowded streets only men of age, rank, and dignity need be saluted (Mt 23:7 etc.). Common forms of salutation are, 'Peace be upon you; response, 'And upon you': 'May your day be happy'; response, 'May your day be happy and blessed'; and, in the highway, 'Blessed be he that cometh' (Jg 18:5, Mt 10:7, Lk 24:36, Ps 118:22, Mt 21:9 etc.). Salutations are frequently prolonged, and repeated inquiries after health and welfare extremely tedious (1 K 4:3, Lk 10:26). See also GESTURES, KISS. W. EWING.

SALVATION, SAVING.—Salvation is the generic term employed in Scripture to express the idea of any gracious deliverance of God, but specially of the spiritual redemption from sin and its consequences predicted by the OT prophets, and realized in the mission and work of the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. In the OT.—The root meaning of the principal OT words for 'save,' 'salvation,' 'saviour' is, to be broad, spacious; salvation is enlargement. As illustrations of this OT meaning of salvation may be taken the words of Ezeckiel (Ez 14:14) 'He is become my salvation;' 16:15; and the aliev of the psalmist. This poor man cried, and Jehovah heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles (Ps 34:7). Jehovah is said to have given 'saviours' to Israel in the time of the Judges (Ne 9:17). Victory in battle is 'salvation' (Ex 14:14, 1 S 14:4, Ps 20 etc.). Salvation, or deliverance, of this kind is sometimes national, but sometimes individual (cf. of David, 2 S 22, Ps 18). Such external deliverances, however, it is to be observed, are never divorced from spiritual conditions. It is the righteous man, and that alone, who is destined to look to God for His saving help; no others can claim Him as the rock of their salvation (Ps 18:1, cf. 40). When, therefore, the people turned their backs on Jehovah, and abandoned themselves to wickedness, salvation could come only through a change of heart, through repentance. The chief need was to be saved from the sin itself. In the prophets, accordingly, the perspective somewhat changes. External blessings delivered from enemies, return from exile, are still hoped for, but the main stress is laid on a changed heart, forgiveness, restoration to God's favour, righteousness. In the picture of the Messianic age it is these things that are to come on (cf. Jer 31:34-35, Ezek 36:25-28, Hos 14 etc.). As the idea of salvation becomes more spiritual, it likewise becomes more universal; the Gentiles are to share its blessings (1 Cor 15:24-29, 1 Thess 5:9-10).

The teaching of the prophets bore fruit in the age preceding the advent of Jesus in deepening ideas of the future life, of resurrection and a future perfected state of the connexion of prosperity with righteousness—though mostly in the sense of outward legal obedience, the very error against which the prophets decried—and in more concrete representations of the Messiah. But there never failed a godly kernel, which cherished spiritual hopes, and waited in patience and prayer for 'the consolation of Israel' (Lk 24).

2. In the NT.—In the NT the word 'salvation' (σωτηρία, from σώτηρ, 'saviour') is sometimes applied to temporal benefits, like healing (e.g. Mt 9:22: 'thy faith hath made thee whole,' lit. 'saved thee'), but most generally it is employed as a comprehensive term for the spiritual and eternal blessings brought to men by the appearance and redeeming work and person of the Lord Jesus. The name Jesus was given Him because 'it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1:21); He is distinctly the 'Saviour' (Lk 2:11); His work on earth was to seek and to save that which was lost (Lk 19:10); His death and resurrection were a means to salvation (Ro 5:12); He is exalted 'to be a Prince and a Saviour' to give repentance and remission of sins (Ac 5:31); 'in none other is there salvation' (47). In Apostolic usage, therefore, salvation is the all-embracing name for the blessings brought by the gospel (cf. 'the gospel of your salvation,' Eph 1:14; 'the word of this salvation,' Ac 13:26; 'repentance unto salvation,' 2 Co 7:9 etc.).

To expound fully the contents of this term, accordingly, would be to expound the contents of the gospel. Enough here to say that it includes deliverance from all sin's evils, and the bestowal of all spiritual blessings in Christ (Eph 1). It begins on earth in forgiveness, renewal, the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, enlightenment, guidance, strengthening, comfort; and is perfected in the blessedness and glory, in which body and soul share, of the life everlasting. The fact never to be forgotten about it is that, it has been obtained at the infinite cost of the redeeming death of God's own Son (cf. Rev. 5). For further elucidations, see art. Atonement, Mediator, Redemption. JAMES OHR.

SAMAIS.—1. (1 Es 19) Shemaiyah, 2 Ch 30:5. 2. (1 Es 8:39) Shemaiyah, Ezr 8:18. 3. (1 Es 8:40) Shemaiyah, Ezr 8:40.
SAMARIA.—A city built on a hill purchased by Omri, king of Israel, from a certain Shemer, and by him made the capital of the Israelite kingdom (1 K 16). We gather from 1 K 20 that Ben-hadad 1, king of Syria, successfully attacked it soon afterwards, and had compelled Omri to grant him favourable trade facilities. Ahab had built a Baal temple (1 K 16) and a palace of ivory (22b). Ben-hadad 1. here besieged Ahab, but unsuccessfully, and was obliged to reverse the terms of his father which had exacted from Omri. Jehoram attempted a feeble and half-hearted reform, destroying Ahab's Baal-pillar, though retaining the calf-worship (2 K 10) and the asherah (13b). The city was again besieged in his time by Ben-hadad 2 (2 K 7). After this event the history of Samaria is bound up with the troublesome internal affairs of the Northern Kingdom, and we need not follow it closely till we reach b.c. 724, when Shallum leaves Ahab and besieged Samaria in punishment for king Hoshea's disaffection. It fell three years later; and Sargon, who had meanwhile succeeded Shalmaneser on the Assyrian throne, deported its inhabitants, substituting a number of people drawn from other places (2 K 17). In b.c. 331 it was besieged and conquered by Alexander, and in b.c. 120 by John Hyrcanus. Herod carried out important building works here, large portions of which still remain. He changed the name to Sebaste in honour of Augustus. Philip preached here (Ac 8b). The city, however, gradually decayed, fading before the growing importance of Neapolis (Schechem). The Crusaders established a bishopric here.

Extensive remains of ancient Samaria still exist at the mound known as Sebawi el-Habbab (Sebaste), a short distance from the town. It is one of the largest and most important mounds in ancient Palestine. Excavations under the auspices of Harvard University were begun in 1908.

Samaritans.—The descendants of the Cubite, Arville, Sepharvites, and Hamathites, established by Sargon in Samaria after he had put an end to the Israelite kingdom. They were instructed in a form of the Hebrew religion (which they grafted on to their own worship) in order to appease the 'God of the land' (2 K 17). To these colonists Ashurbanipal made considerable additions (Ezr 4b-19). The enmity between Jews and Samaritans began to make its appearance immediately after the return from the Captivity. The Samaritans endeavoured to prevent the re-building of Jerusalem (Ezr 4, Neh 4), and from time to time their subsequent aggressions and inuils to the re-founded Jerusalem are recorded by the rose of Zedekiah. The battle of Issus the Samaritans offered assistance to Alexander, and were allowed to build a temple on Gerizim, where they sacrificed after the manner of the Jews—though they were quite ready to repudiate Jewish origin, rites, and prejudices whenever occasion arose (see Jos. Ant. xii. v. 5). This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus. The disputes between the Jews and the Samaritans were at last referred to Rome (Bj 11. xii. 3-7). Throughout the Gospel history the ill-feeling is conspicuous: the Samaritans were 'strangers', (Lk 17), and their admixture of heathen worship seems still to have persisted (Ac 5). Vespasian inflicted a crushing blow upon them by massacring 11,600 on Mt. Gerizim. From this and other sufferings later inflicted by Zenus and Justinian they never recovered. They still persist, to the number of about 150, in Nablus. They accept the Pentateuch as their only written legislation, and endeavour to preserve intact the Mosaic rites and ordinances.

SAMATUS (1 Es 9a) = Shalumm, Ezr 10a.

SAMEOH.—The fifteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 15th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

SAMELIUS (1 Es 29, 17, 10) = Shimshai, Ezr 4 etc.

SAMEUS (1 Es 9b) = Shemaiah, Ezr 10b.

SAMGAR-NEBO.—One of the Babylonian princes who, at the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, in the 11th year of Zedekiah, crossed the middle gate (Jer 39). There has been much discussion concerning this name, due to the varying forms of the Greek version. The most probable explanation is that it is related to Schrade, namely, Sama-qr-Nabo, a name meaning "Be gracious, O Nebu." As, however, Rab-mag are titles, the question arises whether Samgar-nebo may not be one also. If so, it may be a corruption of anpu Nebo, the priest of Nebo,—an office possibly held by Nebriel-nebo, who, if identical with Nebrilissar, was closely connected with E-zida, the temple of Nebo at Borsippa. His daughter married a priest of E-zida in the first year of his reign.

T. G. FINCHES.

SAMLAH.—An Edomite king (1 Sm 30).—1 Ch 11.-24.

SAMMUS (1 Es 9a) = Shema, Neh 8a.

SAMOS was an important island in the Aegean Sea off the coast of Ionia. It was a centre of luxury, art, and science. In b.c. 84 it was united to the province of Asia, and in b.c. 17 was made a free State by Augustus. In 1908 it was when St. Paul, with his new converts, left his way home from his third journey. There were many Jewish residents on the island, and it was one of the places addressed by the Romans in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15).

SAMOTHRACE.—An island S. of Thrace and N.W. of Troas, from which place St. Paul had a straight run to it (Ac 16). The town of the same name was on the N. side of the island. The island is mountainous, and has a summit nearly a mile above the sea level. It owes its name perhaps to a resemblance to Samos (wh. sec.). Samothrace played little part in Greek history, but was famous as the seat of the mysterious cult of the divinities known as Cabeiri. A. BORCHER.

SAPMASEM.—One of the places to which the Romans wrote in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15); usually identified with Samaun, a seaport town on the Black Sea. RVm, with Vulg., has Lampanecus.

SAMSON (LXX and Vulg.; Heb. Shimshon; perhaps derived from shemesh, 'sun,' either as a diminutive, or better 'sun-man').—Mentioned in OT in Jg 13-16, and in NT in He 11.

1. The story need not be recapitulated, but certain details require explanation. 13h. seems to be the prelude to a first exploit, now lost to us, and even his Catholic life (14). His battle with the Philistines is narrated b.c. 1100, and it seems that his father and his mother in v. 1. b. 11a are gossips introduced to avoid the appearance of disobedience. He goes back alone, meets the lion alone, returns to his home after his visit to his bride (v. 17, 'to take her' being another gloss); then after an interval he goes back to celebrate the marriage he has arranged; v. 15b is particularly absurd as it stands. The thirty companions of v. 11 are the 'friends of the bridegroom,' chosen on this occasion from the bride's people (see below, § 4); the companion of v. 9 is their leader, 'the best man.' The 'linen garments' of v. 12 are pieces of fine linen, costly and luxurious (Pr 31b. Is 39); 'the changes' are gala dresses. The Philistines give up the riddle 'after three days' (v. 14), and appeal to the woman on the seventh (v. 1); LXX Syr. 'fourth'; yet she weeps for the whole week, imploring Samson to tell her (v. 17). Perhaps the figures of v. 11, 12 are interjections, the Philistines giving up at once. 'Before the sun went down' (v. 14) is ungrammatical in Heb., with a rare word for 'sun,' with best modern ed., read by a slight alteration 'before he went into the bridal-chamber' (cf. 15). In ch. 16, words, variously represented by LXX, have fallen out between v. 12 and v. 14; the sense is, ' . . . and beat them up with the pin, I shall become weak. So while he was asleep he took the seven locks and wove them into the web, and beat them tight with the pin,' etc. We are to imagine an upright loom with a piece of unfinished stuff. Delilah weaves the hair into this, and heat it tight with the 'pin.' Samson pulls up the posts of the loom by his hair which is fastened to the web. For v. 8, cf. the bindings of captives as shown on Assyrian monuments: to be put to the mill was a frequent punishment of slaves. Nothing is known of the worship of Dagon (cf. 1 Sam 6: 5); the etymology 'fish-god' and the connexion with the Assy. god 'Dagan' are uncertain.

2. Origin and nature of the story.—(a) The narrative seems to belong entirely to J, the Judæan source of the early history of Israel; there are no traces of a double source, as in other parts of Judges. It has been but slightly revised by the Deuteronomistic editor. Ch. 16, though an integral part of the original cycle of stories, was apparently at one time omitted by the compiler; see note on the revised text. (b) The story gives too unfavourable a picture of the hero's love-affairs.

(b) Though it is said that Samson 'judged Israel twenty years' (16: 31), and that he should 'begin to deliver' his nation from the Philistines (13: 25), there is no hint of ever having held any official position, nor does he appear as a leader of his people; on the contrary, he is despised by his neighbours of Judah (15: 16). His exploits have only a slight connexion, and are performed single-handed, for revenge for his private quarrels. The story evidently belongs to the class of popular tales, common to every country-side. Every people has its hero of prodigious strength to set off against the might of others. As are described, he becomes a hopeless task to discover the precise historical basis of the legends, which in this case are undoubtedly of great antiquity. (c) It is not necessary to look for a fundamental explanation in the theory of a 'solar hero.' The name 'Samson,' and the existence of a 'Beth-shemesh' ('house of the sun') near his home, offer an obvious temptation to such a theory; but it is entirely unnecessary and is now generally abandoned. (d) It is not improbable that in ch. 15 we find the workings of folk-etymology ('etiological myth'), i.e. stories suggested by the fancied meaning of names. Ramath-lehi ('the height of Lehi') is taken to mean 'the casting away of the jar-bone'; 'pin-hokhore' ('Partridge spring'), 'the spring of him who called'; and incidents are suggested to explain the supposed meanings. (e) The parallels with other popular stories, especially the exploits of Hercules, are obvious, e.g. the miraculous satisfying of the hero's thirst, and his ruin at the hand of a woman. For the lion episode, cf., further, the stories of Polydamas, David (1 Sam 17), Pericles' lances stand out clearly for the model of the story of Nisus. Ovid (Fasti, iv. 681-712) has a remarkable parallel to the burning of the corn by the foxes (or jackals); at the Cerealia, foxes with lighted torches light up the corn, and it is destroyed. He explains the custom as originally due to the act of a mischievous boy, who burned his father's corn in the same way. The conclusion to be drawn from such parallels is not necessarily identity of type, but the similar working of the mind and imagination under similar conditions.

3. Historical value.—Regarded as a picture of early conditions, the narrative is of greater historical significance. Politically it takes us to the time when Dan, perhaps weakened by the departure of its 600 men of war (Jg 14), was acquisitive in the rule of the Philistines; Timnah is in their hands. There is no state of war between the two peoples, but free intercourse and even intermarriage. As already pointed out, Samson is in no sense the leader of a revolt against the foreign dominion, and his neighbours of Judah show no desire to make his private quarrels an excuse for a rising (15: 1); there is no union even between the tribes of the south. None the less, his exploits would be secretly welcomed as directed against the common foe, and remembering that Jg 17-21 is an appendix, we see how the narrative paves the way for the more definite efforts of Saul and David in 1 Samuel to shake off the foreign yoke. Socially the story gives us a picture of primitive marriage customs. Ch. 14 is the clearest OT example of a 'Judith' marriage (see Mahanaim, § 1). We get a good idea of the proceedings, especially in the East-to-day. The feast lasts for a week, and is marked by lavish eating and drinking, songs, riddles, and not very refined merriment. The whole story gives us a valuable insight into the thought of the people; we note the grim rough humour of its hero, so entirely natural (ch. 14, the three deceptions of ch. 16, 18th RVm).

4. Religious significance.—Samson is a popular hero, and we shall expect the directly religious interest of the story to be subordinate. It appears in the account of his birth, perhaps hardly a part of the original cycle, but added later to justify his inclusion among the Judges, as a child of promise, he is in a peculiar sense a gift of God, born to do a special work; an ever-ruling providence governs his acts (14: 16). The source of his strength is supernatural; at times it is represented as due to a demoniac frenzy, an inspiration or an unfavourable influence (14: 16; 14: 19; 15: 1). When the Nazirite lay in a vow to sacrifice the hair at a sacred shrine, the life-long vow being probably a vow to do so at stated periods. The hair, like the blood, was regarded as miraculous. It is a continuous act of religion; particularly must the body, which nourishes the hair (now the property of the deity), be kept clean from all defilement; the taboo of the vine and its products is esp. common (cf. Am 3: 11). In the story itself no stress is laid on any such precautions on the part of Samson (e.g. in 14 he eats from a carcass), and hence no doubt the taboos were transferred to his mother (13). There is unfortunately no basis for the religious feeling with which Milton has invested the character of Samson. He is a popular hero, and the permanent value of the story is to be sought in its ethical lessons. It is true, its morality is on a low level; revenge is the ruling idea, and his killing of his cousin has been a stumbling-block to apologists. But once we recognize the origin of the story, we shall not feel bound to justify or explain away these traits, and the story enters into the picture of the evils of foreign marriages (14), of laxity in sexual relations, and of tainting by temptation. It teaches that bodily endowments, no less than spiritual, are a gift from God, however different may be our modern conception of the way in which they are bestowed, and that their retention depends on obedience to His laws. But if Samson stands as an example 'of impotence of mind in body strong,' he also stands, in Milton's magnificent conception, as an example of patriotism and heroism in death, to all who 'from his memory inflame their breast to matchless valour and adventures high.'

SAMUEL.—The life of Samuel is viewed from widely differing standpoints in different sections of the books that bear his name. In the oldest narrative, found in 1 Sa 9, he appears as a youth from the land of Zuph, to whom Saul and his servant, who are seeking the lost asses of Kish, Saul's father, apply for help. Saul had hesitated about applying to the man of God, on the score of not having a gift to present, but the servant produced the fourth part of a shekel of silver with which to compensate the seer. Samuel, who had been Divinely apprised of their coming, met them while he was on his way to worship at the high place, and after they had partaken of his hospitality and passed the night with him, he nominated and anointed Saul as Israel's coming king. He further gave Saul signs by which he should know that the promises would be fulfilled, and committed him to the Spirit of God. In another narrative (chs. 1-3), which differs in point of view rather than in trustworthiness, are related the incidents of Samuel's early life and relations to the kingdom. Hannah, his mother, the wife of Elkanah, was barren. During the celebration of the yearly feast she vowed that if God would give her a son she would give him to Jehovah. Samuel is therefore the son of answered prayer, and is in due time dedicated to the Temple service at Shiloh, where he assists Eli. is warned by Jehovah of the coming destruction of Eli's house, and receives the call to the prophetic office.

After the death of Eli and the return of the ark from the Philistines, Samuel becomes 'judge' of Israel, calls the people to repentance at Mizpah, and saves them miraculously from the invading Philistines (ch. 7). He is succeeded in the judgmentship by unworthy sons, and Israel, outraged at their sinfulness and worthlessness, demands a king—a proposition, in the estimation of Samuel, tantamount to a rejection of Jehovah, though no such suggestion was made when he voluntarily appointed Saul. Nevertheless he yields to their wish, but describes in sombre colours the oppressions they must endure under the monarchy (ch. 8). Accordingly the Ark is assembled at Nob, and the people are informed Jehovah, and Saul is selected by lot (10:17-24).

Samuel now makes his farewell address (ch. 12), defends his administration, warns the people, by references to the past history, of the danger of disobeying Jehovah, and compels nature to attest his words by a thunderstorm in harvest time.

The insignificant role played by Samuel in the first narrative proves most intolerable when compared with the part accorded him in that which follows. In the first he is an obscure seer, and takes but a minor part in the establishment of the kingdom. In the latter he is a commanding and dominating figure. He is a judge of the people, adjudicating their affairs yearly at Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah. Saul, as well as the monarchy, is controlled and directed by him.

The narrative of Samuel's prominence is succeeded by an account (ch. 13)—from a different source—of Saul's attack on the Philistines. The story is interrupted at 13:15 by a complaint that Saul had disobeyed in offering sacrifice before the battle, although he had waited the required seven days as instructed by Samuel. It is difficult to see wherein Saul was guilty. Samuel had not commanded Saul to perform this sacrifice. The Philistines were closing in upon Saul, his army was fast melting away, it was necessary to give battle, and it would have been considered irreverent to inaugurate the battle without sacrifice. For this rebellion Samuel informs him that his kingdom is forfeit, and that Jehovah has chosen another, a man after His own heart, to take his place.

Again Saul is instructed by Samuel (ch. 15) to destroy Amalek—men, women, children, and spoil—but he spares Agag and the best of the booty. All his excuses are rejected, and Samuel now attributes the loss of his kingdom to the new disobedience. This narrative does not seem conscious that the kingdom was already lost to Saul. The king confesses his fault, and after repeated persuasion Samuel agrees to honour him before his people by worshipping with him. Agag is brought before Samuel, who beheads him to pieces before the Lord. After this Samuel is sent to the home of Jesse to select and anoint a successor to Saul. One by one the sons of Jesse are rejected, till David, the youngest, is brought from the field, and proves to be the choice of Jehovah (ch. 16). With this significant act Samuel practically disappears. We find an account of his keeping a school of the prophets at Ramah, whither David flees from Saul, and an account of his death and burial at Ramah (2 Sam. 21:1). There is also a mention of his death in ch. 28, and the story of Saul's application to the witch of Endor to call up Samuel from the dead.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.—1. Title.—The two Books of Samuel are really parts of what was originally one book. This is shown not only by the fact that the narrative of Book I. is continued without the slightest interruption in Book II., and that the style, tone of view, and purpose are the same throughout, but also by their appearance as one book bearing the simple title 'Samuel' in the oldest known Hebrew MSS. The division of the Hebrew text into two books was first made in print by Daniel Bomberger in his Hebrew Bible (2nd ed. 1517). In doing so he was in part following the text of the Septuagint and other early translations. Both Books of Samuel and Kings are described as the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Books of Kingdoms (LXX.), or Kings (Vulgate). The title, 'Samuel,' less accurately descriptive of the contents than that of 'Kings' or 'Kings,' owes its origin to the prominent place held by Samuel in 1 Sam. 1:1-16. A late Jewish interpretation regarded it as declaring Samuel's authorship of the narrative; but this is impossible, in view of the fact that the history extends over the reign of David, long after the death of Samuel (1 Sam. 25).

2. Contents.—The period covered by the Books of Samuel extends from the birth of Samuel to the close of David's reign, i.e. approximately from a.d. 1010 to 970. The narrative falls into three main divisions:—I: Samuel and Saul, 1 Sam. 1-15; II: The Rise of David, 1 Sam. 16-2 Sam. 5; III: David as king of United Israel, 1 Sam. 30-2 Sam. 21-24. Division I. is made up of three sections:—(1) The childhood and youth of Samuel, to the downfall of Eli's house and the captivity of the Ark (1 Sam. 1-7); (2) Samuel's career as Judge, including his defeat of the Philistines, his support of Saul, and the anointing of Saul (8:1-24); (3) Saul's reign till his rejection (15:1-15). Division II. likewise includes three sections:—(1) David at Saul's Court (1 Sam. 16-21); (2) David as a fugitive outlaw (1 Sam. 22-31); (3) David in Hebron (2 Sam. 2-5). Division III. forms three more sections: (1) establishment of Jerusalem as the religious and national capital, and a brief summary of David's reign (2:8-16), (2) supplementary narratives, setting forth particularly David's great sin and subsequent troubles (2:9-20); (3) a series of appendixes (2 Sam. 21-24). 1 K. 1:1-22 really belongs to 2 Sam., since it relates the circumstances attending the death of David, and thus brings the natural close to the narrative.

3. Text and Versions.—The text of Samuel is the worst in the OT; only Ezekiel and Hosea can approach it in this respect. Many passages are unintelligible on the basis of the Masoretic text. The large amount of corruption may be due in part to the relatively great antiquity of the text, much of the narrative being among the oldest writings in the Hebrew Bible; and, in part, to the fact that these books were not used in the ordinary synagogue services, and so were not so carefully transmitted as they otherwise would have been.

Unfortunately, the oldest existing Hebrew manuscript of Samuel dates its origin no further back than the tenth century of our era. With each copying and recopying during the many preceding centuries fresh opportunity for error was afforded; and the wonder is not that there are so many errors, but that there are not more. In any effort to recover the original text large use must be made of the Septuagint, which is based upon a Hebrew text at least as old as the 3rd cent. n.c., and has preserved the original reading in many cases, while showing traces of it in others. The Syriac and Vulgate versions are also useful, but to a far lesser extent.

4. Sources and Date.—The Books of Samuel, like almost every other OT writing, are a compilation from various sources, rather than the result of a careful study of earlier sources presented in the form of a unified, logical, and philosophical statement of facts and con-
The analysis presented by the opposing school (Wellhausen, Stade, Kennedy, et al.) differs from the foregoing chiefly (a) in denying the unity of the two sources, J and E respectively; (b) in refusing to recognize any independent sources to J and E; (c) in proposing another chronological assignment of the sources. Kennedy, e.g., the latest representative of this school, resolves Budde's J into three main elements, all of which are dated from the period of the 10th c. B.C. Budde's E likewise falls into three fragments under Kennedy's examination; one of these is a life of Saul dating from about n.c. 650; another and larger work constitutes a Deuteronomic history; and a small remainder consists of pre-exilic duplicates of some narratives appearing in Budde's J.

The precise delimitation of the various sources and the exact way in which the Books of Samuel assumed their present form must remain for the future to determine. The unmistakable fact is that these books in their present form are due to the labours of late exilic editors who wrought them out of existing documents, some of which show Deuteronomic colouring, while others come from early pre-exilic times, somewhere about n.c. 900. As compared with the Books of Kings and Chronicles, or even the Book of Judges, the evidence shows far less evidence of editorial additions and modifications. The various sources are for the most part allowed to tell their stories in their own way. There is a total absence of any such theological stratification as is found in the other historical books of the Hebrew Bible. We thus have in the Books of Samuel some of the finest examples of the historical writings of the Hebrews in the various stages of their development, and Budde.

5. Historical value.—In estimating the historical value of the Books of Samuel, care must be taken to discriminate sharply between the books themselves and the sources which constitute them. The books themselves are the product of a long literary history, the work of various men living in widely scattered periods. They thus form a source-book, rather than a history in the modern sense. It is for this reason that they are so extremely valuable to the modern historian of Israel. For a correct picture of the times of Samuel, Saul, and David, it goes without saying that the oldest sources are the most trustworthy. Failure to paint original scenes and characters with a proper perspective increases in direct proportion to the distance of the narrator from the sources. Hence the later elements among the sources are not to be considered as sources of information concerning the times of the early monarchy, but as reflecting the point of view and the background of their writers. The older sources, however, coming from a period within a century or two of the events they narrate, furnish us with accurate information and are among the best historical records in the OT. They are especially rich in biographical materials. They help us to see Saul and David and their contemporaries as they really were. They give us glimpses of Samuel as the local seer, known only within the narrow limits of his own immediate district; of David as the fugitive, the freebooter, the outlaw, the ideal of his men, the devoted servant of Jehovah, and yet capable of the most dastardly deeds; of Saul as the brave warrior, the patriot, the religious enthusiast, the moody chieftain of his clan. These men, with Joab, Absalom, and others, live and move before our eyes.

A still further service of the Books of Samuel is in the light they throw upon the development of religious practices and ideas in Israel. Kennedy rightly says: 'The study of this book has contributed more than anything else to the more accurate views of the general development of religious thought in OT times, which are characteristic of the present day.' The books present from first to last a period of about five hundred years, during which time the religion of Israel was advancing by leaps and bounds under the leadership of the prophets. They contain, therefore, the record of this progress. Instances of this may be seen in the wide difference between the attitude towards foreign gods ascribed to David in 1 S 23:13 (an early source), and that appearing in 12th (a late source); in the primitive conception of revelation presented in the story of Samuel's call (3:21); in the narratives dealing with the origin of prophecy (2:8), and the sons of the prophets (e.g. 10:24-27); in the use of the teraphim (19:19); and the ephod (23:2-12); and in the advanced conception of God appearing in such passages as 2 S 7:12. The Books of Samuel are thus invaluable to the historian of Israel's religious, social, and political life.

6. Purpose.—But the purpose of these books is not to serve as a bare, cold record of events and their causes; such matters are of only secondary importance. The immediate purpose is to teach religion; they give sermons, not annals; they are prophecy, not history. In the Hebrew canon they occupy a place alongside of the prophetic books, and the crown of the series is the Psalms. The ultimate purpose is to teach men to know God and his will to his people. This is the prophets' philosophy of history, and as such must command our respect. We could not do better than quote the words of the late Dr. A. B. Smith: "The greatness of the books is to teach religion; they give sermons, not annals; they are prophecy, not history. In the Hebrew canon they occupy a place alongside of the prophetic books, and the crown of the series is the Psalms. The ultimate purpose is to teach men to know God and his will to his people. This is the prophets' philosophy of history, and as such must command our respect. The Books of Samuel are thus invaluable to the historian of Israel's religious, social, and political life.

SANABASSAR, SANABBASARUS.—Variants in 1 Es 26:22, 7:13 are the names Shechbassar (wh. see). SANABARIS.—A family that returned with Zerubb.

SANBALLAT (Assyr. Sin-ballat — Sin, save the life).—The most inveeterate of the opponents of Nehemiah. He was a native of Beth-horon, and apparently belonged to an old Bab. family holding office under the Persian government. When Nehemiah came to Jerusalem to repair the walls, he, with his allies (Tobiah the Ammonite and Gelem the Arabian), met him with derision; and after the work was well under way he stirred up the Samaritans and persuaded them to attack against the builders. This was prevented by the watchfulness of Nehemiah and the workmen. Several devices aimed against the life of Nehemiah were also thwarted by the sagacity of the latter. On Nehemiah's second visit he banished from Jerusalem Manasseh (a son-in-law of Sanballat, and grandson of Eliashib), who founded the Samaritan sect. See Neh 2:16, 4:10, 6:13, 7:3, 8:17, 11:14, 15. SANCTIFICATION, SANCTIFY.
—"Sanctify" (Latin, from the Vulgate) — the native Anglo-Saxon "sceat" — the Latin "sacer," and the Greek "hagion" — denotes the act or process of making holy (hallowing), and is applied both to persons and things. It appears in 5 NT passages in the AV, giving way to "holy" in other (Re 5:9; cf. Rev 21:27; Ap 1:4). Although the Greek noun is the same, where RV makes the needed correction; everywhere, except in 1 P 1:21, the state is made; thus, of persons, more than that of the process is implied. To Paul belong 3 out of the 10 examples of the noun, and 11 out of the 28 examples of the verb in NT (including Ac 15:29 and 20:26); 1. Jl 7:8, 17; Mt 11:28; Col 1:22; the "consecrate" of Heb 7:25 and of 10:16 is corrected by the RV to "perfect" and "dedicate" respectively.

1. In the Israelite, as in other ancient religions, that is "holy" which is set apart for Divine use, so that the "sanctified" is the person or thing that is "holy". For example, ascribed to Jehovah, to persons, to vessels, garments, buildings, days (especially the Sabbath). In Is 13:19, Jer 4:2 (see RVm), even a 'war' is "sanctified" and the warriors are J's "sanctified army" or J's "holy host" (Rev 3:21). The "holy One of Israel" (see J, "the Holy One of Israel") is "holy" in a sense in distinction from heathen gods; "sanctify" acquired a corresponding ethical connotation; holiness (ideal or ideal) was required of the people, accordant with its status. For Israel, being J's servant, is "brought near" to Him (Ex 19:22, De 4:4, Jer 2:2, Ps 63:237:145); contrast Ex 19:21-2, Jer 23:2, Hos 9:1 etc., and such a person is "holy" in a moral sense — that congruity of nature wherein circumcision and the ceremonial cleansings were symbolical (Ps 15:4; 116:1, 136:26, 144:1, Hab 2:14, Ezek 36:22, Ps 51 etc.). The refrain I am Jehovah resonates through the Law and Holiness in Lev 17-26; this code blends the ritual and the moral in the holiness it demands from Israel, which is the corollary of J's own holiness. Such is the OT doctrine of sanctification. The prophets, it is said, taught an idealism, a holiness-idealism, a notion that is to say, in effect, they ethicsed holiness. The sanctification binding Israel to J was, in a sense, reciprocal; you shall not profane my holy name (cf. Ex 20:5, Lev 22:29, Am 7:17, Mal 1:11, 12); but J holy and you profane your holy name. On the most ancient of the children of Israel: I am J, which hallow you' (Lv 22:23); "to sanctify" J or His 'name' is to recognize and act towards Him as holy, to 'make him holy' in one's thoughts and attitude (Acts 1:26; cf. 1 P 2:9). This expression is characteristic of Isaiah (5:29) and Ezekiel (20:28; 36:25 38:39 39:7), who regard J as 'sanctified' when His awe-awakening judgments bring men to acknowledge His Holiness and character; in this connexion 'sanctify' is parallel to 'majesty, 'glorify,' 'exalt,' as in Ezek 36:22. J is even said to 'sanctify himself, or His 'great name,' when He vindicates His holiness and 'makes' Himself 'known in the sight of many nations' for what in truth He is.

2. In the NT we must distinguish the usage of our Lord, of the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and of the Apostle Paul.

(1) Adopting the language of Lk 22:29 and of the prophets, Jesus bids the disciples pray, 'Our Father... hallowed be thy name... on earth' (Mt 6:9 — Lk 11)—the unique example of such use of 'sanctify' in the NT, apart from the citation in 2 Th 1:11; elsewhere, 'holy' (or, more properly, 'hallowed' or "hallowed" or "earth" or "hallowed") is used in this connexion. To bring about this 'hallowing' is the very work of Jesus, who for this end makes known the Father's 'name' (Jn 14:21).
In (a) Jn 10:4 and (b) 17:11-12 our Lord makes Himself the object of the verb,—in the second instance the subject also. (a) The Father 'sanctified' Him for Himself (a pre-incarnate destination; see 1 Jn 4:14; cf. Jer 19); (b) at the last Supper the Son endorses that consecration in view of its dread issue, and proposes to share it with His disciples, as He dedicates them to the sacrifice of redemption. Thus in the person of Jesus Christ sanctification assumes a new and very definite character; as Christian holiness, general consecration to the service of God becomes a specific consecration to the mission of redemption. In Mt 23:9-11 Jn 9:13, apostoladominum, appealing to the axiom that 'the holy place' sanctifies whatever is devoted to it.

(2) The Epistle to the Hebrews builds upon the OT ideal to be pursued to the end. Sanctification is found in 21:1-10, 10-14, 14-18, 19-22, 23-27, 10:15, 10:12. Being 'the captain of salvation' and 'high priest of mankind, it is the office of Jesus to 'sanctify' His brethren, i.e., to consecrate them to God's service, for which as sinners they have been disabled (5:10). This He effects God-ward by 'making propitiation for their 'sins' (5:11), and man-ward by 'cleansing their conscience' with the very act of His blood—removing the sense of personal guilt before God—even as the animal sacrifices 'sanctified' the Israelites 'unto the cleanness of the flesh' (9:14), and made their ritual worship possible. The chasm which sin has opened between man and God was bridged by the mediation of Jesus Christ; no longer is he kept aloof from the Divine presence, but is bidden to 'come with boldness unto the throne of grace' (4:16). 'Once for all' this access has been secured, this qualification bestowed on the people whom 'Jesus sanctified by means of his own blood' (13:2): 'we have been sanctified' according to the 'will of God,' which Jesus embraced and whose demands He met. With the Father in the appointment, it is His offering of his body' (10:14). By that 'one offering has been perfected for ever them that are sanctified'—He has assured, for all who will accept it, till the world's end, a full qualification for fellowship with God. (Atonement, Hebrews supplies the link between the 'I sanctify myself' of Jesus, and 'that they also may be sanctified in truth' (Jn 17). With the writer of Heb, 'cleaning and sanctification' define, on the negative and positive sides, all that St. Paul means by 'justification' and 'sanctification;' only, the second term is here made more prominent and wider in meaning than with the Apostle. St. Paul, the inner, the sinless conscience free from the Law of God, guilty and impotent; his fellow-teacher sees him standing outside the temple of God, defiled and banned. Sanctification means, for the former, engagement to God's service (Ro 6:17-22); for the latter, empowerment by God's worship. That this grace imports, however, in Hebrews more than a status once conferred, is evident from 12:24; it is a state to be increasingly realized, an ideal to be pursued to the end.

(3) St. Paul addresses his readers constantly as 'saints' (see art. Holiness); once as 'sanctified in Christ Jesus' (1 Cor 1),—a phrase synonymous with 'called saints,' i.e., made holy by God's call which they obeyed, when He summoned them into His Kingdom (cf. v. 26, 28-29, 1 Th 1:1-2). The former expression points to the completed act of God by which they have become His saints (cf. Col 3:1). That sanctity, with St. Paul, is a true legal relationship, not primarily of character, is evident from 1 Cor 7:14, where 'the unbelieving husband' or 'wife' is said to 'have been sanctified in the Christian wedded partnership, so that their offspring are 'holy': the person of the unbelieving, under the marriage-bond is holy in the believer's eyes, as indeed every possession and instrument of life must be (see 1 Th 4:5-6). In the case of the believer himself, who 'in Christ Jesus' is 'sanctified,' one is to imagine immediate personal contact with the holy One in respect of His holiness (Col 3:9), destination and use imply moral condition—'the vessels of the Lord' must be 'clean' and 'made ready for every good work' (2 Th 3:13-14; cf. 1 Th 1, touching the OT Law of Holiness); so that, while 'sanctity' does not denote character, it normally connotes this; all virtue should be under the category of that which 'holy' or 'is fit in the Lord' (Eph 5:2, Col 3:12, 18 etc.). Accordingly, in 1 Th 4:1-2 'sanctification' is opposed specifically to 'lust and sexual uncleanness'—by contrast, doubtless, with the pagan 'contamination' in the case of the hieroduloi of Corinth (cf. 1 Cor 6:19-20).

Sanctification completes justification (wh. see); together, these constitute the present work of salvation, the re-instatement of the sin-scarred before His Maker, his instantiation into the Christian standing and condition (see 1 Cor 6, and the connexion between chs. 5 and 6 of Ro). In principle the former depends on the latter, in experience, they are concomitant (Rom 6:11). They are alike acts of God, dealing with men in His grace through Christ (Ro 8:1, 1 Th 5:23, Jn 17; cf. Lv 22:8f). The 'anointing' and 'sealing' of 2 Co 1:22, while referring formally to baptism, substantially describe sanctification, since God consecrates the believer for His use and marks him in baptism with His 'broad arrow.' As the writer of Hebrews shows in his own way—see (2) above—Christ is the mediator of sanctification no less than of justification. He 'bought' men with the 'price' of His blood—the bodily 'limbs' along with the inner self—so that we are no longer 'our own' and may not 'live for ourselves,' but are, from the hour we know this, men 'living for God in Christ.' Jesus Christ presents His redeemed 'to God as holy' and makes them God's 'sacred possession,' destined 'for the praise of His glory' (1 Co 6:19, Ro 6:19), Eph 1:4, 1 P 2:9, Rev 1:5 etc.). Grace, in relation to the Church His bride, Christ is Himself called the 'sanctifier' (Eph 5:26, cf. He 13:13). Being our Head and Representative before God, dedicating 'all his own' (Jn 17:19), He accomplished the sanctification of His people, with their justification, once for all (1 Co 15). Paul's saying, 'I have been crucified with Christ' (Gal 2:20), implies that he has been, by the sacrifice of the perfect sacrifice; he thus unfolds the implicit doctrine of Jn 17f and 17-19 (see above; cf. He 10f).

Collectively, believers were sanctified in the self-devotion of their redeeming Lord; individually, they are sanctified when they accept the Redeemer's sacrifice and personally endorse His action. From the latter point of view, sanctification is 'the man's own deed: he 'presents himself from the dead to God as a living sacrifice, holy and impotent; but the sinner is never, as in OT phrase, said to 'sanctify himself,'—though 1 Th 4:5-7 approaches this mode of statement. The Holy Spirit is, with much emphasis, identified with the work of sanctification; Christian believers are 'sanctified in the Holy Spirit' (Ro 15:16, 1 Co 6; also 1 Th 4f, Eph 5f; cf. 1 P 2f etc.). To receive 'the gift of the Spirit' and to be sanctified are the same thing; when God takes possession of the believer, his 'body' becomes a 'temple of the Holy Ghost' (1 Co 6f) —then he is a holy man; and to possess 'the Spirit' is, in effect, to have 'Christ dwelling in the heart' (Eph 3:16f). This twofold identity ('sanctified' —'in the Spirit' —'joined unto the Lord') holds alike of the Church and of the individual Christian (1 Co 3f, Eph 2f; cf. 1 P 2f etc.). Faith conditions this experience (Ac 26:22, Eph 1f). Like the author of Hebrews, Paul recognizes a progressive holiness based upon the fundamental sanctification of the believer, the former being the growing and complete realization of the latter. Holiness is the starting-point, perfect holiness the goal of the Christian consecrated—the progress is 'a growth in holiness rather than to holiness' (Bartlet). Hence in Ro 6:12-23 the aim of one's 'service to God' and 'righteousness' is found in 'sanctification'; and in 1 Th 5:23 the Apostle prays that God will 'sanctify' his readers, who are still lacking in many respects (3:9), so that their 'spirit, soul, and body in full integrity may be. preserved,' and thus found 'blameless in holiness before God at the coming of our Lord Jesus' (2 Th 1:12). This supplication touches the ideal life in Christ; but it is an ideal to the present Christian state, and is not to be relegated to the visionary or the celestial: 'Faithful is he who calleth you; who also will do it' (1 Th 5:24).

St. John does not employ in his Epistles either 'sanctify' or 'sanctification,' while their whole substructure is that of the teaching of Hebrews in speaking of 'the sanctification' made by our 'Advocate,' whose 'blood cleanses from all sin' and thus brings the sinner into 'fellowship with the Father.' Paul's doctrine of holiness is resumed in such passages as 3:17, 4:4, 5:20, setting forth union with Christ through the indwelling Spirit as the spring of a new, eternal life for the man, in the strength of which God's commandments are kept in love, sin and fear are cast out, and the world is overcome. SANCTUARY.—See HIGH PLACE; TABERNACLE, 11(0); TEMPLE.

SAND.—Minute particles of silex, mica, felspar, etc., easily rolled before the wind; hence, probably, its Heb. name, chōl. It lies in great stretches along the borders of Egyptian sea-board—an apt symbol of the inextricably vast or numerous (Gen 22:14, Jer 33:10 etc.). For 'sand,' in Job 29:11, we should probably read, with RV, 'Phoenix.' However compact and firm, sand at once becomes soft at the touch of water (Mt 13:8 etc.).

SANHEDRIN.—The Gr. word synedrion (EV council) became so familiar to the Jews that they adopted it in the form of Sanhedrin, which occurs very frequently both in the Bible and in the Talmud.

1. According to Rabbinical tradition, the Sanhedrin was originally created by Moses in obedience to Divine command (cf. Nu 11:1, and let it be that this assembly existed, and exercised judicial functions, throughout the whole period of Biblical history right up to Talmudic times. That this cannot have been the case is seen already in the fact that, according to Biblical authority itself, King Jehoshaphat is mentioned as having instituted the supreme court at Jerusalem (2 Ch 19:10); but that this court cannot have been identical with the Sanhedrin of later times is clear from the fact that, whereas the latter had governing powers as well as judicial functions, the former was only a court of justice and nothing else. It is possible that the 'elders' mentioned in the Book of Ezra (5:6; 6:14; 10:4) and 'rulers' in the Book of Nehemiah (2:4, 6; 4:8) constituted a body which to some extent corresponded to the Sanhedrin properly so called. But seeing that the Sanhedrin is often referred to as a Gerousia (i.e. an aristocratic, as distinct from a democratic, body), and that as such it is not mentioned before the time of Antiochus the Great (2 Macc 13:28), it is reasonably certain that, in its fully developed form at all events, it did not exist before the Greek period. The Sanhedrin is referred to under the name Gerousia (EV senate) in 2 Macc 1:45, 4th 11/21 154 and elsewhere in the Apoc. (Ac 6:5, and, frequently in Josephus, e.g. Ant. v. VIII. 41.

The Sanhedrin was conceived of mainly as a court of justice, the equivalent Heb. term being Beth Din, and it is in this latter sense that it is largely referred to in the NT (see, e.g., Mt 5:22-26, Mk 15, Lk 22, Jn 11:46, Ac 20:28, etc.). Sometimes in the NT the terms Presbyterion and Gerousia are used in reference to the Sanhedrin (Mt 5:22-23). A member of this court was called a bouleutes ('councillor'). Joseph of Arimathea was one (Mk 15:46, Lk 23:50). The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70).

2. As regards the composition of the Sanhedrin, the hereditary high priest stood at the head of it, and in its fundamental character it formed a hereditary aristocracy, and represented the nobility, i.e., predominantly the Sadducean interest; but under Herod, who favoured the Pharisaic party in his desire to secure the power and influence of the old nobility, the Sadducean element in the Sanhedrin became less prominent, while that of the Pharisees increased. So that during the Roman period it contained representatives of two opposed parties, the priestly nobility with its formal sympathies, and the learned Pharisees. According to the Mishna, the Sanhedrin consisted of seventy-one members (Sanhed. 1:6); when a vacancy occurred the members co-opted the Mosaic Law 'from the charging station' to fill the place (Sanhed. IV. 4), and he was admitted by the ceremony of the laying on of hands.

3. The extent of the Sanhedrin's jurisdiction varied at different times in its history; while, in a certain sense, it exercised civil jurisdiction over all Jewish communities, wherever they existed, during the time of Christ this was restricted to Judaea proper; it was for this reason that it had no judicial authority over Him so long as He remained in Galilee. Its orders were followed by soon after the time of Christ, regarded as binding by orthodox Jews all over the world. Thus we see that it would issue warrants for the apprehension of Christians in Damascus to the synagogue there (Ac 9:29); but the extent to which Jewish communities outside of Judaea were willing to submit to such orders depended entirely on how far they were favourably disposed towards the central authority; it was only within the limits of Judaea proper that real authority could be exercised by the Sanhedrin. It was thus the supreme Jewish court, as contrasted with the foreign authority of Rome; to it belonged all such judicial matters as the local provincial courts were incompetent to deal with, or as the Roman procurator did not attend to himself. Above all, it was the final court of appeal for questions connected with the Mosaic Law: it was only when the case had been given, the judges of the lower courts were, on pain of death, bound to acquiesce in it. The NT offers some interesting examples of the kind of matters that were decided by the Sanhedrin. Stephen was condemned by it because of blasphemy (Ac 6:12, 13), and Paul was charged with transgression of the Mosaic Law (Ac 22:2). It had independent authority and rights to arrest people by its own officers (Mt 26:5, Mk 14:5, Ac 4:27, 15); it had also the power finally to dispose of any matters of such cases as did not involve sentence of death (Ac 4:21, 5:26-40). It was only in cases where the sentence of death was pronounced that the latter had to be ratified by the Roman authorities (Jn 19:4); the case of the stoning of Stephen must be regarded as an instance of mob-justice.

While the Sanhedrin could not hold a court of supreme jurisdiction in the absence, or, at all events, without the consent, of the Roman procurator, it enjoyed, nevertheless, wide powers within the sphere of its extensive jurisdiction. At the same time, it had sometimes to submit to the painful experience of realizing its dependent position in face of the Roman power, even in matters which might be regarded as peculiarly within the scope of its own jurisdiction; for the Roman authorities could at any time take the initiative themselves, and proceed in independence of the Jewish court, as the NT testifies, e.g. in the case of Paul's arrest (see also Ac 23:23, 29, 30).

4. The Sanhedrin met in the Temple, in what was called the Lokahah hall (in his desire to heap stones" as a general rule, though an exception is recorded in Mt 26:55, Mk 14:55). The members sat in a semicircle in order to be able to see each other; in front stood clerks of the court, and behind these, three rows of the disciples of the ‘learned men.’ The prisoner had always to be dressed in mourning. When any one had spoken once in favour of the accused, he could not afterwards speak against him. In case of acquittal the decision might be annulled. The prisoner, when a sentence of condemnation was always pronounced on the day following, or later; in the former a simple majority sufficed, in the latter a majority of two-thirds was required.

SARAH or SARAI.—1. 'Sarah' is the form used previously to Gn 17:5, and 'Sarai' afterwards, in harmony with the change of name there narrated (by P). It is probable that there is no real significance in the change, -as being an old feminine ending found in Sumerian and Egyptian, whereas Sar is the common feminine ending. Sarah means 'princess.' The occurrence of the name Sa-ra-a-a in an Assyrian letter (K 1274) adds no definite information. Sarah was the wife of Abraham, and also his half-sister (Gn 12:10; 20:9; her parentage is not given further. She was taken as wife by the king of Egypt and also by Abimelech king of Gerar, and afterwards restored to Abraham (12:20-20). The former incident is in J, the latter in E; they may be different versions of the same story. The statement that she was at least 65 years old at this time (Gn 12:10), seems inconsistent with these incidents, and especially with the statement concerning her beauty (12:14). It is to be remembered, however, that the dates belong to P. Sarah was long barren, but finally Isaac was born after supernatural intervention, when she was 90 years old (21:21 [P]). Through jealousy Sarah illtreated Hagar, her handmaid, the concubine of Abraham, and finally drove her away with her son Ishmael (16, 21:10-11). The incident is in harmony with the regulations of the Babylonian Hammurabi Code. Hagar was freed at the age of 127 (P), and was buried in the cave of Machpeleh (Gn 23). In the NT she is mentioned in Ro 4:26; He 11:21, 1 P 5:8; Gal 4:29-5:3.

SARCHEDONUS (To 1st.—Eshraddon (wh. see).

SARDIS was the capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia, in Asia Minor, and in the 6th cent. B.C. one of the most powerful cities of the world. It stood on one of the alluvial hills between Mount Tmolus and the sea, about 1500 feet above and south of the great plain of the river Hermus, and was inaccessible except by a neck of land on the south. The date of its foundation must be about B.C. 1200, and the situation was ideal for an early fortified capital of a kingdom. As time advanced, extension was necessary, and a lower city was built on the west and north side of the original city, near the little river Pactolus, and probably also on the east side. The older city now acted as acropolis, or citadel, for the later. This rich Oriental city, whose wealth depended on well-cultivated and incessant commerce, was for centuries to the Greek the type of an Oriental despotism, under which all must sooner or later bend. Its absorption was not without its effects on the conquerors, and Sardis became the home of a newer Hellenism, different from the old.

Cresus was king of Lydia in the second half of the 6th cent. B.C., and planned a campaign against Cyrus, the Persian king. He proceeded with the greatest and crossed the river Halys. There he was completely defeated. He returned to prepare a second army, but Cyrus pursued him in haste, and besieged him in Sardis before he could get it ready. The citadel was captured by means of a climber who worked his way up by an oblique crevice in the perpendicular rock. The city was similarly captured by Antiochus the Great from Achæus late in the third century B.C. The patron deity of the city was Cybele, but she is conceived as possessing different attributes from those usually associated with the name. A special characteristic was the power of restoring life to the dead. The city suffered greatly from an earthquake in 1767, and received a large donation as well as a remission of five years' taxation from the Emperor Tiberius. The greatness of the city under the Roman empire was due entirely to its past reputation. The acropolis ceased to be inhabited, being no longer necessary for purposes of defence. Its use was revived in the earlier Turkish days, but for long there has been no settlement at Sardis. Its place is taken by Sallûkî, above 5 miles to the east.

According to the view of Sir W. M. Ramsay, Sardis is alluded to in the Apocalypse, as are all the other six churches, as a centre of influence in it; and one of the cities within its sphere was Magnesia. The letter addressed by the writer of the Apocalypse to Sardis, with which, as with the other six cities named there, he was obviously well acquainted, shows that the church at Sardis was practically decimated, and decayed from its early promise to an extent equalled by no other city. There were in it only a few faithful souls. That there is a remarkable analogy between the history of the city and the history of the city and the history of the church. The instability of the city in history finds its parallel in the immorality of the church members. Most of the Christians had fallen back to the pagan level of life. The few noble ones shall have their names enrolled in the list of the citizens of heaven. The letter doubtless had a good effect. Christianity survived at Sardis. It was the capital of the province Lydia, instituted about A.D. 265. The bishop of Sardis was metropolitan of Lydia, and sixth in order of precedence of all the bishops subject to the patriarch of Constantinople. Not far from Sardis there dwells in the present day a people whose customs differ so much from those of Mohammedanism that it is probable they would become Christian if they dared. A. SOUTTER.

SARGON (Is 20:1).—The father of Sennacherib and successor of Shalmaneser iv., king of Assyria (B.C. 722-705). Sargon was captured early in his reign, and Sargon carried away 27,200 of the chief inhabitants, the city being placed under Assyrian governors, Sargon's advent to the throne marked a change of dynasty, and he had to subdue Asshur and right and left. Merodach-baladan, once king of the Chaldaean State of Bit-Yakin, seized Babylon, and was supported by the Elamites. Sargon defeated the latter, but was obliged to leave Merodach-baladan undisturbed for twelve years, while he subdued the northern rivals of Assyria, Armenia and its neighbours. In B.C. 720 he faced a combination of the W. States under Tiu-bihdi, who, together with Asaiah, Arpad, Damascus, and Philistia, revolted. This was soon put down, Hamath was colonized by Assyrians, and the Philistines and Egyptians were defeated at Raphia. Then Carchemish was captured and absorbed into the empire (n.c. 717). But Sargon's greatest difficulty was with Armenia, and the rebellions it perpetually stirred up. He was, however, successful in the end, and subdued all the region S. of the Caucasus and parts of Cilicia, as well as parts of Media. In B.C. 711 an Assyrian army was sent against Pales- tine, where Merodach-baladan had been intriguing and had drawn Hezekiah into the conspiracy. Ashdod was captured, and Judah, Moab, and Edom submitted. Merodach-baladan was expelled from Babylonia (n.c. 709), and then chased from Bit-Yakin, whither he had retreated. Sargon was welcomed as the deliverer of the native Babylonians, and became king of Babylon. He was then in a position to be magnificently coronated. In n.c. 708 Sargon was annexed. Sargon was killed B.C. 705,—how or where is not yet clear. He founded a magnificent city at Dur-Sargon, the modern Khorsabad, W. of Nineveh.

SARD.—A border town of Zebulun (Jos 19:15). Probably Sard is a copyist's error for Sardid, which may be identified with Tell Shaddad, to the N. of the plain of Esdraelon.

SAROTHIE.—A family of 'Solomon's servants' (1 Es 3:5).

SARSECHIM seems to be the name of a Bab. official (Jer 39:9), but the versions—Naboussachar, Naboussarch, Sarasechim—suggest that the text was early corrupt. There is no known Bab. name which exactly corresponds to any of these variants, and it is impossible to identify the person intended. C. H. W. Johns.

SATAN.—1. In the OT.—The term Satan is Hebrew and means 'adversary.' In the earlier usage of the language it is employed in the general sense of 'wickedness,' 'penalty,' or 'nabu' (nabu being a rich development of the phrase (cf. e.g. Nm 3:10, 2 Kgs 14:2, 1 Kgs 14:15 etc.). In such passages no trace of a distinct being designated 'Satan' is to be seen. Such a being meets us for the first time in the OT in the prologue (chs. 1 and 2) of the BK of Job, in the person of one of 'the sons of God' who bears the title of 'the Satan.' Here Satan appears as a member of the celestial council of angelic beings who have access to the presence of God. His special function is to watch over human affairs and beings with the object of searching out men's sins and accusing them in the celestial court. He is thus invested with a certain malevolent and malignant character; but it is to be observed that he has no power to act without the Divine permission being first obtained, and cannot, therefore, be regarded as the embodiment of the power that opposes the Deity. In Zec 3 essentially the same view of 'the Satan' is preserved (Zec 3:1). In both passages the word 'Satan' is used of one who combats against Israel, and moved David to number Israel.) The personality of this being is more distinct: he appears now as 'Satan' (a proper name without the article), the tempter who is able to provoke David to number Israel. This is the Chronicler's (4th or 3rd cent. B.C.) reading of the incident which in the earlier narrative (2 S 24) is ascribed to the direct action of God Himself. Elsewhere (2 S 24) the work of Satan is apparently conceived of as more or less independent of, and opposed to, the Divine action.

2. In the extra-canonical literature of the OT.—In the later (apocryphal) literature of pre-Christian Judaism the dualistic tendency becomes more pronounced—a tendency powerfully affected by Persian influence, it would seem, which is also apparent in the development of an elaborate Jewish angelology and demonology. This is most clearly visible in the apocalyptic literature. In the oldest part of the BK of Enoch (chs. 1-36), dating, perhaps, from about B.C. 180, the origin of the demons is traced to the fall of the angelic watchers, and they are depicted as corrupting themselves with the 'daughters of men' (Gn 6:4). It was from the offspring of these sinful unions—the 'giants' or nēphēth—that the demons were sprung. Of these demons the Asmodēus of the BK of Tobit (3:11) seems to have been regarded as the king (Bk. Pes. 110a). The name Asmodēus (or in Heb. Ashmedai) has plausibly been connected with the ancient Persian Ašmaš ē, i.e. 'the covetous or lustful demon'; it is said to be 'like a serpent, to pervert wisdom, or 'bringer of destruction,' and this demon may be intended by 'the destroyer of Wisdom 18 and by the Apōlyon ('Destroyer') of Rev 9. In the latest part of the BK of Enoch, however, the so-called 'Similitudes' (chs. xxxvii-xxx), which perhaps dates from about B.C. 64, 'the fallen watchers' (and their descendants) are carefully distinguished from the tovoke, who appear to belong to a 'counter-faith' evil which existed before the fall of the watchers recorded in Gn 6, the latter, in consequence of their fall, becoming subject to the former. Apparently these 'Evil Ones' are ruled by a single chief. C. H. W. J., in one passage (Enoch 54), 'Their functions were twofold: they tempted to evil (69:1); they accused the dwellers upon earth (49:3); they punished the condemned. In this last character they are technically called 'angels of punishment' (53:505; 62:835; (Charles).

In the BK of Wisdom (29:3; 'by the envy of the devil that entered into the world') we already meet with the identification of the Serpent of Gn 3 as Satan, which afterwards became a fixed element in belief, and an allusion to the same idea may be detected in the Psalms of Solomon 41, where the prosperous wicked 'flow together as a river, and they are blown away as the wind.' The identification also meets us in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch (71st cent. B.C.), where, moreover, satanology is a rich and deep study. The identity of the Satans is Sammael, who is often referred to as 'the angel of death': and in the Secrets of Enoch he is prince of the demons and a magician. It is interesting to note that in the later Midrash one of the works of Messiah ben-Joseph is the slaying of Sammael, who is 'the Satan, the prime mover of all evil.' In the earlier literature his great opponent is the archangel Michael. The Rabbinic doctrine of the 'evil impulse' (getzelut), which works within man (a Ch. 21:5), looks like a theological refinement, which has sometimes been combined with the popular view of Satan (Satan works his evil purpose by the instrumentality of the 'evil impulse')

3. In the NT.—In the NT, Satan and his kingdom are frequently referred to. Sometimes the Hebrew name 'Satan' is used (e.g. Mk 3:26, 4:11), sometimes its Greek equivalent (diabolos: cf. our word 'diabolical') which is translated 'devil,' and which means 'accuser' or 'calumniator.' In Mt 12:27 (cf. 10:22) Satan is apparently identified with Beelzebub (or Bedebeub), and is occasionally designated 'the evil one' (Mt 13:18f., etc.; so, perhaps, also in the Lord's Prayer: 'deliver us from the evil one'). Some scholars are of opinion that the name Beelzebub means not 'fly-god' but 'enemy' (i.e. the enemy of God). He is called the 'prince of the devils' (or demons) in Mt 12:27, just as Sammael, 'the great prince in heaven,' is designated the 'chief of Satan's' in the Midrash.

The demonology that confronts us in the NT has striking points of contact with that which is developed in the Enochic literature. The main features of the latter, in fact, reappear. The 'angels which kept not their first estate' (Jude 6, 2 Pet 2) are the angelic watchers whose fall through lust is described in Enoch 6-16. Their punishment is to be kept imprisoned in perpetual darkness. In Enoch the demons, who are represented as the evil spirits which went forth from the souls of the giant offspring of the fallen watchers, exercise an evil (heavenly) agency, the latter, 'hither to torment us before the time?'). They belong to and are subject to Satan. As in the Book of Enoch, Satan is represented in the NT as the ruler of a counter-kingdom which is to bring its kingdom as a counter-judgment (cf. Mt 12:28f., Lk 11:15f.). Satan is the ruler (Mt 8:29, 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?') and the one who is to subject all to himself (Mt 25:31). He is the one who is the 'enemy' of God (Lk 13:28).

In the Synoptic Gospels Satan is identified with the Serpent of Gn 3. It is also noteworthy that St. Paul shared the contemporary belief that angelic beings inhabited the higher (heavenly) regions, and that Satan also with his retinue dwelt not beneath the earth, but in the lower atmospheric region; cf. Eph 6:7, where 'the prince of the power of the air' = Satan (cf. also Eph 8:3 and Lk 10:18). The Serpent was a symbol of Satan (cf. Gen 3:1). Satan is the serpent (Rev 12:9). For Satan's rôle in the Apocalypse see art. APOCALYPSE. Cf. also art. DEVIL.

4. The attitude of our Lord towards the Satan-belief is clearly apparent in the Synoptic tradition, recognized the existence and power of a kingdom of evil, with organized demonic agencies under the control of a supreme personality, Satan or Beelzebub. These demonic agencies are the source of every variety of physical and moral evil. One principal function of the Messiah is to destroy the works of Satan and his subordinates (Mt 12:28, Lk 10:18). Maladies traced to demonic possession play a large part in the Synoptic narratives (see DEVIL, POSSESSION). In the expulsion of demons by his disciples, Jesus sees the overthrow of Satan's power (Lk 10:18). The evil effected by the disciples is intellectual and moral as well as physical (Mt 4:31, Mt 13:18, cf. 2 Co 4). That our Lord accepted the reality of such personal agencies of evil cannot seriously be questioned; nor is it necessary to endeavour to explain this fact away. The problem is to some extent a psychological one. Under certain conditions and in certain localities the sense of the presence and potency of evil personalities has been painfully and oppressively felt by more than one modern European, who was not prone to superstition. It is also literally true that the light of the gospel and the power of Christ operate still in such cases 'to destroy the works of darkness' and expel the demons. G. H. Box.

SAUL.—1. Son of Kish, a Benjamite, the first king of Israel. We first meet him about to abandon the nomadic life of the shepherd (I Sam 9:1-14), perhaps, on the advice of some friend or the oracle at the temple at Shiloh, he set out to consult Samuel.

As it was customary to bring a present to a seer, and the wallet was empty, Saul hesitated till the servant produced the fourth part of a shew-bread of silver devoted to God. The seer, who was Israel's prophet, knew this was an evil act, and held the matter of the kingdom to Saul, and anointed him as he was leaving.

Saul was given certain signs in atestation of Samuel's message, and after leaving the seer's house, where he and his servant spent the night, he met a band of prophets, and soon was prophesying among them, to the marvel of his acquaintances (1 10:6). This narrative gives no hint that the people asked for a king, or that his selection would be displeasing to either

Samuel or Jehovah.

The account is interrupted at 10:1 by one of a different temper. The people demand a king, which Samuel interprets to be a rejection of Jehovah, their true king, and Saul, after protest, is elected. He remained quietly at home till Nahash's cruel demand that the men of Jabesh-gilead should surrender to him, and each one lose the right eye, roused him. He was deliberately to the ruin of the nation, and immediately sacrificed the oxen, sending out parts of the sacrifice to his brethren with the command that they should follow him. When the army was mustered he marched to Jabesh-gilead and administered a crushing defeat to Nahash, after which his grateful countrymen made him king at Gibeah (ch. 11). A still greater necessity for a king appears in the encroachments of the Philistines.

Saul and Jonathan, his son, were encamped in Michmash and Gibeah (Geba), when Jonathan smote the 'garrison' (7) of the Philistines in Geba, thus precipitating the struggle.

The plan of the Philistines was to send out plundering parties, and Jonathan threw the whole camp into cfusion by surprising one of its guerillas headquarters

(13;14). When Saul heard of the flight of the enemy he inquired of the oracle what to do, but the rout was so apparent that it joined pursuit without the answer.

The destruction of the enemy would have been greater had not Saul put a taboo on food. In the evening the famished warriors fell upon the cattle, and ate without sacrificing till the reported impurity reached the ears of Saul, who legitimated the meal by sacrificing at great stone. As he failed to receive an answer from the oracle, when he inquired whether he should pursue the Philistines farther, Saul concluded that some one had

The verb 'to savour' is either 'to taste or smell of;' as in Pref. to AV 'to savour more of curiosity than of wisdom;' or 'to seek out or to search by tasting or smelling,' used fig. in Mk 8:4 'Thou savourest not the things that be of God.'

SCEPTRE, as tr. of σκῆλος, may stand either for a short ornamental sceptre such as appears in some representations of the Assyrian king, or for a long staff reaching to the ground, which characterizes some portrayals of the Persian monarchs. The long sceptre is simply an ornamental staff, the short one is a development of the ritual mace, cf. also LAYWYER and SHILON. On the difficulty of approaching the presence of the Persian kings referred to in Est 4:14, cf. also Herod. iii. 118, 110.

SCÉEVA.—At Ephesus, where St. Paul worked 'special powers' (Ac 19:10), certain 'wanton Jews' (RV 'strolling'; perhaps conveys too much the idea of 'vagabond') endeavoured to exorcise evil spirits by naming over them the name of Jesus. Among them were seven sons of one Seeva, a Jewish 'chief priest' (probably one of the high-priestly family). In v.14 the demonic overcomes 'both of them' (RV). Seeva himself is not said to have been present. The incident led to many conversions, and several brought and destroyed their books of magic.

There is a difficulty in the text. Seven sons are mentioned in v.14, and these are reduced to two in v.15. Perhaps St. Luke is here abbreviating a written source which detailed the incident more fully, and explained that two out of the seven sons tried to exorcise this particular demon. Inferior MSS (followed by AV) substitute 'them' for 'both of them,' and the Bezan Codex (D) omits the word 'seven' altogether, calls Seeva merely 'a priest,' and adds other phrases which are expansions of our text. But these seem to be but explanations of a difficult original text; and the RV is probably correct. The word 'seven' could never have been inserted if it were not St. Luke's. [See Laywye and Shilon.]

Prof. Ramsay thinks that the whole passage is unworthy of Luke (St. Paul the Traveler, p. 272f.). But it is unsafe to judge first-century thought by that of our own day. The Apostle age firmly believed in possession by evil spirits; and there is really nothing in this chapter unlike what we read elsewhere in NT.

SCHOOL, SCHOOLMASTER.—'School' occurs in EV only in Ac 19:8 for the lecture-room of an Ephesian rhetorician (cf. EDUCATION, p. 204); 'schoolmaster' only in Gal 3:2 as AV, for which RV has 'tutor.' The original is παιδαγός, lit. 'child-conductor,' 'pedagogue'—an old and trusty slave, who accompanied the Greek child to and from school and 'was bound never to lose sight of him, to carry his lyre and tablets, and to keep him out of mischief' (Gardner and JeVons, Manual of Gr. Ant., 303). He had nothing to do with the teaching, as is suggested by both the English renderings. The same word is rendered 'instructors' in 1 Co 4:14 AV (RV, as before, 'tutors'). In AV the latter word is found only in Gal 4:1 as the tr. of an entirely different word, correctly rendered 'guardians' by RV. For the duties of guardians in Gr. law see op. cit. 552 f. A. B. S. SCORPION (Gr. sdr, Heb. same name). Dt 8:i, Ezek 2:2; John, Lk 19:11ff., Rev 9:1f. —The scorpion belongs to the Arachnida or spider family. It occurs plentifully in Palestine, ten species being known; it is nocturnal in its habits, and kills small insects, spiders, etc., for food by means of the poisonous sting at the end of its tail.

The effect of the poison on human beings is severe pain, and sometimes collapse and even death, the latter in young children only. The 'scorpions' of 1 K 12:14, 2 Ch 16:14 are clearly used only figuratively, but it is possible, but hardly likely (see Hastings' DCG, art. 'Scorpion'), that the language of our Lord in Lk 11:2 is suggested by the egg-like form of the 'scorpion' when at rest.

More probably He has in mind some such form of proverb as was current among the Greeks: 'Instead of a perch, a scorpion.'

SCRIBE.—Sometimes a phrase gives the key to a great history. Such is the case here. 'The scribes of the Pharisees' (Mk 2:28) points us to the inseparable connexion between the Pharisees and the Scribes. In other places in the Gospels they are also grouped together (Mt 12:2, Lk 6:5, Mk 7:1). If we would understand the Scribe or Lawyer, we must set him against the background of Pharisaism (see art. Pharisees).

For every community that carves out for itself a great career the supreme problem is law and its administration. Now, after the Exile, the task being to hold together the parts of a nation widely scattered and to combine the unifying power of a common and sacred fatherland, the Mosaic Torah, the Divine Law for Israel, became, in course of time, the moral and spiritual constitution of Israel, its code of duty, the fabric of its life. The Torah is the informing principle of the community. To grasp this principle and apply it to the changing conditions and questions of the nation's life was the supreme need of the time. This need was analogous to the similar need of any great State. And it always necessitates, as at Rome, a great body of lawyers. A fundamental need gives rise to an authoritative function, and the function creates for itself the agents to exercise it. So, in course of time, appears in Judaism a new type, the Scribe. There is, however, a peculiarity in the case of the Scribe that sets him apart from the Roman lawyer or the modern judge. The Scribe which he interpreted and applied was a good many things in one. It was the text-book of a society which was both Church and State; it was at once the constitution and the catechism of the Jews.

So the mastery and administration of it developed in the Scribe a variety of functions which with us are parcelled out among preacher, scholar, lawyer, and magistrate. It is easy to see that history owed him a fortune. He came to occupy a great position in the Jewish community. By the last cent. he had forced his way into that aristocratic body, the Sanhedrin (Gamaliel Lk Ac 5; Nicodemus in Jn 3 and 7). He sat in 'Moses' seat' (Mt 23). He had the power of 'binding and loosing,' i.e. of publishing authoritative judgments upon the legality and illegality of actions.

We see here a situation which had the making of great men in it. To grasp and administer the Mosaic Law, to 'sit in Moses' seat' and become the trustee of the supreme interests of a great people,—there can be no better school. Naturally, there were many noble Scribes, men whose character and learning were commensurate with their task. Such were Iliel and Shamal, elder contemporaries of our Lord. Such also was the Gamaliel at whose feet St. Paul sat (Ac 22:2), and who spoke, with noble feeling, against the persecuting zeal of the Sadducees (506d). As a class, too, they had their noble side. Their work, both in the learned and in the practical, was for the most part eminently public spirited, and many of them were not unlearned in the ways of life. They were to receive no pay. Probably this rule grew out of the idea of an impartial judge (Ex 23:1, Dt 16:19). Of course, there must have been many exceptions. Yet the idea was eminently beneficent, and must have served to enkindle devotion. But, on the other hand, their position encouraged vast pride and vanity. They stood on their prerogatives as 'Teachers.' They loved the title of 'Rabbi.' So our Lord, when He bids His disciples refuse such title (Mt 23:7f.), has the Scribes in mind.

This leads us to the deeper defect of the Scribes as a class. All their training went to unfit them for understanding our Lord. As we have seen, the situation of the Jews in the centuries after the Exile called for a new type of man. The Prophet passed off the stage. The Scribe or Lawyer took his place. In the 1st cent. of our era he had become the veneration to Prophets. He had no sympathy with John the Baptist, and to the meaning of the creative force in spiritual things brought into history by the Saviour there was totally blind. Hence our Lord's fearful denunciation of the Scribes (Mt 23). See also artt. PHARISEES and SADDUCEES.

SCRIP.—See Bag.

SCRIPTURE.—1. The word 'Scripture' (Lat. scriptura, a writing; something written') is used for the Bible as a whole, more often in the plural form 'Scriptures,' and also more properly for a passage of the Bible. It appears as τ. of the Greek γραφή, which is used in the singular for a portion of the OT (e.g. Mk 12:29), and also for the whole OT (Gal 2:16) and more frequently in the plural (αισθαγραφαί). The specific idea of Scripture contains an element of sanctity and authority. Thus it becomes usual to refer to Holy Scripture, or the Holy Scriptures (ἐν γραφαις ἡσιατικαί, Ro 1).

2. This specific conception of Scripture as distinguished from ordinary writing is due to the reception of it as a record of the word of God, and is therefore associated with inspiration. The earliest reference to any such record is in the narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law by Hilkiah the scribe in the time of Josiah (2 K 22:8).

Since this book is now known to have been Deuteronomy or part of it, we must reckon that this first book treated as Scripture. Still greater sanctity was given to the enlarged and more developed Law in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, and from that time the whole Pentateuch, regarded as the Law given by God to Moses, is treated as especially sacred and authoritative. The special function of the scribes in guarding and teaching the Law rested on this Scriptural character attached to it, and in turn rendered it the more venerable as Scripture. Later the reception of the Hagiographa and the Prophets into the Canon led to those collections being regarded also as Scripture, though never with quite the authority attached to the Law.

The Rabbis cherished great veneration for Scripture, and ascribed to it a mechanical inspiration which extended to every word and letter. Philo also accepted plenary inspiration, finding his freedom from the bondage of the letter in allegorical interpretations.

Unlike the Jerusalem Rabbis, in this respect followed by most of the NT writers, who quote Scripture as the immediate word of God, and in so doing is followed by the author of Hebrews. Thus, while St. Mark says, 'as it is written in the prophet' (Mk 12), and St. Paul, 'David saith' (Ro 11:12), in Hebrews we read, 'and become thescribed' (i.e. God) saith' (7:1), 'the Holy Ghost saith' (3:1), or, more indefinitely, 'it is said' (2:9), which is quite in the manner of Philo. Still, the technical expression 'It is written' (γραφή) is very common both in the Gospels and in St. Paul's Epistles. As a Greek writer, it has the peculiar force of a present state resulting from a past action. Thus it always conveys the thought that sculpture, although it was written long ago, does not belong to the past, but is given to us in to-day, and its inherent present authority is thus emphasized as that of a law now in force. The impersonal character of the passive verb also adds to the effect thus introduced, as something weighty on its own account.

3. No NT writings during the Apostolic age are attested, with its associated authority, always reserved by the Apostles for the OT. Thus is an apparent exception in 2 Pet 3:18, where the Epistles of 'our beloved brother Paul' are associated with 'the other scriptures'; but this is a strong argument in favour of assigning to 2 Pet, to a late period in the second century. Apart from this, we first meet with the technical phrase 'It is written' attached to a NT passage in Barn. iv. 4; but here it is a Gospel citation of a saying of Christ: 'As it is written, Many are called but few chosen.' Thus the authority of Christ's words leads to the record of them being cited as Scripture. In Polycarp (Phil. xii. 1) we have the title 'Scripture' applied to the source of a NT quotation, but only in the Latin tr. (his scriptura). In 2 Clem. ii. 4 a saying of Christ is cited as Scripture. But, apart from these rare instances, no writer previous to the second half of the second century appeals to the NT as technically Scripture. Clement of Alexandria in the latter part of the second century (with the exception of Irenaeus), Hermas, and even Justin Martyr use the title for the OT only. Theophilus of Antioch (c. 180) cites passages from St. Paul as 'the Divine word' (ad Athen. xil. 51). It is only later that the other Latin church fathers constantly treat NT passages as the word of God and authoritative Scripture. For an explanation of this remarkable development, see CANON OF NT.

SCYTTHIANS.—A wandering race of the Indo-European stock who lived between the Danube and the Don, and spread over the territory between the Caucasus and the Caspian. They were a cruel and savage people, of huge build. The Athenians employed them as police. In Col 3rd they are mentioned as a degree worse than barbarians. The latter word simply connoted those who spoke neither Greek nor Latin. A. BOURH.

SEA in Scripture generally means the Mediterranean, when the context introduces no distinction by which the particular sea is defined, e.g. in Nu 33, Jos 24, etc. 'The Great Sea' is the Mediterranean (Nu 34, 24, 472, etc.). 'The Sea of the Arabians' (or the Dead Sea) is the Sea of Galilee (Nu 342, etc.). 'The Sea of the Philistines' is the Mediterranean off the Palestinian coast (Ex 239). Yhsh Shp, 'Sea of Wesuds' (Ex 101, etc.), is identical with 'the Red Sea' of Ht 11, Jh 5th etc., and is always so translated. The Nile, as in modern Arabic (al Bahor), is called 'the sea' (is 18h etc.), so also the Euphrates (Is 21, Jer 5113). 'The sea' of Jazer is a scribal error (Jer 483; cf. Is 19). ym, 'sea', is the usual word for 'West'; the Mediterranean forming the W. boundary of Palestine (Gn 12 etc.). The phrase 'from sea to sea' (Am 9 etc.) probably signified the ends of the earth. The influence of the Babylonian myth of the conflict of the gods with the primeval sea may be traced in certain Scripture representations of the sea. See BET. "Commen", in Hastings, DB, Tshm (EV 'deep') of Gn 1 etc. resembles the Bab. Timpal. By the dismemberment of this monster the ordered world is produced (Gn 1). The turbulent and dangerous character of the sea is often referred to in Scripture (Ps 46, 89, 17, 42, Jer 49 etc.). In the Old Testament, the sea came up the monsters of Daniel's vision (7th.); so also in the Apocalypse (13th). If in the literature of the Hebrews there is manifest a certain horror of, and shrinking from, the sea, which seem strange to a sect faring people, we must remember that, as a nation, Israel never knew the sea; nor need we wonder if, viewed from their mountain heights, stretching vast and mysterious over the far horizon, it seemed to them the very home of storms and vague terror. So when the Jewish seer depicts the future home of the blessed there is 'no more sea'. (Rev 21'). Cf. DULCIB, I, RASAB, 2.

SEA OF GLASS.—One of the features of the heavenly landscape described in Rev 21. 16. By its side stood those who had been victorious in the struggle with the beast, singing to the glory of God. Its location was apparently before the throne of God. Just what the Hebrew word means here intended, is it difficult to state. The probability is, however, that there is no distinct symbolism whatever, but that the reference is rather to the brilliancy of the waters as one element in the supremely beautiful land of heaven. SHALER MATHEWS.

SEAH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, 11.

SEAL, SIGNET.—The existence of seals is attested for the early dynasties of Egypt, and for an equally remote period in Babylonia. The use of a seal in the OT is in connexion with the patriarch Judah, who fared forth with his staff in hand and his seal hung round his neck by a cord (Gn 3811 RV), and from him, according to an ancient gentile in the days of Herodotus (I. 195). The seals hitherto found in Palestine show little initiative on the part of the Hebrews in this branch of the fine arts, many showing plainly the predominant influence of Egypt, or to a less extent of Babylonia.

As regards material, almost every variety of precious stone was used for this purpose, although ordinary limestone, and even baked clay were used by those who could afford nothing better. An almost equal wealth of form is attested by the extant seals. Thus the scarab and the scaraboid forms were distinctive of Babylonia. Other, again, were conical in shape, while the square form is not unknown.

Most of the extant seals bearing evidence of a Hebrew origin, however, are oval in outline. This was also the usual form for seals intended to be set in the head of a ring. In this case it was customary to wear the ring on one of the fingers of the right hand (Jcr 22; cf. Gn 41). The distinctively Jewish type of seal is marked by two features: (a) the absence of figures, Divine or human, in the field, and (b) the presence of two parallel lines, set close together, which cross the field longitudinally, and divide the inscription into two parts. The legend, as a rule, contained the name preceded by the preposition signifying 'belonging to'—thus 'the property of X, the son of Y., or 'of M, the daughter of N.' for women also had their seals. Many seals, however, whose owners, to judge from their names, were Hebrews, bear figures and symbols in the field, one of them showing the earliest example of the so-called 'shield of David.'

Another of this class is the finest known specimen of a Babylonia seal. It is of Jasper, and oval in shape; the greater part of the field is occupied by a lion, of the most delicate workmanship in the Babylonian style, while above and below is the legend: 'The property of the Shema, servant [i.e. court official] of Jeroboam.' This seal was discovered in 1904 during the German excavations on the site of the ancient Megiddo, and is fully described by Kautzsch in MNDPV 1904, 1-14, 81-83; cf. Liddabaehr, Ephemera 1, Sem. Archæogr., li. 140 ff., where for horizons on the site of the ancient Megiddo, and is fully described by Kautzsch in MNDPV 1904, 1-14, 81-83; cf. Liddabaehr, Ephemera 1, Sem. Archæogr., li. 140 ff., where for horizons on the site of the original and enlarged. It is impossible to decide whether the so called 'Shema' of the Megiddo seal is identical with the original owner of another seal of the more severe type above described, the legend of which runs: 'the property of Shema, the servant of the king.'
SEAMEW

A series of excellent reproductions of typical seals found in Palestine is given by Ben-Sirin in his Heb. Arch. 3 (1907), 82, 179f., 225-230, while a collection of twenty seal inscriptions, dating from 8th-6th cent. B.C., with ample references, will be found in Ladański's Attimes. Texte, part I, 101.

The engraving of seals was done by means of a graver with a diamond point (Job 17:25). Ben-Sirin (c. B.C. 180-175) makes hemispherical impressions of them 'that cut graver of signs' (Sir 38:27 RV).

As regards the varied uses of the seal in antiquity, one of the most important was to authenticate written documents (1 K 2:28), while a modern signature (cf. Neh 10:1). A roll or other document intended for preservation was sealed up before it was parted with (Dn 12:9); the seals, accordingly, had to be broken before it could be read (Rev 6:6 etc.). In the ordinary business of life sealing was continually employed as a precaution against a deposit of any sort being tampered with by unauthorized persons. Wine jars, for example, invariably had their stoppers covered with soft clay, on which the owner impressed its seal. Such impressions are referred to in Job 38:6.

Newberry in his Scarabs illustrates the Egyptian (and doubtless Hebrew) practice of sealing doors by means of a piece of string attaching the door to the jamb, and sealed with a clay disc. Darius' 'den of lions' (Dn 6:10) and the sepulchre of our Lord (Mt 27:60) were both in all probability sealed in this way by means of a cord which passed over the stone covering the entrance, and was sealed at either end by a lump of clay impressed with one or more seals (cf. Dn. 6:5). From the universal use of the seal in ratifying and authenticating documents, and safeguarding depositions, the writers both of the OT and of the NT have derived a rich variety of figures. Thus, in Dn 9:8, sealing is a figure for the ratification of prophecy; in Jn 6:35, the figure is based on the public acknowledgment of the seal as one nowadays acknowledges one's signature. St. Paul's converts, again, are the 'seal' of his Apostle-ship (1 Co 9:1), in other words, they authenticate his status and mission as a true Apostle. As a document, or vessel, finally, is sealed up until the time for opening it arrives, so the Christian believer is sealed by the Holy Spirit 'unto the day of redemption' (Eph 4:4; cf. 1:3, 2 Co 1:20).

SEA-MONSTER.—See CUCKOW.

SEA-SEAL.—See DRAGON, LEVITHAN, RAMAB, SHEBA.

SEBA.—The eldest son of Cush in Gn 10:7 (1 Ch 1:9) named along with Sheba in Ps 72:5, and with Egypt and Cush in Is 43:1454. In the latter passage its people are referred to as of high stature. A comparison with Is 18 points to a supposed connexion with the tall Cushites or Nubians, though there is no evidence which directly associates either the people or the country with Nubia proper, in the region of the Nile. More specific seem to be the references by Strabo and Ptolemy to a seaport Seba and Soloe, near the modern Massaua on the west of the Red Sea. This location, nearly opposite the ancient Sheba, gives some colour to the hypothesis that Sheba is an African differentiation of Sheba (wh. see), the latter being naturally the parent community.

J. F. McCurdy

SEBAM.—A place in the east-Jordan territory of Reuben (Nu 32:9). In all the other passages (Nu 32:9, Jos 13:4, Is 16:14, Jer 48:49) the name appears in the fem. form Sibmah. The 'vine of Sibmah' is mentioned by Isaiah and Jeremiah as one of the possessions of Moab on which destruction was to fall. The place has been located near Heshbon.

SECAHAL.—A town mentioned (Jos 15:25) among the possessions of Judah 'in the wilderness' (midbar). It was probably in the rocky district above the W. shore of the Dead Sea.

SECHENIAS.—1. 1 Es 3:8 = Shecaniah, Ezr 8:1. 2. 1 Es 8:9 = Shecaniah, Ezr 8:1.

SECOND COMING.—See PAROUSIA.

SECT.—See HERETRY.

SECUL.—A place name which appears only in the late narrative of 1 S 10:30 in connexion with Ramah, Samuel's home, and especially with the 'great cistern' or 'well of the threshing-floor.' Perhaps the name represents a word in the original best rendered 'the height,' referring to the highest part of the town of Ramah.

H. L. Willett

SECUNDUS.—A man of Thessalonica who accompanied St. Paul on his journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20:3), perhaps as a delegate to carry alms from his city. The Greek of the verb is obscure, but the meaning probably is that Aristarchus and Secundus and those mentioned afterwards went direct to Tross from Corinth and waited there for the Apostle, who came with Sopater by way of Macedonia. See SOPATER. A. J. MACLAIN.

SECURE.—To be secure, in the language of AV, does not mean to be free from danger; it means to anticipate danger. Thus, Jg 8:1 'Gideon smote the host, for the host was secure.' The vb. 'to secure' occurs in Mt 23:14 and if this come to the governor's house we will persuade him, and secure you,' when the Greek means literally make you free from care, i.e. make it all right for you.

SEDEKIAS.—1. An ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1:1). 2. 1 Es 1:1, Bar 1:2 = Zedekiah (wh. see), king of Judah.

SEED.—See GENESYS AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

SEED, SEEDTIME (Heb. ver'az; Gr. sperma, spondos).—1. Literal.—(a) Vegetable (Gen 11:30 etc.). See AGRICULTURE, § 1. (b) Animal (Lv 15:17—21 etc.). 2. Metaphorical.—(a) Offspring, race, family (Gen 8:18 etc.; Mk 12:18, Lk 1:32, Jn 7:2 etc.). In NT it is especially frequent in the phrase 'the seed of Abraham'—a favourite Pauline equivalent for 'Israel' (cf. Ro 11:1, 2 Co 11:19). In Gal 3:13 St. Paul argues from the use of the sing. 'seed' instead of the plur. 'seeds' in Gn 13:17, that the Messiah in person is denoted and not Abraham's progeny in general. As a proof the argument has no force, for the same word 'zera' occurs in the sing. form in every passage in the OT where it expresses the idea of offspring. It is a verbal subtilty due to the Apostle's Rabbinical training. But the argument as a whole is independent of this grammatical refinement. St. Paul's meaning is that the Messiah was clearly in view in the promises made to Abraham. Israel was the type of Christ and the seed of Abraham was summed up. From this follows that further extension of the fig. 'seed of Abraham' to denote those united to Christ by faith (Gal 3:14) or the spiritual Israel or 'Israel of God' (Ro 9:6, Gal 6:14). (b) Vital energy. In 1 Jn 3:1 'seed' denotes the indwelling principle of the Divine life by which the Christian is kept from sin.

J. C. LAMBERT.

SEETHY.—This verb, which means to boil, occurs occasionally in AV, especially in the command (Ex 23:13 etc.), 'Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk.' The past tense was used as Gn 23:18 'Jacob sod potage'; and the past part. sodden, as Lk 10:15 'The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children.'

SEGB.—1. The youngest son of Hiel who re-built Jericho (1 K 16:19). He died, or was possibly sacrificed by his father, when the gates were set up. See HOSIA, p. 369. 2. Son of Herezon (1 Ch 2:20).

SEIR.—1. The name of a mountainous district east of the 'Arabah, peopled by the Edomites. It was traditionally occupied by Horebites or 'cave-dwellers' (Gn 14:14). Mt. Seir is practically synonymous with SEIRAH
Edom (cf. Gn 32:1 ‘the land of Seir, the field of Edom’).
2. ‘Mt. Seir’ mentioned in Jos 15:4 among the points defining the boundaries of Judah. The name may still be preserved in that of the ruins at Sûts, S.W. of Kiriath-jearim.

SEIRAH.—The plateau which Edom occupied passed away with the Persian king, Memphion (Jos. 3:24), unidentified.

SELA means ‘rock’, ‘cliff’, or ‘crag’, and as a common noun is of frequent occurrence in Hebrew. In three or four passages (Jg 19:2, 2 K 14:13, Is 16:8, and, according to some, Is 42:17) the word appears to be a proper name. In Jg 19:18 a site near the southern end of the Dead Sea is required by the context. Such a site would also satisfy the requirements of 2 K 14:13 and Is 16:8. But it is not improbable that more than one place was known as ‘the Cliff (or Crag).’ It is therefore not impossible, though far from certain, that the Sela of 2 K 14:13 (cf. Jotthesel) and Is 16:8 is, as RVYm in the latter passage suggests, and as many have held, the place known later as Petra (which also means ‘rock’). Petra lay about 50 miles nearly due south of the Dead Sea, in a valley ‘enclosed on every side by nearly perpendicular rocks of considerable height’ and ‘composed of sandstone of many different colours.’ It was the capital of the Edomites from the close of the 4th century B.C. to the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D. (when it became a Roman province), and during that period a busy commercial centre. For some description of the buildings of Petra and the rock architecture which have verged on the city great fame, see Bedeker’s Palestine, p. 206, and the literature there cited. The general character of the buildings at Petra is that of the debased Roman style of the 3rd and 4th centuries A.D. Apart from the Biblical statements enumerated above, the history of Petra before the Nabataean period is unknown.

SELAH-—A Heb. liturgical-musical term of uncertain meaning. It occurs (a) in the OT, (b) in the Psalms of Solomon, and (c) in the Jewish (Synagogue) Liturgy. In the OT the term occurs 74 times altogether in the Heb. text, viz. 71 times in the Psalter, and 3 in the Prayer of Hahakkuk (Hab 3). In the Gr. tr. of the OT (the LXX) the Gr. equivalent (disponsama) does not always appear in the same places as in the Heb. text; the number of occurrences is not so large as in the LXX. Possibly in some cases ‘Sela’ has fallen out of the Massoretic text accidentally. In the Psalms of Solomon ‘Sealah’ occurs twice (17th and 189th), and in the other parts of the Jewish Liturgy (apart from the canonical Psalms, which are incorporated in it) 5 times (3 in the ‘Eighteen Blessings’ and 2 in the morning Benedictions preceding the Shema’).

Various explanations have been proposed as to the etymology and meaning of the term. Perhaps the least improbable of these is that which regards it as a liturgical direction intended to indicate the place for lifting up the voices in a Doxology at the close of a section; such a Doxology might have been sung at the end of a psalm or section of a psalm which liturgically was separated from the following (cf. the use of the ‘Gloria’ at the end of Psalms or in [in the case of the 119th] at the end of sections of the Psalms in Christian worship). Or it may have been a direction to the orchestra—‘Lift up loud!’—to strike in with loud music (after the soft accompaniment to the singers’ voices) during a pause. Other theories, such as that it represents a Heb. transliteration of a Greek word (e.g. psalle) or an abbreviation of three words, have little probability. The meaning of the LXX rendering (diapalma) is as uncertain as that of the Heb. word itself.

SELED.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2:23).

SELF-SURRENDER
SELEMA.—One of Ezra’s swift scribes (2 Es 14:9).

SELEMIAS (1 Es 9:3) = Seleemias, Exr 10:9.

SELEGUCIA, on the coast of Syria, at the mouth of the river Orontes, was the port of the great Antioch. It was strongly fortified. It stood on the S. side of Mt. Peirea, and on the level ground at its foot. It was preserved on three sides both naturally and by fortifications. It was captured by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Mac 110), and afterwards recovered (in n.c. 210) by Antiochus the Great. Its greatness increased in Roman times. Then it was a ‘free city’. Commercially its importance in the Levantine trade was of the highest. Extensive remains of the ancient city exist. A. Soretten.

SELEUCUS.—1. Seleucus I. (Nikator), originally a cavalry officer of Alexander the Great, became satrap of Babylonia on the death of the king. After some vicissitudes his position there was secured by marriage (1 Mac 118). The battle of Ipsus, n.c. 301, made him master of Syria and great part of the East. He founded Antioch and its fortified port Seleucia (1 Mac 111), and is said by Josephus (Ant. xiii. 11) to have conferred on the Jews the privileges of citizenship. He is the one of his [i.e. the Seleucid] princes (Dn 11:6). He died n.c. 280. — 2. Seleucus II. (Callinicus, n.c. 246-226), son of Antiochus Soter, is entitled the ‘king of the east’ in the passage (Dn 11:28) which alludes to the latter discomfiture of the Syrian king and the capture of Seleucia. — 3. Seleucus III. (Ceramenes, n.c. 231-223, ‘one of his [Seleucian] sons’ (Dn 11:28), was murdered during a campaign in Asia Minor; the struggle with Egypt was continued by his brother Antiochus (Dn 11:14-16). — 4. Seleucus IV. (Philopator; but Jos., Ant. xiv. 10, calls him Soter), son of Antiochus The Great, reigned n.c. 157-176. He was who despatched Heliodorus to plunder the Temple (2 Mac 3:12, Dn 11:15). — 5. Seleucus V. (n.c. 125-124) and VI. (n.c. 95-93) are not of importance to the Biblical student. The four first-named belong to the ‘ten horns’ of Dn 7.

SELF-CONTROL.—See Temperance.

SELF-SURRENDER.—1. The military metaphor underlying the idea of ‘surrendering oneself’ is suggestive. The keys of the citadel of self are handed over to the rightful Lord, whose most powerful weapons of attack have been the entreaties of His love. The surrender is not for demolition, but for restoration in beauty and strength. It is a voluntary act, implying the ‘presenting’ of ourselves unto God, and involving the ‘presenting’ of our ‘members as instruments of righteousness unto God’ (Rom 6:13). The idea occurs in the NT, e.g. 2 Cor. 11:23. The concept finds expression in the Gr. word (hypothesathai) which RV tr. ‘to be subject to,’ ‘to set oneself under.’ The proof that in the mind the ruling element is not ‘flesh’ but ‘spirit’ is the absence of hostility to God: this state of ‘life and peace’ is the result of ‘submitting oneself to the law of God’ (Ro 8:2; cf. 10:13). In Je 12:9 this unreserved surrender of ourselves to God is represented as the only worthy recognition of His absolute claims, and as, therefore, thoroughly consistent with a due regard to the development of our own personality. To ‘be in subjection to the Father of spirits’ is indeed to ‘live.’ Such a positive submission is the crowning sign that was present. True life comes from complete self-surrender’ (Westcott, Com., in loc.).

2. It depends upon the point of view whether the Christian ideal of life is described as the life of self-surrender or as the life of self-development. Repentance and faith are alike acts in which, at one and the same time, self-will is surrendered and the higher self is realized.

‘Our wills are ours, we know not how. Our wills are ours to make them Thine.’
SEMACHIAH

Our self-surrender is the condition of the Divine co-operation; His working is ‘both to will and to work’ (Phil. 2:13). It enables us to respond to the exhortation: ‘work out your own salvation’ (Phil 2:13). ‘Every real sacrifice is at the same time self-preservation, namely, preserved by the ideal self’ (Paulus, System of Ethics, p. 245). ‘To yield oneself up as the organ of a higher spirit which disposes of us as may be fit constitutes the mystic ideal of perfect life’ (Martinus, Types of Ethical Teaching). The open secret of that life is revealed in St. Paul’s profound words: ‘I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me’ (Gal 2:20).

SEMACHIAH.—A Korahite family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:17). The same name should be substituted for Ismachiah in 2 Ch 31:18.

SEMEIN.—The father of Mattathias (Lk 3:25).

SENAH.—The children of Sennaah, or more correctly Hassenah, were a clan or family who, according to Ezr 2:20, Neh 7:43, 1 Es 2:20 [Sanaas], were among the exiles of the first Restoration under Zerubb., and had a share in re-building the walls (Neh 3:8). They are elsewhere unknown, unless they should be identified with Hassenuah, a clan of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:12, Neh 11:16). The latter would then be the correct reading. Other conjectures are less probable.

SENATE is the tr. of Gr.

Gerasia in Ac 6:5, where ‘all the senate of the children of Israel’ is intended to explain the preceding ‘council’ (synedron). See Sanhedrin.

SINR.—The name of Hermon according to Dt 3:4, but in Ca 42:1 and 1 Ch 5:28 distinguished from Hermon. It was famous for its large fir-trees (Ezk 27:3). This Amoritc name was naturally enough, the one in vogue among the Babylonians and Assyrians in Deut. It appears, like Hermon and Sirion, to designate the whole of Anti-Lebanon. When taken more strictly, it stood, we may assume, for the northern portion. The Arab geographers gave the name to that part of the range lying between Baalbek and Homs.

SENACHERIB (Assyt. Sen-châ̄rîb) i.e. ‘Sin [the Moon-god] has increased the brothers’), son of Sargon, succeeded him on the throne of Assyria, on the 12th of Ab, b.c. 705. He was at once faced by troubles in Babylon, where Merodach-baladan had re-established himself. Sennacherib expelled him and placed Bel-shini of the Babylonian seed royal on the throne as a vassal king. After wars against the Assyrians, and Elamites in b.c. 701, Sennacherib set out to reduce the West to order. The king of Tyre fled to Cyprus, Sidon and the rest of Phoenicia were taken or submitted, and placed under a king Ethbaal. Ashdod, Ammon, Moab, Edom sent tribute. Ashkelon and Ekron were captured, and Hezekiah had to restore Edom after keeping him some time in prison. The Egyptians and their allies who had moved to support Hezekiah were defeated at Eltekeh. Then Sennacherib devastated Judæa, capturing 58 cities and 200,000 prisoners. Hezekiah seems to have attempted to bribe him to retreat, sending immense tribute to Sennacherib while he was besieging Lachish. Lachish fell, and the Tartan, the Rab-shakeh and Rab-saris were sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (2 K 18:14). The sudden dispersal of his army compelled Sennacherib to retreat without accomplishing the capture of Jerusalem. There is some reason to think that the Biblical accounts refer partly to a second campaign of Sennacherib after his annals, that does not extend so far. Troubles in Babylonia led him to recall Bel-shini and set his own son Ashur-nadin-shum on the throne. He then had once more to expel Merodach-baladan from Lower Babylonia. Building a fleet on the Tigris and Euphrates, he pursued the Chaldean to the mouth of the Euloeus, and there captured and destroyed the Chaldean stronghold, thus invading Lower Elam. He was too far from his base, and the Elamites fell on his rear and captured Babylon, carried off Ashur-nadin-shum to Elam, making a Chaldean Nergal-usur-bihz king in his stead; b.c. 694. The Assyrians then re-assumed their supremacy, but the fresh rebellion placed a Babylonian on the throne of Babylon. In b.c. 691 Sennacherib brought both Elamites and Babylonians to bay at Khalkale. Two years later he invaded Elam. In b.c. 690 Babylon was captured and razed to the ground. From that time till b.c. 681, when Sennacherib was murdered (2 K 19:17), we have no history of his reign. His great achievement was the creation of Nineveh as a metropolis of the Empire. He built the great palace of Kerak and the temple of Niniveh. Cf. ADAMAMELECH. C. H. W. JOHNS.

SEOM.—The name of the fourth priestly course (1 Ch 24:2).

SEPARATION, WATER OF.—See RED HEFFER.

SEPHER.— Mentioned as a boundary of the descendants of Joktan in Gen 10:31. The probable identification is that with Zafar, the ancient capital of the Himyarites, which is probably the seat or the capital of Hadramaut of the same name (see HAZARMAVETH).

SEPHERAVIM.—1. A city mentioned in 2 K 18:23 (Is 36:6) and 19:11 (Is 37:11) as among those captured by the Assyrians, all apparently in Syria. Probably it answers to the Shabara't named in the Babylonian Chronicle as taken just before the fall of Samaria. In Is 42:24 it may then be the same city. 2. A word of exactly the same sense as the above occurs in 2 K 17:26 as the name of a place whose inhabitants were deported to Samaria. The context favours the suggestion that the famous city Sippar in North Babylonia is intended. Probably the similarity between the words led some early copyist to write Sepharwaim by mistake.

SERAPHIM

7. A priestly clan (Neh 10:18 11:12, 18, 1 Es 51:1 Ch 6[4] Azariah). 8. One of those sent to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36:6). 9. Son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jer 51:44). He held the office of sar menâchâ (AV 'a quiet prince,' mg. 'or prince of Mebucha or chief chamberlain'; RV 'chief chamberlain,' mg. 'or quartermaster').

SERAPHIM.—The seraphim are mentioned only in a single passage of Scripture (Is 6:2). In its inaugural vision, Isaiah sees these supernatural creatures grouped about Jehovah's throne in His heavenly palace. The prophet furnishes no elaborate description of the form of these beings, and apparently assumes that his readers will be able to fill in what he omits; but he does make clear that they are six-winged creatures. With one pair of wings they hover around Jehovah's throne; and with the other two they cover their faces and their feet,—actions symbolical of humility and adoration. The seraphim are arranged in an antiphonal choir, singing the Triangon, and their chorus is of such volume that the sound shakes the foundations of the palace. In the prophet's vision they have human voices and hands (v.4), but it cannot be asserted with equal certainty that they possess human bodies. The prophet leaves us in no doubt about the function of these creatures. They are ministers of Jehovah, occupied in singing the praises of their Sovereign, and in bearing to him the approach of sin and evil. The seraphim may be traced in the imagery and symbolism of the NT Apocalypse, where the four living creatures, in both their function and their form, are a counterpart of the seraphim with the cherubim of Ezekiel's vision (cf. Is 6:2, Ezk 1, 2, and Rev 4).

It was customary with the prophets to transform and purify popular conceptions, by bringing them into relation with their sacred idea of God. The seraphim are an illustration of this process. The popular mythical seraphim were a personification of the serpent-like flash of lightning. The usage and meaning of the singular sârâph (—fiery serpent, Nu 21:6, Is 14:19), as well as the etymology of the word, suggest this view of the origin of the seraphim. The later Jewish tradition, according to which they are serpents, points in the same direction (Enoch 20 61:1ff et al.). The brazen serpent, Neh 9:10, which was removed from the temple by Hezekiah, was a relic probably connected with the popular mythical conception, and it may have suggested the seraphim of the heavenly palace to Isaiah's mind.

The theories of the origin of the prophetic conception have been advanced, but there is little that can be said in their favour. Some would derive the name from the Hebrew sa'ar (—swift), perhaps referring to the fiery appearance of the serpent. Others would regard the seraphim as the flames that enveloped this deity. Others have endeavoured to associate them with the Egyptian griffins (serek), half-lion and half-eagle, which are represented as guardians of graves. According to the latter view, the duty of guarding the threshold of the Temple would be the function that must be assigned to the seraphim of Isaiah's vision. In criticism, it may be remarked that the Egyptian griffin is more akin to the Hebrew cherub, and the latter should be sharply distinguished from the seraph (cf. art. CHERUB).

SERJANTS.—RV tr. in Ac 16:25. As of Gr. phauloi ('weak persons,' 'miserable persons'). The reference to the Levitical laws (Lev 19:18) and to the prohibitions of Deut 23:20 and the limitation to the apartheid laws (Deut 23:20) are the subject of the references (cf. art. PHILIPPUS).

SERON.—A Syrian commander defeated by Judas Maccabaeus at Beth-horon (1 Mac 11:41).

SERPENT, BRAZEN

1. nachâh, generic name (cf. Arab. chamsah), Gn 3:5—etc.; the most commonly used word, occurs frequently.

2. 'aphâh (root to 'grow' or 'hiss'), cf. Arab. a'fû applied to the viper (Job 30:20, Is 30:7). The root meaning (cf. Arab. akasbas) seems to be 'leading back,' as a serpent does before striking.

3. 'akhâbîth, Ps 140:6 'adder.' The root meaning (cf. Arab. akasbas) seems to be 'leading back,' as a serpent does before striking.

4. pehem, tr. 'asp; Dt 32:6, Job 30:4, Is 11:7; tr. 'adder.' Ps 68:9, where it is referred to as the favourite of the serpents-charmers.

5. shê'hôpâhôn Gn 49:17, tr. 'adder,' AV 'arrowsnake,' RV 'horned snake' (cf. Arab. shefîn).

6. tsephâ, Is 14:29, AV 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilik,' RV 'adder.'

7. tiq'hôth, Ps 22:28 'adder;' Is 11:59, Jer 8:17, 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilik,' mg. 'or adder.'

8. gîppâs, Is 34:14, AV 'great snake,' RV 'arrowsnake.' See OWL.

9. wârâph, Is 14:30 'fiery serpent,' coupled with nachâsh in Nu 21:9, Dt 8:2.

10. zôdâch 'âphâ (Spâh, Ds 32:13; zâchâl 'erâd, Mz 71; some creature that glides on or into the earth, probably therefore a serpent. Cf. Woom, 5.

11. šômîn, tr. 'serpent,' Ex 27:10, 12, RV 'any large reptile'; Ps 91:10, AV and RV 'dragon.' See DRAGON.

12. (Gr.) achídâna—any poisonous serpent (Mt 3:3 12:23, Lk 3:1, Ac 28:3).

Serpents are very common in the Holy Land and in the wilderness to the south. Over 30 species are known. Though the great majority are really harmless, all are dreaded by the natives, and several kinds are most deadly. Fatal snake bites are by no means uncommon; the reader knows of several cases of this kind in the Egyptian cobra (Naja haje) is found, but fortunately is not common. It is the favourite with snake-charmers, and is very probably the pehem, tr. 'asp' in OT. It was held in much veneration by the ancient Egyptians, and a little bronze serpent recently found in the excavations of ancient Gezer—probably an object of worship in pre-Israelite times—was of this form. Another very dangerous snake is the horned sandsnake (Ceratosus hasselquisti), supposed to be the 'asp of Cleopatra.' It lies in ambush (Gn 49:3) in depressions of the road and bites the passer-by. It is called by the Arabs shîfân, which corresponds to the Heb. shê'hôpâhôn. Other poisonous Palestine snakes belonging, like the last mentioned, to the viper family are Vipera euphratica, V. ammodytes, Daboia sandhina—a large, nocturnal species—and the small Echis arenicolor, which haunts sandy deserts. These vipers are all included under the Heb. 'aphâh (Arab. a'fû').

The viper of Ac 28:3 was probably Vipera aspis, which is common on most of the larger isles of the Mediterranean, and probably in Malta. The expression 'fiery serpent' probably refers to the burning sensation produced by the bite; in Ps 140 their poison is supposed to reside in their tongues.

Some of the references to serpents do not apparently refer to any natural object, but seem to be used in a figurative sense (Re 3:12, 14, 19). The expression 'fiery serpent' does not occur in the translation in Is 14:5 of tsephâ', and in Is 11:59, Jer 8:17 of tiq'hôth, where 'cockatrice' occurs in AV and 'basilik' in RV. The former was, among early English writers, a creature with a head and body like a cock, but the tail of a serpent, with a sting at its extremity. The basilikos of the LXX was probably the golden uræus, the ornament of the royal headdress among the Egyptians. There is no clear reason why in the passages quoted the references should not be to an actual species of snake. The reference in Am 9:4 to the serpent (nachâsh) at the bottom of the sea may have been in the minds of the Hebrews of the Babylonian myth of 'Umat. See also DRAGON and LEVIATHAN.

For the serpent of Gn 3 see FALL (4), and SATAN, p. 829f. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.
a-wide-spread belief that the image of a hurtful thing drives the evil away. In the absence of a direct statement we cannot say whether it was Jehovah who was worshipped under the form of the bronze serpent of 2 K 18—the Nebushan, or piece of bronze, as it was called. Some think it represented the Celestial Dragon, others the spirit of an ancestor, others a chthonic deity. Robertson Smith believed that it was the totem of David's house. There are traces of serpent-worship in Israel (1 K 19: Zeecha-lelah = "shade"); Neh 2:23). The two points of comparison present to our Lord's mind in Jn 3:1 are—(1) the lifting up of the serpent on the pole and Himself on the Cross, and (2) the voluntary looking of the Hebrews to the serpent—for the verb employed means more than simply seeing—and the faith of believers (see Sir 16:7—7.

J. TAYLOR.

SERUG.—Son of Reu (Gen 11: 12, 13, vs. 39).

SERVANT.—See next art., and Slave.

SERVANT OF THE LORD.—In this phrase, as repeatedly in the EV of the OT, "Servant" is substituted for "Jahweh," the proper name of the God of Israel, which stands in the Hebrew text.

1. Originally the term "servant" in this phrase is simply correlative to such terms as "lord," "master," which were ancient Hebrew, it is common with their Semitic kinsmen, applied to their god. In the first instance, the phrase the servant of Jahweh merely defines a man as one who acknowledges Jahweh as his god; it corresponds closely to the meaning that we might rather call a worshipper of Jahweh. Naturally, therefore, it may stand in antithesis to a similar phrase in which the name of another deity takes the place of that of Jahweh. Thus the servants of Jahweh and the servants of the (Tyrian) Baal are contrasted in 2 K 10:16, though the fact that the same word is used in both phrases is obscured by the RV, which exaggerates a distinction capriciously introduced by the punctuators into the Hebrew text.

2. Thus it will be readily understood that any Israelite might be called "the servant of Jahweh," and as a matter of fact a large number of individuals received this phrase as their name; it is familiar to English readers in the form Obadiah, which was originally pronounced, as the LXX indicates, Abdiya (cf. the parallel name Abdiel—"servant of God"). Adherents of other gods received similar proper names, such as Ebed-melekh (wh. see)—"servant of the god Melech," or Abd-Makarh, Abd-Eshmun, and Abd-Manndt, typical Phoenician and Nabataean names respectively serving respectively the gods Melech, Eshmun, and Manndt.

3. But just as modern terms denoting religious attachment, like Christian or believer, may, according to the connexion in which they occur, differ greatly in the fulness of their meaning, so the word servant, might imply a higher degree, or more special form, of service than is necessarily involved in the proper name Obadiah, or in the distinction between servants of Jahweh and servants of Baal. Such fuller significance attaches to the phrase when prophets (Am 3:1, 2 K 9, Jer 7:1, and often) or priests and Levites (Ps 134) are specified as the servant of Jahweh; so also when particular individuals are thus described. Among the individuals specifically termed "the servant of Jahweh" (which in speech of Jahweh of course becomes "my servant") are Abraham (Gen 20:9), Moses (Ex 14:15, Nu 12:14, and often), Joshua (Jos 24:1), Caleb (Jos 14:4, and often), David (2 S 23:22, and often), Eliakim (Is 22:8), Zerubbabel (Hag 2:2), and the person who is termed "the Shoot" (RV text 'the Branch,' Ezk 3:9).

The use of the term in Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40-55) is peculiar. In certain passages this writer closely uses the term to describe the nation: the entire people is personified, spoken of as an individual, and called by Jehovah 'my servant,' or, by the prophet speaking in his own name, 'the servant of Jehovah.' These passages are 41:12, 46:1-5, 44:1-4, 43:10, 45. The name of the term is found in Ps 136:12, which was written much later; but it does not occur in any extant literature that is unquestionably earlier than the Deutero-Isaiah, for Jer 50:29 (not found in the Canitic text) of 6:1, 2. It is probably not a saying of the prophet Jeremiah's, and in Ezk 37:3, 22, sometimes cited as parallel, the phrase is used of an individual of the past, the patriarch Jacob, not of the nation of the present.

5. But though the particular character of 'the servant of Jahweh' in which the nation is personified may be peculiar to the Deutero-Isaiah, and one or two writers influenced by him, similar passages are enough with Hebrew writers, and are sometimes so remote from our habits of thought and expression that the RV has sacrificed the figure to gain intelligibility, and, e.g., in Jos 9, which, literally rendered, runs, 'and the man of Israel said unto the Hivite, perhaps thou art dwelling in my midst,' (for further examples see G. B. Gray, Divine Discipline of Israel, 79 f., or 'Numbers,' in ICC p. 263 f.). Other notable instances of personification retained even in RV are Hos 11:1: 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (whore son = the Hebrew nation), and Ps 129:3, 4: I have suffered with him, and my soul has endured for him. And theRV puts these words into Jehovah's mouth. In the same way theRV paraphrases the passage Is 52:13, 14: 'I your God have said to the house of Jacob; I am Jehovah thy Maker.' In the Deutero-Isaiah, the servant is not the writer, nor is he the interpreter of the text; but while the personification of the nation as the 'servant of Jahweh' is certainly in the passages cited in § 4, there are other passages in which most scholars in the past, and many of the present, have concluded that the title has another application—that it refers prophetically to Jesus Christ, or to some individual, historically to the writer, such as Jeremiah, Jehoachin, Zerubbabel, or the Eleazar of 2 Mac 6:28, or to the plous section of Israel. In 44 so as far as this conclusion rests on individualizing the servant in such passages as Is 50:4-5, 52:12-13, 53:8, it is unconvinced; for the facts can be equally well, and, so far as the death, burial, and resurrection (cf. Ezk 37) of the servant are concerned, far better explained by the analogy of the personifications referred to in the last paragraph, as figurative descriptions of the history of the nation in the past, and of the prophet's hopes for it in the future.

7. In one passage (Is 50:4), indeed, 'the servant of Jahweh' is probably not the nation Israel; for the audience addressed appears to consist of Jews; if so, the servant here is either an individual or a comparatively small class—not the whole of the pious Israelites, for he is distinguished from 'those that fear Jahweh.' This passage is commonly considered to be the work of a later writer than the Deutero-Isaiah.

8. The most important differences of interpretation are concerned with four passages, 41:4, 49:1-4, 50:6-10, 52:13-14. These are commonly, though not unanimously, attributed to the work of one writer, but several scholars hold that this writer was not the Deutero-Isaiah. The critical question is largely an exegetical one; if there really is the wide difference, which some claim to discover, between the use of the term 'servant of Jahweh' in, and the religious status of, the Deutero-Isaiah, differences of authorship may not unnaturaly be inferred; otherwise the grounds for disintegration are slight. Unfortunately the interpretation of the passage is extremely difficult and ambiguous by the state of the text; that the text is to some extent corrupt, especially in 52:13-14, is now generally admitted; but as to the exact extent, and the nature of the corrupt passages, differences of judgment prevail. No consistent interpretation of 'the servant of Jahweh' given in these four passages is possible on the basis of the present text; for in 49 the servant is identified with the nation, but in 53 he is distinguished... from the nation, for 'my people' (if the text be sound) cannot be made to mean anything but Israel except by very forced exegesis. Consequently, in the interests of consistency some scholars have struck out the word 'Israel' in 49', others have corrected 'the transgression of my people' in 49' to 'their transgression,' or 'their transgression,' or 'the transgression of peoples' (all comparatively slight changes in the Hebrew text). It may be observed that 53 is in other respects admitted obscure, if not also corrupt.

It must suffice to refer briefly here to one or two of the chief points for or against the two main alternatives—that in these passages, as elsewhere in Deutero-Isaiah, the servant is Israel, or something less than Israel (whether a section of the nation or an individual). We shall consider the latter alternative first.

(1) Two passages have been considered to demand a distinction between the servant and Israel. One of these, 53, as already stated, certainly does demand it, if the text be sound; but this is doubtful. The other passage is 49'-51, which follows the statement in the present text that the servant is Israel (49'). These verses as translated in RV imply that the servant and Israel are distinct. But though the translation of RV in v. 9 is grammatically correct, it is not necessary; other grammatically correct translations are: 'and now Jehovah that formed me (the servant) was determined to bring back Jacob again to himself, and that Israel should be gathered to him,' or 'and now saith Jehovah that formed me from the womb to be his servant and brought me he sinneth to his servant Israel unto him.' Either of these translations allows of the identity of Israel and the servant. In v. 9 RV is incorrect. The Hebrew is extremely awkward and questionabe, but literally translated v. 9 runs: 'a lighter (thing) than they being my servant is the raising up of the tribes of Jacob and the restoring of the preserved of Israel, and I will give thee for a light of the nations, etc.' The 'also' in 'I will also give' of RV, which suggests that the illumination of the nations is a second function of the servant, in addition to one already described, is absolutely unrepresented in and unsuggested by the Hebrew text. Thus v. 9 is a true answer to the point in verse 8; it may mean (if it means anything) either, You do not exhaust your service by restoring Israel, you have also to illumine the nations; or, The fact that you are my servant means more than the illumination of the nations. It means that I shall make you for carrying out my purpose of illumining the nations.

(2) Apart from the passages just discussed, which are either textually open to suspicion or ambiguous in meaning, there is nothing that can be forcibly identifying the servant with Israel in 49'-49' 50'-52'-53' as he is unmistakably identified with Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah in many passages (see § 4). In the present text of 49' the identification is actually made. But the strongest argument for the correctness of this identification is to be found in the fact that it does fuller justice to the general tenor of the passages: this is perfectly clear in 42'-44; here the Divine speech and the writer's mind are alike filled with two subjects—the servant and the Nations of the world; the servant is to instruct the nations in the religion of Jehovah: granted that the servant is Israel, we have here a constantly recur- rent, Israel and the nations; other than Israel is totally disregarded. In 49'-49' the servant addresses the nations of the world, and the function of the servant, which on some interpretations (see above) alone is mentioned, and on any interpretation alone receives prominence, is that of spiritually illumining the nations; in 52'-53' Jehovah states that, as the past humiliation of the servant by its very extent attracted far-spread attention, so his coming exaltation will impress nations and men far more, and again, nothing is said of Israel, unless the servant is Israel. In 53', certain speakers make a confession that they had misjudged the servant of Jehovah, terrify him not the righteous one but a sinner, and regarding the unparalleled sufferings which they now perceive had been borne for them, as due to the fact that he was abandoned by Jehovah. Again, the least difficult view as to the speakers who make this confession is that they are the nations referred to in 52', and that the servant is the Hebrew nation. That Israel suffered for the nations is certainly a remarkable idea, but that all the sufferings of Israel were not due to its own sins appears to be the thought of Deutero-Isaiah in 49'. Again, the relative righteousness of Israel, which is all that need be implied if we see in ch. 53 a confession of the nations, is implied elsewhere, e.g. in 407.

It is impossible even to indicate here all the difficulties that beset, or the points that favour, the several theories of interpretation. The case for identifying the servant with Israel throughout is 40-55 has been ably presented in English by K. Budde in A.J.T. III, pp. 499 ff., and by A. B. Peake in The Problem of Suffering in the OT, pp. 34-73 and 180-193, who gives on pp. 44-58 a valuable critical translation of the chief passages. With equal ability the identification of the servant with the ideal Israel is maintained by J. Skinner in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, Isaiah xi.—xxvi, , pp. xxx-xcviii, together with full notes on the relevant passages. The case for interpreting the servant in some passages as an individual has not been fully re-stated in these three cases. In Shakespeare against the background of the arguments for other interpretations: the student may best turn to Delitzsch's Com., (Eng. tr. 1890), or G. A. Smith's 'Isaiah, vol. ii. (Expositor's Bible). T. K. Cheyne, in 1890, offers a very valuable and penetrating criticism of all these theories, and a prelude to his own Jeremite theory, for which he has hitherto found no supporter.

9. In NT some of the passages in the Deutero-Isaiah are frequently cited or referred to: and in most cases, though not in all (see Ac 13', cf. 2 Ti 2'), the servant is identified with Jesus (e.g. Mt 8' 12' 22', Lk 22', Ac 8'). This, of course, proves nothing with regard to the original meaning; for Christian, like Jewish, exegesis was capable of individualising terms that originally had a wider application; for an instance of this, see He 2'-4, where what is stated in Fs 8 of man in general is referred specifically to our Lord.

SEVENEH

SEVENEH (Syene).—A town at the First Cataract, the southern extremity of Egypt proper: Egyg. Suw, now Assuan (Aswan). It lies on the east bank, opposite the island of Elephantine, where lay the capital of the first nome of Upper Egypt, and behind it are the celebrated granite quarries. From Mit Neo, or 'Mit Leper,' is the correct tr. in Esr 29' 30', as LXX and RV. At Syene-Elephantine there was a colony of Jews with a sumptuous temple of Yahu (Jehovah; cf. Is 19' 19') earlier than Cambyses' conquest in a.c. 525, and without the Persian occupation. For this we have the evidence of papyri written there in the Aramaic language.
The dates of the documents hitherto found range from 471 to 410, in the reigns of Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius. One of these is a petition to Ragas, the governor of Judea, for the re-building of the temple, which had been destroyed by the nations in 411. To this a favourably reply was given. But the temple was never built, as the Israelites fought away from the national capital against the Persians about 405. Since the seventh century the frontier garrison against the Ethiopians had been posted there, and the military element predominant.

SEVENTY.

SHALLIM.—See Number, § 7.

SHALALBIN.—See next article.

SHALALBON.—A town mentioned with Mt. Heres and Aljalon as being occupied by the Amorites (Jdg 18). It was, with Makaz and Beth-schemesh, in the district of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4); and was, it is true, allotted to Benjamin in Jos 19. But the name is probably identical with Shalabon, the home of one of David's heroes, who is called 'the Shalalbonite' (2 S 23, 1 Ch 11). It may perhaps be identified with Selbit, about 8 miles N. of Beth-schemesh. Possibly Shalabon should be read for Shalalim in 1 S 9.

SHALALBONITE.—See Shalalbin.

SHALAM, LAND OF.—See Shalalbin.

SHAPPH.—1. The son of Jahdai (1 Ch 26). 2. A son of Caleb by his concubine Maachah (1 Ch 26).

SHARAM.—1. A town of Judah, in the Shephelah, mentioned in Jos 15. Some identity it with Khurbet Sа'ïrэh, west of Beth 'Aâth; others with Zakarya. Sharam is perhaps mentioned again in the pursuit of the Philistines after the death of Goliath (1 S 17, R.V. 'the two gales'). 2. A town of Simeon (1 Ch 4). called Sharuhen in Jos 19, and Shilhim in Jos 15.

SHABGHAZ.—A chamberlain of Abasuerus (Est 2).

SHACHIA.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8).

SHADDAI.—See art. God, 2 (c).

SHADRAIG.—The name given to Hananiah (Dn 1).

SHAFTS.—See Armou Arms, I (d).

SHAGE.—See Shimmam, 3.

SHARABAM.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8).

SHAHAZUMAH.—A town allotted to Issachar (Jos 19). Its site has not been identified.

SHALEM.—In Gn 33: 1 we read 'Jacob (on his return from Haran) came to Shalem a city of Shechem' (R.V. reads 'in peace to the city of Shechem'; as Luther in his German translation). The word shalem means 'peace,' and the preposition b 'in' may have fallen out owing to the final letter of Jacob. Otherwise we must suppose Shalem to be a small town (in the neighbourhood of Shechem), which has been identified with a village called Salim. W. F. Boyd.

SHALISHAH.—A region through which Saul travelled with his servant in search of the lost asses (1 S 9). The route as given probably describes a circuitous journey, to the N.W., the E., and back through Benjamin. This would place the 'land of Shalishah somewhere on the hills W. of Shiloah. Baal-shalishah (2 K 4: 3) was doubtless a place in the same district.

SHALLECHATH.—See Jerusalem, II. 4.

SHALLUM, an inhabitant of Jaheb, was nominally king of Israel for one month in the period of anarchy which preceded the extinction of the Canaanitish kingdom. He assassinated his predecessor Zechariah, so in turn he was 'removed' by his successor Menahem (2 K 15: 20).

SHAM.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11).

SHAMBBLES.—See Art and Crafts, §§ 7; Food, § 11.

SHAME.—1. In the first Biblical reference to this emotion (Gn 26, cf. 37) 'shame' appears as 'the concomitants of sin and guilt'; it is 'the overpowering feeling that inward harmony and satisfaction with oneself are disturbed' (Deitersch, Comm., in loc.). From the OT point of view the crowning shame is idolatry: 'As the thief is ashamed when he is found, so is the house of Israel ashamed; they say to a stock, Thou art my father.' (Jer 26; cf. Is 41: 28). The all-inclusive promise to those who trust in God is 'none that wait on thee shall be ashamed' (Ps 25: 19; R.V. cf. 119: 11, 15: 5; 11: 5). The absence of shame is always regarded as an aggrandizement of sinful conduct; Job (19) reproaches his friends because they are 'not ashamed' of dealing hardly with him; the climax of Jeremiah's complaint (35: 12) against those who had 'committed abomination' is that 'they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush' (cf. 93: 2, 29: 11). The culmination of shamelessness is seen in the 'whose glory is in their shame' (Ps 51: 2); but in this passage, as elsewhere (Is 50: 6: cf. Pr 10: 24) 'shame' is, by a natural transfer of ideas, applied not to the inward feeling, but to its outward cause. The degradation of those 'whose god is their belly' is seen in that conduct which ought to have made them ashamed of their perversion of gospel liberty into sinful licence.
The return of shame is a sign of true repentance: ‘then shalt thou remember thy ways and be ashamed’ (Ezk. 16:8, cf. Ezr 9:3).

2. The consciousness of shame varies with the conventional standards adopted in any society. For example, poverty (Pr 13:8), leprosy (Nu 12:8), widowhood (Isa 54:2) may be viewed as involving ‘shame,’ though there is no blame. In the sense of violation of propriety, St. Paul applies the word to men who wear their hair long and to women who wear it short (1 Co 11:15, cf. 6:14-15); by an analogous adaptation of its meaning he describes God’s ideal ‘workman’ as one ‘that needeth not to be ashamed’ (2 Ti 2:20).

3. In the NT’s it is pre-eminently the shameful thing (Ro 6:1, Ph 3:3, Eph 5:31, Jude 11, 1 Jn 2:19, cf. 3:9). But the distinguishing characteristic of the early Christian use of the word is ‘the transvaluation of values.’ ‘Jesus, the author and perfecter of faith, ... endured the cross, despising shame’ (He 12:2). When St. Paul says ‘I am not ashamed of the gospel’ (Ro 1:16), by a well-known figure of speech his negative statement emphatically asserts his positive glorifying (Gal 6:14). To ‘suffer as a Christian’ and ‘not (to) be ashamed’ is ‘to glorify God’ (1 Pe 4:11; cf. 2 Ti 1:11, 12, 16). The same heightening of the contrast is implied when, on the one hand, the Son on the day of judgment will be ashamed of all who are now ashamed of Him and of His words (Mk 8:8, Lk 9:26); and on the other hand, St. John’s assurance is that those who abide in Christ ‘shall have boldness and shall not be ashamed before Him at his coming’ (1 Jn 2:29). Of those who desire a heavenly country ‘God is not ashamed... to be called their God,’ for the city He has prepared, they are being prepared by the sanctifying grace of Him who is not ashamed to call them brethren (He 11:26). J. G. Tasker.

SHAMAR smote 600 Philistines with an ox-goad (Jg 3:34). There is no mention of his judging Israel, or of the duration of his influence. The exploit belongs to the latest redaction of the book; 4th century of the story. Nothing is known of any Philistine dominion so early a period, and in some Gr. MSS the very folioan declares that in the days of Joshua himself will be ashamed of all who are now ashamed of Him and of His words (Mk 8:8, Lk 9:26); and on the other hand, St. John’s assurance is that those who abide in Christ ‘shall have boldness and shall not be ashamed before Him at his coming’ (1 Jn 2:29). Of those who desire a heavenly country ‘God is not ashamed... to be called their God,’ for the city He has prepared, they are being prepared by the sanctifying grace of Him who is not ashamed to call them brethren (He 11:26).

SHAMIR.—1. A Kohathite (1 Ch 24:8). 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15:46). It is perhaps Khurbat Sëmerah, west of Dedr. 3. The home and burial-place of Tola (Jgs 10:1). The site is uncertain.

SHAMAL.—See SALMAI.

SHAMMA.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:17).

SHAMMAS.—1. Son of Reuel, son of Esau, a tribal chief (Gen 36:4). 2. Third son of Jesse, present when Samuel sought a successor to Saul (1 S 18:15); with Saul in the battlefield when David visited the camp (17:5). He is the same as Shimeah, father of Jonadab (2 S 3:13), the Shimea of 1 Ch 2:4, and the Shime, father of Jonathan who slew the giant (2 S 21:19). In 1 Ch 20: Jonathan is called son of Shimea. 3. Son of Agur, a Hararite, one of the three mighty men of David. Alone he held the field against the Philistines (2 S 21:11). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 11:17, wrongly attributes the feat to Eleazar. He is probably identical with Shammah, the Hararite (Hararite) of 2 S 23:20. V. should read ‘Jonathan son of Shammah, the Hararite.’ In 1 Ch 11:12, ‘son of Shema’ is probably confused with ‘son of Agee.’ Read, with Lucian, ‘son of Jonathan.’ Shimei, son of Elia (1 K 4:5), should also appear here if we accept Lucian’s reading of ‘Ela’ for ‘Agee’ (2 S 23:19). 4. An officer in David’s employ, called Shammah in 1 Ch 11:17, and Shamshith in 1 Ch 27:17. Probably the same as No. 3. J. H. Steyvenson.

SHAMMOTH.—See SHAMMATH.

SHAMMUA.—1. The Reubenite spy (Nu 13:8).

SHAMSHERAL.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:16).

SHAPHAM.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5:9).

SHAPHAN (‘coney’ or ‘rock-badger’; an old totem clan-name—so W. R. Smith).—1. ‘The scribe’ (secretary of state) of Josiah in 621 B.C., ‘son of Lizah,’ who laid before the king the law-book discovered by Hilkiah (wh. see). In the Temple (2 K 22:3–22 = 2 Ch 34:14–18), Shaphan appears to have been the chief lay leader in the execution of Josiah’s reforms. The family for two following generations played a worthy part as servants of Jehovah, and friends of the prophet Jeremiah; the Ahikam of 2 K 22:3 (Is 24:5) and Jer 26, and the Geshurites of Jer 33:20, and Elisha (Jer 29:9) were Shaphan’s sons; the Micaiah of Jer 36:15, and Jedidiah (wh. see), whom the Chaldeans made governor of Judea after the Captivity of 586 B.C., his grandson. 2. The ‘Jasaniah, son of Shaphan,’ denounced in Ezk 8:2 as ringleader in idolatry, was possibly, but not certainly, a son of the same Shaphan.

G. G. Findlay.

SHAPHIR.—A city, probably on the Phrygian plain (Mic 1:11). It has been located by some a few miles S.E. of Ashdod. Attempts have been made to identify it with the Shamar of Jos 15:14. H. L. Willett.

SHARAI.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Eze 15:2).

SHARCER.—See SAGAR.

SHAREZER would answer to the Assy. Shar-œzer, ‘preserve the king,’ but that is only part of a name.

1. It is given 2 K 19:7–11 Is 37:28 as the name of a son of Sennacherib who with Adrammelech (which see) murdered his father. Sharœzer-Ascher was the name of a son of Sennacherib, who in a fragmentary letter is addressed as monarch, about the time of Esarhaddon’s reign. The name might give rise to Sharezer. At present, however, the Assyrian accounts mention only one murderer, and do not name him. A satisfactory explanation of the Hebrew narrative is yet to be found. 2. Sharezer (the name is prob. incomplete) appears in Zec 7:15 as one of a delegation sent to consult the spiritual heads of the Jewish community. C. H. W. Johns.

SHARON.—1. ha-shørôn, lit. ‘the plain,’ 1 Ch 27:1, Ca 2:13, 23, 38, 59, 60; Gr. Ἰσραήλ, A. Saron, Ac 1:1. This is the great Maritime Plain extending from Jaffa (wh. see) southwards, a small s. of it, to Mount Carmel in the north. Though called a plain, it is of an undulating character, and was in parts, particularly towards the N., a forest, though by poor culture almost it has a great depth of rich soil and is capable of much development; now largely to be abandoned, yields it annually a magnificent crop of beautiful wild flowers.
It has always been a pasture of flocks (1 Ch 27:9, Is 65:9). Around Ramleh and Ludd are forests of olives, and the orange gardens of Jaffa are too well known to need more than a passing reference; wherever this hand of man has been diligent, there the soil has bounteously responded. Over a great part of the plain, especially near the sea, water may be tapped at no great depth. Its rivers are the marshy Nahr Zerka or Crocodile River, just below Carmel, Nahr el-Mufaṣṣel, Nahr el-Iskanderiyyin, and Nahr el-Aujaḥ, the last mentioned close to Jaffa. The chief town of Sharon was in ancient days Dor (Jos 11:12b, 1 K 4:32), in NT times Cesarea, and in later times. The fortified city of Atlit. In Jos 12:18 Lasharon is mentioned as one of the royal cities of Canaan; as 'the king of,' is omitted in the original, the passage may read 'king of Aphek in the Sharon.' Fo Absalom set up a pillar of monument. Shaveh (Saronas) is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome as between Mt. Tabor and Tiberias, and this to-day represented by the village of Saronas (in the Ard el-Hammam N.E. of Tabor. This may be the place mentioned in Jos 12:18 (see above).

3. The suburbs (Rv 'pasture lands') of Sharon (1 Ch 5:44) are mentioned as among the possessions of Gad along with Gilead and Bashan.

E. W. G. Masterman.

SHARUAH.—See Shaaraim, 2.

SHASHAI.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign woman, Ezr 10:14 = Seals of 1 Es 9:4.

SHASHAK.—A Benjaminite family (1 Ch 8:9).

2. A son of Simeon (Gn 46:15, Ex 6:18 = 1 Ch 4:4).

The clan of which he is the eponym was of mixed Isr. and Can. descent, hence Saul is called in Gn 46:17 and Ex 6:18 'the son of the Canaanites.' In Nu 26:28 the patronymic Shuahites is used. 3. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:49, called in 1 Ch 6:31, 1 Es 9:6).

SHAVEH, VALE OF.—A broad valley ('meq), known also as 'the king's vale' (Gn 14:17), which was near Salem. It is apparently the same place as 'the king's dale' (2 S 15:18), in which Absalom set up a pillar of monument. Shaveh was possibly the broad open head of the valley of Hinnom which, lower down, contracts to a ravine.

SHAVEH-KIRIAHAIM.—The place where the Edomites were smitten by the allied kings from the East (Gn 14:14). It probably derived its name from the Moabite Kirathaim (Nu 32:17, Jos 13:18).

H. L. WILDETT.

SHAVSHA occurs in the list of David's officers in 1 Ch 18:14 as 'scribe' (Rv 'secretary'), an office made necessary by the growth of the court and relations with other states. His name, and the fact of his father's not being mentioned, make it probable that he was a foreigner chosen to deal with foreign correspondence. His name was evidently unfamiliar; in the list of 2 S 20:20 it appears as Sheva; in that of 2 S 21:18 (otherwise identical with Ch.) Seraiah has been substituted; LXX varies greatly in all passages. It is generally held that Shavsha is correct. Apparently in Solomon's time he was succeeded by his sons (1 K 6:49 Shisha being probably only another variation of the name).

C. W. EMERIT.

SHEA (Ezr 1:6).—One of those who had married a foreign wife; called Jaseclus in 1 Es 6:9.

SHEALTIEL (Salathiel of 1 Es 5:14, 6:6, AV of Mt 1:12, Lk 3:31).—The father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3:2, 5:5, Neh 12, Hag 1:11. 2:2, 6:2). According to 1 Ch 3:1, Shealtiel was the eldest son of king Jehoram. In ev. the NT makes Pedaiah (a brother of Shealtiel) the father of Zerubbabel.

SHEARRAH.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:5, 9:4).

SHEARING-HOUSE, THE.—A place at which Jehu, on his way from Jerimoth to Ramoth, met and killed the brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 10:12, 14).

 Possibly the original should be left untranslated and appear as a place-name Beth-eked, which has not been identified.

SHEAR-JASHUB ('a remnant shall return,' Is 7:11).—Symbolic name given to a son of Isaiah to signify the return of the remnant to God after the punishment at the hands of the Assyrians. See 8:10 9:18, and cf. Z ch. 8-9, and art. ISAIAH, p. 367.

SHEATH.—See Armur ARMS, 1 (c).

SHEBA.—1. The OT name for the people and country of the Sabaeans in S.W. Arabia. In Gen. and Chron. the racial relationships of the people are diversely given. Gn 10:7 (P) and 1 Ch 1:9 make them Hamites, Gn 10:8 (J) Semites. Again, whilst Gn 10:7 has Joktan as the immediate ancestor of Sheba, Gn 25:5 has Jokshan. These discrepancies are sufficiently accounted for by the extensive commerce of the Sabaeans, the number of their settlements in distant regions, and the connections which they were thus led to form. The language and script of Abyssinia, for instance, proves that a Sabean colony was established there; hence the genealogy in Gn 10.

The following are the salient points in the information which the OT gives us. The country was rich in gold (Ps 72:19) and incense (Jer 49:13); the people were great traders (Ezk 27:21), dealing in costly wares (Ezk 28:4); their caravans were well known through the East (Ezk 16:24); they were given to raiding (Job 14:11), possibly uniting trade and robbery, when con venient (cf. Odyss. xii, 415 ff.); and they were not averse to the slave-trade (Jr 39); eventually, it was hoped, they would become tributaries of Israel (Is 60:9, Ps 75:4).

The notices in Greek and Latin authors correspond with the Biblical statements. Strabo, e.g., mentions myrrh, incense, cinnamon, balsam, amongst the products of the land, and states that their commerce was very extensive; that they had abundant furniture of gold and silver, beds, tables, bowls, cups, in costly houses. The panels, walls, and ceilings were adorned with ivory, gold, silver, mosaics. He affirms that they frequently laid waste the Syrian desert.

The Sabaeans are also mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, Tiglath-pileser III. (b.c. 745-727) enumerates the articles which he received from them in tribute: 'gold, silver, camels, male camels, female camels, spices of all sorts.' In an inscription of b.c. 707, Sargon declares that he 'received the tribute of Pitu, king of the land of Musur (Egypt), Samat, queen of the land of Aribu (Arabia), Itamara, king of the land of the Saha'a (Sabaeans), gold, products of the mountains, horses, camels.'

During the 19th century a few European travellers succeeded in penetrating Yemen and bringing back a moderately full account of its natural features, and a large amount of material for reconstructing its history. It is incomparably superior to the rest of the East in climate and in soil. The central district is a highland region, with mountains some 8000 ft. above the sea level. Fertile valleys branch out from the hills, welltimbered in places, and threaded by silvery streams of dancing waters; sloping fields, gay with crops and wild flowers; terraced or jungle-covered slopes. Here are grown the best vines that Arabia produces. The air is pure and comparatively cool. The present capital is Sana, a town of about 20,000 inhabitants, on the southermmost of three great plateaux. The ancient capital, Marib, N. E. of Sana, lies between the rich valleys of the west and the 'wadys of Hadramaut, which were the sources of Arabian gum.' Inscriptions relating to the Sabean kingdom have been found in various parts of the Arabian peninsula. They are written in a dialect which closely resembles Ethiopic, but there are no vowel letters in the consonants, to indicate vowel sounds. Many come from the vicinity of Marib, where the ruins are of astonishing extent. The remains of its great dam, in particular, are very striking: a gigantic wall, two miles long and 175 paces wide, was built to connect two hills, and the water was run off for irrigation purposes by dikes which were cut at different levels. The construction of this work lies back in remote antiquity, B.C. 1700 being the date given by one authority, and B.C. 700 by another. About 100 A.D. it seems to have burst, and the streams which it once served to retain are now wasted in the sands. The Koran (Sura 34) adduces this event as an instance of the punishment of the disbelievers. In addition to these inscriptions, coins have been found and the names of the kings whose monograms they bear have been determined. From two of these sources forty-five royal names have been known, six kings having been called It'amara (see Sargon's list of tributaries). From one of the records it appears that two kings reigned contemporaneously (cf. Ps 72:29), and this has been explained by the fact that the prince next in age to the king was designated as his successor, sometimes to the temporary exclusion of the king's son.

Experts have differed with respect to the number of periods into which the history of the Sabean kingdom falls. All recognize three main divisions: (1) That of the makkur or priest-kings; (2) that of the kings of Sheba; (3) that of the kings of Sheba and Dhū-Hūdun. Glaser (Kurzgefasste Geschichte Arabiens) proposes a different scheme. The Minean empire, and adds a fifth period, during which the dates of the sacred books are copied from the sacred books and slabs relate to war and agriculture. They bring before us a set of traditions disposing of the products of their own country, and also contain many references to Arabia and Africa to the great empires of Tyre and the powerful monarchs of Meopotamia. They give us a glimpse of the life led by a class of powerful nobles who dwell on their estates in castles and towns. They furnish a considerable amount of information respecting the Sabean religion, its offerings in incense, birds, its pilgrimages to certain shrines, its special month for pilgrimage, Dhū Hijjātān. The heavenly bodies were worshipped, the sun as a female, the moon as a male, deity. Many other divinities were recognized: a 20° Alīm for some of the female Ataibah, Ala'mak, Ta'lāb, Samī, Kawīm, Basīr, Haushab. The precise significance of some of these titles is often open to doubt. But the cognate Heb. words (Hbr. šāmā) urge us as a saying that Samī 'is the 'Hearer,' Kawīm, the 'Sustainer,' Basīr, the 'Teddings-bringer,' and the Arabic word of the same form indicates that Ta'lāb is a spirit of the tree. Three other names, Wādī ('Love'), Jāghur ('He befits'), and Nan ('Valture' or 'Eagle'), are spoken of in the Koran (Nbr. 72) as though they were antediluvian idols. On inscriptions which date from the 4th and 5th centuries of our era, Rahman ('the Merciful') appears as a Jewish king's name and it is interesting to observe that the Jews now living in Yemen have a tradition that their ancestors left Palestine before the Christian era. [R. v. 28. 8]

2. A worthless adventurer, who snatched at what he thought was a chance of winning the sovereignty of Northern Israel (2 S 20:9). His appeal was addressed to the deep-seated Intercerastical jealousy. David took a serious view of the situation thus created (v. 40), but his rivals lacked the personal qualities which might have rendered him formidable. He traversed the entire centre of the country seeking adherents in vain. Knowing that Josiah and Abjāl were on his heels, he shut himself up in Abel-beth-macah (modern Ablī), a town in the extreme north. There, according to a probable emendation of the text (v. 40), he was supported by his clansmen and 'sons' of Abishal, c. (cf. 'son of Būḥār,' v. 25). A site of this place would speedily have been carried by his soldiery but not a woman, whose judgment was highly esteemed by the inhabitants, persuaded them to throw Sheba's head over the wall to Josiah. (v. 25). 3. A Gaddite, (1 Ch 5:31). 4. The Sheba of Jos 15:24 is out of place after Beer-sheba. V. 7 shows that we ought to find thirteen, not fourteen, names. The LXX retains that number by omitting Sheba, and putting in the list, Shebarun, brackets, and should be dropped, for it is identical with the Shihim of 15:24. Some Heb. MSS lose out Sheba, as does also the parallel passage 1 Ch 4:14. The Sheba of the LXX is from the list of 15:24. There can be little doubt that Sheba, inserted by mistake in the Heb. text and transliterated by the LXX, was subsequently changed to Sheba. [J. TAYLOR]

SHEBA, QUEEN OF.—1 K 10:14 narrates a visit of the contemporary queen of Sheba to King Solomon. At the present day there is a strong tendency to regard this as a legendary addition made by the later editor for the purpose of emphasizing Solomon's wealth and wisdom. The reasons adduced are not quite conclusive. It is no doubt true that the inscriptions hitherto discovered fail to mention any queen of the Sabaeans. But the names are given of queens who reigned over other Arabian countries, and, curiously enough, in Sargon's inscription, quoted on p. 842, Samāt, queen of Arimlu, immediately precedes It'amara, king of Sheba. It must be admitted, however, that the narrative in 1 K 10 is not free from difficulties. We cannot satisfactorily explain the words 'concerning the name of the Lord' (v. 1): the LXX 'and' etc. being an obvious attempt to evade the difficulty, and the Chronicles (2 Ch 9) omitting all the words. It is hard to believe that the monarch of a highly civilized and exceedingly wealthy State should be dismayed by the luxuriance of the court of Jerusalem (v. 1); that reads as though the queen of some petty tribe of Arabs was in question. Moreover, it is likely enough that the motive of the visit was other than commerce. Riddles, proverbs, apologetics, and stories supply much of the material for the story of this visitation, but the queen of Sheba would visit her brother monarch with a more practical object than these. Commercial intercourse between the two countries was of extreme importance for the prosperity of both: Kittel (Die Bücher der Könige, p. 89) is justified in suggesting that she wished to promote this.

The fantastic legends which gathered round this journey may be conveniently read in Sura 227 of the Koran, and the notes on that chapter from Mohammedan sources which Sale has collected. Mohammed himself no doubt derived his account from Jewish sources. A lengthy history of queen Bilkia, from Ta'līb's Lives of the Prophets, may be found in Brunnow's Arabic Christology. Solomon marries the queen, and the Abyssinians, to whom the story passed from the Arabs, call her Makeda, and trace from this marriage the lineage of all their kings. In this connexion two facts should be noted. First, that Abyssinia was undeniably colonized by the Sabaeans. Second, that Jos. (Ant. n. x. 2) speaks of 'Shea, a royal city of Ethiopia,' and ( complied, without naming Sheba, gives an account of the visit to Solomon of a woman who was 'queen of Egypt and Ethiopia.' He is mistaken as to the locality, but it is interesting to observe the tradition which he repeats, that she was the root of that balsam which our country still bears by this woman's gift. [J. TAYLOR]

SHEBAH.—A place mentioned (Jos 7) in the description of the pursuit of the Jairites by the men of Ai. RVm gives 'the quarries,' but the text is probably corrupt.

SHEBAH.—See TIME.

SHEBER.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:49).

SHEBAH (in 2 K 18:18 = SHEBBANAH).—A major-domo or palace-governor of king Hezekiah, and is directed one of the recorded utterances of Isaiah (Isa 22:11). The prophetic denunciation appears to have found its fulfilment in Sheba's degradation to the office of 'scribe' or secretary, and the elevation of Elikim (wh. see) to the post of palace-governor (2 K 18:18, 19; 19:18). Sheba was in all probability a foreigner.

SHEBEUL.—1. A son of Gershom (1 Ch 23:26), called in 24th Shubael, which is prob. the original form of the name. 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25:1 [v. 30 Sheneah]).

SHECHEM.—1. Gn 33:17, 34:1; etc. See Jacob, Hamor. 2. A Manassean clan, Nu 33:17 (as the Shechemites), Jos 17:1, 17:21. 3. See next article.

SHECHEM.—The place in which Jacob for a while established himself (Gn 33:17, 34:1). Here he is said to have dug the well consecrated by Christ's conversation with the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:11). The development of the Samaritan nation led to its rise. It was known at this period to the natives by the name Mabora (Jos. B.J. iv. viii. 1), but the name by which it was generally known, after its re-building by Titus Flavius Verusianus, was Flavia Neapolis, or, more briefly, Neapolis—a name which still persists in the modern Arabic form Nablus, though usually Roman or Greek names imposed on Palestinian sites have disappeared, the older names persisting.

In the Byzantine period there was a bishopric at Neapolis, of which we know little—save that the Samaritans in a.d. 474 wounded the bishop, and were in consequence severely punished by the emperor Zeno. The church at the Crusaders in 1099, and several churches were there built by them—one of which still survives in part as a mosque. In 1184 it was re-conquered by Salahid. The inhabitants have always been noted for turbulence and lawlessness. Towards the end of the 18th century it was a storm-centre of the inter-tribal wars of the Juttah. The leader of the district being the notorious Kasim el-Ahmad.

It is now a town of some 24,000 inhabitants, all Moslem except about 150 Samaritans and 700 Christians. They are concerned in extensive soap manufacture, and in trade in wool and cotton with Eastern Palestine. There are Protestant and Roman Catholic missions, and an Immaculate Conception English hospital directed by the Church Missionary Society.

In or near the town are shown 'Jacob's well,' which, as already said, is not improbably authentic; and a stone covering the traditional 'Jacob's well.' The genuineness of which is perhaps less unsatisfactory.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SHEDEUR.—The father of Elizur (Nu 1:20, 12:10).

SHEEP.—1. Bib. 'small cattle,' such as sheep and goats, Gn 4:2; etc.; a single sheep or goat, Ex 22:5. 2. a single sheep or goat, collectively, like 1, Is 7:11, etc.; 2, Gn 28:4, 6. 2. a lamb, Ex 34:15; etc. See prop. name Rachel. 5. kar, Dt 32:4, 'young lamb.' 6. heb, Nu 7:1, Is 56:1, etc.; goat, Lv 3:13, etc.; lamb, Is 56:1, 2, etc.; a lamb from the flock of Abraham (Abraham), Is 1:15, Is 40:4, 65, 66, etc. 7. It is often used of the family of Leuel (Josh 21:22), of which Jacob was a member (Jg 9). 8. This is to be distinguished from the 'Shechemites,' or from the contemporary 'Shem ISIS,' etc., son of Jethro (SHECANIAH). 9. It is possible that he and No. 1 are identical.

The common sheep of Palestine is the fat-tailed sheep (Ovis aries, var. laticaudata). The mass of tail-fat is sometimes enormous; it is the 'whole rump' (Heb. and Arab. 'alphy') of the lamb, Ex 23:19, 33:5. Sheep are usually pastured with goats except when the land is too rocky and barren for the former. The flock is led by the shepherd, though the shepherd's boy may bring up rear; on a journey a shepherd of experience must drive the flock (Gn 33:19), while another leads. When away from villages, the sheep are herded at night in folds, which are roughly made enclosures of piled-up stones; the shepherd and the flock are in a g. e. or hut adjoining the fold and touch with his sheep, each of which knows unerring at a glance. The skin of a sheep, roughly tanned with the wool on, is the common winter jacket (jorukh) of a shepherd and his peasant. To kill a sheep for a stranger's meal is one of the first acts of Bedouin hospitality. In the country, sheep are killed only in such circumstances or in honour of some festive occasion (cf. 1 S 25:14, 1 K 19).

SHEEP GATE.—See JERUSALEM, II. 4.

SHEERAH.—A 'daughter' of Ephraim, 'who, according to the MT of Is 1:7, built the two Beth-horons and a place of doubtful identity called UZEN-SHEERAH.—portion [lit. something weighed] of Sheerah.

SHEKHARAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:9).

SHEET.—See DRAPERY, 4 (d).

SHEKEL.—See MONEY, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, III.

SHEKINAH (from Heb. 'shaken'—to dwell, meaning 'dwelling' [abstract], or 'that which dwells']).—The word is not found in OT, but occurs often in other Jewish literature, always of God. The OT, particularly in certain of its writings, uses 'anthropomorphisms' freely, e.g. it speaks of God dwelling in a place or being seen. Later thought objected to this, as materializing the Divine nature; hence in the Targums (Aram. paraphrases of the OT used, though not in their present form, by the 1st cent. B.C.) various devices were adopted to prevent popular misunderstandings. Periphrases were used for the Divine name, 'the Word' (Mema), 'Spirit,' or 'Wisdom' being substituted. One of the most important of these was the Shekhah (Himself, 'God dwells.—usually became 'the Shekinah rests'; 'the temple of God' became 'the house of the S.' (note the Tabernacle was the mishkhan, from the same root). Gq 28:8 becomes 'the glory of the S. of J is in this place'; Is 6: 5: 'my hand have seen the glory of the S. of the King of the world.' God's hiding His face is the removal of the S. Now the presence of God (especially in P related writings) was often manifested by a fiery appearance, or a light in a cloud. It was seen on Sinai (Ex 24:18), in the wilderness and in the Tabernacle (16:25, 40:9, Nu 14:18), in the Temple (1 K 8:1); cf. Ezk 1:4 etc. This glory was not God, but an effulgence from Him, or from His Shekinah. For S. was not 'the glory', as is usually imagined, but the source and centre of it. It is a stage nearer to God Himself, and, though often used in connexion with the physical manifestation, represents a more typical and universal essence. E.g. it is the source of inspiration. Eli failed to recognize Hannah's condition, because it had left him. It was present where three were gathered to administer justice. According to some, it was inseparable from Israel, still hovering over the west wall of the Temple, SHELAH. — The younger son of Judah by Shua (Gn 38:11). He was the father of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 26:15). He was also the father of Shelumiel, prince of the tribe of Simeon. See also SHELUMIEL.

SHEM. — The word signifies 'name,' which can also denote 'fame,' 'renown' (cf. 'the men of name,' Gn 68). Possibly it is an abbreviation; cf. Shelumiel (Samuel), 'name of God.' In one of the two traditions combined in 3 (Gn 11:26-32), Shem, the 'son' of Noah, is the eponymous ancestor of several peoples, occupying, roughly speaking, the central portions of the known world. It has a parallel list in 11:27-32. It is clear that Shem (from which is formed the frequently used title Shechemites or Semites) stands merely for a geographical division, for some of the nations traced to him—e.g., Elam, and Lud (probably Lydians)—are certainly not Semitic. In the other tradition (9:25) 'Shem' stands for a people in Palestine—the Hebrews, or some portion of them—with whom 'Japheth' lived in close conjunction, and to whom 'Canaan' was subjugated. See HAM.

SHEMAPH—A Benjamite (1 Ch 12:9).

SHEMAH ('Jahweh has heard').—The prophet who was associated with Ahijah the Shilonite in 1 Ki 12:25, 26.

SHEMAHIM, SIMEON, SIMEON. — See SIMEON.

SHEMELIAH, SHEMELM, SHEMELMIL. — Prince of the tribe of Simeon, Nu 26:15. See also SHELUMIEL.

SHEM—The word signifies 'name,' which can also denote 'fame,' 'renown' (cf. 'the men of name,' Gn 60). Possibly it is an abbreviation; cf. Shelumiel (Samuel), 'name of God.' In one of the two traditions combined in 3 (Gn 11:26-32), Shem, the 'son' of Noah, is the eponymous ancestor of several peoples, occupying, roughly speaking, the central portions of the known world. It has a parallel list in 11:27-32. It is clear that Shem (from which is formed the frequently used title Shechemites or Semites) stands merely for a geographical division, for some of the nations traced to him—e.g., Elam, and Lud (probably Lydians)—are certainly not Semitic. In the other tradition (9:25) 'Shem' stands for a people in Palestine—the Hebrews, or some portion of them—with whom 'Japheth' lived in close conjunction, and to whom 'Canaan' was subjugated. See HAM.

SHEMELA—A Reubenite, 1 Ch 3:2. See SHEMUEL.

SHEMMAH—A Benjamite (1 Ch 12:9).

SHEMMAH ('Jahweh has heard').—The prophet who was associated with Ahijah the Shilonite in 1 Ki 12:25, 26.

SHEMMEH—A Levite, the son of Shimei, one of the singers engaged in the dedication of the temple (1 Ch 25:28).

SHEMRAH—A son of Joktan (Gen 10:26) and therefore a tribe in Southern Arabia. It is not yet identified.

SHEMREH.—A sheikh (1 Ch 27:7).

SHEMSHAL—Father of an Asherite prince (Nu 34:7).

SHEMOTH.—1. The mother of the man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed the 'Name' (Lv 20:9). 2. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:19). 3. One of the 'sons of Ezra' (1 Ch 23:18), called in 2 Ch 23:18 Shelomoth. 4. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11:19). 5. A family which returned with Ezra (Ezr 2:20; 1 Es 8:24) called Salimoth.

SHEMARIAH

28. "The great," kinsman of Tobias (To 59). In several cases two of these may be the same individual. The identification has the most probability in reference to 2 and 3, 8 and 9, and 12 and 13.

SHEMER.—See Sheemer, No. 4.

SHEMER.—1. The owner of the hill purchased by Omri (1 K 16). 2. A Merarite (1 Ch 624). 3. An Asherite (1 Ch 74), called in v. 18 Shomer. 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 87). The Heb. MSS show here some confusion between r and d as the final letter of the name. The AV (Shamed) and RV (Shemel) retain the reading of the Geneva version, which is based on the Vulg. Samed.

SHEMIMA.—A 'son' of Gilead, according to Nu 268 (P), called in Jos 171 (JE) a 'son' of Manasseh; his descendants are enumerated in 1 Ch 71. The gentilic name Shemidites occurs in Nu 262.

SHEMINITH.—See art. Psalms, p. 772.

SHEMINRATH.—A Levitical family (1 Ch 1512, 169, 2 Ch 178).

SHEMUEL.—1. The Simeonite appointed to assist in the dividing of the land (Nu 343). It is not improbable that the MT should be corrected to Shelumiel, the form in 1679 and 1694. 2. Grandson of Issachar (1 Ch 79).

SHEN ('the tooth or crag').—A well-known place 'the Shen,' named with Mizpah to indicate the position of the stone which was set up by Samuel to commemorate the defeat of the Philistines (1 S 77). The site is unknown.

SHEZAZAR.—See Shezibazzar.

SHEOL.—The Simeonite equivalent of the classical conception of Hades. The word has been derived from a number of roots. The two main probable origins seem to be those from the Assy. root shaal ('to consult an oracle'), and sh planning ('chamber'). The latter derivation seems somewhat more in accordance with the synonym of pit. In most cases, according to this derivation of the word, Sheol was regarded as an underworld of the dead in which the shades lived. Hebrew eschatology, although somewhat obscure in its early phase, probably tended to perpetuate the animistic conception. The habit of burying the family in communal tombs may also have lent some meaning to the word. In Sheol the dead continued to live as on earth. It seems to have been a somewhat common belief that they could be summoned by some process of necromancy (1 S 29). In the absence of any consistent Hebrew eschatology, however, it is impossible to determine whether the dead were believed to be conscious or active. Apparently different opinions existed on this point (cf. Ps 8819 9419 3019, Job 1419, with Ezk 2219). From the latter it would appear that the non-activity of the dead was the more current opinion.

According to Eth. Enoch 2224, Sheol was divided into four sections, intended respectively for the martyrs, the righteous who were not martyrs, sinners who had lived prosperously, and sinners who had been of some degree punished. The situation of those in these four sections varied from extreme bliss in the first case to loss of all hope of the resurrection in the fourth. The souls in the third division were to be 'stain' in the day of judgment; but the meaning of this is obscure. Nor is it at all clear that this fourfold division was commonly held. The twofold division into the abode of the blessed and the abode of those suffering punishment seems to have been generally held. At the resurrection, which preceded the judgment, it was believed, at least by those under the influence of Pharisasm, that the righteous shades would rise from Sheol, and, after receiving new bodies, ascend to heaven.

The NT conception of Sheol is not fundamentally other than that of Judaism, if we may judge from the few references. The most important is that of Lk 1614, the parable of Dives and Lazarus. Hades (AV Hell) in the NT is either the synonym of death, or of complete loss and misery, although the idea of punishment is usually implied by Gehenna. It would appear that the idea of purgatorial cleansing, which Rabbinical Judaism introduced into the conception, was altogether absent from NT thought. Christ is said (Rev 2019) to have 'the keys of death and Hades,' and in 1 P 310 he is said to have preached to 'spirits in prison,' i.e. in Sheol (cf. Apoc. Baruch 232, 2 Es 7216). Generally speaking, however, the NT does not develop any new doctrine of Sheol, and is as far as possible from favouring the extreme speculation of either Rabbinic Judaism or of Patristic Christianity.

SHALER MATTHEWS

SHEPHAM.—A place on the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Nu 3411). The site has not been identified. Perhaps Zabdi, the Shipshime (1 Ch 272), was a native of Shepham.

SHEPHELAH.—See Plain (5).

SHEPHER.—A 'station' of the children of Israel (Nu 3311). Nothing is known about its position.

SHEPHERD.—See Shereph.

SHEPHI (1 Ch 14) or SHEPHO (Gn 363).—A Hottite chief.

SHEPHUPHAN (Nu 268 or SHEPHUPHAN (1 Ch 89).—A Benjamite family = Gn 468 Muppim and 1 Ch 710. 10 268 Shuppim; gentile Shaphamites in Nu 268.

SHEZIB.—One of the Levites who joined Ezra (Ezk 141, Neh 809 109 9129). The name appears in 1 Es 801 as Asebeias, v. 84 Esirebas, and 95 Sarahias. Cf. Mahli.

SHERESHE.—A Manassite clan (1 Ch 79).

SHERIFF.—In Dn 31 'sheriffs' is the EV tr. of Aram. Shaphetib, a word of quite uncertain meaning.

SHESHACH.—A cryptic name of Bab, found in the received text of Jer 25314. It is formed by the method called Atbash, that is a substitution of zay for aleph, shin for bet, and so on. The word is, however, no part of the original text of Jeremiah, being a conceit of later editors. In both passages it is lacking in LXX. Cf. Lesh-Kamai.

J. F. McCurdy

SHESHAL.—A clan resident in Hebron, driven thence by Caleb (Nu 1320, Jos 159, Jg 110).

SHEMBAN.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 218, 11).

SHESHBAZZAR.—This name is of Bab, origin, and appears in LXX in several forms, some of which point to the moon-god Sin, others, e.g. Sanaabaz, to the moon-god Sin as the derivation, the meaning being 'O sun-god [or moon-god], protect the lord [or the son].' The person Sheshbazzar is described as 'the prince of Judah,' having received the keys of Sheol, and to have taken the temple keys (Ezk 1111, cf. 1 Es 2111). The same fact is stated in Ezr 514, 14, where Sheshbazzar is designated 'the governor' (pešēlah), and is also said to have laid the foundations of the Temple (cf. 1 Es 6:6, 9). It is probable that the Persian title 'Tirshathu' in Ezr 2:6, Neh 7:50 refers to Sheshbazzar.

Some have identified Sheshbazzar with Zerubbabel on the ground that the laying of the foundation of the Temple (Ezr 3:8) ascribed to Zerubbabel and in 538 to Sheshbazzar, while instances of men bearing two different names occur infrequently (e.g. 2 Kgs 23:4; 24:1, Dn 1:2). But, when we compare Ezr 3:8 and 5:4, it does not seem necessary to assume that the two men are identical. Both may have returned from Babylon at the same time, while Sheshbazzar was the ruling official, Zerubbabel may in all likelihood have been the moving spirit in building the Temple. Ezr 3:8 gives the Chronicler's own account of the work, while Ezr 5 purports to be an official report, and would naturally mention the official head of the community as the person responsible for what occurred during his term of office. Then the probability of the one person bearing two names, while not impossible, seems unlikely here, because (1) both names are of foreign origin, unlike the double names Dositel and Belteshazzar, where the one is Hebrew and the other foreign; and (2) as a rule, the Chronicler is careful to note the identification—e.g. 'Damiel whose name was Belteshazzar.'

If then, Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel were two different persons, there can be no reason for a forestall. In all probability he was a Jew. It was quite in accordance with the policy of the Persians to appoint a Jew to act as governor in Jerusalem, while the name Sheshbazzar, being of Bab. origin, would not likely be borne by a Persian. It has been conjectured that Sheshbazzar is identical with the Sheshazar of 1 Ch 3:19, a son of Jehoiachin and uncle of Zerubbabel; and this would justify the title 'prince of Judah' given to him in Ezr 1. Then, further, it is not unlikely that the younger man, Zerubbabel, took the leading part in the work of restoration, and as a result his uncle's memory would fall into the background. This theory is made more probable by the fact that Zerubbabel succeeded to the governorship as early as the reign of Darius Hystaspis, B.C. 550 (cf. Hag 1:14). W. F. BOYD.

SHETH.—In Nu 24:7 (only) AV and RVm tr. bēn śēth 'children (sons) of Shehth,' but there can be little doubt that the correct tr. is that of RV, 'sons of tumult.'

SHETHAR.—One of the seven princes who had the right to the royal presence (1 Chr 21:6).

SHEVA.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:52). 2. See Shavsha.

SHEWBREAD.—In one of the oldest historical documents preserved in the OT we find, in a passage telling of David's flight from Saul, the first mention of an offering in the shape of 'holy bread,' which was presented to Jotham in the sanctuary at Nob (1 S 21:14). Here this holy bread is also termed 'the bread of the presence' (v. 5), i.e. of Jotham, which appears in EV as 'shewbread'—a rendering due to Tindale, who adds the note, 'shewbread, because it was always in the presence and sight of the Lord' (cf. v. 5, which ends literally thus: 'the presence-bread, that was taken from the presence of Jotham'). 'Presence-bread' is also the name for this special offering generally used (in the Priests' Code—but 'continental bread' in Nu 4), contr. from the fuller expression 2 Ch 2:2. The Chronicler, however, prefers another designation, which may be rendered 'piles-bread' (1 Ch 23:28-30; EV 'shewbread of the altar')—i.e. to be explained by the arrangement of the loaves in two piles (see below and cf. Lv 24:9 RVm).

After its first historical mention in connexion with the sanctuary of Nob, where it was periodically renewed at what intervals is not stated—the presence-bread is next met with in the Temple of Solomon. Here was an 'altar of cedars,' (1 Kgs 6:7, which scholars regard as an altar for the presentation of the offering of the shewbread. It stood, according to the restored text, in front of the dōr, or Most Holy Place, and is thus identified with 'the shewbread table' whose name was, 'mentioned in 7:4 in a section of later date (see, for the composite text of these chapters, the authorities cited in art. Temple, and cf. ob. § 5). The same inter-change of 'altar' and 'table' is found in the twelfth month (Shibboleth).

The table of shewbread is to be provided for the Tabernacle of P is discussed in the art. TABERNACLE, § 6 (a) (cf. Temple, § 9). The preparation of the shewbread itself, which in the time of the Chronicler was the privilege of a division of the Levites (1 Ch 23:29), is prescribed in another section of P (Lv 24:9). The offering consisted of twelve unleavened cakes of considerable size, since each cake contained a fifth of an ephah—an ephah held more than a bushel—of fine flour. The cakes were arranged on the table in two piles; on the top of each pile was placed an oblation of frankincense. The cakes were renewed every Sabbath day (v. 2 RV); these removed were eaten by the priests alone within the sanctuary precincts, the shewbread being among 'the most holy of the offerings of the Lord' (v. 7).

As regards the original significance of the shewbread offering there can be little doubt. This was done in the hope that any oblation, which modern scholars regard as having had its origin in pre-historic times in the native desire to propitiate the deity by providing him with a meal (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 16). This view is confirmed by the fact that it was accompanied, even in the later period, by a provision of wine, as is clear from the mention of 'the flagons thereof, and the bowls thereof, to pour out withal' (Ex 25:28 RV, Nu 4:12). The analogy of the shewbread altar with the Altar of Incense is apt. Less familiar is the similar offering among the Babylonians, who laid cakes of 'sweet,' i.e. unleavened, bread on the altars of various deities (see Zimmermann's list in KAT 660). The analogy between the Babylonian and Hebrew ritual is rendered still more striking by the identity of the name 'bread of the presence' (loc. cit.), and of the number of cakes offered—twelve or a multiple of twelve. This number had probably an astrological origin. Having reference originally to the twelve months of the year, or the twelve signs of the Zodiac. For the later Hebrews, at least, the twelve loaves of the presence-bread doubtless represented the twelve tribes of Israel, and was thus a symbolical expression of the nation's gratitude to God as the continual source of every material blessing. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SHIBAH.—A name given to a well dug by Isaac (Gn 26:21), which gave its name to the town Beer-sheba (v. 18). The word means, according to the writers of the LXX, 'an oath'; and Beersheba is 'the well of the oath,' so named from the swearing of the oath of friendship between Isaac and Abimelech (Gn 26:29). In Gn 21:31-2 we have another account, according to which the well was dug by Abraham and received its name from the oath between Abraham and Abimelech. There is also a play on the word shib'ah, 'oath' and sheba', 'seven,' as a sacrifice of seven lambs was offered. Perhaps the name, however, was already in existence before Abraham's time, and the writer simply gives a more or less plausible explanation of its derivation. W. F. BOYD.

SHIBBOLETH (means both 'ear of corn' and 'stream').—In the strife that arose between the Gileadites, under Jephthah, and the Ephraimites, an episode occurred which is recounted in Jg 12-4. According to this, the Gileadites were holding the fords of Jordan in order to cut off the fugitive Ephraimites; but the only way of differentiating between friend and foe was to test a fugitive as to his pronunciation of such a word as 'Shibboleth,' in which the Ephraimites possibly of pronouncing sh as s would immediately be noticed. If, on uttering this word, the fugitive pronounced it ‘Sibboleth,’ he was known to be an Ephraimitite, and was forthwith slain. In this way there fell, according to the obviously exaggerated account in J, ‘forty and two thousand.’

SHIELD.—See ARMOUR ARMS, § 2 (a).

SHIGGAION.—See PSALMS, p. 778a.

SHIHOR in Is 23:3, Jer 25:2 seems to mean Egypt (?), the Nile (?), or the waters of Egypt; in 1 Ch 13:10, 13:19, it is the S.W. frontier of Canaan. If the name is Hebrew it may mean ‘the black’ in distinction to the dark waters or even to the black alluvial land itself; the Egyptian name of Egypt is Kemet, meaning ‘black.’ But, as Bruche pointed out, Sh Hor is the Egyptian name of a certain city (Onk. etc.), an eclipse of great Nile, on or near the eastern border of Egypt (see Sura). The black alluvium might well he counted as the boundary of Canaan; but elsewhere the boundary is the high road (of the River) of Egypt was spent, and SHIHOR-LIBNATH.—One of the boundaries of Ashtar (Jos 19:3). It stands apparently for a river, most probably the Nahr ez-Zerku, the Crocodile River.

SHIKKERON.—A place on the northern boundary of Judah (Jos 15:37). The site is unknown.

SHILHI.—Father of Asa’s wife (1 K 22:2, 2 Ch 20:24).

SHILLEM, SHILLEMITES.—See SHALUM, No. 7.

SHILOH.—See SHIELD.

SHILOH.—1. Here the Israelites assembled at the completion of the conquest, and erected the Tent of Meeting; portions were assigned to the still landless tribes (Jos 15:3c. v. 21). At Shiloh the congregation deliberated regarding the altar built by the men of the eastern tribes in the Jordan valley (22:8-9). During the period of the Judges, it was the central sanctuary (Jo 218), the scene of great religious festivals and pilgrimages (219), 1 S 19). On one of these occasions the Benjamites captured as wives the women who danced among the vineyards (211).

At this site the prophet Eli resided, and from this narrative we gather that the ‘tent’ had given place to a permanent structure, a ‘temple’ (hekkot), under the care of the high priest Eli and his family. The loss in war and the disaster to his sons proved fatal to Eli (1 S 4:22), and Shiloh apparently ceased to rank as a sanctuary. The destruction of its temple, possibly by the Philistines, is alluded to in Jer 7:14. 24. 26. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33, Edd’s descendents in Nob (1 S 14:22). The prophet Ahijah was a native of Shiloh (1 K 11:2 149). The original name, as shown by the gentilic Shilonite, was Shilhon. This form survives in the modern. So called, probably, on a ruined site on a hill E. of the road to Shechem, about 9 miles N. of Bethel, and 3 miles S.W. of Khan el-Lubban (Lebanon, Jg 21:19). A terrace on the N. of the hill, with a rock-hewn quadrangle, c. 400 ft. x 80 ft., may have been the site of the ancient temple. There is an excellent spring in the valley to the east. There are also numerous rock-hewn tombs. The terraced slopes tell of ancient works, long since disappeared.

2. The real meaning of the clause, ‘until Shiloh come’ (Ge 49:10 EV) is doubtful. If ‘Shiloh’ were a name applied to the Messiah, it would have a special significance; but this cannot be discovered. No ancient version so reads it. The Targ. (Ed., T. R., and pseu.-J.) all interpret it of the Messiah. The Peshitta, on the other hand, reads ‘until he shall come whose it [i.e. the kingdom] is.’ Three possible readings are given in RV. ‘Till he come to Shiloh’ grammatically correct, and supported by many scholars.

Elsewhere in Scripture, Shiloh means the Ephraimitic town. This is taken to refer to Judah’s laying down the leadership he had exercised, when the conquest finished, Israel assembled at Shiloh. Apart from other objections, however, abbeu, ‘the oath’, seems to be more likely something more than a mere tribal supremacy, and it is not certain that Judah possessed even that preeminence. (2) ‘Until that which is his shall come’; so LXX ‘ξηρά ἐξαντλήσθη’. The things reserved for him are ‘Until he shall come whose it is’ (Pesh., Targg. as above). While no certain decision as to the exact meaning is possible, the Messianic character of the verse is clear. It contemplates the ultimate passing of the power of Judah into the hands of an ideal ruler.

Shiloniote—‘native of Shiloh’ is used of—1. Abiah (1 K 11:21). 2. A family dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Ch 95 etc.). In the latter passage the family is prob. ‘the Shelanite’ (cf. Nu 26:8). W. EVIN.

SHILONITE.—1. See SHILOH. 2. See SHELH, 1.

SHILSHA.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:27).

SHIMEAH.—1. A descendant of Jabez (1 Ch 4:8). The earlier Shimea is called in 8th Shimea. 2. See SHAMMAR, No. 2.

SHIMEAM.—See SHIMRASH, No. 1.

SHIMEATH.—A name given to the father or mother of one of the murderers of Joash (2 K 12:2, 2 Ch 24:3). The murderer himself is called Zabad in 2 Ch. and Jozaar in 2 Kings. Probably for Zabad in 2 Ch. we ought to read Jehovahahad, and undoubtedly Jehovahahad and Jozaar are identical, and by scribal repetition (ditography) we have the two really identical names and the varying forms Shimeath, Shimrith, and Shomer. The descriptions ‘Ammonites’ and ‘Moabites’ in 2 Ch. are certainly later embellishments of the story, and Shimeath was probably the father of the one murderer, Jehovahahad, and an Israelite. The Shimeathites were a family or division of the tribe of Caleb (1 Ch 24). They may be included in the description ‘the families of the scribes, which dwelt at Jabez,’ but the whole passage leaves us uncertain. The Vulg. regards the name as referring to the function of a section of the scribes (resonantes) after the Exile.

W. F. BOYD.

SHIMEI, SHIMEITES.—Shimei was a popular name among the Hebrews, being especially common in Levitical circles. Of most of the persons bearing it, absolutely nothing except the name is known. 1. The personage of this designation, of whom the history has given us some details, is a Benjamite of the clan of Saul. On account of his tribal and family connexions, it is quite natural for him to be David’s bitter enemy. As the latter is fleecing before Absalom, Shimei meets him and heaps curses and insults on the fugitive monarch. David’s triumphant return, however, brings him in abysm penance to the feet of his sovereign, who pardons him (2 S 16:2). 2. Nevertheless, David in his dying charge is represented as enjoining Solomon to ‘bring his head to Sheol with blood.’ After this Shimei is not permitted to go beyond the walls of Jerusalem on pain of death; but presuming three years later to go to Gath in quest of fugitive slaves, he is executed by Benahah at the command of the king (1 K 2:36). The official at the head of one of the prefectures which were erected on this monarch, is probably identical with him (1 K 4:1). 3. A prince of the Judahite royal house of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:1). 4. The name occurs in the tribal genealogies of both Simeon and Reuben (1 Ch 4:43). 5. In v. 5 (in v. Shema). 6. The grandson of Levi (Ex 6:19 Nu 3:16, 1 Ch 6:23). 7. A son of SHIPRAH.—One of the two Hebrew midwives (Ex 19).

Tartessus in Spain, had come to be used in a secondary sense, like the ‘East-Indianman’ of large vessels suited for such a trade. It is believed that by this time they had penetrated as far as Cornwall, and had even found their way to the Canaries. Their numerous copies, at any rate, the most distant, of which Cartwright was the best known, probably began to be founded soon after. The form of their ships, it would appear, a gradual development from the hollowed trunk of a tree to the vessel of three or four mast, of which Cartwright gives a trentive (see Hastings’ DB, Art. ‘Ships’). With the Assyrians navigation seems to have been confined to the Tigris and Euphrates, where small timber boats, supported by inflated skins (kalek), and coracles of plaited woad (kuza), were largely in use (see KB, Art. ‘Ships’). On the other hand, the Babylonians seem quite to have justified the phrase ‘ships of their rejoicing’ i.e. in which they take pride (Is 43:6), having extended their voyages to the Persian Gulf, and even engaged in commerce with India since the 7th cent. B.C. The Egyptians used ‘vessels of papyrus’ for the navigation of the Nile (Is 18:2, cf. Job 40:6), but it is not quite certain whether they were built in different forms or size of ships during these periods, but it is probable that while at first they appear to have varied greatly, they gradually approximated to the type of vessel used in the Levant in NT times. It is no doubt a fact that at times these had been reduced. We find them, or more correctly the sail, in the one great sail mentioned in Ezk 27:2 in addition to the oars. In Is 33:24 the sail only is mentioned. In v. 27 the ship is mentioned, and in contrast to the ‘gallant ship’, which probably means the larger vessel provided with a sail.

3. In Literature.—That the Israelites, though, generally speaking, unused to navigation, had some acquaintance with and took an interest in shipping, is clear from the constant reference to ships in their literature. In 33:4, in which Israel is compared to a disabled vessel, has been already alluded to. Ezekiel’s famous comparison of Tyre to a ship in 27:1–24 gives a fair general idea of the different parts of a ship of that period, though some of them—the deck-planks of ivory, the sail of fine bordered linen, the coverings of blue and purple—were evidently idealized. The gradations of the shields and the thongs of the ships of Ps 106:7–9, respecting the fear of God by those ‘who go down to the sea in ships’ was almost certainly written by one who had experienced a storm at sea. In Ps 104:27 the ships are, as much as leviathan, the natural elements of the deep. Of special beauty is the simile of the ship that passes over the waves and leaves no pathway of its keel behind (Wis 5:19), to express the transitoriness of human life and human hope. The danger of ship-faring is pointed out in Wis 14:12. That people should commit their lives to a small piece of wood would be absurd but for Divine Providence.

2. In the NT.—We are concerned chiefly with our Lord’s Galilean ministry and St. Paul’s voyages. (1) On the Sea of Galilee.—The Galilean boats were used primarily for fishing, and also for communication between the villages on the Lake, and probably for local transport. At least four of our Lord’s disciples were fishermen, and were called while engaged in their work. He frequently crossed the Lake with His disciples, and sometimes preached a boat to the people on the shore (Lk 5, Mk 4). Among the most picturesque pictures of life as recorded in the Gospels are the miracle of stilling the tempest and the miraculous draughts of fishes. The boats were small enough to be in danger of sinking from a very large catch of fish, and yet large enough to contain our Lord and at least the majority of His twelve Apostles, and to weather the storms which are still frequent on the Lake. It appears from the frequent use of the definite article, ‘the boat,’ that on a particular boat, probably St. Peter’s, was usually employed.

(2) In the Levant.—Ships played an important part in St. Paul’s missionary journeys. It was frequently necessary for him to cross the Aegean, and sometimes to make longer voyages, and to move from Syria. He was so frequently exposed to great danger we learn not only from the detailed account of his shipwreck in Ac 27, but from an express statement in 2 Co 11:26, in which, writing before this event, he says among other things ‘that he had frequently exposed to great danger we learn not only from the detailed account of his shipwreck in Ac 27, but from an express statement in 2 Co 11:26, in which, writing before this event, he says among other things ‘that he had been for a time in the deep, which certainly means that he had drifted for this space of time upon the spars or some part of a wrecked ship. But our interest is centred chiefly in the account of his voyage from Cæsarea to Puteoli in Ac 27:28. From this we learn that the larger vessels were of a considerable size, that of the shipwreck containing, according to what is probably the correct text, 276 persons (277, according to v. 40). It was impelled only by sail. The only oars mentioned being the paddles used as rudders, which were braced up, probably in order to allow the ship to be more easily anchored at the stern (v. 29). This, a custom not infrequently recorded when some special purpose was served by it, was to enable them to thrust the vessel into a favourable place on shore without the necessity of turning her round. In addition to the mainsail, the vessel had a foresail (mizzen), which was lowered at the same time, as more easily adapted for altering the ship’s course (v. 39). The vessel had one small boat, which was usually towed behind, but was taken up for greater security during the storm (v. 38). Another remarkable practice is that described in v. 37 as ‘using helps, under-girding the ship.’ These ship’s or ‘under girders’ were chains passed under and across the ship, and tightened to prevent the boards from spreading. It is a practice of ancient times, and is not unknown even in modern navigation. Soundings were taken to test the near approach to land, much as they would be at the present day. Though ships had to depend mainly on one square sail, by bracing this they were enabled to sail within seven points of the wind. In this case, allowing another six points for leeway, the vessel under a north-easter (Eurôpto, v. 40) made way from Caeda to Malta, a direction contrary to wind and current, as, however, the vessel could not safely carry the mainsail, or even the yard-arm, these were first lowered on deck, and then the vessel must have been heaved to and been carried along and steadied by the small storm-sail. Had she drifted before the wind, she would inevitably have been driven on to the Syrtis, the very thing they wished to avoid (v. 37). This has been shown very clearly by Smith in his classical work, The Voyage of St. Paul, ch. iii. The same writer draws attention to the thoroughly nautical character of St. Luke’s language, and the evidence of its accuracy by a comparison with what is known of ancient naval practice; and what is perhaps even more striking, the evidence of skilful navigation to which the narrative points. He justly observes that the chief reason why sailing in the winter was dangerous (277 281) was not so much the storms, as the constant obscuring of the horizon, by which, before the discovery of the compass, mariners had chiefly to direct their course.

The fact that two of the ships in which St. Paul sailed were ships of Alexandria engaged in the wheat trade with Italy (276 278), St. Peter was the great emporium of wheat, is especially interesting, as we happen to know more about them than any other ancient class of ship. In the time of Commodus a series of coins with figures of Alexandrian corn-ships is struck to commemorate an exceptional importation of wheat from Alexandria at a time of scarcity. One of these ships, moreover, was driven into the Piræus by stress of weather. Yetian lays the scene of one of his Dialogues (The Ship or Wishes) on board of her. From the coins and the dialogue together we get a very good idea of the ships of that time (2nd cent. a.d.) and their

—See Shavsha.

SHISHAK (Egypt, Shoshenq or Sheshonk L.)—Founder of the 22nd Dyn. (c. B.C. 950). He reigned at least 21 years. Jeroboam fled to him (1 K 11:21), and he plundered Jerusalem in the fifth year of Rehoboam (142, 2 Ch 12). A long list of Palestinian towns of Israel, and of Judah, was engraved by Sheshonk on the south wall of the temple of Karnak, but Jerusalem has not been recognized among the surviving names in the list. Max Muller suggests that these towns may not have been conquered but that they merely paid tribute, hence the appearance of Israelish towns among them.

F. L. Griffith.

SHITRAH.—A Sharonite who was over king David's herds that fed in Sharon (1 Ch 27:3).

SHITTAH TREE (shittah, Is 41:19).—RV 'acacia tree'; 'shittim wood' (šāš-šittim), Ex 25:18, 25:26, 25:40, 27:4, Dt 10:13. 'Acacia wood' was originally 'shittah, and is equivalent to Arab. sund, which is the Acacia nilotica; but the word no doubt included other desert acacias. The sequlōr of the Arabs, which includes the gum-arabic tree (A. senegal), and A. tortilis, both furnish suitable wood. These two plants are plentiful around the Dead Sea, particularly at 'Ain Jidy.

E. W. G. Masterman.

SHITTIM.—1. The name of the last encampment of the Israelites, on the east of the Jordan opposite Jericho. There the Israelites began to intermarry with Moabites (Nu 25:1), and from there Joshua sent out the spies to Jericho (Jos 2:3). The name means 'acacias,' and the place is called in Nu 33:42 'Abiel-shittim, or 'Meadow of acacias.' Josephus (Ant. rv. vii. 1, v. 1) identifies the place with Abila, which he says is 74 Roman miles east of the Jordan, and which Jerome says was 6 miles east of it. Several modern scholars identify Abila with Khirbet Keferen at the entrance of the Wady Keferen, at the base of the mountains of Moab.

2. Joel's reference to the 'Valley of Shittim' (31) must refer to some valley leading from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea (cf. Ezk 47:8)—perhaps the 'Valley of the brook Kidron,' the modern 'Wady es-Nabir. It is certainly not the same as No. 1, although confused with it by the Chaldee (Jer xe. 297 1). The reference to Shittim in Mic 6—'from Shittim to Gilgal'—is geographically unintelligible, and is rightly thought by many scholars to be a gloss.

George A. Barton.

SHIHA.—Father of a Reubenite chief (1 Ch 11:4).

SHOAH.—A race named in Ezk 23:8 along with Babylonians, Chaldeans, Pekod, Koa, and Assyrians. The Suth were nomads, frequently marauding in company by Assyrian and Babylonian writers, and among other cities inhabited the E. of the Tigris. C. H. W. Johns.

SHOBAB.—1. One of David's sons (2 S 5:14, 1 Ch 3:14).

2. A Calebite (1 Ch 2:9).

SHOBACH.—The captain of the host of Hadarezer, the Amaran king of Zobah (wh. sec), who commanded the forces of that king when he aided the Ammonites in their war with king David. David defeated him, and Shobach lost his life (2 S 10:14). In 1 Ch 19:16 the name is spelled Shopbach.

Perhaps because so little is known of Shobach, he played an important part in later imaginative tradition. The Mishna (Sotah, viii. 1) makes him a giant of the Ammonites equal to Goliath, while the Samaritan Chronicle, sometimes called 'the book of Joshua,' tells a long tale concerning him (chs. 20-22), making him the son of Haman, a king of Persia whom Joshua had killed, and who stirred up a great coalition to avenge the death of his father! All authentic information concerning Shobach is contained in 2 S 10:14, which 1 Ch 19:16 repeats.

George A. Barton.

SHOBAL.—A family of porters (Ezr 2:24, Neh 7:1 [Es 3: Sabi]).

SHOBAT.—1. 'A son of Seir the Horite, and one of the 'dukes' of the Horites (Gn 36:21, = 1 Ch 1:49).

2. A Calebite family in the tribe of Judah. This Shobal is called in 1 Ch 4:12 'a son of Judah, and in 20:24' son of Caleb and 'father of Kiriath-jearim.' The name is probably to be connected, if not identified, with No. 1.

SHOEB.—A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10:59).

SHOBI.—According to 2 S 17:17, a son of Nahash the king of Ammon, who, with Meekah of Le-debar, showed kindness to David when he fled to Mahanaim at the time of Absalom's rebellion. There is some doubt about the name, however, as in 1 Ch 19:14, the son of Nahash who succeeded him was Hanun. S. A. Cook (AJSVL xvi. 164) suggests that the text of 2 S 17:9 is corrupt, and that it originally read 'and Nahash came,' instead of 'Shobi, son of Nahash.' The very existence of Shobi seems, therefore, uncertain. If, however, the present text of Samuel is sound, it is a better historical authority than Chronicles.

George A. Barton.

SHOCH, STACK.—In Jg 15:18 the former, and in Ex 22:24 the latter, is in AV the rendering of the same word—RV uniformly 'shocks,'—which in both places is opposed to the 'standing corn' or 'standing grain' (so Amer. RV for 'corn' throughout). The term, at the former, at least, is misleading, since the Hebrews did not cut up their sheaves in shocks (Scotice 'stooks'), but piled them in heaps for conveyance to the threshing-floor (Agriculture, § 3). So in the beautiful figure, Job 28, render 'like as a heap of corn cometh up to (the threshing-floor) in its season.'

A. R. S. Kennedy.

SHOE.—See Dress, § 6, where also reference is made to the custom, widely prevalent in antiquity, of removing the shoes before entering a temple, or other sacred precinct, in order to save the latter from ceremonial defilement. (For the original motive see RSB 453.)

The shoe played a part, further, in certain symbolical actions in Hebrew law. Thus in Nu 4:4 we are informed that it was an ancient custom in Israel, on completing a purchase, for the seller to draw off his shoe and hand it to the buyer, as a symbol of the transference of the property sold. A parallel symbolism is disclosed by the frequent occurrence, in early Babylonian deeds of sale, with the phrase, 'the paste [of the mortar] has been transferred' (Meissner, Aus dem altbab. Recht, 6). In times when writing was the accomplishment of the few, such a symbolical act in the presence of witnesses was doubtless held equivalent to the later formal deeds (Jer 32:10).
SHOHAM

The same passage of Ruth and Dr 25st shows that this symbolism, somewhat differently performed, with another still more expressive, was also adopted in the case of one renouncing his right to his deceased brother's wife (see MARRIAGE, § 4).

In the expression 'upon [or over] Edom will I cast my shoe' (Ps 60:108) many authorities find a reference to an extension of this shoe symbolism, the actual taking possession of the property being symbolized by throwing a shoe over or upon it. Others, however, rendering as RV 'unto Edom,' see in the words an assertion of Edom's servitude, it being the part of a slave to carry his master's shoes. The context and the singular 'shoe' (not 'shoes') favour the former interpretation.

SHOHAM.—A Merarite (1 Ch 24:17).

SHOMER.—1. 1 Ch 72. See SHEREM, No. 3. 2. 2 K 121. See SHIMEATH.

Siciphach.—See Shophach.

SHOSHANNIM, SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH.—See PSALMS, p. 772.

SHOVEL.—1. Ex 25:39, Nu 4:2, 1 K 7:4, 2, 2 K 25:4, 2 Ch 26:1, 1 Esr 3:8, 1 S 25:20. A vessel of a utensil for removing the ashes from the altar. 2. 1 Sam 21:20, for the broad, shallow, winnowing shovel with which corn after threshing was thrown upon against the wind to clear it of the chaff.

SHRINE.—See DIANA.

SHROUD.—This word is used in Ezek 31:1 in the general sense of 'shelter,' 'covering,' as in Milton's Comus, 147: 'Run to your shrouds, within these brakes and trees.'

SHUA.—1. The father of Judah's Canaanite wife (Ge 38:12), who appears in 1 Ch 2, 2 (RV) as Bath-shua. 2. A daughter of Heber (1 Ch 7:6).

SHUAH.—A son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25:4, 1 Ch 1:36. The tribe represented by this name may perhaps be the Succ of the cutieform inscriptions, on the right bank of the Euphrates. Bilbad the Shubite (Job 24:3, 15:21, 23:49) is prob. intended to be thought of as belonging to this tribe.

SHUAL.—An Asirite (1 Ch 7:7).

SHUAL, LAND OF.—A region referred to in 1 S 13:17 as the destination of one of the three bands of Philistine raiders. The close connexion of Ophrah with the district named indicates that this was one of its towns.

SHUBAEL.—See Shubel.

SHUHAR.—A brother of Chelub (1 Ch 4:8).

SHUHAM.—A son of Dan (Nu 26:3), called in Gn 46:25 Husban; gentile Shubamites in Nu 26:1.

SHUHITE.—See Shuch.

SHULAMMITE.—See Shunem, Song of Songs.

SHUMATHITES.—A family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2:8).

SHUNANMITE.—See next article.

SHU'EN.—A border town of Issachar (Jos 19:17), and the camping-ground of the Philistines before Saul's last battle (1 S 28). It has been identified from early times with a village five miles south of Tabor, on the south slope of Litttle Hermon. It is on the north of the Valley of Jezreel, and opposite to Gilboa, where Saul was encamped; the situation suits the scene of the battle well. A Shunem is also the scene of Elisa's miracle in 2 K 4:43, where the identification is more doubtful. The narrative suggests a place on the road from Samaria, his home (v. 3), to Carmel, and not too far from the latter (v. 23); Solomon satisfies neither of these conditions. Shunammite is applied (1) to Abshag (1 K 19), who is perhaps the original of the Shulamite of Ch 6:1, the interchange of L and n being exemplified in the modern Samalin-Shunem; (2) to the unnamed friend of Elisa in 2 K 4:41-44. The narrative gives us a picture of Heb. home-life at its best, and shows how the legal and theological subjection of the wife was often modified in practice. She is 'a great woman,' perhaps the wives, and takes the lead in both the morning and the evening by the time of the latter she may have been a widow. For the miracle, 1 K 17:17.

SHUNI.—A son of Gad (Ge 46:16, Nu 26:16) [gentile Shumites].

SHUPHAM, SHUPHAMITES, SHUPPIN. — See MUPPM and SHUPPHLM.

SHUR.—A place or district on the N.E. border of Egypt ( Gn 16:20 25:4. Ex 15:20, 1 S 15:27). The name in Aramaic means 'wall,' and, as Egypt, is regularly rendered by sh in Aramaic. Shur is probably the Egypt, city Thor (the vocalization is uncertain), a fortress near the N.E. frontier, and capital of the 14th nome of Lower Egypt. This Thor lay on a stream or canal named Shi-Hor (see Shun'na), and malefactors sent thither after having been banished by their king, is tempting to identify it with Rhinocorus (see EYETO [RIVER OF]), but it was on the banks of a fresh-water canal and 10 days' march from Gaza. Perhaps it is the later Sele, near el-Rantars, on the Suez Canal.

SHUSHAN.—See Shushan.

SHUSHAN(Dn 8, Neh 11 etc.).—The Susa (Ad. Est 11). The Sussa) of the Greek, now Sus or Shush in S.W. Persia, between the Shapour and the river of Dizful (the ancient Euphrates). It was for many centuries the capital of Elam, and afterwards one of the three capitals of the Persian empire. Cf. also Elam.

SHUSHANCHITKES, i.e. inhabitants of Shushan (susa), are mentioned in Ezr 4 among the colonists settled by Osmappar (Asurbanipal) in Samaria.

SHUSHAN-EDUTH.—See PSALMS, p. 772.

SHUTIELEAH.—One of the three clans of the tribe of Ephraim (Nu 26:9. [gentile Shuteelahites] 9). In the parallel passage, 1 Ch 7:8, 9, the foundation text has been expanded and mis-written. J. F. McGoun.

SHUTURE.—Only Job 7, where it is doubtful whether the reference is to the shuttle-rod of the loom or to the loom itself. The Heb. word has the latter meaning in its only other occurrence, Jg 161. See SPINNING AND WEAVING, §§ 3 and 4 (b).

SLA (Neh 7:8) or Ezra 2:24. A family of Nethinim (1 Es 5:13 Sua) who returned with Zerubbabel.

SIBECAL. — See MBECAL.

SIBBOLETH.—See SHIBBOLETH.

SIBMAH.—See SABRAM.

SIBRAIM.—See SERAM.

SICRAIRN.—A point on the ideal northern boundary of the Holy Land (Ezk 47:9); site uncertain. Cf. Ziphron.

SICOTH. — A word which is found in parallelism with Chinn in Am 5. The present form is probably due to the Mesoretic combination of the consonants of Sacrath with the vowels of shkoth ('abomination')—the same vocalization which we find in Chinn. Sacrah is another name for the Assy. god Ninib, god of the panoply turn again, the malefactors. It is also a name of Ninib. This would make Chinn and Sicoth synonymous—or at least different manifestations of the same deity. As evidence that this is the correct reading of the names, Rogers points out that the Babylonians themselves invoked Sacrah and Kutabstract together, just as they appear in Amos. (See CHINN and REPHAH.)

W. M. NEBERT.

SICK, SICKNESS. — See MUCIN.

SICKLE.—The Hebrew sickles (Dt 16:29 28:26 etc.) or reaping-hooks were successively of flint, bronze, and iron, and set in handles of bone or wood. In Palestine the flint stike goes back to the later Stone age (Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 388 ff. with illust.).
a specimen was found by Bles at Lachish. Similar flint sickles, with bone hafts, have been found in Egypt. The ancient sickles were of two kinds, according as the cutting edge was plain or toothed; the modern Palestinian reapling-hook is of the latter kind and somewhat elaborately curved (illus. Benzerger, Heb. Arch. 14). In Jer 50:3 the reaper is described as holding the sicle (מַגָּדָל, AVm 'sceptre, which also erroneously gives an alternative in AVm of Is 2, Mic 4 for 'pruning hooks'). The same word is rendered 'sickle' in 3 Jn 3 but ye in the sickle, for the vintage is ripe' (RVM), where the context, the LXX rendering, and the same figure in Rev 14th. 26 all show that the reference is to the smaller but similarly shaped grape-knife, expressly named מַגַּדָּל in the Mishna, with which the grape-gatherer cut off the bunches of grape.

SICYON.—This was one of the numerous places written to by the Romans on behalf of the Jews in B.C. 139 (1 Mac 15th). It was situated on the Gulf of Corinth, about 18 miles W. of Corinth. It was distinguished in plastic art, and was in early times very important and wealthy, but sank to insignificance early in the Christian era.

A. SCUTTER.

SIDDIM, VALE OF.—The scene of the defeat of the five Cushan kings by Amraphel and his three allies (Gen 14), where the latter are described as 'king of Sodom' or 'king of Sodom and Gomorrah,' and the wells, i.e. holes in the ground from which there issued petroleum, which, when exposed to the air, hardened into solid bitumen. In the route of the five kings by the four, these holes proved disastrous to the foragers of the former, hampering their efforts to escape (Gen 14th). The battlefield is doubtless thought of as being in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, where there are still abundant, if not too obvious, traces of it, which have been detached from the bottom, being often found floating on the surface after shocks of earthquake; and the Vale of Siddim is expressly identified in Gen 14th with the Dead Sea by the explanatory insertion, 'the same is the Salt Sea.' If by this is meant that the vale was co-extensive with the Dead Sea, the statement must be erroneous, for the greater part of the Dead Sea (the N half of which has in places a depth of 1300 feet) is the remains of an inland sea which existed long before the appearance of man on the earth,' and consequently long before the age of Abraham. But it is possible that the Vale of Siddim is intended to be identified with only a portion of the Dead Sea; and those who consider Sodom and the other two 'cities of the plain' to have been situated at the S. end of the Dead Sea (where the morass of es-Sabka now is) have taken the site of Siddim to be the southern portion of the Sea itself, which is very low, and may once have been dry ground that has been covered by water through subsidence (cf. art. 'Siddim' in Hasting's DB). By other observers, however, the shallows at the southern extremity of the lake are thought to be the result of elevation rather than of subsidence; and if Sodom and the other four cities associated with it were situated at its N. end, a barren plain, in its N.W. corner, may have been the scene of the engagement recorded in Gen 14. SIDE, a Greek colony, was situated on the coast of Pamphylia, on a low promontory about 10 miles E. of the river Eurymedon. It had two harbours and was well fortified. The remains are extensive and interesting (Eski Side). It was one of the cities addressed on behalf of the Jews by the Romans in B.C. 139 (1 Mac 15th).

SIGN.—Any outward fact which serves as a pledge of a Divine word or a proof of a Divine deed is a sign, whether it be natural or supernatural in its character. The rainbow served as the signs of the Noahic, as the rite of circumcision of the Abrahamic, covenant (Gen 17th 11th). The sign of God with Moses was, that Israelites was shown in the plagues of Egypt (Ex 10th). Gideon asks for and receives a sign that it is Jehovah who speaks with him (Jud 6th), and Saul also receives signs to confirm the dissuasion of Samuel (1 Sam 10th). This prophetic word is thus proved from God (Jud 4th 8th, Jer 44th, Ezek 14th). The sign need not be supernatural (Is 2 3th, Is 20th; but the Jews in the time of Christ desired miracles as proofs of Divine power (Mt 12th 16th, Jn 4th 1, Co 12th), a request which Jesus refused and condemned. The message of the Baptist, though not confirmed by any sign, was seen to be true (Jn 10th). It is Jonah's preaching that is probably referred to when Jesus speaks of him as a sign to his generation (Mt 12th). The 'babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger,' is the simple and humble sign to the shepherds of the birth of a Saviour, Christ the Lord (Lk 21st), and He is welcomed by Simeon as 'a sign which is spoken against' (Lk 2). The Fourth Gospel frequently describes the miracles of Jesus as signs (Mt 14th 4th, and attributes to them an evidential value which is not prominent in Jesus' own Intention. The confirmation of the gospel word was foretold by the Apostolic Church (Mt 16th, Ac 11th 6th 11th 13th, 2 Co 12th). The last things will be ushered in by extraordinary signs (Mt 24th, Lk 21st, 2 Th 2). The working of miracles with all power and signs and lying wonders, Rev 19th 20th etc.). The faith that depends on signs, if not altogether condemned (Jn 6th), is by Jesus deprecated (4th, cf. 1 Co 12th). Cf. also p. 568th.

SIGNET.—See Seal.

SIHON.—A king of the Amorites at the time of the conquest of Canaan. His dominion lay beyond the Jordan, between Jabok on the N. and Arnon on the S., extending eastward to the desert (Jdg 11th). He refused to allow Israel to pass through his land, and was defeated at Jahaz (Nu 21st 25th, Dt 29th 30th, Jdg 11th 22th). Heshbon, his capital, was taken; and his land, along with that of Og king of Bashan, became the possession of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. Frequent reference is made to his defeat (Nu 31st 25th, Dt 25th 28th, Is 12th 13th 14th, Ez 17th, 1 K 8th 11th, Neh 9th, Ps 135th 136th). Sihon in Jer 48th stands for Heshbon, the city of Sihon.

SILAS (Acts) and SILVANUS (Epistles).—There can be little doubt that the Silvanus of the Pauline Epistles (2 Co 1st 1, Th 1st, 2 Th 1) is the same as the Silas of Acts.

Probably Silas is an abbreviation, like Lucas (Luke), Barnabas, Amphiph, Ephesus, and many such familiar names (cf. esp. Priscilla in Acts—Priscus Ro 16th RV, Popater Ac 20th—Propater Ro 16th). We might indeed have expected 'Silas' and 'Silvanus' to have been used for the same man, but the abbreviations are very irregular. It has been suggested that Silas was the real name, and of Semitic origin, while Silvanus was adopted for a Roman name as being similar in sound; but then we should have expected for the latter 'Silanus,' not Silvanus.

Silas was a Christian prophet (Ac 15th), one of the chief men among the brethren (therefore doubtful of Jewish birth), who with 'Judas called Barsabas' was sent as a delegate from the Apostolic Council with Paul and Barnabas, to convey the decision of the Council (15th). He was also probably a Roman citizen, though this inference is denied by some. It is uncertain if he returned from Antioch to Jerusalem (15th is of doubtful authenticity), but in any case he was soon after chosen by Paul to go with him on the second journey, taking Barnabas' place, while Timothy afterwards took John Mark's. For this work Silas' double qualification as a leading Jewish Christian and a Roman citizen would eminently fit him. He accompanied Paul through S. Galatia to Troas, Philippæ (where he was imprisoned), Thessalonica, and Berea. When Paul went to Athens, Silas and Timothy were left behind, perhaps to bring the latest news from Thessalonica (in case it was possible for the Apostle to return thither), with injunctions to follow at once; and this they probably did. But they seem to have been sent back once on a mission to Macedonia (1 Th 3:20; Paul was 'left behind at Athens alone'), Timothy to Thessalonica, Silas and Timothy, Silas and Timothy; they were together, and are associated with him in the letters, probably written thence, to the Thessalonians. Here Silas disappears from the Pauline history. But there is no reason for suspecting a direction like that in Mark; the cordial reference to his former preaching in 2 Co 11:2 (written on the Third Journey) contradicts this. We afterwards find him attending on St. Peter, acting as bearer and the like. As Fr. Epile (1 Peter 4:9), for there is no reason to suppose that the Petrine Mark and Silvanus were other than those connected with St. Paul. Whether this attendance was before or after the date of 1 Peter is not clear. For a full Excursus in Dr. Bigg's edition of that Epistle. (A. J. MACLEAN.)

SILVA.—See DRESS, 1.

SILVA.—The servants of king Josiah smote him 'at the house of Millo (read rather 'at Beth-Millo') on the way that went down to Silla' (2 K 21:19). Where or what that may have been is nothing to show. The LXX reads Gaol or Ga livelihood.

SILVA.—To.

SILVA.—(waters of Shiloah), Is 8:3; 'pool of Siloah' (RV Shelah), Neh 3:16; 'tower in Siloam.' Lk 13:3; 'pool of Siloam,' Jn 9:7; probably identical with the 'king's pool' of Neh 2:6. 'The name survives to-day in Siloam, the name of the valley which occupies the steep E. slopes of the valley of the Kidron from opposite the 'Virgin's Fount' (Gihon) to near Bir Eyny (En-rogel). The village, occasionally mentioned in the apocryphal literature, is built on ancient sites, and the whole area is riddled with cave dwellings, cisterns, rock-cut steps, and ancient tombs. Some of the caves have apparently served the purposes successively of tombs and chapels, while to-day they are dwellings or store-houses. It may be considered as certain that in NT times, and probably for some centuries earlier, there was a considerable village in this situation. The 'tower' which fell (Lk 13:39) may have been a building similar to many to-day perched on the edge of the precipitous rocks above the Kidron. Immediately across the Jordan, the name of the S. of Siloam, the name of the Kidron, is the Virgin's Fount (see Gihon), the original spring of Jerusalem. In early times the water of this spring, after often filling a pool here, ran down the valley, at a later period the surplus was drained away by an aqueduct built along the N. side of the valley (partially excavated near its W. end), to a spot where is situated to-day a dry pool known as Birket Hamra. Remains of this aqueduct have been traced. As the water supply was, under this arrangement, vulnerable to attack, king Hezekiah 'stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32:30; cf. 32:16). The work thus described is the famous Siloam tunnel, 1700 feet long. This runs in an extraordinarily serpentine course from the Virgin's Fount, and opens in the Tyropeon Valley under the name 'Ain Silwān, the clay Spring of Siloam,' to pool its waters into the pool known as Birket es-Silwān, the 'Pool of Siloam.' These may have been 'the waters of Shiloah that go softly,' a great contrast to the mighty Euphrates (Is 19:18). Of the lower opening of the tunnel was found, in 1880, a Heb. inscription giving an account of the completion of the work. Although undated, there is every reason to believe that this is a contemporary account of Hezekiah's work, and if so, it is the oldest Heb. inscription known. The original Pool of Siloam, of which the present Birket occupies but a part, was excavated by Dr. F. Bliss, and was shown to have been a rock-cut reservoir 97 feet N. to S. by 75 feet E. to W., and just outside its N. edge was found a schoolmarked Paul at Corinth, and probably those mentioned in Neh 3:17. A covered arcade, 12 feet wide, had been built, probably about NT times, round the four sides of the pool, and a division ran across the centre to separate the sexes when bathing. Such was probably the condition of the pool at the time of the events of Jn 9:7. The surplus water of the pool leaves by a sluice at its S. end, and traverses a rock-cut channel to reach the gardens of the Siloam villagers. S. of the Birket es-Silwān is a walled-in area which in recent times was a kind of cesspool for the city, the sewage coming down the Tyropeon Valley (now diverted to-day) to a central purifier now being there kept by a great dam across the valley. On this dam, at one period, ran the city wall, and Dr. Bliss proved by excavations that it was supported by buttresses of great strength. This area is the so-called 'lower Pool of Siloam' or Birket el-Hamra, and may have been used at one time to store surplus waters from the upper pool. Probably it was the reservoir (RV) or 'ditch' (AV) between the two walls, for the water of the old pool (1 Es 224), that is, the reservoir to which the water from the 'old pool' at Gihon was conducted by the earlier aqueduct referred to above, while the dam itself is with some probability considered to be the 'wall of the pool of Siloam by the king's garden' (Neh 3:19). The name of the A'in Silwān is naturally, like that of its source (Gihon), brackish and impregnated with sewage; it also runs intermittently.

SIMÉON (Lk 3:2, Ac 13:15), Simeon (Lk 2:25).—1. The second son of Jacob (Gen 33:1). By Rhes, together with Levi, is closely related to Dinah, she being a full sister (cf. 34). From Gn 30:10 (E) we learn that he had five full brothers, but we are not told how many other sisters or half-sisters had. J (Gn 37) speaks of 'all Jacob's daughters,' but their names are nowhere recorded (cf. 46 FJ). J, who is specially inclined to etymologizing (see RVm of Gn 34:4=♀55 11 12). (etc.), connects the name, as in the case of Reuben, Jacob's 'hated' of Leah; 'Because Jehovah heard (skimma) that I am hated, etc., and she called his name Shim'on (294). The meaning of the name is unknown, but it has been connected by many scholars with the Arabic 'aim', the hybrid offspring of the hyme and the female wolf. This word 'aim' appears as a tribal name among the Arabs, and it is well known that the tribal names are those of animals; Leah and Rhes, probably belong to this class. In such cases the names probably point to the totem worship of the ancestors. If the name appears, as is supposed by some scholars, in the inscriptions of Edessa, it may be of importance in connection with the history of the tribe, but no light is derived from the form as to its meaning.

In the Blessing of Jacob (Gen 49) Simeon is coupled with Levi (wh. see) as bearing in the eyes of Jacob and in the consequent dispersal of the tribe among the other tribes of Israel. This is an indication that at the time the 'Blessing' was composed, the tribe was practically disposed. Ps 83 gives a fuller account of the tribes assembles 90,000 fighting men to Simeon at Baal (Nu 13). At Moab there were only 22,200 (26)—another indication of the future fortune of the tribe. Jg 11-17 makes Simeon join with Judah, at the latter's request, in making the first attack upon the Canaanites, over whom they won a decisive victory at Bezek. Judah in return was to aid Simeon in gaining his possession. Together they attacked and defeated the inhabitants of Zephath-haran. Haran was connected with Arah (Nu 34) about 17 miles to the S.E. of Hebron. Horan in JOS 15:5 is assigned to the tribe of Judah, but re-appears in 19° as a city of Simeon. We are not told in Judges of the subsequent settlement of Simeon, but it is implied in the Dinah story (Gen 34) that bad habits and Levi secured a temporary foothold about Shechem. On account of their treachery, however, they were dispossessed and well-nigh annihilated by the revenge taken upon them by the Canaanites. Levi was permitted to recover sufficiently to establish itself on the southern border of Judah. There, however, they came into contact with nomad tribes of Edomites and Arabs—a circumstance which doubtless contributed to their failure to rehabilitate themselves and win a permanent abode among the original occupants of the land. They are not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), but this may be accounted for by their position. Judah also had no part in that important struggle, and is passed over in silence. In historical times nothing is heard of them, and the conclusion is justified that their descendants merged with the neighboring tribes, and were later, with them, absorbed by Judah, as Reuben was afterwards by Gad. This conclusion is supported by the fact that the cities which are assigned to Simon in the list given in 1 Macc 13, are cities of Judah (cf. JOS 15:5-32). 7. K 19, Neb 113-19, 1 S 27° 30'. In connection with David's ventures to win over the Edomites and other tribes to the south, the name of Simeon does not appear, as might have been expected if the tribe had preserved its solidarity. According to 1 Ch 4:15 (i.e. Simeonites advanced against Gedor and Mt. Seir, in the time of Hezekiah apparently, and there secured permanent possessions. Instead of Gedor, the L. renders Gerar, the name of the Philistine city of Abimelech. It must be admitted that our sources are too uncertain and too indefinite to enable us to speak decisively on almost any point of interest in connection with this tribe. On the other hand, too much credence is given to statements of late writers, as though they furnished indubitable evidence; on the other hand, far-reaching conclusions are often drawn from fragmentary and isolated expressions, both Biblical and extra-canonical, which are little warranted. See also Tribes of Israel.

2. The great-grandfather of Judas Macabaeus (1 Macc 2:43). 3. The righteous and devout ('dikaios kat' eudobe) who took the infant Jesus in his arms and blessed Him, on the occasion of the presentation in the Temple (Lk 2:25). The notion that this Simeon is to be identified with a Rabbi who was the son of Hillel and the father of Gamaliel is very precarious. JAMES A. CRAIG.

SIMON (a Greek form of Simeon).—1. Simon Chosan, who was found to have a 'strange woman' 1 (Es 9:2 = Ex 15:10 Simeon). 2. The subject of the eumonum in Sir 50:1, "son of Onias, the great (or high) priest." It is doubtful if Simon I. or Simon II. (both 3rd cent. B.C.) is meant. 3. The Macabbean high priest and ethnarch, son of Mattathias, slain by his son-in-law Ptolemy, B.C. 155 (1 Mac 16:9), see Macabbea, 4. A Benjamite, guardian of the Temple in the time of Onias III., who suggested to Apollonius, the governor, to plunder it (2 Mac 3). 5. See PETER. 6. See Simon Magus. 7. Simon the Cananaean, one of the Twelve (Mt 10, Mk 9:14). The surname is an Aramaic equivalent of 'Zealot' (Lk 6:1, Ac 1:13). 8. See BRETHREN OF THE LORD. 9. Simon the Leper, our Lord's host at Bethany (Mt 26, Mk 14:8; cf. Jn 12:2), possibly husband or father of Martha, doubtless cured of his leprosy at some time before the anointing by Mary (cf. Mary, 2). 10. The Pharisee who was our Lord's host when the sinful woman anointed Him (Lk 7:46). The contradictions between these two stories are so great that it is difficult to suppose that they relate the same event in different versions. Two such incidents may well have happened, and one may have suggested the other (cf. Mary, 3). 11. Father, or brother, of Judas Iscariot, himself surnamed Iscariot (Jn 6:13, 'Judas of Simon Iscariot,' 13 'Judas Iscariot of Simon'). 12. The Cyrenian who bore our Lord's cross (Mt 27:35, Mk 15:21); see ALEXANDER and THURUS. The followers of Bazilides in the 2nd cent. said that Simon was crucified instead of Jesus. 13. The tanner, Peter's host at Joppa (Ac 9:40).

SIMON MAGUS.—Mentioned in Ac 8:24, and described as using sorcery in Samaria and thereby amusing the people. He was the great-grandfather of the Apostle Peter, and was regarded by all as 'that power of God which is called Great.' When Philip reached Samaria, and, preaching the gospel, gathered many into the Church, Simon also fell under the influence of his message. We are told that he 'believed,' which cannot mean less than that he recognized that the Evangelist exerted, in the name of Jesus Christ, powers of the reality of which he could not deny, and the efficacy of which he admired. He therefore sought baptism, and, being baptized, continued with Philip. The Apostles Peter and John came down to Samaria to establish the work begun by Philip, and by the laying on of their hands the Holy Ghost to the converts. This was no doubt evidenced by the miraculous gifts which were vouchsafed by God to His Church during its early years. The unholiness of Simon's bestowal of the Holy Ghost was now fairly offered to by the Apostles the power of conferring the Holy Ghost. Peter rebuked him in language of such sternness as to lead him to beg of the Apostle to pray that the judgment of God might not fall upon him for his sin. Simon holds the unassailable position of being the one outstanding heretic in the NT: and from then until now his character has been held in particular odium. Ignatius, the earliest of the Fathers, calls him 'the first-born of Satan': Irenaeus marks him out as the first of all heretics: and later centuries have shown their sense of the greatness of his sin by using the word simony to indicate the crime of purchasing a spiritual office by the purchase. Justin Martyr mentions three times in his Apology, and once in his Dialogue, a Simon as a leader of an heretical sect. He states that Gitta, a village in Samaria, was his birthplace, that he went to Rome, and being so successful in his magical impostures as to have secured worship for himself as God, and to have been honoured with a statue, which the inscription Simonis Dexo Sancro ('to Simon the Holy God'). He further mentions that 'almost all the Samaritans, and even a few of other nations,' worshipped him as 'first God' (cf. Ac 8:24 'this man is that power of God which is called Great'). He also adds that the Roman, a fallen woman who accompanied him, was 'the first idea generated by him.' Justus does not specifically identify this Simon with the Simon of the Acts, but there can be no reasonable doubt that he held them to be one and the same.

There was discovered in Rome in 1574 the base of a statue bearing the inscription 'Semoni Saneo Doxo fidio sacrum Sex. Pompeius . . . donum dedicat.' It is therefore generally assumed, and no doubt correctly, that it is dedicated by the Simonians at Rome this statue of the Sabine deity Semo Sanico, was led to believe erroneously that it had been erected in honour of Simon. But this error of his regarding what had occurred in Rome so well not invalidate his statements regarding Simon himself in Samaria and the progress and tenets of his sect, for he himself was a Samaritan and thus cognizant of the facts. Irenaeus deals more fully with Simon and his followers, though there is good reason for assuming that he is really indebted to a lost work of Justin for his information. He directly identifies him with the Simon of 6:18, sees him first in his list of heretics, and makes him the father of Gnosticism. From the account he gives of the doctrines of the Simonians, it is clear that by his time they had developed into a system of Gnosticism; but it is very doubtful whether he is right in making the Simon of the NT the first setter up of Gnostic myths. The beginning of Gnosticism is very obscure, but we may be fairly certain that it had not arisen as early as the scenes described in the Simonian doctrines as given by Irenaeus. For there doubtless developments of the heretical teaching of Simon, which, even from the short account in the Acts, would seem to be the extent and most characteristic of Simon's teaching, were added to the original Simonian teaching. When went on many fanciful additions were made to his history, until, towards the 4th cent. the legend reached its completeness. Throughout these romances Simon is found travelling about from place to place in constant opposition to Peter, uttering calumnies against the Apostle, but being pursued by Peter he is ultimately vanquished and despatched.

The earlier forms of the story lay the scene of the travels chiefly in Asia Minor, and describe the final conflict as taking place at Antioch. The later forms, however, make Rome, in the days of Nero, the ultimate goal of the journeys. Here Simon is said to have met his death through his conflict with Peter or with Peter and Paul. By one tradition the magician, seeing his influence waning, desired his followers to bury him in a grave promising to rise again the third day. They obeyed, and he persisted, for, as Hippolytus adds, 'he was not the Christ.' By another tradition Simon is depicted as appearing to the Emperor Nero as a crowning proof of the magical powers by attempting to fly off to God. He is reported to have flown for a certain distance over Rome, but, having no power to have fallen and broken, and to have been ultimately stoned to death by the populace. Another form of the tradition represented Paul as a companion of Peter in the contest, and as praying while Peter adjured the demons that supported Simon in his flight, in the name of God and of Jesus Christ, to uphold him no longer. Simon thereupon fell to the earth and perished.

Renewed interest in the history of Simon was aroused in modern times by Baur's maintaining that in the Clementine literature, the Simon of its individual form of the legend occurs, Simon is intended to represent not the actual Simon of the Acts, but rather Paul, whom he (Baur) conceived he had been fiercely opposed politically to Peter. Full information on this theory may be found in Hastings' DB 1 Vol. 5231, where its unsoundness is shown. It may be said to be now generally rejected.

It should be added that Hippolytus ascribes a work entitled 'The Great Revelation' to Simon, and quotes largely from it; and that the sect of the Simonians did not long survive, for Origen states that he did not believe that there were more than sixty-three in existence.

CHARLES T. P. GRIETSON.

SIMPLICITY.—I. In the OT 'simple' is, with one exception, the translation of a word (dls, its root dls 'openness'); it is the rendering of haplotps as 'openness' when it implies willingness to receive instruction; it becomes Blameworthy when it connotes a disposition equally receptive of good and of evil, or an incapacity to distinguish between right and wrong. In Ps. 31:18 'the simple' are represented as needing 'prudence' (11 RvM), and they are exhorted to 'understand prudence' (8 RvM). In 14:15 'the prudent' are favourably contrasted with 'the simple' who 'believe every word,' and therefore 'inherit folly.' It is the 'testimony of the Lord' that makes the simple wise (Ps 19; cf. 11924). In 2 S 13:6 'simplicity' means 'integrity' (KJV). In the LXX the Heb. word (hphleo) for 'straightness' or 'uprightness' is translated by the NT equivalent of 'simplicity' (haplotp). 2. In the NT 'simple' (ekartenos =Lat. integer) is used to describe the character in which there is 'no foreign admixture': the RV retains 'simplicity' as the rendering of haplotps only in 2 Co 11:2, where it denotes those in whose hearts there are no 'folds' who are whole-hearted in their dis-positions (Tt, Att. Synonyms, §IV. 1). The Christian ideal is 'simplicity toward Christ' (2 Co 11:2). In the life of His loyal disciples dove-like simplicity is blended with the wisdom of the serpent (Mt 10:19). The word is used of the 'simple' (haplotps) body is 'full of light' (Mt 6:32). Christ Jesus being made unto them 'wisdom from God' (1 Co 15:20), they are no longer beguiled like Eve, but are 'wise unto that which is good, and simple unto that which is evil' (Ro 16:9).

J. G. TASKER.

SIN.—The teaching of the Bible with regard to the doctrine of sin may be said to involve a desire, on the part of the leaders of Jewish thought, to give a rational account of the fact, the consciousness, and the results of human error. Whatever be the conclusion arrived at respecting the compilation of the narrative of the Fall, one thought, at least, clearly emerges: the narratives are saturated through and through with religious conceptions. Omnipotence, sovereignty, condemning active love, and perfect moral harmony, all find their place, and even arise from preserved, as attributes of the Divine character. The sublime conception of human dignity and worth is such that, in spite of all temptation to the contrary belief, it remains to-day as a firmly rooted, universally received verity, that man is made 'in the image of God' (Gn 1:26). 1. THE OLD TESTAMENT.—1. The early narratives.—It is remarkable that in the story of the Fall the writer (J) attributes the sin to a positive act of conscious disobedience to God, and not only so, but he regards it as an entity standing over against 'good' (217). This is more clearly brought out in the same writer's account of the murder of Abel, which is described as 'couching at the door,' lying in wait for the overthrow of the sullen homicide (47). The profound psychological truth that the power of sin grows in the character of him who yields to its dictates is also noticed in this story. Falsehood and selfishness and defiance of God are heard in Cain's answer to the Divine voice. These stories are the beginning of the history of a long process of development which resulted in the Flood. Contrast and between right and wrong. In Ps. 31:18 'the simple' are represented as needing 'prudence' (11 RvM), and they are exhorted to 'understand prudence' (8 RvM). In 14:15 'the prudent' are favourably contrasted with 'the simple' who 'believe every word,' and therefore 'inherit folly.' It is the 'testimony of the Lord' that makes the simple wise (Ps 19; cf. 11924). In 2 S 13:6 'simplicity' means 'integrity' (KJV). In the LXX the Heb. word (hphleo) for 'straightness' or 'uprightness' is translated by the NT equivalent of 'simplicity' (haplotp). 2. In the NT 'simple' (ekartenos =Lat. integer) is used to describe the character in which there is 'no foreign admixture': the RV retains 'simplicity' as the rendering of haplotps only in 2 Co 11:2, where it denotes those in whose hearts there are no 'folds' who are whole-hearted in their dis-positions (Tt, Att. Synonyms, §IV. 1). The Christian ideal is 'simplicity toward Christ' (2 Co 11:2). In the life of His loyal disciples dove-like simplicity is blended with the wisdom of the serpent (Mt 10:19). The word is used of the 'simple' (haplotp) body is 'full of light' (Mt 6:32). Christ Jesus being made unto them 'wisdom from God' (1 Co 15:20), they are no longer beguiled like Eve, but are 'wise unto that which is good, and simple unto that which is evil' (Ro 16:9).
tion lay, not merely in his natural inability to be guilty of a breach of trust towards his master, but still more in his intense realization that to yield would be a 'great wickedness and sin against God' (Gen 39:9). Thus, while it is true to say that the dominant conception of sin in the OT is that it is the great disturbing element in the personal relations of God and man, it seems to have been realized very early that the chief scope for its exercise lay in the domain of human intercourse. The force of Abimelech's complaint against Abraham lay in the fact that the former was guiltless of wrongdoing the latter, whereas he was in serious danger of sinning against God in consequence of the patriarch's duplicity.

2. The Sinaitic Law.—The next great critical point in the evolution of human consciousness of sin is reached in the promulgation of the Law from Sinai. Here the determinative process of Divine election is seen in its widest and most elaborate working. The central purpose of the Law may be considered as of a twofold character. Not only are the restrictions tabulated in order to the erection of barriers against the commission of sin (God is to prove you, and that his fear may be before you, that ye sin not (Ex 20:18)), but positive enactments regulating the personal communion of God and Israel and provide frequently recurring opportunities of loving and joyful service (Ex 23:13). The law of sin as given in Ex 21-22 may be regarded as harsh in some of its enactments, but it may be easily conceived as an immense stride forward on the road to 'the royal law. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' Nor can it be said that restitution and mutual service between God and His people are left out of sight in those chapters of Exodus which are universally recognized as containing the oldest part of the Mosaic Code. These anthropopathic conceptions of God abound, and are seen in the idea of His jealousy being roused by idolatrous practices (Ex 20:3), in the promises made to Israel that, in return for services to Jehovah, He will save His people in the face of their enemies (Ex 20:7f.). Thus it will be easily understood that, as the Levitical and Priestly Codes were gradually elaborated into a somewhat intricate system of legal and ceremonial obligations, the nomenclature of sin in its various aspects was correspondingly enlarged. For example, in one verse three distinct words occur in connexion with Divine forgiveness ('forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin,' Ex 34:7), and though there is a certain vagueness in the precise meaning to be attached to each of these words, whether it be guilt or punishment, rebellion or sin-offering, wickedness considered as a condition, or trespass, which is in the writers' minds, the Levitical and Priestly Codes sought to regard the relations between God and His people. It must not be forgotten, moreover, that the ceremonial enactments provided a circle of ideas of permanent importance in the Hebrew conception of Jehovah's character. The law of clean and unclean animals and things paved the way for a greater and nobler thought of God's holiness, and of the uncleaness of sin as being its contradiction. The 'trespass' of Achan, involving as it did the whole of Israel in his guilt and punishment, did not consist so much in his stealing of the common spoil taken from the enemy, as in his appropriating what was 'holy,' or 'devoted' unto the service of God (Jos 7:21f.). The 'trespass' of the devoted things and property of the army dragged the whole people into a position of guilt, which could be expiated only by the death of the offender. In this way alone could they be shown to the Divine favour, and their army receive Divine succour.

3. Deuteronomy and the Historical Books.—In the Deuteronomic summary of the Law, whatever be the date at which it was edited, a loftier ground of obedience is established. Of God and His covenant love more explicitly dwelt on as the motive power of human life (Dt 6:9,10f. etc.), and the heart is again and again referred to as the seat of that love, both passively and actively (11:13f. 10:14f.). The basis upon which it is rested is the fact of God's love for them and their fathers evidenced in many vicissitudes and in spite of much to hinder its activity (4:31ff. 7:11f. 10:16f.). Though there are numbers of Deuteronomic complaints against Israel, the keeping of God's commandments is one side of a bargain which conditions men's happiness and prosperity (4:7f. 6:6f.), yet we observe a loppy range of thought bringing in its train true ideas of sin and guilt. The sternness of God is laid out there, as having for its objective the good of His people (10:6f. 6f.). It is a necessary phase of His love, compelling them to recognize that sin against God is destructive of the sinner. In Dt 7-11 Deuteronomic remonstrances against the dangers of the people being wicked as God hates it, and to love mercy and righteousness as and because God loves them (cf. Dt 10:14f. Lv 19f.), by establishing the closest relationship and communion between Him and His people (cf. Dt 14f. 20f. 27f. 28f. etc.).

One sin is specially insisted on by the Deuteronomist, namely, the sin of idolatry. No doubt this is largely due to the experience of the nation under the judges, and during the history of Israel subsequent to the great schism. The national disasters which recur so frequently during the former of these periods are always regarded as the consequence of the people, under the guidance of a great representative hero, is always marked by the blessings of peace and prosperity. So in the story of the Northern Kingdom the constant sin of the nation meets us in each succeeding reign: 'He cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam son of Nebat, which he made Israel to sin' (2 K 3:4 10:13f. etc.). During the vigorous and successful reign of Ahaz and Jezabel, the seeds of national decay were sown, and the historian neglects not to point out, in the former as in the latter, the lessons drawn for us in a great advance in national vigour and growth under these kings and their successors in the Southern Kingdom. The great rebellion against the Davidic dynasty in itself afforded the decline of Solomon in his old age from the pure Jehovah-worship so zealously and consistently advocated by his father. We must remember also that, side by side with the introduction of foreign religious ideas, vice peculiar to Oriental despoticism invaded the royal court and the nation of Israel. We are not, however, altogether limited to what is here intertextually taught as historical sin, with its former, its present, and its consequent reaction upon it. The David himself is represented as guilty of a sin which marred his character as an individual, and of an act of indiscretion which seems to have been regarded as a breach of that trust held by him as God's vicegerent on earth. Both these cases are of interest for the light which they throw on the doctrine of sin and its consequences. In the case of Bathsheba, which was purely personal transgression, the prophet Nathan comes not only as the bearer of a message of Divine pardon to the repentant sinner, but also as the stern judge pronouncing sentence of severe and protracted punishment. The death of the newly born child and the subsequent actions arising out of the affair of Abimelech are looked on as expressions of God's wrath and of retributive justice (2 S 12:1f.). Whatever the contemporary reasons may have been for regarding his act as sinful, and the basis on which he is considered it an act of wanton folly, we find the same features of repentance and forgiveness, and the same inclusion of others in the suffering consequent on its commission. The prophet God comes to the king as the revealer of God's love and of the proofs of that love in the sufferings of the king which were regarded as God's pardon (2 S 24:18). Into this narrative, however, another element is introduced, telling of the difficulty which was felt, even at this early stage of human history, as to the origin of sin. God is said by the early historian of David's reign to have been the author of the king's act, because 'His anger was kindled against Israel' (2 S 24). It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that at one stage of Hebrew thought God was looked on as, in some respects at least, the author of evil (cf. Ex 40 7, 15 14, Jg 9, 1 8 16 18 19). Nor ought we to be surprised at this, for the problem is one which was sure to present itself very early to the minds of thoughtful men; while the numerous instances where the commission of a sin seemed to have been made subservient by God to the exhibit ing of His power and love afforded presumptive prima facie evidence that He Himself willed the act as the minister of His glory (see the history of Joseph with the writer's comments thereon, Gn 49 590, Ps 105; cf. Job 1 2 5 3, Hos 2). It is interesting to note the advance made in speculative thought with regard to this still unsolved, and perhaps insoluble, problem, between the above-mentioned historian and that of the later Chronicler (1 Ch 211). Here the name of Satan or 'Adversary' is boldly inserted as the author of the sin, a fact which reminds us of the categorical denial of the Son of Sirach, 'He hath not commanded any man to be ungodly; and hath not given any man to go away from sin' (23 28). That the origin of sin continued to be debated and speculated upon down to a very late period is evidenced by the vehement warning of St. James against imputing to God the temptation to mortal sin (1 S 17, 13), and by the counter assertion that God is the Author of nothing but good (v.17). 4. The Prophets.—By far the most important stage in the history of the O.T. doctrine of sin is that which is marked by the teaching of the Prophets. The practically contemporary prophets of the 8th cent. are Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. The first named reveals a wide outlook on the world at large, and a remarkable problem in sin is presented that the sin and moral guilt of the fathers are imputed to the children; while Amos and Hosea, as well as Judah and Israel, all come under the displeasure of the prophet Amos. Each has a characteristic faults of these heathen peoples—lust and tyranny of the strong over the weak—had invaded Israel too. The love of money, with its attendant evils of injustice, and robbery of the poor by the wealthy, is inveighed against by both Amos and Hosea as deserving of the wrath of God (cf. Hos 12 2, Am 4 8 10). This decree of the people of the Northern Kingdom, 2 Kings 17 6 7, Jer 21 25, is the reign of Jehu. The change of the people is marked by the frequent mention of prophets and priests as among the other ruling classes, and to it, as the cause, is assigned the downfall which so speedily followed (Am 3 7 5, 6 17, 8, 9 etc., cf. Is 10 20 21, 24 12 etc.). The Lord's lament that Micah mourn over the same moral declension (Is 3 14, 5 11 12, Mic 1 6, 2 12 etc.), and it may be said that it is owing to the preaching of these four prophets that the centre of gravity, as it were, of sin is changed, and the principles of universal justice and love, as the fundamental attributes of Jehovah's character and rule, are established. It was the prophetic function to deepen the consciousness of sin by revealing a God of moral righteousness to a people whose peculiar relationship to Jehovah involved both immense privileges and grave responsibilities (Am 3 10, Hos 3 1 3, Mic 3 11, 6 14 etc.). Terrible, however, as were the denunciations, and emphatic as were the words of rebuke, Jehovah's answer to the violent rages of the adversaries, oppression, and lust, they were no less clear in their call to repentance, and in promises of restoration and pardon (Is 1 18, 25 7 14, Hos 6 1, Am 9 12 13). The story of Jonah of Gath-hepher is the revelation of a growing feeling that the righteous dominion of Jehovah was not, in the exercise of its moral influence, confined exclusively to Israel. The consciousness of sin and the power of repentance have now their place in the lives of nations outside the Abrahamic covenant. His to the prophetical teaching was largely confined to national sin and national repentance. It is not till the days of Jeremiah that the impotence, in this respect, of the individual begins to manifest itself. The lament of Jeremiah, it is true, frequently expresses itself in terms of national impiety (Jer 25 14 5 14 4, 23 24 etc.). But at the same time an individualistic thought enters largely into his teaching (cf. 17 22 24). On its darker side he notes how universally present sin is seen to be: 'from the least even unto the greatest, 'from the prophet even unto the priest' (Jer 23 1). It is impossible to find a man either just or truth-loving (2); and the explanation is not far to seek, for sin is a disease which affects the individual heart, and therefore poisons the whole life of each man (cf. 13 17 25 7 etc.). The nature of the disease he characterizes as desolate in the awful deceit which supervenes (17). A hopeless pessimism seems to times to have pervaded the prophet's teaching, and such of the people as were aroused by his appeals were smitten by a blank despair (10 9 21 18 13 etc.). As the prophet grows older, however, and gains a wider knowledge from his own bitter experiences, he discovers a hope in the unreflecting sinfulness of man. As the heart is the seat of evil, it is found that the creative act of God can provide a remedy (31 22 24). A new heart straight from the hand of God, beating with a new and holy impulse (Is 1 19), is the hope for men (32). Every individual, from the least to the greatest, in whom the Divine activity has been at work shall have the felicity of hearing the blessed sentence, 'I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more' (31). Following up and developing this tendency, Ezekiel is emphatic in his declaration of the moral independence of each man. Repudiating, as Jeremiah did, the theory that the sin and moral guilt of the fathers are imputed to the children, he elaborates clearly and emphatically the truth, which to us seems axiomatic, that the soul of the father is personally independent of the sin of the son, with the terrible but inevitable corollary, 'the soul that sinneth, it shall die' (Ezk 18 20, cf. vv. 19 20). The profound truth which lies at the basis of the ancient belief in the close interaction of individual and racial guilt is, of course, as old as time, and has been sanctified by the historical fact of the Incarnation. The life, work, and death of Christ have their value in the re-establishment of this truth, and in the re-creation, as it were, of the concurrent truth of the solidarity of the whole human race (cf. the expression 'we are all become as one that is unclean,' Is 64 4). 5. Psalms.—We turn now to the Psalms, and there find, as might be expected, the deepest consciousness of personal guilt on the part of the sinner. Of course, it is to be remembered that the Jewish Psalter is the product of different epochs in the national history, ranging probably from the day of prophetic religion to the age immediately succeeding the Captivity, if not much later. It may be said, indeed, that this volume of sacred poetry constitutes a kind of antiphonal response to the preaching of the Prophets. Confession and repentance for sin, both personal and national, constitute the prominent features of the authors' attitude. A deep love for God breathes through each poem, and a profound hope that at some future date Israel may once again be restored to the favour of Jehovah. The religious instinct of the compilers displays itself in their choice of those Psalms which form a preface or introduction to each of the Psalms. The first reader is the revelation of the entire volume, setting the music, so to speak, of each part. The First Book (Psa 1 41) opens with a Psalm which is a simple expression of the power of sin constituted danger to which men are exposed by dallying with it. It is thus well fitted to be the prelude to such outbursts as occur in
SIN

Ps 68:10-15, 17. 22-27, etc.: The Second Book (Ps 42-72) commences with a poem which is the language of a soul desperately longing for full communion with his God, and, in sin and suffering, to be cleansed by the mercy of the Lord. The sinners, triumphing in the hope that the loving-kindness of Jehovah will yet call forth praise and joy. It is in this section that we have the teaching of the Hebrew prophets touching the consciousness of personal and racial guilt; and at the same time a denunciation of the artificiality and inanition of the sacrifices. The Psalms of the penitential class (cf. Ps 143-150), in which the holiness of God is opposed to the folly and pride of sinners. The difficulty attaching to the problem of the relation between sin and suffering, so dramatically developed and worked out in the Book of Job, is here dwelt on. For its answer we are referred to the certain fact that God is the strength and refuge of all those who are pure in heart. In Ps 90, which opens the Fourth section of the volume, the author puts the eternal and omniscient God over against man, with his iniquities and secret sins, as they call forth His terrible but just wrath (v. 10). The beauty of holiness and the confident trust that God is the ultimate refuge of all who turn to Him are again and again dwelt on in the Psalms of this volume (cf. Ps 102-117). Fifth division, beginning with Ps 107, the note of praise is struck, and the comprehensive spirit of the Psalms is kept up almost without intermission to the end. The final exaltation of Zion, corresponding to the last overthrow of iniquity (Ps 107), is proclaimed with a confidence which is expressed only in songs of praise. With an insight which can only be termed inspiration, we find one of the poets co-ordinating the forgiveness of Jah and of himself, as in verse 64; and the maxims of Ps 108, the Psalms of Lamentations, are identified with sin (211: 46-48, etc.), and not merely the cause of sin. The only way to attain to righteousness by the unceasing, unerring discipline of the reason (cf. 215: 45-46). Running through the whole book, however, is the conception of the immortality of righteousness and of those who cultivate wisdom (Wis 1: 8-9, 10-11, 12-13), and, in the beautiful personification as the Wisdom of God (Wis 1: 7-9), as with the Spirit of God (Wis 9: 15-19). The universal sinfulness of man is not denied (cf. 3: 24-26), but the whole book, however, is the conception of the immortality of righteousness and of those who cultivate wisdom (Wis 1: 8-9, 10-11, 12-13, etc.). In the beautiful personification as the Wisdom of God (Wis 1: 7-9), as with the Spirit of God (Wis 9: 15-19), and at times we feel as if he believed that some were born to be righteous and some to sin, the power of moral choice being really confined to the former (cf. 8: 36, 72). III. THE NEW TESTAMENT.—1. Synoptists. The practical outcome of the teaching of the OT is seen in the emphasis laid by the first of the Synoptists upon the special position which it was the task of Jesus to occupy in connexion with sin. The anguish and emotion to Joseph (Mt 1: 20), without legitimate criticism of origins, is considered as one of those illuminating flashes of Divine revelation which obtain their interpretative value in the light of subsequent history. At any rate, this is the feature of Jesus' work upon which the Apostles laid particular stress, in their earliest as in their latest teaching. It is true that the preparatory work of the Baptist aroused in the breasts of the multitudes who thronged to hear him an active consciousness of sin, together with the necessity for repentance and the possibility of consequent forgiveness (Mk 1: 15). The preaching of John was, however, necessarily lacking in one element which makes the life and work of Jesus what it pre-eminently is—a new power introduced into the world, giving unto men the gift of repentance (Ac 2: 24). "Confessing the Lord Jesus themselves, and converting one another from their iniquities' (cf. Ac 3: 19. It is significant in this connexion that the recorded teaching of Jesus bears comparatively few traces of direct abstract instruction regarding sin. At the same time, we must not forget the teaching of repentance buried in the Sermon on the Mount, and the early part of the Sermon on the Mount, and the early part of the New Law (Mt 5: 28-27, Mk 7: 17-28, etc.). Or the positive, authoritative declarations by which he drew from the ancient laws and teachings the ethical ideas therein enshrined (cf. Mt 5: 20-26, where the teaching may be described as an intention rather than an extension of the area of sin). For Him 'the law and the prophets' had an abiding significance (Mt 19:8-9), but their regulative values needed re-adjudication. Sin against which the Law was a deterrent, and the preaching of the Prophets a persistently solemn protest, has its domain not in the physical but in the spiritual region of man's life (cf. Lk 11:46). It is by poisoning the life at its roots that it destroys the whole upward growth, and it is here that the language of Jesus assumes its most formidable prophetic severity. There are certain classes of sins, however, against which He uttered His most solemn warnings. Their common characteristic is that of wilfulness or deliberateness. Remarkable amongst these is that described as 'blasphemy against the Holy Spirit' (Mt 12:31-32; Lk 11:53). Mark designates 'an eternal sin'. Taking into consideration the circumstances in which the words were spoken, it is clear that Jesus was pointing to a certain class of sin, in order to establish the non-ordinate or universal nature of the presence and power of 'the manifested righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ' (Ro 3:21-26). He insists on the universality of the presence and power of sin, to show that it is present in all, and inevitable. The central teaching of Paul's is that the teaching of the God's grace in forgiving, restoring, and justifying the sinner; and for the purpose of establishing the reasonableness and the justice of His dealings with man. Before the world, it was needful first to establish the guilt of all for whom it was intended, and to create, so to speak, a consciousness of moral failure and the emptiness of the legal code and the results of the Epistle to the Romans. Here, although he deals separately with Jews and Gentiles, he maintains the proposition that all alike are sinners (Ro 5:8, 17). It is true that the Jews was the recipient of the Law; and as such he occupied the position of the moral teacher of mankind. But instead of proving the means whereby a true 'knowledge of sin' (Ro 3:21, cf. 5:20) is gained, it became, through abuse, a hindrance rather than a help to salvation. The Apostle, therefore, in this Epistle to the Romans, p. 106.), Others affirm that St. Paul is here asserting the freedom of the will, and is stating the plain proposition that all men have sinned as a matter of fact, and of their own choice. The Apostle, however, seems to have left room for a synthesis of these two ideas. It matters not whether he has done so consciously or not. As the result of Adam's transgression sin obtained an entrance and a sphere of activity in the world, and not only so, but a predilection to sin was implanted in the human race and in the human will. At the same time, the simple expression 'all sinned,' explained to the point, if it is of the universalism of death, includes the element of choice and determination. Even those whose consciousness of sin was weakened, if not obiterated, by the absence of positive or objective law, were subjected to death. Here we have the assumption of generic guilt arising directly out of St. Paul's belief in the reality of original death, as that of all men, and the passageway, or channel, through which the sin which dwelt cf. live. all it death (cf. V.22). St. Paul's doctrine of sin consists in his exposition of the function of law in revealing and arousing the consciousness of sin. A curious expression, 'the mind of the flesh' (Ro 8'), emerges in this connexion, and the impossibility of its being 'subject to the law of God' is insisted on. Apart from the law sin is death, but the inner Law came, sin sprang into life, its presence and power were revealed (cf. 1 Co 15'), and by it man was confronted with his own moral weakness. In spite of his belief in the all-pervading character and extent of sin, St. Paul's gospel is the reverse of a gospel of despair. If, on the one hand, there is a death which connotes moral corruption and slavery to sin, on the other hand there is a death unto which is man is called, and to which he may be reconciled by confessing sin, and appropriating forgiveness and new life in the death of Christ. The fact of his employing the same word and idea in senses so completely contrasted lends a marvellous force and finality to his teaching on the nature and meaning of all sin. It is the ultimate ideal result of the redemptive work of Christ. The experience of St. Paul forbade him to believe that the state of 'death unto sin' is fully realized here and now (1 Co 15'), but it is a state to which man is called and to which he is brought, and in which the life of the Kingdom of Christ is established in a peace that is everlasting (Eph 2'), 2 Co 5', Ro 13', 1 Th 4', cf. 2 Th 2', Phil. 2', etc.

3. St. John.—(a) In order to understand St. John's presentation of Jesus' teaching on sin, it will be useful to see his own individual doctrine as given in his Epistles. Here the mission of Christ is dwelt on as having for its objective the taking away of sins (1 Jn 3'), cf. 16'), and 'abiding in him' is dwelt on as constituting the guarantee of safety against sin (1 Jn 3'; cf. 15'), and as affording power to escape unceasing age-long conflict, issuing in victory for the individual, as for the race, only when the Kingdom of Christ is established in a peace that is everlasting (Eph 2', 2 Co 5', Ro 13', 1 Th 4', cf. 2 Th 2', Phil. 2', etc.).

(b) Fourth Gospel.—It is this last aspect of sin that is the dominant note of the teaching of St. John's Gospel. Indeed, this writing may be said to be a record of the sad rejection foreshadowed in the general terms, 'He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not' (1 Jn 4'). This was more particularly true of the Jews of Jerusalem and Judæa, where the story of Jesus' ministry as told in this Gospel is for the most part said. It is thus significant that in his last great discourse with His own disciples, occurring as it did in Jerusalem, the centre of the activity hostile to His claims, Jesus lays special stress on the sin of unbelief in Him ('The Holy Ghost will convict the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment'). The revelation of the Divine life, with its manifold evidences of love and mercy in and by Jesus, took away whatever excuse men might have in the presence of God's judgment. The sin of men by the Jews lay in their hatred of 'the Father' (Jn 15', cf. v.23). Indeed, it is this very revelation, designed by God as the eternal remedy against sin SIN (Jn 19), which in its process and achievement affords further possibilities to sin and its consequences (Jn 34; cf. Lk 12:11).

Nor must we omit to note that in this Gospel sin is regarded as a species of slavery. The reference to this aspect and life (Mt 11:12, Jn 19, Jn 21:20, etc.) is, in all real Christian teaching, is evident from the incidental notices found scattered throughout the NT (cf. Ro 6:14-23, Tit 3: 2, P 2 P 29, Mt 6:4 - Lk 16:3 etc.)

The popular belief in the connexion between sin and physical suffering is noticed also in the Fourth Gospel, where Jesus is represented as denying its universal and absolute authority (Jn 3:9). At the same time He recognized that in certain cases the belief was justified (Jn 5:5). It was, perhaps, His profound knowledge of a similar but a deeper relationship than this—the relationship of sin to the whole life—that gave to the words and actions of Jesus that exquisite tenderness in His treatment of individual sinners so noticeable in this Gospel (cf. Jn 4:4, 8:3-11); a tenderness which He would impart to His followers in their dealings with the sinner (cf. Jn 7:32, Mt 7:11, Jn 9:3).

We are thus enabled to see that the view of sin held and taught by Jesus is profounder and graver than any as yet existing, for it is an offence against One who is a just and holy God (Lk 15:23; cf. Mt 5:4, Jn 3:16 etc.). The life of Christ is the object-lesson which Christians are invited to imitate in their daily relation-ship with God (Jn 15, Jn 13:17). And the all embracing character and lot of all sin is that of sin is a just and holy God (Lk 15:23; cf. Mt 5:4, Jn 3:16 etc.). The life of Christ is the object-lesson which Christians are invited to imitate in their daily relation-ship with God (Jn 15, Jn 13:17). And the all embracing character and lot of all sin is that of sin is a just and holy God (Lk 15:23; cf. Mt 5:4, Jn 3:16 etc.).

4. S. James.—The author of this circular letter views sin in its practical bearings on the daily life of men. Nevertheless, his conception of it and its effects is expressed in a way that would be strange to the writer of this letter, namely, in the words of Jesus Himself, the standard to which His followers are asked to aspire, when He defined sin as a 'sin of the world' and laid the Christian's task to 'take away sins' (Jn 5, cf. 1 P 2: etc.), and St. John has pointed out to us, in the words of Jesus Himself, the standard to which His followers are asked to aspire, when He defined sin as a 'sin of the world' and laid the Christian's task to 'take away sins' (Jn 5, cf. 1 P 2: etc.), and St. John has pointed out to us, in the words of Jesus Himself, the standard to which His followers are asked to aspire, when He defined sin as a 'sin of the world' and laid the Christian's task to 'take away sins' (Jn 5, cf. 1 P 2: etc.),

5. Hebrews.—It cannot be said that there is any special doctrine of sin in this Epistle. Its readers were well acquainted with OT conceptions and teaching, and the writer deals mainly with the superiority of the New Covenant over the Old in supplying means whereby the elements of sin, which are no part of human conscience, are put away (cf. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Add. Note on 9). The central feature of this writing is the stress laid on the discovery by Christianity of a 'new and living way' (10:19) by which we have direct access to the forgiveness of sins. It is by the removal of guilt in the forgiveness of sins by the sacrifice of Jesus that this way is opened 'once for all' (10:19; cf.v, 18 98 etc.). Special emphasis is therefore laid on the failure of the Mosaic institutions to 'take away sins' (10:19, cf. 9), and on the awful character of the danger of harbouring 'an evil heart of unbelief' (3:16).

The temptation to which the 'Hebrews' were exposed was that, under stress of persecution, they would reject the final revelation of God in Christ, or revert, under the influence of the Hellenistic Jews, to the somewhat eclectic faith of the latter. This willful sin the writer characterizes as 'crucifying the Son of God afresh' (9) and as treading Him under foot (cf. 10:4). In warning them against the dangers to which they would be exposed during the time of suffering and trial now imminent, he points out to them that these trials may become in their own hands the means of their spiritual advancement. Instead of being the sole outcome of sin, suffering is often the chastisement of a loving Father 'that we may be partakers of His holiness' (12:9). The great Example, whose solution of an age-long problem we are asked to study, was Jesus, 'who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame' (12:2), and who though 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4:15), was nevertheless made 'perfect through sufferings' (2:18).

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (name probably derived from the moon-god Sin).—A region on the route of the Hebrews from Egypt to Mt. Sinai. It is usually identified with the plain lying S. of the Ras Abu Zenimeh. Upon the view held in many quarters that Mt. Sinai must be located somewhere in the Nekheb, the wilderness of Sin was on the more direct route from Egypt to Kadesh, near to if not identical with the desert of Zin (Nu 13:20-27 14:39 34:1, Dt 32:1, Jos 15:9).—Cf. SINAI (Mountain).—A holy mountain in the Sinaiic peninsula (whose name is said to be derived from that of Sin, the moon-god). It is called Horab by E and D, whereas J and P employ the name 'Sinai.' Here Moses was granted the vision of the burning bush (Ex 3:1), whereby he first received a call to lead the Israelites to adopt Jehovah as their covenanted God; and here took place the tremendous theophany which is the central event of the Pentateuch, wherein the covenant was ratified.

The identification of Mt. Sinai is a matter of some difficulty, and various attempts to discover it have been made from time to time. The traditional site is Jebel Musa, 'the mountain of Moses,' almost in the centre of the triangle; here there has been a convent ever since at least 2385, about which date it was visited by St. Silvia of Aqaba, and among her pilgrims still survives in part. This identification has therefore the warrant of antiquity. It is not, however, wholly free from difficulty, principally connected with questions of the route of the Exodus; but it is possible that with further study and discovery these difficulties may be found to be evanescent.

In recent years the tradition has been questioned, and two suggestions have been made calling for notice. The first is that originally suggested by Leupusis, who would place Sinai at Mount Serbal, some distance north-west of Jebel Musa. This theory has been championed, with a good deal of force, by the latest investigator, Professor Petrie's assistant, Mr. C. T. Currely (see Petrie, Researches in Sinai, ch. xvii.). The region appears more suitable for the occupation of a large host than the neighbourhood of Jebel Musa, and it accords better with the probable site of Rephidim.

The second view would place the mountain out of the peninsula altogether, unless it can be proved that the Land of Midian included that region. And, indeed, the evidence of the Sinai is,p for example, in Ex 3, makes this a theory worth consideration. But we are still in the dark as to the limits of Midian; all we can say is that it is not known whether Midian extended west of the Gulf of 'Akabah, and that therefore it is not known whether Sinai was west of 'Akabah. It must, however, be freely granted that to place Sinai east or north of 'Akabah would entirely disjoint all identifications of places along the line of the itinerary of the Exodus.

For the allegorical use of 'Sinai' in Gal 4:21, see art. Hagar.

SINAI (Peninsula).—The triangular tongue of land intercepted between the limestone plateau of the Tih desert in the north, and the Gulfs of Suez and 'Akabah, at the head of the Red Sea, on the south-west and south-east. It is a rugged and waste region, little watered, and full of wild and impressive mountain scenery. Except at some places on the coast, such as Tora, there is but little of a settled population.

This region was always, and still is, under Egyptian influence, if not actually in Egyptian territory. From a very early period it was visited by emissaries from Egyptian kings in search of turquoise, which is yielded by the mines of the Wady Magharah. There sculptured stelae were left, and scenes engraved in the rock, from the time of Semerkhet of the first dynasty, and Sneferu of the third—dated by Professor Petrie in the fifth and sixth millennia B.C. These sculptures remained almost intact till recent years; till a party of English speculators, who came to attempt the work of the old mines, wantonly destroyed many of them (see Petrie, Researches in Sinai, p. 46). What these vandals left was cut from the rock and removed for safety, under Professor Petrie's direction, to the Cairo Museum. A remarkable temple, dedicated to Hathor, but adapted, it would appear, rather to Semitic forms of worship, exists at Serabit el-Khadem, not far from these mines. It was probably erected partly for the benefit of the parties who visited the mines from time to time.

Geologically, Sinai is composed of rocks of the oldest (Archean) period. These rocks are granite of a red and grey colour, and grue, with strata of various kinds—hornblende, talcose, and chloritic—overlaying them. Many later, but still ancient, dykes of diorite, basalt, etc., penetrate these primeval rocks. Vegetation is practically confined to the valleys, especially in the neighbourhood of water-springs.

SINGERS.—See PRIESTS AND LEVITES, I. 2.

SINIM.—The 'land of Sinim' (Is 44:9) must be derived from the context, if it be in the extreme south or east of the known world. In the south, Sin (Pelusium, Ezk 30:15) and Syene (Ezk 29:30) have been suggested. The latter is favoured by recent discoveries of papyrus (cf. Severens). The LXX favours the view that a country in the east was intended, and some modern commentators have identified Sinim with China, the land of the Sime.

SINITES.—A Canaanite people (Gn 10:15-1 C 14). Their identification is quite uncertain.

SIN-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §14.

SION.—1. A name of Jermon, Dt 4:9. Sion is taken by some to be a textual error for Siron (wh. see). 2. See Zion in art. JERUSALEM, II. 1.

SIPHMOTH.—One of the places to which a portion of the spoil of the Amalekites was sent after David's return to Ziklag (1 S 30:16). The site has not been recovered.

SIPPAL.—See SAPIL.

SIRACH.—See APOCRYPHA, 13.

SIRAH, THE WELL OF.—The place at which Job's messenger overtook Abner (2 S 3:7). It lay on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, and is now probably 'In Shihah, near Hebron.

SIRION.—The name said to be given by the Zidonians to Mt. Hermon, Dt 3:9. Like Sinner, it may originally have been the designation of a particular part of the mountain. Cf. Zion, 1.

SISERA.—1. In Jg 4:21. Sisera is represented as the captain of the host of Jabin, a Canaanite king; his army is overcome by the Israelites under Barak. In his flight after the battle, Sisera, overcome by fatigue, seeks refuge in the tent of Jael, who treacherously kills him while asleep. In another version (Jgs 5:21) Sisera appears as an independent ruler, and Jabin is not even mentioned; the two accounts differ in a number of subsidiary details, but in two salient points.

they agree, namely, as to the defeat of Sisera and as to the manner of his death. It is clear that two traditions, one concerning Jabin and another concerning Sisera, have been mixed up together; in order to harmonize them Sisera has been made Jabin's captain (see Barak, Deborah, etc.). 2. A family of Nethinim (Ex 23-24 =
1 Es 32 Serar).

SISINES.—The governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia under Darius (1 Es 6:7, 217). In Ezr 5 et al., he is called Tattenai (wh. see).

SITAN.—A Jezebelite (1 Ch 24).

SITH.—'Sith,' that is 'since,' occurs in Jer 157 and other places; while 'sithence' occurs in 2 Es 10.

SITHRI.—A grandson of Kohath (Ex 63).

SITNAH ('strife').—The name given to a well dug by the herdsmen of Isaac in the region of Gerar (Gen 265).
The site is uncertain. H. L. WILLET.

SIVAN.—See Time.

SKIRT.—See Dress 4 (b).

SKEUL, PLACE OF A.—See GOLOTHA.

SLANDER, TALEBEARING.—Both noun and verb 'slander' are used of malicious gossip of varying degrees of meanness. The references are all to the slandering of persons, except Nu 147 AV, where RV has 'an evil report against the land.' The expression 'walking with slanders' (Jer 63, cf. Ex 145, 9) is in the original identical with 'going about as a talebearer' (Lv 195, Pr 115250; cf.
Ezk 227 in AV and RV). The element of falsehood in the gossip is seen in 2 S 10, where 'slanderer' is synonymous with 'accused.' 'Of no account' or 'wickedness are there so many complaints in OT as of slander and false accusation—whereof the Psalms are witness' (Cornill, Jeremias, 89). See, further, Crimes and Offences.

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—The Heb. 'ebeth, usually tr.
'servant,' has a variety of meanings, between which it is not always easy to distinguish. E.g. in 2 S 97 'servant' =retainer, in v.98 =bondman, in v.11 =a polite expression of self-depreciation (cf. 2 K 41 and 1 K 292). In a discussion of Hebrew slavery only those passages will be dealt with in which the word probably has the sense of bondage.

1. Legally the slave was a chattel. In the earliest code (Book of the Covenant =BC) he is called his master's money (Ex 215). In the Decalogue he is grouped with the cattle (Ex 207), and so regularly in the patriarchal narratives (cf. I G 126 etc.). Even those laws that were sought to protect the slave witness to his degraded position. In the BC the master is not punished for inflicting even a fatal flogging upon his slave, unless death follows immediately. If the slave incurred a day or two before dying, the master is given the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of his death, and the loss of the slave is regarded as a sufficient punishment (Ex 215).
The jus foliaceum was not applicable to the slave as it was to the freeman (cf. 21924, with 293); and it is the master of the slave, not the slave himself, who is recompensed if the slave is slain by an ox (Ex 219). In these last two instances BC follows the Code of Hammurabi [CH] (§§ 190-199, 253).

In practice the slave as a chattel was often subject to ill usage. He was haggled (Ex 219, Pr 299), and at times heartlessly deserted (1 S 300-31). Though the master is here an Amorite, the cases of runaway slaves in Israel bear testimony to their sufferings even at the hands of their fellow-countrymen: cf. the experiences of the churl Nebah (1 S 289), of the passionate Shimee (1 K 298), and of Sarah (Gn 128); the implications as to the frequency of such cases in the law of Dt 2325, and in later times (Stir 337-8). The position of the maidservant was in general the same as that of the man-servant. In the BC it is assumed that the maid-servant is at the same time a concubine (Ex 217); cf. Hagar, Zilpah, and Bilhah in the patriarchal narratives). Even in the idea of the slave-girl as property is still retained (Lv 1910). Here the punishment for the violation of a slave-girl was almost certainly a fine to be paid to the master, if we may judge from the analogous law in 224-Dt 225; i.e. it is an indemnity for loss of property.
In practice the maid-servant, though the concubine of the master, is often the special property of the mistress (Gn 167, 259, 30); at times having been given to her at marriage (Gn 246 297-18).

Slaves were recruited (1) principally from war, at least in earliest times. Captives or subject populations were often employed not only as personal attendants, but also as public slaves at the Temple (Jos 937 [a] glass), Neh 7176, and see above. The earliest works in the corse (Jos 167, Jr 118, 1 K 962-3 =2 Ch 87-9), while captive women were especially sought as concubines or wives (Dt 2116). From the slave-trade, of which the Israelites are the availed themselves (cf. the implications in Gn 371712, Lv 256).
This trade was mainly in the hands of the Phoenicians and Edomites (Am 14, Ezk 2714, Jl 39). (3) From slave Israelites who had become destitute through misfortune (Ex 2224), whether for other crimes also is not stated; Josephus (Ant. xvi. 1.1) knows of no other. (4) From native Israelites who, through poverty and debt, had been forced to engage in servitude (Ex 2114, Am 28, Dt 16, Lv 259, Pr 1117 [7 227 (7) or their children (Ex 217, 2 K 41), Neh 54, Is 50, Job 24) into servitude.

Whether the creditor had the right to force the debtor into slavery against his will is not clear. Ex 212 and 2 K 14 (cf. Mt 153) rather favour this view. The reflexive verb in Mt 153 and in Dt 184, where the same verbal form should probably be again translated by the reflexive, not by the passive as in RV, favours voluntary servitude.
But probably the later codes are modifications of the earlier practices. Neh 53 is ambiguous.

As to the number of slaves we have no adequate data.
Gn 144 cannot be used as evidence. The numbers in the corse (1 K 53, 18) are discrepant, and in any case probably do not refer to slaves proper. The prosperous retainer of Saul has 20 servants (2 S 94). The proportion of slaves to freemen in Neh 786 is 1 to 6.
The price of slaves naturally varied. The BC (Ex 219) fixes the average price at 30 shekels (about £4). CH in the same law allows but 17 shekels (£252, cf. 214).
Joseph is sold for 20 shekels (Gn 374). In later times the price in Exodus seems to have been maintained
(2 Mac 84; Ant. xii. 2.3).

2. But while the slave was a chattel, nevertheless certain religious and civil rights and privileges were accorded him. In law the slave was regarded as an integral part of the master's household (Ex 2012), and, as such, an adherent of the family cult (cf. the instructive early narratives in Gn 24 and 16). Accordingly the BC (Ex 235) and the Deuteronome (Ex 2015) guarantee to him the Sabbath rest. Deuteronomy allows him a share in the religious feasts (12218 156, 16), the humanitarian viewpoint being chiefly emphasized. In the more primitive law of the slave as a member of the family, conceived as a religious unit, is still retained and utilized in the interest of religious exclusiveness.
Thus, while the (sojourner) cannot partake of the Passover unless circumcised, the slave must be circumcised and so is entitled to partake (Ex 134; cf.
the narrative Gn 1728). Again, while the (in a priest's family, or even the daughter of a priest who has married into a non-priestly family, may not eat of the holy things, the priest's slave is allowed to do so (Lv 219).

As to civil rights: In the BC, murder of the slave as well as of the freeman is punishable with death (Ex 194; the law is Inclusive). If death results from flogging, the master is also punished, conjectur-SLAVE, SLAVERY

ally by a fine (Ex 21:30). If the slave is seriously maimed by his master, he is given his freedom (Ex 21:32). At this point the BC contrasts very favourably with the CH. The latter does not attempt to protect the slave's person from the master, but only provides for the maimed to the master and the slave is injured by another (199, 215, 214). While a man could be sold into slavery for debt (see above), man-stealing is prohibited on pain of death (Ex 21:18–Dt 24). Deuteronomy correctly states the Exodus law correctly as a prohibition against stealing a fellow-citizen (Dt 22:7). It would again contrast favourably with CH, which serves a severe penalty for harbouging fugitive slaves (16, 19). The humane law for the protection of captive wives (Dt 21:10–11) is also noticeable.

But practice often went far beyond law in mitigating the severity of servitude. Indeed, slavery in the ancient East generally was a comparatively easy lot. The slave is group with the wife and child as part of the master's household (Ex 20:16). Children are property and can be sold as well as slaves (Ex 21:7; cf. 22:24–25 where the daughter is regarded as the father's property.
Children are females as well as slaves (Ex 13:31).
Wives were originally bought from the parents, and wives and concubines are often almost indistinguishable. Hence the lot of the slave was probably not much harder than that of a wife or child (cf. Ga 5), and the law implies the possibility of a genuine affection existing between master and man (Ex 21:6–Dt 15:16). Accordingly we find many illustrations of the man-servant raising to a position of importance. He may be intrusted with the most delicate responsibilities ( Gn 24), may be the heir of his master ( Gn 15:14), is often on intimate terms with and advises the master ( Jg 15:17, 1 S 20:24), the custom of having body-servants (Heb. נְדָשִׁים, Nu 31:21; cf. with גְּשֵׁים etc.) being used by intimates, and he may even marry his master's daughter (1 Ch 23:17; cf. similar cases in CH § 175 f). Especially servants of important men enjoy a reflected dignity (1 S 9:17, 2 K 9). The rise of servants into positions of prominence was so frequent as to be the subject of proverb-making (Pr 14:19 17 190 30).

Whether a servant could own property while remaining a slave is an important issue, and the passages adduced in favour of it (1 S 9:17; cf. 9:10, 2 S 9:8). [Ziba is a retainer, Lv 25:39 (fast a real servant)] are not pertinent. Dt 15:23 makes it plain that the custom and the fact that in Amos (Ch 17:10) the slave could own property awakens a presumption in favour of the same custom in Israel.

Under a good house-wife the maid-servant would be well taken care of (Pr 31:27). At times she also seems to be the heir of her mistress (Pr 30:22). The son of the slave-concubine might inherit the property and the father's blessing ( Gn 16:18 21:9 40:4), but this depended on the father's will ( Gn 25:5), as in Babylon (Ch § 174 f).

The effect of occupying such positions of trust was often bad. Proverbs fears it (19:4 30:10), and such passages as 2 K 5:14, Neh 10:11, Gn 16:1 justify the fear. Servants also tended to become agents of their master's sins (1 S 24:4, 2 S 137).

3. Thus far no distinction between native and foreign slaves has been observed either in law or in practice, except possibly by implication at Ex 21:6–Dt 24, and Dt 23:10. The view that the protective laws in Ex 21:12 are applicable only to the native slave is without exetiological justification, and Gn 17:18, Ex 12:19, Gn 15:13 [if the text can be trusted] 39:7 (probably equally applicable to conditions in Israel, J 1 Ch 24:2), and Gn 16:16 show that the foreign man- or maid-servant may enjoy all the advantages of the native Israelite.

The distinction drawn between the subject Canaanites and Israelites at 1 K 9:21 = 2 Ch 8:10 is clearly incorrect (cf. 1 K 5:8) and belongs to a later development in the ideas of slavery (see below). The distinction drawn in P between the "bom-born" slaves ("sons of" or "household of") (Gn 14:4 17:12 etc.) does not refer to the two classes of foreign and native slaves.

In apparently but one particular, though this is of vital importance, the line drawn is less sharp than the foreign-born, namely, in the right to release.
Already in CH (§ 117) provision was made for the release, after three years, of a wife or children who had been sold for debt. In the BC (Ex 21:2) this idea was associated with the Sabbath idea, and a release prescribed after 6 years of servitude, but the law was extended to cover every Israelite man-servant. Yet in the specifications of the law (vv. 4–9) the rights of the master still noticeably precede the rights of the husband and father. Provision is also made for the slave to remain in servitude if he prefers to do so. In this case the servant is to be brought to the door of the master's house, not of the sanctuary (the rite would then lose its significance), and have his ear pierced with an awl (a wide-spread symbol of servitude in the East), in which case he would become a slave for life.

The phrase "unto God" (v. 4) can scarcely refer to this connection to the local sanctuary, as the AK translates.
It signifies the adoption of the slave into the family as a member of a kinsman, and probably referred originally to the household gods (or ancestors)?

In the case of the maid-servant (Ex 21:21) no release was permitted under ordinary circumstances (v. 7), for it is assumed that the slave-girl is at the same time a concubine, and hence release would be regarded as the best interests both of herself and of the home.
Yet she is not left without protection. Her master has no right to sell her to a family or clan not her own (foreign people); v. 8, probably has this restriction in view (it speaks of the "affair of an Israelite to a non-Israelite being out of the question), but must allow her to be redeemed, presumably by one of her own family. Failing this, he may give her to his son, in which case she is to be treated as a daughter (v. 9). If neither of these methods is adopted, a third way is provided. He may take another (concu-bine or wife), but must then retain the first, provide for her maintenance and respect her marital rights (v. 19).
If the master refuses to adopt any one of these three methods ("three three"); v. 19, refers to the three methods in vv. 1–10, not to the three provisions in v. 19), then, and only, the maid-servant has a right to release.

The same is but one of several possible interpretations of this passage. Further, the meaning of v. 8 is doubtful.

The text is corrupt. Instead of the phrase "who hath made his concubine" it read "who hath known her" and "who hath known her." On the first reading the two methods of procedure in vv. 1–8 are allowable if she be still a virgin (in v. 8 she is no longer such). On the second reading one of the three methods in vv. 1–8 must be followed when she is de facto a concubine. The latter reading is exceptionally preferable. The resultant possibility of a father giving his concubine to a son was probably not offensive, at a time when wife and concubine were regarded as property which a son could inherit. Among the Arabs marriage with a stepmother was common till the rise of Islam. In later times these marriages were forbidden both in the Koran and in the Hebrew law (Dt 22:27, Lv 18:10).

The Deuteronomistic re-formulation of the Law of Release (Dt 15:12–19) is noteworthy. (1) Release is extended to the maid-servant. Conversely the specifications in Ex 21:11–14 are allowed to lapse, and in the awl-rite only the possibility of the slave continuing in servitude through love of his master is considered.
This change is due to the increasing respect for the marriage relation. The slave-husband's rights over the wife are now superior to the master's rights, and it is apparently no longer assumed that the maid-servant must be the concubine of her master. Where concubinage does not exist, the maid-servant can be released without prejudice to the marital relation. (2) In Deut.
the awl-rite is clearly only a domestic rite. This confirms the interpretation of the rite given above. The Kemperianist, who localizes all religious observances at the central sanctuary, consequently drops the 'unto God' of Ex 21:6. (3) The characteristic humanitarian exhortation (v.10-14) is added, and the reasonableness of the law defended (vv.15-16).
SLAVE, SLAVERY

Jer 34:17 describes an abortive attempt to observe the law in its Deuteronomic formulation. The law had evidently not been observed in spite of its reasonableness, and was subsequently again allowed to become a dead letter.

A third version of the Law of Release is found at Lv 25:23-46. Three cases are considered: (1) that of the Israelite who has sold himself, because of poverty, to his fellow-countryman (vv.23-41). Such an one is tolto be regarded as a real slave but as a hireling, and is to be released in the year of Jubilee. (2) Actual slaves are to be obtained only from non-Israelite peoples (cf. 1 K 1:30). For them there is no release (vv.42-46).
(3) If an Israelite sells himself to a stranger, he may be redeemed at any time by his next of kin or by himself (power to acquire property assumed), but in any case he must be freed at the year of Jubilee (vv.47-48). The redemption-price is proportioned to the number of years he had yet to serve from the time of his redemption to the Jubilee year, in other words, to the year he would reach at the term of hireling during that period. The possibility of an Israelite becoming an actual slave is again obliterated. The differences between this law and the earlier legislation are marked. (c) It formulates the protest against the practice that an Israelite could be a slave (cf. Neh 5:9). (b) Through the Institution of the Jubilee year it provides that even the quasiservitude which is admitted should not be for life, and consequently it ignores the antithesis.

difficulty which is present at this point. The Levitical law, which postpones release till the 50th year, seems to work a greater hardship at times than the earlier laws, which prescribe release in the 7th year. Here three things are to be remembered: (a) the earlier law had probably become a dead letter long before the present law was formulated.
(b) Lev. 25:23-46 makes this law the result of a theological theory (cf. vv. 23, 42, 46), and never belonged to the sphere of practical legislation; (c) as such it is to be construed, not in antithesis to the 7th year of the earlier laws, but to the lifelong period of servitude often actually experienced. It will not lengthen the time until the year of release, but will theoretically abolish all lifelong servitude.

This theoretical point of view so predominates that the prolongation of the time of servitude, if the law had ever become actually operative, is left out of account. The fact that the Israelite in servitude to another Israelite is really when a slave is attached to a stranger, who even redeemed at any time, also shows that we are not dealing with practical legislation.

In these three laws of release we have three clearly marked stages in the recognition of the slave's personality.
The BC provides for the release of the Israelite man-servant. Deut., with its humanitarian tendencies, extends this privilege to the maid-servant. Lev., on the basis of its theological conceptions, denies that any Israelite can be an actual slave. But all these laws remain within nationalistic limitations. One step more must be taken. The rights of the slave as a man, and not simply as a fellow-countryman, must be recognized.
The growing individualism which accompanied the development of the doctrine of monotheism prepared the way for this final step, which was taken by Job in the noble passage 31:12-41. In the same spirit Joel universalizes the primitive conception of the necessary attachment of the slave to the family cult, and makes him share equally with all flesh in the baptism of the Spirit of God (29).

Note.—The relationship of servant to master is a favourite figure in the OT for the relationship of man to God (esp. in the Psalms). The national Israel, is also often thought of as a slave (Jer 2:18; Ps 106:44), and a thought which finds its most profound expression is Is 42:24 49:4-5 50:14 52:2-3.

In the NT it is only the attitude of Jesus and St.
Paul towards slavery that demands attention. Jesus was not a political agitator, or even a social reformer.
In nothing is this fact more strikingly illustrated than in His allusions to slavery. He refers to it only for purposes of illustration (e.g. Mk 12:1-4; Mt 20:15).
He never criticizes it, even when it violates, as He must have realised, His own principles of love and brotherhood (Mt 18:22, Lk 17:10). But, as Christianity reached into the world and developed into a social force, it became increasingly necessary to consider what its attitude would be to slavery, especially as many slaves came Christians (in Ro 16:5-9; 1 Co 7:13, Ph 4:11).
"Them of the house of bondage are not free-receivers." In this connexion St. Paul enunciates just one great principle,—In Christ all the distinctions of this world disappear; the religion of Jesus knows neither bond nor free. Paul did not use this principle to overthrow the institutions of slavery. On the contrary, at 1 Co 7:21 he counsels one who has been called (into the Christian life) while a slave not to carry his lot. He even advises him, if the opportunity to become free is offered, to remain in servitude (v.9, but the interpretation is doubtful), the near approach of the Parousia (v.9) apparently throwing these examples of duty into a perspective of immediacy for St. Paul. The Apostle does not seek 'to make free men out of slaves, but good slaves out of bad slaves' (Eph. 6:3-4, Col 3:22-4; cf. 1 P 2:16). In these passages the corresponding duties of masters and servants are also insisted upon, as there is no respect of persons with Christ. It is significant in the later Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 6:1, 2 Th 3:11) the exhortations to the masters are omitted.

SLEEVE.—See DRESS, 2 (d).

SLEIGHT.—The word fr. 'sleight' in Eph 4:28, 'by understands 'wytwns,' which is more intelligible now than 'sleight.'

SMITH.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 2.

SMYRNA (also and more strictly Smyrna) was founded as a colony from Greece earlier than B.C. 1000, but the second foundation, which had been Eolian, was captured by its southern neighbours the Ionian Greeks and made an Ionian colony. This second foundation became a powerful State, possessing territory far to the E., as late as the 7th cent. B.C., fought on equal terms against the great Lydian power (see Sardis). It gradually gave way, however, and was captured and destroyed about B.C. 600 by Alyattes, king of Lydia. It now ceased to be a Greek city, and it was not till the 3rd cent. B.C. that it became so again. This was a State called Smyrna between 600 and 800, but it was mainly a loosely congregated of villages scattered about the plain and the surrounding hills, and not in the Greek sense a polis (city-State).

Alexander the Great intended to re-found the city, but did not carry out his plan. It was left for one of his successors, Lysimachus, who accomplished it in B.C. 290. The old city had been on a steep high hill on the N. side of the extreme eastern recess of the gulf; the new was planted on the S.E. shore of the gulf, about 2 miles away. The object of the change was to obtain a good harbour and a suitable point for the building of a land trade route to the E. There were in reality two ports—a small inner one with a narrow entrance, and a mooring ground; the former has gradually filled up through neglect. Its maritime connexion brought it into contact with the Romans, who made an alliance with Smyrna against the Selucid power. In B.C. 105 Smyrna built a temple to Rome, and ever afterwards remained faithful to that State through good fortune and bad. Rome showed a thorough appreciation of this friendship and loyalty, and in A.D. 26 this city was preferred before all others in Asia as the seat of the new temple to be dedicated by the confederacy of that province to Tiberius.

The city was of remarkable beauty. Its claim to be the chief city of Asia was contested by Ephesus and Pergamum, but in beauty it was easily first. In addition to its picturesqueness it was commended by its handsome and excellently paved streets, which were fringed by the groves in the suburbs. The city was well walled, and in the pagos above possessed an ideal acropolis, which, with its splendid buildings in orderly succession, was known as the最高的 position of Smyrna. The protecting divinity of the city was a local variety of Cybele, known as the Sipylene Mother, and the towers and battlements of her head-dress bore an obvious resemblance to the appearance of the city. (The Greeks identified her with Nemesis, who here alone in the Greek world was worshipped, and not as one but as a pair of goddesses.) There was one street known as the Street of Gold. It went from W. to E., curving round the sloping hill, and had a temple on a hill at each end. For its length and fine buildings it was compared to a necklace of jewels round the neck of a statue. The life of the city was and is much benefited in the hottest period of the day by a west wind which blows on it with great regularity, dying down at sunset. This was counterbalanced by a disadvantage, the difficulty of draining the lowest parts of the city, a difficulty accentuated by the very sound. Smyrna boasted that it was the birthplace of Homer, who had been born and brought up beside the river Meles. This stream is identified by local patriotism with the Caravan Bridge River, which flows through the lowest part of the city. It is said that the pahas flows round its eastern base and enters the sea to the N.E. of it. But this is a mistaken view. The Meles is undoubtedly to be identified with the stream coming from the Baths of Diana and called Chalka-boumar, as it serves to satisfy the minute description of the Smyrnian orator Aristides (flourished 2nd cent. A.D.) and other ancient writers. It rises in the very suburbs of the city, and is fed by a large number of springs, which rise close to one another. Its course is circle-shaped at first, and afterwards it flows gently to the sea like a canal. Its temperature is equable all the year round, and it never either overflows or dries up. The city has suffered from frequent earthquakes (for instance, in A.D. 180), but has always risen superior to its misfortunes. It did not become a Turkish city till Tamerlane captured it in A.D. 1402. Even now the Christian element is three times as large as the Mohammedan, and the Turks call the city Infield Smyrna. It has always been an important place ecclesiastically.

The letter to the Church at Smyrna (Rev 2:9-10) is the most favourable of all. The writer puts its members on a higher plane than any of the others. They have endured persecution and poverty, but they are rich in real wealth. They are the victims of calumny, but are not to be afraid. Some are even to be sent to prison at this time, but execution, and to have suffering for a time. If they are faithful they shall receive real life.

The church was dead and yet lived, like the city in former days. The Jews in Smyrna had been specially hostile to the Christians, and had information given them before the Roman officials. Most of them were probably citizens of Smyrna, but became merged in the general population and were not confined to a certain tribe, since the Romans ceased the Jews nation in a.D. 70. The hatred of the Jews there can be explained only by the supposition that many of the Christians were converted Jews. Similarly they helped in the martyrdom of Polycarp (a.D. 155). The city and its Christianity have survived all attacks.

SNAIL.—1. chōmel, Lv 11:30. See LEZZARD, 2. shabbē Hol, Ps 58:2* 'Let them be as a snail which melteth and passeth away.' The reference here appears to be to the slimy track which a snail leaves behind it, which gives the appearance of 'melting away,' E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SNARES.—A cord with running noose, mēqāsh. Am 3:3 etc.; cf. ydqāsh 'one who lays snares,' (fowler) Hos 9:2 used to catch ground game and birds. The fowler also used a net (reseth, Pr 11:10, Hos 5:12 etc.), under which he tempted birds by means of food, and then, concealing it near by, pounced upon them. The pack (Ps 124:7, Pr 7:24, Ec 9:4 etc.) probably corresponded to the Arab, fakkh, a trap made of bone and gut, with tongue and jaws on the principle of the common rat-trap. It is light, and the bird caught by the food springs up with it from the ground in its vain efforts to escape. Of this Amos gives a vivid picture (3). In later times the fowler used decoys to lure birds into his cage (Sir 11:18). Both mēqāsh and pack are several times rendered in EV by gin. The NF pāgā (Ro 11:11 etc.), and brochos (1 Co 7:26), may mean 'snares,' 'net,' or 'trap'; whatever seizes one unawares. W. Ewing.

SNOW.—Every winter snow falls occasionally in the mountainous districts of Palestine, but seldom lies for more than a few hours—at most for a day or two. The greater part of the year, however, snow, glittering on the shoulders of Great Hermon, is easily seen from most of the higher hills in the country. It is frequently used as a symbol of whiteness and purity (Ex 4:7, Ps 51:7, Is 11:16). It is difficult to mēqāsh and pack are several times rendered in EV by gin. The NF pāgā (Ro 11:11 etc.), and brochos (1 Co 7:26), may mean 'snares,' 'net,' or 'trap'; whatever seizes one unawares. W. Ewing.

SNUFFERS, SNUFF DISHES.—The former of these are the 'tongs' of Ex 27:17, the latter the vessels in which the burnt portions of the wicks were deposited. See TADBRAUGERAL, 6 (b). C.F. FISHER.

SO.—The king of Egypt (Misraim), Hoshea's correspondence with whom led shortly to the captivity of Israel (2 K 17:6). In B.C. 755 the kingdom of Egypt was probably in confusion (end of Dyn. 23), the land being divided among petty princes, and threatened or held by the Egyptians. It is difficult to find an Egyptian name of this period that would be spelt Sr or Sh in Hebrew. Assyrian annals, however, inform us that in 722, shortly after the fall of Samaria, a certain Sr's, tartan (commander-in-chief) of Musti, was sent by the king of Assyria, and probably Shalman on his Egyptian expedition, to the help of Gaza against Sargon. This Sr's may be our Sr (or Seve), not king, but commander-in-chief. It has been thought that the Heb. Sr, Seve, and the Assy. Sr'sh might stand for the name of the Egyptian Shabako the 25th Dyn., as crown prince and then king, but they would be singularly imperfect renderings of that name. Shabako gained the throne of Egypt about B.C. 715.

SOLEMN, SOLEMNITY.—The adj. ‘solemn’ frequently occurs in AV, always with assembly or meeting or some such word, and always in its early sense of ‘regular’ or ‘public.’ Thus ‘a solemn feast’ means simply ‘a feast’: there is no corresponding word in the Hebrew. In the same way ‘solemnity’ means ‘public occasion.’ How much this word, as used in AV, differs from its modern meaning, may be seen from Shakes., Midsummer Night’s Dream, v. 1. 576; ‘A fortnight hold we this solemnity.’ In nighting evens and new jollity.

SOLEMN ASSEMBLY.—See Congregation.

SOLOMON.—1. Sources.—1 K 1–11 (cf. 11th), with parallels in 2 Ch 1–9 (add references in closing chs. of 1 Ch.). In Chronicles the character of Solomon, as of the period as a whole, is idealized; e.g. nothing is said of the intrigues attending his accession, his foreign marriages and idolatry, or his final troubles, even with Jeroboam. Details are added or altered in accordance with post-exilic priestly conceptions (2 Ch. 1–9, 11; 8:18); 12 (cf. 1 K 30) makes the sacrifice at Gibeah more orthodox; the dream becomes a theophany; in 7:1 fire comes down from heaven. In 9th reference is made to the building of the temple (1 K 6, 7), but the incident described in 11, 22–39 makes it clear that the Chronicler was unable to go behind 1 K. for his materials. The books of OT and Apocrypha ascribed to Solomon are of value only as giving later conceptions of his career. Josephus (Ant. xvi. 1–8) cannot be relied on where he differs from OT; the same holds good of the fragments quoted by Eusebius and Clemens Alexandrinus. Later legends, Jewish and Mohammedan, are interesting, but historically valueless; the fact that they have assumed no way an effect of the OT narrative is an evidence of its general reliability; only two dreams and no marvels are recorded of Solomon. Archaeology has so far contributed very little to our knowledge of his reign.

2. Chronology.—His accession is dated c. B.C. 969, i.e. about 50 years later than the traditional chronology. We have unfortunately no exact data, the dates of Hiram and Shishak (1 K 11:20) not having been precisely determined. The odds against this are enormous. At 12 years of his reign, as of David’s (cf. 2 Ch 3:1, 5:22, etc.), would seem to represent a generation.

3. Early years.—Solomon was the son of David and Bathsheba (2 S 12:24), presumably their eldest surviving child; his position in the lists of 5:4, 1 Ch 3:14 is strange, perhaps due to emphasis. The name means ‘peaceful’ (Heb. Shelomoh; cf. Iraneaus, Friedrich), indicating the lingering of the name of Absalom (‘father is peace’). The name given him by Nathan (2 S 12:24), Jedidiah (‘beloved of J.’, the same root as David), is not again referred to, perhaps as being too sacred. It was the pledge of his father’s restoration to the Divine favour. We have no account of his training. ‘The Lord loved him’ (2 S 12:24) implies great gifts; and v. 24 and 1 K 1 I suggest the influence of Nathan. His mother evidently had a strong hold over him (1 K 1:2).

4. Accession.—The appointment of a successor in Eastern monarchies depended on the king’s choice, which in Israel needed to be ratified by the people (1 K 12); where polygamy prevailed, interpretation of the data assumed. 14 implies a previous promise to Bathsheba, perhaps a ‘court secret’; the public proclamation of 1 Ch 22:15, if at all historical, must be misplaced. Adonijah, ‘a very Godly man’ (1 K 1), relying on the favours of the people (20) [it is doubtful whether he was the eldest surviving son], made a bid for the throne, initiating the method of Absalom and taking advantage of David’s senility. He was presumably followed in the action of Nathan and Bathsheba; Solomon himself was evidently young, though soon able to assert himself. The careful and impressive ritual of the coronation was calculated to leave no doubt in the people’s mind as to who was the rightful heir. The young king learned quickly to distinguish between his friends and enemies, as well as to rely on the loyalty of the Cherehitites, his father’s foreign bodyguard. The sparing of Adonijah (1 K 14) suggests that he was not a very formidable competitor; his plot was evidently badly planned. His request to Bathsheba (20) may have been part of a renewed attempt on the kingdom (as he claims his father’s wives), or may have been due to real affection. At any rate the king’s suspicion or jealousy was aroused, and his rival was removed: Canticles suggests that Solomon himself believed to have been the lover of Abihail. The deposition of Ahithar, and the execution of Joab and Shimel, were natural consequences; and in the case of the two last, Solomon was only following the advice of his father (21–9). He thus early emphasized his power to act, and as a result ‘his kingdom was established greatly’ at a cheap cost. We shall hardly criticise the removal of dangerous rivals when we remember the fate which he himself would have met if Adonijah had succeeded. (2 K 11:1; cf. Pr 29:25).

5. Policy.—The work of Solomon was to develop the ideas of his father. He consolidated the kingdom, welding its disorganized tribal divisions together into a short-lived unity, by the power of an Oriental despotism. The subjugation of the Canaanites was completed (99).

The position of Jerusalem as the capital was secured by the building of the Temple and palaces and by the fortification of Millo (99). An iron chain of garrison and store cities was established (99), together with a standing army which included 12,000 horsemen and 1400 chariots (4K 109). The extent of his dominions (4K 32) may reflect the idea of a large, and Eastern monarchs were ready to claim suzerainty where there was but little effective control. But inscriptions show us how kaleidoscopic were the politics of the period; kingdoms rose and fell very quickly, and the surrounding States were at the time in a state of chaos. As that enabled his reign to be a generation of peace. His troubles (11A-49) were very few for so long a life. The hostility of Hadad (v.42) was a legacy from David, but there is no evidence that he became king of Edom. Rezon (v.38) conquered Damascus and founded a dynasty, but we hear nothing of any serious war. Nothing is known of the Hamath-zobah which Solomon subdued (2 Ch 8). More than any other Jewish king he realised the importance of foreign alliances, which were closely connected with his commercial policy. (c) Early in his reign he married Pharaoh's daughter (1 K 3:1), who brought her marriage portion Gezer (99). Pharaoh was apparently the last of the Tanite (21st) dynasty—a confused period of which little is known; we have no other notice of the connexion between Egypt and Palestine at this period. Solomon was able to control, and even to profit by, the caravan trade between the Euphrates and the Nile. The caravanserais of Chilmam (Jer 41:7; cf. 2 E 192, 1 K 27) may have been established at this period in connexion with that trade. From Egypt (unless a N. Syrian Musri is intended) horses and chariots for Solomon's own use, and for the purposes of a Syrian trade (10A-18). The alliance was apparently not disapproved at the time (cf. Ps 45), but it was no doubt due to the influence of Sheba (1 K 10:1). (b) The alliance with Hiram of Tyre (according to Gem. Alex., Solomon also married his daughter, cf. 11A-1) was a continuation of the policy of David (but unless this Hiram was the son of David's ally, the building of the palace in 2 S 5:18 is put too early). This was in connexion with his building operations (6-12). Timber from Lebanon was brought by sea to Joppa, together with stones from Tyre, especially the Lebanon (v. 7; cf. Ezk 273). Solomon, a writer in brass, is particularly mentioned (1 K 7:14). The yearly payment consisted of agricultural commodities (51); note exaggerations in 2 Ch 2:9. A grant of twenty cities in Galilee was unsatisfactory to Hiram, though apparently paid for them (1 K 9:9-14). In a more substantial return was the security which Solomon was able to offer to Phoenician trade with the E., and, above all, access to the port of Ezion-geber on the Red Sea, made possible by his suzerainty over Edom. Tamar (1 K 9:24 R V (AY 'Tadmor') in S. Judah apparently protected the route to the port. A lucrative trade was carried on by the two kings in partnership, in gold, spices, sandalwood, apes, peacocks, etc. (9K 10:1-5). The extent of their voyages is a mystery, the situation of both Ophir and Tarshish being unknown. Assuming that there was only one Tarshish, and not, as in the W., it is still very doubtful whether Solomon can have been allowed any share in the Mediterranean trade; 'ships of Tarshish' may be only a name for a particular type of vessel. The Ophir trade must have been connected with S. Arabia; hence no doubt the visit of the queen of Sheba (10); the presents exchanged would be really of the nature of barter, as illustrated by the Tell el-Amarna tablets. The Jews never took kindly to the sea, and, except for the abortive attempt in Pehoshaphat (224), Solomon's policy found no imitators.

6. Internal condition of his kingdom. — The impression is given us of great wealth. Though the sums left by David (1 Ch 229) are incredible (equal to a thousand million pounds), Solomon's own resources were negligible. 1 K 10:4 is possible for an exceptional year. But the gold was used chiefly in unproductive forms of display (v.44), and probably but little was in circulation among the people; he had a difficulty in paying Hiram (99). His passion for buildings was extravagant; the Temple was seven years in building (69); his own house thirteen (7); there was also the palace for his wife (v.4). He had an enormous court (note list of officers in 49) and harem (11), necessitating a luxurious daily provision (49). The country was divided into twelve parts, under twelve officers, each responsible for a month's supplies (v.7); these coincided with the tribal divisions, and Judah was exempt. For the building operations a mas or forced levy was organized under A dor (99; cf. 2 S 209) with numerous subsidies (288), 90,000 men were sent to Lebanon, 10,000 a month; there were carriers and henchmen, 40, and the aborigines were used as helots (99, Ezr 29 mentions their descendants). The mas was the very word used for the labour in Egypt, and beneath the apparent prosperity (49-29) was a growing discontent of the people, but his policy was clearly economically and socially unsound, and could only lead to ruin. From the religious point of view the outstanding feature is the building of the Temple. It is an anachronism to represent it at the close of the Age of the Judges (v.31, 419). The cost of the sport and, in the former years of his reign (1 K 8:9), the most magnificent was a visible proof of the triumph of J over the Baal worship of Canaan, and of His exaltation as supreme God of the nation. It cannot be maintained that the material and artistic glory of the Temple was built during Solomon's reign (Nathan in 49 is probably his brother), and the attitude of Nathan, Ahijah, and Shemaiah makes it probable that they looked with suspicion on the new developments. It was, however, a necessary step in the growth of the national religious feeling of the nation, and the thought that it made Zion the centre of its enthusiastic patriotism.

7. His wisdom. — The special gift of God (33). His 'judgment' (v.32) is the typical instance. It presumably took place early in his reign (cf. the contemptuous laughter of the people in Jos. Ant. viii. ii. 2), and simply shows a shrewd knowledge of human nature; many parallels are quoted. It proves his fitness for judicial functions, and 49.29 gives the general idea of his attainments. He was regarded as the father of Jewish proverbial (or gnomic) wisdom; 'wisdom books' existed in Egypt long before, but it seems impossible to distinguish in our present 'Proverbs' (c. s. Matt. 250) what elements may be due to him. Sirach and Wis. have no title to his name. 1 K 49. 33 suggest general and poetical culture, parables drawn from nature, rather than the beginnings of science. Ps 112 may possibly belong to his time, but Ps 137 of the Canticles. Later tradition added much; the solving of 'riddles' held a large place in the wisdom of the East, and we hear of the 'hard questions' of the queen of Sheba (10), and of a contest between Solomon and Hiram (Jos. Ant. viii. v. 3). Josephus also speaks of his power over demons; Rabbinical legend of his control over beasts and birds, of his 'magic carpet,' and knowledge of the Divine name. Examples of the legendary material are accessible in Farrar's Solomon.

8. Character. — Solomon evidently began his reign with high ideals, of which his dream (33) was a natural expression. His sacrifice at Gibeon (v.5) gives another aspect; his religion was associated with external display. So the magnificence of the Temple, the pageantry of its dedication (8), certainly ministered to his own glory, no less than to God's. His prayer, however, if it be in any sense authentic, is full of true piety, and he seems to have had a real delight in religious observances (9^). His fall is connected with his polygamy and foreign wives (11, cf. Neh 13^). He not only allowed them their own worship, a necessary concession, but shared in it, the memory of his 'high places,' within sight of his own Temple, was preserved in the name 'Mount of Offence.' This idolatry was, in fact, the natural scepticism resulting from his habitual foreign intercourse. Self-indulgence and the pride of wealth evidently played their part in his deterioration. Of his actual end nothing is known; he was an 'old man' (1 K 11^) at sixty years, but Jeroboam's flight suggests that he could still make his authority felt. Ecclesiastes gives a good impression of the 'moral' of his life; but whether he actually repented and was 'saved' was warmly debated by the Fathers. Dt 17^ criticises his Egyptian alliance and harem, his love of horses and of wealth, and Sir 47^ is a fair summary of the career of one whose 'heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father' (1 K 11^). His wisdom could not teach him self-control, and the one true life—life was a son 'ample in foolishness and lacking in understanding.'

SONG OF SONGS (or CANTIOLES). — 1. Place in the Canon, interpretation, structure. — (a) The Song of Songs is one of the Ketubim, Haggographa, or Writings, the third of the three classes into which the Jewish Canon was divided. Printed copies of the Heb. OT follow the arrangement of the German and French MSS in placing it at the head of the five Megillot or Rolls — the short books which are read at the great annual solemnities of Passover and the Feast of Booths, the 9th Ab, 23 Nisan. It probably takes its premier position to the fact that Passover is the earliest festival of the year. But there is reason for believing that a more ancient order survives in the LXX, where it stands by the side of Prov. and Eccles., the two other works to which Solomon's name was attached.

Grave doubts were long entertained by the Rabbin regarding the canonicity of Canticles (a common name of the book, from Vulg. Cantium Cantorum).

The Synod of Jamnia (a.d. 90-100), after some discussion, decided in favour of its reception, and Rabbi Aharan (a.d. 135) lent to this conclusion the weight of his great influence: 'All the Haggographa are holy, but the Song of Songs is the most holy, and the whole world is not of such importance as the day in which it was given.' The opening words of the Targum are equally strong: 'Songs and praises which Solomon the prophet, the king of Israel, spake by the Holy Spirit before Judas, the Lord of the whole world. Ten songs were sung in that day, but this song was more to be praised than the seven.' The Midrash paraphrases the Targum: 'The Song of Songs is the most excellent of songs, dedicated to Him who one day will cause the Holy Ghost to rest on us; it is that song in which His praises we and we pray.'

(b) It was evidently admitted into the OT because it was supposed to be a treatise of a religious theme. This is implied by its title in the Syriac Version: 'Wisdom of Wisdom, which is Solomon's: the book which is called in Hebrew Shiruth Shirim (i.e. 'Song of Songs').'

The theme was supposed to be the reciprocal love of Edweth and Israel, and the story of that love in the history of the Chosen People. This was here enshrined in an allegory somewhat analogous to Hos 1^ and Ezek 16.

The Church adopted this line of interpretation from the Syriac: Christ is the bridegroom, the Church or the soul is the bride.

The rubrics prefixed to many verses in Cod. Amiatinus of the Vulgate illustrate the manner in which this was worked out: 'Voice of the Synagogue.' 'Voice of the Church.' 'Voice of Christ.' 'Voice of Mary Magdalene to the Church,' 'Christ calls together the nations.' To some writers the Virgin Mary was the bride, and Canticles told the story of the Incarnation. Luther read here Solomon's thanksgivings for the blessings bestowed on his kingdom. The school of Dionysius has lost ground considerably in modern times, but is not yet extinct. There were, however, almost from the beginning, exegetes who saw that the subject really treated of in Ca. is the mutual love of man and woman. In the early Church the great name of Theodore of Mopsuestia stands out on this side, and among the Jews that of Ibn Ezra. Castellio was driven out of Geneva by Calvin for asserting it, and Luis de Leon was thrown into prison by the Inquisition for the same reason.

(c) The question of form is closely connected with that of subject. Origen was the first to point out its affinity to the drama, but the earliest attempt to work this out thoroughly was made as late as 1722 by a German, G. W. Leichter. He has found many authors following the Bible and the Targum, that a country maiden was supposed to be the two leading characters. He married her, and his love for her led him to adopt a simpler mode of life. But is there not a third important character in the play? Later students answered in the affirmative. The original explanation was that Solomon carried off 'the Shulammite' to his harem, and, abetted by the women already there, the 'daughters of Jerusalem,' sought to divert her affections from her shepherd-lover; failing in this, he at last magnanimously resigned her to the shepherd. Leaving aside all detailed objections, the consideration which is fatal to these and all conceivable forms of the theory is that the drama has no place in Semitic literature. If Ca. had been an exception to the rule, how is it that there is not a single stage-direction, not a note of any kind to identify the speaker or regulate the action?

Certain important MSS of the LXX show how keenly this defect was felt; to each longer or shorter section they prefix 'The Brdeweg,' 'The Bride,' 'A second time the Bride adjoins the maiden,' or 'the lady and one Mts the story runs to the following length, before 6^.' Not having found the bridegroom, the bride went out, and, as one found by the city-watchmen in the streets,' she is wounded and the keepers of the wall take her veil.

And how is it that there is, within the poem itself, no movement towards a climax, no knot united or cut, no dénouement? Matters are as far advanced at 1^ 2 as at 3^.

Even during the period when the drama-theory was most vigorously maintained, some distinguished scholars held that Ca. is made up of a number of originally detached pieces, which were eventually brought together because they all treat of Love. Wetzstein's Die Syrische Dreischatel (1875) furnished a strong reinforcement of this opinion. He had observed, whilst resident in Syria, that the peasant bridegroom and bride are entitled king and queen for the first week of marriage; in contemporary Arabic epithalamium has since been cited (ZATW xxiv. p. 42) in which the man actually bears the name of the reigning Sultan, Abd Il-Hamid; these are attended by a vizier, have their throne on the threshing-floor, and receive the homage of the whole countryside. Songs and dances are executed by the friends of the bridegroom, the bystanders, and the newly married pair. Some of these ditties, especially those which enumerate the charms of the bride, are of exactly the same character as certain sections of Canticles, and 7^ corresponds precisely with the 'descrip-

In Ac 20:9 we read that Sopater, son of Pyrrhus (RV), of Eupatra, accompanied St. Paul on his journey toward Jerusalem as far as Asia (if these last words are part of the true text), i.e. Troas (see Scipios). The mention of the father's name, unusual in N.T., is thought by Blass to denote that Sopater was of noble birth; by Alford, to be intended to distinguish him from 2. A 'kinsman,' i.e. fellow-countryman [see Jason], of St. Paul, who sends greetings in Ro 16*. It seems unlikely, but not impossible, that these are the same person.

SOREK, VALLEY OF (perh. = valley of the soreq vulture, art. Vink). — The valley or wady in which Delilah lived (Jg 16:6). Enシーズ and Jerome connect the valley with Caphasar (or, Caspar; from the village of Capharsurek (or, Capharsorek), a village to the north of Heleotheropolis and near Sarra, that is, Zorah, the home of Samson's father). Caphasar is now Khurb el Surt, to the north of Wady es-Surur, which is identified with the valley of Sorek, and not far from Surfah. See also Zorah.

SOREL. — See Colours, 3.

SOSPATER. — See Sopater.

SOSTHENES. — 1. Ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, whom 'they all' (RV) laid hold on and beat with clubs. Gallo dismissed the case against St. Paul (Ac 18:16). He probably succeeded Crispus as ruler when the latter became a Christian (v. 7), and the hostility of the rabble to the Jews showed itself when they were wounded in the courts. 2. 'The brother' associated with St. Paul in addressing the Corinthians (1 Co 1:1), and therefore probably a native of Corinth who had special relations with the Church there. If both references are made to the same man, he must have been converted after the Gallo incident.

SOUL. — A family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2:41 — Neh 7:60).

SOU'TH. — The use of the term in the OT (Heb. nephesh) for any animated being, whether human or animal (Gn 1:27 'life,' 27*) must be distinguished from the Greek philosophical use for the immaterial substance which gives life to the body, and from the use in the NT (Gr. psyche) where more stress is laid on individuality (Mt 16:14 RV). As the Bible does not contain a scientific psychology, it is vain to dispute whether it teaches that man's nature is bipartite (body and soul or spirit) or tripartite (body and soul and spirit); yet a contrast between soul and spirit (Heb. ruach, Gr. pneuma) may be recognized, while the latter is the universal principle imparting life from the Creator, the former is the individual organism possessed of life in the creature (Gn 2* — 'breath of life' and 'living soul'). — In some passages the terms are used as equivalent (Is 26:4, Lk 16:19, Pr 1:17, Ps 116:8). In others a distinction is made (He 4:12, 1 Th 5:23). The distinction is this: 'soul' expresses man as apart from God, a separate individual: 'spirit' expresses man as drawing his life from God (cf. Jn 101, 'life' = 'soul,' and 195). This separation individuality may renounce its dependence and refuse its admission to God. Hence the adjective 'psychical' may be rendered sensual (Ja 3:14, Jude 18 [RV 'Or, natural. Or, animal'], or natural (1 Co 2:14 15); probably sensus in the two passages conveys a more moral meaning than the term 'psychical,' justifies, and natural is the better rendering, as expressing what belongs to the old regenerate, in life in contrast with the specific characteristic of the new life in Christ, the spiritual ('pneumatic'). A parallel change in the use of the term 'soul' and its corresponding adjective may be noted.

SPAIN. — The extent of country to which in NT times the name Spain, or more strictly 'the Spains,' was given, was practically identical with modern Spain. In the earliest times of which we have any knowledge it was inhabited, at least in part, by a race supposed to be a mixture of the aboriginal Iberian population with immigrant Celts. In b.c. 236, Hamilcar, father of the great Hannibal, invaded the country from Carthage, and after nine years of contest was succeeded by his son-in-law Hasdrubal, who in turn was succeeded by Hannibal, under whom about b.c. 219 the conquest of the country was practically completed. Hannibal paraded it as his base in the Second Punic War against Rome. The Romans first invaded Spain in 218, and after various successes and reverses constituted two provinces there in 197, known for centuries afterwards as Hispania Ulterior (Tarraconensis) and Hispania Ulterior (Brittica), separated from one another by the Ebro. The mountainous district of the NW. were not actually subdued till the time of the Emperor Augustus (b.c. 20). The country was valued for its agricultural produce, as its precious metals. It became the most thoroughly Romanized of all the Roman provinces, and in nothing is St. Paul's Roman attitude more evident than in his determination to proceed from Rome to Spain, rather than to Africa or to Gaul (Ro 15*). It is not known whether he carried out his plan. Spain claims more honoured names in Roman literature than any other country in the 1st cent. A.D., having been the birthplace of the two Senecas, Columella, Mela, Aelius Aristides, and Quintilian.

SPARRY (Iesprr, Ps 84:1027). The Heb. word is probably equivalent of Arab. 'asfar, and includes any 'tattering' birds generally termed or 'soul.' See Sow. In the NT references (Mt 10:19, RV 'chton') evidently refers to the sparrow, which to-day is sold for food as cheaply as in NT times.

SPECKLED BIRD. — Jer 12:11 (only). If the MT of this passage is correct, the tr. can hardly be other than 'is mine heritage unto me (i.e. to my sorrow [a dative etlicus, Cheyne, ad loc.]') (as) a speckled bird of prey? Are (the) birds of prey against her round about? (so, substantially, RV). The people of Israel is compared to a bird of prey, just as, on account of its hostility to Jehovah, it is compared in v. 8 to a lion. But, as a speckled bird attracts the hostile attention of other birds, Israel becomes a prey to the heathen. The rendering proposed by some, 'mine heritage is unto me the ravenous hyena,' cannot be obtained from the present text, which, however, is possibly incorrect.

(1 Ch 8:9), and in Hezekiah's treasure-house (2 K 20:19); they were used for anointing the dead (2 Ch 16:14), and also as perfumes for the living (Ca 4:18 etc.). 2. amomum, Ex 30:34 'sweet spices'; and, along with 'incense,' Ex 30:42, Lv 7:1, Nu 4:9 etc. In the first passage the 'sweet spices' are enumerated as stacte, ormyra, and galbanum (all of which see). 3. nēkōth, On 'spice-tree' (R V 'gum tragacanth or stony, 42' (R V 'spice-tree'). The gum tragacanth is the product of the Astragalus gummifer, of which several species are known in Syria. The storax (Styrax officinalis), a shrub with beautiful white flowers, also affords an aromatic gum valued by the ancients. Whether nēkōth corresponded definitely to one of these, or was a generic term for 'perfumes,' is an open question. 4. Gr. arōmata (Mk 16, R V 'spices') and anbmon (Rev 19:16, R Vm 'amomum,' R V 'spice,' AV 'anise') are probably both generic.

E. W. G. MASTERN. SPIDER.—1. ēmādāth; see LIZARD (7). 2. 'ākkābēsh (cf. Arab. 'ānkâbî) Job 8:4, Is 56:5. Both references are to the smallness of the spider's web.

E. W. G. MASTERN. SPIKENARD (někōth, Ca 19: 42; 44); also Gr. nardos pīstikē, Mk 14:10. The fragrant oil is derived from the wild plant, Nardostachys jatamansi, which grows with a 'spike.' The Arab name sunbul hindi, Indian spike, preserves the same idea. The perfume when pure was very expensive. (1 Co 13:12).

About the meaning of the Gr. epithet pīstikē there has been much speculation. See note in R Vm at Mk 14:10, and cf. art. 'Spikenard' in Hastings' DCG. E. W. MASTERN.

SPINDLE.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING, § 3.

SPINNING AND WEAVING.—1. The raw material.—In all periods of Hebrew history the chief textile materials were wool and flax, and to a less extent goats' hair. As for the last named, it will be remembered that Josiah was proud of being 'choosy to make no man' (2 Co 119) in virtue of his trade as a weaver of tent curtains (Ac 18:3), doubtless from the goats' hair (kārōm) for which his native province was famed. The preparation of the various materials for the loom differed according to the nature of each. Wool, before being spun, was thoroughly scoured and carded, probably, as now in the East, by means of a bow-string. In the case of flax, the stalks were ripped and exposed to the sun till thoroughly dry (Jos 29); thereafter by repeated processes of steeping, drying, and beating, the fibres were ready for the 'becking' or combing. Represen- tantative processes of these processes are recorded in the history of Egypt. Is 199 also refers to the flax industry on the banks of the Nile; the emended text runs: 'And confounded shall be the workers in linen; the combing women and weavers shall grow pale, and they that lay the warp shall be broken in spirit; (even) all that work for hire shall be grieved in soul.'

2. Spinning.—The spinning was done, as all the world over, by means of the distaff and spindle, and was pre-eminently women's work (Ex 35:1; 2 K 23, Pr 31:19). Both men and women, on the other hand, plied the loom. The distaff probably consisted, as elsewhere, of a piece of cane slit at the top to hold the wool. The distaff in Egypt wherever consists of a round shank of wood, 9–12 inches in length, finished with a hook at the top for catching the wool or flax, and having its lower end inserted into a circular or spherical whorl of clay, stone, or other heavy material, to steady the rotary motion of the spindle (See Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Ant. s. v. 'Fusus'; cf. 'Colus'). Many spindle-whorls have been found in the course of the explorations in Palestine (for illustrate see Bliss and Macalister, Excavations, etc., pl. xxxv. viii.; PEFSi 1603, 39; 1904, 324 and oft.). Sometimes a piece of broken pottery served as a whorl (id. 1902, 338). Distaff and spindle are named together in Pr 31:19, RV, however, rightly reversing the renderings of AV. In 2 S 3:9 for 'one that leaneth on a staff' recent scholars render 'one that holdeth a spindle,' expressive of the work that Joab's descendants may be womanish and effeminate.

3. The three varieties of loom.—'Loom' does not occur in AV; in RV it wrongly appears (Is 38:9) for 'thrum' (so R Vm). It is almost certain, however, that Delilah's loom is meant by the word rendered 'beam' in Jg 16(4). (2) Spindles and looms in one were in use round the Mediterranean in ancient times—the horizontal loom and two varieties of the upright loom, distinguished by the Romans as the tela pendula and the tela jugata.

(a) The horizontal loom is at least as old as the twelfth Egyptian dynasty, and probably goes back to pre-historic times. That the Hebrews were early familiar with it is evident from the incident of Samson and Delilah above referred to, the true interpretation of which will be given in a later section, 4 (c). It is still, with some modifications, the loom in use to-day from Morocco to the Ganges and the farther East.

(b) The oldest variety of the upright loom is that familiar to classical writers from the writers of the Hellenistic period, on a Greek, Vase, of Penelope's loom. It consisted of two uprights joined at the top by a cross-beam, from which, or from a second beam below it, depended the threads of the warp. These were kept taut by having small stone weights attached to their lower ends, hence the name tela pendula. In view of the numerous 'weavers' weights' recently unearthed at Gezer and elsewhere (Ilist. PEFSi 1903, 311., plate iv; cf. 1904, 324), it can no longer be doubted that this form of the upright loom was also in use in Palestine, even as far back as the later Stone Age (Vincent, Canone d'après l'exploration récente, 405).

(c) The second and later variety of the upright loom had for its distinguishing feature a second cross-beam at the foot of the uprights, which served as a web-beam, or as a cloth-beam, according as the web was at the top or at the bottom of the loom. By providing a third cross-beam capable of revolving, a web of much greater length could be woven than if the latter were confined to the height of the loom. The loom in ordinary use in NT times was of this type, as is evident from many passages in the Mishna.

4. Of references to the processes of weaving.—In its simplest form the art of weaving consists in interlacing a series of parallel threads, called the warp, with another set, called the weft; in such a way that the threads of the web pass alternately over and under each thread of the warp. In the beginnings of the art this interlacing was laboriously done by the fingers of the weaver, or by means of a loom, with which weaving was only a more complicated variety. Now the first process is to stretch the threads of the warp (Lv 12:2); even between the upper and lower beams of the loom. This process of warping is mentioned in the literal sense only, Is 190 (§1), but is elsewhere used in a metaphorical sense, as Job 104 (RV 'knit together'), Ps 120:9 R Vm, and the difficult passage Is 30:1. Of the four alternatives here given by the R Vm the only admissible rendering is the first of R Vm 'weave a web' or, still better, 'warp a web,' an apposite figure for commencing a new work of political intrigue (cf. the similar metaphor 599). The Heb. forbade the use of wool and linen, the one as warp, the other as weft, in the same web.

In the process of uniting warp and weft there are the 'three primary movements,' as they are called, to be considered. These are (1) shedding, i.e. dividing the warp into two sets of odd and even threads for the passage of the weft; (2) passing the weft through the 'shed' by means of a rod or a shuttle; and (3) beating up the weft to form with the warp a web of uniform consistency. These three processes, so far as applicable to the Egyptian and Hebrew looms, are the subject of a special study by the present writer in the article 'Weaving' in EBI iv. 5282-87 (with illustr.), to which the curious student is referred. It must suffice here to mention only the most of the details of the technique. It is based on certain OT references, most of them misunderstood hitherto.

(a) The formation of the shed was effected by at least two leach-rods or shafts, the Roman licatoria, suspended from the upper cross-beam (see illust.); the use of loops or leashes was with the odd and even warp threads respectively. The two sets of threads were alternately raised forward or raised in the horizontal loom by pulling the leach-rods, thus forming a shed for the passage of the shuttle-rod carrying the weft. Now, with a heavy warp, the rods must have been of considerable thickness—a stout branch of a tree serves as a leach-rod, for example, in a modern Anatolian loom figured in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant., ii. 179. Accordingly, when the shaft of Goliath's spear is compared to a weaver's mānīr (1 S 17; 2 S 21), it is not to either of the 'beams' of the loom but to a 'weaver's shaft' or leach-rod that the comparison applies. The phrase 'the beam of the loom' is another term for the leach-rod (cf. Jerome's true rendering, quas licatoriorum extenticum).

(b) The weft or woof (Lv 13:114) was passed through the shed by means of a staff or rod on which the yarn wound. Homer, however, was already familiar with a shuttle-rod at one end of which was a revolving spool from which the weft-thread unrolled itself in its passage. It is uncertain whether Job 7:5, the only EV occurrence of shuttle, refers to a shuttle-rod, or to the loom as a whole.

(c) The weft was beat up at each passage of the shuttle-rod by a thin lathe or batten, or, as later, by a special comb.

In Egypt, however, under the Middle Empire, it would appear that the more efficient 'reed,' still used in modern weaving, had already been invented for this purpose (Garstang, Burial Customs of Anc. Egypt, 1907), 133 ff. with illust.) the two reeds thus figured are 27 and 29 inches in length, showing approximately the width of the web. The Bedouin, women of Moab to-day weave their tent curtains in strips about 5 yards long and from 16 to 20 inches wide, according to Jaussen (Costumes des Arabes, etc. [1899], 159). The Hebrews in early times used a batten simply to beat up the weft within, as we learn from the true text of Jg 16:15, which is: 'If thou wovest the seven plaits of his head with the warp and beatest them up with the batten, then shall I become weak and be as other men; and she made him sleep, and wove the seven plaits of his head with the warp, and beat them up with the batten (EV, 'pin'), and said (as in EV . . . and he awoke out of his sleep, and pulled up the loom towards with the warp); Dellaith, seated on the ground beside her horizontal loom with Samson's head upon her knees (v. 19), it was an easy matter to use his flowing locks as weft and weave them into the warp of her loom. When Samson awoke he pulled up the loom, which was fastened to the ground with pegs.

With Penelope's type of loom, the web could be woven only from the top downwards. This was also the Jewish custom in NT times with the other form of upright loom. Our Lord's tunic, it will be remembered, was 'without seam, woven from the top throughout' (Jn 19:23). For the weaving of such seamless robes, which were in every use in Egypt under the later dynasties, at least, it was necessary to mount a double warp and to weave each face of the warp with a continuous weft (EB iv. 5299).

6. When the web was finished, the weaver cut the ends of the warp threads, those left hanging being the thrum of 1 S 9:38 RVm, and rolled up the web. These two processes are the source of the figures for premature death in the OT passage Jb 1:17. The 'new' cloth of Mk 2:21 EV was unfurled (RV 'undressed'), that is, cloth fresh from the loom. The milling or fulling was the work of the fuller (Arts and Crafts, § 6).

6. Special kinds of fabrics.—By appropriate arrangement of the warp, woof, and leach-rods, striped, checked, connected by loops or leashes with each of the odd and even warp threads respectively. The two sets of threads were alternately raised forward or raised in the horizontal loom by pulling the leach-rods, thus forming a shed for the passage of the shuttle-rod carrying the weft. Now, with a heavy warp, the rods must have been of considerable thickness—a stout branch of a tree serves as a leach-rod, for example, in a modern Anatolian loom figured in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant., ii. 179. Accordingly, when the shaft of Goliath's spear is compared to a weaver's mānīr (1 S 17; 2 S 21; 1 Ch 20; cf. 118), it is not to either of the 'beams' of the loom but to a 'weaver's shaft' or leach-rod that the comparison applies. The phrase 'the beam of the loom' is another term for the leach-rod (cf. Jerome's true rendering, quas licatoriorum extenticum).

(b) The weft or woof (Lv 13:114) was passed through the shed by means of a staff or rod on which the yarn wound. Homer, however, was already familiar with a shuttle-rod at one end of which was a revolving spool from which the weft-thread unrolled itself in its passage. It is uncertain whether Job 7:5, the only EV occurrence of shuttle, refers to a shuttle-rod, or to the loom as a whole.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS

usually stands alone, but in Ro 1st it is coupled with the adjective pneumatikon (‘spiritual’). It means concrete manifestations of the grace of God (charisma) and is almost a technical term, though in Ro 6th etc. It is used generally of the gift of God, without reference to its visible result in the life of the believer. The principal passages which deal with spiritual gifts are Ro 12th, 1 Co 12, 13, 14, Eph 4th, 1 P 4th. The gifts may be divided into the miraculous and the non-miraculous. (a) The miraculous include speaking with tongues (probably ecstatic utterances, usually unintelligible to the speaker; see Tongues [Gnt or]), and their interpretation; gifts of healing, and the working of miracles or ‘powers’; of these we may instance the power of exorcism (Mt 161, Ac 16th 19th), and the punishment of offenders (Ac 5th 1, 2 Co 4th 5th). On the border-line come prophecy, discerning of spirits, and the receiving of revelations, where the miraculous element is less strongly marked. (b) From these we pass to the non-miraculous gifts, gifts of character, and mental and spiritual endowments of various kinds. We find mentioned the power of exhortation and of speech (closely akin to prophecy); wisdom, knowledge, and faith; helps and governments (i.e., powers of administration); mercy and almsgiving; money, as affording opportunity for service and hospitality; faith, which adds the gift of faith in Christ’s presence, and Gal 3th gives a list of the fruits of the Spirit, as shown in the Christian character. Ro 12th and 1 P 4th mention only non-miraculous gifts, and in the Eph. the chief evidence for the miraculous is connected with Corinth.

2. Their nature.—Most of these gifts may be regarded as the raising of natural endowments to a higher level. Without going at length into the question of miracles, we may note that the evidence of their reality in this connection is very strong; they are referred to in the Epistles (contemporary documents) as matters of common knowledge; St. Paul speaks of his own powers in this as well known (1 Co 2th 14th, 2 Co 12th); and he 2nd mentions them as a recognised characteristic of the first age of Christianity. Further, these miraculous gifts of the Spirit belong to the class which may most easily be reduced to psychological law, and are to some extent paralleled in modern times, being mainly the well-situated manifestations which accompany times of revival, and are found in connexion with peculiarly gifted individuals.

What we read about miracles—especially about the charismata—in the Epistles of St. Paul is of the nature of things unusual, obedient to laws that are somewhat recondite, distinctly implying Divine impulse and Divine guidance, and yet contra naturam (compare 1 Co 14). It is, indeed, the remarkable how contra naturam which concentrates attention on the inner and less startling gifts of character, which the popular mind would ignore; and if it does not disparage, it certainly does not exalt, those which at first sight seem the most direct evidence of the presence of the Spirit. As a fact of history these tended to degenerate and finally to disappear. Justin and Irenaeus mention them, and they played a large part in the Gnostic and Montanist movements, but after the 2nd cent. they practically died out as normal endowments of the believer, to be revived only sporadically in times of religious excitement.

3. Hence the tone of St. Paul’s teaching as to their use.

(a) He insists on their regulation. The gifts may be sporadic and intermittent; none the less their use must be orderly (1 Co 14th); ecstasy is no excuse for loss of self-control (v. 18). Each Christian must recognize the limitations of his powers and not attempt to transcend them (Ro 12th).

There arises the question of the relation of the charismata to the ministry. Some have maintained that there was originally no fixed ministry, but only unorganized charismata; others again have tried to assign the specific office of the charismata. The former view would seem to be that the charismata and the official ministry existed side by side, but were by no means identical (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 438). All Christians have their share in the gifts of the Spirit, though there were special endowments which would be looked for in the case of officers of the Church; see Tl 14th, 2 Tl 11th a charisma is connected with ‘the laying-on of hands.’

(b) The purpose of the gifts is the edification and the service of the whole body. Chrysostom, in his remarkable homily on 1 Co 12, calls attention to the change of word in vv. 4. The gifts are also ‘ministrations’ (diakonias), i.e., opportunities of service; hence the greater the gift the greater the responsibility, and the harder the work to be done. And so St. Paul passes on to show how the doctrine of the body is served in different ways by all its members. Similarly in Eph 4th the possessives of the endowments are themselves gifts ‘given’ to the Church. The same truth is emphasized in Ro 12, 1 Co 14, 1 P 4; in fact in every place where the charismata are mentioned at any length; St. Paul’s own object is always to ‘impair’ to others (Ro 11th, 1 Co 14th; cf. Jn 7th). It is obvious that this way of looking at the gifts would check ambition, pride, and selfishness in their use.

(c) Relative importance of the gifts. The more startling and apparently miraculous gifts are consistently treated as subordinate to gifts of character and edification. The former, indeed, are not decisive as to their origin; they are not peculiar to Christianity, and may be the accompaniment of evil and falsehood (Mt 7th 24th, 2 Th 2th, 1 Co 12th, Rev 13th 14th). Indeed, in an age when exorcisms and miracles were associated with magic, and the heathen mantis, or frenzied prophet, was a familiar phenomenon, it was impossible to ascribe all ‘powers’ and ecstasy to the Holy Spirit. The test is on the one side doctrinal (1 Co 12th 4th, 1 Jn 4th 4th); on the other the moral life (Mt 7th 24th, Ro 8th, 1 Co 13th) and the practical tendency to edification (1 Co 14). The ‘discerning of spirits’ is itself an important gift (1 Co 12th 1th 5th, Eph 4th 4th). It is, indeed, remarkable how contra naturam concentrates attention on the inner and less startling gifts of character, which the popular mind would ignore; and if it does not disparage, it certainly does not exalt, those which at first sight seem the most direct evidence of the presence of the Spirit. As a fact of history these tended to degenerate and finally to disappear. Justin and Irenaeus mention them, and they played a large part in the Gnostic and Montanist movements, but after the 2nd cent. they practically died out as normal endowments of the believer, to be revived only sporadically in times of religious excitement.

STACTE (nattaph, Ex 30th [cf. Sh 24th]).—It, 'dron,' They would be the stars which the magi hoped to meet and with which they sought to correspond. There was, however, a good deal of uncertainty and doubt among the magi about the appearance of the star, and this uncertainty is reflected in the way in which they described the star. At the time of the star's appearance, there was a great deal of activity and excitement in the heavens, as the stars were moving in different directions and their relative positions were changing. The magi were familiar with the stars and their movements, but they were also aware of the uncertainties and limitations of their knowledge. They knew that the stars were not always visible, and that their movements were not always predictable. They knew that the stars could be obscured by clouds, and that their brightness could be affected by the atmosphere. They knew that the stars were not always visible at night, and that their appearance could be influenced by the time of year and the time of day. They knew that the stars could be seen in the daytime, and that their brightness could be affected by the Sun. was born. If some such brilliant star appeared, this would be taken as portending that the moment for the appearance of such an one had arrived, and search would be made for the Great One. So, in the Apocalypse (Rev 22:6), our Lord is represented as claiming for Himself that He is not only 'the root and the offspring of David,' but also 'the bright, the morning star.'

STATE OF THE DEAD.—See Eschatology, Paradesiasts, Eternity.

STATE.—See Money, § 7.

STRAILING.—See Cribe, § 6 'Theft.'

STEEL.—See Mining and Metals.

STEPHANAS.—A Corinthian, apparently of some importance, whose household were baptized by St. Paul personally (1 Co 1:10), and are called 'the first-fruits of Achaia' (165). Stephanas himself had joined the Apostle at Ephesus when he wrote, and was of great assistance to him there.

STEPHEN.—Early in the history of the Christian Church it was found necessary for the Apostles to devote some of their duties on others. There is no reason for supposing (with Prof. Ramsay) that presbyters had yet existed, though they soon followed, in Ac 6 seven persons, commonly (but not in NT) called 'deacons,' all but one probably Hellenistic or Greek-speaking Jews (see art. Nicolas), were appointed to the care of the poor, and the distribution of alms to the Hebrew widows. Of the Seven, Stephen was the most prominent. Their duties were not ecleemosynary only; Stephen at once undertook evangelistic work and preached successively many, and working miracles. His success resulted in the first persecution of the Church, and false witnesses were brought who accused him of blasphemy, and of speaking against the Temple and the Law. He made a long defence (Ac 7:2-53), which is not easy of interpretation. He summarizes OT history from the call of Abraham to the building of Solomon's Temple (cf. St. Paul's sermon in Ac 13), in a manner which shows that he depended partly on tradition, for there are many discrepancies between his speech and OT. He speaks with great respect of the Mosaic Law (vv. 28-36, 38). Some think that he disparages the Temple as having been built against God's will (v. 48). But this is very improbable.
Perhaps the defence was not completed; yet what was delivered gives it a drift. The Jews had misunderstood their own Law. God had not confined His presence to the Temple, and the Temple; He had appeared to Abraham and others before the Law was given; Isaiah (66v1) had preached that God's worship was not confined to one place. But the people had persecuted the prophets as they now had killed Jesus. This defence provoked the Jews so much that they cast Stephen out of the city and stoned him—undoubtedly an illegal murder, not sanctioned by the Roman law. Stephen, whose dying prayer for his murderers (v. 59) recalls that of His Master, thus became the first Christian martyr. His death led to a persecution, and to a dispersal of the disciples from Jerusalem. This caused the spread of the gospel to many lands. But the most prominent fruit of the martyrdom, without doubt, was the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, who was present (7th 8th), and of whom, as is generally acknowledged, Stephen was in his preaching the forerunner.

STEWARDS.—This term is found six times in AV of O.T., and once in LXX, and applied to Eliazer in Gn 15, where R.V. rightly tr. 'he that shall be possessor of my house.'
In Gn 43v4-4-4 Joseph's 'steward' (AV and RV) is lit. 'he who was over his house' (cf. 43v8, 1 K 18v8 in R.V.). In 1 Ch 23v AV 'stewards' is tr. of Heb. servam (lit.
'princes,' RV 'rulers'). For the 'steward' of Dn 11v18 (RV), see Melkar.

The NT terms are (1) epistrefos, 'steward' in Mt 20v
Lk 8v; also translated in Gal 4v AV 'tutor'; RV
'guardian.' (2) oikonomos, the usual term, found both literally and metaphorically, as is also the cognate noun oikonomia, 'stewardship.' The latter is used literally in Lk 16v4-5, and metaphorically in 1 Co 4v9, Eph 3v1, 5
Ti 1v in last three 'dispensation,' RV 'guardianship.'

W. F. BOYD.

STOICS.—When St. Paul met representatives of the Stoic philosophy at Athens (Ac 17v), that school had been in existence for about three centuries, and had Gn of
as a forerunner.
The leading Stoic maxim is, 'Live according to nature.' Nature both in the world and in man is to be interpreted by its highest manifestation—Reason—which appears in the world as the all-pervading etheal essence or spirit, forming and animating the whole; and in man as the soul. This World-spirit occupies the place of God in the Stoic system. Thus we find St.
Paul quoting the words of a Stoic writer, 'We are also his offspring' (Ac 17v). The approximation, however, it is in language rather than in reality. The systems of the Stoics is pure pantheism. Their so-called God has no independent or personal existence.

The supremacy of reason in man is pushed to such an extreme as to virtually demand that the entire suppression of the emotional side of man's nature.
This rigorous moral standard became, for practical reasons, considerably modified; but Stoic morality was always marked by its rigidity and coldness.

The great quality of Stoicism, which set it above Epicureanism, and brought it into line with Christianity, was its moral earnestness. In his dissertation on 'St. Paul and Seneca.' Bp. Tense (St. Paul's letters, read by him, 1712), he employed a translation of the English, which was the only philosophy which could ever pretend to rival Christianity in the earlier ages of the Church.' Perhaps there was in St. Paul's mind at Athens the high hope of bringing to the side of Christ such a noble rival of the gospel. Yet Stoicism and Christianity ran parallel rather than came into contact with one another, until the weakness inherent in its theology and its ethics the current of Stoic philosophy was disnipated and lost.

W. M. M'DONALD.

STOMACH.—This English word occurs in 2 Mac 7v with the meaning of 'courage,' 'Stirring up her womanish thoughts with a manly stomach.'

STOMACHER is the AV tr. of philekhth, whose meaning is very uncertain. The Eng. word 'stomacher' was applied to that part of a woman's dress which covered the breast and the pit of the stomach. It was usually much ornamented, and was looked upon as an evidence of wealth.

STONE.—I. In OT.—1. Several different words are rendered 'stone,' but the one of by far the most frequent occurrence is 'eben,' which has the same wide range of application as its English equivalent. Palestine is a stone country, and the uses to which stone was put were numerous and varied. In its natural state a stone served as a pillow (Gn 28v4) or a seat (Ex 17v12), for covering the mouth of a well (Gn 20v4) or closing the entrance to a cave (Jos 18v27, etc.). Out of it, again, might be constructed a knife (Ex 4v, Heb.
tsr. RV 'flint'), a vessel (17v1; cf. In 29, a mill (Dt 24v).
Above all, stone was employed in architecture. Houses (Ev 14v4 etc.), walls (Neh 4v, Hab 2v), towers (by implication in Gn 11v), and especially the Temple (1 K 27v etc.), are referred to as built of stone.
We read of foundation-stones (1 K 5v7), of a corner-stone (1s 119v), of a head-stone or finial (24c 47); and in 1 K 19v mention is made of a pavement of stone.
Masonry was a regular trade (2 S 5v etc.), and stone-building is frequently referred to (2 K 12v etc.). Belongning to the aesthetic and luxurious side of life are precious

STONE-SQUARERS. — Only 1 K 5th AV; RV has Gebalites as Jos 13th RV, that is, men of the Phoenician city of Gebal, mentioned Ezk 27, where the ancients and wise men of Gebal are referred to as calkers of ships. Ezk has recently been suggested that the gentile name had become an appellative in the sense of 'stonecutter' (G SOT, 'Kings,' 83 I), which is meaning of AV. Others would emend to read 'did hew them and border them,' i.e. provide the stones with marginal drabs or with bevels. Cf. ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

STORM.—See GALILEE [SEA OF], 3; WHIRLWIND.

STORY (EV for 'storey').—See HOUSES, § 5.

STRAIGHT.—This Eng. word is used in AV in the literal sense of 'narrow,' and in the figurative sense of 'strict' (of which it is simply another form). Once the verb 'straight' occurs, Sus 22 'I am straitened on every side.'

STRANGE FIRE.—See NAZAR.

STRANGER.—This seems, on the whole, the most suitable English word by which to render the Heb. zr, which is a participle denoting primarily the one who turns aside, one who goes out of the way, i.e. for the purpose of visiting or dwelling in another country. It has frequently the meaning foreigner, in contrast to 'Israelite,' especially with the added notion of hostility (cf. 'estranged'), and in particular, the word zr is used of a Levite (see Nu 116), or to a priest proper, or Aaronite (see Ex 20ff, 30ff, Nu 31ff, 17ff, Lv 22ff, 1st. (H)).

The 'strange woman' of Pr 30ff etc. has the same technical sense as 'foreign woman' with which it stands in parallelism, viz. harlot.

Sojourner (sometimes tr. of Hebsh, 'settler' [see below]) is allowed to be participated in the three great annual feasts (Dt 16ff; cf. 24ff and Ex 23ff), and is not, however, compelled, though allowed, to follow his protector's religion (Dt 14ff, 1 K 17). That he occupies a status inferior to that of the born Israelite is indicated by the fact that he is classed with the widows and orphans as needing special consideration (10ff 14ff, 29ff, 15), and that the right of intermarriage is denied him (7ff, 230). When, however, we come to P and to other parts of the OT which belong to the historical religion, we find the 'sojourner' almost on an equal footing with the native Israelite,—he is fast becoming, and is almost become, the proselyte of NT and Rabbinic times. His position has now religious rather than political significance. He is kept to expect the Sebabath and to observe the Day of Atonement, as well as the three great feasts (Lv 16:14). He is to eat unleavened bread during Passover week (Ex 12:18; Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread are now blended), and, if circumcised (not otherwise), to keep the Passover itself. But the gr is not even yet the full equal of the Israelite; for he is not compelled to be circumcised, and no one can belong to the congregation with that rite (Ex 12:14). Neh 9:4, however, he has not yet received the right of intermarriage (Gn 34:31), and is prohibited from keeping Jewish slaves (Lv 25:48).

The doing of the ranks of Judaism, helped by the Exile, by the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, by the Samaritan schism, and consummated by the Maccabean wars, led to the complete absorption of the 'sojourner.' The word proselytoos (representing the Heb. gr), common in classical Greek for one who has come to a place (Lat. advena), acquired in Hellenistic Greek the meaning which we meet us often in the NT (Mt 23:26, Ac 26:18). See PROBELYR.

The indiscriminate use of 'stranger' with the meaning of 'sojourner,' and of 'alien' and 'foreigner' is very confusing. 'Foreigner' is the proper rendering of Heb. ngr. The Heb. ngr (lit. 'dweller') is a post-exilic substitute for gr (or 'sojourner') in the original misleading sense of the latter. For the sake of distinction it might be uniformly rendered 'setter' (EV 'sojourner,' 'stranger,' 'foreigner'). See, for the relations of Israel to foreigners proper, art. NATIONS.

T. WITTEN DAVIES.

STRANGLING.—This is suggested as a mode of death, Job 7:24. The cognate verb describes the manner of Ahithophel's self-inflicted death (1Ch 20:14, EV 'hanged himself'; cf. Mt 27:5 of Judas). The idea conveyed is death by suffocation, not necessarily produced by suspension. Elsewhere, where hanging is mentioned in EV as a mode of punishment, some form of impalement is intended (see CHAMBERS AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10).

In the pastoral letter sent down by the Council of Jerusalem to the early converts from heathenism, these are instructed to abstain from 'things from blood, and from things strangled' (Ac 15:29, cf. v. 20). Both belong to the category of Jewish food taboos (Foou, § 10). The former refers to the former against eating meat which had not been thoroughly drained of the blood, the second to the similar taboo affecting the flesh of animals not slaughtered according to the very minute Rabbinical rules then in force. Thus in the Talmudic treatise Chullin, specially devoted to this subject, it is laid down (1. 2) that 'any one may slaughter . . . with any instrument except a harvest-sickle, a saw, etc., because these strangle,' in other words, they do not make the clean incision required for proper slaughter. 'What is strangled' (Ac 15:29) EV 'bled meat' is thus seen to be a current technical term of the Jewish ngral or ritual of slaughter. In modern phrase the Gentile converts were to eat only kosher meat.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

STRAY, STUBBLE.—In Heb. the former is tehen, the latter qash, and to Western ideas the one is as much 'stray' as the other. The distinction between the two is as follows: 'tehen, the modern tesh, is the mixture of straw and chaff, produced by the state of the threshing-drum and winnowed out by the fan (AGRICULTURE, § 3), as distinguished from the grains of wheat (so Jer 23:13 where 'straw' RV, and 'chaff' AV are both inadequate). It is mentioned as the food of horses, asses, and camels. In reaping, as is still the custom, the stalks were cut knee-high or over; the length of stalk left standing is qash. Accordingly, when the Hebrews in Egypt 'gathered stubble for straw' (Ex 5:1), what they did was to pull up the stalks of wheat left standing in the fields and cut them up into short pieces suitable for brick-making, instead of being allowed to procure the film ready to their hand from the local threshing-floors. Since the wheat-stalks were usually burned as manure, 'stubble' is frequently found in metaphors suggested by this practice (Is 5:1 47:14 etc.). In other passages containing references explicat or implied from these stumbul (41:10), the smaller fragments of chopped straw which the wind blew away from the threshing-floor may be intended.

STUMB'LING-BLOCK (Gr. skandalon; AV 'offence,' 'occasion to fall,' 'stumbling-block'; RV 'stumbling-block,' 'thing that causes stumbling,' 'occasion of stumbling').—Property the source of a spring of trouble to one who has fallen into it, something that ensnares or trips up. The verb is skandalizōin; AV 'offend,' RV 'cause to stumble.'

SUKKOT.—A place first mentioned in Gn 33:17, where it is said to have been so called because Jacob, on his return from Haran to Canaan, halting at it after his wrestling with the angel at Peniel, built there 'booths' (Heb. sukkoth) for his cattle. Gideon also, after crossing the Jordan in his pursuit of the Midianites passed Succoth, and afterwards went up to Peniel (Jg 8:9). The name has not been preserved; and the site is thus matter of conjecture. From the passages quoted and other notices it is clear that it was E. of the Jordan; and it may further be inferred that, while Peniel was close to the Jabbok (Gn 32:23), on higher ground than Succoth, and to the E. or S.E. (Jg 8:9, cf. v. 12), Succoth was on the road from the Joktan to Bochim, which would pass most naturally over the fold ed-Dāmiyeh (a little S. of the point at which the Joktan enters the Jordan), in the territory of Gad, in a 'vale' of...
SUCCOOTH

(Jos 137, Fs 609).—presumably, therefore, in that part of the Jordan valley through which the Jabbok flows into the Jordan, and which is very fertile. Jacob came from Mizpah (see No. 1 in art. s.v.), which is most naturally to be sought somewhere on the N. or N.E. of the Jebel ‘Ajlun; and any one journeying thence to the ford ed-Damieh would naturally descend as soon as possible into the Ghôr (or Jordan valley), and join the track which passes along it from N. to S. The rest of Jacob’s route would be consistent and intelligible, if Mahanaim (his last halting-place before Penuel, Gn 3217) were (say) at Deir ‘Allâ, 4 miles N. of the ford by which the track down the Ghôr crosses the Jabbok, Penuel near where the same track crosses the route from es-Salt to ed-Damieh (see the map), and Suctooth on one of the lower terraces of the Jordan valley (which here sinks from 900 ft. to 1000 ft.), W. of the point just suggested for Penuel, S. of the Jabbok, and in the territory of Gad (Jos 137). Whether towns actually stood at or near the sites thus indicated can, of course, be determined only by excavation.

Succoth is said in the Talmud to have been called in later times Tar’alah or Dar’alah; and it is thus often been identified with Deir ‘Allâ mentioned above. But it is very doubtful whether Deir ‘Allâ has any connection with this Talmudic, and with the name of Arab and Arabic word (in common in names of places) meaning ‘monastery,’ which there is no reason whatever for seeing in the Tar or Dar (without the yod) of the Talmudic name. Nor does the geographical position of Deir ‘Allâ seem to agree with the narrative of either Jacob or Gideon. See, farther, Driver in EzEv xil. (1903), p. 457 ft., more briefly in Gen. p. 300 ft. S. R. Driver.

SUCCOOTH (meaning in Heb. ‘booths’).—The name of the first encampment in the Exodus, which started from Rameses (Ex 127 129, Nu 3339). It is probably the Egyptian Thuka, the same as or near to Pithom (wh. see), capital of the 8th nome, and situated in the W. of the Delta. F. L. Griffith.

SUCCOOTH-BENOTH (2 K 1721).—A deity whose image was made and set up in Samaria by the colonists from Babylon. ‘Benoth’ (LXX Banith) suggests ‘Banitu’ as it appears in the name Zurpanitu—in the inscriptions Zer-banitu—the wife of Marduk, patron god of Babylon. But there is no certainty. Sayce (in Hastings’ DB) suggests that ‘Succoth’ may denote the ‘processional shrines’ in which the images were carried. ‘Benoth’ being corrupted from Belit or Belet, the classical Belith, a common title and synonym of Zer-banitu.

SUD.—The name of a river or canal of Babylon named in Bar 14. This name has not yet been found in the literature of Babylonia, and it seems probable that there is a mistake in the text, the true reading being Sur. A Babylonian text mentions a river or canal in the neighbourhood of Babylon called Nûr Sûru, and this may be the stream intended. Its position is unknown.

SUKKIM.—The name of a tribe led by Shilshah against Judaea (2 Ch 129). The identification of the Sukkim with the inhabitants of Shakin is very uncertain.

SUMER, SUMERIANS.—See p. 68.

SUN.—The first mention of the sun in the Bible is in Gn 14, as ‘the greater light to rule the day.’ It was looked upon as the greatest and most important of the heavenly bodies, and motion was attributed to it, as is still done in ordinary parlance. We read of the going down of the sun, and of its rising: of the increasing force of its heat as the day went on (Ex 169), of its influence in the production of the crops of the ground (‘the precious things of the fruits of the sun,’ Dt 343). The sun ‘sinks’ (i.e. sets) forth in his course (Jev 18), and the situation of a place is spoken of as ‘toward the SUPH.—A place-name in Dt 11 ‘In the Arabah over against Suph;’ AV reads ‘over against the Red Sea,’ in which case it has been assumed that the word for ‘sea’ had fallen out in the received Hebrew text. Suph means ‘wells,’ and the ‘Sea of Weeds’ was the St, stis, should be tr. as in RV (Is 589, Jer 89). ‘swallow’ instead of ‘crane’ (AV). See crane. Some swallow species of swallows or swifts or martins are common in the Holy Land.

SYNAX.—See Synax.

SYMBOL.——The prevalence of figurative language in the Bible is due partly to the antiquity and Oriental origin of the book and to the fact that its subject, religion, deals with the most difficult problems of life and the deepest emotions of the soul. The English word ‘type,’ as the equivalent of ‘symbol’ or ‘emblem,’ is sometimes confusing, as it has been used both for the fulfillment of the prototype and as that which points forward to the antitype. Like the proverb and parable, the symbol implies a connection between two things of which one is concrete and physical, the other abstract and referring to intellectual, moral, and spiritual matters. The former, of course, is the symbol.

SYMBOLS OF SIMILARITY.—Here the connecting principle is one of recognized likeness between the material object and its counterpart. Thus ‘a watered garden’ is made the emblem of a satisfied soul (Jer 51:18). The similarity is that of supplied wants. In the same way the white garments of the priests and of the redeemed were emblematic of holiness (Ex 39:27-31, Rev 19). Marriage, as an Oriental relationship of purchased possession, was an emblem of Palestine in covenanted with God, and of the Church as the bride of Christ. Thus also the Christian life was a element of similarity entered into the dream-visions recorded in the Bible and into the symbolism of prophetic warnings (Is 52:11; Jer 49:5, Ezk 37:10). In the Epistles we find a rich variety of emblems created with the desire to interpret the Person and mission of Christ, and the relationship of the Christian believer to Him. The writers, being of Jewish origin and addressing community, chose (suffering of Christ, and awaiting the consummation of the Messiah's work) a language with much original symbolism familiar, but not only to the parties themselves, the Jews and Gentiles. Of the symbolical language of the New Testament, some 50 times in the Gospels and Acts, certain symbols are employed, others are not. Hence in NT a double meaning is possible, for its symbolical language is often used in a double sense: (1) in the sense of a community organized for religious purposes, as Ac 6:9 (cf. Rev 6:9 'the symbol of the seven stars'); and (2) to the present day, the symbolism of the Christian symbols of baptism and sacrifice remains active, and is often met with in the language of the Christian. Thus baptism is used symbolically of the Christian's death and resurrection, while the cross and the symbols of the Passion (such as the palm branch, the sponge, the nail, the rope, the spear, the wine, etc.) have remained as the symbols of Christian worship—so some 50 times in the Gospels and Acts from Mt 4th onwards. The strict Heb. equivalent in the latter sense is 'the house of assembly.' Of other names for the synagogues as a place of worship may be mentioned the only term prosesach (Ac 16th RV 'place of worship'; Jos. Life, § 54, of the synagogue of Tiberias).

SYNAGOGUE.—1. Meaning and history.—Like its original synagogue (Heb. a gathering, assembly—for its etymology see O.T. above), 'synagogue' in LXX, 'synagogos' in NT, is a common Jewish word in the New Testament to denote the building in which the Jewish, or Gentile, converts for worship—so some 50 times in the Gospels and Acts from Mt 4th onwards. The strict Heb. equivalent in the latter sense is 'the house of assembly.' Of other names for the synagogues as a place of worship may be mentioned the original term prosesach (Ac 16th RV 'place of worship'); Jos. Life, § 54, of the synagogue of Tiberias.

The origin of the synagogue as a characteristic institution of Judaism is hidden in obscurity. Most probably it took its rise in the circumstances of the Hebrew exiles in Babylonia. Hitherto worship had practically meant sacrifice, but sacrifice was now inadmissible in a land unclean, and the law of God was left to the exiles, however, the living the word of the prophet, and the writings of God's interpreters from a former age. In those gatherings in the house of Ezekiel on which we read (Ezk 9:20, etc.), it is likely that the forms of the future synagogue. We are on the solid ground when we reach the religious reform of Ezra and Nehemiah (n.c. 444-443). With the introduction of the 'Law of Moses' as the norm of faith and life, the need for systematic instruction in its observance was felt, and the requirements of this new order of worship was to be seen in the synagogues of the future. From this period, more precisely from the reign of Artaxerxes iii. Ochus (358-337), may be dated the mention of the synagogue in O.T. viz. Ps 74:1, 'they have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.' The papyri finds of recent years have contained several references to the synagogues of the Jewish communities in Egypt, from the time of the third century. In the synagogues of the Roman era, the rabbis of the Talmud, as well as the rabbis of the Talmud, have been identified with the religious instruction in the synagogues of the period. In the synagogues of the Roman era, the rabbis of the Talmud, as well as the rabbis of the Talmud, have been identified with the religious instruction in the synagogues of the period.

SYNAGOGUE.—1. Meaning and history.—Like its original synagogue (Heb. a gathering, assembly—for its etymology see O.T. above), 'synagogue' in LXX, 'synagogos' in NT, is a common Jewish word in the New Testament to denote the building in which the Jewish, or Gentile, converts for worship—so some 50 times in the Gospels and Acts from Mt 4th onwards. The strict Heb. equivalent in the latter sense is 'the house of assembly.' Of other names for the synagogues as a place of worship may be mentioned the original term prosesach (Ac 16th RV 'place of worship'); Jos. Life, § 54, of the synagogue of Tiberias.

The origin of the synagogue as a characteristic institution of Judaism is hidden in obscurity. Most probably it took its rise in the circumstances of the Hebrew exiles in Babylonia. Hitherto worship had practically meant sacrifice, but sacrifice was now inadmissible in a land unclean, and the law of God was still left to the exiles, however, the living the word of the prophet, and the writings of God's interpreters from a former age. In those gatherings in the house of Ezekiel on which we read (Ezk 9:20, etc.), it is likely that the forms of the future synagogue. We are on the solid ground when we reach the religious reform of Ezra and Nehemiah (n.c. 444-443). With the introduction of the 'Law of Moses' as the norm of faith and life, the need for systematic instruction in its observance was felt, and the requirements of this new order of worship was to be seen in the synagogues of the future. From this period, more precisely from the reign of Artaxerxes iii. Ochus (358-337), may be dated the mention of the synagogue in O.T. viz. Ps 74:1, 'they have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.' The papyri finds of recent years have contained several references to the synagogues of the Jewish communities in Egypt, from the time of the third century. In the synagogues of the Roman era, the rabbis of the Talmud, as well as the rabbis of the Talmud, have been identified with the religious instruction in the synagogues of the period. In the synagogues of the Roman era, the rabbis of the Talmud, as well as the rabbis of the Talmud, have been identified with the religious instruction in the synagogues of the period.

similar arrangement in Herod's Temple, see Temple § 11 (b), although the question of the separation of the sexes in NT times is one on which the best authorities disagree.

As regards the furniture of the synagogue, the most important item was the chest or cupboard (bēma, the 'ark'), in which the sacred rolls of the Law and the Prophets were kept. The synagogues of NT times were also doubtless provided with a raised platform (bēma or dais), on which stood the reading-desk from which the Scriptures were read. The larger portion of the area was occupied by benches for the congregation, the worshippers facing southwards. In Galilee at least, towards the holy city. A few special seats in front of the bēma, and facing the congregation, were occupied by the heads of the community. These are the 'chief seats in the synagogues' covered by the Pharisees (Mt 23:4 and D). In front of the 'ark' a lamp burned day and night.

3. The officials of the Synagogue.—The general management of the synagogue of a Jewish town, where it served also as a court of justice and—in the smaller towns and villages at least—as a school, was in the hands of the elders of the community. It had no special priest or 'minister,' as will appear presently. It was usual, however, to appoint an official called 'the ruler of the synagogue' (Mk 15:22, Lk 8:40, and oft.), to whom the authorities of the community committed the care of the building as well as the more important duties, but also that everything connected with the public services was done 'decently and in order.' Hence the indignation of the ruler of Lk 13:34 at the supposed breach of the decorum of worship related in the preceding verse (v. 19-20). It lay with the ruler also to collect the readers for the day, and to determine the order in which they were to be called up to the reading-desk. Occasionally, it would seem, a synagogue might have two or more rulers, as at Anišok of Pisidia (Ac 13:15).

The only other permanent official was the chazzan, 'the attendant' of Lk 4:20 RV (A V 'minister' in the same, but now obsolete, sense; cf. Ac 13:15). The duties of the synagogue 'hecar' (as we say in Scotland) were somewhat varied. He was responsible for the cleaning and lighting of the building; and during service it was his special duty to convey the sacred rolls from the ark to the reader at the desk, and to restore them when the reading was over, as recorded in Lk 4:17, 20. To him fell also the duty of scourging criminals condemned by the court (Mt 10:25 23b etc.), but not, as is usually represented, of the school children (art. 'Education' in DB i. 650).

4. The Synagogue Service in NT Times.—For this part of our subject we are dependent mainly on the fuller information preserved in the Mishna, which reflects the later usage of the 2nd century. According to Megillah, iv. 3, the service consisted of four parts, and with this the scattered hints in the Gospels and Acts agree. These parts are: (a) the recitation of the Shema'; (b) the lifting up of hands, i.e., the prayers; (c) the lessons from the Law and the Prophets, and (d) the priestly benediction. Two elements of the full service, however, are here omitted as not strictly belonging to the essentials of worship, viz., the translation of the lessons into the vernacular, and the sermon.

(a) The recitation of the Shema'.—The 'shema' is the standing designation of three short sections of the Prophets and Law (Deut. 6:4; which opens with the word 'shema' = 'hear', whence the name) 111:1-25, Nu 15:1-4. Their recitation by the congregation was preceded and followed by one or two short benedictions, such as that beginning, 'Blessed be thou, Adonai, our God, King of the universe, who didst form the light and create darkness.'

(b) The lifting up of hands.—In contrast to the first item of the service, in which all took part, the prayers were said by a single individual chosen for the purpose named 'the deputy of the congregation,' the worshippers however, repeating the Amen at the close of each collect. This mode of prayer in the public services was taken over by the early Church, as is attested by 1 Co 14:1 (where the word rendered 'the giving of thanks' is the Gr. equivalent of that rendered 'benediction' below). By the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D., a formal liturgy had been developed—the famous 'eighteen benedictions,' which may be read in any Jewish prayer-book. It is impossible, however, to say with certainty how many of these were in use in our Lord's day. Dalman is of opinion that at least twelve of the eighteen collectarts are older than A.D. 70. These he arranges in three groups, consisting of three opening benedictions, six petitions, and three closing benedictions (see his art. 'Gottesdienst [synagogaler] in Hauck's P.R.E. viii.).

(c) The OT Lessons.—The liturgy was followed by a lesson from the Law. The five books were divided into 154 (or more) Sabbath pericopes or sections, so that the whole Pentateuch was read through in three years (or 35 years, half of a Sabbath period). The custom of calling up seven readers in succession—a priest, a Levite, and five others—may be as old as the 1st century. After the Law came, at the Sabbath morning service only from the Prophets, read by one person and left to his choice. It was the hoph'al, as the prophetic lesson was termed, that our Lord read in the synagogue of Nazareth (Lk 4:18). 'The reader, however, were not at this period read at Divine service. Even the Psalms had no place in the usual service' (Dalman).

In order that the common people might follow the lessons with intelligence, these were translated into Aramaic, the vernacular of Palestine, by an interpreter (mishuregeman—our 'dragoman' is from the same root). The unique position of the Law in the estimation of the time is shown by the fact that the Pentateuch lessons had to be a verse in length, while, the Prophets might be rendered three verses at a time. Reader and interpreter stood while at the reading-desk.

At this point in the service at the principal diets of worship, the sermon was introduced. The preacher sat while giving his exposition, which is so often described in NT as 'teaching' (Mt 4:17, Mk 1:28 etc.). In the synagogue there was full liberty of preaching. Any member of the community was free to exercise his gift. When a likely stranger was present, he was invited by the ruler of the synagogue to address the congregation (Ac 13:19). The sermon was delivered by a priest pronouncing the priestly benediction, Nu 6:24; if no priest was present, it is said that a layman gave the blessing in the form of a prayer.

On some occasions at least, it was usual to ask the aims of the congregation (Mt 6:9) on behalf of the poor. The full service, as sketched above, was confined to the principal service of the week, which was held on the forenoon of the Sabbath. At the other services, such as those held daily in the larger towns, where ten 'men of leisure' were available to form the minimum legal congregation, and the Monday and Thursday services, some of the items were omitted.

5. The influence of the Synagogue.—This article would be incomplete without a reference, however brief, to the influence of the synagogue and its worship not only upon the Jews themselves, but upon the world of heathenism. Even in the latter, the synagogue played a conspicuous part in the preparatio evangelica. From the outworn creeds of paganism many earnest souls turned to the synagogue and its teaching for the satisfaction of their spiritual needs, as is attested by 1 Co 14:18. The Dispersion (Jn 7:50, Ja 1, 1 P 1, all RV) became in consequence the seed-plots of Christianity, as every student of the Book of Acts is aware.

The work which the synagogue did for Judaism itself is best seen in the case with which the breach with the past involved in the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70, and the cessation of sacrificial worship, was hesitated. The highest religious life of Judaism had already transferred its channels from the grosser and more material forms of the Temple to the spiritual worship of the synagogue.

Nor must a reference be wanting to the fact that the synagogues, not the Temple, supplied the mould and model for the worship of the Christian Church.

6. The Great Synagogue.—In late Jewish tradition Ezra is alleged to have been the founder and first president of a college of learned scribes, which is supposed to have existed in Jerusalem until the early part of the Gr. period (c. B.C. 300). To 'the men of the Great Synagogue,' or rather 'of the Great Assembly,' were ascribed the composition of some of the later OT books, the close of the Canon, and a general care for the development of religion under the Law. Recent writers, however, have in the main accepted the results of Kuenen's careful investigation in his Gesamm. Abhandlungen (Germ. tr. 1857-58), and thus regard the Synagogue as unhistorical, the tradition of its existence having arisen from a distorted view of the nature and purpose of the great popular assembly, of which we read in Neh 8-10.

SYNONYCS, SYNOPTISTS.—See Gospel, 2.

SYNGYSS (lit. 'yoke-fellow').—This is taken by some as a proper name in Ph 4 ('Syngyss truly so called'), but it is nowhere else found as such. It is more probably a way of describing the chief minister of the church at Philippi. Lightfoot (Com. in loc.) suggests Epaphroditus; Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 358), Luke; others, Barnabas or Silas or Timothy. An old tradition of the 2nd cent. (Lightfoot, ib.) makes the 'yoke-fellow' to be the Apostle's wife; that Lydia is meant, and that she had become his wife; but see 1 Co 7.

SYRACUSE, on the east coast of Sicily, was the principal city in the island. It was originally a Greek colony of ancient date, which was powerful enough to defeat the famous Athenian Sicilian expedition (c. 415-412). Its kings were often men of distinction, even in literature, of which they were noted patrons. The city had a varied career, being sometimes a kingdom, sometimes a democracy. In B.C. 241 the Romans took the western half of Sicily from the Carthaginians, but remained in alliance with the kings of Syracuse. The last king of Syracuse coquetted with the Carthaginians; the city was besieged and captured by Marcellus in 212, and the whole island was henceforth under a priest, who had two quersors, one situated at Lilybæum in the W., the other at Syracuse. The city continued prosperous down till about the end of the 2nd B.C. After that date it declined in importance, though it remained the capital of the eastern half of the island. As a Synagogue as well as Temple, was transferred to the Sicilian cities, and never large number of the inhabitants were Roman citizens.

St. Paul's ship lay at anchor in the harbour for three days, when he was on his way from Malta to Rome (Ac 28:1). He did not preach there. Christian memorials at Syracuse are not specially early.

SYRIA, SYRIANS.—See Aram, Arameans.

SYRIAC VSNITIONS.—See Text (OT, 15 (6), and NT, 11 ff.).

SYROPHENICIAN.—This is the designation of a 'Greek' (or Gentile) woman whose demoniac daughter Jesus healed when near Tyre (Mt 15:21-28). She was perhaps Greek-speaking (Swete), but was descended from the old Phoenicians of Syria (Mt 15:22 has 'Canaanitish').

SYRTIS.—See Quickands.

TAANACH (Jos 12:4, 1 K 4:2, 1 Ch 7:24).—One of the royal Canaanite cities, mentioned in OT always along with Megiddo. Though in the territory of Issachar, it belonged to Manasseh; the native Canaanites were, however, not driven out (Jos 17:22, Jg 17). It was allotted to the Levites of the children of Kohath (Jos 21:30). It was one of the four fortress cities on the 'border of Manasseh' (1 Ch 7:24). The site of Deborah and Barak with the Canaanites is described (Jg 5:19) as 'in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo.' The site is to-day Tell Tu‘unna, four miles S.E. from Tell el-Mutesellim (Megiddo). The hill has been excavated by Prof. Sellin of Vienna. Many remains of Canaanite and Jewish civilization have been found, and also a considerable number of clay tablets with cuneiform inscriptions similar to those discovered at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt. See Sellin in Mem. Vienna Acad., 1 (1904), Ill. (1905).

TAANACH-SHILOH.—A town on the N.E. boundary of Ephraim (Jos 18:29). It is possibly the mod. Tu‘na, about 7 miles from Nablus (Neapolis), and 2 miles N. of Yā‘ın (Janos).

TABAOTH (1 Es 5:9-10); and TABBATH (Ex 23:29; Neh 7:45).—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel.

TABBATH.—An unknown locality mentioned in Jg 7:23.

TABELLI.—1. The father of the rival to Ahaz put forward by Rezin (wh. see) and Pekah (1 K 7:2). 2. A Persian official (Ezr 4:7); called in 1 Es 9:18 Tabellius.

TABERNACLE.—See Temple, 2.

TABER.—Only in Nah 2 'her handmaids mourn as with the voice of doves, tabering (Amer. RV 'beating') upon their breasts.' Beating the breast was a familiar Oriental custom in mourning (cf. Is 22:19). The word here used means lit. 'drumming' (cf. Ps 68:27, its only other occurrence). The English word 'taber' means a small drum, usually accompanying a pipe, both instruments being played by the same performer. Other forms are 'tabor,' 'tobour,' and 'tambour'; and dimin. forms are 'tobret' and 'tambourine.'

TABERAH.—An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 11, Dt 9:9).

TABERNACLE.—1. By 'the tabernacle' without further qualification, as in the more expressive designation 'tabernacle of the congregation' (RV more correctly 'tent of meeting,' see below), is usually understood the elaborate portable sanctuary which Moses erected at Sinai, in accordance with Divine instructions, as the place of worship for the Hebrew tribes during and after the wilderness wanderings. But modern criticism has revealed the fact that this artistic and costly structure is confined to the Priestly sources of the Pentateuch, and is to be carefully distinguished from a much simpler tent bearing the same name and likewise associated with Moses. The relative historicity of the two 'tents of meeting' will be more fully examined at the close of this article (§ 9).

2. The sections of the Priest's Code (F) devoted to the details of the fabric and furniture of the Tabernacle, and to the arrangements for its transport from station to station in the wilderness, fall into two groups, viz. (a) Ex 25–27. 30. 31, which are couched in the form of instructions from J to Moses as to the erection of the Tabernacle and the marking of its furniture according to the ‘pattern’ or model shown to him on the holy mount (26: 9); (b) Ex 35–40, which tell inder al of the carrying out of these instructions. Some additional details, particularly as to the arrangements on the march, are given in Nu 32: 45. and 7: 14.

In these and other OT passages the wilderness sanctuary is denoted by at least a dozen different designations (see the pl. in Hastings’ JB iv. 150). The most frequently employed is that also borne, as we have seen, by the sacred tent of the Elohist source (E), ‘the tent of meeting’ (so RV throughout). That this is the more correct rendering of the original ‘h*ld m*thd, as compared with AV’s ‘tabernacle of the congregation,’ is now universally acknowledged. The sense in which the Priestly writers, at least, understood the second term is evident from such passages as Ex 26: 1, where, with reference to the mercy-seat (see 7 (b), J) is represented as saying: ‘there I will meet with thee and commune with thee’ (cf. Nu 7: 14). This, however, does not exclude a possible earlier connexion of the name with that of the Babylonian ‘mount of meeting’ (Is 14: 1, EV ‘congregation’), the m*thd or assembly of the gods.

3. In order to do justice to the Priestly writers in their attempts to give literary shape to their ideas of Divine worship, it must be remembered that they were following in the footsteps of Ezekiel (chs. 40–48), whose conception of a sanctuary is that of a dwelling-place of the Divine (see Ezk 40: 1). Now the attributes of Israel’s God, which for these theologians of the Exile overshadowed all others, was His ineffable and almost unapproachable holiness, and the problem for Ezekiel and his successors was how to express that holiness and sinfulness could with safety approach a perfectly holy God. The solution is found in the restored Temple in the one case (Ezk 40 ff.), and in the Tabernacle in the other, together with the elaborate sacrificial and propitiatory system of which each is the centre. In the Tabernacle, in particular, we have an ideal of a Divine sanctuary, every detail of which is intended to symbolize the unity, majesty, and holiness of J, and to provide an earthly habitation in which a holy God may again dwell in the midst of a holy people. ‘Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them’ (Ex 25: 8).

4. Taking this general idea of the Tabernacle with us, and leaving a fuller discussion of its religious significance and symbolism to a later section (§ 8), let us proceed to study the arrangement and component parts of its ideal sanctuary. Since the tents of the Hebrew tribes, those of the priests and Levites, and the three divisions of the sanctuary-court, holy place, and the holy of holies—represent ascending degrees of holiness in the scheme of the Priestly writer, the appropriate order of study will be from without inwards, from the perimeter of the sanctuary to its centre.

(c) We begin, therefore, with ‘the court of the dwelling’ (Ex 25: 9). This is described as a rectangular enclosure in the centre of the camp, measuring 100 cubits from east to west and half that amount from south to north. If the shorter cubit of, say, 18 inches (for convenience of reckoning) be taken as the unit of measurement, this represents an area of approximately 50 yards by 25, a ratio of 2: 1. The entrance, which is on the eastern side, is closed by a screen (27: 14 RV) of embroidered work in colours. The rest of the area is surrounded by plain white curtains (EV ‘hangings’) of ‘fine twined linen’ 5 cubits in height, suspended, like the screen, at equal intervals of 5 cubits from pillars standing in sockets (EV) or bases of bronze. Since the perimeter of the court measured 300 cubits, 60 pillars in all were required for the curtains and the screen, and are reckoned in the text in groups of ten and twenties, 20 for each long side, and 10 for each short side. The pillars are evidently intended to be kept upright by means of cords or stays fastened to pins or pegs of bronze stuck in the ground.

(b) In the centre of the court is placed the altar of burnt-offering (27: 1–4), called also ‘the brazen altar’ and ‘the altar’ par excellence. When we consider the purpose it was intended to serve, one is surprised to find this altar of burnt-offering consisting of a hollow chest of acacia wood (so RV throughout, for AV ‘shittim’) and the only wood employed in the construction of the Tabernacle—5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 in height, overlaid with what must, for reasons of transport, have been a comparatively thin sheathing of bronze. From the four corners spring the four horns of the altar, ‘of one piece’ with it, while half-way up the side there was fitted a projecting ledge, from which depended a network or grating (AV ‘grate’) of bronze (27: 38 RV). The meshes of the latter must have been sufficiently wide to permit of the sacrificial blood being dashed against the sides and base of the altar (cf. the sketch in Hastings’ DB iv. 658). Like most of the other articles of the Tabernacle furniture it was provided with rings and poles for convenience of transport.

(c) In proximity to the altar must be placed the bronze laver (30: 18–19), containing water for the ablutions of the priests. According to 38: 5, it was made from the mirrors of the women who served at the door and of the tent of meeting’ (RV)—a curious anachronism. In harmony therewith we find the essential part of the fabric of the Tabernacle, to which every other structural detail is subsidiary, described in the hand of man in his creation, as, of the designation ‘dwelling.’ ‘Thus shalt make the dwelling (EV ‘tabernacle’) of ten curtains’ (26: 1). It is a fundamental mistake to regard the wooden part of the Tabernacle as of the essence of the structure, and to begin the study of the whole therefrom, as is still being done.

The ten curtains of the dwelling (mi’shkān), each 30 cubits by 4, are to be of the finest linen, adorned with inwoven tapestry figures of cherubim in violet, purple, and scarlet (see Colors), ‘the work of the cunning workman’ (26: 14 RV). They are to be sewn together to form two sets of five, which again are to be coupled together ‘by means of rings of gold’ (cf. § 7: 25). The curtains are then to be fastened to bronze hooks mounted on poles and loops, so as to form one large surface 40 (10 by 4) cubits by 25 (7 by 4), ‘for the dwelling shall be one’ (26: 30). Together the curtains are designed to form the earthly, and, with the aid of the attendant pillar, to symbolize the heavenly, dwelling-place of the God of Israel.

(b) The next section of the Divine directions (26: 14–19) provides for the thorough protection of the more artistic curtains by means of three separate coverings. The first consists of eleven curtains of goats’ hair ‘for a tent over the dwelling,’ and therefore of somewhat larger dimensions than the curtains of the latter, namely, 30 cubits by 4, covering what, when joined together, covered the whole surface of 44 cubits by 30. The two remaining coverings are to be made respectively of rams’ skins dyed red and of the skins of a Red Sea mammal, which is probably the dugong (cf. J), ‘for the dwelling shall be two’ (26: 19). Together the curtains are designed to form the earthy, and, with the aid of the attendant pillar, to symbolize the heavenly, dwelling-place of the God of Israel.

(c) At this point one would have expected to hear of the provision of a number of poles and stays by means of which the dwelling might be pitched like an ordinary tent. But the author of Ex 26: 14 does not apply the term ‘tent’ to the curtains of the dwelling, but, as we have seen, to those of the goats’ hair covering, and instead of poles and stays we find a different and alto-
TABERNACLE

...gather unexpected arrangement in vv. 13-16. Unfortunately the crucial passage, vv. 18-22, contains several obscure technical terms, with regard to which, in the present writer's opinion, the true exegetical tradition has been lost. The explanation usually given, which finds in the word rendered 'boards' huge wooden beams of impossibly dimensions, has been shown in a former study to be excretically and intrinsically inadmissible; see art. 'Tabernacle' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 563 ff.

To § 7 of that article, with which Haupt's note on 1 K 7:2 in S.B.P. should now be compared, the student is referred for the grounds on which the following translation of the leading passage is based. 'And thou shalt make the frames for the dwelling of acacia wood, two uprights for each frame joined together by cross rails.' The result is, briefly, the substitution of 48 light open frames (see diagrams, op. cit.), each 10 cubits in height by 1½ in width, for the traditional wooden beams of the usual theory. The open frames were required, according to the former's construction, to be 'reared up,' side by side, along the south, west, and north sides of a rectangular enclosure measuring 30 cubits by 10 (3:1), the east side or front being left open. (2) The table of shewbread, or, more precisely, presence-bread (25:3-4; 37:10-12); (b) the so-called golden candlestick, in reality a seven-branched lampstand (25:30-31; 37:19-24) (c) the altar of incense (30:1-4; 37:24-25). Many of the details of construction and ornamentation of these are obscure, and reference is here made, once for all, to the fuller discussion of these difficulties in the article already cited (DB iv. 662 ff.).

The table of shewbread (Nu 4) is a low table or wooden stand overlaid with pure gold, 1½ cubits in height. Its top measures 2 cubits by 1. The legs are connected by a narrow binding-nail, one hand-breadth wide, the 'border' of Ex 26:20, to which were attached four golden rings to receive the staves by which the table is to be carried on the march. For the service of the table are provided 'the dishes, the spoons, the flagons, and the bowls thereof to pour withal' (25:29 RV), all of pure gold. Of these the 'dishes' are the salvers on which the loaves of the presence-bread (see SHEWMEAD) were displayed; the 'spoons' are rather cups for frankincense (Lv 247); the flagons (AV 'vessels') were for the wine connected with this part of the ritual.

(3) The golden candlestick or lampstand is to be constructed of 'beaten work' (repousse) of pure gold. Three pairs of arms branched off at different heights from the central shaft, and curved outwards and upwards until their extremities were on a level with the top of the shaft, the whole providing stands for seven golden lamps. Shaft and arms were alike adorned with ornamentation suggested by the flower of the almond tree (cf. diagram in DB iv. 663). The golden lampstand stood on the south side of the holy place, facing the table of shewbread on the north side. The 'tongs' of 25 in are really 'snuffers' (so AV 379) for dressing the wicks of the lamps, the burnt portions being placed in the 'snuff dishes.' Both sets of articles were of gold.

(4) The passage containing the directions for the altar of incense (Ex 30:34) forms part of a section (chs. 30-31) which, there is reason to believe, is a later addition to the original contents of the Priest's Code. The altar is described as square in section, one cubit each way, and two cubits in height, with projecting horns. Like the rest of the furniture, it was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, with the usual provision of rings and staves. Its place is in front of the veil separating the holy from the most holy place. Incense of sweet spices is to be offered upon it night and morning (30:30).
yet connected sacred objects, the ark and the propitiatory or mercy-seat (25°-37°). (e) P's characteristic name for the former is the ark of the testimony. The latter term is a synonym in P for the Decalogue (25°), which was written on [the tables of testimony] (31°), deposed, according to an early tradition, within the ark. The ark itself occasionally receives the simple title of 'ark' whence the Tabernacle as shelter of the ark is named in P both 'the dwelling (EV 'tabernacle') of the testimony' (Ex 38 etc.) and 'the tent of the testimony' (Nu 9 etc.). The ark of the Priest's Code is an oblong chest of acacia wood, 2 cubits in length and 1½ cubits bredth and height (5'3''x3'' half-cubits), overlaid within and without with pure gold. The sides are decorated with an obscure form of ornamentation, the 'crown' of Ex 25°, probably a moulding (RVm 'rim or moulding'). At the four corners (v. 12 AV; RV, less accurately, "feet") the usual rings were attached to receive the bearing-poles. The precise point of attachment is uncertain, whether at the ends of the two long sides or of the two short sides. Since it would be more seemly that the throne of J, presently to be described, should face in the direction of the march, it is more probable that the poles were meant to pass through rings attached to the short sides, but whether these were to be attached at the lowest point of the sides, or higher up, cannot be determined. That the Decalogue or 'testimony' was to find a place in the ark (25°) has already been emphasized in the preceding sections, and need be re-stated in this connexion only for the sake of completeness. The symbolism of the Tabernacle is a subject in which pious imaginations in the past have run riot, but with regard to which one must endeavour to be faithful to the ideas in the mind of the Priestly author. The threefold division of the sanctuary, for example, into court, holy place, and holy of holies, may have originally symbolized the earth, heaven, and the holy of holies. The ark of the author of Ex 25 ff. it was an essential part of the Temple tradition (cf. Temple, § 7). In this case, therefore, the division should rather be taken, as in § 7 above, as a reflection of the three grades of theocratic community, people, priests, and high priest.

9. Reluctantly, but unavoidably, we must return, in conclusion, to the question mooted in § 2 as to the relation of the generous sanctuary above described to the simple 'tent of meeting' of the older Pentateuch sources. In other words, is P's Tabernacle historical? In the first place, there is no reason to question, but on the contrary every reason to accept, the proper historical character of the Author of the Priestly Code, as determined both by the internal evidence (E) regarding the Mosaic 'tent of meeting.' This earlier 'tabernacle' is first met with in Ex 33°-34°: 'Now Moses used to take the tent and pitch it (the tent is frequently mentioned without the article 'the' from the camp... and it came to pass that every one which looked the Lord went out unto the tent of meeting which was without the camp.' To it, we are further informed, Moses was wont to retire to commune with J, who descended in the pillar of the cloud to talk with Moses at the door of the tent as a man talketh with his friend (see also the references in Nu 11°-12°, 14°). Only a mind strangely insensitive to the laws of evidence, or still in the fetters of an antiquated doctrine of inspiration, could reconcile the picture of this simple tent, 'far off from the camp,' with Joshua as its single non-Levitical attendant (36°), with that of the Tabernacle of the Priest's Code, as situated in the centre of the camp, with its attendant army of priests and Levites. Moreover, neither tent nor Tabernacle is rightly intelligible except as the resting-place of the ark, the symbol of the presence of His people, with His people, in whom, as the oldest of our extant historical sources have much to tell us of the fortunes of the ark from the time that it formed the glory of the Temple at Shiloh until it entered its final resting-place in that of Solomon (see ANN). But nowhere is there the slightest reference to anything in the least resembling the Tabernacle of §§ 4–8. It is only in the Books of Chronicles, in certain of the Psalms, and in passages of the pre-exilic writings which have passed through the hands of late post-exilic editors that such references are found. An illuminating example occurs in 2 Ch 31:18 compared with 1 K 3:16.

Apart, therefore, from the numerous difficulties presented by the description of the Tabernacle and its furniture, such as the strangely inappropriate brazen altar (§ 4 (b)), or suggested by the unexpected wealth of material and artistic skill necessary for its construction, modern students of the Pentateuch find the picture of the desert sanctuary and its worship irreconcilable with the historical development of re, and to the cultus in Israel. In Ex 25 and following chapters we are dealing not with historical fact, but with 'the product of religious idealism'; and surely these devout idealists of Ezra should command our admiration as they deserve our gratitude. If the Tabernacle is an ideal, it is truly an ideal worthy of Him for whose worship it seems to provide (see the exposition of the general idea of the Tabernacle in § 2, and now in full detail by X’Nelle as cited, § 6 above). Nor must it be forgotten, that in reproducing in portable form, as they unquestionably do, the several parts and appointments of the temple, including even its brazen altar, the author or authors of the Tabernacle believed, in good faith, that they were reproducing the essential features of the Mosaic sanctuary, of which the Temple was supposed to be the replica and the legitimate successor. TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.—1. OT references.—In Ex 23:15-16 it is called the Feast of Ingathering, and its date is placed at the end of the year.

In Dt 16:12–13 its name is given as the Feast of Tabernacles or Booths (possibly referring to the use of booths in the vineyard during the vintage). It is to last 7 days, to be observed annually, and to be the occasion of rejoicing. In the 'year of release,' i.e. the sabbatical year, the Law is to be publicly read (Dt 31:10–11). The dedication of Solomon's Temple took place at this feast, and the account given in 1 K 7:2–58 the seven-day rule of Deut. is represented as being observed; but the parallel narrative of 2 Ch 7:1–54 assumes that the rule of Lev. was followed.

In Lev 23:42 and Nu 29:1–6 we find elaborate ordinances. The feast is to begin on 15th Tishri (October) and to last 8 days, the first and the last being days of holy convocation. The people are to live in booths through the whole of the occasion.

A very large number of offerings is ordained; on each of the first 2 days 2 rams and 14 lambs, and a goat as a sin-offering; and successively on these days a diminishing number of bullocks: 1 on the 1st day, 12 on the 2nd, and so on till the 7th, when 7 were to be offered. On the 8th day the special offerings were 1 bullock, 1 ram, 7 lambs, and a goat as a sin-offering.

We read in Ezr 3:1 of the observance of this feast, but are not told the method. The celebration in Neh 8:16 followed the regulations of Lev, but we are expressly informed that such had not been the case since Joshua’s day, and that the same route was kept, for Jeroboam instituted its equivalent for the Northern Kingdom in the 8th month (1 K 12:11–12).

2. Character of the feast.—It was the Jewish harvest-home, when all the year’s produce of corn, wine, and oil had been gathered in; though the word used for the occasion of the harvest is the same as that for the conclusion of the vintage. It was an occasion for great joy and the giving of presents; it was perhaps the most popular of the national festivals, and consequently the most generally attended. Thus Zec 14:16 names as the future sign of Judah’s triumph the fact that all the world shall come up yearly to Jerusalem to keep this festival.

3. Later customs.—In later times novel customs were attached to the observance. Such were the daily procession round the altar, with its sevenfold repetition on the 7th day; the singing of special Psalms; the procession on each of the first 7 days to Siloam to fetch water, which was mixed with wine in a golden pitcher, and poured at the foot of the altar. While trumpets were blown (cf. Jn 7:31); and the illumination of the women’s court in the Temple by the lighting of the 4 golden candelabra (cf. Jn 9:13). The 8th day, though appearing originally as a supplementary addition to the feast, came to be regarded as an integral part of it, and is so treated in 2 Mac 10:12, as also by Josephus. A. W. F. BLUnT.

TABITHA.—See DORCAS.

TABLE.—See HOUSE, § 6; MEALS, §§ 3, 4. For 'Table of Showbread' see SHWBRAD, TABERNACLE, § 6 (a), Temple, §§ 5, 9, 12.

TABLE, TABLET.—1. Writing tablet is indicated by the Heb. lāch, which is also applied to wooden boards or planks (Ex 27:37 in the altar of the Tabernacle, Ex 28:25, 30:17 in a ship, Cb 9:11, 19:10 and 20:18) to the bases of the lavers in Solomon’s Temple, 1 K 7:41). It is, however, most frequently applied to tables of stone on which the Decalogue was engraved (Ex 24:12; Dt 9:9; 19:4, etc.). It is used of a tablet on which the Law may be written (Is 30:4, Hab 2:15), and in Pr 3:17 and Jer 17:10 figuratively of the ‘tables of the heart.’ In all these passages, when used of stone, both AV and RV translate ‘table’ except in Is 30:4 where RV has ‘tablet.’ lāch generally appears in LXX and NT as τάμανος (2 Chr 35:26, He 9:9). The ‘writing table’ (RV ‘tablet’) of Lk 1:2 was probably of wax.

The word ‘tablets’ is also the tr. of bōdēt hāmēwēphēk in AV Is 30:3 (RV ‘perfume boxes,’ lit. ‘houses of the soul’). It is doubtful if nēseph actually means ‘odour,’ but from meaning ‘breath’ it may have some to mean scent or smell. On the other hand, the idea of life may suggest that some life-giving elixir, scent, or ointment was contained in the vessels; but the meaning is doubtful.

The ‘tablet’ (gillūgha) inscribed with a stylus to Maher-shalal-hash-baz, Is 8:1 (AV ‘roll’), signifies a polished surface. The word occurs again in Is 31:5 where it probably refers to ‘tablets of polished metal’ used as mirrors (RV ‘glass’).

TABOR.—1. A town in the tribe of Zebulon, given to Leviites descended from Merari (1 Ch 6:77). Its site is unknown. Perhaps it is to be identified with Chisloth-tabor in the same tribe (Josh 20:7, 21). 2. A place near Ophrah (Jg 8:34). 3. The Oak (AV ‘plain’) of Tabor was on the road from Ramah S. to Gibeah (1 S 10:9).

4. See next article. H. L. Willett.

TABOR (MOUNT).—A mountain in the N.E. corner of the plain of Esdraelon, some 7 miles E. of Nazareth. Though only 1438 feet high, Tabor is, from its isolation and remarkable rounded shape, a most prominent object from great distances around; hence, though so very different in size from Mount Carmel (the mountain mass of Hermon), it was yet associated with it (Is 9:1). It was a king among the mountains (Jer 49:21). It is known to the Arabs as Jebel et-Tür, lit. ‘the mountain of the mount,’ the same name as is applied to the Mount of Olives. From the summit of Tabor a magnificent outlook is obtained, especially to the W., over the great plain of Esdraelon to the mountains of Samaria and Carmel. It was on the borders of Zebulun and Issachar (Jos 19:27); it was certainly an early sanctuary, and probably the reference in Dt 33:19 is to this mountain. Here the forces under Deborah and Barak rallied to fight Sisera (Jg 4:14). Whether the reference in Jg 8:16 is to this mountain is doubtful. In later history Tabor appears chiefly as a fortress. In the 3rd cent. B.C., Antiochus the Great captured the city Abuleia which was upon Tabor, and afterwards fortified it. Between B.C. 405 and 78 the place was again in Jewish hands, but in B.C. 53 Gabinianus here defeated Alexander, son of Aristobulus II., who was in revolt. A hundred and ten years later Josephus fortified the hill against Vespasian, but after the Jewish soldiers had been defeated by the general Flaccus, the place surrendered. During the Crusades it was long for the hands of the Christians, but fell to the Musulmans after the battle of Hattin, and was fortified in 1212 by the successor of Saladin—a step which led to the glorious and iniquitous 5th Crusade.

The tradition that Tabor was the scene of the Transformation goes back to the 3rd cent., but has little evidence in its favour. Although not directly recorded, the condition of the hill before and after would lead one to suppose that it was an inhabited site at the time of Christ, while the requirements of the Biblical narrative (Mk 6:46; Lk 9:13) suggest a site near Cæsarea Philippi, such, for example, as an isolated spur of Hermon.

Mount Tabor to-day is one of the best-wooded spots in W. Palestine, groves of oaks and terebinths not only covering the hillsides, but extending also over the considerable area of hill and valley to the N.; game abounds in the coverts. The Franciscans and the Greek Church have each erected a monastery-hospice on the site, and extensive excavations have been made, particularly by members of the former order. The foundations of a great wall of circumvallation—probably that of Josephus (BJ vi. 8)—have been followed, and ancient tombs have been cleared, and the remains of several churches of the 4th and of the 12th centuries have been unearthed.

TABRUS (see art. TABRAS) is AV tr. of taph in Gn 317, 8. 10 16 18, Is 6 24 30 34, Jer 31, Ezek 28. The same Heb. word is tr. 'timbre' in Ex 155, Jg 11, 2 S 6, 1 Ch 13, Job 21, Ps 151 159. It might have been well to drop both 'timbre' and 'tabret', neither of which conveys any clear sense to a modern ear, and adopt some such rendering as 'tambarine' or 'hand-drum'. The AV rendering of Job 174 'aftentime I was as a tabret', has arisen from a confusion of topheth 'spitting' with taph 'tambarine.' The words mean 'I am come one to be spit on in the face' (as open abhorring').

TABRIMMON.—The father of Benhadad (1 K 15:16).

TACHES.—An old word of French origin used by AV to render the Heb. qādšām, which occurs only in Ps's description of the Tabernacle (Ex 26:11, 12 35 etc.). The Gr. rendering denotes the rings set in eylets at the edge of the robe to pass through. The Heb. word evidently signifies some form of hook or clasp (so RV) like the Roman fibula.

TACKLING in Is 33:28 means simply a ship's ropes; in Ac 27:2 it is used more generally of the whole gearing (RVm 'furniture').

TADMOOR (Palmyra).—In 2 Ch 8:9 we read that Solomon built 'Tadmor in the [Syrian] desert'. It has long been recognized that Tadmor is here a mistake for 'Tamar in the [Judean] desert' of the corresponding passage in 1 Kings (9:9). The Chronicler, or one of his predecessors, no doubt thought it was Dama in this fashion a name that was scarcely known to him. (That it is really the city of Tadmor so famous in after times that is meant, is confirmed by the equally unhistorical details given in 2 Ch 8:9 regarding the Syrian chivalry of Hamath and Zobah.) Hence arose the necessity for the Jewish schools to change the Tamar of 1 K 9:8 in turn into Tadmor [the Qeré in that passage], so as to agree with the text of the Chronicler.

The translator of 1 K 9:8 appears to have already had this correction before him. Nevertheless it is quite certain that Tamar is the original reading. But the correction supplies a very important evidence that at the time when Chronicles was composed (c. B.C. 200), Tadmor was already a place of much splendour on which a fabulous splendour had gathered, so that it appeared fitting to attribute it to Solomon. This fiction maintained itself, and received further embellishments. The pre-Islamic poet Amm. Flaccus, the 1st cent. A.D. (see Th. Nash, A.D. 600) relates that, by Divine command, the demons built Solomon's Tadmor by forced labour. This piece of information he may have picked up locally; what he had in view would be, of course, the remains, which must have been still very much, of the city whose climax of splendour was reached in the 2nd and 3rd cent. A.D.

Tadmor, of whose origin and earlier history we know nothing, lay upon a gently natural road through the desert, not far from the Euphrates, but not very far from Damascus. It was thus between Syria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia proper. Since water, although not in great abundance, was also found on the spot, Tadmor supplied a peaceful and intelligible place for the conditions necessary for a metropolis of the caravan trade. Such we find in the case of Palmyra, whose identity with Tadmor was all along maintained, and has been confirmed by numerous inscriptions. The first really historical mention of the place (c. 37 or 36) tells how the wealth of this centre of trade invited M. Antony to a pillaging campaign (Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 9).

The endings of the twain Tadmor and Palmyra are the same, but not the 1st syllable. It is not clear why the Westerns made such an alteration in the form. The name Palmyra can hardly have anything to do with Pal., it would, indeed, be something strange for this Eastern district the Lat. palma was used at so early a date in the formation of names. The Oriental form Tadmor is to be kept quite apart from *tadmur, 'palm.' Finally, it is unlikely that the palm was ever extensively cultivated on its spot.

Neither in the OT nor in the NT is there any other mention of Tadmor (Palmyra), and Josephus names it only when he reproduces the above passage of Chronicles (Ant. xiv. vi. 1). The place exercised, indeed, no considerable influence on the history either of ancient Israel or of early Christianity. There is therefore no occasion to go further into the history, once so glorious and finally so tragic, of the great city, or to deal with the fortunes of the later somewhat considerable place, the founding of which, in spite of its imposing ruins, is desolate in the extreme, but which still bears the ancient name Tadmor (Tadmur, Tadmur).—Tr. NOLDEKE.

TAKAHAN.—An Ephraimite clan (Nu 26:26 28, 1 Ch 7:7); gentile name Tahanim in Nu 26:6 9.

TAHASH.—A son of Nahor (Gn 22:22).

TAHAT.—1. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 6:9). 2. Two (unless the name has been accidentally repeated) Ephraimite families (1 Ch 7:7). 4. An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33:12).

TAHCHEMONITE (AV Tachmonite).—See Hachmont.

TAPHANNEH (Jer 26:43 44 46 46, Ezek 30:10 (Tehaphnehes), in 7th 10th A. Taphnhes).—An Egyptian city, the same as the Greek Daphnepolis (top Taphon) Taphae, The Egyptian name is unknown. It lay on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, which is now silted up, and the whole region converted into a waste. Petrie's excavations showed that it was necessary to be prefixed by Ptolemy's 1; on the 26th Dyn. (B.C. 664-601). According to Herodotus, it was the frontier fortress of Egypt on the Asiatic side, and was garrisoned by Greeks. In its ruins was found an abundance of Greek pottery, iron armour and arrowheads of bronze and iron, while numerous small weights bore testimony to the trade that passed through it. The garrison was kept up by the Persians in the 5th cent., and the town existed to a much later period. After the murder of Gedeliah (a.c. 556), Johanan took the remnant of the Jews from Jerusalem, including Jeremiah, to Tahpanhes.

F. L. GRIFFITHE.

TAHPENES (1 K 11:9).—The name of Pharaoh's wife, whose sister was given to Radad the Edomite. It has the appearance of an Egyptian name, but has not yet been explained. The name of her son Genumuth is not Egyptian. The Pharaoh should be of the weak 21st Dynasty.

F. L. GRIFFITH.

TAHREA.—A grandson of Mephibleseth (1 Ch 9:4); in 8° (prob. by a copist's error) Tarea.

TAHTIM Hodshi, THE LAND OF.—A place east of Jordan, which Josiah and his officers visited when making the census for David (2 S 24). It is mentioned between Gilead and Dan-jaan. The MT, however, is certainly corrupt. In all probability we should read ha-Hittim-Kiddeshah to the land of the Hittites, towards Kadesh (sc. Kadesh on the Orontes).

TALE.—Tal/of in AV generally means 'number or sum,' as Ex 24:18, 'ye shall ye deliver the tale of bricks,' and the verb 'to tell' sometimes means 'to number,' as Gn 15:2, 'Tell the stars, if thou be able to number them,' where the same Heb. verb is translated 'tell' and 'number.'

TALEBEARING.—See Slander.

TALENT.—See Money, Weights and Measures.

TALITHA CUMI.—The command addressed by our Lord to the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5:46), and interpreted by the Evangelist, 'Maiden, I say unto thee, arise.' The reading of the actual (Aramaic) words used by Jesus is characteristic of St. Mark's graphic narrative, cf. 7:18; 11:15.

TALMAI.—A clan resident in Hebron at the time of the Hebrew conquest and driven thence by Caleb (Nu 13:30; Jos 19:1; Jg 19). 2. Son of Ammihur (of Ammihud), king of Geshur, and a contemporary of David, to whom he gave his daughter Maacah in marriage (2 S 5:3; 11; 1 Ch 3).3

TALMON.—The name of a family of Temple gatekeepers (1 Ch 9:9, Ex 28, Neh 7:11; 129; called in 1 Es 3:26 'Tolman.' See also, Talem.

TALMUD ('learning').—1. Origin and character.—The Jews have always drawn a distinction between the 'Oral Law,' which was handed down for centuries by word of mouth, and the 'Written Law,' i.e. the Pentateuch or Five Books of Moses. Both, according to Rabbinical teaching, trace their origin to Moses himself. It has been a fundamental principle of all times that by the side of the 'Written Law,' regarded as a summary of the principles and general laws of the Hebrew people, there was the 'Oral Law' to complete and explain the 'Written Law.' It was an article of faith that in the Pentateuch there was no precept and no regulation, ceremonial, doctrinal, or legal, of which God had not given to Moses all explanations necessary for their application, together with the order to transmit them by word of mouth. The classical passage on this subject runs: 'Moses received the (oral) law from Sinai, and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the Great Synagogue' (Pirke Aboth, i. 1). This has long been known to be nothing more than a myth; the 'Oral Law,' although it no doubt contains elements which are of great antiquity—e.g. details of folklore—really dates from the time that the 'Written Law' was read and expounded in the synagogues. Thus we are told that Ezra introduced the custom of having the Torah ('Law') read in the synagogues at the morning service on Mondays and Thursdays (i.e. the days corresponding to these); for on these days the country people flocked to the synagogues from the neighbouring districts as they did on the market days. The people had thus an opportunity, which would otherwise have been lacking to them, of hearing the Law read and explained. These explanations of the Law, together with the results of the discussions of the Law on the part of the sopherim ('scribes'), the actual Oral Law. The first explanatory term applied by the Jews to the 'Oral Law' was midrash ('investigation'), and the Bible itself witnesses to the way in which such investigations were made and expounded to the people. 'Also Ezra taught and the Levites, the people to understand the Law; and they put the book in the Law, of God, with an interpretation; and they gave the sense, that so they could understand the reading.' (Neh 8:8). But it is clear that the 'investigations' must have led to different explanations; so that in order to fix authoritatively what in later days were considered referable to in Rabbinical writings, there was also spoken only of the continuity of teaching, it became necessary to reduce these to writing; there arose thus (soon after the time of Shammal and Hillel) the 'Former Mishna' (Mishna Rakham, Mishna meaning 'Second Law'). This earliest Mishna, which it is probable, owed its origin to pupils of Shammal and Hillel, was therefore compiled for the purpose of affording teachers both a norm for their decisions and a kind of book of reference for the explanation of difficult passages. But the immense amount of floating material could not be incorporated into one work, and when great teachers arose they sometimes found it necessary to compile their own collections. They excluded much which the official Mishna contained, and added other matter which they considered important. This was done by Rabbi Aqba, Rabbi Meir, and others. But it was not long before the confusion created by this state of affairs again necessitated some authoritative, officially recognized action. It was then that Jehudah ha-Nasi undertook his great redaction of the Mishna, which has survived substantially to the present day. Jehudah ha-Nasi died about A.D. 220; he was the first of Hillel's successors to whose name was added the title ha-Nasi ('the Prince'); this is the way in which he is usually referred to in Rabbinical writings; he is also spoken of as 'Rabbi,' i.e. master par excellence, and occasionally as ha-Qadash, 'the Holy,' on account of his singularly pure and moral life. Owing to his authority and dignity, the Mishna of Jehudah ha-Nasi soon superseded all other collections, and became the only one used in the schools; the object that Jehudah had had in view, that, namely, of restoring uniform teaching, was thus achieved. The Mishna as we now have it is not, however, what it was when it left Jehudah's hands; it has undergone modifications of various kinds: additions, emendations, and the like having been made even in Jehudah's lifetime, by his disciples, and by some of his pupils. The language of the Mishna approximates to that of some of the latest books of the OT, and is known by the name of 'Neo-Hebraic'; this was the language spoken in Palestine during the Second century A.D.; it has a considerable intermixture of foreign elements, especially Greek words Hebraized.

The Mishna is divided into six Sederim (Aram, for 'Orders'), and each Seder contains a number of treatises; each treatise is divided into chapters, and these again into paragraphs. The names of the six 'Orders,' which to some extent indicate their contents, are: Zera'im (Seeds), containing eleven treatises; Mo'ed (Festival), containing twelve treatises; Nashim (Women), containing seven treatises; Nezikin (Injuries), containing ten treatises; and Yadim (Purifications), containing twelve treatises.

Now the Mishna forms the basis of the Talmud; for just as the Mishna is a compilation of expositions, commentaries, etc., of the Written Law, and embodies itself in the Oral Law, so the Talmud is an expansion, by means of comment and explanation, of the Mishna; as the Mishna contains the Pentateuch, with all the additional explanatory matter, so the Talmud contains the Mishna with a great deal more additional matter. 'The Talmud is practically a mere amplification of the Mishna by manifold comments and additions; so that even those portions of the Mishna which have no Talmud are regarded as component parts of it. . . . The history of the origin of the Talmud is the same as that of the Mishna—a tradition, transmitted orally for centuries, and was finally cast into definite literary form, although from the moment in which the Talmud became the chief subject of study in the academies it had a double existence (see below), and was accordingly, in its final stage, redacted in two different forms' (Bacher in JE xii. 39).

Before coming to speak of the actual Talmud itself, it may be well to explain some terms without an understanding of which our whole subject would be very inadequately understood.

HALAKAH. It is the entire legal body of Jewish oral tradition is included; it comes from a verb meaning 'to go,' and expresses the way 'of going' or acting, i.e. custom, usage, which ultimately lies in law. Originally it was used in the plural form Halakhoth, which had reference to the multiform civil and ritual laws, customs, decrees etc., as handed down by tradition, which were not, however, of Scriptural authoritv. This was the Halakhah which were redacted by Jehudah ha-Nasi, and to which the term Mishna became applied. Sometimes the word Halakah is used for 'tradition,' which is binding, in contradistinction to the term 'argument,' lit. 'judgment,' which is not necessarily binding.

HAGGADAH (from the root meaning 'to narrate').—This includes the whole of the non-legal matter of Rabbinical literature, such as homilies, stories about Biblical events and heroes; besides this it touches upon such subjects as astronomy, astrology, medicine, magic, philosophy, and all that would come under the term 'folklore.' This word, too, was originally used in the plural Haggadoth.
Haggadah is also used in a special sense of the ritual for Passover Eve.

GEMARA. This is an Aramaic word from the root meaning 'to learn,' and has the signification of 'that which has been learned,' i.e. learning that has been handed down by tradition (Bacher in JE, art. 'Talmud');
it has also the meaning 'completion'; in this sense it came to be used as a synonym of Talmud.

This is a special Halakah. When Jehudah ha-Nasi compiled his Mishna, there was a great deal of the Oral Tradition which he excluded from it (see above); other teachers, however, the most important of whom was R. Johanan, gathered the excluded portions into a special collection; these Halakhoth, which are known as Baraithoth, were incorporated into the Talmud; the discussions on them in the Talmud occupy many folios.

TANNAIM ("Teachers").—This was the technical term applied to the teachers of the Mishna; after the close of the Mishna period those who explained it were no more called 'Teachers,' but only 'Commentators' ('Amoraim); the dicta of the Tannaim could not be questioned excepting by a Yannait, but an exception was made in the case of Jehudah ha-Nasi, who was permitted to question the truth of Tannaitic pronuncia-ment.

There are two Talmuds, the 'Jerusalem' or 'Talmud of Palestine' and the 'Babylonian,' known respectively by their abbreviated forms 'Yerushalmi' and 'Babili.'
The material which went to make up the Talmud had been preparing in the academies, the centres of Jewish learning, of Palestine, chief among which was Tiberias; it was from here that Rabbi Johanan issued the Yerushalmi in its earliest form, during the middle of the 3rd cent. A.D. The first editor, or at all events the first compiler, of the Babili was Rabbi Aeshi (d. a.d. 430), who presided over the academy of Sura. Both these Talmuds were constantly being added to, and the Yerushalmi was not finally closed until the end of the 4th cent., the Babili not until the beginning of the 6th.
The characteristics which differentiated the academies of Palestine from those of Babylonia have left their marks upon the two Talmuds; in Palestine the tendency was to preserve and stereotype tradition, without permitting it to develop itself along natural channels; the result was that the Yerushalmi became choked with traditionalism, circumscribed in its horizon, and in consequence was regarded with less veneration than the Babili, and has always occupied a position of subordinate importance in comparison with this latter. In the Babylonian academies, on the other hand, there was a widener outlook, a freer spirit of criticism, and, while tradition was venerated, it was not permitted to impede development in all directions; the Babili therefore absorbed the thought and learning of all Israel's teachers, and is richer in material; it contains, besides the Yerushalmi, a much freer and freer Haggadic and legal material, and is more importantly, than the Yerushalmi. In order to give some idea of what the Talmud is, and of the enormous masses of material gathered together there, the following example may be cited, abbreviated from Bacher (or, p. xii. 3). It will be remembered that the Talmud is a commentary on the Mishna. In the beginning of the latter occurs this paragraph: 'During what time in the evening is the halakhah permitted? During the reading of the Shema, or when the priests go in to eat their leaven (Lv 22)? Until the end of the first watch of the night, such being the words of R. Eleazar. The sages, however, say until midnight, though R. Gamaliel says till the coming of the 晨. This is the text upon which the Yerushalmi then comments in three sections; the first section contains the following: a citation from a baraita with two sayings from R. Jose to explain the verse, and a quotation of one who is in doubt whether he has read the Shema; another passage from a baraita, designating the appearance of the stars as an indication of the time in question; further explanations and passages on the appearance of the stars and the rituals, etc. It may be noted that the Talmud is a Rabbinical saying; a baraita on the division between day and night, and other passages bearing on the same subject; discussion of other barai das, and further Haggadic
sayings; a baraita on the reading of the Shema in the synagogue;
other Rabbinical and Haggadic matter; further Haggadic
sayings; lastly, section gives R. Gamaliel's view, compared with that of another Rabbi, together with a question which remains unanswered.

This is, of course, the merest skeleton of an example of the mass of commentary which is dealt with in the Mishna, section by section. Although the Haggadic element plays a much less important rôle than the Halakah, still the former is well represented, and is often employed for purposes of edification and re duction, as well as for instructive purposes. The following outline of a Haggadic passage from the Yerushalmi will serve as an example: It is intended as a rebuke to 'Scandal-mongers,' and a text (Dt 19) is taken as a starting-point, namely,
"How can I myself alone bear your combrances and your burden and your strife?" It then continues: 'How did our forefathers worry Moses with their combrances?
TAMULM

In that they were constantly sandering him, and indeed with intentions to him in everything he did. If he happened to come out of his house rather earlier than usual, it was said: 'Why has he gone out so early to-day? There has no doubt been some question at home.' If, on the other hand, he had gone out a little later than usual, it was said: 'What has been occupying him so long indoors? Assuredly he has been concocting plans to oppress the people yet more.' (Bernfeld, Der Talmud, p. 46.)

One other example: In pointing out the evils which come from a father's favouring one son above the others, it is said: 'This should not be done, for because of the cost of many colours which the patriarch Jacob gave his favourite son Joseph (On 37th), all Israel went down into Egypt.' (ib. p. 47.)

Haggadot flourished, as regards quality, more in the Yerushalmi than in the Babli; for in the Babylonian schools intellectual acumen ranked supreme; there was but little room for the play of the emotions or for the development of poetical imagination: these were rather the property of Palestinian soil. Therefore, although the Haggadic version of Gnt is, so far as it is, much fuller in the Babli than in the Yerushalmi, it is, generally speaking, of a far less attractive character in the former than in the latter. The fact that the Haggadic version is much more prominent in Babli, of which there are many forms, according to Weiss, more than one-third, while it constitutes only one-sixth of Yerushalmi, was due, in general, to the cause of the development of Hebrew Haggadah in Babylonia. The Haggadic writings were accordingly collected in the Talmud (Je xi. 12). But the Haggadah, whether in the Babli or in the Babli, did not occupy its former place, for in its origin, as we have seen, the Talmud was a commentary on the Mishna, which was a collection of Halakah; and although the Haggadic portions are of much greater human interest, it is the Halakah portions that form the bulk of the Talmud, and that constitute its importance as the fountainhead of Jewish belief and theology.

2. Authority of the Talmud.—Inasmuch as the Oral Law, which with its comments and explanations is what constitutes the Talmud, is regarded as of equal authority with the Written Law, it will be clear that the Talmud is regarded, at all events by orthodox Jews, as the highest and final authority on all matters of faith. It is true that in the Talmud itself the letter of Scripture is always distinctly differentiated from the rest; but, in the first place, the comments and explanations declare what Scripture means, and without this official explanation the Scriptural passage would lose much of its practical value for the Jew; and, in the second place, it is firmly believed that the oral laws preserved in the Talmud were delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai. It is therefore no exaggeration to say that the Talmud is of equal authority with Scripture. The eighth principle of the Jewish creed runs: 'I firmly believe that the Law which we possess now is the same which has been given to Moses on Mount Sinai.' In commenting on this in what may not unjustly be described as the official handbook for the orthodox Jewish Religion, the writer says: 'The particular explanations and details of the law were, supplemented by oral teaching; they were handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation, and only after the destruction of the second temple were they committed to writing. The latter are, nevertheless, called Oral Law, as distinguished from the Torah or Written Law, which from the first was committed to writing. Those oral laws which were revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai are called 'Laws given to Moses on Mount Sinai.' (M. Friedlander, The Jewish Religion [revised and enlarged ed., 1900], p. 136.) It is clear from this that the Written Law of the Bible, and the Oral Law as contained in the Talmud, are of equal authority. The Talmud is again referred to as 'the final authority in Judaism' by the writer of a later exposition of the Jewish faith (M. Joseph, Judaism as Creed and Life, 1908, p. viii.). One other authoritative teacher may be quoted: As a document of religion the Talmud acquired that authority which is due to it as the written embodiment of the ancient tradition, and it fulfilled the task which the men of the Great Assembly set for the representatives of the tradition when they said, 'Make a hesed for the Torah.' Those who professed Judaism felt no doubt that the Talmud was equal to the Bible as a source of instruction and decision in problems of religion, and every effort to set forth religious teaching in a new form was accomplished in the Talmud. As to whether such references are to be found or not is one which cannot yet be said to have been decided one way or the other. The frequent mention of the Masam is held by many to refer to Christians; others maintain that by these are meant philosophizing Jews, who were regarded as heretics. This is not the place to discuss the question: we can only refer to two works, which approach it from different points of view, and which deal very adequately with it: Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, by H. T. Hertford (London, 1903), and Die religiösen Bewegungen innerhalb der Zeitalter Jesu, by M. Friedlander (Berlin, 1903).

TAMUZ.—1. A Canaanite woman, married to Er and then to his brother Onan (see Marriage, 4). Tamar became by her father-in-law himself the mother of twin sons, Perez and Zerah (Gen 38, Rv 42, 1 Ch 2, Mt 1).

2. The beautiful sister of Absalom, who was violated and brutally insulted by her half-brother, Amnon (2 Sam 13). 3. A daughter of Absalom (2 Sam 14). 4. See next article.

TAMAR.—In Ezek 47:24 48:3 the S.E. boundary-mark of the restored kingdom of Israel. No proposed identification has been successful, since no place of this name has been found in the region required, that is, near the S. end of the Dead Sea. It is possibly the same place that is mentioned in 1 K 9:4 as one of the S. fortresses built up by Solomon. Here a variant Heb. reading has Tadmon (wh. see)—a manifest error, which is perhaps borrowed from the parallel passage 2 Ch 8:4.

J. F. McCurdy.

TAMMISI (‘bashel’).—This name occurs in RV (only) three times; on 21st AV ‘grove,’ mg. ‘tree’; 1 S 22 AV ‘tree,’ mg. ‘grove;’ 1 S 31 4 AV ‘tree.’ The RV rendering is based upon an identification of the ‘tree’ of the Arab. ’akhš, with the Heb. ’ashš. This gives ‘tamarisk’ for the special of EV in Jer 17:5 (cf. 48), but probably a species of juniper is intended here. There are some eight species of tamarisks, and three of them are widespread in the Mediterranean Plain and the Jordan Valley. Though mostly but shrubs, some species attain to the size of large trees. They are characterized by their brittle feathery branches and minute scale-like leaves.

TAMMUZ (Ezek 8:1) was a Babylonian god whose worship spread into Phoenicia. The name appears to be Sumerian, Dumuzi, Tamuz, and may mean ‘son of life,’

TANHUMETH

He was a form of the Sun-god and bridegroom of Ishtar. He was celebrated as a shepherd, cut off in early life or slain by the boar (wilder). Ishtar descended to Hades to bring him back to life. He was married on the second of the month Tammus (June). His Canaanite name Adonai gave rise to the Greek Adonis, and he was later identified with the Egyptian Osiris. In Am 5:8 and Zec 12:10 the mourning for 'the only son' may be a reference to this annual mourning, and the words of the refrain, 'Ah me, ah me!' (Jer 22:4) may be recalled.

TANHUMETH.—The father (?) of Serah, one of the Heb. captains who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25:2, Jer 40:5).

TANIS (Jth 19).—See ZOAN.

TANNER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 5.

TAPPHAH.—Daughter of Solomon and wife of Ben-ahinadab (1 K 4:1).

TAPPUH.—1. A 'son' of Hebron (1 Ch 2:9). Probably the name is that of a town in the Shephelah (Jos 15:4). It was probably to the N. of Wady es-Susit, but the site has not been recovered. 2. See Ex-TAPPUH. 3. One of the towns W. of Jordan whose kings Joshua smote (Jos 12:24). It was perhaps the same place as No. 2 above; but this is by no means certain. See also TEBHAL and TAPHON.

TARALAH.—An unknown town of Benjamin (Jos 18:26).

TAREA.—See TAHREE.

TARES (Gr. zizania, Arab. zuwan) are certain kinds of darnel growing plentifully in cornfields. The bearded darnel (Lotus temulentum) most resembles wheat. The seeds, though often poisonous to human beings on account of parasitic growths in them, are sold as chicken's food. When harvest approaches and the tares can be distinguished, they are carefully weeded out by hand by women and children (cf. Mt 13:24-30).

TARGUMS.—Originally the word targum meant 'translation' in reference to any language; but it acquired a restricted meaning, and came to be used only of translation from Hebrew into Aramaic. As early as the time of Ezra we find the verb used in reference to a document written in Aramaic (Ezr 4:7), though in this passage the addition 'in Aramaic' is made, showing that the restricted meaning had not yet come into vogue. As early as the time of the Second Temple the language of the Holy Scriptures in Hebrew was not read as it was understood by the bulk of the Jewish people, for it had been supplanted by Aramaic. When, therefore, the Scriptures were read in synagogues, it became necessary to explain them, in order that they might be understood by the congregation. The official translator who performed this duty was called the mathuragan or targeman, which is equivalent to the modern dragoman ('interpreter'). The way in which it was done was as follows:—In the case of the Pentateuch (the 'Law') a verse was read in Hebrew, and then translated into Aramaic, and so on to the end of the appointed portion; but in the case of the prophetic writings three verses were read and then translated. Whether this system was the custom originally may be doubted; it was probably done in a less formal way at first. By degrees the translation became stereotyped, and was ultimately reduced to writing; and thus the Targums, the Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible, came into existence. The various Targums which are still extant will be enumerated below. As literary products they are of late date, but they occupy a highly important place in post-Biblical Jewish religious literature, because they embody the traditional exegesis of the Scriptures. They have for many centuries ceased to be used in the synagogue; from the 9th cent. onwards their use has been discontinued. It is, however, interesting to note an exception in the case of Southern Arabia, where the custom still survives; and in Bokhara the Persian Jews read the Targum, with the Persian paraphrase of it, to the lesson from the Prophets for the last day of the Passover Feast, namely, 10th-12th. There are Targums to all the books of the Bible, with the exception of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah; as the Targum is only an approximate written in Aramaic, one can understand why Targums to these books should be wanting. Most of the Targums are mainly paraphrases; the only one which is in the form of a translation in the modern sense of the word is the Targum of the Pentateuch; this is, on the whole, a fairly literal translation. Isolated passages in the Bible which are written in Aramaic, as in Genesis and Jeremiah, are also called Targums. The following is a list of the Targums which are in existence:

1. Targum of Onkelos to the Pentateuch, called also Targum Rabhi, i.e. the Babylonian Targum.
2. The Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, called also Targum Jerushalmi, i.e. the Jerusalem Targum.
3. The Fragment Targum to the Pentateuch.
4. The Targum of Jonathan to the prophetic books (these include what we call the historical books).
5. The Targum Jerushalmi to the prophetic books.
6. The Targum to the Psalms.
7. The Targum to Job.
8. The Targum to Proverbs.
9-10. The Targums to the Five Megillot (Rols), namely: Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther; the Book of Esther has three Targums to it.
14. The Targum to Chronicles.

For printed editions of these, reference may be made to the bibliographies given in Schürer, HTP 1 i. pp. 160-163, and in the JEs xi. 58.

To come now to a brief description of these Targums:

The Targum of Onkelos is the oldest of all the Targums that have come down to us; it is for the most part a literal translation of the Pentateuch, of which and these assuming the form of a paraphrase. The name of this Targum owes its origin to a passage in the Babylonian Talmud (Megillah, 3a), in which it is said: 'The Targum of the Pentateuch was composed by the proselyte Onkelos at the dictation of Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Joshua'; and in the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, 71c) it is said: 'Aquila the proselyte translated the Pentateuch in the presence of Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Joshua. That Aquila is the same as Onkelos can scarcely admit of doubt. In the tractate Abodah Zara, 11a, we are told that this Onkelos was the pupil of Rabbi Gamaliel the Elder, who lived in the second half of the 1st cent. A.D. and was one that this Targum was of the last generation tradition, it will be clear that we have in it an ancient witness to Jewish exegesis; indeed, it is the earliest example of Midrashic tradition that we possess; and not only so, but as this Targum is mainly an interpretation, it is a most important authority for the pre-Massoretic text of the Pentateuch. This shows of what high value the Targum of Onkelos is, and that it is not without reason that it has always been regarded with great veneration. It is characteristic of the Targum of Onkelos that, unlike the other Targums, the Midrashic element is greatly subordinated to simple translation; when it does appear it is mainly in poetic passages, though not exclusively (cf. Gr 49, Nu 24, Dt 32.33), which are prophetic in character. The idea apparently was that greater licence was permitted in dealing with passages of this kind than with those in which the legal element predominated. As with the Targums generally, so with that of Onkelos, there is a marked tendency to avoid anthropomorphisms and expressions which might appear derogatory to the dignity of God; this may be seen, for example, in Gn 11. Our text here the words 'The Lord came down,' which are anthropomorphic, are rendered in this Targum, 'the Lord revealed Himself.' Then again, the transcendent character of the Almighty is emphasized by substituting for the Divine Person intermediate agencies like the Memra, or ‘Word’ of God, the Shekinah, or ‘Glory’ of God, to which a more or less distinct personality is imputed. In this way it was sought to avoid ascribing to God Himself actions or words which were deemed unfitting to the inexpressible majesty and transcendence of the Almighty. A good example of this, and one which will also illustrate the general character of this Targum, is the following; it is the rendering of Gn 3:8:

And they heard the voice of the Word (Memra) of the Lord God walking in the garden in the evening of the day; and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God among the trees of the garden. And the Lord God called and said: ‘Where art thou?’ And he said: ‘The voice of Thy Word (Memra) I heard in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I would hide.’

The other Targum to the Pentateuch, the Targum Jerushalmi, has come down to us in two forms; one in a complete form, the other only in fragments, hence the name of this Fragment Targum. The fragments have been gathered from a variety of sources, from manuscripts and from quotations found in the writings of ancient authors. Being written in the fragmentary character of this ancient Hebrew, it is of much less value than the ‘Targum Jerushalmi.’ This latter is sometimes erroneously called the ‘Targum of Jonathan ben Uziel on the Pentateuch’; but though this Targum has been ascribed to the authorship of the Targum to the Prophets which bears his name (see below), there was not the slightest ground for ascribing to him the authorship of the Targum to the Pentateuch (‘Targum Jerushalmi’). The Targum to the Prophets is more interesting. In its abbreviated form this Targum was referred to as ‘Targum J;’ this ‘J,’ of which course stood for ‘Jerushalmi,’ was taken to refer to ‘Jonathan’ and is generally accepted. Targum to the Prophets; thus it came about that this Targum to the Pentateuch, as well as the Targum to the Prophets, was called the Targum of Jonathan. So tenaciously has the wrong name clung to this Targum, that a kind of compromise is made as to its title, and it is now usually known as the ‘Targum of pseudo-Jonathan.’

In one important respect this Targum is quite similar to that of Onkelos, namely, in its avoidance of anthropomorphisms, and in its close connection with Josephus, too close contact with man; for example, in Ex 34:6 we have the words: ‘And the Lord descended in a cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord. And he appeared to this Targum in a roundabout way, and says that ‘Jehovah revealed Himself in the clouds of the glory of His Shekinah,’ thus avoiding what in the original text appeared to detract from the divinity of the Almighty. This kind of thing occurs with great frequency, and it is both interesting and important, as showing the evolution of the ideas of God among the Jews (see Oesterley and Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, ch. viii., [1907]). But in other respects the ‘Targum Jerushalmi’ (or ‘Targum of pseudo-Jonathan’) differs from that of Onkelos, especially in its being far less a translation than a paraphrase. The following extracts will give a good idea of the character of this Targum; it is the paraphrase of Gn 50:26: ‘And the Lord of the clouds was revealed to him in the valley of Mamre; and he, being in great pain of circumstances, sat at the门口 of the tabernacle in the heat of the day. And he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, three angels in the resemblance of men were standing before him; angels who had been sent from the necessity of three things—because it is not possible for a ministering angel to be sent for more than one purpose at a time—one, then, had come to make known to him that Sarah should bear a son-child; one had come to deliver Lot; and one to overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah. And when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the door of the tent, and bowed himself to the earth.’

The Targum of Jonathan to the Prophets owes its name to an ancient tradition, according to which Jonathan ben Uziel composed it ‘from the mouths of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi’ (Megillah, 3a); this is merely a figurative way of saying that the traditional interpretation, as supposed to have been handed down by the prophets, was ascribed to Jonathan. The latter was a pupil of Hillel, and wrote (according to the passage just referred to) for the purpose of removing ‘all impediments to the understanding of the Scriptures’ (JE vii. 238). It is said of this Jonathan that when he sat down and occupied himself with the study of the Law, every bird that happened to fly over his head was burned; the reason of this was that so many angels gathered around him in order to bear the words of the Law in their mind (Succah, 28a [Weber, Jud. Theol., p. xviii.]). That Jonathan had the Targum of Onkelos before him when he wrote is proved by the fact that whole passages from Onkelos are incorporated verbatim in his Targum. As a pupil of Hillel, Jonathan lived during the middle and end of the 1st cent. a.d., so that the date of his Targum may safely be stated to be the end of the first century. An interesting example of the Targum of this series is the following paraphrase of Is 52:14: ‘Behold, my servant the Messiah shall prosper, he shall be exalted and exalted, and shall be very strong. Like as the battery was before it; so shall he scatter them. He put his right hand upon his mouth, for which that had not been told them shall they see, and that which they had not heard they shall consider.’ In the whole of this chapter it is evident that the passages which refer to the humiliation of the Servant are interpreted of the people of Israel, while those which speak of the glory of the Servant are referred to the Messiah (Oesterley and Box, op. cit. p. 49).

Of much later date, and also more important than the Targums of Onkelos, pseudo-Jonathan, or Jonathan, is the Targum Jerusalmi to the Prophets. According to JE xii. 61, ‘Most of the quotations given in the Targum Jerusalmi are Haggadic additions, often traceable to the Babylonian Talmud, so that this Palestinian Targum to the Prophets belongs to a later period, when the Babylonian Talmud had begun to exert an influence on Palestinian Talmudic literature. There are not many remains extant of this Targum; most of the extracts in existence are citations in the writings of Rashi and David Kimchi; the largest number of extracts found together are those in the eleventh century Codex Recanellianus, edited by Garde, Prophetae Chaldaicae.

Of the remaining Targums not much need be said; those to the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job show a close relationship and are usually assigned to the same author; they belong to the latter half of the seventh century. They are to a large extent translations, though a considerable Haggadic element is to be found in them, especially in the Targum to Job. The Targums to the five Megilloth are likewise post-Talmudic; in all five translation plays a subordinate part, the prevailing element being Midrashic; this reaches its height in the Song of Songs. Of the three Targums to the second, known as Targum Shenai, has always been extremely popular. The latest of all the Targums is that to Chronicles; it is strongly Haggadic, and is of but little importance.

The Targums are important not only for the light they throw on Jewish theology, but also, especially, as a thesaurus of ancient Jewish exegesis; in this way they often throw much light on the use of the OT by the NT writers; in particular, it can be shown that the NT often agrees with the ancient Syna-
TARPETLITES

TARPELITES.—One of the peoples settled in the cities of Samaria (Ezr 4:4); text doubtful.

TARSHISH.—I. See following article. 2. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 7:29). 3. One of the seven princes who had right of access to the royal presence (Est 11:9). 4. The name of a precious stone (Ex 28:30; 36, Ezek 14:10: 12: 28:14, 21:5, 10). See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

TARSHISH is frequently mentioned in the OT, but its position is never definitely indicated. From an old and 4th we may infer that it was far from Palestine, probably in the extreme west of the Mediterranean. If Sheba and Dedan stand for the commerce of the East, Tarshish may stand for that of the West (Ezk 28:12). The Greeks were in touch with Tarshish on the 7th and 6th cents. B.C. (Herod. i. 163, iv. 152). The inclusion of Tarshish among the 'sons' of Javan (Gen 10:1, 1 Ch 1:17) may be due to the Mutinomad speaks of Tarshish as Tutrike. Gozarn (Phenian, ii. 7) identifies this with the Andalusian plain in S.W. Spain, watered by the Bota (mod. Guadalquivir). The Greek name Tarassos may possibly come through an Aram. form, Tarass, from Tarshish. It may have derived its name from a city (Strabo, i. 147 ff.). The name Tarassom occurs in a commercial treaty (Polyb. iii. 24) referring to a city of the Carthaginians in Spain.

Max Müller (Hastings' D.B. a. i.) favours a suggestion of Chayun, that Tarshish may be identical with Tiras (Gen 10:12). Vocalizing Tarshish with Josephus (Ant. i. 1. 1; he identifies with Cilician Tarshus, which to the present writer appears improbable), we get the Tyrians, Tyrrhenians, or Etruscans—intrigued, piratical people, called Tarshah by the ancient Egyptians.

In either case Tarshish would be folly named with Tyrie, iron, tin, and lead (Jer 10, Ezek 27:22). The ships of Tarshish did not necessarily belong to or trade with Tarshish. The name is used of the ships of Jehoshaphat and Ahabiah, which sailed for Ophi in Ezion-geber (1 K 22:24, 2 Ch 18:3). The Chronicle's explanatory phrase (v. 25) is erroneous. The cargo brought by Solomon's ships of Tarshish' shows that its voyages must have been eastward, not westward (1 K 10:22, 2 Ch 93). The name probably denoted specially large merchant vessels, designed for distant voyages (Ps 48:8, 15:293, Ezek 27:21, W. Ew.).

TARSUS, the capital of the Roman province of Cilicia (Ac 22:2) in the S.E. of Asia Minor, and the birthplace of St. Paul, is a place about which much more might be known than is known only the necessary money were forthcoming to excavate the ancient city in the way that Pompeli, Olympia, Pergamum, and other cities have been excavated. It would be impossible to exaggerate the value which would accrue to the study of St. Paul's life and writings and of Christian origins, if such a work were satisfactorily carried out. It may be commended to the whole Christian Church as a pressing duty of the utmost importance. Tarsus, as a city whose institutions combined Oriental and Western characteristics, was signally fitted to be the birthplace and training ground of him who was to make known to the Gentile world the ripest development of Hebrew religion.

Tarsus (modern Tarsus) is situated in the plain of Cilicia, about 70 to 80 feet above sea level, and about 10 miles from the S. coast. The level plain stretches to the north of it for about 2 miles, and then begins to rise gradually till it merges in the lofty Taurus range about 30 miles north. The climate of the low-lying city must always have been oppressive and unfavourable to energetic action, but the undulating country to the north was utilized to counteract its effects. About 9 to 12 miles north of the city proper there was a second Tarsus, within the territory of the main Tarsus, in theory a summer residence merely, but in reality a fortified town of importance, permanently inhabited. It was to periodical residence in this second city among the hills that the population owed the name of Tarshish. In Roman times the combined cities of Tarsus contained a large population, probably not much less than a million.
TARUS

for about five centuries Tarsus was really an Oriental city. Greek influence began again with Alexander the Great, but made very slight progress. During the fourth century Tarsus was subject to the Greek kings of Syria of the Seleucid dynasty. It continued during the third century in abject submission to them. The peace of n.c. 189 changed the position of Cilicia. Previous to that date it had been in the middle of the Seleucid territory. Now it became a frontier country. About n.c. 175–164 Tarsus was re-organized by Antiochus iv Epiphanes as an autonomous city under the name Antioch-on-the-Cilysus (cf. 2 Mac 491. 28). It is extremely probable that the exact date of this re-founder was n.c. 171–170; the new name lasted only a few years. Not only Tarsus, but a number of other Cilician cities also were re-organized at this time, but Tarsus received the most honourable treatment.

The population of this re-instituted Tarsus, in addition to what remained of the earlier population, consisted of about over ten thousand people. The Dorians form the leading element. It is almost certain that, in accordance with the regular Seleucid practice, a large body of Jews also was added to the population by Antiochus. These would be in close connection with them. The former is represented as sitting at a table, with left hand resting on a sceptor, and the right holding corn or grapes. The latter stands on a lion, wears bow-case and sword, and holds a bratich or flower in his right hand. In his left he is represented within a portable shrine. A. SOUTHER.

TARTAK.—An idol introduced by the Avvites into Samaria when Sargon of Assyria transported them thither (2 K 17. 12) and which was connected with another called Nibhzah, and, according to the Babylonian Talmud, was worshipped in the form of an ass. In Assyro-Babylonian mythology no such deity is at present provable; moreover, the geographical position of the Avvites is uncertain, and the deity may have been in one of the western States of Asia. The Greek text 'A’ replaces Turtak by Nibhas, but this may be merely a corruption of Nibhzah.

TARTAN.—The title borne by two Assyrian officers, one of whom was sent by Sargon to Ashdod (Is 20), while the other, with the Rab-sar, was a Rab-shahak, or sent by Sennacherib, and the other by the Assyrian emperor. The latter was a son of the emperor of Jerusalem (2 K 19). The word is a transcription of Heb. of the Assyrian tar'ianu or tar'tanu, the title borne by the commander-in-chief of the army. L. W. TASSEL.—See Fringes.

TAREDIT.—The name of the governor of CelyCyna and Phoenicia under Darius Hystaspis (Est 5. 4 9). He is called in 1 Es 6. 7. 17. 31. 71 Sinanes, which is simply a reproduction in Greek of a Persian name Thikinatwa (orig. Thathamia), with aspirated t.

TAVERNER'S BIBLE.—See English Versions, 21.

TAVERNS, TIBER (Late Tress Tabernæ).—A name of uncertain origin, which might be translated 'three roads' or 'three ways'. It was a station on the Appian Road (built n.c. 321) which went from Rome to Benevento along the west coast. This was the principal road for all travellers to or from the S. and E., except those who embarked at Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. The village was near the Roman miles from Rome, and to this point many Christians walked, or drove, to meet St. Paul on his arrival in Italy from the E. (Ac 28).

TAW.—The twenty-second letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 22nd part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

TEBAH.—A 'son' of Nahor (Gen 224). See Tihath.

TEBALLAH.—A Merarite gatekeeper (1 Ch 261).

TEBETH.—See Time.

TEHAPHNEES (Ezek 304).—See Tahpanhes.

TEHINNAH.—(Ezr 304).—See Tahpanhes.

TEIGITREE.—Is 68, AV mistranslation of 'terebinth' (wh. see, and cf. art. Oak (1)).

TEKEL.—See Mene Mene Tekel Upharsin.

TEKOA (2 Ch 114 etc.); Tekoah, 2 S 144, 6 (AV), 1 Mon 40 (RV, AV Tekoah).—A fortress city on the edge of the wilderness to which Jeremiah gave its name (2 Ch 205). From here came the 'wise woman' sent by Joab to plead for Absalom (2 S 144-45); Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 114), and apparently continued to be a fortress (Jer 6); Amos 'was among the herdmen of Tekoa' (Am 1). Tekoa is mentioned also in LXX in Jos 154, and in the genealogies in 1 Ch 44. The site is now Khurbet Teqwa, an extended but shapeless mass of ruins crowning an important hill (over 1700 ft. above sea level), 5 miles S.W. of Bethel. It is on the extreme edge of the cultivated lands. Bethel, the Mt. of Olives, and Nebi Samwil (Mizpah) are all visible from it.

E. W. G. Maspero.

TEL-ABIB (perh. 'hill of corn').—A place on the Chebar (Ezek 34) site unknown.

TEL-AMA.—An Ephraimite (1 Ch 72).

TELAIM ('the lambs').—The place at which Saul concentrated his forces, and numbered his fighting men before his campaign against the Amalekites (1 S 15). The LXX reads Figal for Telaim, and Josephus (Ant. vi, vii. 2) also makes Figal the place of assembly. A more suitable locality for the place of assembly would, however, be in the Negeb, or South; and here lay TEL-AZAR (see Azar), with which Telaim is probably identical.

TELASSAR. ('Asheur's hill or mound').—This city is mentioned with Gozan, Hanani, and Rehob, and is spoken of as a place inhabited by 'the children of Eden' (2 K 193, Is 37). The Assyrian inscriptions apparently mention two places so called; one being Tsd-abat, mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III, which had a renowned temple dedicated to Merodach, and is stated to have been a Babylonian foundation. The other, written Tsd-aburti, is referred to by Esarhaddon as having been 'destroyed by the people of Mihru', to which he seems to say, called it Pitdnu. It was inhabited by the people of Barnaku or Parnaku—a name which Deltzsch points out as similar to the Parnach of Nu 3624. This Tsd-aburti is supposed to have lain near the land of Mitanni (Upper Mesopotamia), which would find support if Mihru be connected with the Mehru mentioned by Tukulti-Ninib (-Nirig) 1. T. Pinches.

TELEM.—1. A gatekeeper who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 109); called in 1 Es 99 Thelarsa; perhaps the same as Talmon of Neh 125. 2. See Telm.

TEL-HARSHA.—A Babylonian town of unknown site (Ezr 296, Neh 79); called in 1 Es 58 Thelarsa.

TEILL.—See Tale.

TELMAELAH ('hill of salt').—A Babylonian town of unknown site (Ezr 296, Neh 79); called in 1 Es 58 Thermoleth.

TEMA.—In Gn 258 (1 Ch 19), a son of Ishmael. The country and people meant are still represented by the same name—the modern Taïma, a large oasis about 200 miles S.E. of the head of the Gulf of 'Akbah, and the same distance due N. of Medina in W. Arabia. It was an important community in ancient times, mentioned in Assyrian, annals of the 8th cent. B.C., and later inhabited in part by Armenians, who have left inscriptions. It was noted for its caravan traffic (Is 214), as might be expected from its position on the great trade routes. J. F. McCurdy.

TEMAH.—A family of Nethinim (Ezr 296, Neh 79) = 1 Es 58 Thomei.

TEMAN.—A tribe (and district) of Edom, whose importance is indicated by its prominent position of the eldest son of the eldest son (Eliphaz) of Esau (Gen 256g; cf. v. 4), and by its being taken along with Bozrah (wh. see) to represent the whole land of Edom (Am 1; cf. Ob 5). Ez 293 implies that Edom stretches from Teman to Dedan, from which we infer that the former lay in the north-east of the territory claimed by Edom, that is, to the S.E. of Moab. Its inhabitants were renowned for wisdom (Jer 49), and the chief of Job's counsellors was Eliphaz. 'The Temanite' (Job 21). J. F. McCurdy.

TEMENI.—The 'son' of Ashur (1 Ch 4).

TEMPERANCE.—1. In the RV 'temperance' is the tr. of the Gr. enkrateia, the root-meaning of which is 'power over oneself,' self-mastery. It is a comprehensive virtue, and on this account, 'self-control,' the tr. of RVm, is to be preferred (Ac 249, Gal 52, 2 P 1). The corresponding adjective is found only in Tit 1, and the verb only in 1 Co 73. The negative form of the adjective is 'without self-control' (2 Ti 3), and of the noun 'excess' (Mi 23), and 'inconstancy' (1 Co 7). The RV tr. another Gr. word (nephiadote) 'temperate' is in 1 Ti 3, ii. Tit 2; its root-meaning points to the avoidance of intemperance in the form of drunkenness, but in actual usage it condemns all forms of self-indulgence. This extension of its significance must be remembered in expounding the passages in which the corresponding verb is found, for the RV always tr. it (nephein) 'to be sober' (1 Th 54, 2 Ti 4, 1 P 54). 3. From the philosophic point of view, 'self-control' is mastery over the passions; it is the virtue which holds the appetites in check; the rational will has power to regulate conduct without being unduly swayed by sensuous appetites. From the NT point of view the grace of 'self-control' is the result of the Holy Spirit's indwelling; it is the Spirit-controlled personality alone that is 'strengthened with power' (Eph 3, cf. 54) to control rebellious desires and to resist the allurements of corrupting pleasures. 2. The NT passages in which reference is made to this virtue form an instructive study. To Felix, with an adulteress by his side, St. Paul discoursed of 'self-control,' directing his stern condemnation against the vice of unchastity (cf. 1 Co 72, 5). But to every form of 'excess' (Mi 23) it is directly opposed. In 1 Ti 3 not given over to wine (paroxinos, AV 'brawler,' cf. RVm) balances 'temperate' (v. 5), and from this chapter it is plain that the Apostle regards violent quarrelling (v. 5), false and reckless speech (v. 5), self-conceit (v. 5), greed of filthy lucre (v. 5), as well as fondness for much wine (v. 5), as manifold forms of intemperance by whose means men 'fall into reproach and the snare of the devil' (v. 7). 4. 'Self-control,' in its widest sense, as including mastery over all tempers, appetites, and passions, has a prominent place in two NT lists of the Christian graces. In 2 P 1, faith is regarded as the germ of every virtue; it lays hold of the 'divine power' which makes possible the life of godliness (v. 2). The evolution of faith in 'manliness, knowledge, self-control' is the reward of its 'different culture' (v. 8). This 'self-control,' as Principal Iverach says, grows out of knowledge, it is using Christian knowledge for the guidance of life (The Other Side of Greatness, p. 110). 1. Gal 55 'self-control' closes the list of Christian graces which are all the 'fruit of the Spirit,' just as 'drunkenness and revellings' close the list of 'the works of the flesh' (v. 13). The flesh and the Spirit.—these, indeed, are 'contrary the one to the other' (v. 17). The flesh triumphs when the Spirit is quenched; but the Spirit's victory is gained, not by suppressing, but by controlling, the flesh. Those who are 'in the flesh' (v. 19) who 'live by the Spirit' and 'by the Spirit also walk' (v. 2) attain, in its perfection, the grace of complete 'self-control.'

TEMPEST.—See GALLIER [Sea off], 3; WEHRLEIN.

TECH. —1. The first Temple mentioned in connexion with the worship of J is that of Shiloh (1 S 1), 'where the ark of God was (9) in the period of the Judges, under the guardianship of Eli and his sons (W.). It was evidently destroyed by the Philistines after their decisive victory which resulted in the capture of the ark, as recorded in 1 Sa. 4; for the descendants of Eli are found, a generation afterwards, acting as priests of a temple at Nob (21st. 22nd.). With the capture of Jerusalem by David, and the transference thither of the ark, a new political and religious centre was provided for the tribes of Israel.

2. SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.—The site. The successive Temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod were buildings of moderate dimensions, and were built, each on the site of one that 'of the holocausts' (Rev. 16: 19). Now, there is only one place in Jerusalem where this site is to be looked for, namely, on that part of the eastern hill which is now occupied by the large platform, extending to south-western (literally, 'right'), known as the 'Temple Mount,' and, by inference, the 'Mount of Olives' (see JERUSALEM, and below, §11). There has, however, been considerable difference of opinion in the past as to the precise spot within the Haram area on which the 'holy house' itself was reared. Thus a few British writers, among whom Fergusson, the distinguished architect, and W. Robertson Smith, in his article 'Temple' in the Encyclopædia Biblica, are the most influential, have maintained that the Temple and its courts occupied an area of about 0.600 ft. square, in the lowest part of the Haram. But the great majority of scholars, both at home and abroad, are agreed in placing the Temple in close connexion with the sacred rock (es-Soura) which is now enclosed in the mosque named after it, 'the Dome of the Rock,' also, less appropriately, 'the Mosque of Omar.'

The remarkable persistence of sacred sites in the East is a thing familiar to all students of religion, and there can be little doubt that the Chronicler is right in identifying the site of 'the altar of burnt-offering for Israel' (1 Ch 22: 12) with the spot by the threshing-floor of Oznan (in the South-eastern corner of the Haram), where the angel of the plague stayed his hand, and on which David by Divine command erected his altar of commemoration (see, further, §6 (b)). This being so, the location of the Temple immediately to the west of the rock follows as a matter of course. The only possible alternative is to regard the rock as marking the site, not of the altar of burnt-offering, but of 'the holy of holies' of the successive Temples, a view beset with insuperable difficulties.

3. The Temple building.—Its arrangement and dimensions. The Temple and its furniture are described in 1 K 6: 1-38, 7-36.—two passages which are, unfortunately, among the most difficult in the OT, by reason of the technical terms employed and the unsatisfactory nature of the received text.

All recent study of these passages in commentaries and elsewhere is based on Stade's brilliant essay in his ZATW III. 120. 1899, and by the parallel in the Heb. Text of the Books of Kings, and Father Vincent's exegesis in his In LXX, Oct. 1907. To these must now be added G. A. Smith, Jerusalem (1868), vol. ii. (with plate), which deals fully with all the Temples (see Index, s. w. 'Temple'). The Temple proper was an oblong building, 60 cubits in length by 20 in breadth (1 K 6), with a porch in front, facing eastwards, of the same width as the main building and 10 cubits in depth. These, however, are inside measurements, as is evident from v. 30. 16. 17.

The corresponding outside measurements depend, of course, upon the walls, which were, unfortunately, not stated. But inasmuch as Ezekiel, the Temple of whose vision is in all essential points a replica of that of Solomon, gives 6 cubits as the thickness of its walls (Ez 43: 1), except the walls of the porch, which was 8 cubits thick (40'), those of the first Temple are usually assumed to have been of the same dimensions. Less they could scarcely have been, if, as will presently appear, rebates of three cubits in all have in fact been allowed in the lower half, since a thickness of three cubits in the upper half seems necessary, in view of the thrust of a heavy roof of 20 cubits' span.

The interior was divided into two chambers by a transverse partition, implied in 68, but disregarded in the inside measurements given in v. 4. The anterior chamber, termed the 'kēkāl, and corresponding to the holy place in the Tabernacle, measured 40 cubits by 20, being twice as large as the inner chamber, the 'ēḥeth (EV 'oracle') or most holy place, which was only 20 cubits by 20 (v. 21). The latter in fact formed a perfect cube, since its height was also 20 cubits, as compared with the other, which was only 10. Assuming that this was also the height of the porch, the whole building, we may conjecture, was covered by a flat roof of uniform height throughout, leaving an empty space 10 cubits in height over the inner chamber. On all sides, except the front which was occupied by the porch, the Temple proper was surrounded by a lateral building of three storeys, the whole 15 cubits high (the emended text, '14'), each storey containing a number of small chambers for storage purposes. The beams forming the floors and ceilings of these side chambers were not let into the Temple wall, but were supported by making three successive rebates of a cubit each in the wall (v. 4). The chambers accordingly increased a cubit in width in each storey, from 6 in the lowermost storey to 6 and 7 in those above. The entrance to the side chambers was on the south side of the building.

The nature and position of the windows which were made 'for the house' are alike uncertain. Openings fitted with lattice work are probably intended (v. 4). Their position was most likely in the side walls above the roof of the lateral building and facing the sacred courtyard.

The question of the area covered by the complete building now described has usually been answered hitherto by a reference to Ezekiel's Temple, which was exactly 100 cubits by 100. But a careful comparison of the measurements of the two Temples makes it extremely probable that the numbers just given are due to Ezekiel's fondness for operating with 60 and its multiples. It seems, therefore, quite possible that the prophet has not only increased the depth of the porch from 10 to 15 cubits (Ezk 40: 5, LXX), but has likewise added to the thickness of the walls of the side-chambers and of the interior partition wall. For if the former are taken as 3 cubits in thickness, as compared with Ezekiel's 5, i.e. of the same measurements as the upper half of the Temple walls, and the partition as 1 cubit thick in place of 2 (Ezk 41: 6), we find the area of the whole building to be 926 cubits by 48, the same relative proportion (2:1), it will be noted, as is found in Ezekiel. Similarly, the outside width of the porch or sanctuary proper (32 cubits) stood to the total width as 6:1.

In the existing uncertainty as to the length of the cubic employed by Solomon's architects, it is impossible to translate these dimensions into feet and inches with mathematical exactness. If the long cubit of 20½ inches employed by Ezekiel (see Ezek 40: 5 and ch. 2, ch. 38) is preferred, the total area covered will be 164 ft. by 82 ft., while the dimensions of the 'holy place' will be approximately 78 by 36 by 50 ft. in height, and of those of the 'porch' 55 by 35 by 25 ft. A serious objection to this adoption of the long cubit, which was not foreseen when the art. 'Weights and Measures' (Ezek. Ch. 31 4) was written, is provided by the detailed measurements of the interior of Herod's Temple in Josephus and the Mishna (see below, §12).
are numerically the same as those of the first Temple, but the one employed in the last was the short cubit. As the writer has shown by an inductive study of the Herodian masonry (Esp.TXX [1906], p. 197), it is certain that the actual dimensions of Herod’s Temple were not less than those of Solomon’s, as they would have been if the curtains were in the ratio of 6 to 7. It is more probable, therefore, that the dimensions above given should be reduced by one-sixth—the Chronicler notwithstanding; in other words, 140 by 70 ft. will be the approximate dimensions of the building, 60 by 30 ft., and 30 by 30 ft.—that of the ‘holy’ and most holy place’ respectively.

4. The interior of the Temple. —The entrance to the Temple was through the open porch or vestibule on the eastern front. For the entering of the temple was provided a large folding-door of cypress wood (6 yr.), each leaf divided vertically into two leaves, one of which folded back upon the other. According to v. 3. In its present form, the leaves were ornamented with carved figures of cherubim, palms, and flowers, all overlaid with gold (but see below). The stone floor was covered with planks of cypress wood. That the latter had been plated with gold (v. 8.) is scarcely credible. The walls of both chambers were lined with boards (literally ‘ribs’) of cedar wood, ‘from the floor of the house to the rafters of the ceiling’ (so read v. 9.). There is no mention in this verse, it will be noted, of any ornamentation of the cedar panels, which is first found in vv. 18 and 20; but the former verse is absent from LXX, and v. 20 are recognized by all as a later addition. The ceilings, as we should expect, were formed of beams of cedar (v. 8.) 18. Over all was probably laid an outer covering of marble slabs.

The inner chamber of the Temple was separated from the ‘holy place,’ as has already been shown, by a partition wall, presumably of stone, which we have assumed above to have been a cubit in thickness. In it was set a door of olive wood, described obscurely in v. 8., which seems to say that its shape was not rectangular like the entrance door (see the Comm. on v. R. 8), but pentagonal; in other words, the lintel of the door, instead of being a single cross-beam, consisted of two beams meeting at an angle. In the centre of the chamber, facing the entrances, (2 Ch 310), stood two cherubim figures of olive wood, each 10 cubits high, with outstretched wings. The latter measured 10 cubits from tip to tip, so that the two sets of wings reached from the north to the south wall of ‘the most holy place’ (1 K 60-23). It is entirely in accordance with ancient practice that these symbolic figures should be overlaid with gold (v. 9.)

But regard to the excessive introduction of gold plating by the received text throughout, including even the Temple floor, as we have seen, there is much to be said in favour of the view, first advanced by Stade, that it is due to a desire on the part of later sensibilities to enhance the magnificence of the first Temple. In the original text the gold plating was perhaps confined to the cherubim, as has just been suggested, or to these and the doors, which appear to have had a gold sheathing in the time of Hezekiah (2 K 180).

5. The furniture of the Temple. —If 1 K 714-21 is set aside as a later addition (see the Comm.), the only article of Temple furniture is the altar of cedar introduced in the composite text of v. 20-22. As there are good grounds for believing that a special altar of Incense was first introduced into the second Temple (see § 9), the latter is now identified by most writers with the table of shewbread (see S terns, and T a barncle, § 6 (a)). Its position is evidently intended to be in the outer chamber in front of the entrance to the inner shrine. The same position before the oracle (Deut 72) is assigned to the ten tables ‘of cherubim, properly lampsstands (T a barncle, § 6 (a)), five probably being meant to stand on either side of the entrance. Although, from the date of the passage cited, we may hesitate to ascribe these to Solomon, they doubtless as a later time formed a conspicuous part of the Temple furniture (cf. Jer 329).
by his text of 1 K, or otherwise, tells us that Solomon's altar of burning (1 K 7:12) was of brass (and 'brazen altar' 8 M), 20 cubits in length and breadth and 10 in height (2 Ch 4:1). Its position was on the site of the earlier altar of David (2 Ch 3:1), which, it may be adduced, was to stand on one of the large stones of the rock still to be seen within the Mosque of Omar (see § 2 above). The precise position which the altars of the first and second Temples occupied on the surface of the rock, which measures at least some 60 ft. by 40, must remain a matter of conjecture. Herod's altar was large enough almost to cover the rock (§ 11 (c)).

This question has recently been made the subject of an elaborate study by Kittel in his Studien zur Archäologie (1908, i–55). Solomon's altar was superseded in the reign of Ahaz by a larger altar of more artistic construction, which this sovereign came to be made after the model of one seen by him at Damascus (2 K 16:4–5).

(c) The brazen sea.—In the court, to the south of the line between the altar and the Temple (1 K 7:26), stood one of the most striking of the creations of Solomon's Phoenician art not only by the Babylonians and Egyptians, but also by the so-called Mycenaean civilization of the Eastern Mediterranean basin. The walled court, the porch, fore-room, and innermost cela are all characteristic features of early Syrian architecture; but whether or not there lies behind these the embodiment of ideas from the still older Babylonian cosmology, by which the threefold division of the sanctuary reflects the threefold division of the heavens from the horizon to the End (Heb. Arch., 2, 330, following Winckler and A. Jeremias), must be left an open question. In certain details of the furniture, such as the wheeled carriers of the lavers and the ornamentation, may also be traced the influence of the early art of Crete and Cyprus through the Phoenicians as intermediaries.

8. The Temple of Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 40–43).—Although the Temple of Ezekiel remained a dream, a word may be said in passing regarding one of its most characteristic features, on account of its influence on the plan of the actual Temples of the future. This is the emphasis laid throughout on the aspect of the sanctuary—a reflection of the deeper and more extensive conception of the Divine holiness which marked the period of the Exile. The whole sacred area covered by the Temple and its courts, was to be protected from contact with secular buildings. On this point Ezekiel made a rigid separation of sacred and secular is the introduction of a second Temple court, to which the priests alone, strictly speaking, were entitled to access (Ezk 43:14). For the details of Ezekiel's sketch, with its passion for symmetry and number, see the Comm. and Witton Davies' art. ‘Temple’ in Hastings' DB iv. 704 ff.

9. The Temple of Zerubbabel.—The second Temple, as it is frequently named, was built, at the instigation of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, under the leadership of Zerubbabel. According to the explicit testimony of a contemporary (Hag 2), the foundation was laid in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (a.e. 520) and the Temple was dedicated now generally preferred to that of the much later author of Ezr 3. 1). The building was finished and the Temple dedicated in B.C. 516. We have unfortunately no description of the plans and arrangements of the latter, and are dependent for information regarding it mainly on scattered references in the later canonical and extra-canonical books. It may be assumed, however, that the altar of burnt-offering, previously restored by the exiles on their return (Ezr 3), occupied the former site now consecrated by centuries of worship, and that the ground plan of the Temple followed as nearly as possible that of its predecessor (cf. G. A. Smith, op. cit. ii. ch. xil.). As regards the furnishing of Zerubbabel's Temple, we have not only several notices from the period when it was still standing, but evidence from the better known Temple of Herod, in which the sacred furniture remained as before. Now, however scantily the former may have been furnished at the first, we should expect that after the introduction of the Priests' Code under Ezra, the prescriptions therein contained for the furniture of the Temple would be carried out to the letter. Thus only one golden lampstand illuminated 'the holy place' (1 Mac 1:2) instead of ten in the former Temple. The table of shewbread succeeded 'the altar of cedar' of 1 Kings 6:14 (for which see § 6 above). The golden altar of incense, which belonged to a later stratum of P (Tabernacle, § 6 (c)), was most probably introduced at a somewhat late date, since pseudo-Hecateus in the 3rd cont. n.c., quoted by Josephus (c. Apion. [ed. Nieze] 1. 198 f.), knows only of 'an altar and a candlestick both of gold, and in weight two talents'—the former presumably the altar or table of shewbread. There is no reason, however, to question the presence of the Incense altar by the second century, as attested by 1 Mac 18:9 (cf. 4:9), according to which Antiochus Epiphanes robbed the Temple of 'the golden altar and the candlestick of light ... and the table of shewbread,' where the first of these must be identified with the altar in question (see, against the scepticism of Wellhausen and others, the evidence collected by Schürer, GJ V 2 (1907) 342 f. [= 285f.]).

In this point of cardinal importance the glory of the second house was less than that of the first. No attempt was made to construct another ark; 'the most holy place' was empty. A splendid curtain or veil replaced the partition wall between the two divisions of the sanctuary, and mentioned among the spoils carried off by Antiochus (1 Mac 1:21). In another way the second Temple was distinguished from the first; it had two courts in place of one, an inner and an outer (4 Macc. 4:39), as demanded by Ezekiel. This prophet's further demand, that the lasty should be entirely excluded from the inner court, was not carried out, as is evident from the experience of Alexander Jannaeus. Having given offence to the people while officiating at the altar on the occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles, he was pellet with the citrons which they carried. Alexander in consequence had the altar and Temple razed off to keep the worshippers henceforth at a more respectable distance (Jos. Ant. xiii. 3.).

The altar was no longer of brass but of unhewn stone (1 Mac 4:24), as required by Ex 20:24, and attested by the earlier writer above cited (ap. Jos. c. Apion. [c. 172 c.]), who further adds 'to the same dimensions as the Canaanites give to the brazen altar of Solomon (§ 6 (b)).' In n.c. 168, Antiochus iv., as already stated, spoiled and desecrated the Temple, and by a crowning act of sacrilege set up a small altar to Zeus Olympus on the altar of burnt-offering. Three years later, Judas the Maccabaeus, after re-capturing Jerusalem, made new sacred furniture—altar of incense, table of shewbread, the seven-branched candlestick, and other 'new holy vessels.' The stones of the polluted altar were removed and others substituted, and the Temple dedicated anew (1 Mac 4:28 f.). With minor alterations and additions, chiefly in the direction of making the Temple hill stronger against attack, the Temple remained as the Maccabees left it until replaced by the more ambitious edifice of Herod.

10. If only for the sake of completeness, a brief reference must be made at this point to two other temples for the worship of J' erected by Jewish settlers in Egypt during the period covered by the previous section. The earlier of these has only recently come to light, through the discovery of certain Aramaic papyri on the site of Ιωάννησιος των Ελλήνων. The three last, published by Sachau in Drei aramäische Papyrusruckunden (2nd ed. 1908), describe this temple to Yâhù (Jahweh) which existed at Elephantine before Cambyses invaded Egypt in 525 B.C. and had been destroyed the instigation of Egyptian priests in n.c. 411. It was probably re-built soon after 408. The story of the other, erected at Leontopolis in the Delta by Onias, son of the Jewish high priest of the same name, in the reign of Antiochus iv., has been told by Josephus, who describes it as a replica, but smaller and poorer, of the Temple of Zerubbabel (I E xvi. 2, 1, Ant. vii. 1 f.). This description, which has recently been confirmed by the excavation of the site, the modern Tel el-Yehudiyeh, by Flinders Petrie (Petrie and Duncan, Τελεται της Ιερουσαλημ, 1905, 19- 10, with plans and models, plates xxiii.-xxv.) not the least interesting feature of this temple in partibus infidelium is the fact that it seems to have been built according to the measurements of the Tabernacle. This is altogether more probable than the view expressed by Petrie, that Onias copied the dimensions of the Temple of Jerusalem (op. cit. 24).

11. 'The Temple of Herod. It was in the eighteenth year of his reign that Herod obtained the permission of his suspicious subjects to re-build the Temple of Zerubbabel. The Temple proper was re-built by a thousand specially trained priests within the space of eighteen months; the rest of the buildings took years to finish, indeed the last touches were given only six or seven years before the final catastrophe in a.d. 70, when the whole was destroyed by the soldiers of Titus. For a fuller study of several of the points discussed in this section, see the present writer's Problems of Herod's Temple, in ExpT xx. (1908). 24 ff. (a) The outer court, its size, cloisters, and gates. It is advisable in this case to reverse the order of study adopted for the first Temple, and to proceed from the courts to the Temple proper. In this way we can start from the existing remains of Herod's enterprise, for all are agreed that the Haram area (see above § 2) and its retaining walls are in the main the work of Herod, who doubled the area of Zerubbabel's courts by means of enormous substructure (Jos. BJ i. xxi. 1). There are good grounds, however, for believing that, as left by Herod, the platform stopped at a point a little beyond the Golden Gate in the eastern wall, its northern boundary probably running in proximity to the north wall of the present inner platform of the Haram. (The latter has been considerably extended in this direction since Herod's day, and is indicated by double dotted lines on the accompanying plan.) This gives an area of approximately 26 acres compared with the 35 acres, or thereby, of the present Haram.

The measurements were, in round numbers, 390 yards from N. to S. by 330 yards from E. to W., and 310 yards E. to W. on the south. If the figures just given represent, with approximate accuracy, the extended area enclosed by Herod, the outer court, called in the Mishna 'the mountain of the house,' and by later writers, 'the court of the Gentiles, will have appeared to the eye as almost a square, as it is stated to be, although with divergent measurements, by our two chief authorities, the Mishna treatise Middoth (lit. 'measurements,' tr. in Barclay's Toalmud, and in PEPS, 1886-87), and Josephus (BJ v. v., Ant. xv. xi. and elsewhere).

The climax of Herod's architectural triumphs was reached in the magnificent colonnades which surrounded the four sides of this court. The colonnades along the south wall, in particular, known as 'the Royal Porch' (or portico, στηνον) was 'exceeding magnificent' (1 Ch 22-25). It consisted of four rows of monolithic marble columns of the Corinthian order, forming three aisles; the two inner aisles were 50 ft. in breadth and 50 ft. in height, while the central aisle was half as broad again as the other two and twice as high (Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5, but see ExpT, l.c.). The ceilings of the roofs were adorned with sculptured panels of cedar wood. On the other three sides of the court the colonnades had only two aisles, that along the east wall bearing the name of Solomon's Porch (Jn 10:23, Ac 3:12 35), probably from a tradition that it occupied the site of one of Solomon's triumphs, the first. The main approaches to the court were naturally on the west and south. The principal entrance from the west was by the gate of Kiponos (Midd. l. 3), the approach to which was by a bridge over the Tyropon, now represented by Wilson’s arch. On the south was the gate represented by the present, double and ‘covered gates’, and named the Huldah (or ‘mother’) gates, because the visitor passed into the court by sloping tunnels beneath the royal porch. These ramps opened upon the Court of the Gentiles about 190 ft. from the temple (see plan and, for details, Exp. Times. v. 6). A narrow strip by the entrance—only 11 cubits in width, but extending the whole breadth of the court from N. to S.—is named the court of Israel. Josephus, however, is probably right in representing the latter as running round three sides of the western court (as on plan). Its small size was a reminder that the laity—apart from those actually taking part in the sacrifices, who had, of course, to be allowed even within the still more sacred courts of the priests’ court—were admitted on sufferance to the western court; the eastern court, or court of the women, was, as has been indicated, the proper place of worship for the laity. Along the N. and S. walls of the enclosure were built chambers for various purposes connected with the Temple ritual (Midd. v. 3, 4), chambers and gatehouses being connected by an ornamental colonnade. Those whose location can be determined with some degree of certainty are entered on the plan and named in the key thereon.

The inner court is represented in the Mishna as a rectangle, 187 cubits by 135, the outer or women’s court as an exact square, 135 cubits long (Midd. v. 1, 723). But the rock levels of the Haram, the oblique line of the E. side of the platform—due probably to the rise of the rock required for the foundations of E. wall—and the repeated appearance of 11 and its multiples (note that 187 = 11 x 17) in the details of the totals in Middoth v. 1, all combine to make it a difficult question to the accuracy of the figures. On the accompanying plan the whole inner court, b and c, is entered as 170 cubits long from E. to W., and 170 broad. The outer court, A, has a free space between the colonnades of 155 by an average of about 110. The total dimensions of the sanctuary, including the surrounding buildings, are: (1) by W., 430 cubits (or 462 ft.); (2) by N. to S., 350 cubits or 384 ft. The data on which this table is based in his work, and the figures given in it, will be found in the essays in the Exp. Times, already frequently referred to.

In the inner, and in some respects the best, plan of Herod’s Temple by Waterhouse in Sunday’s Sacred Sites of the Gospels, the data of the Mishna are supposed, and a large court of men of Israel is inserted in the western court in addition to those above described. Against this view it may be urged, (1) that it requires its author to remove the eastern court, which was an essential part of the sanctuary, from a place on the present inner platform of the Haram; (2) the consequence of this is to narrow unduly the space between the Beautiful Gate and Solomon’s Porch. If there is one statement of the Mishna that is worthy of belief, it is that ‘the temple was so wide that the second largest on the east, the third on the north, and the smallest on the west’ (Midd. ii. 1). But, as the plan referred to shows, this is not the case if the court of the women is removed so far to the east by the insertion of a large ‘court of Israel’. The plan is also open to criticism on other grounds (cf. G. A. Smith, op. cit. i. 828 ff.).

The altar of burnt-offering, D, was, like that restored by Judas the Maccabee, of unhewn stone, and measured at the base 32 cubits by 32 (47 feet square, thus covering almost the whole of the sacred rock, see § 6 (b)), decreasing by three stages till the altar-bearth was only 24 cubits square. The priests went up by an inclined approach on the south side in accordance with Ex. 20. To the north of the altar was the place where the sacrificial victims were slain, sprinkled, and prepared for the altar. It was provided with rings, pillars, hooks, and tables. A lever, O, for the priests’ ablations stood to the west of the approach to the altar.

12. The Temple building.—A few yards beyond the greatest altar rose the Temple proper itself, a towering mass of white marble and gold. Twelve steps, corresponding to the height (12 half-cubits) of the massive and probably gold-covered stelafoane on which the building stood, led up to the porch and court. The porch was probably 90 cubits in height and of the same breadth at the base. The Mishna gives its height, including the 6 cubits of the podium or stelafoane, as 100 cubits.

KEY TO PLAN OF HEROD’S TEMPLE AND COURTS.

a b c d, the surrounding balustrade (םרֹק). XYZ, the terrace (เฉลิม).
A, Court of the Women. BBB, Court of Israel. CCC, Court of the Priests.
D, altar of burnt-offering. EFG, porch, holy place, and holy of holies. O, the laver.
H, 1-9, Gates of the Sanctuary (Middoth, 1-4, 6), viz.: 1, gate of the House Moked; 2, Corban gate; 3, gate Nitsus; 5, the gate of Nicanor, or the Beautiful Gate; 7, the water gate; 8, gate of the firstborn; 9, the fuel gate; 10, the ‘upper gate,’ wrongly called the gate of Nicanor.
K, the guardhouse Moked (=hearth). L, the ‘northern edifice that was between the two gates’ (see BJ vi.11. 7 [Niese, § 150]). Here, it is suggested, the sacrificial victims were examined by the priests, having been brought in either by the underground passage shown on the plan, or by the ramp also shown. The upper storey may have contained the important ‘chamber of the councillors’ (parkedritis) (Yomt, i. 1).
M, the chamber Gazith, in which the priests on duty assembled for prayer (Tamid, iv. end). There are not sufficient data for fixing the location of the other chambers mentioned in the Mishna. Their distribution on the plan is purely conjectural.
The real depth was doubtless, as in Solomon's Temple (§ 3), 10 cubits in the court, but now increased to 20 cubits at the wings (so Josephus). As the plan shows, the porch outflanked the main body of the Temple, which was 60— the Mishna has 70—cubits in breadth, by 18 cubits at either wing. These dimensions show that Herod's porch resembled the pylons of an Egyptian temple. It probably tapered towards the top, and was surmounted by an Egyptian cornice with the familiar cavetto moulding (cf. sketch below). The entrance to the porch measured 40 cubits by 20 (Middoth, iil. 7), corresponding to the dimensions of "the holy place." There was no door.

The 'great door of the house' (20 cubits by 10) was 'all over covered with gold,' in front of which hung a richly embroidered Babylonian veil, while above the lintel was figured a huge golden vine (Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 3, BJ v. v. 4). The interior area of Herod's Temple was, for obvious reasons, the same as that of its predecessors. A hall, 61 cubits long by 20 wide, was divided between the holy place (40 by 20, but with the height increased to 40 cubits [Middoth, iv. 6]) and the most holy place (20 by 20 by 20 high). The extra cubit was occupied by a double curtain embroidered in colours, which screened off 'the holy of holies' (cf. Midd. iv. 7 with Yoma, v. 2). This is the veil of the Temple referred to in Mt 27:45 and II (cf. He 61st etc.).

DIAGRAMMATIC SECTION OF TEMPLE AND PORCH.

As in Solomon's Temple, three storeys of side-chambers, prob. 30 cubits in height, ran round three sides of the main building. But by the provision of a passage-way giving access to the different storeys, and making a third outside wall necessary, the surface covered by the whole was now 96 cubits in length by 60 in breadth, not reckoning the two wings of the porch. Over the whole length of the two holy places a second storey was raised, entirely, as it seems, for architectural effect.

The total height of the naos is uncertain. The entries by which the Mishna makes up a total of 100 cubits are not such as inspire confidence; the laws of architectural proportion suggest that the 100, although also given by Josephus, should be reduced to 60 cubits or 80 cubits, equal to the breadth of the nave and lateral chambers. On the plan the lowest side chambers are intended to be 5 cubits wide and their walls (both as § 23) the passage-way 3, and the outside wall 3, giving a total width of 14 + 6 + 20 + 6 + 14 = 60 cubits (Jos. v. v. 4; cf. DB iv. 716 for the corresponding figures of Midd. iv. 7). The result of taking the principles of proportion between the various parts as the decisive factor when Josephus and the Mishna are at variance, is exhibited in the above diagram, which combines sections through the porch and holy place.

The furniture of 'the holy place' remained as in former days. Before the veil stood the altar of incense; against the south wall the seven-branched golden lampstand, and opposite to it the table of shewbread (Jos. BJ v. v. 5). A special interest attaches to the two latter from the fact, known to every one, that they were among the Temple spoils carried to Rome by Titus to adorn his triumph, and are still to be seen among the sculpture of the Arch of Titus.

'The most holy place' was empty as before (Jos. ib.), save for a stone on which the high priest, who alone had access to this innermost sanctuary, stood on the Day of Atonement (Yoma, v. 2).

All in all, Herod's Temple was well worthy of a place among the architectural wonders of the world. One has but to think of the extraordinary height and strength of the outer retaining walls, parts of which still claim our admiration, and of the wealth of art and ornament lavished upon the poricoes and buildings. The artistic effect was further heightened by the succession of double-paved terraces and courts, and by the height of the innermost room reflected from the gilded porch dazzled the spectator like 'the sun's own rays' (Jos. BJ v. v. 6).

13. The daily Temple service in NT times—This article may fitly close with a brief account of the principal act of Jewish worship in the days of our Lord, which centred round the daily or 'continual' (Heb. tamid, Ex 29:1) burnt-offering, presented every morning and every evening, or rather mid-afternoon, through the year, in the name, and on behalf, of the whole community of Israel (see Ex 29:1-9; Nu 28:1-9). A detailed account of this service, evidently based on reliable tradition, is given in the Mishna (Tamid, 1:3), translated into English in Barclay's Talmud, and in PEFSI 1885, 119 ff. (cf. also the full exposition given by Schürer, GJV 112. 269-299).

The detachment of priests on duty in the rotation of their 'courses' (Lk 19) slept in the 'house Moked' (K on plan). About cock-crow the priests who wished to be drawn for the morning service bathed and robbed, and thereafter repaired to the chamber [or court] in order to determine by lot those of their number who should 'officiate.' By the first lot a priest was selected to remove the ashes from the altar of burnt-offering, and prepare the wood, etc., for the morning sacrifice. This done, 'the presiding official said to them, Come and draw (to decide) (1) who shall slay, (2) who shall toss (the blood against the altar), (3) who shall remove the ashes from the incense altar, (4) who shall clean the lampstand, (5-10) who shall carry the parts of the victim to the foot of the altar [six parts are specified], (11) who shall prepare the (meal-offering of fine flour, (12) the baked offering (of the high priest), and (13) the wine of the drink-offering' (Mishna, Tamid, 1:1).

At the hour of dawn the preparations here set forth were begun, and the Temple gates thrown open. After the victim, a yearling lamb, had been at the incense altar prepared and the lamps trimmed, the sacrificing priests assembled in the chamber Gazith for a short religious service, after which there commenced the solemn acts of worship in which the tamid culminated—the offering of incense and the burning of the sacrificial victim. The priest, chosen as before by lot (Lk 19), entered the Temple with a censer of incense, and, while the smoke was ascending from the altar within the Holy Place, the worshippers without prostrated themselves in adoration and silent prayer. After the priestly benediction had been pronounced from the steps of the porch (Tamid, vii. 2), the several parts of the TEMPTATION

TEMPTATION.—The English words ‘tempt’ and ‘temptation’ are in the OT—with the exception of Mal 3:1, where a synonym βδέχαν is used,—the tr. of various forms of the root נשא, which is most frequently rendered ‘prove,’ in Gn 22:2 RV tr. ‘God did prove Abraham.’ But RV retains ‘temptation’ for (a) God’s testing of Pharaoh’s character and disposition (Dt 4:20, RvM ‘trials’ or ‘evidences,’ where Webster’s ‘test’ is to be preferred); (b) Israel’s distrait inclinations of God Himself to the proof (Dt 6:14; cf. Ex. 17:7, Nu 14:11, Ps 78:12, 8.5). In Ps 95:5 RV rightly keeps ‘Massah’ as a proper name, the reference being to the historic murmuring at Rephidim (Ex 17:2, cf. Dt 33:15, Ps 81:17).

Driver (ICC, on Dt 6:5') points out, in a valuable note, that ‘Massah’ is a neutral word, and means to test or prove a person, to see whether he will act in a particular way (Ex 16, De 4:29), or whether the character he bears is well established (1 K 10:10). God thus proves a person, or puts him to the test, to see if his fidelity or integrity is sincere (Gn 22, Ex 17:7, Nu 14:11, Ps 106:10; cf. Is 5:75). (1) 2. The Gr. word πειράματος is the usual LXX rendering of Massah. It is also a ‘neutral word,’ though in the NT it sometimes means enticement to sin (Mt 4:1, 1 Co 7:2, Rev 21:6, etc.; cf. ‘the tempter,’ Mt 4:1, 1 Th 3:9), in the RV it is almost always tr. ‘temptation,’ with occasional marginal alternative ‘trial’ (Ja 1), ‘P 19’; the exceptions are 2 Co 20, Rev 3:9, where ‘trial’ is found in the text. The Amer. RV substitutes ‘try’ or ‘make trial of’ (‘trial’) for tempt (‘temptation’) ‘wherever enticement to what is wrong is not evidently spoken of’ (see Appendix to RV, note vi.); but ‘temptation’ is retained in Mt 6—Lk 11, where the range of the petition cannot be thus limited; cf. Jas 1:13.

3. In expounding the prayer ‘Bring us not into temptation, and other passages in which the word has a wider meaning than enticement to sin, the difficulty is partly, but only partially, to be ascribed to the narrowing of the significance of the English word since 1611. If, as Driver thinks, ‘to tempt has, in modern English, acquired the sense of provoking or enticing a person in order that he may act in a particular way (= Heb. היסת), there is no doubt that ‘tempt’ is often ‘a misleading rendering.’ Into such temptation the heavenly Father cannot bring His children, our knowledge of His character prevents us from tracing to Him any allurement to evil. The profound argument of St. James (1:12) is that God is ‘Himself absolutely unsuscptible to evil,’ and therefore He is ‘incapable of tempting others to evil’ (Mayor, Co 4:14). But the difficulty, if the petition is regarded as meaning ‘bring us not into trial,’ Can a Christian pray to be exempted from the testing without which sheltered innocence cannot be made ‘golden candlesticks’? Can we never be exposed to those trials upon the endurance of which his blessedness depends (Ja 1:2)? The sufficient answer is that He who was ‘in all points tempted as we are’ (He 4:15) has taught us to pray ‘after this manner.’ His own prayer in Gethsemane (Mt 26:39), and His exhortation to His disciples (v.4), prove, by example and by precept, that when offered in subjection to the central all-dominating desire ‘They will be done,’ the petition ‘Bring us not into temptation’ is always fitting on the lips of those who know that ‘the flesh is weak.’ Having thus prayed, those who find themselves ringed round (Je 15:19), by the ‘ten words’ be strengthened to endure joyfully. Their experience is not joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, Divine wisdom enables them to ‘count it all joy as being as a part of the discipline which is designed to make them ‘perfect and entire, lacking in nothing.’

On the Temptation of our Lord see Jesus Christ, p. 447.

TEN COMMANDMENTS

TEN.—See Numbers, § 7.

TEN COMMANDMENTS.—1. The traditional history of the Decalogue.—The ‘ten words’ were, according to Ex 20, proclaimed vocally by God on Mt. Sinai, and written by Him on two stones, and given to Moses (34:11 21:3, 11; cf. Dt 5:19 5:11). When these were broken by Moses on his descent from the mount (Ex 32:19, Dt 9:9), he was commanded to prepare two fresh stones like the first, on which God re-wrote the ‘ten words’ (Ex 34:2-8, Dt 10:6). This is clearly the meaning of Ex. as the text now stands. But many critics think that v.28, originally referred not to the ‘ten words’ of Ex 20, but to the laws of 34:1-10, and that these laws were omitted from the Decalogue. It must suffice to say here that if, as on the whole seems likely, v.28 refers to our Decalogue, we must distinguish the command to write the covenant laws in v.5, and the words he wrote in v.19, in the latter case the ‘ten words’ divided by v.14, as required by 34. The two stones were immediately placed in the ark, which had been prepared by Moses specially for that purpose (Dt 10:5, probably based on Je 3). There they believed to have permanently remained (1 K 8:1, Dt 10): until the ark was, according to Rabbinical tradition, hidden by Jeremiah, when Jerusalem was finally taken by Nebuchadnezzar.

2. The documentary history of the Decalogue.—A comparison of the Decalogue in Ex 20 with that of Dt 5 renders it probable that both are later recensions of a much shorter original. The phrases peculiar to Dt 5 are in most cases obviously characteristics of D, and must be regarded as later expansions. Such as the Lord thy God commanded thee in the 4th and 5th ‘word,’ and that He may go well with thee in the 6th. In the last commandment the first two clauses are translated, and a more appropriate word (‘observe’) is used for coveting a neighbour’s wife. Here evidently we have also a later correction. Curiously enough Ex 20, while thus generally more primitive than Deut., shows signs of an even later recension. The reason for keeping the Sabbath, God’s rest after creation, is clearly based on Gn 2:3, which belongs to the post-exilic Priestly Code (P). The question is further complicated by the fact that several phrases in what is common to Ex 20 and Deut. are of a distinctly Deuteronomic character, as that is within thy gates in the 4th commandment, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee in the 5th. We see, then, that the Decalogue of Ex. is in all probability the result of a double revision (a Deuteronomic and Priestly) of a much more simple original. It has been suggested that originally all the commandments consisted of a single clause, and that the name ‘word’ could be more naturally applied to each. In favour of this view, beyond what has been already said, it is argued that this short form would be more suitable for inscription on stone.

3. How were the ‘ten words’ divided?—The question turns on the beginning and the end of the Decalogue. Are we to know as the First and Second, and again what we know as the Tenth, one or two commandments? The arrangement which treats the First and Second as one, and the Tenth as two, is that of the Masoretic Hebrew text both in Ex. and Dt., and was that of the Western Church from the time of St. Augustine to the Reformation, and is still that of the Roman and Lutheran Churches. Moreover, it may seem to have some support from the Deuteronomistic version of the Ten Commandment. Again, the present arrangement, however, is that of the early Jewish and early Christian Churches, and seems on the whole more probable in itself. A wife, being regarded as a chattel, would naturally come under the general prohibition against coveting a neighbour's goods. If, as already suggested, the original form of the commandment was a single clause, it would have run, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house.' (Ex 21:18.)

4. The contents of each table.—If, as suggested, the original commandments were single clauses, it is most natural to suppose that they were evenly divided between the two tables—five in each. This view is adopted without hesitation by Philo, and it is not contradicted by our Lord's division of the Law into the love of God and the love of one's neighbour. It would be difficult to class parents in the category of neighbour, whereas the reverse may have been due to them being the ancestors regarded as a specially sacred obligation, and was included, both Greeks and Romans at any rate, under the notion of filiation.

5. Order of the Decalogue.—The Hebrew texts of Ex 20 and Dt 5 agree in the order—murder, adultery, theft—as the subjects of the 6th, 7th, and 8th Commandments. The LXX (best MSS) in Ex. have the order—murder, theft, adultery; in Dt. —adultery, murder, theft. This last is borne out by Ro 13 and by Philo, and may possibly have been original.

6. Mosaic origin of the Decalogue.—The chief difficulty in assuming a date out of the second Commandment. There can be little doubt that from primitive times the Hebrews were monogamous, worshiping Jh' as their national God. But it is argued that this does not appear to have prevented them from recognizing to some extent inferior divine beings, such as those represented by teraphim, or even from representing their God under visible symbols. Thus in Jg 17 we find Michal making an image of Jahweh, without any disapproval by the writer. David himself had teraphim in his house (1 S 11:4-15); Isaiah speaks of a pillar as a natural and suitable symbol of worship (Is 19:1); Hosea classes pillar, ephod, and teraphim with sacrifices, meaning that without which Israel would be deprived of a blessing while a punishment (Hos 3). The frequent condemnation of Asherah (sacred tree-images, AV 'groves') suggests that they too were common features of Semitic worship, but not confined to the worship of heathen gods. It may reasonably be doubted whether these religious symbols were always regarded as themselves objects of worship, though tending to become so. Again, it may well have been the case that under the deteriorating influences of surrounding Semitic worship, the people, without generally worshiping heathen gods, failed to reach the high ideal of their traditional religion and worship. We may fairly say, then, that the Decalogue in its earliest form, if not actually Mosaic, represents in all probability the earliest religious tradition of Israel.

7. Object of the Decalogue.—Looking from a Christian point of view, we are apt to regard the Decalogue at any rate as an incomplete code of religion and morality. More probably the 'ten words' should be regarded as a few easily remembered rules necessary for a half-civilized agricultural people, who owed allegiance to a national God, and were required to live at peace with each other. They stand evidently in close relation to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21-23), of which they may be regarded as either a summary or the kernel. With one exception (the Fifth, see below, 8 (y.) they are, like most rules given to children, of a negative character—thou shalt not,' etc.

8. Interpretation of the Decalogue.—There are a few obscure phrases, or other matters which call for comment.

(i.) 'before me' may mean either 'in my presence,' condemning the ecstatic worship of many gods, or 'in preference to me.' Neither interpretation necessarily excludes the belief that other gods were suitable objects of worship for other peoples (cf. Jg 11:32).

(ii.) 'the water under the earth.' The Israelites conceived of the sea as extending under the whole land (hence the springs, etc.). This, being in their view the larger part, might be used to express the whole. Fish and other marine animals are, of course, intended.

(iii.) 'unto thousands,' better 'a thousand generations,' as in R.V.

(v.) 'in six days,' etc. We find in Old Testament three distinct reasons for the observance of the Sabbath. (1) The first is that of the Book of the Covenant in Ex 20:8, that thine ox and thine ass may have rest, and the son of thine handmaid and the stranger may be refreshed. In Ex 20 and Dt 5 the rest of the domestic animals and servants appears as part of the injunction itself. (2) In Dt 5 there is added as a secondary purpose, 'that thou mayest serve the Lord thy God with gladness and with joyfulness.' In Ex 20 and Dt 5 it seems, as far as the reference to the Priestly Code is published, bases the observance on the Sabtiatical rest of God after the Creation (Ge 2:2,3).

(vi.) 'Honour thy father and mother.' It has been suggested that this commandment has been modified in form, and was originally negative like all the rest, and referred like them to a prohibited action rather than to a correlative feeling, as, very possibly, 'Thou shalt not smile,' etc. (cf. Ex 21:17). At a later time such an outrage would have been hardly contemplated, and would naturally have given way to the present commandment. The word 'honour' seems, according to current Jewish teaching (see Lightfoot, on Mt 19:19), to have specially included feeding and clothing, and Christ assumes rather than implies exacts as new this application of the commandment. The Rabbinical teachers have encouraged men in evading a recognized law by their quibbles.

(vii.) 'Thou shalt not . . . house.' Deut. transposes the first two clauses, and reads 'desire' with wife. The teaching of Ex 20 is, beyond question, relatively the earliest. The wife was originally regarded as one of the chattels, though undoubtedly the most important chattel, of the house, or general establishment.

On the Decalogue in the NT see art. LAW (in NT).

TENT.—Apart from the traditions of the patriarchs as 'quiet' men, 'dwelling in tents' (Ge 28th R.Vm.), the settled Hebrews preserved a reminder of their nomad ancestry in such phrases as 'going to one's tent' for to 'go home' (Jg 19th), and in the recurring call, 'to ity tents (i.e. to your homes), O Israel' (1 K 12th etc.). For an interesting case of adherence to the 'nomadic ideal' on religious grounds, see Rechabites.

The Hebrew tent, even in later days, cannot have differed much from the simple Bedouin tent of 10-day, made by sewing together strips of the native goats' hair cloth (cf. Ca 41: 'I am black as the tents of Kedar'). These 'curtains' (Jer 4th, Ex 28th and other) are held up by poles, generally 9 in number, arranged in three rows of three, and 9 ft. long, which are tied at one end by ropes—the 'ords' of EV, and the 'tent-cord' of Job 4th R.V—attached to 'staves' or 'tent-pins' driven into the ground by a mallet (Jer 42th). The furniture of the tent, the 'tent-furniture' (v. 3; see below, 8 (x.) they are like most rules given to children, of a negative character—thou shalt not,' etc.)
TEPHON.

—One of the towns in Judaea fortified by Baccides (1 Mac 9:24). Tephon was probably an old Tappuah; but whether it was Tappuah 1 or 2, or Beth-tappuah, is uncertain.

TERAH.—The father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (Gn 11:25-31, 1 Ch 1:29, Lk 3:36). Along with his three sons he is said to have migrated from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, where he died. In Jos 24:2 and 35:11 he is said to have 'served other gods,' a statement which rise to some fanciful Jewish 'happadith about Terah as a maker of idols. 2. A station of the Israelites (Nu 33:5-23).

TERAPHIM.—See Images; Israel, p.412; also p.569.

TEREBINTH does not occur at all in AV, and only thrice in RV, being substituted in Is 44:1 for 'teel tree,' in Hos 4:14 for 'elm,' and in Sir 24:9 for 'terebinne tree.' Strong reasons, however, can be urged for rendering by 'terebinh' in a great many instances where EV has 'oak' (see Oak). The terebinth or terebinne tree (Sir 24:9)—Pistacia terebinthina, the butt of the Arabs—is one of the most imposing trees in Palestine. In almost every locality where it is allowed to attain its full growth—30 to 40 feet high—it is associated with a sacred tomb or grave; many such graves are represented in illustrated bibles. Dwarfed trees occur everywhere among the oak brushwood. The tree has pinnate, lance-shaped leaves and small reddish clusters like immature grape clusters; it is also often covered with curious red galls—like pieces of coral. The dark overhanging foliage affords a grateful shade in summer, but in autumn the leaves change colour and fall off. Cf. MAMRE.

TEREPHAH.—A chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Est 2:8); called in Ad. Est. 12° Tarra.

TERTIUS.—St. Paul's amanuensis who wrote Romans and added a personal salutation (16:22). It was the Apostle's custom to employ a scribe (no doubt dictating shorthand notes, a common practice), but to add a short autograph himself. The autographs probably are the Ro 16:22-23, 1 Co 16:23 (expressly), 2 Co 13:18, Gal 6:11 (expressly), Eph 6:23, Ph 4:23, Col 4:1 (expressly), 1 Th 5:24-28, 2 Th 3:17 (expressly). In the Pastoral Epistles and Philemon, which are personal letters, the presence of autograph passages is more uncertain.

TERTULLIAN.—This name (a diminutive of Tertius) is that of the advocate hired by the Jews to speak for them against St. Paul before Felix (Ac 24:2). From his name we should judge him to be a Roman; probably he was not a Jew. It has been conjectured (Dean Milman) that his speech is a translation from the Latin, but the name of a friend inserted in the law courts, it is a gross piece of flattery, for the Jews were in constant opposition to Felix. It accuses St. Paul of stirring up disturbances, of being the ringleader of an unlawful sect, and of profaning the Temple (cf. the reply in 239).

A. J. M. MACLEAN.

TESTAMENT.—The word is not found in the OT. In the text of the RV of the NT it occurs only twice (He 11:16), and is used to translate the Gr. word diatēkhē, elsewhere rendered 'covenant' (with 'testament' in the margin). In Heb 11:16 the RV translates it 'covenant,' and twice 'testament.' An indication of the difficulty involved in its interpretation is given in the marginal note: 'The Greek word here used signifies both covenant and testament.'

In classical Greek diatēkē means 'a testamentary disposition,' and synthēkē 'a covenant.' The latter word connotes an agreement between two persons regarded as being on an equal footing (syn-); hence it is unsuitable as a designation of God's gracious covenants with men. The LXX therefore use diatēkē as the equivalent of the Heb. word for 'covenant' (bērith), in its most frequent application being to the Divine covenants, which are not matters of mutual agreement between God and His people, but are rather 'analogous to the disposition of property by testament.' In the LXX diatēkē was extended to covenants between man and man, but Westcott says: 'There is not the least trace of the meaning 'testament' in the Greek Old Testament, the idea of a 'testament' was indeed foreign to the Jews till the time of the Herods.' (Com. on Hebrews, Additional Notes on p. 9).

In the NT 'covenant' is unquestionably the correct translation of diatēkē when it occurs 'in strictly Biblical and Hebraic surroundings' [see Covenants]. But, as Ramsay has pointed out, the word 'covenant' or 'testament' may be used in the meaning of the word after the publication of the LXX. This development was 'partly in the line of natural growth in Greek will-making...partly in the way of assimilation of Roman ideas on wills' (Hist. Com. on Galatians, p. 360). Therefore the question which the interpreter must ask is, 'What ideas did the word convey to the first readers of the NT writings?' The Revisers' preference for 'testament' in He 9:41 is strongly confirmed by the fact that 'the Roman will...appeared in the East as a document which had standing and no meaning until after the testator's death, and was revocable by him at pleasure.' But whilst the Epistle to the Hebrews was written to those who knew only the Roman will, the Epistle to the Galatians was written at a time when in Hellenized Asia Minor 'irrevocability was a characteristic feature of Greek will-making. The Galatian will had to do primarily with the appointment of an heir; no second will could invalidate it or 'add essentially novel conditions.' Such a will furnished St. Paul (29:39) with an analogy; like God's word, it was 'irrevocable.' It might be supplemented in details, but 'in essence the second will must confirm the original will' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 349 ff.).

In the NT, testamentum is the uniform Lat. tr. of diatēkē. Frequently, therefore, it means 'covenant' (Lk 1:78, Ac 7:17, Ro 11:2 etc.). This use of the Latin word is the explanation of the fact that, as early as the second cent. of our era, the books of the Old and New Covenants were spoken of as the Old and New Testaments.

been regarded as pointing to a northern, or to a relatively late, origin of the writings in which they occur. Certainly any large presence of Aramaism, and in particular any conspicuous Aramaizing of the syntax, due to the influence on their writings of the language which the later writers commonly spoke, such as we find, for example, in Daniel and Ecclesiastes, points to a later date.

Other languages besides Aramaic contributed to the vocabulary of Hebrew: Assyrion, indirectly through the Canaanites from the earliest times to an extent not easily to be defined, and later directly; Persian, after the Persian conquest of Babylon in 538; Greek, after the time of Alexander (332 B.C.); and Latin, after the establishment of Roman suzerainty over Judea in the first century B.C. Latin words are found in the Hebrew of the Mishna, but not in the OT; a few Greek words in the latest writings of the OT (particularly Daniel, about B.C. 167) and very many in the Mishna; Persian words in some of the post-exilic literature (Esther, Canticles, Tobit).

Through the oldest Hebrew MSS of the Bible the consonants of the original text are accompanied by the vowels which express at once the traditional pronunciation and the traditional interpretation of the text. It is now as generally accepted that the vowels formed no part of the original text as that the earth revolves round the sun. Down to the 17th century it was otherwise; and that century was marked by a final and keen discussion of this point.

4. Transliteration of Hebrew adopted in this article.—Since considerable importance attaches to this Jewish tradition as to the colloquial and the literary language, though our knowledge of the colloquial is only such as we can draw by inference from the literature. But there came a time when Hebrew ceased to be the colloquial language, being replaced by Aramaic, and survived only as the literary language. The disuse of Hebrew in favor of Aramaic cannot be precisely dated, and was probably gradual; according to 2 K 18:3, the time of Isaiah (5th cent. B.C.), Aramaic was unintelligible to the Jewish populace, but as a language of diplomacy was spoken by Assyrian and Jewish officials alike. Apparently as late as Nehemiah (5th cent. B.C.) the colloquial language of the Jews in Palestine was still Hebrew, called 'Jewish' (Neh 13:17 as In 2 K 18:3). In the first century A.D., as the few sayings of the popular language preserved in the NT (such as Tolitah cumi) prove, it was Aramaic. Between these two dates, and, as we may infer from the increasing influence of Aramaic on the later books of the OT, considerably nearer the earlier than the later date, the change was made. Long before Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the spoken language, it exercised an influence through the spoken on the written language such as is commonly exercised by the language of one neighbouring people on another,—that is to say, Hebrew borrowed words from Aramaic, as English borrowed words from French and French from English.

The Northern Kingdom was first brought into closer proximity with Aramaic-speaking peoples, and later the Southern Kingdom; and Aramaism has consequently been regarded as pointing to a northern, or to a relatively late, origin of the writings in which they occur. Certainly any large presence of Aramaism, and in particular any conspicuous Aramaizing of the syntax, due to the influence on their writings of the language which the later writers commonly spoke, such as we find, for example, in Daniel and Ecclesiastes, points to a later date.

of the Hebrew text can be determined only within broad limits. It was after the beginning of the 5th cent. a.d., for the way in which Jerome speaks leaves no room for doubt that the Hebrew Scriptures in his day were uncoveted. It must have been before the 10th cent., for the fully developed system is employed in the earliest Hebrew Biblical MSS, which date from the beginning of the 10th cent. (or, according to some, from the 9th cent.).

6. Later attempts to represent sounds.—Long before the invention of vocal points certain consonants had been used, though neither systematically nor consistently, to indicate the vowel sounds: thus H was used to indicate a, and sometimes e; W to indicate o or u, Y to indicate i. This practice in some measure goes back to the times, and doubtless also to the actual usage, of some of the writers of the OT; but in many cases these consonants used to indicate vowels were added by scribes or editors. This we learn from the fact that passages which happen to occur twice in the OT differ in the extent to which, and the particular instances in which, these letters are employed. Ps 18 occurs not only in the Psalter, but also in 2 S 22; the Psalter expresses these consonants used of 17 times where 2 Sam. does not, e.g. 2 Sam. writes KDNY (v.9) and HBSYM (v.3), where the Ps. writes KDWMNY and HBSYM. In some cases Rabbinic discussions prove that words now written with these vowels were once without them; so, e.g., it appears from a discussion attributed to two Rabbis of the 2nd cent. a.d. that in Is 51:3 the word LKWMY ("my nation" RV) was at one time written without the L, thus LWMY. The importance of this fact for the textual criticism will appear later.

7. Character of evidence for the text of OT.—The text of the OT has been transmitted through circumstances singularly different from those which mark the transmission of the NT text; and the results are a difference in the relative value attaching to different classes of evidence, and a much less close and sure approach to the original text when the best use has been made of the material at our disposal. Quotations play a much less immediate and conspicuous part in the criticism of the OT than in the criticism of the NT; and here we may confine our attention to the nature of the evidence for the text of the OT furnished by (1) Hebrew MSS, (2) ancient Versions.

8. (1) Hebrew MSS.—One well-established result of the criticism of Hebrew MSS is that all existing MSS are derived from a single edition prepared by Jewish scholars in accordance with a textual tradition which goes back substantially to the 2nd cent. a.d., but became increasingly minute. This is proved by the existence in all MSS of the same peculiarities, such as the occurrence at certain places of letters smaller or larger than the normal, of dots over certain letters, or broken or inverted letters. For example, the H in the word BdBN (Gen 26) is written small in all Hebrew MSS; it was doubtless written originally so by accident or owing to pressure of room; but under the influence of a school of Jewish scholars, of whom R. Agiba in the 2nd cent. r.c. was a leading spirit, all such miniaturn of the Scripture acquired a mystic significance. Thus the word just cited really means 'when they were created,' but the small H was taken to mean that the words were to be translated 'in the letter H be (i.e. God) created them' ([heavens and the earth]), and this in turn led to much curious speculation. As another illustration of this method of interpretation, which was so important in securing from the 1st or 2nd cent. a.d. onwards a remarkably accurate transmission of the text, the case of the word WYZR in Gn 27 may be cited. The word means 'And he formed'; an alternative orthography for the word is WYZ (with one Y). Why, it was asked, was written with two Ys? Because the man asked, the title the second part of the word, God created man with two YSRS (i.e. two natures), the good nature and the bad. In order to secure the perpetuation of the text exactly as it existed, a mass of elaborate rules and calculations was gradually established; for example, the number of occurrences of cases of peculiar orthography, the number of words used in the several books, the middle word in each book, and so forth, were calculated and ultimately printed in notes on the margins of the MSS containing the Scriptures. This textual tradition is known as the Massoretic, and those who perpetuated it as Massoretes. The Massoretes also includes a certain number of variant or corrupt readings; in this case the one reading (Kethibh 'written') stands in the text, but provided with vowels that do not belong to the consonants in the text, but to the consonants of the alternative reading (Qere 'read') given in the margin. E.g. In Job 9:27, the word of SWYM, which means 'with,' should, if vocalized, have the vowel o over the W; but in the Hebrew text the vowel actually supplied to the word is e under the M, which is the vowel that really belongs to the marginal reading BYM, and this means 'in the water of.' These Massoretic variants are for the most part relatively unimportant. The value of the Massoreh in perpetuating a form of the Hebrew text for many centuries has doubtless been great; but it has also long served to obscure the fact that the text which it has perpetuated with such slight variation or mutilation was already removed by many centuries from the original text and had suffered considerable changes.

In spite of the Massoreh, certain minute variations have crept into the Hebrew MSS and even into the consonantal text. The vowels, it must be repeated, are merely an integral part of the original text, and have gone into the Hebrew text, or into the Massoretic, and not part of it, and different Hebrew MSS show a matter of fact two distinct systems of vocalization, with different symbols.

9. The earliest MSS.—Among the earliest Hebrew Biblical MSS are the Prophetae posteriores codex Babylonicus Petropolitanus, dated A.D. 916; a codex of the former and latter Prophets now in the Karaite synagogue at Cairo, and written, if correctly dated, in A.D. 885; a codex of the entire Bible by Fr. Ben Jacob, now at St. Petersburg, and written, if the dating be genuine, in A.D. 1009.

10. Critical editions of the Masorethic text.—The most accurate reproductions of the Masorethic text are the editions of the Hebrew Bible by S. Baer and Fr. Delitzsch and that by C. D. Ginsburg. These are critical editions of the Masorethic text, but make no attempt to be critical editions of the Hebrew text, i.e. they make no use whatever of the Versions or of any other evidence than the Massoretic tradition.

11. The Samaritan Pentateuch.—Before passing from the evidence of Hebrew MSS we have to note that for the Pentateuch, though unfortunately for the Pentateuch only, we have the invaluable assistance of a Hebrew text representing an entirely different recension. This is the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Samaritan Pentateuch is a form of the Hebrew text which has been perpetuated by the Samaritans. It is written in the Samaritan character, which far more closely resembles the ancient Hebrew characters than the square Hebrew characters in which the Massoretic MSS are written, and is without vowels. The available MSS of the Samaritan Pentateuch are considerably later than the earliest Massoretic MSS; nor is it probable that the copy at Nablus, though perhaps the earliest Samaritan MS in existence, is earlier than the 12th or 13th cent. A.D. But the value of the recension lies in the fact that it has descended since the 4th cent. B.C. in a different circle, and under different circumstances, from those which have influenced the Massoretic MSS. Though in some respects, as for example through expansion by insertion of matter from parallel passages, the Samaritan is more remote than the Jewish from the original text, it has some other characteristics which make it possible to go back considerably further than the LXX. An instance is Gn 4:4; here in the ordinary Hebrew MSS some words spoken by Cain have certainly dropped out; the fact is obscured in the RV (text), which misinterprets; the Hebrew text really reads, 'And Cain said to Abel his brother'; the Samaritan text and the LXX have the additional words, 'Let us go into the field; this is probably right (see next clause).

12. The Samaritan Targum.—No thoroughly critical edition of the Samaritan Pentateuch at present exists. The material for establishing a critical text consists of the several MSS and the Oriental translation of the Samaritan recension into an Aramaic dialect. The colloquial language of the Samaritans, that of like the later Hebrews, was different from that in which the Scripture was written.

13. Papyrus fragment of OT text.—Thanks to a recent discovery, we have a further witness to a fragment of the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch. This is the Nash papyrus. The papyrus is apparently not later than the 2nd cent. A.D.; and it contains the Ten Commandments and Dt 6:11, in Hebrew. The text, which of course unvocalized, is several times in agreement with the LXX against the Massoretic text. This fragment was edited by Mr. R. A. Cook in PSBA (Jan. 1908).

14. Versions: Earliest MSS.—We come now to the second main branch of evidence for the text of the OT. The evidence of Versions is of exceptional importance in this case of the OT. In the first place, the actual MSS of the Versions are much older than the earliest Hebrew MSS; the earliest Hebrew MSS date from the 10th cent. A.D., but there are Greek MSS of the OT of the 9th cent. A.D. and there is a Syriac MS of the greater part of the Pentateuch of the date a.d. 464. But secondly, and of even greater importance, the Versions, and especially the LXX, represent different lines of tradition; in so far as the original text of the LXX can be established, it is a witness to the state of the text some two or four centuries before the date at which the stereotyping of the Hebrew text by the Massoretes took place.

15. Brief account of the Primary Versions.—The Primary Versions of the OT, arranged in (approximately) chronological order, are as follows:

16. Two groups of versions. Pre-eminence of the of Onkelos on the Pentateuch; it does not appear to have been committed to writing before the 5th cent. A.D., and is first mentioned by name by Saadia Gaon in the 9th century. Far more paraphrastic is the Targum of the Pentateuch known as the Targum of Jonathan, or the Jerusalem Targum. Fragments of yet a third Targum of the Pentateuch survive, and are known as the 2nd Jerusalem Targum. Quite distinct from these is the Samaritan Targum, a later Samaritan translation of the Samaritan recension of the Hebrew text (see § 11). The chief Targum of the Prophets is that known as the Targum of Jonathan ben Uziel; it is not much younger than the Targum of Onkelos, and is by some considered to be even earlier. There are also fragments of another Targum of the Prophets. Targums of the Hagiographa (with the exception of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel) exist, and there are two of the Book of Esther. Cf. art. Targum.

The text of the Targums will be found in Walton's (and others) polyglots, with a Latin translation. Onkelos has been separately edited by Berliner (1884), and the Prophets and Hagiographa by Lagarde (1872, 1874). See further, Hastings' DB, art. 'Targum.' There is an English translation of the Targums of the Pentateuch by Etheridge (2 vols. London, 1862-1865).

(3), (4), and (5) The Greek Versions which have survived in fragments are those of Aquila, Symmachus, and, of all the 2nd cent. A.D. See Greek Versions of OT, §§ 15-18.

(6) The Syriac Version, commonly called the Peshitta. The date at which it was made is uncertain. The earliest extant MS of part of this version is, as stated above, of the year 464 A.D.; and the quotations of Aphraates (4th cent. A.D.) from all parts of the OT agree with the Peshitta text, so that it is obvious that the Peshitta version differs in different books, being literal in the Pentateuch and Job, paraphrastic for example in Chronicles and Ruth. The text in the main agrees closely with the Massorete Hebrew text, though in parts (e.g. in Genesis, Isaiah, the Minor Prophets, and Psalms) it has been influenced by the LXX.

(7) The Vulgate.—The Old Latin Version was a translation of the LXX. To Christian scholars acquainted with Hebrew the wide differences between the LXX and versions derived from it and the Hebrew text then current became obvious. As it seemed suitable to Origen to correct the current LXX text so that it should agree more closely with the Targum of Jonathan, or the 4th century Jerome, after first revising the Old Latin, making alterations only when the sense absolutely demanded it, prepared an entirely fresh translation direct from the Hebrew text. The Vulgate text was formed from this direct translation of Jerome's from the Hebrew in the case of all the canonical books of the OT except the Psalms; the Psalms appear commonly in editions of the Vulgate in the form of the so-called Gallican Psalter; this was a second version of the Old Latin, in which, however, after the manner of Origen's Hexaplar text, the translation was brought nearer to the current Hebrew text by including matter contained in the later Greek versions but absent from the LXX, and obelising matter in the LXX which was absent from the later versions. Jerome's Latin version of the Psalms, made direct from the Hebrew, has been edited by Lagarde (Psalterium iuxta Hebraeos Hieronymi, 1874). On the extent to which editions of the Vulgate differ from Jerome's translation, see Vulgate. In some cases additional matter (e.g., I 8 14th, on which passage see § 24) has been incorporated from the Old Latin.

The effect of the substitution of Jerome's version from the Hebrew text for the Old Latin version of the LXX was to give the Church a Bible which was more compact and intelligible and in much closer agreement with the Hebrew text current in the 4th cent. A.D., but which at the same time was in many passages more remote from the original text of the OT.
TEXT, VERSIONS, LANGUAGES OF OT

Septuagint.—Judged from the standpoint of their importance for recovering the original text of the OT, and for the kind of service which they render to OT textual criticism, the primary versions fall into two groups: (1) the LXX, (2) the rest. The LXX differs, and in a wide variety of details and degrees, from the remaining versions closely agree with it: the LXX dates from before the Christian era and, what is more significant, from before the rise of the Masoretic text; the rest of the versions date from after the Old Testament era, and, with the possible exception of the Syriac, from after the close of 1st cent. a.d. The agreement of these versions made direct from the Hebrew text at various dates subsequent to 100 b.c. confirms the conclusion suggested above, that since that date the Hebrew text has suffered relatively little in course of transmission. Such variations as do occur in these versions from the Hebrew consist largely (though not exclusively) of variations in the interpretation of the consonants, i.e. while presupposing the same consonants as the present Hebrew text, they presuppose also that these consonants were pronounced with other vowels than those which were added to the text after the 6th cent. a.d. These variations therefore do not, strictly speaking, represent variants in the text of the OT, but merely in the commentary on that text, which at the time the versions were made still existed, but of which the latter was converted into writing in the form of vowels attached to the consonants, of which alone the Scripture proper consisted. A fuller discussion of the versions of the OT other than the LXX which would carry us into the controversy of the authors of the authority of the books which do not belong to a brief sketch such as the present one. On the other hand, the LXX claims further attention even here.

17. The early history of the Hebrew text.—The history of the Hebrew text since the 2nd cent. a.d. is uneventful; it is a history of careful transmission which has preserved the text from any serious deterioration since that date. But the fortunes of the text before that date had been more varied and far less happy. They cannot be followed completely, nor always with certainty. But the main fact is abundantly clear, that between the ages of their several authors and the 2nd cent. a.d. the Hebrew Scriptures had suffered corruption, and not infrequently very serious corruption. Nor is this surprising when it is remembered that the text in that period consisted of consonants only, that in the course of time the character of the writing was changed: the Old Hebrew to the square character still in use (the difference between the two being greater than that between old black letter type and the Roman type now commonly used), that in the earlier part of the period copies of the books cannot have been numerous, and that in times of persecution copies were hunted for and destroyed (1 Mac 1:9,1). We are here concerned, of course, merely with such changes as crept into the text accidentally, or such minor changes as the introduction of the expressed for the implicit subject, which belong to the province of textual criticism. The larger changes due to the editing and redacting or union of material belong to the province of higher criticism, though in the case of the OT it is particularly true that at times the line between the two is not sharply defined. Our chief clue to the earlier history of the Hebrew text, and of our judgment of the problem, will be our interpretation of the XXY in comparison with the Septuagint version, and in certain features of the Hebrew text itself. The remainder of this article will be devoted to elucidating and illustrating these two points.

18. The Hebrew Text between c. B.C. 250 and c. A.D. 100. The LXX and the Masoretic Text.—The materials for forming a judgment on the general character of the Hebrew text during this period by the Hebrew text, and for the existence of early variant readings in particular passages, are to be drawn mainly from a comparison of the LXX with the Hebrew text. A much smaller amount of material is to be derived from the quotations in the NT and other early Jewish works, such as the Book of Jubilees, written, according to Dr. Charles, at the close of the 2nd century B.C.; but so far as it goes this bears witness of the same general character as that of the LXX.

19. A correct solution of the main problem here raised depends on three things: (1) the establishment of the original text of the LXX; (2) the detection of the Hebrew text which lay before the translators; and (3) in cases where the Hebrew text there recorded differs from the present Hebrew text, the determination of the more original of the variants. A complete solution of the problems will never be reached, for it is no more possible to establish beyond dispute the original text of the LXX than the text of the NT; the detection of the underlying Hebrew text must inevitably often remain doubtful; and when variants are established, there will be in many cases room for differences of opinion as to their relative value. But though no complete solution is to be hoped for, a far greater approximation to such a solution than has yet been reached is possible.

A good beginning (though no more) towards the recovery of the original text of the LXX has been made (see GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, § 13) but of really systematic work on the recovery of the underlying derived text there has been far too little. What commonly happens is that in particular passages where the sense of the LXX and of the Hebrew text differs, the Greek is translated without due reference to the methods of the translators, and the re-translation that thus obtains is cited as the variant. In many cases the true variant even thus has undoubtedly been obtained, but in many cases a closer and more systematic investigation of the methods and idiosyncrasies of the translators, and the comparison of the results, will show that, through misinterpretation, the support of the LXX has been cited for variants which there is no reason for believing ever had any existence.

20. Distinction between LXX and Hebrew variants.—A difference in sense between the Greek version and the Hebrew text as subsequently interpreted by means necessarily points to a variation in the Hebrew text that underlay the versions.

For example, parts of the three Hebrew verbs BH (to lead captive), and YSB (to dwell) and of SWB (to return) are indistinguishable in the Hebrew consonantal text; the letters of the one are among others, the following meanings, and he dwelt, and he returned, and he brought back, and he took captive.

The substitution of one of these meanings for the other occasionally renders the Greek version inconvenient as this must have been for those who used that version, or versions, like the Old Latin, made from it, it presents no difficulty to those who are attempting to recover the Hebrew original of the Greek version. It may sound paradoxical, yet it is to a large extent true, that for textual criticism the LXX is most useful when it makes least sense; for when a passage makes no sense in the Greek, but can be explained as a translation from the Hebrew, we have the best reasons for believing that we have before us the original text of the Greek, and through it can recover a Hebrew text of early date. Copyists and translators do not deliberately transpose sense into nonsense and sense does not frequently, through mere accidents of transmission, become the particular form of nonsense that can be accounted for by a misunderstanding of a Hebrew original.

As a further illustration we may refer to the Greek translation of the letters BY; this very commonly occur with the meaning in me, but they also represent a particle of entreaty Oh! or I pray; this particle occurs but rarely, about a dozen times altogether, and it is only known to some of the Greek translators. In the Pantateuch and Joshua it is correctly rendered; but elsewhere it is rendered 'me' with ridiculous effect, e.g. if he substitutes these words for 'Oh' in Jg 6:1, I S 17.
TEXT, VERSIONS, LANGUAGES OF OT

But again, there is no difficulty in seeing beneath the nonsense of the Greek, the true sense and the actual reading of the Hebrew. The ignorance of the translators is as useful to the critics as their knowledge. 21. Euphemistic translations.—But there are many variations in sense which point to no real textual variants, though both Hebrew and Greek in themselves yield a good sense. The last clause of the 19th Psalm in the AV, 'O Lord, my strength and my redeemer,' reads admirably; but though the translators give us no clue to its meaning, it is one of translation of the Hebrew, it is a translation of the LXX. The Hebrew reads 'My rock and my redeemer' (so RV). In that case the LXXrend is due, not to ignorance, but religious scruple; their rendering is a euphemism. So in Gn 38:1 the Greek version substitutes 'Enoch was well-pleasing to God.' (Hence He 11:1) for the anthropomorphic 'walked with God' of the Hebrew text; in these cases, if we had not also the Hebrew text we could not discover the original from the LXX with certainty, or, perhaps, even be sure that the translators were paraphrasing and not translating.

22. Relative values of Greek version and Hebrew text.—These illustrations may suffice to show both that much care is required in using the LXX for the recovery of the Hebrew underlying it, and also that it is wide of the mark as a critic to anticipate the text which the translator was required to render, by emphasizing the ignorance of the translators. Before either the fullest or the costest use of the version can be made, an immense amount of work remains to be done; but the importance of doing this work of detection of even the most cautious deductions have already proved that the text underlying the LXX and the present Hebrew text differ widely, and that in many instances the LXX text is superior. The relative values of the Greek are not in the case of different books and, to avoid misunderstanding it should be added that in no case would a simple translation of the LXX bring us near to the sense of the original document as a translation from the Hebrew text had survived, to detect by means of the LXX the correct text and the sense of the original. Issues are sometimes confused, and the distinctive character, and virtues of our chief witnesses to the text of the OT obscure, in discussions as to the relative values of the LXX and the Masoretic text. Perhaps the most important general point to remember is that the text is not only the other would be nearly as valuable by itself as it is when used in combination with the other.

23. Examples of important readings preserved by the Greek version.—We may now come to some illustrations of important variations in which the LXX has clearly preserved an earlier text than the Hebrew. These are much less numerous in the Pentateuch than elsewhere in the Bible, and most important is the Hexateuch. The text of the Hexateuch, received at an early period something approaching to that great care in transmission which was later extended to the entire OT. It is the more remarkable, therefore, that in one section of the Pentateuch (Ex 35-39) we find striking differences in the arrangement of sections in the Hebrew and Greek texts. Other instances of different arrangement or of marked differences in the extent of the material occur in the Books of Job and Jeremiah (see, further, Swete, Intro. to the OT in Greek, 221 ff.). This type of difference connects the textual with the higher criticism of these books, and cannot be pursued further here. The differences arose from an early stage in the text. The LXX version was made and the time when the Hebrew text was stereotyped and the later Greek versions were made, by nothing short of a stupendous miracle could the text have been preserved free from errors of transmission, during the centuries that separate the original autographs from the date of the Greek version. This intervening period differs, of course, widely in length; between the age of Isaiah and the Greek translation of the Book of Isaiah lay some centuries; between the age of the Pentateuch (c. 1000 B.C.) and the translation of Judges little short of a thousand years; between the age of Samuel (c. 900 B.C.) and the translation of Samuel 2 (2 S 114°) and the translation of Samuel 1 (1 S 3:1). With the other hand, there was the compilation of the Hexateuch, or the first composition of books such as Ecclesiastes or Daniel, and the translations in the several cases, not more than a couple of centuries elapsed. 23. Means of detecting early corruption of Hebrew text.—Though the general fact that the present Hebrew text contains corruptions that date from these earlier centuries cannot reasonably be questioned, the detection of the actual cases of early corruption is necessarily difficult, and only within limits is it possible. We are obviously far worse situated in attempting to determine the conditions of this date than corresponding later dates; the LXX often indicates the presence of the later corruptions, but we have no external clue to the earlier corruptions. We have to rely entirely on indications of the Hebrew text itself. One of these indications will of course be the occurrence of nonsense, for the original autographs were intended to convey an intelligible meaning. Another indication will be the occurrence of bad grammar—unless in the case of a particular writer there is reason for supposing that he was not master of the language which he wrote. An interesting illustration of the way in which the latter indication may serve is furnished by some of the references to the ark.

The ark is called in Hebrew הָרָקָן הָרָקָן the ark, where the first letter is the Hebrew article; or הָרָקָן הָרָקָן theark of the covenant of the Lord; where a word in Hebrew is defined by a following genitive it cannot be preceded by the article, so in this second phrase we have הָרָקָן, not הָרָקָן. Now, in certain passages (e.g. Josh 6:20), our present Hebrew text has two corruptions which are combined, viz. הָרָקָן הָרָקָן; some corruption then is present here; and it is probable that the original text had only הָרָקָן theark, and that other words are due to the intrusion of an annotator's explanation.

29. Negative and positive judgments: the justification of conjectural emendation and its limitations.—The ultimate justification of textual criticism is to recover as accurately as possible the actual words of the original; an intermediate task of the textual criticism of the OT is to establish all the real variants of the Hebrew text underlying the Greek version, and in each case to determine the relative value of the variants. In this way the text which was the common source of the Greek translators and that of the Jewish scholars of the 2nd cent. A.D. is as far as possible recovered. So far negative and positive judgments must necessarily accompany one another; we say, Here the Hebrew text is right, and the Greek text wrong, or vice versa. But when we have recovered that common source of the Hebrew and Greek texts, it is wise to distinguish sharply between negative and positive critical judgments. The general fact that there are early errors in the Hebrew text must, as we have seen, be admitted; and, further, no sound criticism of the Hebrew text can proceed far without helically competing with the text itself, this or that correction, even though the Greek version agrees with the Hebrew text or cannot be shown to have differed from it. In some cases where this negative judgment may be passed with confidence, it may be possible with some confidence to pass to the positive statement. These words are a corruption of these other words: that is to say, the text in such cases can be restored by conjecture; but in many cases where the first judgment—These words are not the original text—must be passed, the second judgment ought only to take the form—It is possible that such and such words or something like them were in the original text. In brief, we can more often detect early corruption than restore the text which has been corrupted. The reason should be obvious. Nonsense (to take the extreme case) must be due to corruption, but the sense which it has obscured may altogether elude us. Or, at best, we may be able to discern the general sense without determining the actual words.

There can be no question that it is nonsense to say, as the Hebrew text does, that Saul, who was anointed king to meet a national emergency, was a year old when he began to reign; nor can it be impossible to say whether the original text attributed to him twenty, thirty, forty, or any other particular number of years. Such apparently simple tasks are often, not without helically, computed into complications. The original language and the language of the translation are close in many respects, and we may pass easily from nonsense in the LXX to the actual original consonants of the Hebrew text, which merely remain to be discovered, and we may believe, to be correctly interpreted; but if the Hebrew letters themselves yield nonsense, we are reduced to guessing, and frequently with little hope of guessing right.

30. The preceding paragraphs should have suggested the justification for conjectural emendation of the OT; at the same time they should have indicated its limitations. As against a conjectural emendation, it is in no way to the point to urge that the Hebrew text and all the versions are against it; for the agreement of the Hebrew text and the versions merely establishes the text as it was current about, let us say, a.c. 300. The principle of conjecture is justified by the centuries of transmission that the Hebrew text had passed through before that date. It may be worth while to notice also the degree of truth and the measure of misunderstanding involved in another common objection to conjectural emendations. Tactily or openly it takes this form: Critics offer different emendations of the same passages: both cannot be right; therefore the Hebrew text is not to be questioned. The real conclusion is rather this, The fact that several scholars have questioned the text renders the presence of corruption probable, that they differ in their emendations shows that the restoration of the original text is uncertain. The idiocy of a single scholar may lead him to emend the text unnecessarily; the larger the number w ho feel compelled to pronounce it unsound, the greater the probability that it is unsound, however difficult or uncertain it may be to pass beyond the negative judgment to positive reconstruction of the text.

31. Evidence of parallel texts within the OT.—We have now to consider in what ways beyond those indicated in § 28 the Hebrew text, taken by itself, gives indication of the presence of corruptions, or, on the other hand, of material that has been accurately preserved, and is used in order to approximate most closely to the original text, and through it to the original intention of the authors of the several books.

Of most importance, so far as it is available, is the evidence of double texts within the OT. There are certain passages that occur twice over in the OT: e.g. Ps 18 is found also in 2 S 22; Ps 14 recurs as Ps 53; 18:17—20:13 (for the most part) is repeated in Is 36:16—20:22; 2 K 24:1—25:5, and 29:6—22 in Jer 52, and large parts of Samuel and Kings are incorporated in Chronicles. The variations between these parallel texts are of two kinds: some are due to the editor who incorporates in his own the matter common to his work and the earlier work from which he derives it; for example, in the Chronicler often abbreviates, expands, or modifies the passages he borrows, with the view to adapting them to his special purpose; or, again, the editor who included the 14th Psalm in the collection in which Ps 53 stands, substituted 'God' for 'Jahweh' (Psalm, § 2 (2)). With these changes, which it is the province of higher criticism to consider and explain, we are not here concerned. But the second type of variations is due to accidents of transmission, and not infrequently what is evidently the earlier reading is preserved in the later work; and the explanation is very simple: the earlier books were more read and copied: and the more a book is used, the worse is its text (Benziinger). In certain cases there is room for doubt as to the type to which particular variations belong, so, for example, in several cases between 2 K 18—21 and 1 S 36—39. As an illustration of the nature and extent of variations between two parallel texts of the OT, we may rather more fully analyze the variations in Ps 18 and 2 S 22. In a few cases the Greek version of both passages agrees with the Hebrew of one, and here the presumption is that the Hebrew text of the other passage has suffered corruption after the date of the Greek version. There are other cases in which the Hebrew variations can be represented in Greek, the Greek version of Ps 18 agrees with the Hebrew text of the Psalm, and the Greek version of 18 22 with the Hebrew text of that passage. In these instances the presumption is that the variation and arisen before the date of the Greek version. There are in all more than 80 variations. Of these just over 20 are cases of vowel letters (§ 6) present in the one text, and absent from the other; in the great majority of instances it is the Psalm that has the vowel letters, and 2 Rs 22 that lacks them.

Among the remaining variations are cases of the following kinds:—(1) Omissions or additions: Ps 18: is absent from 2 S.; so also is v.22(2) on the other hand, 2 S. 22 is absent from Ps. (2) Variations in single words present in one text are absent from the other; (2) in or (2) three cases a word has been lost through the substitution of a word repeated in a parallel or neighbouring line: so "thhere" in Ps 18: has accidentally given place to "cords of the earth" (Sten of Ps 18: is absent from 2 S. 22 and v.22; (2) due to the confusion of similar letters; (4) Ps 18: differs from 2 S. in respect of the Divine name used (in v. 1 the Ps. has Eloah, 2 S. El); (5) inversion of words (not shown in EV), Ps 18:; there are also cases of inversion of letters; (6) of use of different synonyms, Ps 18:.

The variation of Ps 18: from 2 S. 22 is more complicated, and the significance of several of the variations is clear only in the Hebrew.

32. Evidence of mutilated literary forms.—(1) Acrostics.—Thus the comparison of parallel texts furnishes one line of evidence of the way in which the Hebrew text had suffered in transmission before the date of the Greek version. Another proof may be found in the mutilated form in which certain Hebrew literary forms survive in the present Hebrew text. Most conclusive is the case of the acrostic poems (see Acrostics). At times two considerations converge to produce a parallel passage corrupt. For example, the early part of Nah 1 consists of a mutilated acrostic: in the middle of v. a word beginning with D should occur; instead, the word NML beginning with N is found; but this word NML occurs again in the parallel line; in the light of Ps 18: (see previous §), it is possible that NML in the first has been accidentally substituted for a parallel word which began with D.

33. Rhythm and acrostics.—It is possible that further study of the laws of Hebrew rhythm or metre may give us a valuable instrument for the detection of corruption; much has already been attempted in this way, and in some cases already with results of considerable probability. Similarly, in some cases the strophic division of poems admits of conclusions that are again, if not certain, yet probable. Thus in Ps 9: and 53: we have a five strophes marked off from one another by a knave (see to the above: p. 300). In the present text the first strophe consists of 13, the second of 14, the third of 14, the fourth of 14, and the fifth of 15 lines; the probability is that originally each strophe was exactly equal, and that the first strophe has lost a line, and that the fifth has been enlarged by the interpolation of a line.

34. Limited extent of corruption of text of OT.—The considerations adduced in the two preceding paragraphs have a double edge. They show, it is true, that the Hebrew text has in places suffered considerably; but they indicate certain limits within which corruption has taken place, or, to state it otherwise, the degree of integrity which the transmitted text has preserved. If in the way just indicated we can detect the loss or intrusion of lines or words, or the substitution of one word for another, we can elsewhere claim a strong presumption in favour of a poem having preserved its original length and structure. For example, the majority of the acrostics have come down to us with little or no mutilation that affects their length or the recurrence at the right place of the acrostic letters. Similarly the very possibility of determining rhythm must rest on a considerable amount of the text having reached us free from far-reaching corruption. A further consideration of a different kind may be found in the fact that a large number of names (which are peculiarly exposed to transmissional corruption) as handed down in the Hebrew text have been paralleled in ancient material brought to light by modern discovery. In many cases it is beyond question that names have suffered in the course of transmission; but the correct transmission of rare, and in some cases strange, names is significant.

35. Secondary nature of vowel letters: bearing on textual criticism.—So long as we deal with parallel texts, we are not brought face to face with the problem of how to deal with a Hebrew text resting on a single authority. Yet the great bulk of the OT is of this class. How, then, is it to be dealt with, especially when there is no control over it to be obtained from fixed literary forms? The first duty of sound criticism is to disregard, or at least to suspect, all vowel letters (§ 6). We cannot, indeed, assert positively that the original writers made no use of these letters, for we find them employed in certain cases in early inscriptions (Moabite stone, Siloam inscription); but in view of the evidence of the parallel texts of the Hebrew Bible, of the LXX, and of Rabbinic references, it is certain that in a large number of cases these vowel letters have been added in the course of transmission. The consequence is that we cannot claim any particular vowel letter for the original author; he may have used it, he may not; particularly in the case of earlier writers, the latter alternative is the more probable. In other important respects the form of the present Hebrew consonantal text differs from what there is reason to believe was its earlier form. The texts are not a source of evidence of earlier form. We have seen above (§ 17) that the alphabet in which existing Hebrew MSS are written differs widely from that in use at the time when the OT was written; the letter D, practically the smallest (M 59) in the alphabet, was in use since the Christian era, was one of the larger letters of the earlier script. It is necessary in doubtful passages to picture the text as written in this earlier script, and to consider the probability of a text differing from the received text merely by letters closely resembling one another in this earlier script.

Thus the letters D and R are similar in most Semitic alphabets, in some they are indistinguishable; for example, in the Assuan papyri, Jewish documents of the 6th cent. e.c. recently discovered and published (1907). D and R cannot be clearly distinguished, and it is disputed, and is likely to be disputed, whether a particular word which occurs several times is DGL or DLR. A letter, moreover, in dealing with the Hebrew text of the OT to consider the variant which arises by substituting Ds for Rs. The Heb. words for Syria and Edom are R 8 and 8 RM respectively; the context alone is really the only safe rule to the original reading in any particular case, and not the letter in the present Hebrew text reads the one or the other is relatively unimportant; but, for example, the Heb. text is obviously wrong in 2 S. 8:4, and the translation in 2 Chron.

37. Division of text into units secondary.—Finally, it must be remembered that there is good reason for believing that the division of the consonants of one word from those of another has not been a constant feature of the text. Consequently we cannot safely assume that the present division corresponds to that of the original writers.

38. The starting-point of criticism in attempting to detect the earliest errors in the text.—From all this it follows that sound criticism requires us to start from this position: the original writers wrote in a different script from the present, used no vowel signs, no marks of punctuation, and even vowel letters but sparingly; either they themselves or copyists wrote the text continuously without dividing one word from another, or at least without systematically marking the divisions. Consequently the canon that the history of the text justifies is that that division of consonants and punctuation of clauses and sentences must be adopted which, everything considered, yields the most suitable sense; obvious as this canon may appear, it does no means always obtains recognition in practice; the weight of Jewish tradition is a factor of considerable importance. And yet there are most obvious cases where the Hebrew text gives a division of consonants or clauses which are not the original, but have arisen from accident or particular theories of exegesis. Further, wherever no division of the existing consonants yields any sense, or but an improbable sense, it must be concluded whether the substitution of similar consonants will. Whether the text thus obtained has any or much probability of being the original will depend on many considerations.

39. Illustrations of such errors.—We shall conclude with some illustrations of the variations in text or sense that arise when such considerations are allowed due weight. It is not to be understood that in all cases the variations from the traditional interpretation (1–3) or text (4) are certainly the true interpretation or text, but they all have a claim to be seriously regarded.

(1) In some cases simply a fresh punctuation of the sentences found; we obtain for the verse the sense 'like those ever gives an important variation in sense. A good instance is in 11:24; even in the present text the denunciation of princes is evidently much misunderstood. Thus, without any change in the text, we may render—

When ye come to see my face, we will not be upbraided.

No more shall ye trample on my courts.

The bringing of oblations is a vain thing;

Instructing is so to me.

New moon and sabbath, the calling of assembly, I cannot away with.

Instructing the solemn meeting, your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hate.'

For WFM uniquely the Greek version has Z WM fast. (1, 12–13), we have in the history of this passage a series of attempts to soften down the severity and absoluteness of the prophetic denunciation of the externalities of religion. The word for man YS is distinguished from the word for fire NS by the insertion of the vowel letter Y; but in the Moabite stone, the Sibian Inscription (written Jerusalem in the age, is commonly supposed, of Isaiah), and in Phoenician inscriptions, it is regularly without Y, and is thus indistinguishable from the word for fire. Where either of these words occurs, therefore, we must decide by the context only which was intended. Without such adjoining considerations are allowed due weight, the word for man YS is given, and the word for fire NS is Z WM fast. (1, 12–13), The Revisers have explained their standpoint in their preface: 'As the state of knowledge on the subject is not at present such as to justify any attempt to give an entire reconstruction of the text, the authority of the versions, the Revisers have thought it most prudent, to adopt the Masoretic Text as the basis of their work, and to depart from it, as the authorized Translators had done, only in exceptional cases. In some few instances of extreme difficulty a reading has been adopted on the authority of the Ancient Versions, and the departure from the Masoretic Text recorded in the margin.' In spite of this, when the Revisers have in one instance admitted an exceedingly questionable conjecture: in 1 S 13, they insert—in italics and between square brackets, it is true—the word 'thirty'; yet this word, though found in a few Greek MSS (not, however, in the earlier text of the LXX, nor unfortunately described by the Revisers as 'the unrevied LXX'), is really due to a pure guess; the word 'thirty' possesses exactly the same value as would any other number not obviously unsuitable. In addition to this peculiarly unhappy excursion into what is, if not technically yet in reality, a conjectural rendering of the most hazarded parts of the text, the Revisers make few acknowledged departures from the Hebrew text even when it is most obviously corrupt. Instances will, however, be found in Ruth 4, 1 S 18 (27), 2 S 19 (2), Ps 9 (59), Mic 4 (4). In some of these cases the AV had previously (without acknowledgment) abandoned, the Hebrew text; in all, the Revisers were well advised in doing so. But the more general effect of the attitude adopted by the Revisers to the question of the Hebrew text may be illustrated by their treatment of the passages cited in their preface as cases in which the AV abandoned the Hebrew text.

In 2 S 18 (2), AV has 'It may be the Lord will look on mine affliction,' which may represent the original text, the last word of the original Hebrew in that case having been BBNY; but the present Hebrew text has BBNY, which means 'on my iniquity,' and the Hebrew (as also the AV) has BBNY on my eyes (interpreted as meaning 'on my face'; so AV). Here the AV translates the rendering 'on my affliction,' the margin, and gives in the text the scarcely defensible rendering of the Hebrew text 'on the wrong done unto me.' In 2 Ch 32 (3), AV of the Hebrew text, at some time after the date of the Greek version, has been reduced to nonsense by the accidental misplacement of a word. AV renders this clause, 'it is written, and the Revisers, after having correctly discovered the word, have wisely left the English text, and, shrinking from the full effect of this, half translates, yet with the total result of being nearly as unintelligible as the Hebrew ('in

The earliest of English versions proper (Wyclif's) was made from the Vulgate. Between the time of Wyclif and of the numerous English versions of the 16th cent. (see English Versions) the study of Hebrew, which, since the age of Jerome, had practically been neglected in the Christian Church, was re-introduced. The AV, in which the series of Reformation translations culminated, is a primary version of the Hebrew text with occasional acknowledged substitution of the text. The authority for that of the Hebrew (see for an example § 21 and below). It was only natural that at first translation from the original language should seem the last word in Biblical translation. In the 17th cent. already appreciated the value of the versions and the faultiness of the Hebrew text, and perceived that any translation that attempted to approximate to the sense of the original writers was doomed to fail unnecessarily far short of its aim if it slavishly followed the existing Hebrew text. Unfortunately the appreciation of these facts had not become general even towards the end of the 19th cent. With the result that the Revisers of the OT felt themselves justified in practically renouncing the use of the versions (not to speak of critical conjecture), so far as the text of their translation is concerned. Some of the evidence of the versions is given by them, yet very often in the margins. The Revisers have explained their standpoint in their preface: 'As the state of knowledge on the subject is not at present such as to justify any attempt to give an entire reconstruction of the text, the authority of the versions, the Revisers have thought it most prudent, to adopt the Masoretic Text as the basis of their work, and to depart from it, as the authorized Translators had done, only in exceptional cases. 40. The English versions and the Hebrew text.—The the place that David had appointed is not a legitimate rendering of the words correctly rendered in RV marg. Both AV and RV insert (in italics) 'had appointed'; this probably stood in the original text, still stands in the Greek version, but is not even suggested in the Hebrew text. In 2 Ch 22.19 (rightly) adds to its text the reading of the parallel passage in Kings for the first part of the ver.; but retains in the second part of the verses wise use of reading the parallel text—Azariah (Greek version and 2 K—Azariah). In Job 37:7 AV gives what probably approximates to the original sense, though it is not a translation of the Hebrew text. RV correctly renders the Hebrew text as now divided; otherwise divided (cf. above, § 37), it would mean 'that all men who have had the hard work done.' In Ezk 49:6 (rightly) adopts a slight emendation (YZN for YZNW); RV retains the Hebrew text so far as the verb is concerned, but in order to make some sense illegitimately inserts (in italics) 'together'—illegitimately because 'together' is as little suggested by the Hebrew as it would be by the English. In Am 3:4 AV has been led astray by the LXX; RV (text) is nearer the original sense. In Hag 1:13, as in Ezk 49:6, the Revisers, to avoid placing in their text the exceedingly probable reading which stands on their margin, have inserted words (in italics) which are not even remotely suggested to the Hebrew, and have in another respect translated out of context wildly.

From the foregoing examples it will appear that in some cases the AV in effect approximates more closely to the original text and sense than the RV text, though the RV generally, perhaps always, in its margin gives the rendering of AV (or an equivalent rendering). It is desirable to add that in some cases Wyclif's, and (indeed because) a secondary version, follows a more satisfactory text than either AV or RV (so, e.g., in 1 S 14:1, where it has the words that have accidentally fallen out of the present Hebrew text; see § 24). For the instances in which the RV gives a translation that is either entirely indefensible or questionable or improbable, to save the appearance of abandoning the Hebrew text, might be gravely he had done it. In a translation, or questionable translation, was indeed necessarily involved in the carrying out of the principles adopted. For, owing to the state in which the Hebrew text has come down to us, a translator is not infrequently shut up to one of two four options: (1) he may leave the doubtful words of the Hebrew text untranslated; (2) he may translate from the Hebrew text as emended by the help of the versions or conjecture; (3) he may render unintelligible words in Hebrew by equally unintelligible words in English; or (4) he may mistranslate the Hebrew. If he adopts the third option he will not really recover the original sense; if the fourth, he will probably not do so, and if he does, it will be by accident; if he adopts the second, he no doubt runs a risk, and sometimes a considerable risk, of still failing to recover the original sense; the first option alone is safe, and in certain cases would best promote the fullest possible understanding of an entire passage. The Revisers have occasionally adopted the third, but generally the fourth, of these options.

Between the age of the AV and that of the RV, Biblical scholarship advanced particularly in two directions: (1) in the critical study of the Hebrew text; (2) in the understanding of the principles and vocabulary of the Hebrew language. For example, in the light of the comparative study of language, meanings of many words which Hebrew tradition had lost became clear. The RV made full use (in its margins, if not in its text) of the results of this line of advance, in consequence greatly superior to the AV. At the same time, in order to utilize this first knowledge, it was compelled to abandon Hebrew tradition, and in some cases to substitute evidence embodied in the vernacular vowels. In consequence the RV is a version of rather mixed character; it is a less faithful rendering into English of the Hebrew traditional understanding of the OT than the AV; on the other hand, for reasons already explained, it represents the original meanings of the OT writers only very partially and much less completely than is possible. In sum, then, the English reader, if he wishes to read in the OT the meaning as attached to it by the leading tradition, should either use the AV and not the RV; if he wishes to understand the meaning of the original writers of the OT, the RV will bring him much nearer his desire than the AV, especially if he has in the hands the books of Introduction, of Textual Criticism, and of Textual Emendation, of which the RV gives an adequate account, but which the AV omits.

Any full treatment of the subject of this article naturally involves a knowledge of Hebrew. Of works on the text, in addition to the relevant articles in the larger dictionaries, it may suffice to refer here to Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT (T. & T. Clark); Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel. Introduction, Critical editions of the Massoretic text have been mentioned above, § 10. A critical edition of the Hebrew text of the entire OT was published in 1853 by Tischendorf. So far as published it is met by Haupt's Sacred Books of the OT. Meanwhile, the best Hebrew Bible for use is Kittel's, which prints the Massoretic text, but which also compiles present in the footnotes a large mass of well-selected variants suggested by the versions or conjecture. Some of the MSS chiefly dealt with in the footnotes have never been fully discussed in other articles in the present work; see in particular GREEK VERSIONS, VERSIONS, ENGLISH VERSIONS, WARTINO, G. B. GRAY.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—1. The text of the NT as read in ordinary copies of the Gr. Testament, and as translated in the AV of 1611, is substantially identical with that printed by Stephanus (Robert Estienne) in 1550, and by the Elzevirs in their popular edition of 1624. To this text the Elzevirs in their next edition (1633) applied the phrase 'Textum eorum habebi'; and in a smaller size, 'textum omnibus receptum'; and by the name of Textus Receptus (TR) or Received Text, it has since been generally known. The edition of Stephanus was based upon the two earliest printed texts of the NT, that of Erasmus (published in 1516), and that of the Complutensian Polyglot (printed in 1514, but not published until 1522); and he also made use of 15 MSS., mostly at Paris. Two of these (Codd. D and L, see below, § 7) were of early date, but not much use was made of them; the others were minuscules (see § 6) of relatively late date. The principal editor of the Complutensian Polyglot, Lopez de Stunica, used MSS borrowed from the Vatican; they have not been identified, but appear to have been late, and ordinary in character. Erasmus, working to a publisher's order, with the object of anticipating the Complutensian, depended principally upon a single 12th cent. MS for the Gospels, upon one of the 13th or 14th for the Epistles, and upon one of the 12th for the Apocalypse. All of these were at Basle, and were merely those which chance to be most accessible.

The TR is consequently derived from (at most) some 20 or 25 MSS., dating from the last few centuries before the invention of printing, and not selected on any estimate of merit, but merely as being ready to the editor's hands. They may be taken as fairly representative of the great mass of Gr. Test. MSS. of the late Middle Ages, but no more. At the present time we have over 3000 Greek MSS of the NT, or of parts of it, and they range back in age to the 4th cent., or even, in the case of a few small fragments, to the 3rd. The history of Textual Criticism during the past two centuries and a half has been the history of the accumulation of all this material (and of the further masses of MSS. preserved by ancient translations), and of its application to the discovery of the original text of the NT; and it is not surprising that such huge accretions of evidence, going back in age a thousand years or more behind the date of Erasmus' principal witnesses, should have necessitated considerable emendation, in the details of the TR. The plan of the present article
TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

5. Vellum MSS are divided into two classes, according to the style of their writing. From the 4th cent. to the 10th they are written in uncial, i.e. in capital letters, of relatively large size, each being formed separately. In the 9th cent. a new style of writing was introduced, by the adaptation to literary purposes of the ordinary hand of the day; this, consisting as it did of smaller characters, is called minuscule. In the 10th the uncial MSS have become exceedingly rare, and the minuscule style dies out. Minuscule continue in use, with progressive modifications of form, until the suppression of manuscripts by print in the 15th cent.; at first always upon vellum, but from the 18th cent. onwards sometimes upon paper.

6. Uncial MSS, as a class, considerably older than the minuscules, is natural to expect that the purest and least corrupted texts will be found among them; though it is always necessary to reckon with the possibility that the minuscule MS may be a direct and faithful representative of a MS very much older than itself. Over 150 uncial MSS exist, and we have the whole of the NT or parts of it are known to exist, of which more than 110 contain the Gospels or some portion of them. The apparatus criticus of the NT they are indicated by the capital letters, first of the A then of the Greek, and finally of the Hebrew, for which it is now proposed to substitute numerals preceded by α. Further, since comparatively few MSS contain the whole of the NT, it is found convenient to divide it into four groups: (1) Gospels; (2) Acts and Catholic Epistles; (3) Pauline Epistles; (4) Apocalypse; and each group has its own numeration of MSS. The uncials MS with one or all of these groups, such as those known as A and C, retain these designations in each group; but when a MS does not contain them all, its letter is given to another MS in those groups which it does not contain. But here again it is now proposed to adopt a simpler system, by which nearly every MS will have one letter or number to itself, and one only.

7. A selection of the most important uncial MSS will now be briefly described, so as to indicate their importance in the textual criticism of the NT.

N. Codex Sinaiticus, originally a complete codex of the Greek Bible. Forty-three leaves of the OT were discovered by Tischendorf in the mountains of Sinai in 1844, and acquired by him for the University Library at Leipzig; while the remainder (156 leaves of the OT, and 114 of the NT) were sent to him by the Patriarch of Constantinople (the "Shepherd" of Hermas, on 148 leaves) were found by him in the same place in 1859, and eventually secured for the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. The Bible text is written with four columns to the page (the narrow columns being a survival from the papyrus period); and palaeographers are now generally agreed in referring the MS to the 4th cent., so that it is one of the two oldest MSS of the Bible in existence. Tischendorf attributes the original text of the MS to four scribes, one of whom he believes (though, in the opinion of many, this is very questionable) to have been also the scribe of the Codex Vaticanus (B); and the corrections to six different hands, of which the first are Æ (about contemporary with the original scribe), and Æ and Æ (of the 7th cent.). The corrections of the latter were derived (according to Tischendorf) from a MS corrected by the martyr Pamphilus, the disciple of Origen and founder of the library of Caesarea. It has been held that this MS was written at Caesarea, but this cannot be regarded as certain. The character of its text will be considered in § 90 below.

O. Codex Alexandrinus (or Alexandrinus) was written at Alexandria in the 5th cent., and now in the British Museum. From an uncertain, but early date it belonged to the library of the Cæsarean (as it is called) in Alexandria; it was brought back thence by Cyril Lucar in 1621, when he became Patriarch of Constantinople, and presented by him to Charles I. in 1626, and so passed, with the rest of the Royal Library, to the British Museum in 1577. It contains the whole Greek Bible, with the exception of 40 lost leaves (containing Mt 1-25). In 2 Co 7:11, Cp 20:1, originally contained the text of Epistles Clement and the Psalms of Solomon, but the Psalms and the conclusion of the Second Epistle have disappeared together with one leaf from the First Epistle. The text of the NT is written by three scribes, with two columns to a page. The scribes had a few corrections in common, and were also influenced by an ancient contemporary reviser (A*).

B. Codex Vaticanus, No. 1209 in the Vatican Library at Rome, where it has been probably the oldest and the best extant MS of the Greek NT, and its evidence is largely recoverable for the changes in the NT text. It is written in a small, neat uncial, probably of the 4th century, with three columns to a page. It originally contained the whole Bible (except the Book of Esther) along with the four canonical gospels, the Apocalypse and The Revelation of John, and the book of the future. It was passed down as containing the shorter conclusion of Mk. (see RV) as well as the usual longer one (16:39-42), and its readings often agree with those of B and some other Bibles, which follow the Acts and hence have escaped and Apocrypha.

C. Codex Ephraemi, in the Bibliotheca Nationale at Paris. This is a palimpsest, i.e., a manuscript of which the original writing has been partially washed or scraped off the paper in order to use it again to receive other writing. In 1577 the original writing was the Greek Bible. It was written in the 6th cent., in one broad column to the page; and this was sacrificed in the 12th cent., in order to inscribe it twice by the same scribes with St. Ephrami, bishop of Syria. Only 64 leaves of the OT now survive, and 146 of the NT (out of 236); and often it is impossible to decide the order in which the text was originally written. It is therefore only fully and intermittently of service.

D. Codex Bezae, in the University Library at Cambridge, which was presented in 1581 by Theodo Beza, who obtained it in 1562 from the monastery of St. Irenaeus at Lyons. It contains entries on Acts, in Greek and Latin, the former occupying the left-hand pages and the latter the right. It is mutilated, Ac 22° to the end being lost, together with a few words of the Old Testament which followed. It is generally assigned to the 6th cent., though some would place it in the 5th. Its place of origin has been variously held in the South of France or western Italy or Sardinia, but the evidence is not decisive in favour of any of these. Its text is very remarkable, containing the number of additions and omissions as compared with the TR; in some places the Latin version seems to have been accommodated to the Greek, and in others the Greek to the Latin. As will be shown below, its type of text belongs to a family of which the other principal representatives are the Old Latin and Old Syriac MSS.

D. Codex Claromontanus, in the Bibliotheca Nationale at Paris. Contains the Pauline Epistles in Greek and Latin, written in the 4th cent. The Latin text is practically independent of the Greek. Before the Epistle to the Hebrews, 22 books of the NT, widely, a number of "stiches" (or normal lines of 16 syllables each) in each of them, which must be descended from a very early ancient books in an unusual order, and includes in the last several unCanonical books (cf. descriptions of E and A): the order is Mt, Jn, Mk, Lk, Ro, and Acts, Eph, Php, Col, Phlm, 1 and 2 Pet., 1, 2, 3 Jn, Jude, Barnabas, Apoc., Acts, Herman, Acts of Paul, Apoc. of Peter (Th., He, and Phil. being omitted). The MS was in the monastery of Clermont, whence it was acquired by Beza, who was also owner of D. It probably may have been written in Italy. Other Grec-Latin MSS of the Pauline Epistles are E, G, G2, which all belong to the same archetype as D.E.

E. Codex Laudianus, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Contains the Acts, in Greek and Latin, the latter holding the place of precedence on the left. Probable 7th cent.; was in Sardinia in an early date; and may have been written there for a private individual in any individual (practically only the 5th century). The text of the Latin has been ascertained to the Greek, and is of little independent value. It is the earliest MS extant that contains Ac (to the time of Jerome [6th-7th cent.]).

F. Codex Coddneorum 202. Fragmentary remanents of a copy of the Pauline Epistles. Written in the 6th (or perhaps the 7th) century. Originally at Mt. Athos, in the Laura monastery, but has since been lost. It is of interest as a witness for MSS, which became scattered in various quarters; 22 columns of the text, but each at St. Evment, 2 each at St. Beno, 1 each at St. Petrus, 1 each by Kieff, and 2 at Turin. The text of 22 more pages have been or more less completely recovered from the "set-off" which they have left on the surviving leaves. The MS represents the text of the Pauline Epistles as edited by Euthymius of Sulea in the 4th cent.

G. Codex Regius, in the Bibliotheca Nationale at Paris. Contains the Gospels; one of the most important MSS of the NT, containing the shorter conclusion of Mk. (see RV) as well as the usual longer one (16:39-42); and its readings often agree with those of B and some other Bibles, which follow the Acts and hence have escaped and Apocrypha.

H. Codex Palatinus. Contains the Gospels, written in large silver letters on purple vellum, in the 5th cent. Forty-five leaves have been long been known (334 in the TR known of 6 in the vellum, 4, in the British Museum, and 2 at Vienna); and 182 more leaves came to light in 1856 in Asia Minor, and are now known. The text is half the original MS is now extant, including portions of all Gospels. The MS forms part of a group with three other MSS, and is of great importance, B and T (otherwise 099) has the double ending to Mark.

I. Codex Dubitabilis, at Trinity College, Dublin. A palimpsest, containing 595 verses of Mt., of the 6th cent., probably from Egypt, with a text akin to N, C. Codex Tischendorfianus III, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Contains Lk and Jn, of the 9th cent. Mt. and Mk. written in minuscules, are at St. Petersburg (Ev. 566). This MS is chiefly notable for a subscription stating that its text was derived from the ancient copies at Jerusalem. Similar subscriptions are found in about 12 minuscule MSS. Codex Rosamondis, at Rossano in Calabria, 6th cent. Contains Mt. and Mk., written in silver letters on purple vellum, with illustrations. Its text is closely akin to that of B, both being probably copies of the same original. These MSS are in silver letters on purple vellum, with illustrations similar to those in A. It was picked up for a few francs by a French naval officer at Sineope in 1899. Its text is akin to that of N and A.

J. Codex Beradinus, at Belgrade in Albania: the fourth of the purple MSS, and belonging to the same school as the others, and probably of the same date. Contains Mt. and Mk., in a text akin to N and E, but not so closely related to them as they are to one another. These are all the uncials of which it is necessary to give separate descriptions. Of the 5th cent, containing a text of considerable interest, found in Egypt in 1907, and is now in America, but is unpublished. Large fragments of MS of the Pauline Epistles were found at the same time.

8. Passing to the minuscule MSS, we find the number of witnesses overwhelming. The last inventory of NT MSS (that of von Soden) contains 1716 copies of the Gospels, 531 of Acts, 628 of Pauline Epp, and 219 of Apoc.; and of this total, as stated above, less than 100 are uncials. The minuscule MSS are usually indicated by Arabic numerals,* separate series being formed for the four divisions of the NT. The result of this is that when a MS contains all four parts (which is the case only with about 40 MSS) it is known by four different numbers: a certain MS at Leicester bears the numbers Evan. 69, Act. 31, Paul. 57, Apoc. 14. It is, of course, impossible to give any individual account of so great a mass of MSS; indeed, many of them have never been fully

* A new numeration has been introduced by von Soden, with the object of indicating the contents and date of each MS, but it is more cumbersome than the previous system. Thus A becomes 64, and Evan. 69 becomes 5605. On the other hand, each MS always has the same designation, and the difficulty of finding a name for each MS is obviated. A revision of the old numeration, so as to secure the same name for the same objects; seizing the familiar symbols of the more important MSS, has just been given in a German and has received the adhesion of most NT scholars.
TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

examined. But it is the less necessary, because by far the greater number of the minuscule MSS contain the same type of text, that, namely, of the TR. The fact that they play an out of proportion part in the MSS substantially the TR may be taken as universally admitted, whatever may be the inferences drawn from it; and it is only necessary to indicate some of those which are most notable from his normal standpoint, and ally themselves more or less with the early uncials.

Thus in the Gospels 33 is akin to the text found in B; so, to a lesser extent, is the group of the four related MSS, 1-115-131-209; also 59, 157, 431, 496, 582; while the type of text found in D and in the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions has left its mark notably upon 473, and more or less on 325, 431, 700, 1071, and on a group of related MSS (known from the scholars who first called attention to it as the 'Ferrar group') consisting of 33, 69, 124, 346, 348, 543, 713, 788, 826, 889. In Acts and Cath. Ep., 61 and 31 are the most notable adherents of B, while 31, with 137, 180, 216, 224, also shows kinship with D. A group consisting of Acts, 15, 193, 205, 237, 257, 299, 330 seems to represent an edition of Acts prepared by Euthalius of Sulca in the 4th century. In Paul, the most noteworthy minuscules are 1, 43, 78, 89, 157, 209; in the Syriac editions is found 216, 224, 81, 83, 93, 376, 381. In Apoc. (where uncials are scarce and minuscules consequently more important) the best and least open to revision is the MS of the 11th cent., 95, 96, 123, 126; No. 368, the minuscule MSS are more fully examined, more will be discovered which possess individual characteristics of interest; besides a large number of MSS of earlier date on the one hand, and the general uniformity of the great mass of minuscules on the other, it is not very likely that much important material will be found. It may be possible to establish relationships between certain MSS (as in the case of the Ferrar group), and to connect them with certain localities (as the Syriac MSS, to be connected with Calabria); but not much progress has yet been made in this direction.

9. One other class of MSS remains to be mentioned, namely the Service-Books or Lectionaries, in which the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles were divided into portions to be read on each day throughout the ecclesiastical year. These books fall into two classes, according as they contain the lessons from the Gospels (Evangelia or Evangelaria) or from the Acts and Epistles (Praxapostola). Nearly 1100 MSS of the former class are known, and 300 of the latter. Over 100 of these are uncial, but with hardly an exception they are of relatively late date (9th cent. or later), the uncial style being retained later for these liturgical books than elsewhere. Of the value of their evidence little can be said, many of them have been previously examined. A priori they might be of considerable value, since service-books are likely to be conservative, and also to preserve local peculiarities. They might be expected, therefore, to be of great value in localizing the various types of text which appear in the MSS, and in preserving early variants from a period before the establishment of a general uniformity. As a matter of fact, however, these claims have not yet been substantiated by any actual examination of lectionaries, and it may be questioned whether, as a whole, any of them go back to a period before the extinction of the local and divergent texts.

The standard lists of NT MSS are those of C. R. Gregory (Prolegomena zu Tischendorf’s NT Greece, ed. 8, 1894; reproduced in German, with additions, in his Textkritik des NT, 1900); and F. H. A. Scrivener, Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, 2nd ed., by E. M. Reuss, 1894. The new list, by H. von Soden (Die Schriften des NT, vol. 1, pt. i. 1902) contains rectifications and additions to Gregory’s list, with a new numeration. For Gregory’s revised list, which, it may be added, will be accepted as the standard, see Die griechischen Handschriften des NT (Leipzig, 1908).

10. Versions.—The second class of authorities, as indicated in § 2, is that of Versions, or translations of the NT into languages other than Greek. It is only the earlier versions that can be of service in discussing the original text of the NT; modern translations are important for the history of the Bible in the countries to which they belong, but contribute nothing to textual criticism. The early Versions may be divided into Eastern (Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, etc.) and Western (Latin and Gothic), but the distinction is of little importance. Age is a more important factor than locality, and the two oldest and, on the whole, most important (though not necessarily the most trustworthy) are the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions, which, moreover, are in many respects akin to one another. Next in importance are the Coptic versions and the Latin Vulgate; and the Armenian and the later Syriac versions are also of considerable value. It will be convenient to describe the several versions under their respective countries in the first instance. As to defer the description of their characters and affinities until the tale of our authorities is complete.

A. SYRIAC VERSIONS.—

11. The Old Syriac Version (OS).—The evidence for the character, and even the existence, of the primitive version of the NT in Syriac is meager. It is supposed that it may be possible to establish relationships between certain MSS (as in the case of the Ferrar group), and to connect them with certain localities (as the Syriac MSS, to be connected with Calabria); but not much progress has yet been made in this direction.

One other class of MSS remains to be mentioned, namely the Service-Books or Lectionaries, in which the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles were divided into portions to be read on each day throughout the ecclesiastical year. These books fall into two classes, according as they contain the lessons from the Gospels (Evangelia or Evangelaria) or from the Acts and Epistles (Praxapostola). Nearly 1100 MSS of the former class are known, and 300 of the latter. Over 100 of these are uncial, but with hardly an exception they are of relatively late date (9th cent. or later), the uncial style being retained later for these liturgical books than elsewhere. Of the value of their evidence little can be said, many of them have been previously examined. A priori they might be of considerable value, since service-books are likely to be conservative, and also to preserve local peculiarities. They might be expected, therefore, to be of great value in localizing the various types of text which appear in the MSS, and in preserving early variants from a period before the establishment of a general uniformity. As a matter of fact, however, these claims have not yet been substantiated by any actual examination of lectionaries, and it may be questioned whether, as a whole, any of them go back to a period before the extinction of the local and divergent texts.

The standard lists of NT MSS are those of C. R. Gregory (Prolegomena zu Tischendorf’s NT Greece, ed. 8, 1894; reproduced in German, with additions, in his Textkritik des NT, 1900), and F. H. A. Scrivener, Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, 2nd ed., by E. M. Reuss, 1894. The new list, by H. von Soden (Die Schriften des NT, vol. 1, pt. i. 1902) contains rectifications and additions to Gregory’s list, with a new numeration. For Gregory’s revised list, which, it may be added, will be accepted as the standard, see Die griechischen Handschriften des NT (Leipzig, 1908).
that it was most influential, and it is in its evidence as to the Syriac version that its textual importance now consists. It is only of late years that its evidence has been available at all. Until 1880 it existed only in name, and the very fact that it was a compilation from our four canonical Gospels was a matter of controversy. In that year, however, E. Abbott, in his article on the Diatessaron in the _Harper’s Bible Dictionary_, published a Latin translation of an Armenian treatise which had been printed so long ago as 1836, and written in fact St. Ephraem's commentary on the _Diatessaron_. Subsequently two copies of an Arabic version of the _Diatessaron_ itself were discovered, in Rome and in Egypt, and from these the text was published in 1888.—In a form modified, it is true, by transmission through many centuries and an Arabic version, but still making it possible to draw some conclusions as to the text and character of Tatian's work.

It is now certain, as a result of the recovery of the _Diatessaron_, that the Gospels existed in a Syriac dress in the second half of the 2nd cent.; but whether the _Diatessaron_ was the earliest form of the Syriac Gospels, or whether the version represented by Syr.-Sin. and Syr.-Cur. was previously in existence and formed the basis of Tatian's compilation, is still uncertain. The opinion of Syriac scholars as the present day appears to be in favour of the priority of the _Diatessaron_. Even so, the Syriac Old Testament, and the Old Syriac text, can hardly be placed later than A.D. 200, and all its characteristics stamp it as representing a very early type of the Gospel text. For some two centuries it existed side by side with the _Diatessaron_, the former being known as _Evangelion-da-Mepharresht_ (the Gospel of the Separated) and the latter as _Evangelion-da-Mehalдет_ (the Gospel of the Mixed); and then both alike were superseded by the former. There is some slight evidence (chiefly in the Armenian version, which was derived from the Syriac, and in references in Syrian authors) of the existence of an Old Syriac version of Acts and Paul (Cath. and Apoc. formed no part of the original Syriac NT), but for textual purposes they no longer exist.

13. The _Peshitta._—Previous to the discovery of Syr.-Cur., the _Peshitta_ was believed to be the oldest Syriac version, and was sometimes regarded as the queen of all the versions. Its date is supposed to be referable to the 2nd century. Even when the superior claims of Syr.-Cur. and still more of Syr.-Sin., came to be generally (though not quite universally) admitted, the date of the _Peshitta_ was assigned to the 4th cent. at the latest; on the ground that traces of it were supposed to be found in the Biblical quotations of St. Ephraem, who died in A.D. 378. Since, however, it has been shown (Prof. Burkitt, _St. Ephraem’s Quotations from the Gospel_, 1901) that the treatises in which the use of the _Peshitta_ is observable are not the genuine work of Ephraem, this evidence falls to the ground, and there is now nothing to prove the existence of the _Peshitta_ before the 5th century. Its origin may now be assigned with some confidence to Rabbula, bishop of Edessa 411-435, who is recorded to have made a translation of the NT from Greek into Syriac, and to have been active in suppressing the use of the _Diatessaron_. This new translation, which was to some extent based on the Old Syriac, but was assimilated to the type of Greek text then current, completely superseded its predecessors, and from this point onwards its uses in Syriac literature is universal. It appears in both branches of the Syriac Church (Nestorian and Monophysite), whose quarrels date back to 431. The name _Peshitta_ means "the simple," but whether it was used to distinguish it from its predecessors or its successors is uncertain.

MSS of the _Peshitta_ go back to the century of its origin. The earliest with an actual date (which is also the earliest date of Biblical MS in existence) is a copy of some portions of the Pentateuch, written in 642 (now in the British Museum; and the two earliest NT MSS may be assigned to about the same date. Of the Gospels, 125 copies in this version are on record; of Acts and Cath. 58, and of Paul. 67. Apoc. (with the four minor Catholic Ep.) was not included in the Syriac canon. The last edition was published very faithfully, so that the latest edition (by G. H. Wиль, 1913) does not substantially differ from the first (A. Wid-merstedt, 1650).

14. The _Philothean Syriac._—Unlike the Latin Vulgate, the _Peshitta_ was not entirely unchallenged in its supremacy. In 508, Philoxenus, Jacobite bishop of Mabug in eastern Syria, caused a new translation of the NT to be made by one Polycarp; but of this nothing has come down to us except the four minor Catholic Ep., which were incorporated into the _Peshitta_ to fill the gap caused by their original omission there, and a single MS of the Apoc. (at Trinity College, Dublin; identified by Dr. Gwynn, and published in 1897). The style of Philox. was free and idiomatic, and the Greek text on which it was based was that of the majority of late MSS

15. The _Palestinian Syriac._—Yet another Syriac version exists, but in a different dialect from those hitherto described; for, whereas they all belong to a variant_ of the Tiberian with its centre at Edessa, this is in the Western Aramaic characteristic of Palestine and its neighbourhood. The extant MSS of it (which are few and generally fragmentary, and mostly discovered within the last 15 years) are mainly lectionaries, and its textual importance is slight. Prof. Burkitt has argued, apparently with good reason, that it owes its origin to the efforts of Justinian and Heraclius to abolish Judaism in Palestine in the 6th cent.; and that it came again into prominence in the 11th cent. The three principal MSS of it are dated in 1030, 1104, and 1118.

On the Syriac versions see especially articles by Woods and Gwynn in _Staati Biblica_, vol. i. and iii.; A. S. Lewis, _The Four Gospels translated from the Syriac by Stephen of Ephesus_, 1894; Gwynn, _Apocalypse of St. John in a Syriac Version_, 1897; F. C. Burkitt, _op. cit._, and _Evangelion da Mepharresht_, 1904, and art. on "Text and Versions" in _Encyc. Biblica_.

17. The _Armenian Version._—In connexion with the Syriac NT it will be convenient to mention also the Armenian, which was largely dependent upon it. The earliest translation of which we definitely have evidence seems to have been made by Sahak and Mesrop about A.D. 400, from a Syriac text of the Old Syriac family. After 431 this version was revised by the help of Greek MSS received from Constantinople, which were apparently added to it, and thereby the original features of the version were much obscured. The earliest extant MSS belong to the 9th and 10th cent. (from A.D. 887). These usually omit the last 12 verses of Mark, but one, which has them, has a marginal note assigning them to "the Elder Ariston," i.e., presumably Ariston, a disciple of our Lord known to us by a mention in Papias.

On the Armenian version see F. C. Conybrey, art. in _Hastings’s Dict._, and J. Armitage Robinson, _Bibl._., 1887.

18. The _Old Latin Version_ (OL).—As Christianity spread westward, it inevitably came into contact with the Latin-speaking population of the Roman Empire; and a translation of the NT into Latin might naturally be looked for at an early date. Indeed, since the gospel was preached in Rome by St. Paul himself, it might seem reasonable to suppose that Latin versions of the Christian literature would have been required almost as soon as it came into being. But this would be to overlook the bilingual character of the Roman Empire, even in Italy. The educated classes spoke and wrote Greek freely; the uneducated classes were largely recruited from the East, and spoke Greek more naturally than Latin. The evidence of the predominantly Greek character of the primitive Roman Church is clear in the name of the church at Rome. The name of the apostle whom he salutes is naturally Greek. The first twelve bishops in the list of the Roman episcopate (down to A.D. 169) are Greek. Clement, the third in the list after St. Peter, holding in the name of the Roman Church to their brethren in Corinth, wrote in Greek. All the early literature of the Roman Church is Greek. The same may be said, so far as our knowledge goes, of the Church in Gaul. The report on the martyrdoms at Vienne, which the Christians of that province sent to their brethren in other countries, was written in Greek. Ireneus (c. 135-202), the most famous representative of the Gallican Church in the 2nd cent., came from Asia Minor, and wrote in Greek. All the traditions of Gallia Narbonensis were Greek, not Latin.
TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

The need for a Latin version of the Christian books was consequently not so pressing as might be supposed. There was one large and important province in which Greek had no place, and where Latin was the language of the spoken language. This was Africa, where the Mediterranean countries were especially the district which is now to be inhabited by a large Latin-speaking population. When Christianity was first introduced into the province is uncertain; but in the 2nd cent. it was strong and widespread there, and had for its spokesman the eloquent of early Christian writers, Tertullian (c. 150-220).

Two lines of argument combine to show that the earliest Latin version of the NT known to us had its home in Africa. The first mention of the existence of a Latin version occurs in Tertullian, and that type of text, to each of those represented by our extant OL MSS, appears on internal grounds to be the earliest, is identical with the Biblical quotations in the writings of Tertullian's junior contemporaries and compatriot, Cyprian (c. 200-258). Whether the version was actually made in Africa cannot be determined with certainty. It is true that its Latinity agrees with that of certain African writers of the 2nd cent. (Apollos, Arnobius, Latinus, besides Tertullian and Cyprian); but so happens that there is very little non-African Latin of that period in existence for comparison with it. The kinship which the text of the OL has with the Old Syrian has caused Antiochus to be suggested (by Sanday) as the original home of the version, that being a metropolis where Syrian and Latin elements met, and whence versions of the Scriptures in either language might radiate. But with a strong general resemblance between the two versions, there is also a considerable amount of divergence in details, so that one cannot be certain that the connexion is not more remote. What is certain is that the earliest form of Latin version known to us was circulating in Africa in the first half of the 3rd century.

The extant MSS of the OL are mainly fragments; for after the supersession of this version by the Vulgate its MSS naturally fell into neglect, and survived only fortuitously. The number of them is a little over 40, and they are habitually indicated by the small letters of the Latin alphabet. The following are the most important:

a. Codex Vercellensis, at Vercelli, containing the Gospels (Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk., the usual Latin order), somewhat mutilated, assigned to the 4th century.

b. Codex Veronensis, at Verona, containing the Gospels on purple vellum; 5th century.

c. The Latin text of Codex Bezae in the Gospels and Acts, and with the Pauline Epistles, in the Pauline Epistles.

d. Codex Palatinus, at Vienna, containing the Gospels, considerably mutilated; 4th century. One leaf is at Dublin.

e. The Latin text of Cod. Laudanum; in Pauline that of Cod. Sangermanensis.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

f. Codex Eriugae, at Brescia, of the Gospels, on purple vellum; 6th century.

f. Codex Corbeiensis, at Paris, containing the Gospels, but imperfect. Genially assigned to the 5th cent., but by its latest editor (E. S. Baldwin, Journ. of Biblical Speculum, 1905-6) to the 5th.

g. Codex Coptus, at Stockholm; a complete Bible of the 13th cent., with Acts and Apoc. in an OL text. Written in Bohemia, and a remarkable example of a late survival of OL.

i. Codex Bobiensis, at Turin, where it fortunately escaped from the recent fire with slight injury. Contains Mk 8-16 (ending at 16th, Mt 1-15; probably 5th cent. (according to Burkitt, 4th cent.). Contains the OL version in its earliest form, closely akin to that found in the writings of Cyprian.

j. The Speculum of pseudo-Augustine, which contains copious quotations from the NT. It is probably of Spanish origin, and should be reckoned either with the Fathers than with the MSS.

k. Codex Monacensis, at Munich, containing the Gospels; 6th or 7th century.

The remaining MSS are, for the most part, only small fragments, of a few leaves each. The Apoc. is also found, the most complete, in the commentary of Primasius, written in Africa in the 6th century.

21. With these MSS must be reckoned the quotations of the early Latin Fathers, notably Tertullian (who, however, appears often to have made his own translations, and is also too exact to be of much service in this respect), Cyprian, Hilary, Lucter of Cagliari, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Tyconius, Priscillian, and (as just noted) Primasius. It is usual to classify all these authorities (MSS and Fathers) under the three heads of (1) African, (2) European, (3) Italian; the African type of text being the earliest and also the highest in style and vocabulary, the European being so far modified in both these respects as to be supposed by some scholars to be due to a fresh translation, and the Italian being a revision of the European, and itself providing the basis for Jerome's Vulgate.

The question is complicated by the fact that no two MSS represent quite the same type of text. All (except perhaps k) have undergone modification in some respect, either by the corrections introduced by scribes in early times, or by contamination with the Vulgate. Cyprian and k, so far as they go, represent the African text of the Gospels in what appears to be a fairly pure form; e and m come next to them; h is a good African authority in Acts and Apoc., and Priscillian, Tyconius, and Primasius in the Epp. and Apocalypse, and are be the leading authority in the MSS of the Gospels, with the Latin version of Ireneus; in Acts, g and Lucifer. Of the Italian group, f is the most important, and the best descriptive as the best representative of the OL text which Jerome had before him when he undertook his revision of the Latin in 380. Quite correctly the rule adopted in the bilingual MSS have to be used with caution, as they show signs of assimilation to the Greek. The remaining MSS are either too fragmentary to be of much service, or too mixed in their text to be classified definitely with any family.

In general character, as already indicated, the OL version (especially in its earliest form) belongs to the same class of authorities as the Old Syriac and Codex Bezae, the class, namely, which is distinguished by rather striking divergences from both the TR and the text represented by BE. The character and claims of this type of text will be considered later; here it will be sufficient to point out the high antiquity which can be established for it through the OL (and still more through the concensus, as far as it exists, between OL and OS), and the great amount of divergence which exists between the several MSS which contain it. It is not possible, even approximately, to reconstruct the original OL text; it is even certain that we have read one original or more. What is certain is that it underwent constant revision and alteration, and that the few and fragmentary MSS which have come down to us, and of which no two agree even approximately with one another, do but reflect a state of textual confusion which was rampant in the Latin Bibles of the 4th century.

The Vulgate.—This state of confusion is described in emphatic terms by the great Latin Fathers of the 4th cent., Jerome (c. 345–420) and Augustine (354–430), and it was to the former that the task fell of attempting to make a new work. The credit of initiating the work which was to become the Bible of the West for a thousand years is due to Pope Damusus (pope, 366–84). At his request, Jerome, the leading Biblical scholar of the day, began, in collaboration with many others to study the Scriptures in the East in their original tongues, undertook, as he says in his preface to the NT, to 'make a new work out of an old one' by revising the existing Latin texts with reference to the original languages. He began with the Gospels, about the year 382; and at first his revision was on conservative lines. Where the existing text fairly represented the sense of the original, he let it stand, without enforcing complete agreement on places where accents affected the sense, but felt bound to make alterations. The Greek manuscripts which he employed as his guides appear to have been similar in character to Bις. The revision of the Gospels was completed in 385, that of the Epistles following, but was conducted more superficially than the previous work, partly, no doubt, because the divergences in the extant texts were less pronounced in these books. At about the same time he was beginning his work on the OT by a revision of the Psalter; but for the history of this see TEXT OF THE OT, 15 (7).

23. The later history of the Vulgate (as Jerome's work is generally called) is the subject of a separate article. Here it is only necessary to mention that the received text of it, which is found in all ordinary Latin Bibles, is that which was officially sanctioned by Petrarch in 1343. Its first printed edition (1483) is regarded as the best MS of the Vulgate, and with it go the other Northumbrian MSS, ASY, with F in attendance. A second group of MSS, which, generally speaking, is of inferior merit, is headed by Z, and includes several MSS not described above. OT represents the Spanish type of text, which had an important influence on the history of the Vulgate, and Q the not less important Irish type. In Acts, Wordsworth and White give the first place to Z, with CA and F in attendance. These three latter MSS represent different groups, the A group being generally preferable to the F group; but no one MS or group has a monopoly of merit. In general character, satisfaction above, the Vulgate tends to agree with the type of Greek text represented by Bις. It is clear that the Greek authorities which Jerome regarded as the most trustworthy were of this type; but since (in the NT) this revision retained a considerable quantity of the OL version, which is largely of a different type, the result, as it now stands, is of a composite character. By reason of this composite character, and also of its relatively late date, the Vulgate is not of the same textual importance as OS or OL; nevertheless it is to be remembered that Jerome must have made use of Greek MSS at least as old as the oldest which we now possess. The historical importance of the Vulgate will be dealt with in a separate article. Of the OL version the most comprehensive account is given by H. A. A. Kenyon, in The Old Latin Bible and Its MSS (C, 1896), and also Burckitt, The Old Latin and the Itala (Cambridge, 1896), the prefaces by Wordsworth, Sandy, and White to their editions of Old Latin Bibles (1883–97), and articles by Gebhardt (in PEF, 1897) and Corsin (in Burmester's Jahrbücher über die Forschung der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, bd. 19, 1907). On the Vulgate see Westcott's art. in Smith's DB, White's chapter in Busbey's Introduction, ed. 3 (1896, revised versions), and the prefaces to Wordsworth and White's edition of the Vulgate, now in progress (Oxford, 1889 ff.).

C. Coptic Versions.

25. Coptic is the literary form of the vernacular language of Egypt, the descendant of the ancient tongue which we know first in its hieroglyphic, and later in its demotic form, but differing from them in adopting the Greek alphabet, with the addition of certain letters to represent sounds not employed in Greek. Is the outcome of the Greek settlement in Egypt, which took place under the empire of the Ptolemies and continued under that of Rome; and along with the Greek characters the native tongue adopted also a considerable number of Greek words. When this form of writing came into being is uncertain. It appears in a primitive form in a certain horoscope, now in the British Museum, written in Greek, and it is reasonable to suppose that it became established as a literary medium in the course of the 2nd century. It is quite possible that its growth was promoted by the use of it by members of the foreign, however, known to native converts. Christianity was no doubt introduced into Egypt even in Apostolic times, but it would have come in the first instance to the Jews of Alexandria and the Greek-speaking population generally. Even when it penetrated farther, and addressed the native population in its own tongue, its message would at first have been oral, and the earliest Coptic versions of the NT may well have been merely oral paraphrases, such as were the earliest Anglo-Saxon versions in our own country. The first mention of Coptic Scripture occurs in the Life of St. Antony, who is said by Pachomius to have heard the Gospel read in church as a boy about A.D. 270; and since he was not acquainted with Greek, this must have been a Coptic version, whether oral or written. Early in the 4th cent., the first extant copy of the NT, the Sahidic, or dialect of Upper Egypt, was made. The other native dialects—Egyptian, or dialect of Lower Egypt, and Thebaic, or Sahidic, for Upper Egypt. Between the two lie several dialects collectively known as Middle Egyptian, with local varieties in the Fayyum, at Akhmim, and elsewhere, which certainly possessed a translation (or translations) of the Bible, but of which very little is known at present, for lack of materials.
TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

27. The Sahidic Version (Sah., formerly Thebaic).—It was formerly held that the Bohairic version (Boh.) was in use in the 4th cent. at least, since it was the version used by Azyrinus, bishop of Cos in Upper Egypt in the 14th cent. from the Arabic name of a district near Alexandria, the latter from which the Sahidic name for Upper Egypt. The two lie several dialects collectively known as Middle Egyptian, with local varieties in the Fayyum, at Akhmim, and elsewhere, which certainly possessed a translation (or translations) of the Bible, but of which very little is known at present, for lack of materials. But Coptic scholars are now generally agreed that the order of precedence must be inverted. Lower Egyptian was very largely Greek-speaking, and the language in which the Septuagint was already familiar would have been sufficient for a considerable time. In Upper Egypt, though there were considerable Greek communities there, and in the principal towns Greek must have been generally understood, the population as a whole must have been more Egyptian, and an Egyptian version of the NT would have been required sooner than in the neighbourhood of Alexandria. The characteristics of the Sahidic version also suit this hypothesis of an earlier date. It is rougher and less literary in style than the Bohairic, and its text is of a very early type, and closely akin to that of the NT that exists complete in a single MS, though some books pre-Origenian. Unfortunately it is known to us only in fragments. It was ultimately superseded by Boh. and dropped out of use; and, with the exception of some small but complete volumes recently acquired by the British Museum, all that we now have of it are isolated leaves of vellum or papyrus which have been rescued from the buried towns and monuments of Lower Egypt. The Akhmim. The Akhmim. The Akhmim. The Akhmim. The Akhmim.

28. The Bohairic Version.—This, which ultimately became the accepted Bible of the Coptic Church, is much better known than Sah., and is preserved in a considerable number of MSS. The date of its origin, however, is quite uncertain. In favour of an early date is the fact that the Apocalypse was apparently not originally contained in it; this book seems to have been generally accepted after the 7th cent., but was regarded with some doubt before. In the OT, Boh. contains the insertions made by Origen, which implies a date not earlier than the latter part of the 3rd cent. On the other hand, the date of the OT is 5707), and this again points to a date not substantially later than the first half of the 4th cent. The cent. from A.D. 250 to 350 seems the most probable period for its origin; though some writers (notably Guld) think that Coptic Christianity (as distinct from Greek) did not develop in Lower Egypt until the middle of the 6th cent., in that case Boh. literature is subsequent to this date.

The Bohairic version follows the Greek very closely, being more faithful and less free than Sah.; hence it is trustworthy evidence of the readings of the Greek MSS from which it was made. These MSS, as indicated above, were of the same general character as BN, and especially B. Divergent readings of the type represented by OL and OS, which are generally Coptic, are not infrequently in Sah., are practically absent from Boh. The earliest Boh. MS of the Gospels is the Curzon Catena (an inter-mixture of text and commentary) in the Parham Library, dated A.D. 257, or perhaps earlier, and the oldest and best continuous MS of the Gospels is Huntingdon MS 17, in the Bodleian, dated 1174. Several others are of the 12th and 13th cent.; but none goes back to anything like the age of the fragments of Sah. Some of them have Arabic versions in the margins. An excellent edition of Boh. has recently been completed by the Rev. G. Horner (Oxford, 1898 and 1903), who is now engaged on Sah.}

Fathers of the Western Church, Jerome (about 345–420) and Augustine (354–430). Later than the first quarter of the 5th cent. it is not necessary to go; for the settlement of the great issues in the textual history of the NT had taken place before this date.

A list of episcopalian writers and their principal works is given by Gregory (Prolegomena and Textual Criticism). An index of Patristic quotations was compiled by Dean Burgon and is now in the British Museum. Critical texts of the Latin and Greek Fathers are being issued under the direction of the Vienna and Berlin Academies respectively.

The most important MSS is discovered only in 1859 and published in 1862. Of the two most important versions, the Old Syriac was wholly unknown before 1854, and quite inadequately known until 1894; while the Old Latin, though known and studied in the 18th cent. (when Sabatier published his Bibliorum sacrorum Latinae versiones antiquae, Lyons 1743), cannot be said to have been rightly understood and classified, and the publications of several scholars who are still living. For many of the Fathers, we still are without editions which can be trusted with regard to their Scripture quotations. The textual criticism of the New Testament, as now understood, is consequently a science of comparatively modern growth. As was shown above (§ 1), the earliest editions of the Greek NT were in no sense critical texts. It is true that MSS were collated for them, but only such MSS as chance to be easily at the disposal of the editor. No search was made for specially good or old MSS, and (except for a very slight use of Cod. Sinaiticus) the MSS of the first century, which before any of the great uncials MSS had been examined. This is the more remarkable because B was used as the main basis of the text which became the standard text of the Septuagint (B), and hence most fully known at Rome in 1587; but it chanced that no Roman edition of the NT was issued, and consequently the great Vatican MS was little known and less used until the 19th cent. and the revised versions (1881) and the Textus Receptus (1894) were published.

The first of these was that of Dean Fell in 1675; the greatest was that of John Mill in 1707, which was remarkable not only for the number of Greek MSS quoted in it, but for the use of this collection for the first time of Patristic quotations, and its valuable prolegomena. In the 18th cent. Bentley (whose first appearance in the field of Biblical criticism was quite stimulating) edited (in 1751–52 an edition in which our present notation of the MSS was first introduced; and the list

31. Patristic Quotations. The third class of evidence available for textual purposes is that which is derived from the quotations from the NT in the writings of the early Fathers. If we can be sure that a writer is quoting from a MS lying before him, then his quotation gives us the reading of a MS which in many cases must have been earlier than any which we now possess. Sometimes we can be fairly sure of this, as when the quotation occurs in a continuous commentary on a single book; but when the writer expressly enumera-tes a certain reading as against other variants; or when he quotes the same passage several times in the same way. In other cases it is impossible to be certain that he is not quoting from memory; and this makes quotations from the Synoptics especially fallacious, since it is so easy to confuse the wordings of the different Evangelists. There is always the danger also that a copist may have assimilated the wording of a quotation to the form with which he was himself familiar. Consequently evidence of this class, though highly valuable when its surroundings guarantee its freedom from other readings, may not be of great value, because they can be both dated and placed. The dates of the earliest MSS and versions are uncertain, within half a century or more, while the date of a given Patristic work can generally be fixed within a few years. The advantage of being assignable to a certain country is one which Patristic quotations share with variants, but it is of great importance in fixing the origin and range of certain types of text. In both respects it will be found that the evidence of the Fathers is of great value in elucidating the textual history of the NT. It is impossible to treat here the evidence of the many other works, and we shall therefore not be able to state the names of most of the important Fathers may be mentioned, and subsequent sections will show what sort of part they play in the operations of textual criticism.

32. The earliest Patristic writings, such as the Epistles of Clement, Barnabas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, and the Shepherd of Hermas, contain very few quotations from the NT, and those few are inexact (see NT of Apostolic Fathers [Oxf. Soc. ofHist. Theol.]). In the third quarter of the 2nd cent. we have the writings of Justin Martyr and Tatian, and we know something of the Gnostic NT heresies by the heretic Marcion. From about 180 onwards the evidence becomes much fuller. Irenaeus (whose principal work was written between 181 and 189) worked mainly at Lyons, though his home was in Asia Minor. Western texts are also represented by Tertullian (about 160–200), Cyprian (about 200–258), and Hippolytus (flourished about 200); the two former being African writers, and the last-named of Rome. In Egypt there are two very important theologians, Clement of Alexandria (about 160–250) and Origen (185–553), and the two scholars who succeeded to the latter's literary inheritance, and founded the library of Cæsarea largely on the basis of his works, Pamphilus (d. 380) and Aelius Aristides (about 270–330). In Spain the most notable names are those of Aurispa (flourished about 340) and especially Epiphanius (d. 378); in Asia Minor, Gregory Thaumaturgus (d. 285), Basil of Cæsarea (229–79), Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 389); in Palestine, Cyril of Jerusalem (b. 351–86); and especially Chrysostom (347–407). Returning to the West, the important works of the NT, and those few are inexact (see NT of the last-named of Rome, are Hilary of Poitiers (bishop, 364–68), Lucifer of Cagliari (d. 371), Ambrose of Milan (bishop, 374–97), Tyconius (an African writer of the end of the 4th cent.), Priscolitanus (a Spaniard, d. 380); and, finally, the two great was considerably extended by C. F. Matthäi (1782-88), F. K. Alter (1786-87), A. Birch (1788-1801), and, finally, J. M. A. Scholz (1830-36), with whom the first stage of NT textual criticism may be said to have come to an end.

35. During this first, and most necessary, stage of the collection of evidence, which extends from 1657 to 1830, little was done in the way of classifying the materials thus obtained, or laying down the principles upon which they should be employed and interpreted; and, however, some notable exceptions. Mill, in his Prolegomena, discussed the true reading of many passages. J. A. Bengel, in 1724, divided the MSS and Versions into two families, which he called African and Asiatic, and asserted the superiority of the former, consisting of the few most ancient witnesses, over the latter, which included the great mass of later authorities. In this we find the germ of the principle of the classification of authorities, which is now the guiding principle of textual criticism, whether Biblical or classical. It was opposed by Wetstein, who anticipated the advocacy of the TR in our own time by Dean Burgon and others, maintaining that all the most ancient MSS had been contaminated from the Latin, and that only the later authorities were worthy of attention. J. S. Semler (1767) developed Bengel's theory, making a triple classification of authorities, and assigning all other MSS to the Antiochian and Constantinopolitan, and Western; and this was elaborated by his pupil J. J. Griesbach (1774-75), who adopted the same classification, but carried much further the assignment of the MSS to the three families, Versions to their several classes. Both in his classification and in his estimate of the characteristics of the various families Griesbach went far to anticipate the theory of Westcott and Hort, which is the foundation of contemporary criticism.

36. None of the scholars hitherto named, however, put his principles to the test by producing a reformed Greek text of the NT. The first opening of a new era in textual criticism, was taken in 1831 by K. Lachmann, a distinguished classical scholar, who, like Bentley before him, but with greater success, resolved to apply to the text of the NT the principles which were admitted as sound in the case of the Greek and Latin classics. This method consisted of selecting some of the oldest authorities (MSS, Versions, and Fathers), and forming his text solely from them, while excluding the great mass of later evidence. Putting faith mainly in the most ancient witnesses, in spite of their numerical inferiority, Lachmann only did what every editor of a classical text would do; but he departed from sound principle, first, by absolutely ignoring all evidence outside his selected group; and, secondly, by adopting in all cases the reading given by the majority of his selected authorities, without regard to the internal probabilities of the various readings, or applying any of the tests which textual science provides for discriminating between alternatives the external evidence for which is approximately equal. Moreover, the knowledge of the earlier authorities as Lachmann's disposal was by no means so complete as that which we have at the present day. For these reasons Lachmann's text could not long hold its ground precisely as it stood; nevertheless it did very great service in breaking the monopoly of the TR, and in preparing the way for further progress.

37. The next stage in this progress is marked by the names of Constantine Tischendorf and S. F. Tregelles. A close follower of the Codex Sinaiticus, Tischendorf achieved the most sensational success in textual history; but he also did admirable service by his collation of almost all the uncial MSS of any importance (except that he was allowed only limited access to B), and his collection of evidence in his successive editions of the NT (culminating in the 8th, published in 1860-72) remains the fullest apparatus criticus to the present day. His own printed text of the NT fluctuated considerably from one edition to another, and his judgment between various readings was hardly equal to his industry in collecting them; still in many he followed the TR, and his edition received some of the principal examples of a text constructed on critical lines. The prolegomena to his 8th edition was compiled after his death by Dr. C. R. Gregory, and is a perfect storehouse of bibliographical information; in its latest edition (published as a supplements to the critical works of the Textkritik des neuen Testamentes, Leipzig, 1900) it is the standard book of reference on the subject.

38. Tischendorf's industry as a collator was rivalled by that of his English contemporary, Tregelles, who collated all the extant uncial MSS and some of the chief minuscules, so that his results serve to check and test those of Tischendorf. In his text (published in 1857-72) he confined himself almost wholly to the uncialis, with the Versions and Fathers, completely ignoring the TR. In fact, he followed very much the same principles as Tischendorf, and his edition is serviceable chiefly as a means of testing Tischendorf's judgment, and of showing how far two scholars, working independently on the same evidence, arrive at the same results. Unfortunately his text of the Gospels was published in 1857, and therefore knowledge of B was even less than that of Tischendorf.

39. The evidence accumulated by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Tregelles, aided by the public interest excited by the controversy at this time between the Cornutus and Curetonian Syriac, produced a general sense of dissatisfaction with the TR, and in England led to an increasing desire for a revision of the AV in the light of modern knowledge, culminating in the appointment of the Committees which produced the RV (for which see art. English Versions, §§ 35-37). Meanwhile two English scholars were at work on a text of the NT, whose results were destined not only to affect very greatly the revision of the English Bible, but also to lay the foundations of all the textual work of the succeeding generation, and whose influence remains paramount to this day. These were B. F. Westcott (afterwards Bishop of Durham) and F. J. A. Hort. Their joint work began as far back as 1853, when they were colleagues at Cambridge; and it bore fruit in 1881, when their text of the NT appeared on May 12th (five days before the publication of the RV of the NT), and the Introduction, embodying the principles upon which their text was based, in the following September. This volume (written by Hort, but representing the views of both scholars) is the text-book of modern textual criticism as applied to the Greek Bible.

40. The principles of WH are an extension of those of Semler and Griesbach, as described above (§ 38), and rest upon a classification of our authorities into families, and a discrimination between the merits of these families. It is in the Gospels and Acts that the textual phenomena are most plainly marked, and it is to them that the characteristics to be described apply most fully; but they are likewise true, in a lesser degree, of the other books of the NT. If the apparatus criticus of the Gospels be studied, it will be found that certain MSS and Versions tend to agree with one another, and to form groups distinguished from others by the TR, and in such groups are in fact distinguished by WH, as follows; the reasons for the names assigned to them will appear shortly. (a) The Syrian family, often headed in the Gospels by the manuscripts A and C, but more fully and characteristically represented by the later uncialis, such as EFKMS, etc., and by the great mass of the minuscules, by the Peshitta version, and by most of the Fathers from Cyrus onwards; from this family, in its fully developed form, is descended the TR. (b) The Neutral family, of which the main representative is B, often supported by X, by LRTZ, by the minuscule

Evan. 33, and some other minuscules in a lesser degree, by Boh., and sometimes Sah. and frequently by the quotations of Origen; in Acts, Epp., and Apoc., A and C generally join this group. (y) The Alexandrian family, a sort of variant text, of which many MSS. are found in any one MS., but represented by the readings of some MSS. of the B group when they differ among themselves, and especially when they differ from B, L7, and AC when they are not Syrian, may be taken as the leading members of the family. (z) The Western family, headed by D among the uncials (with E* in Acts and D; in Paul.) and Evan. 473 among a small group of minuscules, but most authentically represented by the Old Latin and Orosius, is characterized by k. and Syr.-Sin.; it also largely colours Sah., and is found in almost all the early Fathers, notably Justin, Irenaeus, Cyprian, and Clement.

41. These being the main divisions which are found to exist among our authorities, the next step is to discriminate between them, so as to determine which is the most generally trustworthy. Here it is (in addition to the greater minuteness of the examination and analysis of the individual authorities) that the original and epoch-making character of the work of WH is most conspicuous. The first proposition—and one which at the root of the claims of the TR—sufficiently is this, that no specifically 'Syrian' reading occurs in the NT quotations of any Father before Chrysostom. In other words, wherever the Syrian family marks itself off from the others by a reading of its own, that reading cannot be shown to have been in existence before the latter part of the 4th century. The importance of this proposition is obvious, and it is noteworthy, as showing the value of Patristic evidence, that the proof of it rests wholly on the quotations found in the Fathers. The inevitable conclusion is that the Syrian text is a secondary text, formed (according to WH in Syria, and especially in Antioch) in the course of the 4th century. The secondary character is also established by an examination of representative Syrian readings (for these, see especially J. O. F. Murray's art. 'Textual Criticism of the NT' in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol.). As compared with the rival readings of other groups, they show the ordinary signs of editorial revision, such as the modification of harsh or strange phrases, assimilation of one version of an incident with another, greater literary smoothness, and the like. A special proof of secondariness is found in what WH call confute readings, when one group of authorities has one reading and another has a second, and the Syrian text combines the two. The shortest and simplest case is Latin, where § BCI. Boh, read euadogustas ton theon, D, OL., and Augustine aionastes ton theon, while A and the general mass of late uncials and minuscules have aionates kat euadogustas ton theon. (For other examples of this type see Hort's Introduction, and Murray, loc. cit.) The conclusion, therefore, is that the witnesses belonging to the Syrian family, although they predominate enormously in numbers, possess little intrinsic weight when opposed to witnesses of the other groups.

42. As between the remaining groups the discrimination is not so easy, and must be made by other methods. The Patristic evidence can show us that the Western text (originally so named by representatives of it were the OL version, the Latin Fathers, and the bilingual MSS) was spread over all the principal provinces to which Christianity penetrated,—Syria, Egypt, Rome, Gaul, Africa,—and that it goes back as far as we have any evidence, namely, to the middle of the 2nd century. On the other hand, it points to Egypt as the special stronghold of the neutral text, and it is possible that it may even be called Alexandrian. All, however, are of such antiquity that the preference can be given to none on this ground alone. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the internal character of the several texts. Of the Western text WH say (Introd. § 170): 'Any prepossessions in its favour that might be created by its imposing early ascendency are for the most part soon dispelled by continuous study of its internal character.' The chief characteristics with which they characterize it are a love of paraphrasing; a tendency to interpolate words, sentences, and even paragraphs; free changes or insertions of conjunctions, pronouns, and prepositional phrases; and generally an extreme licence in handling the original text. Alexandrian readings, on the other hand, are assigned to the family (z) (the Western) that is characterized by the many changes, made in the interest of literary style; they are thus comparatively unimportant, and give rise to little controversy. Over against these various divergences stand the texts which WH call 'neutral,' and even these show few or none of the signs of aberration which characterize the other groups. This text is found predominantly in B, the character of which is so superior that its evidence always deserves the most careful consideration, even when it stands alone.

43. Such is, in briefest summary, the theory with regard to the textual history of the NT propounded by WH. On its first promulgation it was bitterly assailed by the advocates of the TR; but against these its triumph, in the opinion of nearly all students of the subject, has been decisive. More recently the tendency has been to depreciate the pre-eminence of the B or Neutral Text, and to exalt the B or Western family, on the ground of its wide and early diffusion and the apparently primitive character of some of its special readings, in contrast with the text of WH. The term 'Syrian' has been condemned as liable to be confused with 'Syriac'; 'Western' as wholly misleading, since that type of text was widely prevalent in the last two centuries; and probably took its rise thence; 'Neutral' as begging the question of the superior character of the family so described. These criticisms may be briefly dismissed; there is good foundation for the claim to antiquity; but it is by form rather than by substance. 'Antiochian' might be substituted for 'Syrian' with advantage, and the Egyptian status of the 'Neutral' text might be admitted without abandoning its claims to antiquity; but no good substitute for 'Western' has yet been proposed. In some ways it would be better to abandon epithets altogether, and to call the several families by the names of the a-text, the p-text, the g-text, and the d-text, as indicated in § 40; or the nomenclature of the manuscripts may be retained, but regarded simply as so many labels, devoid of any significant connotation.

44. It is more important to say something with regard to the comparative claims of the B and the d texts in the first instance, and the d and B texts subsequently. With regard to the former controversy, which raged with great warmth after the publication of the RV of the NT, the advocates of the B or Syrian or TR (chief among whom were Dean Burgon, his disciple and literary heir the Rev. E. Miller, and the Rev. G. H. Gwinn, the editor of the Peshitta) rest their case mainly on the numerical preponderance of the manuscripts of this type, which they take as indicating the choice, deliberate or instinctive, of the early Church, and as implying the sanction and authority of Divine Providence. But in order to argue thus, it is necessary to maintain that the textual history of the Bible is fundamentally different from that of all other books of ancient literature, and that the reasoning faculties given us by God, which are generally recognized as guiding us to the truth with regard to the textual history of ancient literature, are not to be employed with regard to the textual history of the NT. There is nothing strange or abnormal in the rejection of a relatively large number of late authorities in favour of a smaller number of ancient authorities; on the contrary, it is a phenomenon common to nearly all works of ancient literature that have come down to us, the sole difference being that the NT manuscripts, early and late, are far more numerous than those of any classical work, so that the ordinary phenomena are exhibited on a much larger scale. If once it be admitted that the ordinary principles of literary criticism are to be applied to the NT, then the rejection of the TR in favour of one of the earlier families follows as a matter of necessity.

It may be added that the course of discovery since the publication of WH's theory is altogether the most possible test of such a theory, that of wholly new and unforeseen witnesses, and that it has received therefore much confirmation and no refutation. The discovery of the Sinaitic Syriac, the fuller scrutiny of the versions, the testing of the Patristic quotations (e.g. in the case of Ephraem Syrus, who was formerly supposed to have used the Peshitta), the papyrus and vellum fragments from Egypt and Sinai, the examination of more of the minuscule MSS, all these have brought additional support to readings of the 7, 8, and 9 families, for which the evidence previously available was sometimes very scanty, while they have done nothing to carry back the date of the distinctively Syrian period beyond the period assigned to them by WH, namely, the age of Chrysostom.

46. One point remains to be dealt with in this connection, the question of the origin of this 'Syrian' text, which thus dominated the NT tradition for considerably over a thousand years. The view of WH is that it was due to deliberate editorial revision, operating permanently, the first revision taking place early in the 4th cent., the second at some time after the middle of that century. Against this hypothesis it has been objected that, if such revisions took place, we should have expected to find some record of them in early Christian literature. We know the names of several editors of the Greek OT during this very century (see Gra. Versions or OT); it is likely that two revisions of the NT could have been executed and yet have left no trace in history? It has been urged that there is no record of how another great textual change was carried out, namely, the substitution in the Greek OT of Theodotion's version of Daniel for that of the LXX; and it is no doubt true that where the whole available literature likely to deal with such a subject is so scanty, the argument from silence is very precarious. Still it must be allowed to carry some weight, and not a few critics would subscribe for Hort's double revision a process of gradual change spread over a considerable period. Such a gradual change would be due to a general consensus of opinion as the only way to deal with divergent texts, namely, to combine them when possible, and otherwise to soften down harshnesses, to harmonize contradictions, and to give greater smoothness to the literary style. In favour of this hypothesis it may be noted that the MSS themselves show signs of a gradual and progressive development of the a text. The earliest MSS which (In the Gospels) can be classed with this family, A and C, exhibit its characteristics sporadically, not continuously, and not infrequently side with MSS of the 7 and 8 families against readings found in the overwhelming mass of later witnesses. The 6th cent. MSS, N29, show the a text in a somewhat more advanced stage; but it is not till we reach the later minuscules, such as Ep-MSS, that we find it fully developed in the form which we know as the TR. But whether we adopt the hypothesis of a definite revision or that of a gradual process of change in order to account for the existence of the a text, the fact of the existence of such a text remains, and its character as a secondary text of relatively late origin must be taken to be one of the established results of criticism.

The ordinary English student of the Bible is able readily to appreciate the points at issue in the controversy between the a and 9 texts, because they are substantially represented to him by the differences (so far as they are differences in text, and not merely in rendering) between the AV and the RV; for though the RV does not go the whole way with the 'Neutral' text, nevertheless its textual departures from the AV are small in that direction and give an adequate idea of its character. In dealing with the 9 text, however, there is no such ready means of realizing its character, since it is not embodied in any English edition, or even in an adequate appendix of the Greek. The features must be gathered by an inspection of the apparatus criticus of such works as the 'Variorum' edition of the English Bible, or the Oxford edition (with Sanday's appendices) of the Greek. Even here it is not all plain sailing, since no one MS gives a full and consistent representation of the 9 text, and the authorities which are predominantly of this character not infrequently disagree with regard to particular readings. Generally it may be said that k, e, and Cypriam (especially the c and Old Latin) and Old Latin (especially k, e, and Cypriam) represent the oldest form of the 9 text, while Codex Baeza (D), its chief champion among Greek MSS, has it in a more advanced (and more extravagant) form.

From these same ideas of its divergences from the a and 9 texts may be gathered (though it must be remembered that sometimes k and 9 are found in agreement against k, and that, according to the eclectic compilation, having diverged from the alternatives presented to them; and sometimes, on the other hand, k and 9 concur in the preservation of what has been dropped from a) that the early revision which has been proposed to explain 9 a). Thus OL and OS (with k) omit 'firstborn' in Mt 14, and the words 'blesse them that curse you, do good to them and pray for them that spitefully use you and persecute you.' In Mt 26, D in both cases has the omitted words; Yr-Cur. has the myxology to the Lord's Prayer, while D and most OL MSS omit it; ot omits Mt 17, and the omission in D is greater than in OL; D and D retain both; in Mt 18, D, OL, and Yr-Cur. agree with the 9 group in retaining the verse, while Yr-Syn. sides with the a group in omitting it; after Mt 26 a long additional passage (akin to Lk 1414) is inserted in D, OL, and Yr-Cur. (Yr-Syn. is defective). Mt 104 is omitted by k and Yr-Syn, inserted by D, Yr-Cur., and most other MSS. At Lk 6 D inserts the incident of the man working on the Sabbath day, but OL is defective here, and OL has no trace of it; in Lk 6 the TR is derived from the 9 text (D, OL, Yr-Cur., but Yr-Syn. agrees with the a group in omitting the words). We know not what spirits are of, etc: D and some OL MSS omit Lk 22, while other OL MSS and OS transpose v18. to this place; Yr-Syn. omits Lk 2214, but D, OL, and Yr-Cur. retain them; in Lk 234 some words are added to the end by OL and y; in Lk 242, where D and OL have remarkable divergences (which WH are in point of fact against the testimony of 9), both MSS of OL contain the omitted passages; but they concur with D and OL in omitting 245. Thus there are examples where both the a and 9 texts and the way in which its authorities are divided among themselves—a point of considerable importance; while it is quite possible that the divergences of 9 text (in the sense represented by D and OL, the OS not being extant) are even greater, so much so as to have given rise to the hypothesis that it represents a different edition of the book, due to the author himself. The vagaries of individual members of the 9 group are occasionally still more striking than those which have been already noted: as when two OL MSS (a and p) insert in Mt 14 the legend (apparently from the Ebionite Gospel) of the great light which flashed from Jordan at the baptism of Jesus, or when D and Sah. state (at Lk 239) that the stone at the mouth of the sepulchre was 'such as scarce twenty men could roll.' In addition to these substantial additions to or alterations of the text, the verbal divergences are very numerous, proving that an excessive licence was taken, by scribes or editors, in dealing with the Gospel text.

47. Until quite recently, the special variants of the 9 text were almost universally regarded as aberrations, which no one would think of accepting as readings of the original text. It is probably true that they believe that the passages omitted by the 'Western' text; partial exception is furnished by Blass' texts of Mt., Lk., Acts.

authority in the later chapters of Lk, are no authentic part of the Evangelist's original work, but are additions made at a very early date; but this is the only case in which they accepted testimony of this class as superior to B and its allies, and few other scholars would at that time have gone so far as they did. For some time after the promulgation of WH's theory, the conflict raged over the comparative merits of the s and k classes of text; and it was only as the superiority of the latter was more and more established that scholars began to investigate more fully the characteristics and claims of the remaining family (ignoring y, as merely a more or less independent variant), and that a very high antiquity could be demonstrated. The claims of the s text received a considerable stimulus from the publication of more of the OL MSS (especially k), and above all from the discovery of Syr.-Sin., which is perhaps the most important single member of the group. Further attention was attracted to it by Blass' attempt to show that the s text in Lk, and that in Acts represent different missions, and that where such care has been wanting, corruption is both rapid and far-reaching. The papyrus MSS of the Greek classics, written in the first two centuries of the Christian era, which have recently come to light in large numbers, a very high antiquity.

The main argument in favour of the s text is its great age and wide circulation, as demonstrated by the Patristic evidence of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. It has to be borne in mind, however, that purity of text is due not so much to great age as to care in transferral, and that where such care has been wanting, corruption is both rapid and far-reaching. The papyrus MSS of the Greek classics, written in the first two centuries of the Christian era, which have recently come to light in large numbers, a very high antiquity can be more accurately and revised more carefully. So with regard to the early Christian literature: we can well imagine that during the century and a half following the composition of the books, when Christianity was an unauthorized religion, liable to persecution and the destruction of its books, and when Christian compendiums looked for a speedy Sealing of the Lord, there would be little care and little opportunity for the precise collation of manuscripts, and a great possibility of verbal and even material variation in transcription.

Therefore, that through the greater part of the Christian world inaccurate copies would circulate, and that the more careful preservation of the true text would run in a comparatively narrow channel. And if there was one part of the world in which such care might more than elsewhere be expected, it was Egypt, and especially Alexandria, the home of Greek textual criticism, and the home also of the Greek version of the OT. Hence, when the internal evidence points to the s text as the most accurate and authentic in character, the inference to be drawn therefrom is not materially shaken when we find signs that its birthplace was in Egypt, and that its early circulation was in that country. In the MSS of various shades of the s type were prevalent elsewhere. That such was the character of the s text was the deliberate opinion of WH, who were perfectly aware of the early and wide atterion of the s text in the S class of text; and the support is supplied by the quite independent investigations of B, Weiss, whose elaborate study (on very different lines) of the texts of the principal uncials led him to the conclusion that, whereas all the rest show marked indications of editorial revision in varying degrees, the text of B, though by no means free from scribal blunders, has the strongest signs of authenticity and originality. It is also to be remembered that it is impossible to form a coherent text of the s type. The witnesses differ so much among themselves that it is easier to find a majority of them against any reading of that type than in favour of it. The revisers' attempt to patch up a coherent text of Lk and Acts, and in the other books the text is still more hopeless. Readings of the s type, in short, have much more the character of results of a common tendency, working more or less independently in different places under similar circumstances, than of the descend-
THADDAEUS

THADDAEUS.—This is the name of one of the Twelve Apostles as given in Mt 10, Mk 3*4. He is doubtless to be identified with the 'Judas [son of] James,' who appears in the Lukan lists (Lk 6*, Ac 19*; but AV renders 'brother of James'), and with the 'Judas, not Iscariot,' of Jn 14*, though some Syrian writers have made this last Judas the same as the 'Lebbaeus' (叙利亚) reads 'Judas Thomas,' Thomas being confessedly only a surname, 'the Twin.' In all four lists Thaddaeus (or Judas) comes next to Simon the Canaanite or Zealot and may not necessarily have been his brother or intimate friend (cf. the variant 'Judas Zeoltes' in Mt 10*, noted below). It is the opinion of almost all modern scholars that neither is to be identified with any of the brethren of our Lord, though Dom Chapman has lately published an elaborate argument to the contrary (JThSt vii. 412).

Instead of, or in addition to, 'Thaddaeus,' we find the variant Lebbeus. In Mk 6*, Codex Bezae (D) and some Old Latin MSS have 'Lebbeus'; but all the best authorities, including syriac (叙利亚) is wanting here, have 'Thaddaeus,' and this is doubtless right. In Mt 10* the oldest Greek MSS (V B), the Vulgate, the Copto, and some Old Latin MSS have 'Thaddaeus,' while D, supported by the valuable Old Latin k and some other MSS, has 'Lebbeus.' Some other Old Latin MSS have 'Judas Zeoltes,' and syriac has 'Judas sbeulat,' (叙利亚) is wanting here). Some inferior MSS and several Versions combine 'Lebbeus' and 'Thaddaeus,' as AV ('L. whose surname was Th.); but this is clearly a later explanation, and must be rejected. We see, then, that in Mt. 'Thaddaeus' is the best attestation, and this alone is read in RV, from which 'Lebbeus' has completely disappeared. But how could 'Lebbeus' have been invented? It has been suggested (a) that some early scribe, taking 'Thadaeus' and 'Lebbeus' to be names of kindred meaning, the former from an Aramaic word denoting 'breast,' the latter from another denoting 'heart,' confused the two; or (b), with greater probability, that 'Lebbeus' is the variant of 'Ileii,' introduced by some scribe who would not know that Ileii and Matthew were the same person. It does not affect these explanations if, with Dalman, we hold that these derivations are in fact wrong, for the scribes were not necessarily qualified to be good philologists.

After NT times Thaddeus (Syr. Todda) was often confused with Addai, who was said to be one of the Seventy disciples, and, being sent to Edessa, healed Abgarus (Smith-Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 875). In a list of Apostles given in Lagarde's Appendix to the Apostolic Constitutions (p.288), Thaddeus, 'who is Lebbeus and Judas, is distinguished from 'Judas of James,' and is said to have preached at Edessa, to have been buried in Egypt, and to have been crucified. THANK-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 12.

THARRA.—See TERESA.

THASSI.—The name is Greek (lit. 'a place for viewing') and the thing appears to be of Greek origin also. From the cities of Greece proper, theatres spread all over the Greek and Roman world. The auditorium consisted regularly of a semicircular cavity cut on the side of a hill, much broader at the back end than the front, and placed concentrically, being commonly carved out of the rock. The part level with the ground, the orchestra, was occupied by the choir. The stage and scene were on the diameter, and were of artificial construction, being very often like the front of a temple. The theatres were used for public meetings, as being generally the largest buildings in the cities (Ac 19* 26; cf. also art. EPHESIUS).

THEBAIC VERSION.—See TEXT OF NT, § 27.

THEBES.—See No.

THEBEZ.—A fortified city, in the reduction of which Abimelech met his death (Jg 9* 4, 5 11*). It is described by Eusebius and Jerome as 13 miles from Napes, on the road to Scythopolis. There is some connection of the present Tell Bâ, a prosperous village in a fruitful open valley, 10 miles N.E. of Nablus, on the ancient highroad to Beisan. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

THEFT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 6

THELEMAS.—See TEL-HARA.

THEODOTION.—See GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, p. 519*

THEODOTUS.—1. One of the messengers sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus (3 Mac 14* 1). 2. The author of a tract to assimilate his Psalms to the Septuagint, which was frustrated by Dositheus (3 Mac 12*).

THEOPHILUS (lit. 'beloved of God').—The person to whom St. Luke's two works are addressed (Lk 1*, Ac 1*). That Theophilus stands for a real person and is not a general name for the Christian reader is made probable by the title 'most excellent,' which, when strictly used, implies equestrian rank (Ramsay, St. Paul p. 388). It is used also of Felix (Ac 23* 24*) and of Festus (26*). But some take the title and mean something else, as 'my lord,' and therefore are saying nothing of Theophilus himself. If it is used strictly, we may agree with Ramsay that Theophilus was a Roman official, and the favourable attitude of St. Luke to the institutions of the Empire is in keeping with this idea. If so, Theophilus would be the Christian, not the Roman, name of the person addressed. A. J. MACKEN.

THESALONIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO

THESALONIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO
Theodore having just arrived (39), not, however, from Berea, but from Thessalonica, whither he had been dispatched by St. Paul from Athens (3-1). It is clear, then, that the Epistle was written from Corinth, but in the compressed narrative of Acts, St. Luke has overlooked the fact that Timothy at least did join St. Paul at Athens, and was later under the influence of the Apostle's deep concern for his converts, whom he could not re-visit personally, for 'Satan hindered us' (1 Th 3: 2 2 Th 1-14). (Very possibly Jason's bond involved a pledge that St. Paul should not re-enter the city—an absolute barrier designed as hindrance by Satan.) Further, the impression is conveyed by Acts that St. Paul's expulsion from Thessalonica followed immediately upon a three months' ministry in the synagogue, and a doubt naturally arises whether the church as described in 1 Th. could have been established in so short a time. Apart, however, from indications in the Epistle itself of a longer stay (e.g. Gal 1: 17), it is probable, therefore, that the Acts narrative is to be interpreted as implying a brief and almost fruitless appeal to the Jews, followed by a longer and more successful ministry to the Gentile population (Ac 18-5). A more plausible thesis is that Ac 17 there is considerable 'Western' authority for inserting 'and of' before 'Greekess,' thus giving three classes of converts besides the women—Jews, devout persons (i.e. proselytes), and Greeks (i.e. heathen). See also Ramsay, who constructs an 'eclectic' text (St Paul the Traveller, pp. 226 note, 235 note 2).

The occasion of the letter, then, was the return of Timothy from his mission: its date falls within the closing months of St. Paul's ministry to the churches of South Galatia, which, may have been written earlier), it is the earliest of extant Pauline writings.

2. Contents. The Epistle does not lend itself to formal division. The least doctrinal and most personal of all St. Paul's letters to the churches, it is simply prompted by affectionate concern for the 'faith and love' of his recent converts, and for their 'good remembrance' of himself.

The tidings brought by Timothy that they 'stand fast' (3:4) leads the Apostle to begin with an outburst of thankful memories of his mission, in which every reminder of his ministry among the Thessalonians and of their enthusiastic response is both an appeal and an admonition. This, together with reference to his intense longing to see them and to the visit and return of Timothy, forms the first and main section of the passage (3:1-16), the final verse gathering up all the Apostle's desires into a prayer (3:17). Very simple yet profound expression is given to the Christian faith and hope (1:1-2); there is reference to Jewish hostility (2:19-20), but no controversial insistence on an anti-Judaic Christianity—a confirmation of early date. In ch. 4 there is a warning against the growing impurity of the Gentile life (4:1-3), and against a fanatical detachment from the ordinary duties and responsibilities of life (v. 31). This is followed by a comforting assurance, needed no doubt by the believers in the speedy 'coming of the Lord' which St. Paul shared with his converts (passed by St. Paul in Acts 20, 28), and which will have part in that event equally with those who are yet alive (v. 18). This theme is carried on to a warning to be watchful against the sudden coming of 'the day of the Lord,' as beseems 'sons of light and sons of the day' (5:4-11). A general admonition to the church to respect its leaders and to cultivate peace (5:12-13) leads out into a beautiful series of short exhortations, like a 'string of glittering diamonds' (vv. 14-22), prayer and salutation (v. 23), an instruction that the letter be read to all the brethren (v. 27), and final benediction (v. 28).

3. Authenticity. (1) External testimony. Echoes of 1 Th. have been traced in Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp,—none of them, however, certain. It is contained in the Syriac and Old Latin Versions, and named in the Muratorian Fragment. The earliest quotation is in Irenaeus, who attributes the Ep. to St. Paul, and specifies it as the 'First' to the Thessalonians: it is quoted by Clement of Alexandria, and frequently by Tertullian. If regarded as the personal and non-theological character of the letter, this testimony is ample.

(2) Internal evidence. The simplicity of the letter, the prevalence of the personal note over the doctrinal, its accord with the history in Acts (apart from the slight discrepancies already noted, which a 'forgery' would surely have avoided), and the agreement with Philipp, and 1 Cor., in the writer's attitude of affectionate confidence towards these Macedonian Christians, all make strongly for genuineness, and the Ep. is, in fact, generally accepted by critics of all schools.

The assertion of an un-Pauline doctrinal standpoint (by Barrow) fails for the standard of St. Paul's teaching in the later Ep. (Gal., Cor., Rom.) and ignores the gradual shaping of Pauline Christianity under stress of problems and controversies as yet hardly formulated. The Jewish opposition is not to St. Paul's distinctive teaching, but to his whole mission (2 Cor. 13): the declaration that because of persistent rejection of Christ 'the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost' (29), is a mean implication that Jerusalem is already destroyed (A.D. 70). The rapid progress of the Church at Thessalonica refutes the view that it is the Jewish opposition which organizes itself as it is (50) is consistent with the still earlier date of Act 14. It is true, and in no way remarkable, that the expression 'in eminent Parousia' (4:17) is not repeated in St. Paul's later letters (2 Co 5, Ph 3, Col 3). Would, then, a 'forgery' of a later generation have attributed this to St. Paul? There is no reason to doubt that the Epistle gives a genuine and invaluable self-revelation of St. Paul the man. All the great Christian truths appear—the Divinity of Christ, His death for men, and resurrection, the Christian's union with Him, the gift of the Holy Spirit,—but less as doctrines than as vital elements of personal religion, the moving forces of St. Paul's own life and ministry.

S. W. GREEN
3. Authenticity.—(1) External testimony. The evidence cited for 1 Th. is双十一 reinforced by 2 Th. 7, Polyepist. in Polycarp, and possibly in Justin Martyr; that is, of the two Epistles the Second is the more strongly attested.

(2) Internal evidence. Circumstances have already been assigned to the letter, in themselves consistent and not improbable. To these may be added the close resemblance to 1 Th. In subject-matter and phrasing, so obvious that it need not here be detailed. A literary dependence of 2 Th. on 1 Th. is practically certain, for the possibility itself is necessary to justify a second letter at all and bids the supposition of unconscious repetition. If 2 Th. is by St. Paul, he must have re-read his former letter before writing this, and the question naturally arises whether it is likely that he would so reproduce himself. (The case of Colossians and Ephesians is not parallel; these were contemporary Epistles, and not addressed to the same Church.) Hence the resemblance to 1 Th. is made an argument against the Pauline authorship of 2 Th.

Moreover, along with the resemblance are found other features which are regarded as un-Pauline and post-Pauline, with the result that the Second Epistle is widely rejected by those who admit the First. The grounds on which this rejection must be briefly examined.

(o) Style. It is freely admitted that this argument is hazardous and inductive: those who rely upon it would not perhaps quarrel with Jowett's dictum that 'objections of life and death, matters of taste or fashion, about which it is useless to dispute.' (Com. on Th. i. 147.) The argument must also reckon with those evident features of the 1 Th. style by which the close resemblance of some two-thirds of the Ep. to 1 Th. carries with it, while in the remainder what is exceptional may be due to the new subject already in hand. It must be argued that some portions of the Second Epistle are more closely parallel to 1 Th. show a loss of ease and simplicity which suggests that they have been written without careful revision. There is a difference of style, account for in the same writer saying the same thing after so short an interval; nor is the change such as marks advance towards the style of St. Paul's later letters.

(2) Subject-matter (apart from 2:12). As compared with 1 Th., very little appears in 2 Th. that is new or convincingly Pauline: something, too, of the warmth and glow of personal feeling has gone. The severity of tone in 1:6-8 cannot perhaps be object to, in view of 1 Th. 2:16, 18, while 2:8 is sufficiently accounted for by the aggravation of the offence already rebuked (1 Th. 4:14, 8:1). The reference to an 'epistle as from us' (2:2) suggests an earlier correspondence of St. Paul with his Churches, of which we have no knowledge, frequent enough to have already given rise to fraudulent imitation. The point is possible, though the presence of a betraying signature (3:17) may seem, perhaps, a little inadequate.

(c) The passage 2:12. The objection that this contains a 'Tower of Babel' character of the passage, unique in Paul, and held to show both dependence on later writings and allusion to post-Pauline history. So far, however, as the thought is exceptional, the section may fairly be regarded as a pendant to the equally exceptional section 1 Th. 2:14-17 (cf. also Ro 7:7, Gal 4:4-5), and as more likely to be original than attributed to Paul by a later imitator. The question rather is whether it can be accounted for by contemporary ideas, or betrays the facts and conclusions of a later time. The general thought is that the coming of Christ is to be hindered by an utmost apostasy. The apostasy is called the 'falling away' (2 Th. 2:3), either headed by or personified as 'the man of sin' (2 Th. 2:8) the man of lawlessness). The son of perdition, 'the man of sin' (2 Th. 2:3) whose character and coming are more fully described in v. 3-5, 11-12. Already 'the mystery of lawlessness is at work' (2 Th. 2:7), but the crisis is delayed, may suggest that this is the last of a series of delayed disasters, the 'antichrist.'

Now, of the elements of this conception, that of an 'apostasy' is not unknown to 1 Th. 2 Th. 2 Co 11:13, Ro 16:17. (as well as 2 Co 10:5-10, and throughout the Pastoral Epp.), and is attributed to false teachers. The same idea occurs in Mt. 24:24, 26, 27 (2 Th. 2:10, 11), and Jude 16 (2 Th. 2:10, 11). This wide prevalence of the thought in the NT writings, and the constant prediction of 'many' false teachers, false prophets, false Christs, antichrists, as regards our passage: (1) that it draws upon a common stock of eschatological ideas; (2) that 'the man of sin' is not necessarily a person, but a thing, 'a type'; (3) that 'the antichrist' is not necessarily a person (2 Th. 2:2), but v. 22 and elsewhere (the 'antichrist'), symbolizing tendencies and movements, and therefore only at great hazard be identified with any real personal image. Hence the alleged reference to the legend of Nero redivivus (Tac. Hist. ii. 8), with its implication of Ca. 65-70 as the earliest possible date for 2 Th., is quite without warrant.

It is true that our passage has close affinities with Revela- tion (especially 15:2-7, 18, 20, but this does not necessarily mean dependence. For Ezk 38, 39, Dn 7-9, 11, 12, and later extra-canonical Jewish apocalyptic literature present, under varied historical colouring, the same conception of a final rally of the powers of evil before the last days, and of the triumph of Messiah over 'antichrists.' In 2 Th. 2:1, Par. this 'anti-christ' is Be'lial or Be'l,in 2 Co 6:14, 15, 'the beast' (symbol of the Roman Empire rather than exclusively of Nero), and it is not necessary to regard 'the man of sin' and equivalent expressions as more personal than these. What is really peculiar to 2 Th. is the assertion of a restraining power, a power which, once it has been removed, the world is free to its own destructive force. Can this be explained as historical colour given by St. Paul to current apocalyptic tradition under the circumstances of a 2 Th. 2:2 as a development of a fragment of genuine Pauline material, which stood, as it may be supposed, in Christ the Second Epistle. But the trend of Paul's critical opinion is perhaps indicated in Judglic's judgment, that the 'man of sin' can after all be most easily solved' under the view that the Epistle was written by St. Paul.

THESAULONIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO

THEUDAS.—mentioned by Gamaliel (Ac 5:39) as the leader of an unsuccessful rebellion of 400 men. Josephus
THIGH

(Ant. xx. v. 1) speaks of a Theudas who misled the people and gave himself out for a prophet, at least ten years after Gamaliel's speech; and also a little afterwards (§ 2) speaks of the sons of Judas the Galilean, the instigator of a rebellion in the time of Quirinius. Now St. Luke (Ac 5:30) speaks successively of Theudas and Judas the Galilean. It is alleged that he erroneously put the names into Gamaliel's mouth owing to a misreading of Josephus. But the difference between the writers is so great that it is impossible to suppose that the one account depends on the other. If St. Luke depends on Josephus, where did he get his number '400 men' from? There may have been more than one Theudas, and Lightfoot suggests that the name might be used as the Greek equivalent of several different Hebrew ones. There certainly were, as Josephus tells us, many rebellions at this period. Or the name may be an interpolation in Josephus, taken from Acts by some Christian scribe (Blauck); or one of the writers may have made a mistake in the name. But they could hardly be quoting, either from the other.

A. J. Maclean.

THIGH (Heb. vārēk, Gr. méros).—The hollow of Jacob's thigh was strained as he wrestled at Peniel (Gn 32:25), and to this is attributed the Jewish custom (enforced by the Mishna) of not eating 'the sinew of the hip' (v. 38). On the thigh the sword was girded (Ex 32:26, Ps 45:4, Ca 34); Ehud's on the right thigh because he was left-handed (Jg 3:19). Under the jealousy ordained the woman's thigh falls away if she has been guilty of adultery (Nu 5:12). To smile 'hip and thigh' (Lit. 'leg upon thigh') is a phrase denoting utter discomfiture accompanied by great slaughter (Jg 19:13). Its origin is unknown, and its meaning much disputed. In Jer 31:19 and Ezek 21:12 'smiling upon one's thigh is a gesture of sorrow or terror. In Heb. (cf. AVm) of Gn 48:6, Ex 13, Jg 8:4 a man's children are described as coming out of his thigh. This explains the oath taken by placing the hand under the thigh (Gn 24:6 477), a special sacredness being ascribed to the organs of generation. In NT 'thigh' occurs only in Rev 19:18, where perhaps the meaning is that the name was written on that part of the garment which covered the thigh.

J. C. Lambert.

THISBE.—The place from which Tobit was carried away captive by the Assyrians (To 19). Its position is described as being on the right hand (south) of Kedesh-napthall in Galilee above Asher. No trace of the name has yet been found. Some commentators maintain that Thisbe was the home of Elijah 'the Tishbite,' but this is very doubtful.

Thistles.—See Thorns.

THOGANUS (1 Es 926) = Thirvah, Ezr 10:9.

THOMAS.—One of the twelve Apostles. The earlier Evangelists mention only his name (Mt 10:8 = Mk 3:18 = Lk 6:14), but St. John has rescued him from oblivion. His question in the Upper Room (Jn 14:5) proves him somewhat slow of understanding. He was querulous and gloomy, always disposed to look at the dark side. Thus, when Jesus on the evening of the Resurrection-day appeared to the Apostles in the room at Jerusalem where they were assembled with closed doors, Thomas was absent, buried in despair; and when he heard that they had seen the Lord, he would not believe it. He would not believe it, he declared, be persuaded unless he saw and handled His pierced hands and side (Jn 20:25-29). The next Sunday evening Jesus appeared as before, and gave Thomas the evidence he had craved. 'My Lord and God,' God-God cried the doubter, leaping from the depth of despair to the summit of faith (Jn 20:29). His doubts were removed, and he was one of the seven who journeyed north to meet the Lord at the Lake of Gennesaret. Doubtful though he was, Thomas was no coward, and he had a great devotion to Jesus. It was he who, when tidings of Lazarus' sickness were brought to Bethany beyond Jordan, and the rest, fearing the rage of the rulers, were disposed to let the Master venture alone into Judea, put his cowardice to shame: 'Let us also go, that we may die with him!' (Jn 11:16).

Thomas is not really a name but an epithet, meaning, like its Greek equivalent Didymus (Jn 11:20 = 21), 'the Twin.' If, as is generally held, the name of the Apostles' name was Judas, he would be styled 'the Twin' to distinguish him from Judas the son of James and Judas Iscariot. Tradition credits him with the authorship of a Gospel (see Gospels [Apostrophical], 6). D. W. Smith.

THOMEI.—See TEMAR.

THORNS, THISTLES, ETC.—So many words are used in the Heb. for thorny plants, and they are so variously translated, that it will be convenient to consider them all in one group. In the great majority of cases it is impossible to identify the special species referred to.

1. 'āzād, Je 5:6 AV 'thistle,' 'thistle,' RV 'thorn'; Ps 58:9 AV and RV 'thorns.' In Gn 60:11, Gad occurs as a proper name. The 'āzād is probably the buckthorn (Rhamnus palaestina), a lowly bush.

2. berqēm (Jg 8:32 'briers'), some kind of thorn. Arab. berqēm is the Centaurea scoparia, a thorny-headed composite common in Palestine.

3.决心 (Gn 34:7, 10), 'thistles,' 'thorny thickets or thorny plants. In modern Arab. shalqet el-darrar is applied to the star twigs or knawps of which Centaurea calcitrapa and C. erucifolia are common Palestine forms. They are given the name shalqet because, when the tiny blossoms die away, the leaves are left as long, thin, hard, sharp thorns.

4. ḥēḏeq (Pr 15:19 'thorn,' Mic 7:1 b. 4: 55', thistle,' cf. Arab. chadag 'to enclose,' some prickly plant used as a hedge (Pr 15:4). See ch. 2 K 14:1, 2 Ch 234, and Job 31:13 'thistles.' 2 Ch 33:1, Ca 22, and Hos 9 'thorns'; Is 34:4 AV 'thistles'; 1 Is 38 'thickets'; Job 41:4 'thorns where book,' as in RV, 'were better'), some shrub, species unknown, with very strong spines.

5. hašākh, a thorn hedge (Mic 7:7).

6. nā'ē thētsēs (Is 7:4 'thorn,' 45:19, thorns'), from Aram. nā'tēs 'to prick,' a general term for a thorn.

7. στέρες (Ec 7:1, Is 34:1, Hos 9, Nah 11 'thorn'). The reference to the 'cracking of thorns' suggests the thorny burnet, which is burned all over Palestine in lime-kilns, inyāth, Am 12, many 'books.'

8. σίλεν (Ec 2:24 'brier'; σελλόνθι, Ezk 2:27 'thorns'). The reference to the 'cracking of thorns' suggests the thorny burnet, which is burned all over Palestine in lime-kilns, inyāth, Am 12, many 'books.'

9. στήριθσ (Ec 2:24 'briers,' lit. 'reeds,' as in mg., but text, doubtful).

10. καρπὸς (Is 55:1 'briers,' lit. the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

11. κεφαλή (Is 55:1 'briers,' the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

12. κεφαλή (Is 55:1 'briers,' the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

13. στήριθσ (Ec 2:24 'thorns'), elsewhere 'nettles.' See NIV.

14. στήριθσ (Ec 2:24 'thorns'), elsewhere 'nettles.' See NIV.

15. καρπὸς (Is 55:1 'briers,' the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

16. καρπὸς (Is 55:1 'briers,' the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

17. καρπὸς (Is 55:1 'briers,' the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').

18. rhamnos (Gr.), Bar 67 (AV and RV 'thorn').

19. thallos (Gr.), 2 Co 12:7 (RV 'thorn,' RV 'stake'). See MEMBCO, p. 600; PUBL., p. 688.

20. akbarā (Gr.) = Heb. qeś, Mt 7:19 = 27:27 etc. 'thorns.'

21. triboles (Gr.), Mt 17:8 'thistle,' He 6:4 'brier.'

The variety of words used to describe these prickly plants is not surprising, when it is remembered that such plants are ubiquitous throughout Palestine, and for many months of the year are almost the only living uncultivated vegetation. They form the common food of goats and camels; they are burned (Ec 7:7), specially the thorny burnet (Arab. bilādūn), in oven and lime-kilns, large areas of land being diligently cleared every autumn for this purpose. Gigantic thistles, sometimes as high as a horse's head, cover whole acres of fellow land and have to be burned before ploughing can begin. 'Thorns' of various kinds, e.g., prickles, oleasters, etc., are commonly used as hedges; and tangled masses of dead thorny branches from the Ziziphus and similar trees are used, particularly in the Jordan Valley, as defences round fields, flocks, or tents (Pr 130, Mic 74 etc.).

THOUGHT

THOUGHT.—In 1 S 9v, in Mt 6v (as well as in the foll. vv. 27, 28, 31, 44), in 10v, in Mk 13v, and in Lk 22v, 23, 25 = the Eng. word 'thought' is used in AV in the old sense of 'grief or anxiety.' Thus Mk 13(2) 'Take no thought beforehand what you shall speak, because it shall not be given you then to speak what you shall have thought.' Hence 'does not mean do not think or plan, but be not burdened with anxiety beforehand.'

THOUSAND.—See ARMY, 2; NUMBER, 5.

THRACE.—Some have proposed to identify Tirias (Ge 10(15)) with Thrace, but this identification is uncertain. An Achaean horseman is mentioned in 2 Mac 12(20) (about b.c. 163) as saving Gogias, the governor of Idumea, under Antiochus Epiphanes, from capture. The name Thrace—It was not till a.d. 56 the name of a Roman province—was applied to the Hellenized Thrace, between the rivers Strymon and Danube. After the death of Lysimachus (b.c. 281)—see THYATIRA,—with whom the prospect of civilization for the country died, it continued barbarous, and was famous only for its severe climate and its soldiers. Of the latter there was a plentiful supply, and as soldiers of fortune they were to be found in the armies of the richer States. They were chiefly cavalry and light-armed infantry. The name 'Thractian' was hence applied to gladiators armed in a particular way. Kings who employed them in war frequently settled them in colonies after peace was declared. A. SCOTT.

THREASUS.—The father of Apollonius (2 Mac 2v).

THREE.—See NUMBER, § 7.

THREE CHILDREN [SONG OF].—See APOCRYPHA, 6.

THRESHING, THRESHING-FLOOR.—See AGRICULTURE, 3, 3.

THRESHOLD.—See HOUSE, 6.

THRONED.—The OE tr. of Heb. mesî or mesêš. It was used by any seat of honour: e.g. of the high priest (1 S 17, 14, 15), of a judge (Ps 94, 19), of a military officer (Jer 14); but most frequently of a king (e.g. Pharaoh Ex 19, David and Solomon 1 K 20 etc.). For a description of Solomon's throne see 1 K 10, 4, 2 Ch 9, 11, 14. Frequently 'throne' is used metaphorically for dignity, royal honour, and power. Thus 'the throne of David' often stands for the royal honour of David's house (2 S 7v). So God's 'throne' is His sovereign power (cf. Ps 45, 9, 9).

The NT term thronos [once (Ac 12v)] bêma, 'judgment-seat,' is tr. 'throne'; is frequently used in Rev 20 to the thrones of the assessors of the heavenly judge (cf. Mt 19, Lk 22); but is most frequently used of the throne of God or Christ (Mt 5v, 19v, Lk 12v, Rev 22v). For 'throne' as a rank of angels, see art. DOMINION, and cf. POWER. W. F. BOYD.

THROUGHLY.—This is the older spelling of 'thoroughly.' In mod. editions of AV we find both forms used, 'thoroughly' in Ex 21v, 2 K 11v, and 'throughly' elsewhere; but in the original edition of 1611 the spelling is 'thoroughly' everywhere. There was no distinction in earlier Eng. between 'through' and 'through' 'throughly' and 'thoroughly.' In the first ed. of AV Ex 14v reads 'the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea.'

THUMB.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING, §§ 3, 5.

THUMB.—The thumb is associated with the great toe, and occurs in two different connexions. 1. We are told that Adonibezek's thumbs and great toes were cut off (Jg 19), and that he himself had practised this mutilation on seventy kings (v.7). The object seems to have been to render the vanquished monarchs unfit for war and thus for reigning in a warlike age. 2. In the ritual of the consecration of Aaron, the right hand and the great toe of the cleane leper was similarly sprinkled with blood and oil (Lv 14v, 17, 25, 28). The action seems to have symbolised the consecration (or purification) of the whole man, the extremities only being touched, just as only the horns of the altar were sprinkled with the blood.

THUMMIM.—See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THUNDER. —There is no finer description of a thunderstorm than that of Ps 18v, 13v. In a region of high mountains and deep gorges, split throughout its length by the great cleft of the Jordan, the effect of thunder is peculiarly terrible. In Palestine it is confined almost entirely to winter (1 S 13v, 1), but the writer once witnessed a terrific storm late in April, among the Gilead uplands. It is invariably accompanied by rain. According to poetic and popular ideas, thunder was the voice of God (Ps 104, Job 37v etc.), which a soul gifted with insight might understand and interpret (Is 12v; cf. Mk 1, Mt 3v etc.). It is the expression of His resistless power (1 S 26v, Ps 28v etc.), and of His inexorable vengeance (Is 30v etc.). Thunder plays a part in adorning the Egyptian (Ex 9v), at the delivery of the Law (19v), and in discomfitting the Philistines (1 S 7v). It is not guided by caprice, but by the will of God (Job 28v, 8v). It appears largely in the more terrible imagery of the Apocalypse. "The voice of Thunder," see BOOKS.

THYATIRA.—There was a long valley extending northward and southward and connecting the valleys of the Hermus and Calicus. Down this valley a stream flows southwards, and on the left bank of this stream lies Thyatira. An important road also ran along this valley, the direct route between CONSTANTINOPLE and Smyrna, and the railway takes this route now. Thyatira was also in the 1st cent. a.d. a Roman station on the Imperial Road (overland route) from Brundisium and Dyrrhachium by Thessaonica, Neapolis (for Philippi), TROAS, Pergamum, Philadelphia ... to Tarasus, Syrian Antioch, Caesarea of Palestine, and Alexandria. In its connexion with Pergamum this road had always a great importance. Thyatira was built (in the middle of the valley, with a slight rising ground for an acropolis) by Seleucus, the founder of the Seleucid dynasty, whose vast kingdom extended from W. Asia Minor to the Himalayas. The city was founded between b.c. 300 and 282 as a defence against Lysimachus, whose kingdom bordered that of Seleucus on the N. and W., and the colonists were Macedonian soldiers. Lysimachus was succeeded by Seleucus, and Lysimachus and founded the kingdom of Pergamum. After the death of Lysimachus, Thyatira was a useful garrison to hold the road, in the interests first of the Seleucids and afterwards of the Pergamum. The latter were safe from the former if they were in possession of Thyatira. The relation between Pergamum and Thyatira was thus of the closest. The city, though weak in position, was a garrison city, and had to be carefully fortified, and everything was done to foster the military spirit. The character of the city's religion is illustrated by the hero Tyrannos, who is figured on its coins. He is an horseback and has a battle-axe on his shoulder. This hero is closely related to the protecting god of the city, whose temple was in front of the city. He was considered the divine ancestor of the city and its leading families, and was identified with the sun-god. He also had the title Pythian Apollo, thus illustrating the strange mixture of Anatolian and Greek ideas and names which is so common a feature in the ancient religions of Asia Minor. In conformity with this, he was represented as wearing a cloak fastened by a brooch, carrying a battle-axe, and with a laurel branch in his right hand, symbolizing his purifying power. It is certain that the place was inhabited before the time of Seleucus, but merely as a trading post with his town. The city had nearly 30,000 on the model of those in Greece proper, and in the 3rd cent. a.d. the Emperor Elagabalus was associated with the god in the worship connected with them, showing the closer relation which had been effected between the popular and the Imperial religion. It is probable that Seleucus I. had settled Jews in Thyatira, as he certainly did in some of the cities of Asia. Lydia of Thyatira (Act 16:9) had come within the circle of the synagogue, possibly in her native place.

Little is known of the history of the city. It surrendered to the Romans in B.C. 198. It was occupied by Aristion during his revolt in B.C. 135-134. It must have suffered severely and repeatedly during the fighting between Arabs and Christians, and Turks and Christians, in the Middle Ages. Its situation demands that it be captured and re-fortified by every ruling power. In Roman times it had been a great trading city, during the greatest period of prosperity from about the time when the Seven Letters were written. There is evidence of trade-guilds there than in any other Asian city: wool-workers, linen-workers, makers of outer garments, dyers, leather-workers, tanners, bronze-smiths, etc. Lydia probably belonged to one of those guilds. The purple in which Lydia dealt must have been a product of the region of Thyatira, and the well-known Turkish madder-root, which must therefore be meant. It is obtained from madder-root, which grows abundantly in that region. The name 'purple' had a much wider meaning among the ancients than among us. The bronze work of Thyatira was also remarkably fine (cf. Rev 21).

The letter addressed to the Church at Thyatira

(Rev 2:20) is the most obscure and difficult of all the seven, as it is known so little of local conditions. It is remarkable that the city, which was the least of all the seven (with perhaps the exception of Philadelphia), should be promised strength and power. The exact nature of the Nicolaitans with their prophetic cannot be precisely determined. The principles they represented were regarded by the author as subversive of true Christianity.

A. W. B. DAWKINS.

TIBERIAS. — A town built by Herod (A.D. 16-22) on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee (called the 'Sea of Tiberias' in Js 6:21, and in modern Arabic), and named in honour of the Roman Emperor. It was erected over the site of an ancient graveyard (Jos. Ant. x. 111. ii. 3) in itself proves that no city had previously existed here. This circumstance made it an unprofitable place to the Jews, and Herod was obliged to use force in order to people it with any but the lowest of the nation. It was designed entirely on Greek models, and the fact that it was in spirit and civilization entirely foreign is perhaps the reason why it is hardly allowed to be in the Gospels—the sole reference being Js 6:21. There is no evidence that it was ever visited by Christ. The city surrendered to Vespasian and by him was restored to Agrippa. After the fall of Jerusalem many of the Jews took up their abode in Tiberias, and by a strange reversal of fate this undue city became a most important centre of Rabbinic teaching. Here lived Judah the Holy, editor of the Mishna. Here the 'Jerusalem Talmud' was compiled. In the neighbourhood are the tombs of 'Aqiba and of Maimonides.

Constantine built a church and established a bishopric at Tiberias, but Christianity never flourished there. The Arabians named it in A.D. 637; it is now called to its present name.

TIBERIUS, whose designation as Emperor was Tiberius Caesar Augustus, was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero (a Roman noble) and Livia, whose second husband was the Emperor Augustus. He was born B.C. 42 and reigned AD 14-37. Augustus, as he grew old, appointed in succession four of his relatives as co-regents, or marked them out as his intended successors. It was clear that he did not desire the succession of Tiberius II., who was reserved, morose, and unlovable. The successive deaths of his nominees compelled him to fall back upon Tiberius, who in A.D. 11 was made co-emperor. Three years later he succeeded to the purple. It is probable that the thirteenth year (9 B.C.) runs from the first of these dates, and thus means A.D. 25-26. Tiberius was an able general and a competent Emperor, but the unhappy experiences of his early life made him suspicious and timorous, and he put many of his rivals or supposed rivals to death. In his later years he was much under the influence of a villainous schemer Sejanus. He spent these years in retirement at Capri.

A. SOUTER.

TIBHATH. — A city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (1 Ch 18:3). In 2 Sa 8:9 the name of the town is Betah, but the original reading was possibly Tibhath, as in the Syrac version, and as a tribal name in Gn 22:8. The site of Tibhath is unknown, but it was possibly on the western slopes of Anti-Lebanon.

TIBN. — A rival who disputed the throne for four years (compare 1 K 16th with v. 20) with Omri.

TIDAL. — A king of Gomr, or 'the nations,' who accompanied Amraphel of Shinar and Arioch of Ellasar in the expedition made by Chedorlaomer of Elam against Sodom and the cities of the plain (Gn 14:1).

This name is probably the Tadhul or Tadhuil of a British Museum tablet of late date, which mentions also Kudur-lahmal (?) (Chedorlaomer?) and Durmah-Iilani (of the son of Gasza[ld]). Whether it was he who smote (shattered) his father's head 'with the weapon of his hands,' the mutilation of the text leaves uncertain.

TIGLATH-PILESER [In 1 Ch 5:29 and 2 Ki 15:19, 22, 25, an error, corrupted to the form Tiggath-Pileser]. — This Assyrian ruler, the Tukultii-apal-Zahara of the monuments, was the third of the name. He began to reign about B.C. 745 (13th of Izyar), and is supposed to have been a son of Sargon, with the Babylonian chronological list he is called Pul, the Pol of 2 K 15:29, and the Per of the Canon of Toltethy. His reign was a very active and important one. Five months after his accession he marched into Babylonia to overthrow the power of the Aramaean tribes. In B.C. 744 he went to Naim to punish the tribes who harassed the Assyrian border. In B.C. 743 he defeated the forces of Sarduri II. of Ararat at Arpad. Among those who gave tribute on this occasion were Rezin of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre, and Pekirs of Carchemish. Arpad, however, revolted again, and was for three years the objective of Tiglath-pileser's expeditions (B.C. 742-740). In B.C. 739 he went to Tell Lalah in Mesopotamia, and the presence of his armies there enabled him, in B.C. 738, to make head against Syrian and Phoenician resistance. On this occasion he subjected Kallul, supposed to be in the area of the Crusaders lost it to Saladin in 1187. The city was almost destroyed by a great earthquake in 1837. The principal objects of interest are the ruins of a large castle (possibly Herodium), a palace, and a synagogue, and—half a journey to the south—the hot springs of Emmaus (the Hammat of Jos 19th), mentioned by Josephus and Pliny. The city is dirty, and proverbial for its vermin. There is a population of about 4000, more than half of whom are Jews, principally refugees from Poland. There is here an important mission of the United Free Church of Scotland.

For the 'Sea of Tiberias,' see GALILEE [SEA OF].

R. A. S. MACALISTER.
Tigris—Only in RVm of Gn 21' and Dn 10', where both AV and RV have Hiddokel (wh. see). The Tigris rises a little S. of Lake Goliath, where it issues from Diarbekr. After passing Diarbekr it reaches the eastern Tigris (which rises in the Niphates mountains) at Osman Rkleu. Then it flows through narrow gorges into the plateau of Mesopotamia, where it receives from the east the Greater Zab and Lesser Zab, and from the E. bank, opposite Mosul, were Nineveh and Calah, a little N. of the junction of the Tigris and Greater Zab; and on the W. bank, close to the town of Edin and the Diyala or Tornadus. On the S. bank, opposite Mosul, were Nineveh and Calah, a little N. of the junction of the Tigris and Greater Zab; and on the W. bank, close to the town of Edin and the Diyala or Tornadus. The Tigris is about 1150 miles in length, and rises rapidly in March and April owing to the melting of the snows, falling again after the middle of May. Cf. also Eden (Garden of).

Tikhvah.—1. The father-in-law of Huldah (2 K 22'), called in 2 Ch 34'22' Tokath. 2. The father of Jabez (1 K 10'), called in 1 Esd 14'42' Thocanus.

Tile, Tiling.—The former occurs only in Ezek 1'4 for 'brick'—the usual rendering of the original. For plans of a city drawn on 'bricks' or 'tablets' of soft clay, which were afterwards baked hard, see 'Ezr 5'3', in 8'6' OT, in loc. 'Tiling' is found only in Lk 16'1 AV, for which RV has 'through the tiles.' St. Luke seems here to have adapted a phrase of Mk. (for which see House, § 5) to the style of roof covered with tiles (see 'Tequt' in Rich's Dict. of Antiq.), with which his Western readers were more familiar; or 'through the tiles' is here simply synonymous with 'through the roof' (cf. our expression 'on the tiles').

Tiglath-Pileser.—See Tiglath-Pileser.

Tilton.—A son of Shimon (1 Ch 4'39).

Timeus.—Father of Bartimias (Mk 10').

Timbrel.—See Tarbath, and Music, etc., §§ (3) (a).

Time.—The conception that we seem to gather of time from the Holy Scriptures is of a small block, as it were, cut out of boundless eternity. Of past eternity, if we may use such an expression, God is the only inhabitant; in future eternity angels and men are to share. And this 'block' of time is infinitesimally small. In God's sight in the Divine mind, 'a thousand years are but as yesterday' (Ps 90'; cf. 2 P 3'8; one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day'). Time has a beginning; it has also, if we accept the usual translation of Rev 10'8 there shall be time no longer,' stated end. The word 'time' in Biblical apocalyptic literature has another meaning—'time' stands for 'a year' both in Daniel (46, 22, 22, 22) and in Rev 12'6 (derived from Dn 22').

When once the idea of time formed itself in the human mind, subdivisions of it would follow as a matter of course. The division between light and darkness, the rising and setting, the day and night, the division of the sun and the moon, together with the phases of the latter, and the varying position of the most notable stars in the firmament, would all suggest modes of reckoning time, to say nothing of the circuit of the seasons as indicated by the growth and development of the fruits of the field and agricultural operations. Hence we find in Gn 1 and 2 the first division of time, and, because light was believed to be a later creation than matter, one whole day is said to be made up of evening and morning; and the day is reckoned, as it still is by the Jews and, in principle, by the Church in her ecclesiastical feasts, from one disappearance of the sun to the next, the divisions between day and night being formed by that appearance and disappearance and lesser periods, in this same manner, we meet with a further use of the lights in the firmament of heaven; they are to be 'for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years' (Gn 1'). The day would thus be an obvious division of time for intelligent beings to be reckoned from the very earliest age. As time went on, subdivisions of this day would be made, derived from an observance of the sun in the heavens—morning, noontime or midday, and evening; and, by analogy, there would be a midnight. The only other expression we meet with is 'between the two evenings' (Ex 12:42), used most probably for the time between sunset and dark, though others take it as equivalent to 'the time of the heat' (De 32:4). Any time in the night, or moon, comes to noon: any shorter subdivisions of time were not known to the Jews till they were brought into contact with Western civilization and the Roman military arrangements. Only one exception to this is the 'stroke of the dial of Ahaz (2 K 20:34). In the passages in Daniel where the hour occurs in the EV, the term is quite an indefinite one, the 'one hour' of Da 4 in AV becoming 'a while' in RV. The Aram. word used in that book was used in the New Hebrew for the word 'hour.' In the Apocrypha the word 'hour' is quite indefinite. But in the NT we find the Western division of the day into twelve hours, reckoning from sunrise to sunset, quite established. 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' said our Lord, in an appeal to the Jews (Jn 11:9). Westcott holds that in St. John's Gospel (19:23-37) the modern mode of reckoning the hours from midnight to midnight is followed. The strongest passage in support of this view is 191. These twelve hours were divided into the four military watches of each (cf. Mt 18:27), the four in the night (i.e., the three watches which seem to have prevailed among the Jews ('If he shall come in the second watch, and if in the third,' Lk 12:4). The only other measure of time, quite indefinite and untranslatable, is the 'moment,' common to OT, Apoc., and NT ('we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye,' 1 Co 15:52). To-morrow (Ex 24:4) and yesterday (Ex 5:9), and even yesterday (Ps 96:13), would soon take their place at either side of the day. The Hebrew word meaning literally 'the day before yesterday,' is generally used vaguely of previous time, 'yesterday.'

The audacious division of time would be the week. The phases of the moon would be watched, and it would soon be noticed that these recurred at regular intervals. Each appearance of the new moon would be noted as the beginning of a new period. The first mention of the new moon in Biblical history is in 1 S 20:5, though 'the beginnings of the months' are mentioned in the ritual laws of Nu 10:10-28. Of the two Heb. words for 'month,' one is identical with the word for 'moon,' the other means 'newness.' Though the actual period of each moon is rather more than 29 days, the actual time of its visibility could scarcely be more than 28 days. The first appearance of the moon would be eagerly watched for and made a matter of rejoicing. We find, in fact, that a keen lookout was kept for it, and the 'new moon' feast was kept with great rejoicings, as well as, apparently in later times, a 'full moon' feast ('Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, At the full moon, on our solemn feast day,' Ps 81:1).

Given this period of 28 days, together with the recurrent phases of the moon, it would naturally be subdivided, like the day itself, into four divisions or weeks of seven days each. The first occurrence of a week is in Gn 29:29, though the Creation is represented as having been completed, including the rest of the Almighty, in a period of seven days, and periods of seven days occur in the history of the Flood. Of the two Heb. names for 'week' one is derived from the number seven, and the other is identical with 'Sabbath,' the day which completes the Jewish week. The NT takes over the latter word, and makes a Greek noun of it, whilst to the Christian and to the Christian Church, the first day of the week becomes the Important day, fixed by pre-exilic, and is the seventh, and therefore, to the modern Christians the day for gathering together 'to break bread' (Ac 20:7), and of making collections for the needs of the faithful (1 Co 16:2), and also wins for itself the name of 'the Lord's day' (Rev 1:10). The word 'week' was given other applications.

The seventh year completed a week of years and was a sabbath; seven times seven years formed seven sabbaths of years, i.e., forty-nine years, and was followed by the jubilee. From the constant occurrence of the tenth day of the month in the dating of events, it has been supposed that the month of 30 days was subdivided into periods of ten days each (see, e.g., Ex 12:2, Lv 16:25, Jos 4:1, 2 K 25:7 etc.).

There are no names in the OT for the days of the week except for the seventh—the Sabbath. In the Apocrypha (Jth 8) there is a name for Friday which is translated 'the eve of the Sabbath'; so in Mk 15:15 'the day before the Sabbath.' This day is also called the Preparation (Mt 27:15, Mk 15:15, Lk 23:16, Jn 19:14), and in Roman Catholic service-books Good Friday is still called 'Feria Sexta in Parasceve' (i.e. the Preparation), and the following Saturday 'Sabbathum Sanctum.'

While these various divisions of time were being arrived at, there would be, concurrently with them, the obvious recurrence of the seasons in their due order. One of the promises represented as having been made by God to Noah immediately after the Flood was that seedtime (i.e. spring), summer, harvest (i.e. autumn), and winter should not cease (Gn 8:22). This is the earliest time in the world's history to which a knowledge of the months is ascribed. Autumn and winter are frequently mentioned. In AV the word 'spring,' to mean that season, occurs only in Wis 2:7, and 'autumn' not at all, though the word translated 'winter' in Am 9:1, Jer 36:13, might equally be rendered 'autumn,' as the time referred to is the border time between autumn and winter. It would in due course be noticed that the seasons recurred practically after a series of twelve moons or months; hence would come in the division of time into years of twelve lunar months. A year of 360 days is implied in the history of the Flood (Gn 6-8), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the scheme of years and chronology in the geographical account of the Deluge.

The twelve months of the year would be given names. The Biblical names we find for them are:

1. Abb (Ex 13), the month of the green ears of corn, about the same as our April, called in post-exilic times, in correspondence with its Bab. name, Nisan (Neh 2). This was the month in which the Passover came.
2. Ziv (1 K 6:9), seemingly the bright month, called later Iyar.
3.ivan (Est 8), another Bab. name, occurring only in this one passage in the OT.
4. This month has no Biblical name, but was called in later times Tammuz, after the god of that name, in whose honour a fast was kept in the month, which is mentioned in Zec 8:19 as 'the fast of the fourth month.'
5. This month also has no Biblical name, but was called later Ab.
6. Elul (Neh 6:1, 1 Mac 14). The etymology of this name is unknown; it occurs in Assyrian.
7. Ethanim (1 K 8:2), the month of constant flowing, in later times called Tishri. This was the first month of the civil year.
8. Buil (1 K 6:9), a word of doubtful etymology, called later Marchesvan.
9. Castlev (Neh 2:1, Zec 7:1, 1 Mac 1 etc.), a Bab. word of uncertain derivation.
10. Tebeth (Est 2), taken over from the Assyrian. It has been conjectured to mean 'the month of sinking in,' i.e. the muddy month.
11. Shebat (Zec 1:1, Mac 16), taken from the Babylonian; of doubtful meaning, but, according to some, the month of destroying rain.
12. Adar (Bar 5:6, Est 3 etc.), a Bab. word, perhaps meaning 'darkness.' In 2. 13:15 we are informed that the twelfth month 'is called Adar in the Syriac tongue.'

The names given are, it will be seen, of rare occurrence, and only four of them are pre-exilic. Biblical writers are generally content to give the number of the month. Some of the months were notable for their historic feasts. In the first came the Passover, on the 14th day; in the third, the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost); in the seventh, the Feast of Trumpets and the Feast of TIMNA

Tabernacles, as also the Fast of the Day of Atonement; in the ninth, the Feast of Dedication; and in the twelfth, the Feast of Purim.

Though at first all the months seem to have been reckoned according to their actual length, in later times they contained 30 and 29 days alternately. This rendered an interpolating in the Calendar necessary, to keep the Passover in the right season of the year; and this intercalary period filled the second Adar, and was inserted as required to bring Abb in its proper place in the year.

It remains to mention that in the Apocalypse we have traces of the Macedonian Calendar. In 2 Mac 11, a month is named Dioscoriathius, a name which does not occur elsewhere, and which is either a rendering of the text for Dystrus, a name for the twelfth month, which occurs in the Sinaitic text of To 2, or the name of an intercalary month inserted at the end of the year. In 2 Mac 11 Xanthius, the name for the first month of the Macedonian year, occurs. It answers to the month Abb. These names, with other Macedonian names, are used by Josephus. In 3 Mac 6 two Egyptian months, Pachon and Epibhi, occur, the former being omitted in some texts. They are the ninth and eleventh months of the Egyptian year.

Of epochs or eras there is but little trace. There were the periods of seven years and fifty years already mentioned, but they never occur in any chronological statement. 430 years is the time assigned to the sojourn in Egypt, both in OT and NT (Ex 12, Gal 3), and the commencement of the building of Solomon’s Temple is dated 480 years after the Exodus. The chronology of the two kingdoms is reckoned by regnal years, though in some cases a regency period is counted as part of the length of the reign. Twice in Isaiah (61 14) the date noted is that of the year of the death of a king, in another case the date is the invasion by the Tartan (20); whilst in Amos (1) a date is given as ‘twelve years before the earthquake,’ apparently a mere fancy, for none one which relates to the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah (Zec 14). The ‘seventy years’ of the Captivity is also a well-known period, as is the thousand years of the Apocalypse (Rev 20), with all its spectacles. It has given rise to. In later times the years were reckoned by the names of those who filled the office of high priest; in Lk 3, we have a careful combination of names of various offices held by various persons at the time of the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist, to indicate the date.

Of instruments to measure time we hear of only one, the sun-dial of Ahaz (2 K 20, Is 38), but what shape or form this took we do not know.

TIMNA.—1. A concubine of Eliphaz, son of Esau (Gn 36).2. A woman of the Esau clan of Horites (Gn 36, Ch 13).3. A ‘duke’ of Edom (1 Ch 1, Gn 36) [where RV has, by a slip, Timna].

TIMNAH.—1. A town in the high region of S. Judah, S.E. of Hebron (Jos 15). This is possible that this was the Timnath visited by Judah at the time of sheep-shearing (Gn 38). Or it may have been—2. A place on the N. frontier of the tribe of Judah between Beth-shemesh and Ekron (Jos 15). At one time it was counted in the territory of Dan (Jos 19), but at another it was in Philitine possession (Jdg 14). Here Simeon celebrated his marriage. His father-in-law is called the Timmite (Jdg 15). The town was held by the Hebrews in the reign of Uzziah, but was lost to the Philistines by Ahaz (2 Ch 28). It is now identified with Timnah, on the S. side of the Wady Sarar, 2 miles W. of Beth-shemesh.

TIMNATH-HERES (in Jos 19 24 written Timnath-serah).—A place assigned to Joshua as an inheritance and burying-place (Jg 2). It is described as being ‘in Mt. Ephraim, on the N. side of the Mountain of Gaash.’ See next article.

TIMNATH-SERAH was the city in Mount Ephraim given to Joshua (Jos 19), where he was buried (Jos 24), lying on the N. of the Mountain of Gaash (Jg 2), probably that of Timnath of 1 Mac 6 40, although there it is reckoned to Judais. It was head of a Jewish toparchy, and is named with Lydda and Emmaus (BJ ii. 5, etc.). The Omphalion identified probably with Locust, where there are remains of an important place, with a spring and ancient tombs, on the Roman road from Caesarea to Jerusalem, about 14 miles N.E. of Lydda (Lydda). The tombs are on the S. of the road. One, distinguished by its size and workmanship, may have pointed out as Joshua’s in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. The Samaritans place the burial of Joshua at Keiy Haris, a village some 10 miles S. of Nablus, with two sanctuaries to the E., one of which, Nebi Rats (‘the prophet of the portion or lot’), may be identified with Joshua. In this case, only the second element in the name has survived. Heris, will be observed, simply reverses the order of the letters in Solomon’s name, but probably.

TIMNATH-HERES.—1. Of ‘the Seven’ (Ac 6).

TIMOTHEUS.—1. A leader of the Ammonites who was defeated in many battles by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 5 46, 2 Mac 8 92 104 47). 2. The AV form of the name Timothy everywhere in NT except 2 Co 11, 1 Ti 1, 2 Ti 2, Phil 4 29. Phil 1 29.

TIMOTHY.—A young disciple, a native of Lystra, chosen as companion and assistant by Paul when, during his second missionary journey, he visited that city for the second time. He was the child of a mixed marriage, his father a Greek and his mother a Jewess (Ac 16). From earliest childhood (‘babe’ RV) he had received religious training, being taught the Jewish Scriptures by his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois (2 Ti 1 24). Probably both he and his mother were converted during Paul’s first sojourn at Lystra, for on the Apostle’s second visit he was already ‘a disciple’ of some standing, ‘well reported of by the brethren’ (Ac 19). Paul seems to have adopted him as a personal convert in 1 Co 4 4, describing him as his ‘beloved and faithful child in the Lord.’

The selection of Timothy was due not only to the wish of Paul (Ac 16), but also to the opinion of the Church at Lystra. In his case, as in the case of Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13), the local prophets ‘led the way’ (1 Ti 1 4 RV) to him; and he was then set apart by imposition of hands by Paul (2 Ti 1) in conjunction with the local presbyters (1 Ti 4). Possibly it was on this occasion that he ‘confessed the good confession’ (1 Ti 6). Paul caused him to be circumcised (Ac 16), judging that, as his mother was a Jewess, his not having submitted to the rite would prove an obstacle to his ministry among Jews, and, further, that from his semi-Jewish parentage, he did not come within the scope of the Church’s decree which released Gentiles from circumcision.

Timothy at once accompanied Paul through Asia to Troas, and thence into Macedonia. He was left behind at Bernea when the Apostle moved on to Athens, but was summoned to return him (Ac 17 16). He was thence despatched back again to Macedonia to confirm the Church at Thessalonica, and to bring news of its state to Paul. He rejoined the Apostle in Corinth and cheered him by a favourable report (1 Th 3 4, Ac 18). While in Corinth, Paul wrote his Epistles to the Thessalonians, and included Timothy in the greetings (1 Th 1, 2 Th 1). He is next men-
TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO

Paul visited Ephesus with Paul on his third missionary journey, and hence is sent with Erastus to Macedonia in advance of the Apostle (Ac 19:24). Shortly after Timothy's departure, Paul despatched by direct sea route his First Epistle to the Corinthians (Ac 19:29). In this he mentions that Timothy (travelling via Macedonia) would shortly reach them (1 Co 4:17); he bespeaks a kindly welcome for him, and adds that he wishes him to receive with the brethren (i.e. probably at Philippi who had borne the Epistle) to Ephesus (16:11 and 19). Timothy may not have reached Corinth on this occasion, being detained in Macedonia; and the absence in the Second Epistle of all mention of his being there points in this direction. But in any case he is found with Paul again when 2 Cor. was written, in Macedonia (2 Co 1:1). Paul in due course reached Corinth, and Timothy with him, for his name occurs among the greetings in the Epistle to the Romans, which was then written (1 Ro 16; cf. Ac 20:4). Paul and he, after a three months' sojourn, returned by land to Troas (Ac 20:16). Timothy is not again mentioned in the Acts. It is clear from the Epistles of the Captivity that he was a companion of Paul during his imprisonment (Col 1:1, Philem 1:21), and that the Apostle mediated sending him on a special mission to Philippi (Ph 2:19). From the Epistles we learn that when Paul, after his release, came into Asia, he left Timothy as his delegate in Ephesus, giving him full instructions as to how he was to rule the Church during his absence, which he realized might be longer than he anticipated (1 Ti 1:3-4). When Paul was a second time imprisoned, and felt his death to be imminent, he summoned Timothy to his side (2 Ti 4:1-2). If Timothy ever reached the Apostle, he may have been then imprisoned. From this we read (He 13:23) of his being 'set at liberty.' Of this subsequent history nothing is known with certainty.

CHARLES T. P. GRIFFINSON

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO

Timothy - These Epistles, together with that to Titus, form a special group among the Pauline letters, the Pastoral Epistles, being united by common objects in view, and by a common literary style. Each Epistle claims in its opening salutation to have St. Paul for its author—a claim which the Church has consistently allowed 'ever since the idea of a Canon of the NT came into clear consciousness.' During the last century, however, their genuineness has been vigorously assailed. Baur relegated them to the 2nd century; but modern hostile criticism very generally holds that, while they contain genuine fragments of the Apostle's writing, their present form is the work of unknown or anonymous writers.

There is no doubt that these Epistles present very special difficulties to scholarship; but these are on the way to solution, and the general tendency of criticism may be said to be towards establishing their genuineness. We have to consider (1) the situation disclosed by 1 and 2 Tim. is as follows. Paul, having to go into Macedonia, left Timothy in charge of the Church at Ephesus (1 Ti 1:1); and, fearing he might be detained longer than he anticipated, he wrote telling him how to act during his absence (1 Ti 3:14). From other allusions in the Epistles we gather that the Apostle visited not only Ephesus and Macedonia, but also Troas (2 Ti 4:19), Corinth and Miletus (490), and Colossae (Philem 1), and that he purposed wintering in Nicopolis (381).

Now it is impossible to fit these visits into the period covered by the Acts. No doubt in Acts we find the Apostle remaining two years in Ephesus (Ac 19:31), but on that occasion he did not leave Timothy behind when he went into Macedonia; on the contrary, he sent him into that country while he remained at Ephesus (Ac 19:22). In 1 Ti 14 he says he was there during his two years in that city for such lengthened journeys as the above visits require. Therefore, as the Acts closes with St. Paul in Rome in prison (A.D. 61), we must conclude, if we accept the Pastoral as genuine, that the Apostle visited Ephesus, Macedonia, and Crete after a release from imprisonment.

Those who oppose the Pauline authorship refuse to believe in this release, taking as their ground the fact of the silence of the Acts on the point, and charge those who accept it with making an unwarranted assumption; but surely theirs is the unwarranted assumption, for they assume that St. Paul was not released, merely because the Acts do not expressly say so. The Acts does not say that he was released, but he was certainly released; and it is clear, therefore, that, when Paul was released from his imprisonment, he wrote to the Philippians that he hoped shortly to come to them (Ph 2:20), and when he bid Onesimus prepare him a lodging at Colossae (Phil 2:2). Therefore, we add the further facts, that it was probably not long after his release that he undertook his journey to Rome, and that he intended to visit Spain (Ro 15:23).—a journey which certainly necessitates his release from his Roman imprisonment and that Clement of Rome tells of his reaching 'the bounds of the West;'—a phrase which, used by one resident, as Clement, in Rome, can only mean Spain—we may hold without misgiving that St. Paul was released in A.D. 61, that he was again arrested, and suffered martyrdom in Rome (A.D. 64), that between these dates he visited Spain in the West, and various Churches in the Eastern Mediterranean, and that during this period he wrote the Pastoral Epistles.

2. The external evidence in favour of the Pastoral Epistles is remarkably strong. Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, the Epistle of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons, Theophilus of Antioch, were all clearly acquainted with them. A singularly convincing quotation is found in the writings of Polycarp (the disciple of the Apostle John, and who died A.D. 155), who says: 'The love of money is the beginning of all trouble, knowing... that if a man, and nothing into the world, neither can carry anything out' (cf. 1 Ti 6:10).

On the other hand, not a word is raised by earlier writers against their genuineness, save by the heretics Marcion and Basilides; and their rejection was due not to any stated doubts as to the Pauline authorship, but apparently to dislike to the teaching of the Epistles. Very much stronger evidence against their authenticity must be supplied before this weight of evidence can be overthrown.

3. Much discussion has arisen concerning the nature of the heresies attacked by Paul in these Epistles. Some see in them an Incipient Gnosticism, theories of which the developed Gnosticism of Marcion ultimately sprang. Strength was lent to this view by the position that 'the endless genealogies' mentioned in 1 Ti 1:1 and Tit 3:5 were the long lists of emanations of deities and angels which formed part of the Gnostic systems. But, as Philo and others use the word 'genealogy' of the primitive history of the Pentateuch, it is now generally allowed that the reference is not to Gnostic speculations but to the legendary history of the Jewish patriarchs. Others regard the heresies opposed as essentially Jewish in origin, and undoubtedly many passages point in this direction. We read of would-be 'teachers of the law' ('the circumcision' Tit 1:10), of 'Jewish fables' (1 Thess 2:14), of 'fights about the law' (Rom 12:3). Yet, while there are these distinct evidences of Jewish influence, it seems probable if it is right to mark all the heresies opposed as coming from this source. The errors leaning towards ascetism, with its prohibition of marriage, and of certain foods, and perhaps of wine also (1 Ti 4:4, 5), may indeed have sprung from the teachings of Judaism which had become ascetic; but just as likely—indeed more likely—they may have come from Gentile sources. These ascetic doctrines may have been founded on the un-Jewish belief of the essential evil of matter—an error which the Apostle probably aimed at when he wrote that God gave all things richly to be enjoyed (6:1). In a city like Ephesus, Oriental mysticism, Greek thought, Judaism, and Christianity would meet; and the Church there, if lapsing from truth, would show signs of heresy derived from all these sources. In the epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. 5:29), the word 'husband' is distinctly named—the belief that the resurrection was already past; this opinion may have been the same as that held by those within the Gentile Corinthian Church, as is said there was 'a generation of unwise men' (1 Co 14:20). Within these Epistles St. Paul's use of certain theological terms is somewhat different from that in his earlier writings. Thus faith is used more of the object of faith, in which the individual holds, than of the warm affection that unites the personal soul to Christ. Similarly righteousness is used rather of a virtue to be reached by personal struggle than in the technical sense found in the Epistle to the Romans. But it must be remembered that faith in the earlier writings is not always subjective (e.g. Gal 1:3, 10), nor is it always objective in the Pastoral (1 Ti 5, Tit 3), and that righteousness is often spoken of elsewhere as a virtue to be acquired (e.g. 2 Co 5:8, Ro 6:14), while justification by faith is emphasized in the Pastoral Epistles (2 Ti 1, Tit 3). Another distinguishing mark is found in the traces of a formulated creed, which show themselves in fundamental assumptions, such as the five 'faithful witnesses' and the rhythmic stanza commencing 'He who was manifested in the flesh' (1 Ti 3). The latter is clearly part of a hymn embodying a confession of the Christian faith, which are undoubtedly marks of a Church and history behind it; but, assuming that St. Paul wrote the Epistles shortly before his death in a.d. 64, ample time would have passed since he first evangelized Ephesus in a.d. 54. It takes but a few years for a living and active community to crystallize its common convictions.

It is important to note the development reached in Church organization as presented in the Epistles. The Apostle had been holding the reins of supreme control (1 Ti 16; 2 Ti), while Timothy and Titus are his delegates. Some years before he had acted in this capacity on special commissions (1 Co 17, Ph 2, 2 Co 3); and, as on those occasions, so on these, they seem to have been appointed to go about the functions entrusted to them until the Apostle's return (1 Ti 1; 3:1; Ph 2, Ti 3:5). But as his delegates, even though temporarily, they had full jurisdiction over the various leaders of the Churches, and full instructions are given to them to guide them as to the qualifications necessary to be found in those to be appointed to the offices of bishop (or elder) and deacon. The bishop and elder are spoken of as identical (Tl 1:6); but 'deacon' (539). As such they are mentioned in the midst of regulations concerning deacons, they probably are not the deacons 'wives' (as AV), but official women or deaconesses, holding such an office as Phoebe held (Ro 16:1). This is a distinct difference from the ecclesiastical organization in closed earlier NT writings, but need not surprise us. 'The seduced life of women must at the very beginning have caused a felt want for women to perform for women what was done for men.' The care of widows engaged the Church from the first (Ac 6:1, Jas 1:2). The absence of all instructions regarding prophets is remarkable. Probably prophecy, which is an abnormal gift and not a stated function, was not very active in the Ephesian or Cretan Churches at the time of, or if active, was under due control, and so did not call for special treatment as formerly at Corinth (1 Co 14:17).

6. The individuality of St. Paul is strongly present in all his writings, a distinguishing style marking them as his. At the same time his Epistles form themselves into different groups, which vary considerably in style in accordance with the particular period of his life in which they were written. So strongly do the Pastoral Epistles show the general Pauline style, that even those who oppose their genuineness admit that they contain genuine fragments of his writing. While, but this is so, there is no doubt that there is present in them a considerably larger proportion of words peculiar to themselves than we find in any other of the groups into which his Epistles are divided. This is the strongest argument against their Pauline authorship. The argument from 'style,' however, is a most precarious one, especially in the writing of one who shows such great variety of phraseology in his other groups of Epistles. Indeed, if we followed it to its logical conclusion, it would tell us that the three Pastoral Epistles are themselves the work of different authors, for each of these Epistles contains a large number of words absent from the other two.

The following judgment of the late Dr. Hort will, we believe, be increasingly accepted: 'In spite of by no means trivial difficulties arising from comparison of the diction of these with other Epistles, I believe them to be his, and to be as he is now}' according to the first Epistle to Timothy, to that to Titus are devoted chiefly to instructions as to the government of the Church. The Second Epistle to Timothy is the outpourings of the Apostle's heart, when he felt his deserts to be imputed (2 Ti 4), to one that had become his faithful companion and assistant for many years; it shows tender anxiety for his 'beloved child' (19), whose strength and weaknesses he well knew, and upon whose piety and wisdom so much of the Church's future, after his own decease, would depend.

TIPHSAH ('crossing').—1. The classical Thebus, the chief crossing-place on the middle Euphrates and the residence of the Tigris. It lay on the eastward bend of the river where it leaves its southerly course. It is named as the north-east limit of the dominions of Solomon (1 K 4:11). 2. Taphsa should be Tappah, with the Lucian LXX, in 2 K 15:15.

TIRAH.—A son of Japheth (Gen 10), formerly identified with Thrahse, but of late much more plausibly with Turah, a provincial organization in the northern Proconsular province of Assyria and Egypt in the 13th cent. B.C. But Tirah has also been identified with Tarusa (E. Cilicia) and even Tarshish (wh. see).

TIRATHITES.—A family of scribes (1 Ch 29).

TIRE.—See Headtie, and Dress, 5.

TIRAH, king of Cush (2 K 19, Is 37), marched out from Egypt against Sennacherib shortly before the mysterious destruction of the Assyrian army (? B.C. 701). Herodotus preserves a version of the same event. Tirahak was thethird of the Ethiopian (25th) Dyn.
and reigned as king of Ethiopia and Egypt from about B.C. 691-665; towards the end of his reign (670-665) until his death he was engaged in constant struggles with the Assyrians, who endeavoured to establish their supremacy by means of the native princes as against the Ethiopian. Tirhakah was quite unable to resist the attacks of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal; even Thebes was sacked, but the Assyrians were equally unable to hold the country they had won. The chronology of the reign is not clear; Tirhakah was not king at the time of Sennacherib's expedition, but he may have commanded the army opposing it. Winkler places the later Assyrian attacks in 675-668.

TIRHANAH.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:49).

TIRIA.—A son of Jehallelel (1 Ch 4:9).

TIRSHATHA.—A Persian word—'His Excellency,' or more probably 'His Reverence,' mentioned Ezra 2:63 (=Neh 7:8). Neh 7:70, 8:10. In the first three passages it is unnamed, and is apparently Zerubbabel; in the last two he is Nehemiah. The title is used interchangeably with the Assyrian pechah or 'governor,' of which it may be the Persian equivalent, and apparently represents a plenipotentiary appointed for a special mission.

TIRZAH.—1. One of the 31 cities captured by Joshua (Jos 12:20). It was the residence of Jeroboam I. (1 K 14:22) and his successors down to Omri (1 K 15:20, 21. 1, 2 K 5:28). A doubtful reference in Ca 6:3 compares to Shiloh, and Tirzah is a beauty. The site is uncertain. Three different identifications have met with favour: Tullus, a village E. of Samaria and N. of Mt. Ebal, and Tyrech, a village close to Mt. Gerizim; and Tegarir, 11 m. N. of Nablus (Shechem) and 12 m. E. of Sebastiah (Samaria). 2. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 26:27; 36:1, Jos 17:1). H. L. WILLSTETT.

TISHBITE.—Eliah is repeatedly designated 'tishbite' (I K 17:16, 18, etc.)—i.e. native of Tishbeh (Tilbe) in Gilead.

TITANS.—In Greek mythology the Titans were divine or semi-divine beings who, endowed with supernatural powers, were overcome only with the greatest difficulty. In later times they were identified with primitive giants.

In the LXX version of Samuel the 'Vale of Rephaim' (2 S 5:5, 15) is called the 'Vale of the Titans.' Here it is used in the sense of 'giants,' for the same version of Chronicles translates this name 'Vale of the Giants.' Thus, in interpreting early Hebrew thought for Greek readers, the old shadowy Rephaim were identified with Titans and giants.

Similarly in the song of victory in Jth 16:10 we read: "For the mighty one did not Fall by the young men, Neither did the sons of Titans smite him, Nor did tall giants set upon him, But Judith, the daughter of Merari . . . ." In this late work Greek mythology has been absorbed by Jewish thought.

TITHES.—According to both North Israelites (Gn 28:22) and Judeans (Gn 14:24) tradition, Israel's patriarchs paid tithes; the custom, therefore, among the Israelites was evidently very ancient. But the institution of offering tithes of the fruits of the field and of the flock is one which dates back to a period greatly anterior to Israelite history. A tenth of the flock's fruits, and possessions of all kinds, as well as of the spoils of war, was given to their gods by many peoples, not only of Semitae, but also of Indo-Germanic race.

In this part two ideas lie as the root of the custom; the more antique—apart from its position in the Bible—is that which regards the offering of a tenth to the Deity as His due, owing to His being the Supreme owner of the land and all that it brings forth, or that feeds upon it (Lv 27:5, 8); here the underlying thought is that of propitiation,—if the Supreme owner does not receive His due, His blessing will be withering another year. The other idea, which is obviously a later one, is that of thankfulness for the blessings received (Gn 28:22); the tithes were given in recognition of the fact that the Giver of all things had accorded to His worshippers.

Among the Israelites this ancient custom was taken advantage of by the Levitical priesthood, who, as those employed in the sanctuary of Jahweh, claimed for themselves, on behalf of Him, a tithe of all. According to Nu 18:24 the Levites were to receive this in lieu of the inheritance of land which fell to all the other tribes; but they received the tithe on behalf of Jahweh; stress is laid on this point in v. 24. For the tithe of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave-offering unto the Lord, I have given to the Levites for an inheritance;—the 'hosing' of an offering towards the altar was the substitute for the actual consuming of it upon the altar. Although tithes were, of course, intended to be offered one year (Dt 14:23), it would appear from Am 4:10—though the words are ironical—that in their anxiety to more than fulfill the requirements of the Law, many worshippers brought them more frequently (the original Hebrew, however, is ambiguous). Though, generally speaking, tithes were offered only to God, yet it is clear that they were sometimes given to the Levites (Gn 14:18, 16:S 7, He 7-9). W. O. OSTERBERG.

TITLE (Jn 19:16, 19).—The ordinary term for the 'inscription, consisting usually of the name of the criminal and the crime with which he was charged (Mt 27:37), written on a board, which, according to Roman practice, was carried in front of the victim, was placed on the cross as he was led through the streets of the city to execution, or exposed for punishment. In cases of crucifixion the inscription was often fastened above the head of the criminal (Mt 27:38). This public announcement was intended to serve as a warning to evil-doers.

The four inscriptions on the cross of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels are different, though the words 'the King of the Jews' (Mt 27:37) are common to all, and truly set forth the charge on which Jesus was formally condemned. Mt. (27:37) adds, 'this is Jesus.' Lk. (23:38), this is the thirtieth; and Jn. (19:19) 'Jesus of Nazareth.' The variations may be partly explained by the statement of Jn. that the inscription (like Roman edicts which also were often published in both Latin and Greek) was written in Hebrew, i.e. Aramaic (which was spoken ordinarily by the people of Jerusalem and the pilgrims from Palestine), Latin (the official language), and Greek (the lingua franca of the world). The Evangelist sees, in this announcement in the three languages of the Roman Empire, a symbol of the proclamation to the world of the Messiahship of Jesus, now the outward manifestations of the efforts of the Jews to cover Him with ignominy. Jn. alone implies that Pilate took revenge on the Jews in preparing the inscription; Mt. and Mk. seek to suggest that the soldiers themselves placed the inscription on the cross, and crucified Jesus between two robbers in order to heighten the insult.

TITUS.—A convert from heathenism (Gal 2:2), probably won by St. Paul himself (Tit 1). He is not directly mentioned in Acts, and all that is known of him comes from the Epis. to Gal., 2 Cor., and the Pastors. Neither his age nor his place of birth is told us. We first hear of him when he accompanies St. Paul on his journey from Antioch to Jerusalem—a journey undertaken in connexion with the question of the circumcision of Gentile Christians (Gal 2:4). He is thus included in the 'certain others mentioned in Ac 15.' The Judaistic party within the Church wished to have Titus circumcised (Gal 2:9); but the Apostle and those representing Gentle Christianity strenuously resisted (v. 5), and the decision of the Church was in their favour (Ac 15:6). The case of Titus thus seems to have been the test case in this controversy. From this time we may suppose that Titus continued with St. Paul as one of his missionary companions and assistants, but we have no distinct reference to him until some ten years after the Council at Jerusalem, namely, when the Apostle wrote 2 Corinthians. In this Epistle Titus is mentioned nine times, and from it we gather that he visited Corinth as the Apostle's delegate—probably three times. On the first occasion, which was a year before 2 Cor., was written (2 Co 8:19), he came with an unnamed 'brother' (12:9), and on his arrival set on foot the necessary organization to secure the local contributions towards the collection for the poor Christians of Judea which the Apostle had inaugurated (1 Co 16:2). After his departure from Corinth serious trouble vexed the Church there, and he was a second time sent to reduce matters to order. Probably on this occasion he was the bearer of the letter referred to in 2 Co 8:7. St. Paul anxiously awaited at Troas the return of Titus (2 Co 2:13); but the journey took longer than was expected; and so the Apostle moved on into Macedonia, with a view to meeting him the sooner on his road. Here Titus ultimately reached him, and bringing good news from Corinth refreshed his spirit (v.33). Titus was then despatched as a designated envoy to Corinth, bearing the 2nd Epistle occasion, and was charged to complete 'the collection'—the organization for which he had commenced the year before (3:2). After these events we do not hear of Titus until St. Paul addressed him to the Pastoral Epistle. From it we gather that he had accompanied the Apostle, after his release from his Roman imprisonment, on a visit to Crete, and had been left there by him 'to set in order things that were wanting' and to 'ordain elders in every city' (Tit 1:5). He is charged to maintain sound doctrine (2:2), to avoid unprofitable discussions (5:9), and duly to assert his authority (2:2). The Apostle tells him of his intention to send Artemas or Tychicus to him, and bids him, when this occurs, to join him in Nicopolis, where he hopes to winter (3:2). Whether these plans were ever realized we know not. St. Paul may have been re-arrested before reaching Nicopolis; but we learn from 2 Ti 4:1 that Titus was with the Apostle during part of his second imprisonment in Rome, though at the time of the writing of that Epistle he had left the city.

Titus and Timothy share the honour of being the most trusted and efficient helpers of St. Paul, and the fact that the former was chosen to deal with so sharp a crisis as presented itself at Corinth shows that prudence, tact, and firmness marked his Christian character.

Titus, Epistle To.—This Epistle was written by St. Paul (1:4) to Titus while the latter was acting as his delegate in Crete (1:5). It may have been a reply to a request from Titus for guidance, or may have been written by the Apostle on his own initiative, to assist his delegate in the difficulties that faced him. St. Paul had come to Crete in company with Titus (1:4), but, having to leave before he could complete his work there, he left Titus behind to 'set in order things that were wanting.'

As far as our records tell us, this was the first missionary visit of St. Paul to the island. No doubt on his journey as a prisoner from Caesarea to Rome he was windbound under its lee, sheltering from unfavourable winds at Fair Havens (Ac 27:7); but we are not told that he landed on this occasion, and it is probable that, as a change of wind was being anxiously waited for, he was unable to leave the ship. In any case there was no opportunity thus gained by the Apostle to make any effective evangelization. It has been thought possible that the visit alluded to in our Epistle might have taken place during the Apostle's long sojourn at Corinth (Ac 18:1-2), or at Ephesus (Ac 19:1-2), or at Crete (Ac 20:2). Such a visit is possible, but we have no record of it; while the general literary style of the Epistle marks it distinctly as belonging to the same group as 1 and 2 Timothy, which group on strong grounds must be held to belong to that period of St. Paul's life which is marked by his two Roman imprisonments (see Timothy [Epistles to]).

From the Epistle it is evident that, though the Cretan Church was lacking in organization, yet it was of some years' standing. We read of several cities having congregations in need of supervision (1:6), and of elders to be chosen from amongst those who were fathers of 'believing' (i.e. Christian) families (v.5); while the heresies dealt with are those that are in opposition to true doctrine, rather than such as might occur in a young Church through ignorance of truth.

The Cretan character was not high. Ancient writers describe their avarice, ferocity, fraud, and mendacity, and the Apostle himself quotes (1:10) Epimenides, one of their own poets, as saying 'Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons.' Christianity, without the discipline of a firm organization, springing up in such soil, would naturally be weakened and corrupted by the national vices. We are not surprised, then, to find the Apostle in this Epistle laying the chief emphasis on the importance of personal holiness of character, and insisting that right belief must issue in useful, fruitful life (1:6-2:11). The chief errors mentioned by him are the smooth-talkers, vain talkers, and deceivers, especially those of the circumcision, who led men astray for filthy lucre's sake (1:10, 11), men who, professed that they knew God but denied Him in their works (1:12), and men who were 'fictious' (3:5). The type of error to be resisted is also seen in the caution given to Titus to avoid foolish questions, genealogies (i.e. Jewish legendary history), and strifes and contentions about the Law, as unprofitable and vain (3:5).

These dangers to the Christian faith are very similar to those opposed in 1 Timothy; with, however, this difference, that none of those mentioned here seems to have its origin in the Incipient Gnosticism which in a measure affected the Church in Ephesus, where Timothy was in charge. The false doctrines in Crete are predominantly, if not exclusively, Jewish in origin, and it is known that Jewish teachers were abroad in Crete.

The ecclesiastical organization, entrusted to Titus for establishment, is of the simplest kind, merely the ordination of elders (1:1; spoken of as 'bishops' v.7) —officers which it had been the custom of the Apostle from the first to appoint in the Churches he established (Ac 14:23). The appointment of presbyters was left entirely in the hands of Titus; but while this was so, it is evident that it would be necessary for him to consult the congregations over whom the elders were to be appointed, for he is charged to select only those whose reputation should be 'blameless' in the eyes of their fellow-Christians. Further, the presbyter is spoken of as 'God's steward,' so that the authority committed to him by Titus was ultimately derived from God and not from man. No mention is made in this Epistle of deacons, deaconesses, or widows—a fact which so far distinguishes it from 1 Timothy.

The Epistle claims to be written by St. Paul (1:1); and its authenticity is established by the same considerations as establish that of 1 and 2 Timothy, with which Epistles it is closely allied in general character, external attestation, and literary style. For a discussion of the questions involved in this connexion the reader is referred to art. Titus [Epistles To].

The Epistle was probably brought to Titus by the hands of Zenas and Apollos (3:2).

TOB.—One of the small Aramaean principalities founded to the south of Mt. Hermon and Damascus in the 12th cent. B.C., the others being Hamath (the less), Zobah, Beth-rehob, Maacah or Geshur. It was in Tob that Jephtha lived as an outlaw (Jud 11:15). Tob joined the rest of the Aramaeans, except those of Hamath (2 Sm 8:7), in helping the Ammonites in their war against king David (2 Sm 10:6). The exact position of these little States is uncertain. Tob was perhaps the most easterly of them. Possibly Tob is meant in the region allotted to 1 Mac 5:5 (Tubias), 2 Mac 12:7 (Tubieni).

TOCHEN.—An unidentified town of Simeon (1 Ch 4:42).

TOGARMAH.—The third son of Gomer, his brothers being Ashkenaz and Riphath (Gn 10:3). In Ezekiel mention is made of the house of Togarrah, the members of which traded for the wares of Tyre with horses and mules. Fried. Delitzsch suggests that Togarrah is the Til-gartmu of the Assyrian inscriptions, described by Sargon of Assyria as the capital of Mедин, which he captured and re-colonised. Seh, or Talmon, who again captured Til-gartmu and destroyed it, speaks of it as being on the borders of Tabal (Tubal see Mesopotam). The difference in the first element (tö–to) makes a slight difficulty. Keiper and Dillmann regard Togarrah as being in Armenia.

TOMB, GRAVE, SEPEULCHRE.—The disposition of the dead among the Israelites was always by burial. While spices were sometimes sprinkled among the grave-clothes, there was no religious motive for the embalming of the dead as in Egypt. 1. The common grave must have been the usual opening in the ground with protective stones laid on the surface; or one prepared slab of stone either quite flat, or with the ridge of a sarcophagus lower than the face, on a raised spot just large enough for the body. The grave would often be cut partly or altogether in rock, not because that was preferred, but because the village elders usually marked off for the cemetery a section of ground that was too rocky for purposes of cultivation. 2. Tombs of a more important kind were made by excavating in the face of a rock to form a chamber about 8 or 9 feet on each side. At the opposite end and on the two sides were three narrow recesses, Neb., kokim, 6 or 7 feet long and about 2 feet wide, cut into the rock at right angles to each wall. Into one of these the dead body was inserted with the feet towards the entrance, which was then covered with a slab sealed around the edges with plaster. 3. During the two centuries of Greek influence before the Christian era, a somewhat larger form of tomb came into use. The common chamber had on each of its three sides two, and occasionally three, shallow arched recesses, and in each recess a sarcophagus was laid along the line of the wall. From the fact that the two angels could be seen, one at the head and the other at the foot of the receptacle for Christ's body (Jn 20:12), it is evident that the tomb belonging to Joseph of Arimathaea was of this later character. The opening to the central chamber was guarded by a large and heavy disc of rock which could roll along a groove slightly depressed at the centre, in front of the tomb entrance. Both the primitive Israelite sepulchre and its Greek successor might be of a compound form, having a passage leading from one chamber to another, each with its kokim or toculi. The most extensive example of such tombs is found in the catacombs of Rome.

From time immemorial a tomb was a sacred place which it was an act of profanation to violate, and of communal pollution to use for other purposes. In the erection of a house upon the site. The tomb of a saint became a shrine, and that of a Christian martyr was venerated as the memorial and altar of a living sacrifice. Religious meetings were held there, and pilgrimages were made to it as to a heathen oracle, and votive offerings gradually adorned the walls of the building erected over it. At the present day the peasants of Palestine can leave clothing and agricultural implements, in perfect safety, beside the tomb, under the guardianship of the saint. In course of time this power of protection became transferred to the Church as the common institution of the saints. G. M. MACKIE.

TONGS.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 2; TABERNACLE, 6 (b).

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.—The belief that the world, after the Flood, was re-populated by the progeny of a single family, speaking one language, found itself in the Bible with the existing diversity of tongues by a story which relates how the descendants of Noah, in the course of their wanderings, settled in the plain of Shinar, or Babylon, and of Shinar, or Babylon, and a tower high enough to reach heaven, as a monument to preserve their fame, and as a centre of social cohesion and union. But the Lord discerned their ambitious purposes, and therefore consulting with the Divine beings who constituted His council and court (cf. Gn 1:32), frustrated their design by confounding their speech, so that concerted action was no longer possible for them. In consequence, the name of the city was called Babel (see below), and its builders were compelled to disperse over the face of the earth (Gn 11:9). The story belongs to a class of narratives (of which there are several in the Bible) intended to explain the origin of the various institutions, or usages, and the existence of which excited the curiosity of a primitive race. Among these was the prevalence in the world of different languages, which contributed so greatly to produce confusion between the various nations, and thus to one another, feelings of mutual suspicion and fear (cf. Dt 28:4, Is 28:23, Jer 51:5). The particular explanation furnished was doubtless suggested partly by the name of the city of Babel or Babylon (which, though really meaning 'gate of God,' was by a popular etymology connected with the Heb. word bâdat, 'to confuse'), and partly by the presence, at or near Babylon, of the ruins of some great tower, which looked as though...
TONGUES, GIFT OF

It had originally been designed as a means to scale heaven. Two such towers, or séqurats, were the temple of Merodach (or Marduk) in Babylon (supposed to be beneath the mound of Boubi), and the temple of Nebi in Borsippa (the ruins of which form the mound of Bîr Nîmûrûd); and knowledge of one or other of these may have helped to shape the narrative. The question of the name of mankind makes it impossible to consider it as real history: it bears on its surface manifest evidence that it is a creation of primitive fancy. The question whether the various languages of mankind have really been derived from one common tongue cannot be separated from the question (into which it is unnecessary to enter here) whether the various races of men have sprung from a single stock, i.e. 'whether man appeared originally on the globe at one centre or at many centres.' It may be said, however, that philological research has proved that the numerous existing languages are members of a comparatively small number of families of speech (such as the Indo-European, the Semitic, etc.); but that between these families of speech there is a sort of isomyth, a certain degree of structure, that their descent from one original tongue seems highly improbable. At the same time, all languages must have arisen from certain families and instincts common to human nature; and it is immediately belonging to distinct families, of onomatopoetic, or imitative, nature, serves to illustrate the essential similarity of human tendencies in the sphere of speech all the world over.

TONGUES, GIFT OF.—1. In NT we read of 'speaking with tongues' or 'in a tongue' as a remarkable sign of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; but we have no record in the NT of the phenomenon described as having been much disputed. We may take the passages in the chronological order of writing.—(a) The Epistles. In 1 Co 12-14, among the charismas or (spiritual) gifts are 'divers kinds of tongues' and 'the interpretation of tongues' (12:10). Yet St. Paul, who possessed the gift himself (14:18), considers it to be of little importance as compared with prophecy. In itself it is addressed to God, and unless interpreted it is useless to God that it be understood by believers, but will not edify, but rather excite the ridicule of, unlearned persons or heathens (14:20). Whatever the gift was, speaking with tongues was at Corinth evidently not intelligible to the hearers, and sometimes not even to the speaker (14:20), though the English reader must note that the word 'unknown' in AV is an interpolation. The gift was not to be forbidden, but everywhere the done deed had to be interpreted from the word, or the speech was of no use. The indications of the gift are thought to be found in 1 Th 5.1, Ro 8.9, Gal 4.4, Eph 5.19. Galatians, or Johanne Epistles. It seems to have belonged to the infancy of the Church, and to the gift that shall cease. (14:21, 22).—Irenæus, apparently speaking at second hand, says that the gift existed in the 2nd cent.; but this is very doubtful. Chrysostom says that it was non-existent in the 4th cent. (b) Acts. At Pentecost, in addition to the 'mighty wind' and the 'tongues parting asunder like as of fire,' we read that the assembled disciples spoke 'with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance' (2:4). The multitudes from many countries together, heard them speak in their tongues the mighty works of God (2:11), while some thought that they were drunken (2:19). We read again of the gift in the conversion of Cornelius and his household (10:45)—St. Peter expressly says that it was the same as at Pentecost (11:15)—and at Ephesus (19:19); and probably the same is intended in the story of the Samaritan converts (19:1 f.: 'Simon one that . . .'). In the Append to Mark (which, even if Markan, is comparatively late) we have the promise that the disciples 'shall speak with [new] tongues' (16:14; 'new' is probably not of the best text).

2. Meaning of the gift.—Relying chiefly on the passages of Acts, most of the Fathers (as Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus) understand the gift as being for purposes of evangelization, as if the disciples received a miraculous endowment of foreign languages to enable them to preach; Gregory of Nyssa and others take the gift as a miracle of hearing, the disciples speaking in their own language, but the people understanding their speech as their own tongue. This view starts with the doubtful true idea that 'tongue' means 'language' here. But Acts says nothing about preaching; the gift is never found in NT in connexion with evangelization; the passages in 1 Co., where we find utterances of tongues, are reproducible even to the utterer, are clearly repugnant to this interpretation, and we have no proof that the Apostles ever preached in any language but Greek or Aramaic, even not in Jerusalem, as the Lycaonians or Maltese. Indeed, Paul and Barnabas clearly did not know Lycaonian (Ac 15:15). Peter probably did not know Greek well enough to preach in it, for Mk 16:17, 'Peter seeing the wonders.' He was not more probable than the other view. At Pentecost the disciples spoke the 'mighty works of God.' All the NT passages either suggest or agree with the view that the gift was for the worship, and the work of it. This, indeed, we find very difficult to understand, not as 'languages,' but as 'poetic or symbolic speech,' not readily understood by the unlearned. But this view does not satisfy Ac 2, though in itself it may be true; in a word, this is an insufficient explanation. (c) The languages required by Ac 2 are actually only two—Greek and Aramaic. For those present at Pentecost were Jews; the list in v.22, of countries, not of languages. All the Jews of these countries, whether Greek or Aramaic. This is a difficulty in interpreting the narrative, which gives us the impression of a large number of different languages. But probably what is intended is the number of languages, and not merely Greek and Aramaic, especially of the latter; it would be as though a Somerset man heard one who habitually spoke broad Scots praising God in the Somerset dialect. And what would strike the pilgrim Jews present was that the speakers at Pentecost were mainly those who themselves spoke an uncouth Aramaic dialect, that of Galilee (Mt 27:51).—(d) This consideration may lead us a step further. We may recognize in the Pentecostal wonder a stirring of memories, a reviving of utterances previously heard by the disciples at former feasts when a polyglot multitude of Jews (polyglot at least in dialects) assembled, the speakers uttering what they had unconsciously already taken into their memories. This would account for their words being so readily understood; some of the speakers would be praising God in one dialect, some in another.—(e) Something of this sort may have happened at Corinth, one of the most cosmopolitan of cities. Here the possession of the gift was not confined to those of Jewish birth. But naturally the resident Christian community at Corinth would ordinarily not understand the strange of these parts as predatory (Ant. xvi. 1. x. 1). Phillip's rule, on the other hand, he describes as just and gentle (ib. xvii. iv. 6). Trajan in A.D. 106 transformed Trachonitis into a new province, which he called 'Arabia,' making Bosra its capital. GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.—The processes by which international trade is carried on consist in the exchange of commodities or of services, and these latter may be positive or negative in character: they may be represented by actual performance or by the withdrawal of opposition. Such procedure as the occupation of passes or other traffic, with the view of demanding tolls of the traders who use them, is the subject of few allusions in the OT; yet the location of the Israelite kingdoms was such as to be most practicable routes both from the North and from the East to the Red Sea lay through their country; and the land route from Egypt to Asia either traversed or skirted it. United under a powerful sovereign, the Levant could levy large contributions on the traffic of the surrounding nations; and this appears to have been done in Solomon's time.

The products of Canaan were in the main agricultural, horticultural, and pastoral, and some of these could be exported. Oil was sent to Egypt (Hos 12:4) and Phoenicia (Ezk 27:20); wine to the latter country from Ch. 2 Chr. 2:8, as well as from (Ezk. l.e. 2 Chr. l.c.), barley (2 Chr. l.c.), oak timber (Ezk 27:8) from Bashan, honey (or diba) and balsam (Ezk 27:21), and an unknown substance called pannag (Ezk l.c.). Other possible objects for exportation were sand for glass manufacture, bitumen, the purple-fish, wood and leather; and certain fruits and spices (Gn 43:11).

2. Of national industries we hear very little; nor does it appear that any articles of Israelite workmanship acquired fame in foreign lands. A few natural products, however, be collected, which indicate the existence of manufactures, and of a sort that may have been exported. The housewife of Fr 31 not only makes her own clothes, but sells some to the 'Canaanite' or pedlar; and in 1 Ch 4:17 there is mention of a Jewish family that owned a byssus-factory. Further, there are not a few references to potteries, and to work done in brass, the precious metals, stone and wood. The iconoclastic attitude which prevails in the OT causes the plastic arts to be ordinarily referred to with scorn and indignation; but of their existence in Palestine there is no doubt, and the considerable market that existed for images probably led to some small development. That any of these manufactures was exported is not attested by any evidence that has yet come to light; but there is apparently no a priori reason against such a supposition.

Prior to the settlement of the country by the exertions of the kings, trade can have been carried on by Israelites only to an insignificant extent. In Saul's days, according to 1 S 13:19, there were no Israelite smiths—a fact there explained as due to the tyrannical precautions of the Philistines; but perhaps we should infer that the Israelites had as yet learned no crafts, since even in Solomon's time we find that artificers had to be imported for the building of the royal edifices. The place of industry had to be supplied by raiding, and Saul himself is praised for having stripped the finery of his enemies' women to put it on his own (2 S 19). The heroic David fights with rustic weapons and without armour. The possibility of the peaceful progress which is the preliminary condition of trade would seem to have been provided by the first two kings.

3. We have unfortunately no account of the financial system which must have been introduced with the foundation of the kingdom, though the prophecy of Samuel (1 S 8:19-20) suggests that the king claimed a tithe of all produce, but in theory had a right to both the persons and possessions of his subjects. Before the end of David's reign we hear of permanent officials appointed by the king; and the need for steady sources of revenue whence the stipends of such officials could be supplied, is sufficient to cause the erection of an elaborate financial system, with registers and assessments, tax-gatherers and clerks. The 'numbering of the people,' which lived on in popular tradition as an inquiry earning conden punishment, doubtless belonged to the comments of order and government. For Solomon's time we have something like the fragment of a budget (1 K 10:4-18), according to which it would appear that the king had three sources of revenue—one not further specified, but probably a land-tax; another, tributes from subject States, gathered by sending special agents, and annexed to commerce, and probably equivalent to excise and customs. The text implies that these various forms of revenue were paid in gold, which was then stored by the king in the form of shields and vessels. This gold must all have been imported, as there are no mines in Palestine; and indeed we are told that it came, with other produce as well as silver, from the mysterious Tyre,sidebar and Tarshish; and that the enterprise was a joint venture of Solomon and the king of Tyre, the latter probably supplying the vessels, the former the produce which was exchanged for these goods, unless include the gold was procured by raiding. If it was obtained in exchange for these goods, we must suppose either that the latter were identical with those of which we afterwards read in Ezekiel, or that the commodities to be exchanged were all supplied by the Phoenicians, for the service by which the Israelites knew their share being that of giving the former access to the harbour of Ezion-geber. In favour of the latter supposition, it has been pointed out that the commodities known to have been exported from Palestine to Egypt, or another were ill-suited for conveyance on lengthy voyages, and unlikely to be required in the countries where the gold was procured. There is in the OT no account of the practice of coinage metal, and when-sums of money are mentioned they are given in silver; the effect, however, of the quantities of gold brought into Palestine in Solomon's time was not, according to the history, to depreciate silver, as might have been expected, but to depreciate it, and render it unfastionable. Yet the notice of prices in the time of Solomon (1 K 10:9) suggests that silver was by no means valuable, whatever weight we assign to the shkel of the day. While it is clear that all silver in use have come in by importation, the notices in the OT of transactions in which it would probably be employed are too scanty to permit of even a guess as to the amount in use; and though it is likely that (as in Eastern countries to this day) foreign coins were largely in circulation, there is little authority for this supposition.

4. If little is known of Israelitish exports, many objects are mentioned in the OT which were certainly imported from foreign countries. These were largely objects of luxury, especially in the way of clothes or stuffs; the material called 'd'un (Pr 7:17 RV 'yarn') was imported from Egypt; the ivory, to which reference is frequently made during the period of the kingdom, from Ethiopia, through Egypt or Arabia; and the gems from one or other of these countries. Various objects are mentioned in connexion with Solomon's enterprises, as naval vessels imported into Palestine times a list of 118 articles has been drawn up which came from foreign countries into the Palestinian market; this list contains many foods and food-stuffs, materials for wearing apparel, and domestic utensils. We should rather gather that in pre-exilic times food was not ordinarily imported, except in times of famine. Imports of raw materials must have been considerable as soon as the people began to settle in towns; for there is no native iron, and little native wood, and as these other materials would be required for even the simplest manufactures. Probably, in the case of instruments, the more valuable and elaborate sort came from abroad, while the poorer classes had to content themselves with home-made articles. The finds that have hitherto been made of Israelitish utensils are insufficient to determine this point. Among the more important imports in Biblical times were horses, which seem to have been procured regularly from Egypt. Of the slave-trade there are very few notices in the OT, and it may be that the reduction of the aboriginal population by the Israelites to serfdom, and the almost continuous warfare leading to the constant capture of prisoners, rendered the importation of slaves ordinarily unnecessary. According to Joel (3:11), the Philistian acted as dealers, purchasing prisoners of war, and exporting them to foreign countries. The same may have been the fate of those persons who, for non-payment of debt, were assigned to their creditors (2 K 4:5).

5. Persons engaged in commerce. The words used in the OT for merchants such as the generally improper 'traveller' (1 K 10:14 RV 'chapmen', 'merchants', 'traffic'), and convey the ideas of shady and making circuits. The number of the word 'Canaanite' for pedlar has been noticed. In Jer 37:14 there is an allusion to a place in Jerusalem called 'the booths,' but references to shop-keeping are rare before the Exile. In Nehemiah's time different classes of dealers had their locations in Jerusalem—goldsmiths and grocers (2 K 25:13), and fishmongers (1 K 10:22). Articles of general consumption seem to have been brought in day by day by foreigners and others (10:18 and 13:15), and sold in the streets. The distinction between dealers proper and allusion in the text of Ezek. (17:6) 'let not the buyer rejoice nor the seller mourn' suggests that the latter operation was not ordinarily thought of as it is in commerce, but as a humilation required at times by stern neces-ity; and there are few allusions to trade in the codes embodied in the Pentateuch, though such are not absolutely wanting. Perhaps, then, we are justified in concluding that the prae-practice of trade was in generally improper travelling, and largely in the hands of itinerant foreigners; and it is only in NT times that merchants is regarded as an occupation as normal as agriculture (Mt 24:49).

Allusions to the corn-trade are rather more common than to any other business, and to certain inquisitions connected with it—probably, in the main, forms of the practice by which corn was withdrawn from the market in the hope of selling it at famine prices: this at least seems to be the reference in Pr 11:17, though Sirach (24:3-8) seems to have interpreted the passage merely of liberality and stinginess. In Am 9:8 the reference is more distinct, and implies both the offence mentioned above and the use of deceitful measures, a wrong also condemned by Micah in a similar context (3:9). The interpretation of these passages must remain obscure until more light is thrown on land-tenure in Israel, and the process by which the king's share in the produce was collected.

The foreign commerce conducted in king Solomon's time is represented in his biography as a venture of his own, whence the goods brought home were his own possessions; and the same holds good of commerce in the time of Jehoshaphat (1 K 25:24-27). There is no evidence that Israelitish commerce was conducted on any other principle before the Exile, after which isolated individuals doubtless endeavoured to earn their livelihood by trade ventures. The imports of which we occasionally hear in the OT was also conducted by communities (e.g. Gn 37:25-35), to be compared null
TRANSGRESSION

Its value is symbolic. Silence regarding it is enjoined by Jesus, and practised by the disciples until the Resurrection, with which it is closely connected in significance. The problem of the transfigured body of Jesus and of the Resurrection body is the same. The event is referred to by Jesus Himself as a vision (הָרָדָם, Mt 17:2); it is vouched for by the three Synoptists (Lk 9:28-36, Mk 9:2-10, Mt 17:1-13). Elsewhere in the NT it is referred to only in 2 Pet 1:18-19. The Fourth Evangelist, after his manner, undeniably expresses its inner significance for faith in Jn 12:23-28. The mountain on which it took place was probably Hermon. The time was night (Lk 9:28). It was as ‘he was praying’ that the transfiguration of face and raiment appeared.

As regards the inner significance of the occurrence, one expression in St. Luke’s narrative is of great importance—τελειός εξασφάλισται (v. 39), was white and glistering” (AV). The sense is really ‘gleamed out white.’ The glory is not that of reflected light; its source is inward. It is the manifestation of a mental process. The note of time (‘six days after’ [Mt. Mk.]; ‘about eight days after’ [Lk.]) affords the key to His thoughts and the subject of His prayers. After what? After Peter’s confession (Lk 9:18-22), and the prediction of Christ’s death (v. 33). Recognized as Messiah by the disciples, He must now prepare them to meet the stumbling-block of the cross. Thus the Transfiguration had (1) a deep significance for Jesus Himself. He was strengthened by the appearance of Moses and Elias, who spoke of His decease (Lk 9:29). They represented the saints in heaven, who understood. Again, it was also stood for the acceptance of His work by God, and He was enabled to yield up His heart and life anew to the will of God. (2) The great lesson for the disciples was that the dreadful shame of His cross was real and eternal, and that all suffering is ultimately radiated with heavenly beauty, being perfected in Christ. Peter’s suggestion of the three tents is an attempt to materialize and make permanent the vision, to win the crown with ease. The vision vanished, and they saw ‘Jesus only.’ It was real, but only a glimpse and foretaste. By loyalty once more to the Master, in the common ways of life to which they returned, the disciples would come to share the eternal glory of the risen Lord.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL

2. In NT we find a like ambiguity in the use of the word ‘treasure,’ and also of the Gr. ἀλληλουργία for which it stands. The treasures of the Magi (Mt 2:11) and the treasure in heaven (Mt 19:19) refer to precious stores; but it is out of his ‘treasure’ rather than his ‘treasure that the good man brings forth丰硕 things’ (Mt 12:4), and the householder things new and old (13:44). In Ac 8:9 ‘treasure’ renders γαζα, a word of Persian origin. In Mt 28:19 ‘treasure’ represents κορβανά (the depository of the ‘corban,’ see SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 4 (c)), the sacred treasury into which the chief priests would not put Judas’ 30 pieces of silver. For the treasure of the Temple (γαζοπλακών) into which Jewish worshippers cast their offerings (Mk 12:4, Lk 21:1) see Temple, § 11 (b). When Jesus is said to have spoken ‘in the treasury’ (Jn 8:19), the meaning probably is that He was teaching in the colonnade of the Temple where stood the treasure-boxes into which the offerings were cast.

Treasurer occurs in OT in Neh 12:14, 19, 13:19, Is 22:2, Ez 2:1, 3:1, representing a different term in each writer. The word is found in NT only in RV of Ko 16θ as a substitute for AV ‘treasury’ (1 Thess 4:10), but the Ethiopian eunuch is said to have had charge of all the treasure of queen Candace. J. C. LAMBERT

TREE.—‘Tree’ is used as a poetical name for the Cross in Ac 5:31, 10:13, 1 P 2:11; cf. Gal 3:14. For the named trees see HOM PLACE, 11:1 (3); and, for the various trees of the Bible, the artt. under their respective names.

TRESPASS-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 15.

TRIAL.—See TEMPTATION.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL.—The number of the tribes of Israel varied at different periods. The number 12 is an artificial one, as is seen from its application to the descendants of Ishmael (Gn 17:23-25), of Nahor (Gn 22:2-3), and of Esau (Gn 36:11-12, 40-44). Simeon and Levi were ‘divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel’ (Gn 49:7) when the tribe of Benjamin arose, so that at that time there would not be 12 but only 11 tribes. Reuben, likewise, in the period of the kings, was an insignificant remnant, and, though mentioned in 1 Ch 5:18 as still existing in 754, had apparently become disintegrated long before. As Stade (GYF r. 146) correctly remarks, several of the largest tribes—Judah, Ephraim, Manasseh, Gad—contained many minor tribes which surpassed in number, possessions, and political significance several of those counted in the twelve tribes.

The number of the tribes, according to JE’s genealogy (Gn 29-30), is not 12 but 13, and in the following order:

2. Bechur tribes—Bilhah (Rachel) tribes—Dan, Naphtali.
4. Leah tribes—Issachar, Zebulun.
6. Benjamin (born in Palestine), Gn 33:11

To obtain the number 12 from this scheme it is necessary to omit Levi, or to count Manasseh and Ephraim as one.

Why the number twelve was chosen cannot be answered with certainty. Whether it is astronomical or mythological, i.e. connected with the 12 signs of the Zodiac and the 12 months in the year—in which case it would be traceable to Babylonian, as Gunkel suggests in his Genesis (p. 300), and Winckler holds (Gesch. Israels, ii, p. 57, where he connects the ‘Zwölft Söhne’ (Jacob’s) with the ‘Zwölf Monaten’), or whether it rests upon Solomon’s partition of the land into 12 divisions so that each might provision the royal household one month in the year (1 K 4:17), as Luther thinks (ZATW xxii. 34), or whether the true explanation...
TRIBUTE, TOLL, TAXING.

In OT the subject is obscure. The word most frequently rendered 'tribute' is mas, which denotes a body of forced labourers (2S 20:14, I K 2:26 etc.; see RV), and then later 'forced service'—the feudal corvée. Solomon had a regular system of levying provisions for the maintenance of the royal establishment (I K 4:17), and labourers for the execution of his vast building schemes (2 S 5:13, 18), and also exacted toll from the caravans of merchants that passed through his kingdom (1 K 9:14). After the fall of the Israelitish empire it is lost. See also under the heading of 'Levites' the foreign masters (2 K 23:27, Ezr 4:11 etc.).

In the last-mentioned passage (cf. v. v. 23-24) we read of 'tribute, custom, or toll,' but have no information as to the precision of meaning of the terms and the distinctions between them. Cf. Trade and Commerce. 3.

2. In NT 'tribute' represents 3 Gr. words. (1) phoreus is properly a land tax; (2) rēnos (originally a property regis), a capitatio or poll tax. Both were direct Imperial taxes payable by the Jews as Roman subjects; the former in kind, the latter in Roman money. In NT, however, the distinction is not carefully observed (cf. Mt 22:21, Lk 20:25). For the 'tribute matter' Mt 22:17-22; Lk 20:21-24; Mt 17:24-27; Rv 14:17 (Mt 17, RV 'the half-shekel') was the sum paid by every male Israelite to meet the cost of the daily services in the Temple. See Money. 7 (d). Roll (tērōn, AV 'custom'), 'payment of toll,' AV 'recept of custom,' must be carefully distinguished from tribute (cf. Mt 17:24, Ro 13:7). It was not a direct tax like (1) and (2), but an impost on the value of exported goods. For details see Tax and Taxation. 3. 'Toll' (ἀπήγγελμα, 'enrollment,' Lk 2:1 Ac 5:27) denotes a registration with a view to taxation for Imperial purposes. See Quirinius.

TRINITY.

TRINITY.

The doctrine approached. It is sometimes asked why we are not given a definite statement that there are three Persons in the Godhead. One reason for the absence of any such categorical and dogmatic teaching is probably to be found in the fact that the earliest hearers of the gospel were Jews, and that any such pronouncement might (and probably would) have seemed to be an attempt to establish the own great truth of the unity of the Godhead. Consequently, instead of giving an intellectual statement of doctrine, which might have led to theological and philosophical discussion, and which in opposition to Christianity, the Apostles preached Jesus of Nazareth as a personal Redeemer from sin, and urged on every one the acceptance of Him and His claims. Then, in due course, the doctrine of the Trinity process of thought and meditation upon this personal experience, and this would in turn lead to the inference that Jesus, from whom, and in whom, these experi-tences were being enjoyed, must be more than man, must be none other than Divine, 'for who can forgive sins but God only?' Through such a personal Impression and Inference based on experience, a distinction in the Godhead would at once be realized. Then, in the course of their Christian life, and through fuller instruction, would be added the personal knowledge and experience of the Holy Spirit, and once again such Inference would in due course follow, making another distinction in the thought of the Godhead. The reception and expression of these Inferences probably concerned only comparatively few of the early believers, but nevertheless all of them had in their lives an experience of distinction and individuation which has only been from above, and which no difficulty of intellectual correlation or of theological co-ordination with former teachings could invalidate and destroy.

2. The doctrine derived. The Trinity is an expansion of the doctrine of the Incarnation, and emerges out of the personal claim of our Lord. We believe this position can be made good from the NT. We take first the Gospels, and emphasize the that of revealing Himself to His disciples was by means of personal Impression and Inference. His character, teaching, and claim formed the centre and core of everything, and His one object was, as it were, to stamp Himself on His disciples, knowing that in the light of fuller experience His true nature and relations would become clear to them. We see the culmination of this Impression and Inference in the confession of the Apostle, 'My Lord and my God.' From the phenomenon of the Acts of the Apostles, we find St. Peter preaching to Jews, and emphasizing two associated truths: (1) the Sonship and Messiahship of Jesus, as proved by the Resurrection, and (2) the consequent relation of the hearers to Him as to a Saviour and Master. The emphasis is laid on the personal experience of forgiveness and grace, without any attempt to state our Lord's position in relation to God. Indeed, the references to Jesus Christ as the Servant (wrongly rendered in AV 'Son') of God' in Ac 3:17 and 4:12, seem to show that the Christian thought regarding our Lord was still immature, so far as there was any purely intellectual consideration of it. It is worthy of note that this phrase, which is doubtless the NT counterpart of Isaiah's teaching on the Servant of the Lord', is not found in the NT later than these earlier chapters of the Acts. Yet in the preaching of St. Peter in the claim made for Jesus of Nazareth as the Source of healing (3:16), the Prince-Leader of Life (3:19), the Head Stone of the corner (4:11), and the one and only Way of Salvation (4:12) was an unmistakable assumption of the position and power of Godhead. In the same way the doctrine of the Godhead of the Holy Spirit arises directly out of our Lord's revelation. Once grant a real personal distinction between the Father and the Son, and it is easy to deduce that also of the Spirit as revealed by the Son. As long as Christ was present on earth there was no room and no need for the specific work of the Holy Spirit, but as Christ was departing from the world He revealed a doctrine which He associated with Himself and the Father in a new and unique way (Jn 14:16-17, 26; 15:26 16:7-14). Arising immediately out of this, and consonant with it, is the place given to the Holy Spirit in the opening sentences of the Acts of the Apostles. From ch. 2 there lying against the Holy Spirit is equivalent to lying against God (5:3, 4), we see throughout the book the essential Deity of the Holy Spirit in the work attributed to Him of superintending and controlling the life of the Apostolic Church (20:8, 12, 14; 13:2, 1, 2 20:32).

Then, as we pass to the Epistles, we find references to our Lord Jesus and to the Holy Spirit which imply unmistakably the functions of Godhead. In the opening salutations our Lord is associated with God as the Source of grace and peace (1 Th 1:1, 2, P 1:3), and in the closing benedictions as the Divine Source of blessing (Ro 15:5; 2 Th 2:17). In the doctrinal statements He is referred to in practical relation to us and to our spiritual life in terms that can be predicated of God only, and in the revelations concerning things to come He is stated to be about to occupy a position which can refer to God only. In like manner, the correlation of the Holy Spirit with the Father and the Son in matters essentially Divine is clear (1 Co 2:4, 2 Co 13:4, 1 P 1:2).

In all these assertions and implications of the Godhead of Jesus Christ, it is to be noted very carefully that St. Paul has not the same meaning of 'soul' as in the Jewish monotheism. Though he and other New Testament writers do assume the personality of Christ, it is of great moment to remember that Christianity was the very process of polytheism. The NT doctrine of God is essentially a form of monotheism, and finds no relation to polytheism. There can be no doubt that, however and whenever the word 'Trinity' was formulated, it was an immediate connexion with the monotheism of Judaism; and the Apostles, Jews though they were, in stating so unmistakably the Godhead of the Son, there was in them never once considered teaching anything inconsistent with their most cherished ideas about the unity of God.

3. The doctrine confirmed.—When we have approached the doctrine by means of the personal experience of redemption, we are prepared to give full consideration to the two lines of teaching found in the NT. (a) One line of teaching insists on the unity of the Godhead (1 Co 8, Jn 20:2); and (b) the other line reveals distinctions within the Godhead (Mt 3:16, 17 and 28; 2 Co 13:4). We see clearly that (1) the Father is God (Mt 11:27; 28:19). (2) the Son is God (Jn 1:1-18; 20:28; Ac 20:30; Ro 9:5; He 1:2; Col 1:15; Ph 2:6 2 P 1:1); (3) the Holy Spirit is God (Ac 5:3-4; 1 Co 2:4, 11; Eph 4:4). (4) The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are distinct from one another, sending and being sent, honouring and being honoured. The Father honours the Son, the Son honours the Father, and the Holy Spirit honours the Son (Jn 1:14 16:14 17:1. 8, 11-15). (5) Nevertheless, whatever relations of subordination there may be between the Persons in working out redemption, the three are alike regarded as God. The doctrine of the Trinity is the correlation, co-ordination, and synthesis of the teaching of these passages. In the Unity of the Godhead there is a Trinity of Persons working out redemption. God the Father is the Creator and Ruler of man and the Provider of redemption through His love (Jn 3:16). God the Son is the Redeemer, who became man for the purpose of our redemption. God the Holy Spirit is the 'Executive of the Godhead,' who applies to each believing soul the benefits of redemption. The elements of the plan of redemption thus find their foundation, and spring in the nature of the Godhead; and the obvious reason why these distinctions which we express by the terms 'Person' and 'Trinity' were not revealed earlier than NT times is that not until then was redemption accomplished.

4. The doctrine stated.—By the Trinity, therefore, we mean the specific and unique Christian idea of the Godhead. The foundation of the Christian idea of the Godhead is that of the One Supreme Almighty Spirit whom we worship, to whom we pray, from whom we receive grace, and whom we serve. But the specific Christian thought of God is the revelation of one person of whose being is revealed a distinction of Persons whom we call Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the God from whom, through whom, and by whom all things come—Father as the Father of the world to whom the redeemed Mediator, and the Holy Spirit as the personal Applier of life and grace. The Christian idea of the Trinity may be summed up in the familiar words: 'The Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God. And yet they are not three Gods, but one God. The Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one, the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal. And in this Trinity none is afore or after none: greater or less is none. For whole three Persons are co-eternal together and co-equal.'

The term 'Trinity' dates from the second century, being found in Greek in the works of Tertullian (a.p. 200). Its use is sometimes criticised because it is not found in the Bible, but this is no valid objection to it. Like other words, e.g., 'Incarnation,' it expresses in technical language the truth about the Godhead which is found implicitly in the Bible. The real question is whether it is true, and whether it is fairly expressive of the Bible truth. It is intended to express and safeguard that rational and essential unity of the Godhead which is that of a Spirit, and that of the distinctions of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The term 'Person' is also derived from Greek like all human language, it is liable to be misused and even objected to. It certainly must not be pressed too far, or it will lead to Trinitarianism. While we use the term to describe the distinctions in the Godhead, we do not imply distinctions which amount to separateness, but distinctions which are associated with essential mutual co-existence or co-inclusiveness. We intend by the term 'Person' to express those real distinctions of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit which are found amid the oneness of the Godhead and which are expressed in the many temporary manifestations of Deity, but essential and permanent elements within the Divine unity.

5. The doctrine supported.—When all this is granted and so far settled, we may find a second line of treating to support the foregoing in the revelation of God as Love. Following the suggestion of St. Augustine, most modern theologians have rightly seen in this a safe ground for our belief. It transcends, and perhaps renders unnecessary, all arguments drawn from human and natural analogies of the doctrine. 'God is love' means, as some one has well said, 'God as the infinite home of all moral emotions, the fullest and most highly differentiated life.' Love must imply relations, and, as He is eternally perfect in Himself, He can realize Himself as Love only through relationships within His own Being. We may go so far as to say that this is the only way of obtaining a living thought about God. Belief in Theism postulates a self-existent God, and yet it is impossible to think of a God without relationships. These relationships must be eternal and prior to His temporal relationships to the universe of His own creation. He must have relationships eternally adequate, and worthy, and when once we realize that love must have an object in God as well as in ourselves, we have the germ of that distinction in the Godhead which is theologically known as the Trinity.

6. The doctrine anticipated.—At this stage, and only here, we may seek another support for the doctrine. In the light of the facts of the NT we cannot refrain from asking whether there may not have been some adumbrations of it in the OT. As the doctrine arises directly out of the facts of the NT, we do not for an instant look for any full discovery of it in the OT. But if the doctrine be true, we might expect that Christian Jews, at any rate, would seek for some anticipation of it in the OT. We believe we find it there. (a) The references to the 'Angel of Jehovah' prepare the way for the Christian doctrine of a distinction in the Godhead (Ge 16:11 17:25 with 19. Jos 24:14-16 with 6, 13-18, Zeo 157). (b) Allusions to the 'Spirit of Jehovah' form another line of OT teaching. In Gn 3 the Spirit is an energy only, but in subsequent books an agent (is 48:14 59:19 63:18). (c) The personification of Divine Wisdom is also to be observed, for the connexion between the personification of Wisdom in Pr 8, the Logos of the NT, and the 'wisdom of the firstborn ' in Col 1 18 was probably accidental. (d) There are also other hints, such as the triplicity of the Divine Names (Nu 6:7-21, Ex 29:4-5, Is 6), which may not be pressed, but can hardly be overlooked. Hints are all that were to be expected desired until the fulness of time should have come. The function of Israel was to guard God's transcendence and omnipresence; it was for Christianity to develop the doctrine of the Godhead into the fulness, depth, and richness that we find in the revelation of the Incarnate Son of God.
TRIPOLIS

7. The doctrine justified.—(a) From the facts of Scripture. It emerges clearly from the claim of Christ; it is an extended claim of the Lord Jesus. If the Incarnation was real, the Trinity is true. (b) From the facts of Christian experience. It is a simple fact that Christians of all periods of history claim to have personal direct fellowship with Christ. This claim must be accounted for. It is possible only by predicating Deity of our Lord, for such fellowship would be impossible with one who is not God. (c) From the history. Comparison with other religions Christianity makes God a reality in a way in which no other system does. The doctrine of the Trinity has several positive theological and philosophical advantages over the Unitarian conception of God, but especially is this so in reference to the relation of God to the world. There are two conceivable relations of God to the world—as transcendent (in Mohammedanism), or immanent (in Buddhism). The first alone means Delen, the second alone Pantheism. But the Christian idea is of God as at once transcendent and immanent. It is therefore the true protection of a living Theism, which otherwise oscillates uncertainly between these two extremes of Delen and Pantheism, either of which is false to it. It is only in Christianity that the Semitic and Aryan conceptions of God are united, blended, correlated, balanced, and preserved. (d) From reason. It is impossible to say that, if Jesus be not God, Christians are idolators, for they worship one who is not God. There is no other alternative. But when once the truth of the doctrine of the Trinity is regarded as a necessary part of Christ's claim as Godhead as the Redeemer, reason soon finds its warrant for the doctrine. The doctrine of the Trinity comes to us by revelation and not by nature, though it is soon seen to have points of contact with thought and reason.

The doctrine started in the concrete, with the baptismal formula...emanating from Jesus Christ. And throughout the history of its dogmatic formulation, we are confronted with this fact. It was regarded as a revelation by the men who shaped its intellectual expression; and it was only in the process...of that expression that its congruity with human psychology came out; that psychology in fact being disqualified to give its utterance...They did not accommodate Christian religion to their philosophy, but philosophy to their Christian religion. This doctrine appealed first to unsophisticated men, far removed from Alexandria or Athens; yet the very words in which it does so, turn out, upon analysis, to involve a view of personality which was the last to be attained, but which, once staked, is seen to be profoundly, philosophically true (Illingworth, Personalitv, p. 212 f.)

TRUTH

TRIPOLIS.—An important town in northern Phœnicia, where Hannibal Soter landed when he made his successful attack against Antiochus v. (2 Mac 14). It was divided into three parts, originating in colonies from Tyre, Sidon, and Arvad—hence the name. The modern Tripoli is two miles inland, its fort occupying the site of the ancient city on the coast.

J. F. McCurdy.

Troy.—To tow' was originally to 'trust,' with which it is connected in origin; but it came to mean no more than 'think or suppose.' This is the meaning in Lk 17, its only occurrence in AV.

TRUS.-See Faith.

TRUST.—See Faith.

TRUTH.—1. In OT ('Emeth, 'Emânâh).—Firmness or stability is the fundamental idea of the root, and to this radical thought most of the uses of the Heb. nouns may be traced. Often they signify trust in w. the sense of confidence in the meaning of the word, the correspondence, viz., between speech and fact (De 12, Pr 12). At first the standards of veracity were low (Gn 12:25, 20:2, 27:2, 12:20), but truthful bearing is a commendable point of the Decalogue (Ex 20), and from the prophetic age onwards falsehood of every kind is recognized as a grave sin (Hos 4, Ps 50:6, Pr 12). See, further, TRUST. Sometimes 'truth' denotes justice, as administered by a ruler or a judge (Ex 18, Pr 23), and, in par-

TROAS.—A city of Mysia on the N.W. coast of Asia Minor. It was in the Roman province Asia. It was founded by Antigonus Gonatus and re-founded in B.C. 300 by Lysimachus, who named it Alexandria Troas. For a time under the Seleucid kings of Syria, it gained its freedom, and began to strike its own coins (examples exist from B.C. 164 to 65). It was re-founded by Pergamenean and afterwards, from B.C. 133, under Roman rule. Augustus made it a Roman colony, and it became one of the greatest cities of N.W. Asia. The Roman preference was partly explained by the close connexion between Troy and their own capital.

This place was a regular port of call on coasting voyages between Macedonia and Asia (cf. Ac 16, 20, 2, 20). St. Paul, with Silas and Timothy, approached Troas from the Asian-Bithynian frontier near Doryleum or Colophon (Ac 16:3). He did not preach in Mysia on the first visit, though the Western text at Ac 16 makes him do so.

TROCHILUS.—According to the AV (Ac 20), which here follows the Western text, St. Paul's ship, after touching at Samos, and before putting in at Milethus, tarried at Trochilus. This statement is not part of the NT text as now commonly read, but it is impossible, and perhaps embodies a real tradition. Trochilus is a promontory which projects from the mainland and overlaps the external extremity of Samos, so that it was used by sailors as a landmark in entering the mouth of the river which, near called 'St. Paul's Port.'

TROPHIMUS.—A Gentile Christian, a native of Ephesus (Ac 21), who, with Tychicus, also of the province Asia (20), and others, accompanied St. Paul to Jerusalem. The Jews, seeing Trophimus with the Apostle in the city, hastily concluded that St. Paul had brought him into the inner court of the Temple, separated from the outer 'Court of the Gentiles' by a barrier on which were inscriptions in Greek and Latin forbidding any non-Jew to enter on pain of death. This occasioned the riot which led to St. Paul's arrest. Some years later Trophimus was left at Milethus sick (2 Ti 4).

TROY.—Near Troy, the court of Priam was said to have been situated (cf. Od 1, 216), and the site of the 'city of the gods' in the earlier days of Homer's Iliad. It is probable that the name was of a later origin than the place, for the site of the ancient city seems not to have been mor}

TRUMPET.—See Music, 4 (2).

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.—The 1st day of Tabor (October), the 7th month, was observed as a Day of Atonement by a 'memorial of blowing trumpets,' to call both God and the people to remembrance of their reciprocal position. It was a day of holy convocation, on which no servile work might be done. The trumpets blown were probably of a different kind from those used at the ordinary new-moon festivals. At the Feast of Trumpets special offerings were made: a burnt-offering of a bullock, a ram, and 7 lambs, and a sin-offering of a kid of the goats; these, in addition to the ordinary daily and monthly offerings (cf. Nu 29:4, Ly 23:23-25). This was one of the lunar festivals of the Jewish calendar, and the most important of the new-moon celebrations.

TRUTH

Holar, by the Messianic King (Ps 45', Is 429). Frequent ly it denotes faithfulness, especially the faithfulness of man to God (2 K 259) and of God to men (Gn 329). When it is described as a faithfulness to His promises may be especially in view (Ps 319). But not far away is the sense of 'living reality,' in distinction from the 'lying vanities' in which only trust to whom Truth is unknown (cf. Dt 329). In some later canonical writings there appears a use of 'truth' or the 'truth' as equivalent to Divine revelation (Dn 99', Is 99'), or as a synonym, for the 'word' in which the true philosophy of life consists (Pr 329). In the Apoc. books this use becomes frequent (1 Es 499, Wis 3', Sir 49 etc.).

2. In NT (allhēia).—The Gr. word (which is employed in LXX to render both 'emeth' and 'emdnah') has the fundamental meaning of reality, as opposed to mere appearance or false pretence. From this the sense of veracity comes quite naturally; and veracity finds a high place among the NT's virtues. The OT law forbade the bearing of false witness against one's neighbour; the law of Christ enjoins truth-speaking in all social intercourse (Eph 49), and further demands that this truth-speaking shall be animated by love (v.14; cf. v.3 v.1 one of another).

Special attention must be paid to some distinctive employments of the word. (a) In the Pauline writings there is a constant use of the 'truth' to describe God's will and primary reason for the reason and essence of the natural man (Ro 2', 30, but especially in the Gospel of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4', Gal 3' etc.). 'The truth' thus becomes synonymous with the 'gospel' (Eph 1' cf. Gal 2', 14 etc., where 'the truth of the gospel' evidently means the truth declared in the gospel). In the Pastoral Epistles the gospel as the 'truth' or 'the word of truth' appears to be passing into the body of a settled doctrine (1 Ti 3', 2 Ti 2 etc.). It is to be noted that, though the above usages are most characteristic of the Pauline cycle of writings, they are occasionally to be found elsewhere, e.g. He 11', 12', 21, 1 Ti 1', 2 Ti 2 etc.

(b) In the Johannine books (with the exception of Rev.) allhēia is a leading and significant term in a sense that is quite distinctive, e.g. 'light' and 'life'. To Pilate's question, 'What is truth?' (Jn 18'), Jesus gave no answer. But He had just declared that He came into the world to bear witness unto the truth (v.30), and the Fourth Gospel might be described as an elaborate exposition of the nature of the truth as revealed by Jesus, and of the way in which He reveals it. In John 'the truth' stands for the absolute Divine reality as distinguished from all existence that is false or merely seeming (cf. 8', where Jesus contrasts His Father, from whom He had heard the truth, with 'your father the devil,' who 'stood not in the truth, because there is no truth in him'). Jesus came from the bosom of the Father (Jn 19), and truth came by Him (v.14) because as the Word of God He was full of it (v.14). The truth is incarnated and personalized in Jesus, and so He is Himself the Truth (14'). The truth which resides in His own Person He imparts to His disciples (8'), and on His departure He bequeaths the Spirit of truth to abide with them and be in them for ever (14'). Hence the truth is in the Christian as the very ground-work and essence of his spiritual being (1 Jn 19, 2 Jn 19). It is there both as a moral and as an intellectual quality, standing midway, as it were, between 'life' and 'light,' two other ruling Johannine ideas with which it is closely associated. Primarily it is a moral power. It makes Christ's disciples free (Jn 8'), free i.e., as the context shows, from the bondage of sin (v.34). It has a sanctifying force (Jn 17', 19') which is truth only to the commandments (1 Jn 29) and the life of Christian love (30'). And, while subjectively it is a moral influence, objectively it is a moral power—something not only to be known (Jn 3') and believed (v.41), but requiring to be done (Jn 3', 1 Jn 1'). From this moral quality of the truth, however, there springs a power of spiritual illumination. The truth that is life more clearly passes into the truth that is light (Jn 3'). Every one that is of the truth heareth Christ's voice (19'); if any man will to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine (7'); the Spirit of truth, when the time is come, shall guide the disciples into all the truth (16').

TYREPHNA.—Greeted along with Tryphosa by St. Paul in Ro 162, and described by him as labouroing in the Lord. They were probably sisters or near relations, 'for it was usual to designate members of the same family by derivatives of the same root.' The common root makes their names signify 'delicate,' 'luxurious'—a meaning which contrasts with their active Christian toil. Inscriptions in a cemetery used chiefly for the Emperor's servants, contain both names; if we identify them with these, then they would be among 'the saints of Caesar's household' (Ph 4'). A Tryphena plays a prominent part in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thekla.

CHARLES T. P. GRISWOLD.

TYRPHON.—An officer of Alexander Balas, who, after the death of the latter, took advantage of the unpopularity of Demetrius to put forward Antiochus, the son of Balas, as a claimant to the throne (1 Mac 110). His real aim, however, was to gain the crown for himself, and this he accomplished after he had murdered in succession Jonathan the Maccabees (129-120) and Antiochus (120). His rapacity led Simon to appeal to Demetrius (124). The latter was organizing an expedition against Tryphon when he was himself made prisoner by Arsaces (14'). In the end, Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, attacked Tryphon, beheaded him in Dor, and pursued him when he escaped thence to Orthesia (154-14). Tryphon was finally shut up in Apamea, where he committed suicide (Strabo, p. 688; Jos. Ant. xiii. 7; App. Ssr. 6).

TRYPHNA.—See TRYREPHA.

TUBAL.—A country and people in Asia Minor mentioned only in association with Meshech (wh. sec.).

J. F. McCurdy.

TUBAL-CAIN.—In Gn 42 the 'father of every founder of copper and iron' (so read, with slight textual correction), i.e. the founder of the guild or profession of metal-workers. The name seems to be made up of Tubal (or the Tbarani, noted for production of bronze articles (Ezk 27'), and Cain ("smith"), as the ancestor of the Kenites or "Smiths."—J. F. McCurdy.

TYCHICUS.—A native of the province Asia, like Trophimus, and a companion of St. Paul on the journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20). He was the bearer of the circular letter to Asia which we call 'Ephesians' (Eph 6'), and of Colossians (Col 4'). In later years either he or Artemas was to have been sent to Crete, apparently to take Titus' place (Tit 3'), but he was sent to Ephesus, probably instead of to Crete (2 Ti 4').

A. J. MACLEAN.

TYRANNSUS.—This man is mentioned only in Ac 19. St. Paul in Ephesus preached before the Jews and proselytes in the synagogue for three months. Finding them determinedly hostile, he resorted to the 'school of Tyrannus,' where he reasoned every day. The expression is somewhat enigmatical to us, as we have no other reference to this institution by which to illustrate it. The Greek word may be translated either 'school' or 'lecture room,' and Tyrannus may have been either a schoolmaster or what we call a professor. There is the further curiosity that Tyrannus may have been a poet at the time, and that the building may have been merely known as 'Tyrannus's school,' in memory of a once famous teacher who taught there. All the probabilities are in favour of this having been the name of a noted public building in Ephesus. Permission to use this building was given to Paul; perhaps it was hired by him or his friends. All this may be inferred from what is generally accepted text of the passage in the present day. The Word, the ancient other texts have touched up this simpler text, and changed the situation considerably. They have inserted the word 'a certain' before 'Tyrannus,' and this at once converts the public building into a private one. The person Tyrannus could then be unknown to the readers, and would be one not unfavourable to St. Paul, who lent him his own building with or without fee. The most notable MS of the Western text adds the words: 'from the ninth hour till the tenth.' This addition is all of a piece with the idea that Tyrannus was a schoolmaster or professor, whose work, according to the ancient custom, would be over early in the day, thus free for the building fees of the rest of the day. Juvenal describes to us how the boys read their lessons to the master even before dawn. Augustine, himself a professor, tells us that his lecturing work was over early in the day. The experience of moderns in some countries confirms this: the early morning is the time for brain work in the South, as the young Julius Charles Hare and his brother found when resident as boys in Italy. The story is told to Paul as a rule. The passage is worded thus: 'Tyrannus's house', or 'Tyrannus's lecture,' or 'Tyrannus's schoolmaster.' The translation which might be rendered 'Tyrannus's school,' or 'Tyrannus's house,' or 'Tyrannus's lecture,' or 'Tyrannus's schoolmaster.'

A. SOUTTER.

TYRE (Tyr—'rock,' Jos 19th) was situated on the coast of Palestine about half-way between Carmel and the mouth of the Jordan River. The narrow strip of low land and the background of mountains was almost inaccessible owing to massive rocky promontories (the most famous being 'the Ladder of Tyre'), which barred the approach of invaders. The date of the foundation of Tyre is unknown. That given by Herodotus is B.C. 2740, by Josephus about B.C. 1217. Isaiah (23:14) calls her 'the joyous city whose antiquity is of ancient days'; Strabo, 'the most ancient of all Phoenicia.' Her original inhabitants probably came from the Semitic homeland near the Persian Gulf. But Tyre was not 'the most ancient.' Isaiah (23:12) calls her 'daughter of Sidon' (cf. Gn 10th; Homer mentions 'Sidonian wails,' but ignores Tyre. Justin says Sidon suffered so severely at the hands of Ascalon that her trade passed to her daughter Tyre. The Tiddel-Amarna letters (c. B.C. 1430) reveal Abi-milki, king of Tyre, sending appeals to his lord Amenhotep IV. for assistance against the invading forces of Khakhi, who were ravaging the land, while the citizens were dying of want on the islets off the coast. At the conquest of Canaan, Joshua assigned the Tyrian territory to Asher, though at 1650 neither occupied (Jos 13th, but c. 2 S 245). For the next 430 years the city's history is a blank. It was Hiram, David's contemporary, who raised Tyre to fame. Old Tyre (Palestyrus), on the mainland, he strongly fortified, its walls being 15 miles in circumference. Hiram now built New Tyre by uniting the scattered islands, half a mile out to sea, till they enclosed an area 24 miles in circumference. At the N. end, two stone piers, about 100 ft. apart, extended E. and W., for 700 ft. These with the shore line embraced an area (the 'Zidon Harbour') of 70,000 sq. yds. At the S. end a similar harbour ('the Egyptian'), 80,000 sq. yds. in area, was enclosed by a vast pier 200 yds. long, and a breakwater 26 ft. wide and 990 ft. in length. The two harbours were united by a canal across the island. The city rose up in tiers of houses, gardens, orchards, and vineyards, and was embellished by a new and splendid temple of Melkarth, a royal palace, and a great piazza (the 'Eurychorus') for national assemblies. The city's wealth was furnished largely from the trade in purple dye, the secret of the extraction of which from two species of murex the Tyrians possessed. The gradual failure of the supply of these shellfish on their own shores led the citizens to become great explorers. Every island and coastline were searched for these precious molluscs. Trade naturally followed. They trafficked to the Nile as far as Memphis; worked copper mines in Cyprus and Crete (cf. Phenice, Ac 27th); erected stations on the Bosporus, the Euxine, and the Crimea; established colonies on the N. African shores, Malta, Sicily, Sardinia, Crete, and employed the gold, silver, lead, and other mines of Spain from their emporium Tartessus (prob. the Tarshish of Gn 10th, Ps 274, Is 69th). Even the Atlantic was braved, and they worked the tin deposits of Cornwall and the lead deposits of the Isle of Wight. Hiram co-operated with David in the erection of the latter's palace in Jerusalem, sending cedars from Lebanon (1 Ch 14th). Under Solomon, Tyrian sailors built the Egyptian-Fenician ship the 'Ships of Solomon.' Hiram and Solomon had joint maritime adventures, Jewish ships with Tyrian seamen trading to Ophir every three years (1 K 9th 10th). 'Hiram's Tomb,' a limestone sarcophagus, is still shown on the shore 6 miles S. of Tyre.

The years following Hiram's death were very troubled, changes of dynasty occurring through repeated assassinations. At length Ethbaal, by the murder of his brother, seized the throne, and married his daughter Jeabsel to Ahaz (1 K 19th). Some time after the death of Ethbaal a domestic rebellion led to the emigration of the Tyrian princess Elissa, who is said to have fled from Tyre with her murdered husband's riches and to have founded Carthage, thereby winning fame for herself as the Dido of Virgil's Aeneid. About B.C. 880 Assyria began to interfere with Western politics. Tyre purchased her freedom from Assyrian domination for a heavy bribe. Hiram, B.C. 726, Shalmaneser IV. came against the city, but, having no ships, could not reach the island fortress till he had bribed Sidon to furnish 60 vessels. These the Tyrians, with only 12 ships, easily routed. Shalmaneser retired, leaving a garrison in Old Tyre, which kept up a fruitless blockade for five years. At the next attack, under Sennacherib, Elulius, the king, fled in despair to Cyprus, the Assyrins appointing a tributary king, Tubaal, in his stead (2 Ch 30th). Under Esarhaddon, Tyre rebelled. The Assyrians held the shore, and captured Sidon, but Tyre again escaped. In B.C. 664 it submitted to Ashurbanipal on honorable terms. On the decline of Nineveh, Tyre again proclaimed her independence (B.C. 630), and after Nineveh fell (B.C. 605) she reached the zenith of her glory. Essekil (27-28) gives a marvelously vivid picture of the island city at this period, yet prophesies her fall on account of her colossal sins.

In the early unsettled days of the New Babylonian Empire the Tyrians entered into a league with Pharaoh-necho of Egypt. They were invited to make a canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, and even to circumnavigate Africa. The latter feat they accomplished in three years, the voyagers sailing down the E. coast, and reaching the Pillars of Heracles after a feat of unheard-of daring. In b.c. 522 a Tyrian attack was repulsed, and besieged for 13 years. Old Tyre was destroyed.
TYRE

(Ezk 26:1-12), but the Babylonian Army in vain wearied itself in trying to subdue the island (29th). It is probable that the city was finally capitulated on favourable terms. The long siege, however, had ruined her commerce, and for 50 years Tyre was a poverty-stricken town. An attempt at a republic did not improve her fortunes. She was involved in the struggle between Nebuchadnezzar II and Pharaoh-hophra (Jer 44:14), was for a time under Egypt, but finally fell to Babylon, and remained a dependency until the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire. Her humbled state did not change her people's temper. Their pride (Ezk 29, 30) was a contempt for their foreign rights of man (Am 1), their slave-trading propensities (Jl 3:4) are denounced by the Hebrew prophets. In b.c. 538 Cyrus the, the founder of the Persian Empire, ordered Tyrian workmen to assist with Lebanon cedars in the re-building of the Jewish Temple (Ezk 37).Cambyses II. engaged the Tyrians to supply a fleet for his invasion of Egypt. On his proposing to send them to subdue Carthage they refused, on the score of their blood relationship with the daughter colony of Tyre. Under Artaxerxes Longimanus (b.c. 430) we read of Tyrian fish-merchants at the gates of Jerusalem (Neh 13th). In the Persian-Greek wars Tyrian fleet fought on the Persian side, 391, after the Peace of Antalkidas (b.c. 387), Tyre transferred her allegiance to Persia's enemies. Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) took fearful vengeance. Sidon disappeared in flame and torrents of blood. Tyre in horror opened her gates, and was spared. In b.c. 332 Alexander the Great appeared in front of the city. The Tyrians declined to allow him to sacrifice personally to Melkarth in their fortress. The memorable siege began. Alexander built a mole 200 ft. wide out towards the island. It was repeatedly destroyed. The defence was desperate and successful, till Alexander invested the city with a fleet of 224 ships. Tyre was stormed, 8000 of her inhabitants massacred, 2000 crucified on the shore, and 20,000 sold into slavery. Tyre ceased to be an island, and henceforth was permanently joined to the mainland. Only a blunt headland to-day suggests the existence of the former island fortress. The mole is now ½ mile broad.

Tyre was again re-peopled. She figured in the wars of the Ptolemies and Seleucidae. In b.c. 314 Antigonus besieged her for 15 months. After 70 years' subjection to Egypt she was under Antiochus II. In b.c. 65, when the Romans made her a free city. Some of her citizens came to hear the preaching of Jesus (Mc 3°). Christ visited the neighbourhood (Mk 7th), and got a favourable reception (Lk 19th). Tyre figured in connexion with St. Paul in Apostolic times (Ac 12th-21st). Was the Church in Tyre not a fulfilment of Ps 87th? A Christian church was built on the site of the Melkarth temple. Origen found refuge in Tyre, and died there. Jerome (4th cent.) speaks of it as the 'most noble and beautiful city of Phoenicia.' Captured by the Saracens (a.d. 638), it was recovered (a.d. 1124), and William of Tyre celebrates its fame under the Crusaders. Here was buried Frederick Barbarossa. Saladin was repelled in 1187, but the spot was abandoned in 1291, and the Moslems took possession of it. Tyre has since sunk to a miserable stagnant village, where the waves mournfully crush amid the ruins of her former magnificence.

TZADE.—The eighteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 18th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

UCAL.—See IXTHET, 2.

UEL.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10th); called in 1 Es 9th Juel.

UKNAZ.—In 1 Ch 46 14 A Vm gives 'Uknaz' instead of 'even Kenaz' (AV) or 'and Kenaz' (RV). In all probability something has dropped out of the text, which had read originally 'the sons of Eliah, . . . and Kenaz.' This is favoured by the plural 'sons.'

ULAI.—A large river of Elam, emptying into the Persian Gulf. According to Dn 8° and the Assyrian inscriptions, it flowed past the city of Shushan (Susas). It is the modern Karun, which, however, does not now flow close to the site of Susa, but to the east of it. Cf. also HYDASPES.

ULAM.—1. A Manassite family (1 Ch 7th, 11). 2. A Benjamite family, specially noted as archers (1 Ch 8th, 44; cf. also 2 Ch 14th, 19).

ULLA.—An Asherite family (1 Ch 7th).

UMMAH.—An Asherite city (Joz 19th), probably a slip, owing to resemblance of Heb. letters m and l, for ACCO (Ptolemais).

UNCHASTITY.—See MARRIAGE, 7, 8.

UNCHOLE, UNCLEANNESS.—See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

UNDERSTRUCTION.—The same Gr. word as that translated 'anointing' in 1 Jn 227 is in 22 rendered 'unction' (RV 'anointing'). It is used there metaphorically of the effect of the presence of the Holy Spirit upon the believer.

UNDERGIRDING.—See HELMY; SHIPS, etc., p. 850.

UNDESSERTED.—Only 1 K 7th, in the difficult description of Solomon's lavers (TEMPLE, § G (d)). In older English it meant 'support'; the Heb. word is lit. 'shoulders,' and denotes something of the nature of a strut or brace. See the ref. in the above mentioned article.

UNICORN (re'ôm, Nu 22° etc.; rôm, Job 39° RV in all passages 'wild ox').—This is undoubtedly the rîmu of the Assyrians, often figured on their sculptures. A fine bas-relief of this animal was uncovered recently by the excavations of Nineveh. It is probably identical with the aurochs or Bos primitivus, the type of Julius Caesar. It was of great size and strength (Nu 22°, Nu, Ps 22°), very wild and ferocious (Job 39°-19), and specially dangerous when hunted, because of its powerful double horns (Ps 22°, Ps 65°). In connexion with Is 34° it is interesting to note the inscription of Shalmaneser II., who says, 'Him I trod down like a rôm.' The Arab, rôm, the graceful Antelope leucoryx of Arabia, is a very different animal.

UNKNOWN GOD.—St. Paul, wandering along the streets of Athens, saw an altar bearing the dedication, 'To an Unknown God' (Ac 17th). He used this as the text of his sermon before the Areopagus. There is evidence in other ancient writers in favour of the existence of such a dedication, and the conjecture may be permitted that the altar was erected as a thank-offering for life preserved in some foreign country, the name of the proper divinity of which—a very important thing in Greek ritual—was unknown to the person preserved.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.—See BREAD, LEAVEN, PASSOVER.

UNNI.—1. A Levitical family (1 Ch 15°). 2. See UNNI.
UNNO

UNNO (so Kethibh, followed by RV; Keres Unni [so AV, cf. 1 Ch 15:4, 49].—A family of Levites that returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:19).)

UNTOWARD.—'Untoward' is 'not toward,' i.e. not well disposed. It occurs in Ac 26:9 'this untoward generation.' Cf. 'untoward to all good'...forward to evil'—Judgment of the Synode at Dort, p. 32. The subst. 'untowardness' occurs in the heading of Is 25, Hos 6. The word is still occasionally used, but in the more modern sense of 'unfortunate'—as 'an untoward accident.'

UNWRITTEN SAYINGS.—The name Agrapha or 'Unwritten Sayings,' is applied to sayings ascribed to Jesus which are not found in the true text of the canonical Gospels. That some genuine sayings of the Lord not recorded by the Evangelists should linger in the oral tradition of the early Church is only what we should expect, but of the extant Agrapha it is only a small number that meet the tests of textual criticism, or satisfy the requirements of moral probability. It is significant of the value of the canonical Gospels as historical records that outside of them there are so few 'sayings of Jesus' that could possibly be accepted and preserved as a veritable tradition of His actual teaching. The Unwritten Sayings may be classified as follows:

1. Those in the NT.—Two varieties meet us here.
   (a) Those which are found in some MSS of the Gospels, but whose authenticity textual criticism renders doubtful. Among the most important of these are Mt Mtr 17, Mk 9:19, Lk 9:6. 234, which all find a place in TR and are reproduced in AV, while RV removes all of them except the last to the margin. To this list must be added the sayings of Jesus in Mk 16:11 and Jn 8:11, the conclusion of Mk 16:28 and the Pericope adulterae in Jn. (7v-21) being regarded by critical scholars as additions to the original text, which may at the same time embody authentic traditions. Between Lk 6 and 2 Cod. D gives the striking saying:
   'On the same day he saw one working on the Sabbath, and said to him, Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law.'
   (b) Those outside of the Gospels.—The most notable is Ac 306, but to this may be added Ac 1 (cf. 112) and the Co 112; 'This do, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.' In the opinion of some commentators, Ja 12 the 'crown of life' which the Lord promised to them that love him,' is 'a semi-quo of the same saying of Christ's.'

2. In Apocryphal Gospels.—See these fully given in art. Gospels [APOCYPHTH], III. 1, 2.

3. In the Fathers and other early Church writers (cf. p. 446).—Only a few examples of these can be set down:
   Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 5: 'Wherefore Peter says that the Lord said to the apostles, If then any one of Israel wishes to repent and believe on God through my name, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years go forth into the world, lest any one say, We did not hear.'
   Orig., in Jer. xx. 3: 'But the Saviour himself saith, He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'
   Orig., in J oh. xix. speaks of 'the commandment of Jesus which saith, Prove yourselves trustworthy money-changers.'
   Tertullian, de Bapst., commenting on the words 'Watch and pray' added to St. Peter in Gethsemane, deprecating the saying had also preceded, that no one untempted should attain to the heavenly kingdom.'

4. In Mohammedan writers.—A large number of Agrapha, collected by Professor D. S. Margoliouth from the- Ghazzali's Revival of the Religious Sciences and other sources, were published by him in a series of papers in Expository Times, [1893-94] (cf. Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 356, DCG ii. 882). Though interesting and sometimes historical, these have no claim to represent original traditions, but are frequently traceable to Gospels canonical or apocryphal. The following are among the best specimens:
   Jesus one day walked with his apostles, and they passed by the carcase of a dog. The apostles said, How foul is the smell of this dog! But Jesus said, How white are its teeth!'
   'Jesus said, Take not the world for your lord, lest it take you for its slaves.'
   'Jesus said, Whose knows and does and teaches, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.'

5. In the Oxyrhynchus papyri.—Special interest attaches to the Sayings of Jesus unearthed at Oxyrhynchus by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, all the more as they do open a prospect of further discoveries of a like kind. The first series of these, published in 1897, contained some sayings that have Gospel parallels, but the following strike a note of their own:
   'Jesus saith, Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God, and except ye take the sabbath a real sabbath, ye shall not see the Father.'
   'Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the midst was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart and see not.'
   'Jesus saith, Wherever there are two, they are not without God; and wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with such.'
   Raise the stone and there shall find one; leave the wood and there am I.'

More recently the same scholars discovered another papyrus with additional 'Sayings of Jesus. In this case, unfortunately, the leaf was in a mutilated condition, and both re-construction and interpretation are difficult. A good account of this second series of 'Sayings with the Gr. text as restored by Grenfell and Hunt themselves, will be found in an article by Professor Swete in Expository Times, 1898-94 p. 488, with which cf. his art. on the 1897 Oxyrhynchus fragment in Expository Times, 1896-97 p. 544. Here again some of the 'Sayings' have Gospel parallels, while others bear a more original character. From the two most important the following extracts (based on a text that is partly conjectural) may be given:
   'Jesus saith...If ye shall truly know yourselves, ye are the sons and daughters of the Father Almighty, and ye shall know yourselves to be in the city of God, and ye are the city.'
   'Jesus saith...Do nothing save the things that belong to the truth, for if ye do these, ye shall know a hidden mystery.'

Of the value of the Oxyrhynchus 'Sayings' very different estimates have been formed. But it is pretty generally agreed that, in their present shape at all events, they were not uttered by Jesus, and do not belong to the first Christian age. J. C. LAMBERT.

UPHARISIN.—See MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARISIN.

UPHAZ.—A supposed country or region mentioned in Jer 10, On 10, as a source of gold. Probably the word is miswritten for Ophir (wh. see).

UPPER ROOM.—See House, 5.

UR.—Father of one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11).

UR OF THE CHALDEES, whence Abraham set out upon his journey to Canaan (Gen 11:8-15, Neh 9), is usually identified with the well-known city of Ur in southern Babylonia, the site of which is marked by the mounds of Muciyaar. This city was in existence in the earliest period of Babylonian history, and was the seat of a dynasty of early kings before the foundation of the Bab. monarchy; it was always the centre of the worship of the moon-god in Southern Babylonia.

The identification has not been universally accepted, since from the narrative in Gen 11 it would appear that Harran was passed on the journey from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan; hence, too, the traditional explanation of the place with Urfa, the Gr. Edessa. The difficulty may perhaps be the explanation by the supposition that the narrative incorporates variant traditions with regard to Abraham's origin; but Marduk and Harran were both of them centres of moon-worship is possibly significant. I. W. KINGSLEY.

UBRANUS.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Rom 16*. The name is common among slaves, and is found in inscriptions of the imperial household.

URIAH, or URIAH (in AV 1 below appears as Urias [Mt 1:1 Urias], 2 as Urias in Is 58 and Uriah in 2 K 15:10, and 4 as Uriah in Ezr 8:30 and Uriah in Neh 3:11; while Uriah is found only in the case of 3 and 4. In Rev Uriah is found only in 2 K 15:10-12, Uriah elsewhere).—1. One of David's 30 heroes, the husband of Bathsheba. He was a Hittite, but, as the name indicates, doubtless a worshipper of Jehovah (2 S 1 12:31, 1 K 15, Mt 1:8). After David's ineffectual attempt to use him as a shield for his own soul, he was killed in battle according to the instructions of David to Joab. 2. High priest in the reign of Ahaz; called a 'faithful witness' in Is 58, but subservient to the influence of the latter. Name of Ahaz in 2 K 15:10-12. The omission of the name in 1 Ch 6:41 may be due to textual corruption, since it appears in Jos. Ant. x. VII, 6, which is based on Chronicles. 3. A prophet, son of Semahah of Jerusalem. His denunciations against Jerusalem and Jerusalem in the style of Jeremiah aroused the wrath of King Jehoiakim. Uriah fled to Egypt, was seized and slain by order of Jehoiakim, and was buried in the common graveyard (Jer 26:20-23). 4. A priest (Neh 3:31, son (representative) of Hakkoz, doubtless one of the courses of the priests (1 Ch 24:4). He was father (or ancestor) of Meremoth, an eminent priest (Ezr 8:2, 1 Es 8:9 Urias). 5. A man who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8:1, 1 Es 9:4 Urias).

URIAH.—1. Es 8:2.—Ezr 8:9 Uriah; perhaps identical with.—2. Es 10:17—Neh 5:1 Uriah.

URIEL ('flame of God' or 'my light Is God').—1. Mentioned in genealogies: (a) 1 Ch 6:4 15:2, 12:2 Ch 1:9. 2. The angel who rebukes the preoccupation of Esdras in questioning the ways of God (2 Es 4:20-23, 10:22), and converses with him at length. In 4 M Rev 'Jeremiel'. In Enoch 9:4 Uriel, or Urjan, is one of the four archangels, but in 46 and 71 his place is taken by Raphael. In 19:30 he is one of 'the watchers', 'the angel over the world and Tarshish'; and in 21:27 he explains the fate of the fallen angels (cf. Sb. Orac., where he brings them to judgment). In 72:8 Uriel, 'the archangel of glory', sets over all the multitude of heaven,' shows Enoch the celestial phenomena; in 33:4 he writes them down. In the lost 'Prayer of Joseph' he is the angel with whom Jacob wrestled, the eighth in rank from God, Jacob being the first.

URIM AND THUMMIM.—These denote the two essential parts of the sacred oracle by which in early times the Hebrews sought to ascertain the will of God. Our OT Revisers give as their meaning 'the Lights and the Perfections' (Ex 28:35, RvM). This rendering—or rather, taking the words as abstract plurals, 'Light and Perfection'—seems to reflect the views of the late Jewish scholars to whom we owe the present vocalization of the OT text, but the oldest reference to the sacred lot suggests that the words express two sharply contrasted ideas. Hence if Thummim, as most believe, denotes 'innocence,' Urim should denote 'guilt'—a sense which some would give it by connecting it with the verb meaning 'to curse.' Winckler and his followers, on the other hand, start from 'light' as the meaning of Urim, and interprets Thummim as 'darkness' (the completion of the sun's course). 'Urim and Thummim are life and death, yes and no, light and darkness' (A. Jeremias, Das AT im Lichte d. alt. Orientes, 450; cf. Benzing, Heb. Arch. 659 f.). There is thus a wide divergence among scholars as to the original significance of the words.

As to the precise nature of these mysterious objects there also exists a considerable, though less marked, divergence of opinion, notwithstanding the numerous recent investigations by British, American, and Imperial scholars, of which the two latest are those by Kautzsch in Hauck's Papyri xx. 328-336 [1907], with literature to date, and M'Neile, The Book of Exodus [1906], 181-184. The most instructive, as it is historically the oldest, passage is Deut 33:8. In 1 S 14:11, as preserved in the fuller Greek text. The latter runs thus: And Jotham said, O J* God of Israel, why hast thou not answered thy servant this day? If the inquiry be in me or in my son Jonathan, J* God of Israel, give Urim; but if thou sayest thus, The iniquity is in thy people Israel, give Thummim. And Saul and Jonathan were taken, but the people escaped,' etc. Now, if both these interpretations are correct, it was necessary to agree beforehand as to the significance to be attached to the two lots.

As to the material, shape, etc., of the two lots and the precise method of their manipulation, we are left to the narrow and impossibly view that they were two small stones, either in the shape of dice or in tablet form, perhaps also of different colours. Others, including Kautzsch (op. cit.), think of a well-known Babylonian and Arabian method of divination (cf. Ps 81). In addition to the two alternatives above considered, it may be inferred from 1 S 28:6 that neither lot might be cast. Were they contained within the hollow ephod-image, which was provided with a narrow aperture, so that it was possible to shake the image and yet neither lot 'come out'? The lot is technically said 'to fall,' and the reference (latter Jos 16:6, 19, etc.) The early narratives above cited show that the manipulation of the sacred lot was a special prerogative of the priests, as is expressly stated in Deut 33:8 (cf. LXX), where the Divine Urim and Thummim are assigned to the priestly tribe of Levi, and confirmed by Ezr 2:8—Neh 7:8.

In the Priest's Code the Urim and Thummim are introduced in Ex 28:30, Lv 8, Nu 27*, but without the slightest clue as to their nature beyond the inference as to their small size, to be drawn from the fact that they were to be inserted in the high priest's 'breastplate of judgment' (see Breastplate). But this is merely an attempt on the part of the Priestly writer to divest these 'old-world mysteries' of their association with ideas of divination now outgrown, and, moreover, forbidden by the Law. It is, besides, doubtful if P was acquainted, any more so than ourselves, with the Urim and Thummim of the Books of Samuel, for the passage above cited from Ezr-Neh. shows that they were unknown in the post-exilic period. In specially placing the breastplate of judgment, it is impossible that P was thinking by the analogy of the Babylonian 'tablets of destiny' worn by Marduk on his breast, but the further position that these 'and the Urim and Thummim were origin.
nally one and the same' (Muse-Arnolt, Urim and Thummin, 213 and passim), as has been recently maintained, has yet to be proved. A. R. S. KENNETTY.

USURY, INTEREST, INCREASE.—At the date of our Lord Jesus Christ, when the modern connotations of usury were not yet developed, the use of interest on loans was lawful, though limited in amount and, in any case, not based on usurious motives. The OT law codes forbade the taking of interest on loans by one Jew from another, see Ex 22:20 (Book of the Covenant), Dt 23:19, Lv 25:38 (Law of Holiness). Of the two terms constantly associated and in EV rendered ‘usury’ (neshek) and ‘increase’ (tarbut), the former, to judge from Lv 25:37, denotes interest on loans of money, the latter interest on other advances, such as food stuffs, seed-corn, and the like, which was paid in kind. In Dt 25:3 and Rev 6:5 neskhe is applied to both kinds of loan.

For the distinction in EV times, see Maimon. Baba mezia, v. 1. Cf. also Strack's art. 'Wucher' in PRE xxii. A large part of the Babylonian loan-system, which was fully developed before b.c. 2600, consisted of such loans (Johns, Sub. and Assyr. Laws, ch. xxiii. Loans and Deposits).

To appreciate the motives of the Hebrew legislators, it must be remembered that, until a late period in the history of the Hebrews, they were almost entirely dependent on agricultural and pastoral pursuits. The loans here contemplated are therefore not advances required for trading capital, but for the relief of a poor 'brother' temporarily in distress, who, without others, would be compelled to sell himself as a slave (Lv 25:38). We have to do with an act of charity, not with a commercial transaction. In similar circumstances loans without interest were made from the Babylonian temple funds and by private individuals, as is still done by the Arabs to-day (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, I. 318).

In NT times conditions had greatly changed, and capital was required for many trading concerns. Our Lord twice introduces with approbation the investment of money with 'the bankers,' so as to yield a proper 'interest' (Mt 25:5, Lk 19:22 both RV). The rate of interest in the ancient world was very high. In Babylonia one shekel per mina per month, which is 20 per cent. per annum, was a usual rate; for advances of grain, for 400 or 300 ka the return was 100 ka, i.e. 25 to 33 per cent. per annum (Melissers, Aus d. altbab. Recht, 191). The interest on loans for 15 days might rise as high as 300 per cent. per annum (Johns, op. cit.). In Egypt 30 per cent. was not unusual. Even in Greece 12 per cent. was considered a low rate of interest. The recently discovered papyri from Elephantine in Egypt show members of the Jewish colony there already engaged (c. a.c. 430) in the characteristically Jewish business of money-lending. See also Deut. 23:19.

UTA (1 Es 58).—His sons returned among the Temple servants under Zerub. (Ezra. and Neh. omit). UTHAI.—1. A family of Judah after the Captivity (1 Ch 9:1) = Neh 11th Atiaha. 2. One of the sons of Bigvai (Ezr 8:20) = Es 8th Uthi.

UTHI (1 Es 8:20) = Ezr 8th Uthi.

—Aramaic form of Shem (Gen 10:25 and 1 Ch 1:17 in emended text). 2. A son of Nahor (Gen 24:14, AV Huz), whose descendants are placed in Aram-naharaim (Gen 24:10). 3. One of the Horilites in the land of Edom (Gen 36:27; v. 29, and v. 42, 1 Ch 1:47). 4. A region which is called the dwelling-place of the daughter of Edom (La 4:2). 5. A district containing a number of kings, situated between Philistia and Egypt, or, with a different pointing of the consonants of one word, between Philistia and the country of the Edomites (Jer 25:5, the name not in LXX). 6. Job's country (Job 14). As the first three are probably tribal designations, all may be regarded as geographical terms. It is not certain that they all refer to the same region. Nos. 1 and 2 seem to point to Mesopotamia. Nos. 3 and 4, and perhaps 5, indicate Edom or its neighbourhood. The locality of No. 6 is obscure. Ancient tradition is threefold. In LXX of Job 42:8 U7 is affirmed, on the authority of the 'Syriac book,' to lie on the borders of Idumea and Arabia. In v. 11 it is located on the borders of the Euphrates. Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 4) associates the Us of No. 1 with Damascus and Trachonitis. The work of Job itself about its hero's home seems to favour the neighbourhood of Edom or N. Arabia. Temen (21st) was an Edomite district containing the city of Bozrah (Am 1:11), and Ethpeus was an Edomite name (Gen 36:14). The Sabaeans (Job 14:16) were S. Arabian people who had settlements in the north. Tema (619) lay in N. Arabia, about 250 miles S.E. of Edom. The description of Job, however, as one of 'the children of the East' (12) is most naturally understood to refer to the east of Palestine. The cuneiform inscriptions have a name Usai, which has been identified with Us, but the identification is extremely uncertain.

Modern tradition, which can be traced back to early Christian times, locates Job in the Hauran, where the German explorer J. G. Wetzstein found a monastery of Job, a tomb and fountain of Job, and small stones ('wurms') called 'Job's stones.' Another German explorer, Glaser, finds a monument with the name Usi in W. Arabia, at a considerable distance to the N.W. of Medina. Decision is at present unattainable, both on the general question of the significance of Us in the OT and on the special question of Job. All that can be said is that the name points to the E. and S.E. of Palestine, and that the Book of Job appears to represent its hero as living in the neighbourhood of the Arabian or Syro-Arabian desert. W. TAYLOR SMITH.

UZAL.—Father of Palal (Neh 3:24).

—A place named in Ex 23:13 (RV 'from Uzal,' AV 'Meuzal')—a difficult passage, the text being in disorder. Davidson ([Exekiel, loc. cit.) suggests that, although the most serious objections occur to the rendering, it might read, 'Vedan and Javan of Uzal furnished their wares, etc.' Uzal is thought to be the ancient name of San'a, the capital of El-Yemen. The name San'a may have been given by the Abyssinians, in whose tongue it means 'fortress.' The modern Jewish inhabitants, who occupy a separate quarter, are reported to have come from India. But although none of the pre-Islamic Jewish stock remains, they were influential in the century before Mohammed (Harris, el-Yemen, 313). Probably the name was preserved in the region of the holy city, which was then known may have been due to their revival of the ancient name (Glaser, Stzize, ii. 427). In Arabic ozal means 'eternity.' This may account for the Arabs' belief that it is the world's oldest city (Margoliouth in Hastings' DB, s. a.). Iron is found in several districts of Central Arabia (Doughty, Arabia Deserta). The steel made in San'a is still highly esteemed, especially the sword- and dagger-blades (Harris, op. cit., 310 ft.).

Standing on the floor of a spacious valley, 7250 feet above the level of the sea, San'a is dominated by a fortress on Jebel Nuztim, which rises abruptly to the east. The height renders the climate delightful. The gardens and orchards are luxuriant and fruitful. A river bed lies through the city, and in the rainy season is full of water. In the dry months water is supplied by deep wells. The splendid palace of the Qusaymids, and the adjoining temple dedicated to Zahrab, the Arabian Venus, were destroyed by Othman, the third Caliph. The same fate befell the famous Christian church built by Abraha el-Assmar, viceroy of el-Yemen under the Abbasids. The evidence of the name, of which the Emperor of Rome is said to have sent marble and workmen (Harris, op. cit., 291-322). According to Ibn Khaldun, San'a was the seat of the Himyarite kings for centuries before Islam. W. Ewons.

tr. of hebel, 'breath' or 'vapour.' The RV rightly gives the literal rendering in Is 57:16: 'a breath (AV vanity) shall carry them all away.' The word naturally became an image of what is unsubstantial and transitory; in Is 40:15 man is said to be 'like a breath' (RVM); because 'his days are as a shadow that passeth away.' In Ecclesiastes 'vanity' often occurs; it connotes what is fleeting, unsatisfying, and profitless. Vanity of vanities' (Ecc 2:1-11) is the superlative expression of the idea of the futility of life. Jeremiah regards idols as 'vanity,' because they are 'the work of delusion' (10:19), 'lies and things wherein there is no profit' (10:20). Another great emphasis (Hab), whose root-meaning 'breath' or 'nothingness,' is twice rendered 'vanity' in the RV, and is applied to idols (Is 41:19, Zec 10:1). But 'vanity' generally describes moral evil as what is marred, discoloured; the man 'vanity' is rendered 'iniquity' for 'vanity' in Job 15:16, Ps 107; cf. Is 55:19. (3) More frequently, however, 'vanity' is the tr. of sharet, which also signifies 'what is naught.' In the OT it connotes the emptiness of life, which is in vain, and false. In Ps 41:8 RVM 'he speaketh falsehood' is preferable; but the AV 'he speaketh vanity' expounds the close connexion between vain or empty words and lies (cf. Ps 129:3, Jer 33:14, Job 30:14, Eccl 12:29). (4) 'Vanity' occurs twice as the rendering of riq 'emptiness,' and refers to that which is destined to end in failure (Ps 49:5). In the RV it is used for 'vanity,' but the marginal alternative 'the void in all passages but one (Is 59:16) is 'confusion' (Is 40:17, 41:44). 2. In the NT. — 'Vain' is the rendering of (a) kenes 'empty,' (b) mataios 'worthless.' When the former word is used, stress is laid on the absence of good, especially in essential qualities. The true force suggested by the RV 'void' in 1 Co 15:18, 19 21. A partial exception is Ja 2:22 — a rare example of the absolute use of the word. The 'vain man' is not 'only' one in whom there is no name, who has found no entrance, but he is also 'one who is puffed up with a vain conceit of his own spiritual insight' (Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 181). Even here the primary negative force of the word is emphasised — the 'conceit is vain,' that is to say, his conception of himself is devoid of real content. He is a 'man who cannot be depended on, whose deeds do not correspond to his words' (Mayor, Comm. on loc.). In v. 21 the reference (mataios) is to a faith which is 'frustrate,' or 'void of result,' because it does not save from sin (cf. Fbdlay, EGT, in loc.).

'Vanity' occurs only three times in the NT (Ro 6:18, Eph 2:1; it is always as the tr. of mataios, which is not a classical word, but is often found in the LXX, especially as the rendering of hebel 'breath' (see above). When St. Paul describes the creation as 'subject to vanity' (Ro 8:21), he has in mind the marring of its perfection and the frustration of its Creator's purpose by sin; nevertheless, the groanings of creation are, to his ear, the utterance of its hope of redemption. When he says that 'the Gentiles walk in the vanity of their minds,' he is dwelling on the futility of their intellectual and moral gropings, which is the result of their walking in darkness (v.19). In 2 P 2:1 the intimate connexion between unreality and boasfulness in speech is well brought out in the graphic phrase 'great swellings of vanity.' How pitiful the contrast between the high-sounding talk of the false teachers who were themselves 'bond-servants of corruption,' and yet had the effrontery to 'promise liberty' to them whose in reality they were bringing into bondage (v.19).

VASHNI.—Samuel's firstborn son, according to MT of 1 Ch 2:18 (Eng. 20), which is followed by AV. RV, following the Syr. (see n.), and on the strength of v. 18 (see the § I), supplies Joel as the name of Samuel's oldest son, and substitutes 'and the second Abiah' for 'Vashni and Abiah.'

VASHTI (Est 1:11 etc.).—See Esther [Book of], 3.

VAU or WAW.—The sixth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 11th Psalm to designate the 6th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

VEDAN.—In RV the name of a country or city that traded with Tyre (Ezk 27:22). AV has 'Dan also.' The passage is so corrupt that no certainly correct reading is at present attainable. Cf. Uza.

VEIL.—See VAIL.

VERMILION.—See Colours, 4.

VERSIONS.—See English Versions, Greek Versions of OT, Text of NT, Text Versions and Languages of OT, Vulgate, etc.

VESSELS.—See HOUSE, § 9; MEALS, § 5. For 'the vessels of the tabernacle' (AV) RV has sometimes furniture, sometimes 'instruments,' according to the context (cf. Nu 16:10 with 19). For the Temple cf. 1 Ch 29:3 in AV and RV. In Gn 43:11 'vessels' is equivalent to 'saddledbags.' In 1 Th 4:4 'vessel' probably stands for 'body' rather than 'wine,' an alternative favoured by many (see Milligan, Thes., ad loc.).

VESTRY occurs only in 2 K 10:2 'him that was over the vestry,' as the rendering of a word of uncertain meaning. Cf. 22:4 'keeper of the wardrobe.'

VESTURE.—In AV this word occurs as the rendering of both words denoting dress or raiment generally, as Gn 41:4, Ps 22:13, and of special words for the plaid-like upper garment of antiquity, as Dt 22:4 (see Princes), Rev 19:14, 11 (RV here 'garment'), for which see Dress, § 4 (b).

VESTRY occurs only in 1 S 10:2 'him that was over the vestry,' as the rendering of a word of uncertain meaning. Cf. 22:4 'keeper of the wardrobe.'

VIAL occurs in OT only in 1 S 10:1 AV, and 2 K 2:9 RV (AV box) for an oil-flask. In NT, RV has substituted 'bowl' for 'vial' throughout (Rev 5:5, 15). The phialos was a flask or vessel resembling a saucer, specially used for pouring libations of wine upon the altar of a deity.

VILLAGE.—For the OT villages and their relation to the 'mother' city, see OITY, and cf. FORTIFICATION AND STRATOCRAZY, ad init. In all periods of Heb. history the cultivators of the soil lived for greater security in villages, the cultivated and pasture land of which was held in common. Solitary homesteads were unknown. The NT writers and Josephus also distinguish between a city (polis) and a village (kôme), the distinction being primarily a difference not of size but of status. Thus in Mk 8:27 the word rendered 'towsa' is literally 'village-cities' (others render 'market-towns'), i.e. places which are cities as regards population but not as regards constitutional status. When Josephus tells us that 'the very least of the villages of Galilee contained above 15,000 inhabitants' (Bjn ii. ii. 2 [Niese, § 46), he is, more exact, drawing a very long bow indeed! A. R. S. KENNEDY.

VINE, VINEYARD.—The usual Heb. word for 'wine' in geophon, used of the grape-vine everywhere except in 2 K 4:31, where geophon (lit. 'field vine') refers to a wild-gourd vine. Another word, sir (Is 5:1, Jer 2:21), or sirâôph (Gn 49:11), refers to superior vines with purple grapes.

VINEGAR

The vine (Vitis vinifera) is supposed to be a native of the shores of the Caspian, but has been cultivated in Palestine from the earliest times, as is witnessed by the extensive remains of ancient vineyards. The climate is peculiarly suited to the grape, which reaches perfection during the prolonged sunshine and the dewy nights. Vines specially flourish on the hill-sides unsuited for cereals (Jer 31, Am 9). Viticulture, which languished for centuries under the Arabs, has recently been revived by the German and Jewish colonies, and millions of imported vines of choice strain have been planted. As in the case of the olive, the culture of the vine needs a peaceful, settled population, as the plants require several years' care before bearing fruit (Deut 2, 19), and constant attention if they are to maintain their excellence; hence to sit under one's 'own vine and fig tree' was a favourite image of peace (1 K 4, Mic 4, Zec 8). In some districts to-day vines are trained over a trellis at the front door, making a cool summer resort. The Israelites found Palestine ready planted with vineyards (Dt 6, Jos 24, Neh 9). The steps taken in making a vineyard are described in detail in Is 5. The land must be fenced (cf. Ps 80), the stumps gathered out, the choicest possible plants obtained. A winepress was then built, and a watchtower (Is 5, Mt 21, Lk 21) was built to guard against intruders. These last included foxes (or jackals) (Ca 28) and boars (Ps 103). In such a tower the owner's family probably passed all the grape season; for in the latitude the vintage a large proportion of the people are to be found living in the vineyards. Every spring the soil between the vines must be dug or ploughed up and the plants pruned (Lv 26, Is 29). Neglect of this work results in rapid deterioration of the grapes; only the slothful man could permit his vineyard to be overgrown with 'thorns and nettles' and 'the stone wall thereof to be broken down' (Is 5). The clusters of grapes are often enormous (cf. Nu 13). When the vintage is over and the leaves turn scarlet and yellow, the vineyards have a very desolate look (Is 1, 24). The failure of the vintage was looked upon as one of God's terrible misfortunes (Ps 73, Jer 5, Hab 3), and a successful and long continued vintage as a sign of blessing (Lv 26). Of the vast quantities of grapes produced in ancient times a large proportion was, without doubt, converted into dibb (Arab.) or grape honey (cf. Heb. debash = 'honey'), a form of thick, intensely sweet grape juice, which is still made in considerable quantities in Syria, but which must have been much more important in the days when cane sugar was unknown. Many of the early references to 'honey' may very probably refer to this product rather than to that of the bee.

Israel is compared to a vine in Ezek 16, 17, 18, 19, and Ps 80. The vine-leaf was a favourite design on Jewish coins. The numerous references to the vine in the NT (eg. Mt 20, 21, 22, Mt 15) point to the continued importance of viticulture in those days.

Vine of Sodom (Dt 32, 2, 3).—If the reference is to any particular plant—which is very doubtful—the most probable is the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis); see Gourou. The apple-sized fruit of the curious 'asher (Calotropis procera) has been suggested; but though this answer well to the description by Josephus (Juv. vili. 4) of the 'fruit of the grape' which vanish into ashes, so substantial a tree, with its cork-like bark and large glossy leaves, could in no sense be called a vine.

VINEGAR.—The light wine of the Bible was, in consequence of the primitive methods of manufacture, in vogue (for which see WINE AND STRONG DRINK), turned sour much more rapidly than modern wines. In this condition it was termed 'vino (Lat. 'wine'), or 'wine (Heb. sherut), and was used, mixed with water, as a drink by the peasants (Ru 2). The Nazirite's vow of abstinence included also 'wine of vinegar' and 'vinegar of strong drink,' i.e. of all intoxicating liquor other than grape-wine (Nu 6). The Jewish chibmst corresponded to the Roman ponca, the favourite drink of the soldiers, which those charged with our Lord's crucifixion offered him (Mt 27, but not Mt 27, see RV). A. R. S. Kennedy.

VIPER.—See SERPENT.

VIRGIN usually represents (a) Heb. besharath, an unmarried maiden. The word is frequently applied to countries, often with the addition of 'daughter,' e.g. Israel (Jer 19, Am 6), Zion (2 K 19, Lk 21), Babylon (Is 47), Egypt (Jer 48). In Jt 15 it is used of a young widow. Dt 22 has laws for the protection of virgins; v. 11 insists on the importance of virginity in a bride. (b) In Is 7 a rare word 'umdash is used (RVm 'maiden'). The OT usage is for the virginity of the unwed (e.g. Ex 2, Ca 1, 6, mase, 1 S 17 20). The Arab. root means 'to be mature,' and the Aram. does not connote virginity. The word apparently means 'one of marriageable age,' not the word which would naturally be used if 'virginity' were the point to be emphasized. LXX has perathmos ('virgin'); so Mt 19; but the complaints of Justus and Tamar against the Jewish tr. nezhat ('damsel') are hardly justifiable. A modern view holds that Isaiah was adopting the language of a current mythological tradition, and intended the word to convey the idea of a divine mother (note also the divine 'virgin,' EV Lk 14). Hence uses the word of men, probably metaphorically, implying chastity, not celibacy; cf. 2 Co 11. Ac 21 is probably the term of the later 'order of virgins. For 'virgin-birth' see pp. 586, 705. C. W. Emmet.

VIRTUE.—In Mk 5, Lk 6 5 the word 'virtue' is used with the anticipated meaning of 'power,' or 'powerful influence' (Gr. dynamis).

VISION.—1. In OT.—In its earlier form the vision is closely associated with belief in dreams (wh. see) as the normal vehicle of Divine revelation. The two words are repeatedly used of the same experience, the dream being rather the vehicle of revelation (e.g. Jn 1 22, 4). The common phrase 'visions of the night' embodies the same conception (Jn 2, 1, Job 4, Gn 40; cf. Is 3 1, Co 10). In the darkness, when the eye is closed (Nu 24, 4) and the natural faculties are suspended by sleep, God speaks to men. A further stage is the belief in an exalted condition of quickened spiritual discernment ('ecstasy') Ac 1 11, 11, 21, 22, Gn 19, LXX), detached from the dream-state to 'honey of the mouth', or 'honey in the mouth' (Mt 13 44, Lk 10 41-42, cf. Is 6, 1). The ORB recognizes this stage of 'vision' (or 'discourse'), as a natural preliminary stage to the reception of the vision proper. The later prophets, on the other hand, had already attained to the idea of vision as inspired insight, of revelation as an inward and ethical word of God (Is 1, 2, etc.; Is 1 S 3, Ps 80). Their prophetic consciousness is not born of special theophanies, but rather of a resistless sense of constraint, upon them to discern and utter the word (1 Th 2, 8). Ecstasy and visible appearances are the exception (1 Th 1 4-9, Heb 6, Jer 11). In Is 22 4 the 'vision of vision' (Ev) is possibly a mistake for 'vision of Visions, a Valley of Vision.' (2). In NT.—St. Paul once makes incidental reference to his 'visions' (2 Co 12), and perhaps confirms the objective character of the revelation to him on the road to Damascus (Gal 1 11-13, 1 Co 13 15). There are also recorded in Lk 1 2, Ac 10. 11. 16; and the term is once applied to the Transfiguration (Mt 17; Mk. Lk. 'the things which they had seen'). But the NT vision is practically confined to the Apocalyptic imagery of the Book of Revelation. S. W. Green.
VOPHIS.—The father of the Naphalites, spy (Nu 13:4).

VOWS.—In common with most peoples of the ancient world, the making of vows was of frequent occurrence among the Israelites. The underlying idea in making a vow was to propitiate the Deity; this was done either by himself to do something for Him, or to please Him by the exercise of self-denial. Vows were made from a variety of motives: Jacob vows a vow according to which he will please Jahweh by becoming His worshipper, or else, that Jahweh will keep him safe during his journey and give him food and raiment (Gen 28:20-22). Jephthah vows to offer to Jahweh the first person he sees coming out of his house on his return from battle, provided he is victorious (Judg 11:30-32). Hannah vows that if Jahweh gives her a son, she will dedicate him to the service of God (1 S 2:1). These cases are typical: in each something is promised to God, on condition that God will do something for him who makes the vow. But there was another class of vows which were of a more disinterested character; the most striking here would be the Nazirite vow, according to which a man undertook to lead a strenuously austere life, which was supposed to be due to the simple life of the patriarchs: that was done out of protest against the current mode of life, which had been largely adopted from the Canaanites; indeed, the Nazirite vow implied, and was intended to be, a greater loyalty to Jahweh.

There are two words in Hebrew for a vow—though they do not necessarily correspond to the two ideas just mentioned: neder, which is a vow whereby a man dedicates something to God; 'isser, a vow by which a man binds himself to abstain from enjoyment, or to exercise self-denial, in honour of Jahweh.

Vows were clearly of very common occurrence in Israel. Indeed, it would almost seem as though at one time it was deemed generally incumbent on men to make vows; this would, at all events, explain the words in Dt 23:19. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin unto thee. A vow having once been made had to be kept at all costs (Dt 23:1-3, Nu 30:2-5); though, as regards women, they might be absolved by father or husband, under certain conditions, from fulfilling a vow (Nu 30:3-9). From the expression used in connexion with the making of a vow, "to bind the soul" (Nu 30:3), it would seem that the idea was that if the vow was broken the life was forfeited to the Deity to whom the vow had been made; the warning, therefore, of Pr 20:5, Ex 5:5 (4), was needed.

In making a vow in which something was promised to Jahweh only such things could be promised as were truly the property of the one who vowed; for this reason a man might not promise a firstling or the like, as that was already the property of Jahweh (cf. 1 S 27:27-28).

In later times the spirit in which vows were observed appears to have degenerated; Malachi speaks sternly of those who make a vow, and in fulfilling it sacrifice unto the Lord 'a blemished thing' (11). Another, and still worse, misuse of vows meets us in the Gospels: the spurious piety of some men induced them to vow gifts to the use of the sanctuary, but they neglected, in consequence, the most obvious duties of natural affection; when a man uttered the word 'Corban' in reference to any possession of his, it meant that it was dedicated to God. Money that should have been given to the support of aged parents was pronounced to be 'corban,' the son felt himself relieved of all further responsibility regarding his parents, and took honour to himself for having piously dedicated his substance to God (see Mt 15:16, Mk 7:19).

W. O. E. OSTERLEY.

VULGATE.—1. The position of the Latin Vulgate, as a version of the original texts of the Bible, has been dealt with in the two articles on the Text of the OT and the NT. But its interest and importance do not and ever. Just as the LXX, apart from its importance as evidence for the text of the OT, has a history as an integral part of the Bible of the Eastern Church, so also does the Vulgate deserve consideration as the Bible of the Church in the West. Although the English Bible, to which the reader is accustomed for nearly 300 years, is in the main a translation from the original Hebrew and Greek, it must be remembered that for the first thousand years of the English Church the Bible of this country, whether in Latin or in English, was the Vulgate. In Germany the conditions were much the same, with the difference that Luther's Bible was still more indebted to the Vulgate than was our AV; while in France, Italy, and Spain the supremacy of the Vulgate lasting to this day. In considering, therefore, the history of the Vulgate, we are considering the history of the Scriptures in the form in which they have been mainly known in Western Europe.

2. The textual articles above mentioned have shown that, when Jerome's Biblical labours were at an end, about a.d. 404, the Latin Bible as left by him was a very complex structure, the parts of which differed very considerably in their relations to the original Greek and Hebrew texts. The Canonical Books of the OT, except the Psalms, were Jerome's fresh translation from the Massoretic Hebrew. The Psalms were extant in three forms—(a) the Roman, Jerome' s slightly revised edition of the OL, which still held its own in a few churches; (b) the Gallican, his more fully revised version from the Hexaplar text of the LXX; and (c) the Vulgate, his new translation of the Massoretic text; of these it was the second, not the third, that was taken into general use. Of the deuterocanonical books, or Apocrypha, Judith and Tobit, with the additions to Daniel, were in Jerome's very hasty version; the remainder, which he had refused to touch (as not recognized by the Massoretic canon), continued to circulate in the OL. The Gospels were Jerome's somewhat conservative revision of the Massoretic text, which was a much more superficial revision of the same. The Latin Bible, therefore, which we know as the Vulgate was not wholly Jerome's work, still less did it represent his full and final views on the textual criticism of the Bible; and, naturally, it did not for a long time acquire the name of 'Vulgata.' The 'vulgata editio,' of which Jerome himself speaks, is primarily the Gr. LXX, and secondarily the OL as a translation of it. It is not until the 13th cent. that the epitaph is found applied to Jerome's version by Roger Bacon (who, however, also uses it of the LXX); and it was canonized, so to speak, by its use in the decree of the Council of Trent, which speaks of it as 'the only version.' By that time, however, it differed in many points of detail from the text which Jerome left behind him; and it is of the history of Jerome's version during this period of some twelve hundred years that it is proposed to speak in the present article.

3. Jerome's correspondence and the prefaces attached by him to the several books of his translation (notably those prefixed to the Pentateuch, Joshua, Ezra and Nehemiah, Job, Isaiah, and the Gospels) sufficiently show the reception given to his work by his contemporaries. He complains constantly and bitterly of the virulence of his critics, who charge him with deliberate perversion of Scripture, and refuse to make themselves acquainted with the conditions of his task. Especially was this the case with the OT. In the NT Jerome had restrained his correcting pen, and made alterations only when the sense required it. His ex temporaneus ut his tantum quae sensum videantur mutare corrects, religius manere pateremur ut fuerant' (Proef. ad Damasium); and though even these were sufficient to cause discontent among many readers, the openings given to adverse criticism were relatively insignificant. But in the case of the OT the basis of the OL rendering to which people were accustomed was the LXX, the differences of which from the Massoretic Hebrew are often very wide. When, therefore, readers found whole passages omitted or transposed, and the meanings of very many sentences altered beyond all recognition, they believed that violence was being done to the sacred text; nor were they prepared to admit as axiomatic the superiority of the Hebrew text to the Greek, the OT of the Jews to the OT of the Christians. Even Augustine, who is recommended as Jerome's model in the second part of the Gospels, questioned the expediency of the far-reaching changes made in the OT.

4. Nor was Jerome's translation assisted by authority to oust its predecessor. Never until 1546 was it officially adopted by the Roman Church to the exclusion of all rivals. It is true that the revision of the Gospels was undertaken at the instance of Pope Damasus, and was published under the sanction of his name; and the Gallican version of the Psalter was quickly and cordially adopted. But the new translation of the OT from the Hebrew had no such shadow of official authority. It was an independent venture of Jerome's, encouraged by his personal friends and financed by his own misers, with the strong weight of popular prejudice against it, and dependent for its success on the admission of its fundamental critical assumption of the superiority of the Hebrew to the Vulgar Latin text. He was, it must be wondered at if its progress in general favour was slow, and if its text was greatly modified before it reached the stage of universal acceptance.

5. There is no evidence that Jerome made use of occasional statements by ecclesiastical writers, and their ascertainable practice in Biblical quotations) is not sufficient to enable us to trace in detail the acceptance of Jerome's version in the various Latin-speaking countries. Gaul, as it was the first country to adopt the exclusion of all the Psalter, was also the first to accept the Vulgate as a whole, and in the 6th cent. the use of it appears to have been general there; but Gaul, it must be remembered, from the point of view of Christian literature was quickly and cordially mained to the provinces of the extreme south. Isidore of Seville, however, testifies to the general use of the Vulg. by all churches, as being alike more faithful and more popular than its predecessors. In the 7th cent. it is probable that its use was general among scholars. Victor of Capua, about 541, finding a Latin version of the Diatessaron according to the OL text, and being described as making it generally known, had it transcribed, with the substitution of the Vulg. for the OL. Gregory the Great (d. 604) used the Vulg. as the basis of his commentary on Job, but speaks of both versions as equal. Photius (d. 896) in the 9th cent., is said to have made a translation a dissero, sed ut comprobationem causa excit, non movit nonum veterum per testimonia assumo; ut, quia sedes Apostolica utraque utitur, mel quamquam ex eodem auctore fuisset (I. M. E. 193, 20). On the other hand, Primasius is evidence of the continued use of the OL in Africa; and a considerable number of the extant fragments of OL MSS are of the 6th cent., or later date (C. P. F. P. or MT, 202). In general it is probable that the old version was retained by the common people, and by such of the clergy as took little interest in questions of textual scholarship, long after it had been abandoned by scholars. In Switzerland, the Vulg. was never officially adopted in early times by the Roman Church, and was adopted gradually by its own merits. The continuance of the OL in secluded districts is illustrated by the fact that Cod. Colbertinum (c) was written as late as the 12th cent. in Languedoc, and Cod. Gigas (g of the Acts) in the 13th cent. in Bohemia.

6. Although this method of official non-intervention was necessary, in view of the fact that Jerome's version of the OT was a private venture, and one which provoked much hostile criticism, and although in the end the new translation gained the credit of a complete victory on its merits as the superior version for general use, nevertheless the price of these advantages was heavy. If the Vulgate had enjoyed from the first the protection of an official sanction, which Sixtus and Clement ultimately gave to the printed text, it would have come down to us in a simpler form. It is not unlikely the case. Under the actual conditions, it was peculiarly exposed to corruption, both by the ordinary mistakes of scribes and by contamination with the familiar OL. In some cases whole books or chapters in a Vulg. MS contain OL text; for some reason which is quite obscure, Mt. especially tended to remain in the earlier form. Thus Codd. q, r, s all have Mt. in OL, and the remaining Evv. in Vulg. Cod. Gigas is OL, in Acts and Apoc., Vulg. in the rest of the Bible.

7. During the 5th and 6th centuries, when Jerome's version was winning its way outwards from the centre of the Latin-speaking Church, the conditions over a large part of Western Europe were such that the Vulgate was fully occupied with the effort first to oppose and then to assimilate the heathen Frankish invaders; and even in the 6th it was a scene of almost perpetual war and internal struggles. Germany was almost a part of the thrones of the English conquest, and the ancient British Church was submerged, except in Wales and Ireland. Outside Italy, only Visigothic Spain (Arian, but still Christian) and Celtic Ireland were freely open at first to the access of the Scriptures; and in these two countries (cut off, as they subsequently were, from central Christendom by the Moorish invasion of Spain and the English conquest of Britain) the two principal types of text came into being, which, in various combinations with purer texts from Italy, are found in the different MSS which have come down to the present day. From the Visigothic kingdom the Spanish influences made their way northward into the heart of France. Irish missionaries carried the Bible first into southern Scotland, then into Northumbria, then into northern France and up the Rhine into Germany, penetrating even into Switzerland and Italy, and leaving traces of their handwork in MSS produced in all these countries. Meanwhile Rome was a constant centre of attraction and influence, and that from Italy there was an unceasing stream of travellers, and not least between Italy and distant Britain. These historical facts find their illustration in the Vulg. MSS extant, which can be connected with the various churches.

8. In the 6th and 7th centuries the priority of missionary zeal and Christian enterprise rested with the Irish Church; and in the latter part of the 7th and the first half of the 8th century, the Church of Northumbria was the centre of Christian enterprise, and added to the gifts which it had received from Iona a spirit of Christian scholarship which gave it for a time the first place in Christendom in this respect. In the production of this scholarship the arrival of the Anglo-Saxon school of Theodore of Tarsus as archbishop of Canterbury in 669 happily co-operated, if it was not a chief stimulus; for Theodore and his companions brought with them from Italy copies of the Latin Bible in a purer text than the Vulgate; and Ireland had been able to provide. There is clear evidence to show that the celebrated Lindisfarne Gospels (Y in 3P 961).
VULGATE

Wordsworth's numeration was copied from one of these MSS, and the same was probably the case with another Northern copy of the Gospels now in the British Museum (Royal 1 B v). The great Cod. Amiatinus (A) itself, the best single MS of the Latin Bible in existence, was written in Northumbria before 716, and must have been copied from MSS brought from Italy either by Theodore or by Ceolfrid of Jarrow, by whose order it was made. Other MSS (notably A and S), written in the north, are closely akin to these, and must be derived from the same source; and this whole group of MSS furnishes the best text of the Vulg. now available. The centres of English scriptoriums, and the place of the manuscripts which we now have, was due, were the twin monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, of which the most famous members were Ceolfrid and Bede; but their influence spread widely over Northumbria, and was reawakened in the more distant parts of England and western Europe.

9. To this renown it was due that, when a king at last arose in France with a desire to improve the religious education of his country, he turned to Northumbria for the necessary assistance to carry out his scheme. The king was Charlemagne, and the scholar whom he invited to help him was Alcuin of York; and the record of their joint achievement constitutes the next chapter in the history of the Vulgate. Alcuin came to France in 781, and was made master of the schools attached to Charlemagne's court at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen). He was subsequently made titular abbot of Tours, and in 790 he obtained leave to retire to that monastery, where he spent the nine remaining years of his life (d. 805) in establishing the school of calligraphy for which Tours was famous. His work in connexion with the Latin Bible falls into two stages, both in the earlier part of his life at Aix belong, in all probability, the beginning of a series of magnificently copied MSS of the Gospels, of which several have survived to the present day. Certainly, they date from about this period, though there are indications that the present text of the Vulgate exists, of which the Lindisfarne Gospels is the most eminent example. Prefixed to each Gospel is a portrait of the Evangelist (in the Byzantine style), a full page of elaborate decoration, and another containing the first words of the Gospel in highly ornamental illumination. The English MSS excel their French successors in elaboration and skill of workmanship, but the French MSS are far more numerous in existence, and it is from them that the Vulgate is derived. The MSS of the earlier part of the 9th cent. is often described as the 'Golden Gospels.'

10. The importance of the 'Golden Gospels' group of MSS is artistic rather than textual, and although their connexion is with Anglo-Celtic models is obvious, their connexion with Alcuin personally is only hypothetical. It is otherwise in both respects with another great group of MSS, which are directly due to the commission given by Charlemagne to Alcuin to reform the current text of the Vulgate. About the end of 796, Alcuin established the school of Tours, and sent to York for MSS to enable him to carry out his work. On Christmas Day of 801 he raised the king of a complete Bible, carefully revised. Several descendants of this Bible are still in existence, and enable us to judge of Alcuin's work. They differ from the 'Golden Gospels' in being complete Bibles, in being written in the beautiful small minuscule which at this time, under Charlemagne's influence, superseded the tortured and unsightly script of the Merovingian and Lombardic traditions, and of which Tours was one of the principal homes. The MS, which apparently was not much clearly derived from the original of Alcuin at the present day is the Cod. Valleliciana at Rome (Wordsworth's V); with this Wordsworth and White associate the 'Caroline Bible' (Add. MS 10540 [Wordsworth's K] in the British Museum), and there are some 8 or 10 other MSS (written mostly at Tours), besides several others containing the Gospels only, which in varying degrees belong to the same group. In text these MSS naturally show a great affinity to the Northern English MSS headlong cases, but there is no question that Alcuin introduced into France a far purer text of the Vulgate than any which it had hitherto possessed.

11. Alcuin's attempt, however, was not the only one made in France at this period to reform the current Bible text. Another edition was almost simultaneously produced in western France by Theodulf, bishop of Orleans and abbot of the monastery of Fleury, in the British Museum, which are closely akin to the Paris MS, but follow sometimes its first and sometimes its second reading; the latter (especially in its corrections) was more influential in his native country, and may probably have been a model for the Paris MS to represent the Theodulfian edition. All are written in an extremely minute Caroline minuscule.

12. In spite, however, of the labour spent upon these attempts to improve the current text of the Vulgate, the forces of deterioration were more powerful than those of renovation. Theodulf's edition, which was a private venture, without the advantages of Imperial patronage, had no wide sphere of influence, and left no permanent mark on the text of the Vulgate. Alcuin's had, no doubt, much greater authority and effect; yet its influence was only transient, and even at Tours itself the MSS produced within the next two generations show a progressive departure from his standard. On the other hand, the study of the Scriptures was now definitely implanted on the Continent, and the number of copies of them produced in France and Germany shows a great increase. During the 9th cent. splendid copies of the 'Golden Gospels' continued to be produced in the valley of the Rhine, and Alcuinian texts at Tours; while a new centre of Scripture study and reproduction came into existence in Switzerland, at the famous abbey of St. Gall. The library and scriptorium of this monastery (many of the inmates of which were English or Irish monks) first became notable under abbot Gozbert (816-836), and perhaps reached its height of its influence under abbot Hartmut (872-883). Many copies of the Bible were written there, and the influence of St. Gall permeated a large portion of central Europe. Here, too, was produced by Walfridus Strabo, dean of St. Gall, before 842, the original form of the Glosa Ordinaria, the standard commentary on the Bible in the Middle Ages.

13. After Alcuin and Theodulf no important edition was made to recover the original text of the Vulgate, though some attempt in this direction was made by Lanfranc, of which no traces seem to survive; but the history of its diffusion can to some extent be followed by the help of the extant MSS, which now begin to increase greatly in number. The tradition of the 'Golden Gospels' was carried into Germany, where copies of the Gospels were produced on a smaller scale, with less ornamentation, and in a rather heavily Caroline minuscule, which were eventually the direct ancestors of the MSS which exist in France itself, too, the later representatives of this school are inferior in size and execution to their predecessors. Spain and Ireland had by this time ceased to be of primary importance in the circulation of Bible texts.
VULGATE

In England a new departure was made, on a higher scale of artistic merit, in the fine Gospels and Service-Books produced at Winchester between about 960 and 1060, the characteristic feature of which was the broad bands of gold forming a framework with interlaced foliage. These details, however, relate more to the art than to that of the Bible, and with regard to the spread of the knowledge of the Scriptures there is nothing important to note. In the 10th and 11th cent., beyond the increase of monasteries in all the countries of Western Europe, in the scriptoria of which the multiplication of copies proceeded apace.

14. In the 12th cent., the most noteworthy phenomenon, both in England and on the Continent, is the popularity of annotated copies of the various books of the Bible. The ordinary arrangement is for the Bible text to occupy a single narrow column down the centre of the page, while on either side of it is the commentary; but where the commentary is scanty, the Biblical column expands to fill the space, and vice versa. The main staple of the commentary is normally the Glossa Ordinaria; but this, being itself a compilation of extracts from pre-existing commentaries (Jerome, Augustine, Isidore, Bede, etc.), lent itself readily to expansion or contraction, so that different MSS differ notably only in their proportions. Many of the books of the Bible generally form separate MSS, or small groups of them are combined. Meanwhile with these, some very large Bibles were produced, highly illuminated and enriched with gold and silver, and in these the best examples come from England or northern France. These are of the nature of éditions de luxe, while the copies with commentaries testify to the extent to which the Bible was at this time quoted at any rate in the larger monasteries; and the catalogues of monastic libraries which still exist confirm this impression by showing what a large number of such annotated MSS were preserved in them, no doubt for the study of the monks.

15. A further step in advance was taken in the 13th cent., which is to be attributed apparently to the influence of the University of Paris then at the height of its renown and the intellectual centre of Europe. The present chapter division of the Bible text is said to have been first made by Stephen Langton (archbishop of Canterbury, 1207–1228), while a doctor at Paris; and the 13th cent. (probably under the influence of St. Louis) witnessed a remarkable output of Vulgate MSS of the complete Bible. Histerto complete Bibles had almost always been very large volumes, suitable only for public use; but here we find them on thin vellum and very small writing; it was now found possible to compress the whole Bible into volumes of quite moderate size, comparable with the ordinary printed Bibles of to-days. For example, one such volume, containing the whole Bible with ample margins, measures 5½ x 3½ inches, and consists of 471 leaves. From the appearance of these Bibles (hundreds of which are still extant) it is evident that they were intended for private use, and they testify to a remarkable growth in the personal study of the Scriptures. The texts of these MSS seem to embody the results of a revision at the hands of the Paris doctors. Correctoria, or collections of improved readings, were issued at Paris about 1230, and at other places during this cent., the best being the 'Correctorium Vaticanum,' so called from a MS in the Vatican Library. This revision, however, was superfluous, as the text itself was already of great importance in the history of the Vulgate mainly because it established the normal text which was current at the time of the invention of printing. These small Bibles were produced almost as plentifully in England as in France, and in an identical style, which continued well into the 14th cent.

16. After the Parisian revision of the 13th cent. no important modification of the text or status of the Latin Bible took place until the invention of printing two centuries later. The first book to be printed in Europe was the Latin Bible, published in 1458 by Gutenberg and Fust (now popularly known as the Mazarin Bible, from the circumstance that the first copy of it to attract notice in modern times was that in the library of Cardinal Mazarin). In type this Bible resembles the contemporary large German Bible MSS; in text it is the ordinary Vulgate of the 15th cent., but the next century Bibles poured from the press, but with little or no attempt at revision of the text. Some MSS were consulted in the preparation of the Complutensian Polyglot; but only the Bibles published before the middle of the 16th cent. which deserve the name of Vulgate are those of Stephanus in 1540 and Hentenius in 1547, which laid the foundations of the modern printed Vulgate. It is, however, to the action of the Council of Trent that the genesis of this authority is ultimately due. Soon after its meeting, in 1546, a decree was passed declaring that the 'vetus et vulgata editio' of the Scriptures was to be accepted as authentic, and that it should be printed in most accurate form possible. It was forty years, however, before this decree bore fruit. Sixtus V., in his short pontificate of five years (1585–90), not only caused the production of an edition of the Greek text (1587), but, in 1589, caused a Latin Bible which he declared was to be accepted as the authentic edition demanded by the Council of Trent. This edition was the work of a board of revisers appointed for the purpose, but this board itself existed only a short time, and the results before they were published, and introduced a large number of alterations (rarely for the better) on his own authority. The Sixtine edition, however, had hardly been issued when the new Pope, Clement VIII, in 1602, at the instance of the Jesuits, with whom Sixtus had quarrelled; and in the same year a new edition was issued under the authority of Clement, with a preface by the famous Jesuit Bel- larmine, in which (to avoid the appearance of a conflict between Popes) the suppression of the Sixtine edition is falsely stated to be due to the abundance in it of printers' errors, and to have been contemplated by Sixtus himself. The Clementine revisers in many instances restored the readings of Sixtus' board, which Sixtus himself had altered; and the general result of their labours was to produce a text resembling that of Hentenius, while the Sixtine edition was nearer to that of Stephanus. The bull by which the Clementine edition was promulgated forbade any future alteration of the text and any printing of various readings in the margin, and thereby secured (though at the cost of the official text of the Vulgate from that day until this).

17. Clement's bull practically closed the textual criticism of the Vulgate in the Roman Church, though Valla was able to print a new text in 1555 at the request of the works of St. Jerome in 1534, and Vercellone published a collection of various readings in 1860–64. The course of criticism outside the Roman communion can be briefly sketched. Bentley, with the help of his assistants, made large collections for an edition of the Vulgate, but was unable to carry through his task. Lachmann, in the second edition of his Greek NT (1842–50), added a text of the Vulgate, based on a collation of the Cod. Amiatinus and a few other MSS. Orsen in 1855 printed a revised text of Gal. as a sample of a new NT, but has carried his enterprise no further, being perhaps deterred by the appearance of the great Oxford edition now in progress. This edition, planned by Bishop J. Wordsworth of Salisbury, and carried out by him with the assistance of the Rev. H. J. White and others, gives a revised text of the Vulgate with a full critical apparatus and introductions. The four Gospels and Acts have now appeared (1889–1905); it is to be hoped that nothing will prevent the completion of the entire work, which will establish the criticism of at least the Vulg. NT on a firm foundation. A very handy text of the NT, with Wordsworth and White's variants in the margin, has been produced by E. Nestle (1907). Quite recently it has been announced that Pusey Plus x has entrusted the Benedictine order with the revision of the Vulgate text. It is satisfactory to know that they propose to devote themselves in the first instance to the OT.

WALLS.—In Palestine the principal cities were protected by surrounding walls, sometimes of great size. That of Gezer, for instance, was fourteen feet thick. These walls were built of stones, set in mud, or else of brick. The walls of houses were generally ill-built structures of the same materials. The choice of material varied with the locality; Lachish (Tell el-Hesay), for example, was almost entirely a brick town; in Gezer brick is the exception. See also artt. CRV.; ENCLOSURE, § 1; HOUSES, §§ 13-14. For the walls of Jerusalem, which may be taken as typical of a city wall, see JERUSALEM.

WAR.—1. In the days before the monarchy the wars of the Hebrew tribes must have resembled those of early Greece, when 'the two armies started out, marched till they met, had a fight and went home.' Rarely, as in the case of the campaign against Sicer (Jg 4), it was necessary to summon a larger army from several tribes. From the days of Saul and David, with their long struggle against the Philistines, war became the affair of the whole nation, leading, also, to the establishment of a standing army, or at least of the nucleus of one (see ARMY). In the reign of Solomon we hear of a complete organization of the kingdom, which undoubtedly served a more serious purpose than the providing of 'victuals for the king and his household' (1 K 4).

Early spring, after the winter rains had ceased, was 'the time when kings go out to battle' (2 S 111). The war-horn (RV 'trumpet'), sounded from village to village on their hilltops, was in all periods the call to arms (Jg 69, 1 S 139, 2 S 28). How far the exemptions from military service specified in Dt 20 were in force under the kings is unknown; the first express attestation is 1 Mac 39.

2. War, from the Hebrew point of view, was essentially a religious duty, begun and carried through under the highest sanctions of religion. Israel's war of old were 'the wars of J' (Nu 21:4), and was not Jahuw Tabaduth, especially 'the God of Israel's battle-array' (1 S 17:44). His presence with the host was secured by the 'ark of J' accompanying the army in the field (2 S 11:11, cf. 1 S 4:19). As an indispensable preliminary, therefore, of every campaign, the soldiers 'sanctified' themselves by ablutions, and other observances preparatory to offering the usual sacrifices (1 S 20:21). The men thus became God's 'consecrated ones' (1 S 13:1 RV), and to open a campaign is in Heb. phrase 'to consecrate war' (Jg 3:2, Jer 6:9 etc.). It was 21 'anoint the shield' (cf. 2 S 13:21) is constantly taken to allude to a practice of smearing shields with oil, that hostile weapons might more readily glance off (see, for another explanation, Marit or Duhm, Jesaia, ad loc.).

To ascertain the propitious moment for the start, and indeed throughout the campaign, it was usual to 'enquire of the Lord' by means of the sacred lot (Jg 11, 1 S 23 and oft.), and in an age of more advanced religion, the gates of Bethau, / were a circle of priests, 14 months. Still later a campaign was opened with prayer and fasting (1 Mac 3:36). As regards the commissariat, it was probably usual, as in Greece to start with three days' provisions, the soldiers, for the rest, helping themselves from friends (cf. however, the voluntary gifts, 2 S 17:29), and foes. The arrangement by which 'ten men out of every hundred were told off to fetch victual for the people' (Jg 7:18) is first met with in a later document.

As the army advanced, scouts were sent out to ascertain the enemy's position and strength (Jg 1:36 [AV 'spies', RV 'watchers'], 1 S 26:4, 1 Mac 549). Where there were no scouts, we may call them spies (so Jos 2:16, RV 2 S 15:14, 1 Mac 12:9; cf. Gideon's exploit, Jg 7:13).

Little is known of the camps of the Heb. armies. The men were sheltered in tents and booths (2 S 11:11, 1 S 4:11, this reference, however, is to a lengthy siege). The general commanding probably had a more elaborate 'pavilion' (1 K 20:4, 5, see Targ.) The obscure term 'pavilion' in 1 Mac is derived from a root which justifies us in supposing that the Hebrew camps were round, rather than square. Of the 20 Assyrian camps represented on the bronze plates of the gates of Balawat, 4 are circular, 14 almost square, and 2 have their long sides straight and their short sides curved outwards. Two gates are represented at opposite ends, between which a broad road divides the camp into two almost equal parts (Billing- beck u. Deltitzsch, Die Palastinens Solmansi, II [1908], 104). The Hebrews divided the night into three watches (Jg 7:1, 1 S 11:11).

The tactics of the Hebrew generals were as simple as their strategy. Usually the 'battle was set in array' by the opposing forces being drawn up in line facing each other. At a given signal, each side raised its battle-cry (Jg 7:19, Am 1:4, Jer 4:19) as it rushed to the fray, for the wild slogs of former days, the Ironides of the Jewish Cromwell, Judas the Maccabbeus, substituted prayer (1 Mac 5:8) and the singing of Psalms (2 Mac 12:7). It was a common practice for a general to divide his forces in three divisions (Jgs 7:18, 1 S 11:1, 2 S 18:6, 1 Mac 5:8). A favourite place of tactics was to pretend flight, and by leaving a body of men in ambush, to fall upon the unwary pursuers in front and rear (Jos 8, Jg 20:9). As examples of more elaborate tactics may be cited Judah's handling of his troops before Rabbath-ammon (2 S 10:11), and Benhadad's massing of his chariots at the battle of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22:29); the campaign of Judas Maccabaeus would repay a special glance (39) this point of view. The recall was sounded on the war-horn (2 S 2:11 18:20).

5. The tender mercies of the victors in those days were cruel, although the treatment which the Hebrews meted out to their enemies was, with few exceptions (e.g. 2 K 15:16), not to be compared to what Benzinger only too aptly describes as 'the Assyrian devilities.' It is one of the greatest blots on our RV that 2 S 12:4 should still read J as it does, instead of as in the margin (see Cent. Bible, in loc.). The Hebrew wars, as has been said, were the wars of J', and to J' of right belonged the population of a conquered city (see 2 Sam.). Even the humane Deutoronomical Code spares only the women and children (20:13). The captives were mostly sold as slaves. A heavy war indemnity or a yearly tribute was imposed on the conquered people (2 K 5:30).

The booty fell to the victorious soldiery, the leaders receiving a special share (Jg 8:26, 1 S 30:26). The men 'that tarried by the stuff'—in other words, who were left behind as a camp-guard—shared equally with their comrades 'who went down to the battle' (1 S 30:4), a law first introduced by David, but afterwards characteristically assigned to Moses, Nu 31:31. The returning warriors were welcomed home by the women with dance and song (Ex 15:21, Jos 11:18, 1 S 18:1 etc.). The piety of the Maccabean age found a more fitting expression in a service of thanksgiving (1 Mac 4). See also ARMY, ARMOUR, ARMS, FORTIFICATION AND STRATEGER, J. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF THE Work quoted in Nu 21:14 to settle a point with regard to the boundary of Moab and Ammon. The quotations in wv 15, 16, 27-40 are probably from the same original. This is the only mention of the book in the OT. It is not likely that the work is identical with the Book of Jashar. It probably consisted of a collection of songs celebrating the victories of Israel over their neighbours. The song in Ex 15:15 describing the Lord as 'a man of war' has been thought to be derived from it. The date of the work is unknown. As it deals with the heroic age, it likely originated in the period immediately following, and it has been dated in the reign of Omri (Stade), and by others as early as the time of David or Solomon. If Nu 21:1-20 refer to the wars of Omri, we must regard the work as a product of the N. kingdom. W. F. BORD.

WATER OF BITTERNESS

It is held a meritorious act to set a vessel of water by the wayside for the refreshment of the wayfarer. The same right does not extend to flocks (Gen 24:15), for which water must often be purchased. Use and wont have established certain regulations for the watering of animals, infringement of which frequently costs strife (Gen 20:3b, Ex 23:19; cf. Gen 26:25 etc.). The art of irrigation (wh. see) was employed in ancient days (Ps 11:55b, Ezek 17:22 etc.), and reached its fullest development in the Roman period. To this time also belong many vast, and even massless aqueducts, leading water to the cities from distant sources.

Cisterns and springs are not common property. Every considerable house has a cistern, or pit, roofed and adjoining areas. Importance is attached to plunging in the buckets by which the water is drawn up, this preventing stagnation. The springs, and cisterns made in the open country, are the property of the local family or tribe, from whom water, if required in any quantity, must be bought. The mouth of the well is usually covered with a great stone. Drawing of water for domestic purposes is almost exclusively the work of women (Gen 24:14, Jn 4:16 etc.). In crossing the desert, water is carried in 'bottles' of skin (Gen 21:15).

The 'living,' i.e. 'flowing' water of the spring is generally preferred to the 'dead' water of the cistern, and is always referred to for the vitalizing influence of God's grace (Jer 2:2, Zec 14:1, Jn 4:16 etc.). Many Scripture references show how the cool, refreshing, fertilizing qualities of water are prized in a thirsty land (Ps 25:7, 47:1, Jer 15:17, Lk 16:12 etc.). Water is furnished to wash the feet and hands of a guest (Lk 7:7). To pour water on the hands is the office of a servant (2 K 3:4). The sudden spates of the rainy season are the symbol of danger (Ps 18:32, 32:2, 28:7 etc.), and their swift passing symbolizes life's transiency (Job 11:14, Ps 88:9).

Water is also the symbol of weakness and instability (Gen 49:21, Ezek 21:17 etc.). Cf. City: Jerusalem, I. 4. For Water's see New Testament, E.

WAY.—1. OT usage.—(a) O of a road or journey (1 S 6:11, 2 K 3:8, Jer 2:8). (b) Figuratively, of a course of conduct or character (Job 17:8 Ps 91:11), either in a good sense as approved by God (Dt 31:16, Ps 91:11), or in a bad sense of man's own choosing (Ps 138:8, Is 65:3, Jer 18:11). (c) Of the way of Jehovah, His creative power (Job 29:1), His moral rule and commandments (Job 21:4, Ps 18:32, Ps 81:9).

2. NT usage.—(a) In the literal sense (Mt 4:16, Ac 8:3). (b) Figuratively, as in OT of human conduct, or God's purpose for man (Mt 11:13, Ac 14:14, Ro 11:1, 1 Co 4:7, Js 3:20). But the gospel greatly enriched the ethical and religious import of the word. Though Jesus was addressed as one who taught 'the way of God in truth' (Mt 22:16), He Himself claimed to show the way to the Father because He is 'the Way, the Truth, and the Life' (Jn 14:6). By Him 'the two worlds were united' (Westcott). This is equivalent to the Apostolic doctrine that Christ is the gospel (Mk 1:1, Ro 15:5). In Ho 10:10 there is the similar thought that Jesus by His life, death, and exaltation has opened the way whereby men may sin the holy presence of God, and enables them also to walk therein. In Acts 'the Way' is used with the distinctive meaning of the Christian faith and manner of life, which is the only 'way' that leads to salvation (Acts 19:8, 24:9).

This is the 'way of the Lord' so often referred to in the OT, of which Jesus became the final and perfect revealer. The development of the conception may be traced in Ac 10:16, 18, 22, 23.

WAYMARK.—In Jer 31:1 (29 'the virgin of Israel' is called on to set up waymarks and make guide-posts to mark the way for the returning exiles. The Heb. word tr. 'waymark' apparently means a small stone pillar, similar to our milestones, with an indication of routes and distances.

WEALTH.—This word is used in Scripture occasionally in the Elizabethan and praiseworthy sense of 'well-being' (e.g. 1 S 2:5, Est 10:5 etc.), but generally in the more usual sense of affluent possessions (e.g. Gn 34:30, Dt 8:12, Ac 1:28 etc.).

1. Palestine is described in Dt 8:8 as rich not only in cereal but also in mineral wealth; but this may be a description more poetical than literal. It is, however, frequently spoken of as 'flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 33:1, etc. etc.)—products which were in ancient times considered the marks of fertile lands. The wealth of Israel increased as the country developed; and under the monarchy it reached its height. The increased prosperity was not, however, lead to increased wastfulness. If in the times of Israel 'full of silver and gold,' it was also 'full of idols' (Is 2:19); the ruling classes oppressed the poor (S, Mic 6:10), drunkenness (Is 3, Mic 2:13) and audacity of treatment (Is 5:21). The nation's wealth was followed upon the Exile had been removed before the birth of our Lord, as exemplified by the magnificent buildings of Herod. Throughout the OT and NT wealth is said to increase or decrease, and the limitation of power and transfer of wealth were realized (Ps 49; cf. 37:7, 31:20, Jer 2:12 etc.). In the NT the problem does not present itself so keenly; as, in the full belief of a future life, the difficulty resolved itself. But the general conductiveness of virtue to earthly prosperity is inculcated: we are taught that godliness is profitable for this life as well as for that which is to come (1 Tm 4:8; cf. Mt 6:6, Mk 12:24).

Our Lord's position regarding wealth must be deduced from His practice and teaching. As regards His practice, it is clear that, until He commenced His ministry, He obtained His livelihood by labour, toiling as a carpenter in Nazareth (Mk 6:3). During His ministry, He and the Twelve formed a family with a common purse. This store, composed, no doubt, of the personal property of those of their number who originally had wealth, was replenished by gifts of many attached disciples (Lk 5:14). From it necessary food was purchased and the poor were relieved (Jn 4:13). Christ and His Apostles as a band, therefore, owned private property. When our Lord dispatched the Twelve on a special tour for preaching and healing, and when He sent the Seventy on a similar errand, He commanded them to take with them neither money nor food (Mt 10:9, Lk 10:4); but these were special instructions on special occasions, and doubtless on their return to Him the former system of a common purse was reverted to (cf. Lk 22:35).

As regards Christ's teaching, it is important to balance those sayings which appear to be hostile to any possession of wealth, with those which point in the other direction. On the one hand, we find Him bidding a young rich man sell his all and give to the poor (Mk 10:21), and then telling His disciples that it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God. He pictures a possessor of increasing wealth hearing God say, 'Thou foolish one, this night is thy soul required of thee' (Lk 12:20); He follows beyond the grave the histories of a rich man and a beggar, placing the rich man in a 'place of torment' and the poor man in Abraham's bosom (Lk 16:22). But there is the other side; for we find that He sympathized deeply with those entering poverty, assuring their Father's care (Mt 6:25), praying especially to them the gospel (Mt 11:28), and pronouncing upon them in their sorrows a special benediction (Lk 6:22). He showed that He desired that all should have a sufficiency, by bidding all, rich and poor alike, pray for 'daily bread.' If He taught that riches were indeed an obstacle to entrance into the Kingdom of God, He also taught that it was the 'few' (whether rich or poor) that succeeded in entering it (Mt 21:8). If He told one young man to sell all that he had, clearly He did not intend this counsel to be applicable to all, for He assured of 'salvation' Zacchaeus, who gave but the half of his goods to the poor (Lk 19:3). If the builder of large barns is termed the 'foolish one,' His folly is shown not to have been mere acquisition of wealth, but that acquisition apart from riches 'toward God' (Lk 12:19); and if Dives is in Hadès, it is evident that it is not there merely because of his riches, for Lazarus lies in the bosom of Abraham, the typical rich Jew. Further, in the parables of the Pounds and the Talents (Lk 19:14, Mt 25:14) He teaches, under the symbolism of money, that men are not stewards but stewards of the times; while in the parable of the Unjust Steward He points out one of the true uses of wealth—namely, to relieve the poor, and so to insure a welcome from them when the eternal tabernacles are entered (Lk 16:11).

From the foregoing we may conclude that, while our Lord realized that poverty brought sorrow, He also realized that wealth contained an intense peril to spiritual life. He came to raise the world from the material to the spiritual; and wealth, as the very token of the material and temporal, was blinding men to the spiritual and eternal. He therefore urged those to whom it was a sport, or to resign it altogether; and charged all to regard it as something for the use of which they would be held accountable.

4. In the Apostolic Church, in its earliest days, we find Ber members having 'all things common,' and that was used to supply the wants of their brethren (Ac 2:464:31-35). But this active enthusiasm does not necessarily show that the Church thought the personal possession of wealth, in itself, unlawful or undesirable; for the case of Ananias clearly indicates that the right to the possession of private property was not questioned (Ac 5:1-3). Later in the history of the Church we find St. James inveighing against the proud and grasping rich (Ja 2:1-5:4), and St. Paul warning men of the spiritual dangers incident to the procuring or possessing of wealth (1 Ti 6:9, 10, 17-19; cf. Rev 3:17). CHARLES T. F. GRIEISON.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—Since the most important of all ancient Oriental systems of weights and measures, the Babylonian, seems to have been based on a unit of length (the measures of capacity and weight being scientifically derived therefrom), it is reasonable to deal with the measures of length before proceeding to measures of capacity and weight. At the same time it seems probable that the measures of length in use in Palestine were based on a more primitive, and (so far as we know) unscientific system, which is to be connected with Egypt. The Babylonian system associated with Oudea (c. n.c. 3000), on statuses of whom a scale, indicating a cubit of 30 digits or 19 1/2 inches, has been found engraved, was not adopted by the Hebrews.

I. MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The Hebrew unit was a cubit (§ of a reed, Ezk 40:5), containing 2 spans or 6 palms or 24 finger's breadths. The early system did not recognize the foot or the fathom. Measurements were taken both by the 6-cubit rod or reed and the line or 'fillet' (Ezk 40:9, Jer 31:18; 52:21, 1 K 7:21).

The ancient Hebrew literary authorities for the early Hebrew cubit are as follows. The 'cubit of a man' (Dt 3:4) was the unit by which the 'bedstead' of Og, king of Bashan, was measured (cf. Rev 21:17). This implies that at those times (apparently not long before the time of Ezekiel) the Hebrews were familiar with more than one cubit, of which that in question was the ordinary working cubit. Solomon's Temple was laid out on the basis of a cubit 'after the first (or ancient) measure' (2 Ch 3:3). Now Ezekiel (40:4232) prophesies the building of a Temple on a unit which he describes as a cubit and a hand's breadth, i.e. § of the ordinary cubit. As in his vision he is practically reproducing Solomon's Temple, we may infer that Solomon's cubit, i.e. the ancient cubit, was also § of the ordinary cubit of Ezekiel's time. We thus have an ordinary cubit of 6, and what we may call (by analogy with the Egyptian system) the royal cubit of 7 hand's breadths. For this double system is curiously parallel to the Egyptian, in which there was a common cubit of 0.450 m. or 17 7/16 in., which was § of the royal cubit of 0.525 m. or 20 67/64 in. (Egyptian data are derived from actual measuring rods). A similar distinction between a common and a royal norm existed in the Babylonian weight-system. Its object there was probably to give the government an advantage in the ease of taxation; probably also in the case of measures of length the excess of the royal over the common measure had a similar object.

We have at present no means of ascertaining the exact dimensions of the Hebrew ordinary and royal cubits. The balance of evidence is certainly in favour of a fairly close approximation to the Egyptian system. The estimates vary from 16 to 25-2 inches. They are based on: (1) the Siloam inscription, which says: 'The waters flowed from the outlet to the Pool 1200 cubits,' or, according to another reading, '1000 cubits.' The length of the canal is estimated at 537-6 m., which yields a cubit of 0.527 m. or 20-67 in. (Egyptian data are derived from actual measuring rods). Another uncertainty is occasioned by the possibility of the number 1200 or 1000 being only a round number. The evidence of the Siloam inscription is thus of a most unsatisfactory kind. (2) The measurements of tombs. Some of these appear to be constructed on the basis of the Egyptian cubit; others seem to yield cubits of 0.575 m. (about 22-6 in.) or 0.641 m. (about 25-2 in.). The last two cubits seem to be improbable. The measurements of another tomb (known as the Tomb of Joshua) seem to confirm the deduction of the cubit of about 0.525 m. (3) The measurement of grains of barley. This has been objected to for more than one reason. But the Rabbinical tradition allowed 144 barley grains of medium size, laid side by side, to the cubit; and it is remarkable that a recent careful attempt made on these lines resulted in a cubit of 17.77 in. (0.451 m.), which is the Egyptian common cubit recently it has been pointed out that Josephus, when using Jewish measures of capacity, etc., which differ from the Greek or Roman, is usually careful to give an explanation relating the measures to his Greek or Roman readers. While, in the case of the cubit he does not do so, but seems to regard the Hebrew and the Roman-Attic as practically the same. The Roman-Attic cubit (1/2 ft.) is fixed at 0.444 m. or 17.57 in., and we have here a close approximation to the Egyptian common cubit. Probably in Josephus' time the Hebrew common cubit was, as ascertained by the methods mentioned above, 0.450 m.; and the difference between this and the Attic-Roman was regarded by him as negligible for ordinary purposes. (5) The Mishna. No data of any value for the exact determination of the cubit are to be obtained from this source. Four cubits is given as the length of a loculus in a rock-cut tomb; it has been pointed out that, allowing some 2 inches for the bier, and taking 5 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 8 in. as the average height of the Jewish body, this gives 4 cubits = 5 ft. 10 in., or 175 in., to the cubit. On the cubit in Herod's Temple, see A. R. S. Kennedy in Art. Temple (p. 902), and in Art. In Ezy T xx. (1908), p. 24 ff.

The general inference from the above five sources of information is that the Jews had two cubits, a shorter and longer, corresponding closely to the Egyptian common and royal cubit. The equivalents are expressed in the following table:

Parts and multiples of the unit.—The ordinary parts of the cubit have already been mentioned. They occur as follows: finger's breadth or digit (Jer 53:1, 1 K 53), palm (or hand's breadth) (1 K 73), Ezek 42:41 43:21, etc.); the comb (Ex 28:30 39), etc.). A special measure is the gūnān, which was the length of the sword of Elhad (2 K 17), and is not mentioned elsewhere. It was explained by the commentators as a short cubit (hence EV 'cubit'), and it has been suggested that it was the cubit of 5 palms, which is mentioned by Rabbi Judah. The Greeks also had a short cubit, known as the pugyn, of 5 palms, the distance from the elbow to the first joint of the fingers. The rēd (6 cubits) is the only definite OT multiple of the cubit (Ex 40:5). This is the akatina of the Greek writers. The pace of 2 2/3 ([3] probably is probably correct and is a definite measure. A 'little way' (Gen 33:48, 2 K 52) is also indefinite. Syr. and Arab. translators compared it with the parasang, but it cannot merely for that reason be regarded as fixed. A day's journey (Num 13:21) 1 K 10, Jer 49:19, Lk 24) and its multiples (Gen 30:10, Nu 10:3) are of course also variable.

The Sabbath day's journey (Ac 15°) was usually computed at 3000 cubits. This was the distance by which the Jews preserved the rest of the Sabbath; it is consequently presumed that this distance might be covered on the Sabbath, since the host must be allowed to attend worship at the ark. The distance was doubled by a legal fiction: on the eve of the Sabbath, food was placed at a spot 2000 cubits on, and this new place thus became the traveller's place within the meaning of the prescription of Ex 16°; there were also other means of increasing the distance. The Mt. of Olives was distant a Sabbath's day's journey from Jerusalem, and the same distance is given by Josephus as 5 stadia, thus confirming the 3000 cubits of computation. But in the Talmud the Sabbath day's journey is equated with 5000 cubits or 75 furlongs; and the measure 'three-score furlongs' of Lk 24, being an exact multiple of this distance, seems to indicate that this may have been one form (the earlier?) of the Sabbath day's journey.

In later times, a Byzantine writer of uncertain date, Julian of Ascalon, furnishes information as to the measures in use in Palestine (Provincial measures, derived from the work of the architect Julian of Ascalon, from the laws or customs prevailing in Palestine), is the title of the table), from this we obtain (omitting doubtful points) the following:

1. The finger's breadth.
2. The palm = 4 finger's breadths.
3. The cubit = 2 palms = 6 finger's breadths.
4. The pace = 2 cubits = 3 feet = 12 palms.
5. The fathom = 2 palms = 4 cubits = 6 feet.
6. The reed = 14 palms = 6 cubits = 36 palms.
7. The plethron = 10 reeds = 15 fathoms = 30 palms = 60 cubits = 90 feet.
8. The stadium or furlong = 6 plethrons = 60 reeds = 100 fathoms = 200 palms = 600 cubits.
9. (a) The milon or mile, according to Eratosthenes and Strabo = 84 stadia = 834 (fathoms. (b) The milon 'according to the present use' = 73 stadia = 750 fathoms = 1500 palms = 3000 cubits.
10. The present milon of 73 stadia = 750 'geometric fathoms = 834' simple fathoms; for 9 geometric fathoms = 10 simple fathoms.

We may justifiably assume that the 3000 cubits of 9 (9) are the royal cubits of 0.525 m. The geometric and simple measures according to Julius thus work out as follows:

Measures of area.—For smaller measures of area, there seem to have been no special names, the dimensions of the sides of a square being usually stated. For land measures, two methods of computation were in use. (1) The first, as in most countries, was to state area in terms of the amount that a yoke of oxen could plough in a day (cf. the Latin juropan). Thus in 1 K 15° (possibly also in the corrupt 1 S 14°) we have '10 yokes' (timed) of vineyard. Although definite authority is lacking, we may perhaps equate the Hebrew yoke of land to the Egyptian unit of land measure, which was 100 royal cubits square (0.2546 hectares or 0.6618 acre). The Greeks called this measure the aroura. (2) The second measure was the amount of seed required to sow an area. Thus 'the sowing of a homer of barley' was computed at the price of 50 shekels of silver (Lv 27:41). The dimensions of the trench which Elías dug about his altar (1 K 18°) have also recently been explained on the same principle; the trench (i.e. the area enclosed by it) is described as being 'like a house of two seams of seed' (AV and EV wrongly 'as great as would contain two measures of seed'). This measure 'house of two seams' is the standard measurement in the Mishna, and is defined as the area of the court of the Tabernacle, or 100 X 50 cubits (c. 1648 sq. yds. or 1372.9 hectares). Other measures of capacity were used in the same way, and the system was Babylonian in origin; there are also traces of the same system in the West, under the Roman Empire.
WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

II. MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

The terms 'handful' (Lv 27) and the like do not represent any part of a system of measures in Hebrew, any more than in English. The Hebrew 'measure' par excellence was the seah, Gr. σωλων. From the Greek version of Is 59, Gr. κεραμίον ('chasam') and other sources we know that the ephah contained 3 such measures. Euphænus describes the seah or Hebrew modius as a modius of extra size, and as equal to 1½ Roman modius = 30 sextarii. Josephus, however, equates it with 1½ Roman modius = 24 sextarii. An anonymous Greek fragment agrees with this, and so also does Jerome in his commentary on Mt 13:4. Euphænus elsewhere, and other writers, equate it with 22 sextarii (the Bab. ephah is computed at 66 sextarii). The seah was used for both liquid and dry measure.

The ephah (the word is suspected of being Egyptian origin) of 3 seahs was used for dry measure only; the equivalent liquid measure was the bath (Gr. βάθος, baθos, keramion, choïnix). They are equated in Ezek 45:1, each containing 3 x of a homer. The ephah corresponds to the Gr. artibos (although in Is 59 six artabai go to a homer) or metretes. Josephus equates it to 72 sextarii. The bath was divided into tenths (Ezek 45:14), the name of which is unknown; the ephah likewise into tenths, which were called 'omer or 'issarom (distinguish from homera = 3 ephahs). Again the ephah and bath were both divided into sixths (Ezek 45:15); the 1 bath was the hin, but the name of the 1 ephah is unknown.

The homer (Ezek 45:15, Hos 3:2) or cor (Ezek 45:4, Lk 10:2; Gr. κόρος) contained 10 ephahs or baths, or 30 seahs. (The term 'cor' is used more especially for liquids.) It corresponded to 10 Attic metretai (so Jos. Antiq. xii. 6, though he says medio by a slip). The word kor may be connected with the Bab. gur or gurru.

The reading lekhek which occurs in Hos 2:3, and by Vulgate and EV is rendered 'half a homer,' is doubtful. Euphænus says the lekhek is a large 'omer (pomer) of 15 modii.

The hin (Gr. heim) was a liquid measure = x seah. In Lv 19:29 the LXX renders it chous. But Josephus and Jerome and the Talmud equate it to 2 Attic chous = 10 sextarii. The hin was divided into halves, thirds, quarters, sixths, and twelfths (= log). In later times there were a 'sacred hin' = x of the ordinary hin, and a large hin = 2 sacred hins = x ordinary hin. ### Sextarlius

The sextarlius is disputed, and a capacity as high as 0.526 l. or 0.99 imperial pint is given for the sextarlius by an actually extant measure. This would give as the capacity of the ephah-bath 40-45 l. or 71-78 pints. But it is highly improbable that the equation of log to sextarlius was more than approximate. It is more easy to confound closely resembling measures of capacity than of length, area, or weight.

Other methods of ascertaining the capacity of the ephah are the following. We may assume that it was the same as the Babylonian unit of 0.505 l. (0.99 pint). This would give an ephah of 36.37 l., or nearly 8 gallons of 66.5 sextarlii of the usual assembr weight, and more or less quzsars with Ephraimitus’ equation of the sekh or ephah with 22 sextarlii. Or we may connect it with the Egyptian system, thus: both the ephah-bath and the Egyptian-Ptolemaic arbole are equated to the Attic meteres of 72 sextarlii. Now, in the case of the arbole this is only an approximation, for it is known from native Egyptian sources (which give the capacity in terms of a volume of water of a certain weight) that the arbole was about 30-45 l., or a little more than 64 pints. Other calculations, as from a passage of Josephus where the coor is equated to 41 Attic (Greek-Roman) modii (i.e., 65 sextarlii), give the same result. In this passage modii is an almost certain emendation of medimnus, the confusion between the two being natural in a Greek MS. There are plenty of other vague approximations, ranging from 50-60 sextarlii. Though the passage of Josephus is not quite certain in the text, we may accept it as having the appearance of precise determination, especially since it gives a result not materially differing from other sources of information.

In the above table, the values of the measures are given according to three estimates, viz. (1) log = Babylonian unit of 0.505 l.; (2) ephah = 65 pints; (3) log = sextarlius of 0.99 pint.

Foreign measures of capacity mentioned in NT.

Setting aside words which strictly denote a measure of capacity, but are used loosely to mean simply a vessel (e.g., 'cup' in Mk 7), the following, among others, have been noted. Bushel (Mt 5v) is the tr. of modus, the which represents sekh. Firkin is used (Jn 20) to represent the Greek metres, the rough equivalent of the bath. Measure in Rev 6 represents the Gr. axionis of about 2 pints.

III. Measures of Weight.

The system of weights used in Palestine was derived from Babylonian and Egyptian. Egypt does not seem to have exerted any influence in this respect. The chief denominations in the system were the talent (Gr. talanton, Heb. kikkar meaning, apparently, a round cake-like object), the mina (Gr. mna, Heb. maneh; tr. 'pound' in 1 K 10v and oblong); though 'pound' in Jn 12v 10 (maah) means the Roman pound of 327-45 grammes or 503.5 grs. (troy), and the shekel (Gr. ziklos or siglos, Heb. shogel, from shogel, 'to weigh'). The shekel further was divided into 20 gerahs (gerah apparently - the Babylonian gur, a small weight of silver). [References to shekels or other denominations of precious metal in pre-exilic times must be to uncoined metal, not to coins, which are of later origin.] For ordinary purposes 60 shekels made a mina, and 60 minas a talent; but for the precious metals a mina of 60 shekels was employed, although the talent contained 60 minas, as in the other case. There were two systems, the heavy and the light, the former being double of the latter. The evidence supports the view that there was a very complex system, involving at least two norms, one of which, the royal, used for purposes of taxation, was heavier than the other, the common. For our purposes, we may here confine ourselves to the common norm in the heavy and light systems. It may, however, be mentioned that the 'king's weight,' according to which Abulom's hair weighed 200 shekels (2 S 14v), is probably to be referred to this royal norm. Combining the evidence of the extant Bab. weights with the evidence of later coins of various countries of the ancient world, and with the knowledge, derived from a statement in Herodatus, that the ratio of gold to silver was as 18:1, we obtain the following results:

Heavy.

N.B.—One heavy talent = 98.154 lbs. avoirdupois; one heavy mina = 1.636 lbs. avoirdupois.

Now the pieces of ⅓ and ⅔ of the value of the gold shekel in silver were the units on which were based systems known as the Babylonian or Persic and the Phoenician respectively; the reason for the names being that these two standards seem to have been associated by the Greeks, the first with Persia, whose coins were struck on this standard, the second with the great Phoenician trading cities, Sidon, Tyre, etc. For con-
WELL

The evidence as to the actual use of this weight in Palestine is as follows: From Ex 38:31 it appears that the Hebrew talent contained 3000 shekels. Now, Josephus equates the mina used for gold to 2½ Roman pounds, which is 12,633.3 grains troy, or 818.625 grammes; this is only 10 grains heavier than the heavy mina given above. From Josephus also we know that the kikkor or talent contained 100 minae. The talent for precious metals, as we have seen, contained 3000 shekels; therefore the shekel should be assumed as 1 gram = 421.654 grains troy. We thus have a heavy shekel of 421 grains, and a light one of 210.5 grains. There is other evidence equating the Hebrew shekel to weights varying from 210.48 to 210.55 grains. This is generally supposed to be the Phoenician shekel of 224.4 grains in a slightly reduced form. Ex 38:31 is probably the same kind of reduction took place at Sidon in the course of the 4th cent. B.C., where, probably owing to a fall in the price of gold, the weight of the standard silver shekel fell from about 28.50 grammes (441.36 grains) to 26.30 grammes (406.9 grains). A change in the ratio between gold and silver from 133:1 to 128:1 would practically, in a country with a coinage, necessitate a change in the weight of the shekel such as seems to have taken place here; and although the Jews had no coinage of their own before the time of the Maccabees, they would naturally be influenced by the weights in use in Phoenicia. The full weight of the old standard probably remained in use as the 'shekel of the sanctuary,' for that weight was 20 gerahs (Ezk 45:3, Ex 30:13), which is translated in the LXX by '20 obole,' meaning, presumably, 20 Attic drachms of the time; and this weight is 224.4 grains. This shekel was used not only for the silver paid for the 'ransom of souls,' but also for gold, copper, and spices (Ex 30:24; 38:25); in fact, the Priests' Code regarded it as the proper system for all estimations (Lv 27:21). The shekel is ¼ shekel is mentioned in Gn 24:22, Ex 38:25.

Foreign weights in the NT.

The 'pound' of spike-nard (Jn 12:5) or of myrrh and aloes (10th) is best explained as the Roman libra (Gr. litra) of 327.45 grammes. The 'pound' in Lk 10:21 is the money-mina or ψε of the Roman-Attic talent (see art. MONEY, VII). The 'talent' mentioned in Rev 16:4 also probably belongs to the same system.

The evidence given in the table is as follows: 1. 2. 3. Three stone weights from Tel Zaka¬riya, inscribed apparently netseph, and weighing—

- 10-21 grammes = 157-564 grains troy.
- 9.5 = 146-887
- 9.0 = 138-301

4. A weight with the same inscription, from near Jerusalem, weighing 9-61 grammes = 134-891 grains troy.

5. A weight from Samaria inscribed apparently ½ netseph and ½ shekel, weighing 2-54 grammes = 39-2 grains troy; yielding a netseph of 9-16 grammes = 156-8 grains troy. This has been dated in the 8th c. B.C.; and all the weights are apparently of pre¬exilic date. There are other weights from Gezer, which, having, without due cause, been connected with the netseph standard; and a second set of weights from Gezer, Jerusalem, Zaka¬riya, and Tel el-Judeideh may be ignored, as they seem to bear Cypriote inscriptions, and represent a standard weight of 93 grammes maximum. Such an addition must be allowed to Nos. 1 and 2 and 3 of the above-mentioned netseph weights, for fracture, and probably to No. 4, which is pierced. The highest of these weights is some ten grains or 0-7 grammes less than the light Bab. shekel. It probably, therefore, represents an independent standard, or at least a deliberate modification, not an accidental degradation, of the Bab. standard. Weights from Naucratis point to a standard of about 80 grains, the double of which would be 160 grains, which is near enough to the actual weight of our specimens (maximum 157½ grains). We need not here concern ourselves with the origin of this standard, or with the meaning of netseph; there can be no doubt of the existence of such a standard, and there is much probability that it is connected with the standard which was in use at Naucratis. Three weights from Lachish (Tell el-Hesy) also indicate the existence of the same 80-grain standard in Palestine. The standard in use at the city of Aradus (Arvad) for the coinage is generally identified with the Babylonian; but as the shekel there only exceptionally exceeds 165 grains, it, too, may have been an approximation to the standard we are considering. But in Hebrew territory there can be no doubt that this early standard was displaced after the Exile by a form of the Phoenician shekel of 14-34 grammes, or 224-4 grains. It has, indeed, been thought that this shekel can be derived by a certain process from the shekel of 160 grains; but on the whole the derivation from the gold shekel of 126-23 grains suggested above is preferable.
WEN.—See Medicine, p. 600.

WENCH.—This word, once good English, was used by the Bishops’ Bible of 1568, and was transferred to AV at 2 S 17 v. So Wyd. at Mt 9 a., ‘Go ye away, for this man is not dead, but slepith.’

WHALE.—1. hamash. See DRAG. (4). 2. dayg gaddol, the ‘great fish’ of Job 41:1, is in the LXX and in Mt 12 rendered in Gr. by kteis and tr. ‘whale,’ though the Gr. word has a much wider significance. It is impossible to say what kind of fish is intended in the narrative. See, further, art. JONAH.

WHEAT (chittah, Ge 30:4, Ex 34:22 etc.; sifos, Mt 3:23; 13:32, 34, 35; Lk 3:1 16, 22 etc.).—The wheat of Palestine is mostly of the bearded varieties; it is not only eaten as bread, but also boiled, unground, to make the peasant’s dish burghul, which is in turn pounded with meat in a mortar (cf. Fr 273) to make the festive delicacy kibbeh. Wheat is grown all over the valleys and plains of W. Palestine, though to a less extent than barley, but it is cultivated in the largest quantities in the Nuphar plain or plain of the Hauran, one of the finest grain-growing countries in the world. The wheat harvest occurs from April to June; its time was looked upon as one of the divisions of the year (Ex 34:2, Jg 15:1, 1 S 12:7). The expressions ‘fat of wheat’ (Ps 81:14, 147:14 mg.) and ‘the fat of kidneys of wheat’ (Dt 32:19) refer to the finest flour of wheat.

WHEEL.—The various parts of a cart or chariot wheel are enumerated in connexion with the bronze wheels of Solomon’s chariots (1 K 22:36). In R V v.s. reads: ‘And the work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot wheel: their axletrees, and their felloes, and their spokes, and their naves were all motten’ (cf. AV). In cars and chariots the essential parts were, of course, of wood. The felloes were made in segments dovetailed together. For illustr. see Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. i. 234 ff. The finest specimen of a Roman chariot wheel as yet found is of the form, ‘which is formed of single piece of wood bent,’ and the nave shot with iron, the latter being also ‘bushed with iron’ (Scott, Hist. Rev., Oct. 1905, p. 123, with illustr.). For the potter’s wheel, see PORTX. Wells and cisterns also were furnished with wheels, over which the rope passed for drawing up the water-bucket (Ec 12:2). See also CART, CHARIOT.

WHIRLWIND represents two Heb. words—saphâh (Job 30:6, Pr 15:1 etc., also tr. ‘storm’ in Job 21:13, Ps 83:13, 15:24; Ge 38:20; 2 K 3:24, Job 38, Jer 23:12, etc., also tr. ‘tempest,’ and ‘stormy wind,’ Ps 55:23, 83:107, Exk 13:16 etc.) The words do not necessarily mean ‘whirlwind,’ and are applied to any furious storm. From the context, however, in certain passages, we gather that whirlwind is intended—a violent wind moving in a circle round its axis (2 K 2:2, Job 38 etc.). It often works great havoc in its path, as it sweeps across the country. Drawing up sand, dust, straw, and other light articles as it gyrates, it presents the appearance of a great pillar—an object of fear to travellers and dwellers in the desert. Passing over the sea, it draws up the water, and the bursting of the column causes the water-spong. God spake to Job from the whirlwind (Job 40): the modern Arabic regards it with superstitious dread, as the residence of demons. W. E. WIMNO.

WHITE.—See COLOURS, § 1.

WHITE OF AN EGG (EV Job 40, RVm ‘juice of purslane’).—The allusion should perhaps be understood to be the juice of some kind of plant, probably for tulaca oleacea, L., the common purslane. ‘White of an egg’ (lit., on this view, ‘slime of the yoke’) is still, however, accepted by many interpreters.

WHORE.—This term is generally replaced in RV by harlot (wh. see).

WIDOW.—Widows from their poverty and unprotectedness, are regarded in OT as under the special guardianship of God (Ps 68:146, Pr 15:2, Pr 4:20); and consequently it was looked upon as a mark of true religion, ensuring a blessing on those who showed it (Job 29:11, Is 1:17, Jer 7:5, 22:9); while neglect of, cruelty or injustice towards them were considered marks of wickedness, bringing punishment from God (Job 22:12, 24:9, Ps 94:6, Is 13:10, Zec 7:11, Mal 3:5). The Book of Deut. is especially rich in such counsels, insisting that widows be granted full justice (De 24:19), that they be received as guests at sacrificial meals (14:21, 16. 24ff.), and that they be suffered to glean un molested in field, oliveyard, and vineyard (24:19ff.). See, further, INNOCENCE, i. 2 (c); MARATHON, 6.

The earliest mention of widows in the history of the Christian Church is found in Ac 6, where the Grecian Jews murmured ‘against the Hebrews because their widows were neglected’ in the daily distribution of alms and food. In course of time these pensioners became an excessive burden on the finances of the Church. We thus find St. Paul dealing with the matter in 1 Ti 5:4, where he charges relatives and Christian friends to relieve those widows with whom they are personally connected (vv. 4, 8), so that the Church might be the more able to relieve those who were ‘widows indeed’ (i.e. widows in actual poverty and without any one responsible for their support) (vv. 4, 5). He further directs that ‘none be enrolled as widows’ except those who were sixty years of age, of unblemishable character, and full of good works; and he adds that the younger widows should be married (v. 14), that they may receive pecuniary help from the Church (for many young widows might be in great poverty), and since he could not describe the re-marriage of such a widow-pensioner as a rejection of her faith, he follows that the list of widows, from which the youngest widows were to be excluded, was not the list of those who were in receipt of Church relief, but rather a list of those, from among the pensioner-widows, who were considered suitable by age and character to engage officially in Church work. Therefore we may see in this passage a proof of the existence thus early in the history of the Church of that ecclesiastical order of ‘Widows’ which we find mentioned frequently in post-Apostolic times.

WIFE.—See Family, 2; Marriage.

WILDERNESS, DESERT.—These terms stand for several Heb. and Gr. words, with different shades of meaning.

1. mishabar (from dabar, ‘to drive’) means properly the land to which the cattle were driven, and is used of dry pasture land where scanty grazing was to be found. It occurs about 280 times in OT and is usually tr. ‘wilderness,’ though we have ‘desert’ about a dozen times. It is the place where wild animals roam: pelicans (Ps 1029), wild asses (Job 39, Jer 22, 28, 35; Lam 4:12), jackals (Mal 19); and is without settled inhabitants, though towns or settlements of nomadic tribes may be found (Jos 15:26, Is 43:18). This term is usually applied to the Wilderness of the Wandering of the Arabian desert, but may refer to any other waste. Special waste tracts are distinguished: wilderness of Shur, Zin, Paran, Kadesh, Moab, Ziph, Tekoa, Moab, Baniom, etc.

2. ocob (probably from a word meaning ‘dry’) signifies a dry, desolate, unfertile tract of land, ‘steppe,’ or ‘desert plain.’ As a proper name, it is applied to the great plain including the Jordan Valley and extending S. to the Gulf of Akabah, ‘the Arabah,’ but it is applied also to steppes in general, and translated ‘wilderness,’ ‘desert,’ and sometimes in pl. ‘plains,’ e.g. of Mount Nebo, Je Jericho.
3. churbah (from a root ‘to be waste or desolate’) is properly applied to cities or districts once inhabited now lying waste, and is translated ‘wastes,’ ‘deserts,’ ‘wildernesses’; though it is once used of the Wilderness of the Wanderings (Is 42:19).
4. tsaphoah meaning ‘dry ground’ is twice translated ‘wilderness’ in AV, Job 30:15 (RV ‘dry ground’), Ps 78:30
(RV ‘dry land’).
5. ‘wastes’ has the special meaning of a ‘wild desolate expansion.’ In Job 6:7 it is the waste where the caravans perish.
It is applied to the primeval chaos (Gen 1), also to the Wilderness of the Wanderings (De 32:20 ‘wasting wilderness’).
6. The NT terms are σκαλάρ and σκάλα, the former being used either as noun or as adjective, with ‘places’ or ‘country’ understood. Generally the noun is trans. ‘wilderness, the adjective ‘desert’ in the English versions.
On deserts named in NT see arct. on respective names.

WILD OLIVE.—See GRAFTING, OLIVE.

WILD OX.—See UNICORN.

WILL.—‘Will’ and ‘would’ are often Independent verbs in AV, and being now merely auxiliaries, their force is liable to be missed by the English reader. Thus Mt 11:7 ‘if ye will receive it’ (RV ‘if ye are willing to receive it’); Jo 1:14 ‘Jesus would go forth into Galilee’ (RV ‘was minded to go forth’).

WILL.—See PAUL, p. 692; TESTAMENT.

WILLOW (καρβόμ, Lv 23:47, Job 40:27, Ps 137, Is 15:44
[cf. Arab. qurb ‘willow’ or ‘poplar’]; tsaphoṭapchah, Ez 17:11 [cf. Arab. saṭaḥ ‘the willow’]).—Most of the references are to a tree growing besides water and applied well to the willow, of which two varieties, Saltz fragilis and S. alba, occur plentifully by watercourses in the Holy Land. Some travellers consider the poplar, especially the willow-like Populus euphratica, of the same Nat. Ord. (Salicaceae) as the willows, more probable.
Tristram, without much evidence, considered that tsaphotapchah might be the oleander, which covers the banks of so many streams. E. W. G. Masterman.

WINE.—Only is 28 AV; RV shawls. The precise article of dress intended is unknown.

WIND.—The winds in Heb. are designated by the four cardinal points of the compass. ‘South wind,’ e.g., may be either S., S.W., or S.E.; and so with the others. Cool winds come from the N., moist winds from the western sea, warm winds from the S., and dry winds, often laden with fine sand, from the eastern deserts. Warmth and moisture, therefore, depend much upon the direction of the winds. During the desert summer months May till October, the prevailing winds are from the N. and N.W.; they do much to temper the heat of summer (Ca 4:10, Job 37:17). In Sept.
and Oct., E. and S.E. winds are frequent; blowing from the deserts, their dry heat gives the furniture to crack, and makes life a burden (Hos 13:4). Later, the winds from the S. prolong the warmth of summer (Lk 21:25);
then the W. and S.W. winds bring the rain (1 K 18:23, Lk 12:27). East winds earlier in the year often work great destruction on vegetation (Ezk 17:12). Under their influence strong plants droop, and flowers quickly wither (Ps 103).
Of the greatest value for all living things is the perpetual change of land and sea breezes. At sunrise gentle airs stir from the sea, cross the plain, and creep up the mountains. At sunset the cooling air begins to slip down seaward again, while the upper strata move landward from the sea. The moisture thus carried ashore is precipitated in refreshing dew.
The ‘tempestuous wind’ (Ac 27:10), called Euroclydon or Euracculo (wh. see), was the E.N.E. wind so prevalent in the Levantine Mediterranean, called by travelers to-day the Levantian. W. Ewroso.

WINES AND WINE DRINK.

WILDRICH.-See HEBBE, § 7.

WINE AND STRONG DRINK.—Taken together in this order, the two terms 'wine' and 'strong drink' are continually used by OT writers as an exhaustive classification of the fermented beverages then in use (Lv 19:12, Is 1:21, Pr 20:1, and oft.). The all but universal use in OT—in NT 'strong drink' it is mentioned only Lv 1:16—is to restrict 'wine' (yayin) to the beverage prepared from the juice of the grape, and to denote by 'strong drink' (šekār) every other sort of intoxicating liquor.
1. Before proceeding to describe the methods by which wine in particular was made in the period covered by the canonical writings, it will be advisable to examine briefly the more frequently used terms for wine and strong drink. The Hebrew word šekār is translated the term šekār, which in virtue of its root-meaning always denotes 'intoxicating drink.' In a former study of this subject ('Wine and Strong Drink' in EBi iv.
col. 5900 f.), the present writer has given as a reason for believing that among the early Semites a name similar to šekār and the Babylonian šikušarwas first given to the fermented juice of the date, and that from signifying date-wine the name passed to all other fermented liquors. At a later period, when the ancesstors of the Hebrews became acquainted with the vine and its culture, the Indo-Germanic term represented by the Greek αἷμα (with the dipthong, eino) and the Latin vinum was borrowed, under the form yayin, to denote the fermented juice of the grape. The older šekār then became restricted, as we have seen, to intoxicating other than grape wine.

Another important term of uncertain etymology,
'on which,' in Driver's words, 'much has been written—not always wisely,' is ṣēḇēq, in our EV sometimes rendered 'wine,' sometimes 'new wine,' but in Amer. RV consistently 'new wine.' Strictly speaking, ṣēḇēq is the freshly expressed grape juice, before and during fermentation, technically known as 'must' (from Lat. mustum). In this sense it is frequently named as a valued product of the cultivation: 'may it be 56' (1 K 7:14 etc.),—that is, the raw, unclarified oil as it flows from the oil-press, to which it exactly corresponds.
In some OT passages, however, and notably Hos 4:16, where ṣēḇēq is named with yayin and wāzēq, as taking away the understanding (RV), it evidently denotes the product of fermentation. Hence it may be said that ṣēḇēq is applied not only to the 'must' in the wine-fat (see § 3), but to 'new wine' ('to be made before it has become yayin,' or, as Driver suggests in his careful study of the OT occurrences (Joel and Amos, 79 L.),

'to a light kind of wine such as we know, from the classical writers, that the ancients were in the habit of making by checking the fermentation of the grape juice before it had run its full course' (see also the discussion in EBi iv. 5907 f.).

Of the rarer words for 'wine' mention may be made of chemer (Dt 32:14, and, in a cognate form, Ez 6:9, Dn 5:5), which denotes wine as the result of fermentation, from a root signifying 'to ferment,' and 'zēts, a poetical synonym of ṣēḇēq, and like it used both of the fresh juice and of the fermented liquor (see Jl 11, Is 49:1); in Am 9:7 it is rendered 'sweet wine,' which suggests the gvousos (EV ‘new wine’) of Ac 2:14. Reference may also be made to the poetical expression 'the blood of the grape' (Gn 49:10, Dt 32:12) and to the latter 'trust in the vine' (Mt 26:28 and §) of the Gospels and the Mishna.

2. The Promised Land was pre-eminently a 'land of wine and milk' (2 K 18:12, and, in the widely scattered remains of the ancient presses. A normal winepress consisted of three parts, two rock bottles at different levels with a connecting channel between the two. The upper trough or press-vat was the 'winefat' of Is 65, elsewhere generally winepress') had a larger superficial area, but was much shallower than the lower trough or wine-vat (yehēq, Is 5:1, cf. RV'm). The relative sizes may be seen from a typical press described by Robinson, of which the upper trough measured 8 feet square and was 15 inches deep, while the lower was 4 feet square and 3 feet deep. The distinction between the two is entirely obscured in EV, and is not always preserved in the other translation.

The grapes were brought from the adjoining vineyard in baskets, and were either spread out for a few days, with a view to increase the amount of sugar and diminish the amount of water, or were cast into the press-vat. There they were thoroughly trodden with the bare feet, the juice flowing through the conducting channel into the lower wine-vat. The next process consisted in piling the husks and stalks into a heap in the middle of the vat, and subjecting the mass to mechanical pressure by means of a wooden press-beam, one end of which was fixed into a socket in the wall of the vat or of the adjacent rock, while the other end was weighted with stones.

While the above may be considered the normal construction of a Hebrew winepress, it is evident, both from the evidence of contemporary and from a detailed reference to wine-making in the Mishna, that the number of troughs or vats might be as high as four (see the press described and illustrated in PEFQS, 1899, 41 ff.), or as low as one. The object of a third vat was to allow the 'must' to settle and clarify in the second before running it off into the third. Where only one vat is found, it may have served either as a press-vat, in which case the 'must' was once transferred to earthen jars (see next section), or as a wine-vat to receive the 'must,' the grapes having been pressed in a large wooden trough, such as the Egyptians used (Wilkinson, Anc. Egy. l. 885 with Illust.). This arrangement would obviously be impossible if the grapes were laid on a solid rock or other surface in such a confined space. In such a case, indeed, a rock-hewn trough of any sort was dispensed with, a vat for the wooden press being supplied by a large stone hollowed out for the purpose, an excellent specimen of which was found at Tell es-Súfi, and is figured in Bliss and Macalister's Excavations, etc., p. 24 (see, for further details, the index of that work, under 'Vats').

Returning to the normal press-system, we find that the 'must' was usually left in the wine-vat to undergo the first or 'tumultuous fermentation, after which it was drawn off (Hag 2:8, lit. 'baled out'), or, where the vat was shallow, simply run off into the large jars of wine-skins (Mt 20:19, 21 and J.) for the 'after-fermentation.' The modern Syrian wines are said to complete their first fermentation in from four to seven days, and to be ready for use at the end of two months. The Mishna has it ordained that 'new wine' cannot be presented at the sanctuary for the drink-offering until it has stood for at least forty days in the fermenting jar.

When the fermentation had run its full course, the wine was racked off into smaller jars and skins, the latter for obvious reasons being preferred by travellers (Jos 6:23). At the same time, the liquor was strained (Mt 9:5; cf. Is 28:7 'wines on the less well refined,' i.e., strained) through a metal or earthenware strainer, or through a linen cloth. In the further course of maturing, in order to prevent the wine from thickening on the less refined (12 RV'm), it was from time to time decanted from one vessel to another. The even tenor of Moabite history is compared to wine to which this process has not been applied (Jer 49:11). When sufficiently refined, the liquid was poured into the jars lined with pitch, which were carefully closed and sealed and stored in the wine cellars (1 Ch 27:77). The Lebanon (Hos 14:19) and Hebron (Ezk 27:19), to the N.W. of Damascus, were two localities specially celebrated for their wines.

It may be stated at this point that no trace can be found, among the hundreds of references to the preparation and use of wine in the Mishna, of any means employed to preserve wine in the unfermented state. It is even improbable that with the means at their disposal the Jews could have so preserved it had they wished (cf. Professor Macalister's statement as to the 'impossibility' of unfermented wine at this period, in Hastings' DB ii. 24).

4. Of all the fermented liquors, other than wine, with which the Hebrews are likely to have been familiar, the oldest historically was almost certainly that made from dates (cf. § i). These, according to Pliny, were steeped in water before being sent to the press, where they were probably treated as the olives were treated in the oil-press (see Ortl). Date wine was greatly prized by the Babylonians, and is said by Herodotus to have been the principal article of Assyrian commerce.

In the Mishna there is frequent mention also of cider or 'apple' wine, made from the quince or whatever other fruit the 'apple' of the Hebrews may signify. The only wine, other than the 'fruit of the vine,' mentioned by name in OT is the 'sweet wine' of pomegranates (Ca 8: Rv'm). Like the dates, these fruits were first crushed in the oil-press, after which the juice was allowed to the Mishna, further reference to various fermented liquors imported from abroad, among them the beer for which Egypt was famed. A striking and unexpected witness to the extent to which the wines of the West were imported has been furnished by the handles of wine jars, especially amphorae, from Rhodes, which have been found in such numbers in the cities excavated in Southern Palestine (see Bliss and Macalister, op. cit. 131 ff., and more fully PEFQS, 1911).

5. The Hebrew wines were light, and in early times were probably taken neat. At all events, the first clear reference to diluting with water is contained in 2 Mac 14:19: 'bursed wine mingled with water, pleasant,' and in NT times this may be taken as the habitual practice. The wine of Sharon, it is said, was mixed with two parts of water, being a lighter wine than most. With other wines, according to the Talmud, the proportion was one part of wine to three parts of water.

The 'mingling' or mixing of wines of different strength denounced by Isaiah (55:1) has reference to the ancient practice of adding aromatic herbs and spices to the wine in order to add to its flavor and strength. Such was the 'spiced wine' of Ca 8:19. Our Saviour on the cross, it will be remembered, received 'wine mingled with myrrh' (Mk 15:34, Mt 27:34). The use of wine was universal among all classes (see Mears, § 6), with the exception of those who had taken a vow of abstinence, such as the Nazirites and Rohabites. The priests also had to abstain, but only when on duty in the sanctuary (Lv 10:9). A libation of wine formed the necessary accompaniment of the daily burnt-offering and of numerous other offerings (cf. Sir 30:13, 34:17). He stretched out his hand to the cup, and poured of the blood of the grape . . . at the foot of the altar.

The attitude of the prophets and other teachers of Israel, including our Lord Himself, to the ordinary use of wine as a beverage is no doubt accurately reflected in the saying of Jesus ben-Sira: 'wine drunk in measure and to satisfy is joy of heart and gladness of soul' (Sir 31:4, RV). At the same time, they warn us to the danger, and unapprovingly denounced the sin of excessive indulgence (see, e.g., Is 5:1, 28), Hos 4:11, Pr 20:29-31, etc.). In the altered social conditions of our own day, however, it must be admitted that the rule of conduct formulated by St. Paul (cf. Ro 14:14-21) appeals to the individual conscience with greater urgency and insistence than ever before in the experience of Jew or Christian.

WISDOM

-WINEFAT, WINEPRESS

WINEFAT, WINEPRESS, WINE-VAT.—See Wine and Strong Drink, § 2.

WINK.—To 'wink at,' 't. e. pass over, is used of God in Ac 17:20. 'The times of this ignorance God winked at,' and Wis 11:9 'Thou . . . waknest at the slums of men.' It is a good example of the colloquial language of the English Versions.

WINNOW.—See Agriculture, § 3.

WISDOM.—The great literary landmarks of the 'wisdom' teaching are the Books of Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon. This literature, in its present form at least, belongs to the latter half of the Persian period and to the Greek period of Jewish history. But behind this latest and finest product of the Hebrew mind there lay a long process of germination. In the twelfth century, before the presence of the 'wisdom' element from early times. This primitive 'wisdom' was not regarded as an exclusively Israelitish possession, but was shared with the sages (1 K 4:32; Jer 1:9-15). It possessed the most heterogeneous elements: e.g., mechanical skill (1 K 7:14), statecraft (59), financial and commercial ability (Ezk 28), political trickery (1 K 2:2), common sense and tact (2 S 14:20-22), learning (1 K 3:1), military skill and administrative ability (Is 10:4), pty (Dt 4), and the creative energy of God (Jer 10:12). In short, any capacity possessed in an exceptional degree was recognized as 'wisdom'. It was regarded as a gift of God. But there was already manifest a marked tendency to magnify the ethical and religious elements of 'wisdom', which later came to their full recognition.

In pre-exilic Israel, however, 'wisdom' played a relatively small part in education. The vital, progressive religious spirit exhausted itself in prophecy. Here was laid the foundation of all the later 'wisdom.' Not only did the prophets hand down the literary forms through which the sages expressed themselves, but they were also possessed of the same genius for symbols. These were: (a) monothelitism, which found free course in Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, and Deutero-Isaiah; (b) individualism, or the responsibility of the individual before God for his own sins and for the sins of no one else—The great message of Ezekiel; and (c) the insistence of God upon right character as the only passport to His favour—truth proclaimed by all the great prophets. With the fall of Jerusalem, however, and the destruction of the Jewish State, the knell of prophecy was sounded; the responsibility for shaping the religious destiny of Israel now fell into the hands of the priests and sages.

The priest responded to the call by attempting to heal the wounds of Israel lightly, by purification and elaboration of the ritual. The true heir of the prophet was the sage. He found himself confronted with a new world; it was his to interpret it religiously. The witness of the prophet was no longer tenable. New problems were calling for solution and old problems becoming ever more pressing. The task of the sage was to adjust the truths left to him by the prophets to the new situation. It was his to find the place of religion in that situation and to make it the dominant element therein. The greatest sources of danger to true religion were: (a) an orthodoxy which held the ancient traditions inviolable and refused to see the facts of the present; (b) the scepticism and disregard arising out of the miseries of the time which seemed to deny the justice and goodness of God; and (c) the inroads of Greek civilization which seemed to threaten the whole fabric of Judaism. Indeed, the sages themselves were not wholly escape being influenced by these tendencies; witness the orthodoxy of the hulk of the Book of Proverbs, the scepticism of Ecclesiastes, and the Greek elements in the Wisdom of Solomon. In the conclusions the sages, each in his own way, addressed their message.

The writers of Proverbs, for the most part, stand firmly upon the old path; in the midst of mental and moral chaos and flux they insist upon adherence to the old standards of truth and goodness, and they promise success to all who hearken to this message of wisdom. This is the old prophetic recipe for national success made operative in the lives of individuals. Through it the individual is informed of the universal, how to live life with religious meaning. Their philosophy of life is simple, but shallow. They fail to realize that the reward of life is not in the market—this is not their concern.

The weakness of this traditional position is exposed by the Book of Job, which points out the fact that the righteous man is often the most wretched and seeks to reconcile this fact with belief in the justice and goodness of God. But no solution of the age-long problem of suffering is provided; the sufferer is left to wonder what is the reason for his suffering in God's goodness and wisdom, and to realize that, just as the mysteries of God's providence are beyond human knowledge, so is it futile for him to attempt to penetrate the greater mysteries of God's providence. Let him be content with the God of Himself as his problem and activities.

Song of Songs illustrates the humanity of the sages. It concerns itself with the greatest of all human passions—love. Nor is it to be interpreted only in a sexual sense; the lyrics such as were sung at weddings in Syria, it extols the nobility and loyalty of true love. In a period when the polygamous customs of the pagan world were finding eager acceptance in Israel, such a powerful and beautiful vindication of the character of unselfish love was urgently needed, and it was calculated to play an important part in the preservation of true religion.

Ecclesiastes is the product of many minds, with more or less conflicting views. But there is a pronounced and widespread problem of practical scepticism: Does God care for truth and goodness? Is there any religious meaning in the universe? All the heart of the book meets this question head on and squarely. The iron has entered the author's own soul. He desires to help those in the same situation with himself. Recognizing and giving full weight to the many difficulties that beset the religious point of view and tend to drive men to despair, he holds fast to his belief in God's loving care, and therefore counsels his fellow men to put on a cheerful courage and perform their allotted tasks with all their might. This is a wonderful way of making life worth living, and worth living it is.

Ecclesiastes and Wisdom of Solomon are both products of the life and death struggle between Judaism and Greek thought. The author of the former is hostile to Greek social life, but in his adherence to the old Hebrew ideals of morals and religion. He seeks to arouse loyalty and enthusiasm for these in the hearts of the Jews, who are in constant danger of yielding to the seductive and powerful influences of Greece. The same purpose animates the author of the Wisdom of Solomon. But he is more liberal in his attitude to foreign influences. He welcomes truth from any direction, and therefore does not hesitate to incorporate Greek elements in his fundamentally Hebraic view of life and duty. He thus enriches the conception of 'wisdom' from every source, and seeks to show that this Hebrew ideal is immeasurably superior to the boasted Greek sophia.

Hebrew 'wisdom' by its very nature could have no fellowship with philosophy. The aims and methods of the two were fundamentally different. In the words of Bishop Westcott, 'the axioms of the one are the conclusions of the other.' For philosophy, God is the conclusion; for 'wisdom,' he is the major premise. Philosophers have ever been seeking after God 'if haply they might find him.' The mind of the sage was saturated with the thought of God. Philosophy starts with the world as it is, and seeks to find it; 'wisdom' started with God and sought to explain the world in terms of God. 'Wisdom,' furthermore, was practical and moral; philosophy was speculative and metaphysical. The interests of 'wisdom' were immensely human. They were concerned with living questions and concrete issues. The problems of the sage were surcharged with emotion; they were the outcome of troubled feelings and perturbed will; only in slight measure were they the product of the intellect. It is not surprising, therefore, that 'wisdom' presents no carefully developed system of thought. The heart knows no logic. 'Wisdom' cares little for a plan of the universe; it leaves all such matters to God. It seeks only to enable men to live and trust God and to walk in His ways.

The Hebrew conception of 'wisdom' developed along two lines. 'Wisdom' had its human and its Divine elements. In fact it was human, it devotes itself to the consideration of the great problems of life. It was identified with knowledge of the laws and principles, observance of which leads to the successful life. These were all summarized in the formula, 'the fear of the Lord.' Later in the history of the idea, this subjective experience was externalized and objectified and, under the growing influence of the priestly ritual, 'wisdom' came to be defined as observance of the Mosaic Law (Sir 19:3-4 24). On its Divine side, 'wisdom' was at first conceived of as an attribute of God which He generously shared with men. Then, as the conception of God grew broader and deeper, large areas of 'wisdom' were marked off as inaccessible to man, and known only to God (Job 28). Still further, 'wisdom' was personified and represented as the companion of God in all His creative activities (Pr 8:2); and was, at last, under the influence of Greek thought, personalized, or hypostatized, and made to function as an intermediary between man and God, carrying out His beneficent purposes towards the righteous (Wis 7:5 14:6-7 11:13 10:6).

Upon the whole, the 'wisdom' element must be considered the noblest expression of the Hebrew spirit. It was in large part the response of Judaism to the influx of Gentile civilization. It demonstrated the vitality of the Hebrew religion. When the forms and institutions in which Hebrew idealism had clothed itself were shattered beyond restoration, 'wisdom' furnished new channels for the expression of the ideal, and kept the passion for righteousness and truth burning. When Judaism was brought face to face with the Gentile world on every hand, 'wisdom' furnished it with a counter-offensive message. National and transitory elements were discarded, and emphasis was laid upon the great fundamental concepts of religion adapted to the needs of all men everywhere. 'Wisdom' thus became of the greatest importance in the preparation for Christianity, the universal religion.

WISEMEN.—See Magi; and, for 'the Wise,' Wisdom.

WIST.—See Wt.

WIT.—The vb. 'to wit,' which means 'to know,' is used in AV in most of its parts. The present tense is I wot, thou wostest, he wotest or wotest, we wost; the past tense, I wist, he wist, ye wist, ye wist; the infinitive, to wit. In 2 Co 8:10 occurs the phrase do to wit, i.e. make to know—'we do you to wit of the grace of God.' The subst. wit means AV 'knowledge'; it occurs only in Ps 107:27 at their wit's end. 'Witty,' which is found in Pr 8:14, Jth 11:2, Wis 8:15, has the sense of 'knowing,' 'skillful'; and 'wittingly' (Gn 43:9) is 'knowingly.'

WITCH, WITCHCRAFT.—See MAGIC DIVINATION and SOCRERY.

WITHERED HAND.—See MEDICINE, p. 599.

WITH: (E) S in Jg 16:7 represents a term which probably means bow-strings of 'green' gut. The Eng. word means a supple twig from a willow (see also Coan).

WITNESS.—This is the rendering of Heb. 'zd' and 'z'dah' and of the Gr. marturos, marturiy, and martypanos, and compounds of this root. The primitive idea of the Heb. root is to repeat, re-assert, and we find the word used in the following connections:—(1) Witness meaning evidence, testimony, sign (of things): a heap of stones (Gn 31:4), the Song of Moses (Dt 31:19), Job's disease (Job 14:4), the stone set up by Joshua at Shechem (Jos 24:27). So in the NT the dust on the feet of the disciples was to be a witness against the Jews (Mt 8:11). (2) Witness signifying the person who witnesses or can testify or vouch for the parties in debate; e.g. God is witness between Jacob and Laban (Gn 31:19); so Job says, 'My witness is the LORD' (Job 16:13, cf. also 12:16, Jer 29:24 42). In the NT God is called by St. Paul to witness to his truth and the purity of his motives (Ro 1:2, 2 Co 12:13). In this meaning we have (3) Witness in a legal sense. Thus we find witnesses to an act of conveyancing (Jer 32:19), to a betrothal (Ru 4:4), while in all civil and criminal cases there were witnesses to give evidence, and references to false witnesses are frequent (cf. Pr 12:19 15:2 21:19 28:33). See also JEREMIAH (2:27). In the teaching of the Apostles frequently appear witnesses (martypanos) of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus (Lk 24:24, Ac 1:9 2:22 5:46 etc). The heroes of the faith are called the "witnesses" (He 11:32) and James is called 'the faithful witness (martypanos)' in Rev 1:1, (cf. 1 Ti 6:11). Cf. also ARTT. ARR § 1; TABERNACLE, § 7 (2).

WOLF.—In AV 'wolf' is always tr. of zo'd (cf. Arab. zeed, 'wolf'); Gn 40:2, Is 11:6, Jer 50, Lk 23, Zeph 3:1. Cf. also proper name Zebul, Jg 7:14. For 'wolves' (tr. 'wolves' in Is 13:28 RV) and lammim see JACAL. The NT term is λύκος (Mt 10:3, Lk 10:3, Jn 10:5, Ac 20:29).

The wolf of Palestine is a variety of Canis lupus, somewhat lighter in colour and larger than that of N. Europe. It is seldom seen to-day, and never goes in packs, though commonly in couples; it commits its ravages at night, hence the expression 'wolf of the evening' (Jer 6:17, Zeph 3:1). It was one of the greatest terrors of the lonely shepherd (Jn 10:29); persecutors are compared to wolves in Mt 10:16, Ac 20:29.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

WOMAN.—1. In OF ('tehdelah, 'woman,' 'wife'; nóagédh [Lv 19:28, Nu 31:14, Jer 31:21], formal name of the position is one of inferiority and subjection to man (Gn 3:8); and yet, in keeping with the view that ideally she is his companion and 'help meet' (2:18-19), she never sinks into a mere drudge or pillars of scaffold. In patriarchal times, Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel stand beside by side with their husbands. In the era of the deliverance from Egypt, Miriam is ranked with Moses and Aaron (cf. Mic 6). In the days of the judge, Deborah is not only a prophetess (wh. see), but is herself a judge (Jg 4). Under the monarchy, Jezebel in the Northern Kingdom and Athaliah in the Southern, afford illustrations of the political power and influence that a woman might wield. In religious matters, we find women attending the feasts along with men (1 S 12:1), taking part with them in acts of sacrifice (Jg 13:21, 22 etc.), combined with them in the choral service of the Temple (Ex 29 etc.). And though in the Deut. code woman's position is one of complete subordination, her rights are recognized and safeguarded in a way that prepares the soil for the growth of those higher conceptions of woman's influence in Malachi's declaration that divorce is hateful to Jehovah (2:19), and in the picture of the virtuous wife.
WONDERS

with which the Book of Proverbs concludes (ch. 31). See, further, Family, Marriage.

"Parousia" (Gr. "parousia", lit. 'being with'), "Thedosia" (Ro 1:3 thru 7), "female"; γυναικαρίων (dimin. fr. γυναῖκα, 2 Ti 3:9, EV 'silly women').—Owing to the influence of Rabbinism, Jewish women had lost some of their earlier freedom (cf. Gen 31:11). The women at the well of Samaria (Jn 4:28) the "surprise of the disciples by the well of the woman" (18:22) that found Jesus 'speaking with a woman' (Jn 4:27). But Jesus wrought a wonderful change. He did not do this only by His teaching about adultery (Mt 5:23) and marriage and divorce (Mt 19:9—12), but more by His personal attitude to women, whether good and pure like His own mother (there is nothing harsh or discourteous in the 'Woman' of Jn 2:1; cf. 18:36) and the sisters of Bethany, or sinful and outcast as some of the women of the Gospels were (Lk 7:38, 8:1, Jn 4). The work of emancipation was continued in the Apostolic Church. Women formed an integral part of the earliest Christian community (Ac 1:14), shared in the gifts of Pentecost (2:11, cf. v.17), engaged in tasks of unofficial ministry (Ro 16:1, Ph 4:3), and by and by appear (1 Ti 5:9) as holding the office of the deaconess (whh. see), and possibly (5:9) of the 'widows' (whh. see, and cf. Timothy, Eph. 6:1, § 5). St. Paul's conception of woman and of man's relation to her is difficult (1 Co 7), but may be explained partly by his expectation of the Parousia (vv.5-6), and partly by the exigencies of an era of persecution (v.6). In a later Pauline Epistle marriage becomes a type of the union between Christ and the Church (Eph 5:22-24). And if by his injunction as to the silence of women in the Church (1 Co 14:34-35) the Apostle appears to limit the prophetic freedom of the first Christian days (Ac 2:11), we must remember that he is writing to a Church set in the midst of a dissolute Greek city, where Christian women had special reasons for caution in the exercise of their new privileges. Elsewhere he announces the far-reaching principle that in Christ Jesus 'there can be no male and female' (Gal 3:28).

J. C. LAMBERT.

WONDER (Heb. מָזוּד, Gr. ταῦτα; usually in OT and always in NT associated with Heb. בּוֹד, Gr. σώματον, Eng. 'sign').—In OT the term ordinarily occurs with reference to the miracles at the time of the deliverance from Egypt (Ex 7:7 et seq.).—Jehovah's 'wonders in the land of Ham' (Ps 105:48). In NT it is used of the miracles wrought by Jesus (Ac 2:22 et seq.), those demanded of Him by the people (Jn 4:45); those of the Apostles and the early Church (Ac 2:22 et seq.); those which should be wrought by false Christs (Mt 24:24 = Mk 13:22). It refers primarily to the manifestations produced by a miraculous event, and in so far it is significant that, as applied to the miracles of Jesus, it is always conjoined with some other term. His miracles were not mere prodigies existing astonishment, but 'signs and wonders,' that sustained at the same time, through their evident value, to the reason and spirit. And yet Jesus preferred the intuitive faith that is independent alike of wonders and of signs (Jn 4:45). See, further, Miracles, Sign.

See FOREST, also WRITING, 6.

WOOL.—See FOREST, also WRITING, 6.

WOOLEN stuffs were much used for clothes (Lv 13:47, Pr 31:13 et seq.); mainly, however, for outer garments. For underwear, linen was preferred, as being cooler and cleaner. Wool, falling swiftly a prey to moths and larvae (Is 55:10 et seq.), was not used for wrapping the dead. A garment of mingled wool and linen might not be worn (Lv 19:13, Dt 22:5). Josephus says this was reserved exclusively for the priests (Ant. iv., vili. 11). Dyed wool is referred to (He 9:1, cf. Lv 14:41), but its natural yellow, white, makes it the criterion of whiteness and purity (Ps 147:14, Is 11, Dt 7:4, Rev 1:14). Wool was a valuable article of commerce (Ezek 27:17) and it figures in the tribute paid by King Mesha (2 K 3:4).

W. EWING.

WORD.—Apart from the personal use of 'Word' as a title of Christ (see Loosely), its Biblical interpretation presents few difficulties. Both in the OT and in the NT the original terms employed may pass from the meaning 'speech' to signify the 'subject matter of speech.' In some passages there is uncertainty as to whether the tr. should be word or thing. For example, 1 K 11:19 has 'word or matter' as alternatives to 'the acts of Solomon.' In Ac 8:34 'thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter' probably means 'in the matter in dispute,' which was the coveted power of imparting the gifts of the Holy Spirit; but the RV 'word' is preferred by some expositors, who think that the reference is to the word preached by the Apostles and its attendant blessings (cf. Mk 1:11, Lk 1:1). The EV retains 'word' in Mt 13:42 and 2 Co 13:16, although Dt 13:11 reads: 'At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall every matter be established.'

WORLD.—1. In OT.—In general it may be said that the normal expression for such conception of the Universe is the phrase 'heavens and the earth' (Gen 1, Ps 89:1, 1 Ch 16:5), and that 'world' is an equivalent expression for 'earth.' So far as there is a difference, the 'world' is rather the fruitful, habitable earth, and the 'earth' the life above and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein (Ps 24; cf. 50:29, Is 34:1). The religious sentiments awakened by the contemplation of Nature appear also in references to the heavens and the sea (e.g. Ps 8:1, Job 38:39). But of the ethical differentiation of the world, so prominent in some NT writings, there are in the OT few traces. The 'world' is to be judged righteous (Ps 94:9, 95), and punished for its evil (Is 13:1). The transient character of its riches and pleasures, with the consequent folly of absorption in them, is perhaps indicated by another Hebrew word (meaning 'duration' cf. 'eon') below rendered 'world' at Ps 174 ('men of the world, whose portion is in this life,' RVm); also by the same word at Ps 49 (see the whole Psalm). A word of similar meaning is rendered 'world' in AV at Ps 78:5, Ec 5:4, but RV 'world' only in the latter passage, and gives quite another turn to the sense.

The ethical aspect of the 'world' does not receive any special emphasis in the Apocrypha, though in the Book of Wisdom the scientific interests of the age and the impulses of natural religion are notably quickened (Wis 12:3—14—15, 17—18). There is ample contrast between the stability of the righteous and the vanity of ungodly prosperity (e.g. Wis 5:5—6), but the latter is not always identified with the world. In the NT the Apocrypha the word κόσμος, which in the LXX means 'adornment,' has reached its sense of 'world;' conceived to be a beautiful order; in the NT this becomes the prevalent word.

2. In NT.—(1) αἰὼν (aion), 'age,' is used of the world in its time-aspect: human history is conceived as made up of ages, successive and contemporaneous, converging to and consummated in the Christ. These in their sum constitute the 'world.' God is their Maker (He 11:1 [AV and RV worlds, 'world' better represents the thought]) and their King (1 Ti 1:11 RVm, Rev 19:15 RV).

Hence the phrases 'since the world began,' lit. 'from the age' (Lk 17:11, Jn 6:15); and 'the end of the age,' lit. the 'consummation of the age' (Mt 13:30, 41 24:29) or 'of the ages' (He 9:28). All the 'ends of the world' so conceived meet in the Christian era (1 Co 10:11 [RV 'ages'), cf. He 11:19, 40). Under this time-aspect, also, the NT writers identify their own age with the 'world,' and this, as not merely actual but as typical, is set in new lights. As this present world, it is contrasted explicitly or implicitly with 'the world to come' (Mt 12:30, Mk 10:13, Lk 18:8, 20:44, 8, Eph 1:21, 2 Ti 4:8, Tit 2:12, He 6:6).

In some of these passages there is implied a moral condemnation of this world; elsewhere this receives deeper emphasis. 'The cares of the world choke the word.' (Mt 13:22, Mk 4:19): the 'sons of this world' are contrasted with the 'sons of light.' (Lk 16:9; cf. Ro 12:9.) Eph 2:2 according to the transient fashion [eon] of this material world [kosmos]. This world is evil (Gal 1:4). Its wisdom is taught (1 Co 2:1-3:4), its rulers crucified the Lord of glory (1 Co 2:8); finally, it is the 'god of this world' that has blinded the minds of the unbelieving (2 Co 4:4). This ethical use of cosmos—'world' is not found in the Johannine writings.

(2) But the most frequent term for 'world' is kosmos, which is sometimes extended in meaning to the material universe, as in the phrase 'from the beginning.' (IIoud. 3:14—17). More commonly, however, the word is used of the earth, and especially the earth as the abode of man. To 'gain the whole world' is to become possessed of all possible material wealth and earthly power (Mt 16:19, Mk 8:8, Lk 9:25). Because 'sin entered into the world' (Ro 5:12), it becomes the scene of the Incarnation and the object of Redemption (2 Co 5:14-17); the scene also, alien but inevitable, of the Christian disciple's life and discipline, mission and victory (Mt 5:10; 18:28, Jn 10:28, 1 Co 13:6; Lk 12:31, Rev 11:18). From this virtual identification of the 'world' with mankind, and mankind as separated from and hostile to God, there comes the ethical explanation of the world's great development in the writings of St. Paul and St. John.

(o) The Epiph. of St. Paul. To the Galatians St. Paul describes the pre-Christian life as slavery to the 'natural conditions of the world' (4:9, cf. v.4, through Christ the world is crucified to him and he to the world (6:14). Both thoughts recur in Colossians (2:15-16). In writing to the Corinthians he condemns the wisdom, the passing fashion, the care, the sorrows of the world (1 Co 1:21, cf. 2 Co 10:16, Alberti, 1 St. Paul's teaching, of the 'fall' of Israel as leading to 'the riches of the world,' and of the 'casting away' of them as the 'reconciling of the world' (11:21-22; v.21 and 3:21). What St. Paul contends, then, is hardly the world as essentially evil, but the world-spirit which leads to evil by its neglect of the unseen and eternal, and by its blindness to the true scale of values revealed in the gospel of Christ crucified.

(b) The Gospel and First Ep. of St. John. In these two writings occur more than half the NT instances of the word we are considering. That is, the term kosmos is characteristic of St. John, and, setting aside his frequent use of it in the non-ethical sense, especially as the sphere of the incarnation and saving work of Christ, we find an ethical conception of the 'world' deeper in its shadows than that of St. Paul. It is true that Jesus is the Light of the world (Jn 11:9; 12:46), its Life-giver (10:10), its Saviour (3:16-17); yet, 'the world knew him not' (1:10); and the Fourth Gospel sets out its story of His persistent rejection by the world, in language which at times seems to pass beyond a mere record of contemporary unbelief, and almost to assert an essential dualism of good and evil (7:18-29; 8:12-14; 10:16-18). Here the 'world' is not simply the worldly spirit, but the great mass of mankind in deadly hostility to Christ and His teaching. In contrast stand His disciples, his own which were in the world' (13:18), chosen out of the world (15:19, cf. 17:14), but not of it, and therefore hated as He was hated (15:19, 10, 17:14, 19). For them He intercedes as He does not for the world (17:9). In the 1st Ep. of St. John the same sharp contrasts meet us. The world lies within the scope of God's redemptive purpose in Jesus Christ (2:4-5), yet it stands opposed to His followers as a thing wholly evil, with which they may hold no traffic (2:15-17, cf. Ja 4), knowing them not and hating them (3:14). It is conceived as under the sway of a power essentially hostile to God—'the antichrist' (1:23-24; cf. Eph 6:12). The prince of this world' is said to be 'world' is not to be entreated and persuaded, but fought and overcome by the 'greater one' who is in the disciple of Christ (4:4-5). Faith 'conquers the world,' but John reserves for comparative use the darkest expression of a persistent dualism of good and evil, light and darkness: 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one' (3:13).

The idiomatic use of the term 'world' in Jn 7:19, 1 Jn 2:15-17 are sufficiently obvious. For the difficult expression 'the world of iniquity' applied to the tongue (Ja 3:15), see the Commentaries.

WORM.—1. skls, Is 51:5 (cf. Arab. sah, a moth or a worm), the larvae of a clothes-moth. See Moth. 2. rimmadh (Ex 16:4, Job 29:14). 3. larva, larve, larva, or larve (Ex 16:3, Job 25:4, Is 66:14, Jon 4:6 etc.). Both 2 and 3 are used to describe the same kind of insect, the larvae of the cabbage maggot and other insect larvae which breed on putrid organic matter. These are very common in Palestine, occurring even on neglected sours and, of course, on dead bodies (Job 9:25 21:25, 24:16, 1); Jonath's worm (22:17) was probably some larva which attacks the roots, or perhaps a centipede. The 'worms' of Dt 29:28 were probably caterpillars. 4. rishon (Heb 5th AV), rishon (Pr 12:9) where the same word is also tr. 'rottenness,' it is rendered in LXX skelos, 'wood-worm,' which seems appropriate to the context. 5. zok'hal, zok'hal, worms of the earth' (Mic 7:17), may possibly refer to earth-tottling insects (which are commonly found), or perhaps to serpents. See SERPENT (10). 6. skelos, skelos, Mk 18th ent. The expression 'eaten of worms' used (Ac 12:33) in describing the death of Herod Agrippa I, would seem to refer to a death accompanied by violent abdominal pains, such symptoms being commonly ascribed in the Holy Land to-day to abdominal worms (Lumbricoides)—a belief often revived by the evacuation of such worms near the time of death (cf. p. 600).

WRITING.—I. Pre-historic.—The origin of writing is not recorded in Genesis, where we should expect to find some account of it, but this omission may be intentional. Since God is represented as writing on two Tablets of stone (Ex 32:14), it might seem improper that He should employ a human invention, while, on the other hand, there may have been no tradition that the art was first used on that occasion: the inference is therefore left to be drawn by the reader. Perhaps we may infer from the phrase in Is 8 that there was a style known as 'Divine writing,' being the character used in these Tablets. The Tablets themselves scarcely figure in the historical parts of the OT, neither can we from the Pentateuch learn their contents with precision; yet the tradition that such Tables at one time existed is likely to be trustworthy, and the narratives given in Ex. and Deut. imply that there were whole Tablets of Fragments of Tables which had to be accounted for. From the statement that they were written on both sides afterwards grotesquely misunderstood—we may infer that they resembled cypher writing, in form, and perhaps the original should be rendered by that word.

2. Origin of writing among the Israelites.—It is improbable that the OT contains any documents which in their written form are earlier than the time of David, when we first hear of an official scribe (2 S 8:11). The question of the date at which writing was first in use in Palestine is absolutely distinct from that of its earliest employment by the Israelites, though two are often confused. There is no evidence of Israel ever having employed the cuneiform script or any form of hieroglyphic writing, though both may have been familiar in Palestine before the rise of the Israelitish State. Probably, then, their earliest writing was alphabetic, but whether the Israelites got the art is a question of great difficulty, never likely to be cleared up. It is certain that Hebrew orthography is etymological, i.e. fixed in many cases by the history of the language as well as by its inherent necessity; and, being so, it must have come down by tradition from an earlier stage of the language; yet of this earlier language we have no monuments. The possibilities are: (1) that the Israelish tribes continued the knowledge of writing hereditary; (2) that when they settled in Canaan—however we interpret this phrase—they took over the language, and with it the writing and orthography of the earlier inhabitants; (3) that when the immigrants were settled, teachers of this art, among others, were sent for to Phoenicia. The second of these hypotheses has most in its favour, as it accounts best for the differences between Hebrew and Phoenician spelling.

3. Character of writing.—The alphabet employed by the Israelites consists of 22 letters, written from right to left, or from top to bottom 26 or more sounds, not excluding vowels, which some of the consonants assist in representing. The OT, which has no grammatical terms, never alludes to these signs by name; yet we learn a few letter-names, not from their being employed, but from their use as names of objects resembling those letters: these are ווא (Wa), and תאו (Ta), meaning ‘hook’ and ‘cross’ (like our T-square, etc.), and it seems possible that two more such names may be found in Is 28:18. Practice was common in Western and Eastern countries in the early centuries of our era, and even before; and it has rightly been inferred from the occurrence of these dots that all our copies of the Hebrew OT are back to one of great accuracy. In Bible times the process of graven is indicated by a word signifying ‘to scratch out’ (Ex 32:20), apparently with water (Nu 5:8), whereas in Rabbinical times a word which probably signifies ‘to blow out’ (Ex 39:3) to indicate that they should be “ex-punged,” a term which literally means ‘to point out.’ This practice was common with Western and Eastern scribes in the early centuries of our era, and even before; and it has rightly been inferred from the occurrence of these dots that all our copies of the Hebrew OT are back to one of great accuracy. In Bible times the process of graven is indicated by a word signifying ‘to scratch out’ (Ex 32:20), apparently with water (Nu 5:8), whereas in Rabbinical times a word which probably signifies ‘to scratch out’ is ordinarily employed. The NT equivalent is ‘to smear out,’ etc. Col 2:4 etc. During the period that elapsed between the fall of Jerusalem and the completion of the Talmud, viz. the introduction of a system of signs indicating the vocalization and musical pitch or chant. Of the former, two systems are preserved, an Eastern and a Western, but the familiar Western system won general acceptance. The invention and elaboration of these systems stand in some relation to the efforts made by Syrian Christians and Moslems to perpetuate the correct vocalization and intonation of their sacred books and facilitate their acquisition; and should lead to the formation of a variety of scripts. The style current, as exhibited in the inscription mentioned, and in a weight and a few gems, differs very slightly from that in use in the Phoenician settlements, though it is probably more eared among the descendants of the Israelites than was the case with the Israelites themselves.

3. Character of writing.—The alphabet employed by the Israelites consists of 22 letters, written from right to left, or from top to bottom, 26 or more sounds, not including vowels, which some of the consonants assist in representing. The OT, which has no grammatical terms, never alludes to these signs by name; yet we learn a few letter-names, not from their being employed, but from their use as names of objects resembling those letters: these are ווא (Wa), and תאו (Ta), meaning ‘hook’ and ‘cross’ (like our T-square, etc.), and it seems possible that two more such names may be found in Is 28:18. Practice was common in Western and Eastern countries in the early centuries of our era, and even before; and it has rightly been inferred from the occurrence of these dots that all our copies of the Hebrew OT are back to one of great accuracy. In Bible times the process of graven is indicated by a word signifying ‘to scratch out’ (Ex 32:20), apparently with water (Nu 5:8), whereas in Rabbinical times a word which probably signifies ‘to scratch out’ is ordinarily employed. The NT equivalent is ‘to smear out,’ e.g. Col 2:4 etc. During the period that elapsed between the fall of Jerusalem and the completion of the Talmud, viz. the introduction of a system of signs indicating the vocalization and musical pitch or chant. Of the former, two systems are preserved, an Eastern and a Western, but the familiar Western system won general acceptance. The invention and elaboration of these systems stand in some relation to the efforts made by Syrian Christians and Moslems to perpetuate the correct vocalization and intonation of their sacred books and facilitate their acquisition; and Indeed the Jewish inventions seem based on those already employed by Syrians and Arabs, and both in form and in nomenclature bear evidence of this origin. It would seem, however, that the first employment of vowel-signs for a sacred language be known in the monuments of pagan Abyssinia. We should expect the introduction of extraneous signs into the sacred page to meet with violent opposition, yet of this we have no record; there is, however, evidence that the employment of the same signs for the punctuation of non-Biblical texts was disapproved by a party. The Karaites Jewish appear to have saved the text from these additions by the expedient of transliterating it into Arabic characters, but this practice was soon abandoned, and the MSS which illustrate it belong to a limited period.

Some record of the process by which the text was vocalized would be welcome, for without this it has to be written would be similar to every Jew, and in one case (241) distinctly imply it. Of association of the art of writing with the priestly caste there is perhaps no trace except in Nu 5, where a priest has to write a magical formula; and the fact that in later times the order of scribes was quite distinct from that of priests shows that there was no such association. Unless we are to infer from Jg 6 that the art of writing was not yet known at an early time in the tribe of Zebulun, it would appear that the foreign policy of David first led to the employment of a scribe (2 S 8), such a person doubtless corresponding with the kethib or 'written' label, whereas afterwards it appears there was a written form of the Pentateuch (cf. 2 Mac 9) and circulation of literature in masses probably belong to post-exilic times, when Ecclesiastes can complain that too many books are written (129), and Daniel thinks of the Library (99). But for legal and commercial purposes (as well as epigraphy) the use of writing was common in pre-exilic times. So Jezebel sends a circular note in many copies (1 K 21), which bear the king's seal, probably in the way of a written monument, whereas afterwards the practice of writing up documents fraudulently, Contracts of divorce and purchase of land are mentioned by Jeremiah (24 29 etc.), the latter being attested by witnesses. The images of Is 34, Ps 130 etc. appear to be taken from the practice of bookkeeping, which ben-Sira in the 2nd cent. a.c. so strongly recommends (42). Of genealogical rolls we have seen few new terms for writings and copies were introduced into Hebrew, and we hear of translations ('Ezr 4 written in Aramaic and translated into Aramaic', where the first, 'Aramaic', is surely corrupt), and of manuscripts being learned by Jews (Dt 4). In Esther we read of an elaborate system in use in the Persian empire for the postage of royal communications.

On the whole, we are perhaps justified in asserting that the notion connected with writing in the classical period of Hebrew literature was rather that of rendering matter permanent than that of enabling it to reach a wide circle. Hence the objection that some have found to the Two Tables of stone being hidden away in the ark (unlike the Greek and Roman decrees engraved on public steles) is not really a valid one; the contents are supposed to be graven on the memory (Jer 31), the writing copy serves merely as an authentic text for possible reference in case of doubt—like the standard measures of our time. This theory is very clearly expressed in Dt 31 and 1 S 10, and renders it quite intelligible that the Law should have been forgotten, and recovered after centuries of oblivion. Such instruction as was given to the young was in all probability without the use of any written manuals, and in the form of traditions to be committed to memory. 'We have heard with our ears and our fathers have told us' (Ps 44:1) is the formula by which the process of acquiring knowledge of ancient history is described. The conception of the Law as a book to be read, whereas other literary matter was to be learned and recited without note, is theogical services, such as commenced long after the first Exile. Even in the time of Josephus it would appear that a community rather than an individual was ordinarily the possessor of a copy of the Law, whence the term 'to read,' as in Lk 10:4, is the formula employed in quoting texts of Scripture only, whereas 'to repeat' would be used when the Tradition was cited. Both were doubtless habitually committed to memory and so cited, whence it comes that quotations are so often inaccurate.

6. Writing materials.—The ordinary verb used in Hebrew for 'writing' has in Arabic as its primary sense that of 'sewing' or 'stitching,' whence it might be inferred that the earliest form of writing known to the peoples who employ that word consisted in embroidery or the perforation of stuffs and leavés. More probably the sense of 'writing' comes through an intermediate signification to put together, make a list, compose, of which we have examples in Jgs 8:16, 10:1, and perhaps Hos 5:2 and Pr 22:21; this sense is preserved in Arabic in the word katabah, 'regiment or list of men controlled.' From the Heb. word kathabah, then, we learn nothing as to the nature of the material; more is indicated by a rarer word chappiq, lit. 'to scratch,' which involves a hard surface, such as to the stone or wood; and of 'books' of this sort, calculated to last for ever, we read in Is 30:8 and Job 10:28. Wooden staves are specified as material for writing in Nu 17:16 and Ezk 37:2; and a 'polished surface,' probably of metal, in Is 8:2. The instrument (AV pen) employed in this last case has a peculiar name: that which was employed on stone was called 'kef, and was of iron, with a point at times of some harder substances, such as diamond (Jer 17:1). There appears to be a reference in Job (L.c.) to the practice of filling up the scratches with lead for the sake of greater permanence, but some suppose the reference to be rather to leaden tablets. At some time near the end of the Jewish kingdom, the employment of less cumbersome materials came into fashion, and the word for 'book' (sepher) came to suggest something which could be rolled or unrolled, as in Is 34:1, where a simile is drawn from the latter process, and Is 37:19, where a letter from the king of Assyria—which we should expect to be on clay—is 'spread out'; in the parallel narrative of 2 Kings this detail is omitted. Allusions to rolls become common in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and though their material is not specified, it was probably papyrus; but skins may also have been employed. For writing on these lighter substances, reeds and pigments were required; references to the latter are to be found in Jer 36:4, Ezk 29:3, but of the former (3 Jn 13 ("pen")) there is no mention in the OT, though it has been conjectured that the name of the graving tool was used for the lighter instrument (Ps 45); the later Jews adopted the Greek name, still in use in the East, and various Greek Inventions connected with the preparation of skins. To an Instrument containing ink and probably pens, worn at the waist, there is a reference in Ezk 9:2 (EV inkhorn), and to a penknife in Jer 30:6.

In Roman times parchment appears to have been largely used for rough copies and notes, and to this there is a reference in 2 Ti 4:14. The Apostolic letters were written with ink on papyrus (2 Co 3:2, 2 Jn 3:15c). Zacharias (Lk 1:26) uses a tablet, probably of wood filled in with wax.

Literary works, when rolls were employed, were divided into portions which would fill a roll of convenient size for holding in the hand: on this principle the division of continuous works into 'books' is based, while in other cases a collection of small pieces by a variety of authors was crowded into a single roll. The roll form for copies of the Hebrew Scriptures was maintained long after that form had been abandoned (perhaps as early as the 2nd cent. B.C.) for the paper or parchment in the case of Greek and Syriac copies. The quire was employed, it would appear, only when the material was parchment, the roll form being still retained for papyrus. Paper was brought from the far East by Moslems in the 7th cent. A.D., when factories were founded at Isphahan and elsewhere, and owing to its great cheapness it soon superseded both papyrus and parchment for ordinary purposes. The Jews, however, who were in possession of a system of rules for writing the Law on the latter material, did not readily adopt the new invention for multiplying copies of the Sacred Books.

7. Writing as affecting the text.—It has often been shown that accuracy in the modern sense was scarcely known in ancient times, and the cases in which we have parallel texts of the same narrative in the Bible show that the抄ists took very great liberties. Besides arbitrary alterations, there were others produced accidentally by the nature of the rolls. The writing in these was in columns of breadth suited to the convenience of the eye; in some cases lines were repeated through the eye of the scribe wandering from one column to another. Such a case probably occurs in Gn 4:11, repeated from 3:26. Omissions were ordinarily supplied on the margin, when such a margin existed in a wrong place. There is a notable case of this in Is 30:8, whose true place is learned from 2 K 20:11. Probably some variations were written on the margin also, and such a marginal note gets into the text of Ps 40:6. Ancient readers, like modern ones, at times inserted their judgment of the proportions of the text in marginal comments. Such an observation has got into the text in 2 Mac 12:6, 'It is a holy and godly thought,' and there are probably many more in which the criticism of an unknown reader has accidentally got embodied with the original: Ec 12:11 appears to contain a case of this sort. A less troublesome form of insertion was the colophon, or statement that a book was finished, c.g., Pr 72:24. Similar editorial matter is found in Pr 25, and frequently elsewhere. An end was finally put to these alterations and additions by the registration of words, letters, and grammatical forms called Massorah, of which the origin, like all Hebrew literary history, is obscure, but which probably was perfected during the course of many generations. Yet, even so, Jewish writers of the Law were thought to be less accurate than copyists of the Koran.

ZACHARIAH, ZACHARIAS

YARN.—1. This is prob. the correct tr. of 'yarun' (a word of doubtful etymology) in Pr 7:5. 2. In Ezk 27:2 RV 'yarn' is very doubtful (cf. BVM and-art, USAL). 3. In 1 K 10:8 miqueb should be tr. 'drove' (RV), not 'yarn' (AV). See also SPINNING AND WEAVING, 4 (b); TRADE AND COMMERCE, 4.

to a scribe, who perhaps was misled by the mention by Josephus of a 'Zacharias son of Baruch,' murdered in the Temple by the Zealots (BJ iv. 4). Origen's guess that the father of the Baptist is meant is scarcely tenable.

ZACHARY (2 Es 16) —Zachariah the prophet.

ZADOK.—1. Founder of an important branch of the priesthood in Jerusalem. The reading of MT in 2 S 8:15 (»1 Ch 15b) being doubtful, there is no definite information concerning his family except in the genealogical lists in 1 Ch 6:14-18, 24-26, in which his descent is traced from Eleazar the elder son of Aaron; but these details are of doubtful reliability. He is first mentioned in 2 S 8:15, where perhaps he should be associated with Abiathar in the correct text, as he is in 2 S 15-16. He was appointed priest by Solomon in place of Abiathar (1 K 2:27), because of his own loyalty (1 K 1:1) and the disloyalty of Abiathar (v.?). From this it is evident that his position hitherto had been inferior to that of Abiathar, although his name regularly has the precedence in Samuel. From the time of Solomon the descendants of Zadok constituted the most prominent family among the priests, the high priests being taken from them till the time of the Maccabees. To Ezekiel the Zadokites are the only legitimate priests (40:4-6 [40:4-5, 48:39]).

2. A warrior of David's, of the house of Aaron (1 Ch 12:36), identified by Josephus (Ant. vii. 2) with 1, against all probability.

3. Maternal grandfather of Jotham (2 K 15:5, 2 Ch 27?).

4. Son of Banaah (see Ezr 2:6, Neh 7:7), a helper of Nehemiah in re-building the wall (Neh 3:25).

5. Son of Immer, regarded as a portion of the wall (Neh 3:26).

6. 'The scribe,' probably a priest, appointed a treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh 13:2); possibly to be identified with 7. One of the 'chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:12).

8. An ancestor of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1:1; AV and RV additions, see G. E. BECKY)

ZAHAM.—A son of Rechoba (2 Ch 11).

ZAIN.—The seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 7th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

ZAIR.—According to the MT of 2 K 20, Jerusalem, in the course of his campaign against Edom, 'passed over to Zahir.' In the parallel passage, 2 Ch 21:19, the Heb. is 'passed over with his princes,' which may be more correctly understood to be a corruption of the text in the King James Version. The latter itself is unfortunately not certain.—So that the identification of the place in question is impossible.

ZALAPH.—The father of Hanun (Neh 3:20).

ZALMON.—1. The hill near Shechem where Abimelech and his followers cut wood for the burning down of the stronghold of Basli-beth (Jg 9:4). Possibly the same mountain is meant in Is 68:14, where a snowstorm is apparently referred to as contributing to the scattering of 'kings' opposed to the people of Jehovah. As the Psalm refers to incidents of wars not related in the canonical books, we have to look to the times of the Maccabees; and the most obvious allusion is to the retreat of the army of Tryphon in b.c. 143, when he attempted to relieve the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem and was prevented by a heavy fall of snow (1 Mac 13:7).—See 1.

ZALMONAH.—An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33:11).

ZALMUNNA.—See ZEBAH.

ZAMBRI (1 Es 9:4) —Ezr 10:10 Amariah.

ZAMOTH (1 Es 9:9) —Ezr 10:27 Zattu.

ZAMUMMIM.—A name given by the conquering Ammonites to the Rephaim, the original inhabitants of the land (Dt 29:4). They are described as a people 'great and many and tall like the Anakim' (see art. REPHAIM). The name Zammummit has been connected with Arab. zamam 'a distant and confused noise,' and with zirim, the sound of the firm heard in the desert at night. The word may thus perhaps be translated 'Whiteperas,' and 'Murrumites,' and the name of Zamban in the villages supposed to haunt the hills and ruins of Eastern Palestine (cf. art. ZIZIM).

ZAPHENATH-PANAH.—The name given by Pharaoh to Joseph (Gn 41:50). It should evidently be read Z-p-net-f-jômakh, meaning in Egypt, 'God hath said he liveth'—a common type of Egyptian name in late times (see PHARAOH, 2, and cf. JOSEPH, p. 495).

ZAPHON ("north").—A city E. of Jordan, assigned to Gad (Jos 13:27). It is named also in Jg 12, where Zaphaphah should be rendered 'to Zaphon' (RVv) instead of 'northward.' (AV and RV). Possibly the Talmudic tradition is correct which identifies Zaphon with Amathus, the modern 'Amál, a little north of the Jabbok, at the mouth of Wady er-Rugeb. Zaphon is probably connected with Zephon (Gn 46:26), or (more remotely) Zaphon, with gentle name Zephonites (Num 26:25), described as a 'son' of Gad.

ZARAIAH.—1. 1 Es 8:5-Seraijah, Ezr 2:11; Azariah, Neh 7:7. 2. 1 Es 8:8, one of the ancestors of Ezra, called Zerahiah, Ezr 7:1, and Arza, 2 Es 11:3, 1 Es 3:28—Zerahiah, the father of Elseleoni, Ezr 8:4, 1 Es 3:28—Zedebiah, Ezr 8:8.

ZARAK.—Called in 1 Es 11:36th of Josakim or Jehosakim, king of Judah, and said to have been brought up out of Egypt by him. The name appears to be a corruption, through confusion of Heb. d and r, of Zedekiah, who was a brother of Jehoshakim (2 K 24:27). The verse of 1 Es. is entirely different from the corresponding passage in 2 Ch 36:21.

ZARDEUS (1 Es 9:38) —Ezr 10:10 Azira.

ZAREPHATH.—The Arab. village of Sarafend lies on a promontory about eight miles south of Zidon. On the shore in front of it are the scattered remains of what must have been a considerable town, the Zarephath or Sarepta of the Bible. Zarephath originally belonged to Zidon (1 K 17:7), but passed into the possession of Tyre after the assistance rendered by the fleet of Zidon to Achish in the battle. In b.c. 222 in his abortive attempt to capture Jbaal Tyre. In Lk 4:33 it is again called a city of Zidon (RV 'in the land of Sidon'). Zarephath is included in the list of towns captured by Sennacherib when he invaded Phoenicia in b.c. 701. It was the town in which Elijah lodged during the years of famine (1 K 17:4-5).

ZARETHAN (Jos 21:35, 1 K 13:4 21).—Three readings of this name appear, the other two being Zeredah (1 K 11:19, 2 Ch 6:17) and Zererah (Jdg 7:5). It is probable that all these names refer to the same place, and that it must be sought on a ford of the Jordan on the W. side. The most probable spot is near the Jibr ed-Damieh at the junction of the Jabbok and the Jordan.

ZATHUI.—1 Es 8:36; possibly stands for Zathu. The name does not appear in the Heb. of the corresponding passage Ezr 8:4, to be corrected from 1 Es. so as to read 'Of the sons of Zattu, Shecaniah the son of Jahanel.'

ZATHU1 (1 Es 8:24) —Zattu, Ezr 2:1, Neh 7:21; called also Zathu1, 1 Es 3:28.

ZATTU.—A family of exiles that returned (Ezr 2:21 = Neh 7:21 [1 Es 5:24 Zathu1]); several members of this family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:27 [1 Es 9:23 Zomoth]); its head sealed the covenant (Neh 10:18).—See also ZATHUS.

ZAFA.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2:28).
ZEALOT

ZEALOT.—See CANANEEAN, MYSTERI (p. 610 a f.), PHARISEES.

ZEBDIAH. 1. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 8:17). 2. One of those who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:7). 4. One of David’s officers (1 Ch 27:7). 5. An exile who returned with Ezra’s second company (Ezr 8:31); called in 1 Es 3:27 Zerias. 6. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:26); called in 1 Es 92 Zabdeus.

ZEBADIAH (Keththb and RV) or ZEBUDAH (Keré and AV).—The mother of Jehoshaphat (1 K 2:33).

ZEBINA.—One of the sons of Nebi who had married a foreign wife (Est 10:9).

ZEBOIM. 1. The tent of Jacob, and the sixth of Leah (Gen 30:14). 2. One of the five cities of the Plain (Gen 10:14, 11:1, Dt 29:19, Hos 11:14 [AV and RV here Zebaim]). The site has not been identified. See, further, PLAIN (CITIES OF THE).

ZEBOIM. 1. The ravine of Zeb’oim (‘ravine of the hyenas’) is named in Is 10:28 in describing the route followed by one of the bands of Philistine marauders. It is prob. the Wady el-Kelt or one of its branches. The name Wady abu Dadd (‘hyena gorge’) is still applied to a ravine in this neighbourhood. The statement of Judges 1:5 appears to be referred to in the Zebaim of Neh 11:14, 2. Hos 11:1, See ZEBOIM.

ZEBUDAH. —See ZEBINA.

ZEBUL. A lieutenant of Abimelech (wh. see), who was left by him as governor of Shechem. He cleverly assisted his master in suppressing the revolt of Jotham (Judg 9:44). The episode is obscure, but he apparently acted loyally from the first; having no force at his command, he was obliged to use craft. This is clear, if vv. 45, 46 belong to a different narrative. C. W. EMMET.

ZEBULON. According to OT tradition, Zebulon was the tenth son of Jacob, and the sixth of Leah (Gen 30:14). The original form of the name is uncertain, there being some evidence in favour of Zebul, and even Zebul. The meaning of the name is likewise very doubtful. The king’s mark of a double connection. One of these (apparently E’s) connects it with the verb zebah ‘to endow’; the other (which dis.sp. from zebah) ‘to dwell’; —because Leah said, ‘Now will my husband dwell with me’ (so AV and RV following the Vulg. habitation). The Assyr. meaning of zabul, however, was ‘to become great’ or ‘to grow fat’, and it would seem that it was used for this isolated use of the Hebrew verb, for the remark, ‘Now will my husband dwell with me,’ appears rather grandioses and pointless after she had borne him six sons. The phrase beth zebul, 1 K 8:8, moreover, implies a connotation of zebal different from that of ‘dwell’, for the context involves another purpose as ‘a place where to dwell in.’ Zebul is here used of the dwelling of God, elsewhere of the sun and moon, and, therefore, probably designated originally, in harmony with the Assyrian, a lofty abode, a bith-er, or mountain sanctuary, such as is referred to in Dt 33:24 as being in the territory of Zebulon in the time of Assyria. If so, the name which is related to zbl, is rather of geographical import in its historic application to the tribe.

Zebulon, according to Gen 49:15, is the progenitor of three tribal families through his three sons Sered, Elon, and Jahleel, who went down into Egypt with the other sons and grandsons of Jacob. The first and last of these names are notably like the town name Sarda in the Kingdom of Nahalal, which were allotted to Zebulun according to Jos 19:11. There is no name corresponding to Elon in this passage, but the names of seven of the twelve tribes spoken of have not been lost.

At the time of the Sinai census the male Zebulunites from 20 years old and upwards numbered 57,400, and their lot on the march was cast on the east of the Tabernacle, with Judah and Issachar (Nu 1:14 f.). All of these, as in the case of the men of the other tribes, died before the next census in the plains of Moab, where, nevertheless, the total reached 60,500 (Nu 26:46 f.).

The boundary line marked off by lot in Jos 19:14-20 goes only the southern and eastern borders, and is difficult to follow. Starting on the south with Sarid (Tell Shaddad I), about five miles S.W. of Nazareth, it reached Jokneam, eight miles due W., on the farther side of the plain of Zebulun. It continued north to the same distance eastwards, reaching, at the west of Mt. Tabor, Daberen (which, however, in 218 fell to Issachar), and then, if the text and identifications are correct, which is improbable, turned still further west again to Japhia. Thence it continued in a north-easterly direction, passing Gath-hepher and Rimmon, and across the plain until it reached Hannathon, known to Babylonians, e. n. 1400, as Hannath (Hannath), which was held by Amenhotep. The remaining statement, ‘and the going out thereof were at the valley of Ipsael,’ would indicate that the line turned at Hannathon south-west-easterly direction, perhaps towards Japhia. There would thus be no distinctly northern border, but only a north-western. The western is left undefined; but as Asher is made to reach to Carmel, and its S.E. point to join Zebulun at the valley of Ipsael (vv. 21, 22), there is no room left for the access of Zebulun to the sea. Jacob’s Song, however, uses the same expression (Gen 49:6) as is used of Asher in Jg 1:32, and apparently extends the border to Sidon. In the ‘Blessing of Moses’ it is said that ‘Zebulun and Issachar shall abund the sacrifice of the sea’ (Dt 33:19). This, as is clear from the inclusion of Issachar, implies only that their position will be such as to enable them to obtain the march of the sea traffic. The delimitations of the tribal boundaries in Joshua are very indefinite, and often in conflict with one another and with other data. Of the five cities mentioned in 19:10, the only one whose site is identified with certainty is that of Nahalal. The modern Ma’aloth may represent Nahalal, one of the four cities which, according to Jos 21:14 (P), was given by the Zebulunites to the sons of Morath (Levites). Roughly speaking, Zebulun lay to the N.E. of Carmel, between Issachar on the S.E. and Asher on the N.W.

Zebulon shared in the natural richness and fertility of the rest of Galilee, and the great ‘way of the sea’ (the via maris of the Crusaders) which ran through its territory, and from Acre to Damascus, brought it into touch with the outer world and its products.

In the war against Jabin 10,000 men of Zebulon and Naphtali went with Barak against Sisera, and in the battle, whose issues were of decisive importance to the tribes of Israel, they immobilized themselves by their bravery (Jg 4:9). They, like the other tribes, failed, however, to obtain the Canaanites from the city strongholds. One of the men of the Judges came from this tribe, viz. Elon, who headed the tribes in the anarchy and troublesome time preceding the kingdom (Jg 12:10). In later history, Zebulun, like the other northern tribes, played an unimportant role. According to 2 K 15:24, it would appear that the fate of the other tribes of Galilee overtook this tribe in the days of Pekah, when the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser carried them captive to Assyria. See also art. Tiglath-pileser.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

ZECHARIAH, king of Israel, was the last member of the house of Jehu to come to the throne, and he occupied it only six months. His assassination begins the period of virtual anarchy with which the history of Israel comes to an end (2 K 14:25-12.5). E. F. SMYTH.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.—The first eight chapters contain the genuine prophecies of Zechariah. Chs. 9-14 are sharply distinguished from these in form, language, and thought. They are generally regarded as anonymous prophecies which became attached to the original book, and are often spoken of as Deutero-Zechariah.

1. CHAPTERS 1-8.—1. Historical occasion.—According to Ezra (5:6), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah roused Zerubbabel and Joshua to build the Temple, and the work went forward prosperously through their prophesying. The dates given in the book itself assign the prophecies to the second and fourth years of Darius (c. 520, 518). The first message (1:1-14) is placed two months after the first address of Haggai, between the second and third. The section 17-19 is about two months later than the last addresses of Haggai, while chs. 7, 8 follow after an interval of nearly two years. The prophecies are thus associated with the earlier part of the building. The building is the re-building of the Temple, and their contents connect themselves with this occasion.

2. Contents.—The book opens with an exhortation to return unto Jehovah (1:4), based upon God's wonderful acts of mercy and grace (chs. 1-7), and his declaration of mercy (8:3-17). The messages of the past he can draw broad and deep moral lessons, with something of the freedom and consciousness of immediate Divine illumination that distinguished an Amos or an Isaiah. Yet, even in the pages where this is most observable, one feels a harkening back that was not characteristic of the earlier prophecy—less of vital touch with present conditions and with the God in whose name he speaks. The centering of hope in prince and prophet is not prominent, and the result is that the greater part of the prophecy is past, sharply distinguishes Zephaniah from his pre-exilic predecessors. In the visions, the machinery of apocalypse, introduced by Ezekiel, has become an end in itself, and Zephaniah's characteristic apocalyptic spirit, however, with its revelling in the blood of enemies, is noticeably lacking. Zephaniah loves, rather, to dwell upon peace and prosperity, upon sin removed, and the Divine spirit infusing the earth. His message is rich and full, for he has caught the ethical enthusiasm of the great eighth-century prophets, and has enriched it by the spiritual insight of Jeremiah and the glorious hopes of the exile prophets. Zephaniah is more inevitable. How many separate prophecies, so far as the differences, may be embodied in these six chapters, is not determinable with equal clearness. On the whole, however, 9–11 (with 13–9) seem distinct from 12–14. Let us not see the data which indicate distinct sections as beginning at 11:4 and 14:1. It is not possible to connect chs. 9–14 positively with any known events in the post-exilic history. In general, the historical situation seems to be that of the years after Alexander's conquests and death, when the Egyptian and Syrian rulers struggled for the possession of Palestine. Possibly some of the material comes from the time just before or during the archaic struggles.

2. Contents.—In 9–11 the oracle is one of doom upon Israel's neighbours, with promises of dominion and prosperity for Israel, restored to her land. The little burden of the word 'Jehovah' is very unusual, occurring elsewhere only in Zec 12:2 and Mal 1:1. The opening message of doom upon Israel's neighbours bears outward resemblance to Amos, but the ethical ground of Amos's denunciation is noticeably lacking. If vv. 7–9 are rightly interpreted as referring to food usually clean, the contrast with the prophet is still more pronounced. V. 9, with its confirming promise, seems to reflect the desolation of the Temple, as in the past. This is followed by the prediction of the coming king of peace—a beautiful lyric which breaks in sharply upon the context, and is followed by a prediction of successful resistance to the Greeks, and victory given through Jehovah. The shepherds of Judah, Jehovah's flock, are condemned, and victory is promised to the flock. The house of Judah shall be strengthened, and the house of Joseph restored to its land. In 11:27, 13:7 the figure of the false shepherds, introduced in the preceding section, is worked out into an allegory of the false and true shepherd, in a way that enables the prophet to illustrate the frustration of God's beneficent purpose by the obstinacy of His people, as well as the evil character of their rulers. The three shepherds cut off in quick succession strongly suggest the conditions shortly before the Maccabean uprising, but the highly symbolic and somewhat involved nature of the prophecy renders it precarious to seek any exact picture of immediate conditions; our ignorance, too, of large portions of the post-exilic age makes it impossible to say that some other time may not have furnished an equally appropriate occasion.

The second main division of chs. 9–14, beginning with ch. 12, leads us immediately into the familiar apocalyptic prophecies introduced by Zephaniah, and developed by Ezekiel and Joel. The nations are assembled against Jerusalem, there to be consumed through the power of Jehovah. Hope centres in the house of David, and yet this house, it would seem, is now reduced to the position of merely one of the important families of the people. The closing verses of the first section in this division (13:4) indicate a time when prophecy is utterly degraded—false, prophetic, unclean spirit are evils to be removed. Ch. 14 gives another apocalyptic vision of the age of Jerusalem. The onslaught is terrible, and the discomfiture of her enemies is wrought only after great affliction. In this little apocalypse the vengeful, proud hopes with which the wretched, persecuted Jews consoled themselves throughout the later pre-Christian centuries, and on into Christian times and vivid expression. With these hopes there is clearly presented that late, narrow, apocalyptic spirit which finds its climax in medieval apocalyptic, in a wide recognition of the feasability and innumerable clean boiling-pots for the sacrifices. It is evident that this closing oracle of this collection, the prophecy assigned to Zephaniah carries us far into 'the night of legalism.'

HENRY T. FOWLER.

ZECHER (1 Ch 9:27) = ZECHARIAH.

ZECHARIAH.—An ancestor of Ezra (1 Es 9:1).

ZEDAD.—One of the points mentioned in defining the northern border of the Promised Land in Nu 34; and again in Ezekiel's ideal picture, Eze 47:20. The reading is uncertain; not improbably it should be Zerad. The place may perhaps be identified with Khirbet Serada, N. of Abil, E. of Merj 'Ajun, towards Hermon.

ZEDEKIAH.—1. Son of Chenaanah, and one of Ahab's four hundred court prophets (1 K 22:9, 10, 2 Ch 18:19, 20). 2. A prophet deported to Babylon with Jehoiachin. He and another, named Abiah, are denounced by Jeremiah (25:20-23) for gross immorality as well as for falsely prophesying a speedy restoration from Babylon. It was probably their action as political agitators that brought on them the cruel punishment of being roasted in the fire by the Babylonians. 3. Son of Hananiah, one of the princes in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 26:18). 4. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10). 5. See next article.

ZEDEKIAH, the last king of Judah before its fall at the hands of the Babylonians, is known to us only through the historical books, but also from references in the Book of Jeremiah. He was the third son of Josiah to assume the royal title. Jehohaz was deposed by the Pharaoh: Jehoiakim had a troubled reign of eleven years, and escaped the vengeance of Nebuchadrezzar by dying just before the Babylonian reached Jerusalem. The young Jehoiachin suffered for the sin of his father, being carried into captivity after three months of barren kingship. With him were carried away the chief men of Judah to the number of eight thousand, Neubuchadrezzar thinking thus to break the seditious temper of the people. Over the remnant left behind Zeedekiah was made king. His earlier name, Mattaniah, was changed to Zedekiah (meaning 'righteousness of Jehovah'), to indicate that the Babylonian monarch, in punishing the treachery of Jehoiakim, had the God of Judah on his side (2 K 24:17). We are told by Ezekiel (28:21, 14) that Zeedekiah 'sat as king upon his throne,' but his exaltation did not last; he was taken prisoner to Babylon, and was put to death by his executioners. For Zaraekes of 1 Es 1:18 see ZARKAKES.

Neubuchadrezzar's confidence that the people would be submissive after the severe lesson they had received was disappointed. The new men who came to the front were as headstrong as, and even more foolish than, their predecessors. They were blind to the ludicrous insufficiency of their resources, and determined to play the game of politics against the great nations of the world. The court of Zedekiah was the centre of intrigues against the Babylonian power, and the plotters were fed with promises from Egypt. Zedekiah showed himself weak man, unable to cope with the situation. In his fourth year ambassadors appeared at Jerusalem from the surrounding nations, to concert common measures against the oppressor. The majority of the prophets encouraged the movement; only Jeremiah saw the madness of the undertaking, and declared against it. His bold declaration of the truth brought upon him the enmity of the courtiers. Zedekiah seems to have been called to account by the great king, to whom he made some explanation which satisfied him, or at least fulfilled suspicion for a time. The movement itself came to nothing at this time. But in Zedekiah's ninth year renewed promises from Egypt induced the Jerusalemites to revolt, and Zedekiah was too weak to restrain them. Nebuchadnezzar replied promptly by marching in person against the rebels. Jerusalem was a stronghold in which the people had confidence, and they seem also to have believed fanatically that Jehu would intervene to protect His Temple. This faith was raised to a high pitch by the approach of an Egyptian army under Pharaoh-hophra; for Nebuchadrezar was compelled to raise the siege to meet the new enemy. The expression of the people's confidence that they had got from Jehu all that they desired is seen in the indecent haste with which they reduced again to slavery the servants whom they had set free in order to obtain His favour (2 Ch 36:4).

The joy was short-lived. The Egyptians were hardly a serious problem to Nebuchadnezzar, and soon left him free to resume the siege, which he did with energy. The strongly fortified city was defended as its inhabitants did against with the courage of despair, and held out a year and a half. During this time they suffered all the horrors of siege, famine, and pestilence. Jeremiah, who still predicted disaster, was arrested, and would have perished in his dungeon had it not been for the compassion of one of the king's slaves (Jer 38). Zedekiah, who believed in him, consulted him by stealth, but could not nerve himself to follow the advice he received. When at last the wall was breached, the king attempted to escape to the Jordan valley, hoping thus to gain the eastern desert. But he was overtaken and carried to Nebuchadrezar. The victor, considering that forbearance had been too great a virtue, slew the king and blinded him before his eyes, then blinded the king himself and carried him away in chains to Babylon. The kingdom of Judah had come to an end (2 K 25:18).

ZEEB.—See ZEBEED AND ZEEB.

ZELAH.—A Benjamite city (Jos 18:39), where was the family burying-place of Saul (2 S 21:4) [see also Nebuzar-adan as the chief priest]. Its site has not been discovered.

ZELAN.—One of David's heroes (2 S 23:9 = 1 Ch 11:9).

ZELOPHOTHAD.—A Manassite who died during the wilderness journeys, leaving no male issue. His five daughters successfully asserted their claim to the inheritance of their father (Nu 26:46; 36:11-13, Jos 17:1, 2 Ch 7:7, 9).

ZELZAH.—In 1 S 10:8 Samuel tells Saul that he will find 'two men by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah.' No such place is known to us, and the reference is strange after the definite mention of Rachel's sepulchre. The LXX does not regard it as a proper name, and reads 'Leaping furiously'; and the Vulgate reads 'in the south.' Neither of these can be correct. Possibly the Greek of the LXX is a transliteration of some Heb. word, which was not understood and was then transformed into something significant in Greek. The meaning remains uncertain.
contemptuous taunts with which they had upbraided Judah (2 K 25:19) such taunts as, according to Ezekiel 20:40-44, these peoples hurled at the Jews after the Fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.; in the case of Assyria, in her presumptuous arrogance and self-confidence (20:1-9). According to the gentiles of the time, Zerahiah, like Jeremiah, who was prophesying at the same time, expected the Scythians to be the instruments of this judgment; for at about this time hordes of these barbarians were pouring into Asia. According to Marti, Zerahiah's original prophecy confined itself to a prediction of a destructive invasion by the Scythians, who, coming from the north, would first sweep through Judah, then southwards through Philistia to Ethiopia in the eastern central and then, turning backwards, would overwhelm the Assyrian empire. The references to Moab and Ammon, and the touches which universalizes the judgment, must in this case owe their insertion into Zerahiah's prophecy to later editors. Many also think that the promises in chs. 1. 2 (see chiefly 2 K 18-20) are later than Zerahiah.

Ch. 5 contains (1) a description of the sins of Jerusalem (5:1-7); this may be a solemn denunciation of Zerahiah's, parallel to ch. 1 and particularizing rather different sins, or a prophetic description of Jerusalem at a later date; (2) a description of a universal judgment from the midst of the holy remnant of Judah with special regard to the sons of Zedekiah (the principal of priests) (5:8-12); (3) a description of the glory of the Jews after Jehovah has delivered them from captivity (5:13-19). All of ch. 5 may be of post-exilic origin, and the third section can scarcely be pre-exilic. Inserted in the midst of the second section are two verses (5:14-15) which, like 2:11, predict that Jehovah will be universally worshipped; these also are probably of post-exilic origin.

It seems clear that Zerahiah, like the prophets of the 8th cent. and his own contemporary, Jeremiah, was, primarily, a prophet of judgment to come upon his own people. In this respect he differed from two prophets of his own generation—Nahum and Habakkuk, both of whom, however, probably prophesied after the Reformation of Josiah. Nahum is entirely concerned with judgment on Assyria; Habakkuk is perplexed by what to Zerahiah might have appeared the fulfilment of his prophecy—the present troubles of Judah. Zerahiah marks no new departure in prophetic activity or thought, but by his moral earnestness, and his insistence on the need for a single-hearted devotion to the demands of Jehovah for righteousness, he performed for his own generation the service rendered a century earlier by Isaiah, whose influence on his thought and teaching is obvious (cf. particularly 15:12, with Isa 26:8).

Owing more especially to textual corruption, parts of the book, even in the R.V., are unintelligible: see Driver, "Minor Prophets," vol. ii. (Century Bible); G. A. Smith, Book of the Twelve Prophets, vol. ii. pp. 35-74 containing a translation from a critically emended text; see also A. B. Davidson's Commentary on the AV in the Cambridge Bible. G. B. Gray.

ZEPHANIAH.—See HORMAN.

ZEPHATHIAN.—An unknown locality named only (if the text is correct) in 2 Ch 14: 4 (4).

ZEPHI (1 Ch 14: 4) or ZEPHO (Gn 38: 12).—A son of Eliphaz, and one of the 'dukes' of Edom.

ZEPHON, ZEPHONITES.—See ZAPHON.

ZER.—A 'fenced' city of Naphtali (Jos 19: 33). It follows Ziddim (properly Hazziddim [with art.]), which may be the modern Hattin, N.W. of Tiberias. The identity of Zer is quite uncertain.

ZERAH.—1. One of the sons of Reub (Gn 38: 11, 1 Ch 1: 18). The name appears again as that of the father of Jobah, one of the early kings of Edom (Gn 38: 11, 1 Ch 1: 18). 2. The younger-born of the twin sons of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law (Gn 38: 30). He gives his name to the Zerahites (Nu 26: 39). Of this family was Achan, the son of Zabdi (Jos 7) or Zerah (1 Ch 2: 29). Zerah's sons are mentioned in 1 Ch 9: 6, and Pethahiah (Neh 11: 12) is one of his descendants. He finds a place in the genealogy of our Lord (Mat 1: 10).

2. A son of the family of Zerah with regard to his nickname (Gn 14: 1). This is an exilic family of Zerah within that tribe (Nu 26: 39, 1 Ch 4: 43); called also Zochar (Gn 46: 13, Ex 6: 4). A Levite, born, according to a Genoshite (1 Ch 6: 43) and a Kohathite (1 Ch 6: 45). 6. The name of the Cushite (2 Ch 14: 6) who invaded Judah in the reign of Asa. The story of this invasion is unknown to secular history, and rests solely upon the authority of the Chronicler. There has been much controversy as to its historicity, and the question is still involved in obscurity. In any case the numbers in the text of Chron. (580,000 men in Asa's army, 1,000,000 in Zerah's) are incredibly large.

ZERADAH, ZERERAH.—See ZARETHAN.

ZERESH.—The wife of Haman (Est 5: 14, 6: 14).

ZERETH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4: 7).

ZERETH-SHANAH.—A Reubenite town (Jos 13: 23). Its site has not been identified.

ZERI.—See Izar.

ZEROR.—An ancestor of Saul (1 S 9: 4).

ZERUHAH.—The mother of Jeroboam (1 K 11: 27).

ZERUBBABEL (meaning uncertain, perhaps 'offspring of Babel'; the form Zorobabel is used in the Apocrypha).—The son of Shealtiel, and related to the house of David. He was the leader of one of the bands that returned from the Captivity (Ezr 2: 1, Neh 7?), and was at one time pechah or 'governor' of Judah (Hag 1: 6 etc.). On the question of his identity with Sheshbazzar, see SHESHBASSAR. As the servant of the Lord and His specially chosen one, he is designated as one who is to be specially honoured in the 'day of the Lord,' for which reason he is called the 'signet' (Hag 2: 25). Both Haggai and Zechariah point to Zerubbabel and the high priest Joshua as those who are to re-build the Temple (Hag 1: 12-13, Zec 4: 14-15); this was done, though after considerable delay owing to enemies of the Jews; it was only after a special appeal had been made to Darius that the work was proceeded with unimpeded (Ezr 6: 14). From Zechariah's fourth 'night-vision' (Zec 3: 8, esp. vv. 8-14) we learn that Zerubbabel was looked upon as the coming Messiah; in this night-vision it is pointed out that Joshua and his fellows are a pledge and an earnest of the near approach of the Messiah—the 'Branch,' as he is here called; the stone which is to adorn his crown is ready, and Jehovah Himself is about to engrave thereon a fitting inscription; when the Messiah comes, God will obliterate all guilt from the people, and peace shall rest upon the land (see BRANCH). Although Zerubbabel is not mentioned here by name, a comparison of the passages Zec 3: 8-14, 4: 14-6: 12 makes it reasonably certain that he is intended.

This period of Jewish history presents not a few very difficult problems; one of the burning questions has reference to the respective parts played in the rebuilding of the Temple and the re-organisation of the Jewish State generally, by the returned exiles, and by the 'people of the land' who had been left behind when the rest were carried off to Babylon; this question has an important bearing on the subsequent history of Judaism.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ZERUIAH.—The mother of David's officers Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, who are always referred to as 'sons of Zeruiah.' The father's name is never mentioned, and he may have died early; or the mother may have been so remarkable a woman that her husband's name was not generally known or we have the privilege of tracing kinship through the female line.

In 1 Ch 2:48 Zeruiah and Abigail are called 'sisters of the sons of Jesse,' but in 2 S 17:25 Abigail is called the daughter of Nahash. It seems more probable that for Nahash in 2 S 17:25 we ought to read Jesse, than that Jesse's wife had previously been married to Nahash the Ammonite. According to this view, Zeruiah would be the daughter of Jesse and sister of David.

ZETHAM.—A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23:26).

ZETHAN.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7:9).

ZETHAR.—A eenuch of king Abasenurus (Est 1:12).

ZEUS.—See JUPITER.

ZIA.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5:4).

ZIBA.—A servant, probably a freedman, of Saul. He appears before David (2 S 9:1-4), possessing 15 sons and 20 servants, and is consulted as to the existence of any members of the house of Saul. He informs David of the retreat of Mephibosheth, to whom David restores the lands of his father and appoints Ziba steward. On David's flight from Jerusalem (2 S 16:9) Ziba followed him, was set out with provisions, and accused Mephibosheth of treachery. He received a grant of his master's lands, but on David's return Mephibosheth was able to clear himself and was allowed to retain a half (2 S 19:20-26).

W. F. BOYD.
paradise uselessly. The present walls of the city were built by Mamelukes (Ali of Egypt, 1382-1430). A great fortress, Kat'at el-Bahr, 'Castle of the Sea,' dating from the 13th cent., stands on the largest of the islands, which is joined to the mainland by a bridge of 9 arches. The fishermen and other occupations are fishing, and the cultivation of the gardens and orange groves for which modern Zidon is famous. While the oldest existing buildings date from the Middle Ages, there are many remains of great antiquity, traces of walls, hewn stones, pillars, columns, and the reservoir cut out of the rock. The most important discoveries so far have been (1855) the sarcopha-gus of king Es Shanazar (early in the 4th cent. B.C.), with the well-known inscription, now in Paris; and (1887) the tomb containing 17 Phoenician and Greek sarcophagi, highly ornamented; among them that of Tabnit, father of Es Shanazar, and the alleged sarcopha-gus of Alexander the Great. W. EWING.

ZIHA.—A family of Nethinim (Ezr 2: 17—Neh 7: 42); called in 1 Es 8: 31 Esau.

ZIKLAK.—A town given by Achish king of Gath to the outlawed David (1 S 27: 10, 21, 8 14: 2, 1 Ch 12: 29). In the national register of cities it is assigned to Judah (Jos 15: 62). Its site is mentioned in the post-exilic list (Neh 11: 19). It has been identified with Zuhelilka, 11 m. S. E. of Gaza, and 20 m. S.W. from Eleutheropolis. H. L. WILLETT.

ZELLAH.—See Adah, No. 1.

ZELLETHAI.—1. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 8: 33).

2. A Mnaazite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12: 24).

ZILPAH.—A slave-girl given to Leah by Lahan, Gn 29: 20 (P), and by her to Jacob as a concubine, 30: 2 (J); the mother of Gad and Asher, v. 10, 11 (J), 33: 37, 46 (H) (all P). Cf. art. Tamar of Israel.

ZIMPAN.—A family of Gersomite Levites (1 Ch 6: 38, 40, 42, 2 Ch 32). ZIMRAN.—A son of Abraham and Keturan, Gn 25: 1 Ch 1: 1. The etiological specification of the word is doubtful. The name is derived from zerem, 'mountain-sheep or-goat,' this animal having doubtless been the totem of the clan.

ZIMRI.—1. A prince of the tribe of Simeon, slain by Phinehas (Nu 25: 4, 14, 1 Mac 29: 2). Son of Zerah, and grandfather or ancestor of Acham (1 Ch 27: 2); called Zabdi in Josh 7: 3. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8: 39, 40). See next article. 3. All the kings of Zimri are mentioned in the same verse, Jer 22: 30, with those of Elam and the Medes as among those who were to drink the cup of the fury of the Lord. There is considerable doubt as to what place is meant, or even as to the genuineness of the phrase.

ZIMRI seized the throne of Israel by the murder of his king Elah, but held it only seven days before Omri, another general of the army, asserted himself as claimant. Omri, as is well known, was the stronger, and established himself after disposing of two opponents. The character of Zimri, as one who caused Israel to sin by following in the ways of Jeroboam, is due to the author's desire to pronounce judgment on all the kings of the Northern Kingdom (1 K 16: 29-34).

ZIN (Nu 13: 20-27, 33: 4-6, Dt 34: 2, Jos 13: 3).—A region passed through by the Israelites in their journeys. The most exact indication of its position is given in Nu 14 and Jos 15. In Nu 13: 26 the wilderness of Zin' is named as the southern limit from which the spies began to search the land. In Nu 33: 15 it is given as one of the stations in the journeys. In Jos 13: 26, which are duplicates, the wilderness of Zin' is given as the southern limit from which the spies began to search the land. In Nu 33: 15 it is given as one of the stations in the journeys. The brief note, 'the same is Kadesh,' serves to explain the following verse ('And they journeyed from Kadesh...'). Nu 20: 1 records the arrival of the children of Israel 'in the wilderness of Zin.' In the first month (the year is not stated), and the following vv. 1-12 relate the events which took place at Meribah. The remaining two passages, Nu 27 and Dt 32, which are duplicates, refer to the punishment of Moses for his offence at 'the waters of Meribah of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.' Hence it may be inferred (a) that the Wilderness of Zin formed part of the southern boundary of Judah at its eastern extremity and towards the Dead Sea; (b) that Kadesh was included within its limits. The close similarity between the events recorded in Ex 17 and Nu 20, and other points of resemblance between occurrences before and after Sinai, suggest the question whether Sin and Zin, the Sin of the pre-Sinai and the Zin of the post-Sinai narrative, may be variations developed in the course of tradition. The hypothesis does not appear improbable, but the narrative in its present form indicates two regions bearing different names. Cf. TABNIT, Sin (Wilderness of).

ZIZA.—See ZEFAH.

ZION.—See JERUSALEM, esp. 11. 1.

ZIDOR.—A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15: 27), probably to be identified with the modern village Zer'sin, about 6 miles N.E. of Hebron.

ZIPH.—1. A son of Jehallelel (1 Ch 4: 42). 2. A city of Southern Judah (Jos 15: 34). Its site has not been recovered. 3. A city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15: 36), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11: 3). Its wilderness was the place of the residence of David when fleeing from Saul (1 S 23: 14, 15 26: 4). The gentile name Ziphites occurs in 1 S 31: 26 (LXX only) 26: 2, Ps 54: 4 (LXX). Ziph is Tell Zif, S.E. of Hebron.

ZIPPOR.—1. A son of Jashmeel (1 Ch 4: 42).

ZIPPOR.——See ZAPOR.

ZIPPOR.——An unknown point on the northern frontier of Canaan (Nu 34: 14); perhaps the same as Sibraim of Ezekiel 47: 1.

ZIPPOR.——Father of Balak (Nu 22: 5, 14, 23: 23), Jos 24: 1. The name, which doubtless in this case and in that of Zipporah has a totemistic significance, means 'sparrow.'

ZIPPOR.——One of the daughters of the priest of Midian, Ex 2: 22 (J), wife of Moses and mother of Gershom. According to 18 (E), she had another son. For the incident of Ex 4: 20, see Moses, p. 652 A.

ZIV.—See art. TIME.

ZIZ.—The ascent of Ziz is mentioned in 2 Ch 20: 30 as the way by which the allied Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim made their way up from En-gedi to attack Jehoshaphat at Jerusalem. It has been identified as an ascent near En-gedi from the plain of the Dead Sea to the tableland of Judah. The Roman road from En-gedi to Jerusalem followed this track. H. L. WILLETT.

ZIZAH.—A Gersomite Levite (1 Ch 23: 1). The name, prob. by a copyist's error, appears in v. 18 as ZINAH.

ZOAN.—A city in the N.E. of Lower Egypt (Egypt, Zon, Gr. Tanis).—It is now Sm el-Hagar, one of the most important of the ancient sites in Lower Egypt, with ruins of a great temple. The 21st Dyn. arose in Tanis, and it was probably a favourite residence of the Pharaohs, though it is now in the midst of a barren salt marsh, with only a few fishermen as inhabitants. Ramasses II. placed in the temple a colossal of himself in granite, the greatest known, which Petrie calculates from the fragments to have measured 92 feet in height. Zoan is not mentioned in Genesis, but elsewhere (Ps 78: 41, 42, 19: 14, 36, Ezek 30: 14) it appears as almost or quite the capital of Egypt, perhaps as being the royal city nearest to the frontier. Tanis was very ancient; the curious reference to its building in Nu 13: 20 cannot be explained as yet. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ZOAR.—See PLAIN (CITIES OF THE), LOT.

ZOBAH.—An Aramese community, the most powerful of the coalition of 'Syrian' States which made ZOBEH.-—A Judahite (1 Ch 4:9).

ZOHAR.—1. Father of Epibl the Hittite (Gn 23: 22). 2. A Simeonite family (Gn 46:14 Ex 6:9); called in Nu 26:14 and 1 Ch 4:7 Zarah. 3. A Judahite family, according to the Keri of 1 Ch 4:4, which was followed in AV of 1611. The Kethibh is incorrectly reproduced in modern edd. of AV as 'Jesroa,' and in RV as 'Ishhar.'

ZOHELETH. STONE OP.—An object mentioned in connexion with the attempt of Adonijah to overthrow the throne of Israel (1 K 1:8). It was near the spring Engropolitan, which is supposed to be the 'Virgin's Fountain' in the Kidron valley. Its name ('serpent's stone' or 'brilliant stone') has not been explained, but it was evidently a sacred rock or stone. H. L. Willetts.

ZOHETH.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4:9).

ZOPH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7:6, 8).

ZOPHAN.—An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:8 (11)) = Zuph of v. 20 (26) and 1 S 1.

ZOPHAR.—The third in order of Job's three friends, described in the LXX as 'king of the Mines' (Job 2:6); probably the chief of a tribe on the borders of Idumaea. Ct. art. Jow, esp. 2 (8).

ZOPHIP.—The 'field of Zophim' was one of the spots to which Balak took Balaam to view Israel, Nu 23:3 (JE). It is questionable whether we have here a proper name; the Heb. expression means literally 'field of viewers or lookers out.' Such 'places of watching' were naturally situated frequently on the tops of hills. On the impossible combination Ramathaim-zophim of 1 S 1 see Ramah, 4.

ZORAH.—A town allotted to Judah, according to Jos 15:8; but elsewhere spoken of as Danitah (Jos 19:6, Jg 18:3, 8; 11); specially noted as the home of Samson (Jg 13:5, 25), who was buried between Zorah and Eshtaol (18:3). It was fortified by Rehoboam (1 Ch 11:4), and is mentioned in Neh 11:18 as peopled by Judahites after the Captivity. The gentilic name Zorathites occurs in 1 Ch 22:4 and prob. 26 (where read Zorathites for Zorites). Zorah is the modern Sur'ah on the northern side of Wady es-Surur (the Valley of Sorak) opposite 'At Shams (Beth-shemesh), which lies on the southern side.

ZORITES.—See ZORAH.

ZOROASTRIANISM.—See MAGI.

ZOROBABEL.—See ZERUBBABEL.

ZORQUELEUS (AV Berzulius, 1 Es 5:4—Barzillal of Ezr 2:6 and Neh 7:4).—A daughter of his, named Augiis, is mentioned as married to Addus, the ancestor of a priestly family, who could not trace their genealogy at the return under Zerubbabel.

ZUAR.—Father of Netheunel the head of the tribe of Issassar (Nu 1:26 17:1 104).

ZUPH.—1. An ancestor of Samuel (1 S 1:1, 1 Ch 6:9 (39); called in v. 28 (11) Zophai). 2. The land of Zuph (1 S 9:9) probably derived its name from having been originally settled by the family of Zuph. The gentilic name Zuphite probably underlies the name Ramathaim-zophim of 1 S 1. No known site can be said to contain any certain trace of the name Zuph.

ZURIEL.—A Maranite chief (Nu 3:4).

ZURISHADDAI.—Father of Shelumiel, the chief of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 1:23 7:4 104).

ZUZIM.—One of the nations defeated by Jehoram and his allies when they went against the cities of the plain (Gn 14). It is described as being in Ham. This name is read by some as Cham (i.e. with initial heth, not he as in MT) and regarded as possibly identical with 'Ammon (interchange between the aspirates heth and Ayim), the Ammonites being descended from Ben-ammi, son of Lot's second daughter (Gn 19:38). This identification of Ammon with Ham has led to the suggestion that Zuzim and Zamzummim (Dt 20:29) were the same, by the contraction of am and um to g, which may be supported by Babylonian analogies. Robinson points out that Zuzim reminds one of Zita (Ptol. v. xvii, 6) between Bosra and Leboin. T. G. Pinches.

ADDITIONAL NOTE TO ARTICLE 'ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.'
For the reign of Dungi we have the additional information that 'he cared greatly for Eridu, which was on the shore of the sea,' and that he sacked Babylon. Gudea was his contemporary at Shuruppak. On the fall of this dynasty the power passed to Isin, where the following dynasty reigned. The place of Gungunnu is not certain.

Damkī-lišu, his son

This last king has been thought to be a contemporary of Ammunitana, who, in the last year of his reign, destroyed the wall of Isin 'which the men of Damkī-lišu had erected.' But the reference may be to the third king of the second dynasty; and in any case is not very clear.

Two new names, Urra-imitti and Bel-lbni, are now to be placed high in the list of Assyrian kings. The latter was a gardener whom Urra-imitti raised to be his successor. They appear to have preceded Ilu-shumas, whom we now know to have been king of Assyria and contemporary with Sumu-abi, founder of the first dynasty of Babylon. Sulli may be another form of the name of Sumu-laššu, the second king of this dynasty, who thus reigned over Assyria as well.

We further learn that Hammurabi's conquest of Rim-Sin was not final, for Samsu-Iluna had to fight with him again. Samsu-Iluna also fought with Ilu-maššu, who was king of the Sea-land, and Abshu later waged indecisive war with him. In the time of Samsu-satana the Hittites invaded the land of Akkad. Ea-gamil, the last king of the second dynasty apparently, and king of the Sea-land, attacked Elam, but was defeated and deposed by the brother of Bitlilashu the Kassite. Agum, son of Bitlilashu, then conquered the Sea-land. These synchronisms, if the proposed identifications of the rulers named are correct, show that the second dynasty was contemporary partly with the first, partly with the third, and consequently that the dates of the first dynasty must be lowered. Whether the Kassite dynasty directly followed Samsu-satana is still uncertain.

Later, we learn that Adad-apiliddina was an Aramean usurper, and that in his reign the Sutu nomads ravaged Sumer and Akkad. The name of the Elamite who formed the seventh dynasty was Ašš-ilusur. A new Tiglath-pileser has to be added to the kings of Assyria. He was the father of Ashur-dan II. and son of Ashur-resh-īšu II., grandson of Ashur-rabi II. Hence the Tiglath-pileser of R.C. 731 becomes IV. Merodach-baladan, 'the son of Baladan,' Marduk-apiliddina III., was the son of Nabu-shum . . . We get fresh information as to the troubled times in Babylonia after Senacherib destroyed Babylon; and the name of Erba-Marduk (who dispossessed the Arameans from the estates which they had seized in Babylonia and Borsippa, and restored Ešagila and E-sīna, the temples of Marduk and Nabu) is, with others, rescued to history.

The changes which these new facts involve are likely to give rise to much discussion, and will probably not be settled till we have still further information.
